“Law and Political Economy: Framings and Questions”

What would it mean to put themes of power, equality, and democracy at the center of legal scholarship? Doing so requires contesting what several of us have called the “Twentieth-Century Synthesis”: a pervasive view of law that encases “the market” from claims of justice and conceals it from analyses of power. The emerging “law and political economy” movement seeks to unsettle the conventional ways that law and economy have been theorized. The talk will consider the framings it has developed, and some neglected issues and problems that any such reframing will need to confront.
