His Government welcomed the draft resolution, which not only recognized Croatia’s sovereignty over its occupied territories and defined its international borders, but also called for control and demarcation of those borders. The draft resolution gave the United Nations ample legal ground to control the relevant borders of Croatia. Croatia also attached the utmost importance to paragraph 3 (d), which should be thoroughly planned and effectively executed. It believed that a peaceful settlement in Croatia was possible only if that paragraph was strictly implemented. The border mechanism could be made effective by taking measures beyond those expressed in the Vance plan and by imposing punitive measures against violators, in the form of sanctions. He noted, in that regard, that the Council had already established in resolution 871 (1993) that the sanctions regime imposed against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia could be linked to developments in the occupied territories in Croatia.

Croatia also welcomed operative paragraph 5 of the draft resolution, which stated that the final political solution in regard to the rights of the Croatian Serb minority must be consistent with the territorial integrity and sovereignty of Croatia. That paragraph, along with the third and fourth preambular paragraphs, confirmed and supported the territorial integrity of Croatia in its internationally recognized borders. Croatia hoped that both Knin and Belgrade would understand that message and would finally accept that the only way to achieve a solution to the problem of the occupied territories was for Belgrade to recognize Croatia and for Knin to permit the peaceful reintegration of the occupied territories into the legal and administrative systems of Croatia. The speaker expressed the concern of his delegation that the draft resolution did not give enough consideration to the right of displaced persons and refugees to return to their homes. His delegation hoped that the upcoming report of the Secretary-General might mitigate those concerns.⁵³⁵

Speaking before the votes on the draft resolutions, the representative of Indonesia stated that Croatia's sovereignty and territorial integrity could not be compromised. That must also remain a guiding principle for the United Nations presence in Croatia and in Bosnia and Herzegovina. In relation to the new United Nations Confidence Restoration Operation in Croatia (UNCRO), he stressed the importance of controlling the manner in which military personnel, equipment, supplies and weapons crossed the international borders between Croatia and Bosnia and Herzegovina, and between Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. He also emphasized that the troop strength of UNCRO should be sufficient not only to implement the operation's mandate, but also to serve a deterrent function. Another important element of the UNCRO mandate was facilitating the delivery of humanitarian assistance to Bosnia and Herzegovina through Croatian territory. In relation to the operations in Bosnia and Herzegovina, the speaker noted that his delegation wished to draw attention to the past discrepancies between the UNPROFOR mandate and its implementation, and to emphasize the importance of effective implementation. In that connection, his delegation emphasized the importance of the tenth preambular paragraph of the second draft resolution on the need for Member States to take appropriate steps to enhance UNPROFOR's capacity to execute its mandate.⁵³⁶

The representative of Germany pointed out that the fact that a new mandate for the presence of the United Nations had become necessary was, in his delegation's view, a consequence of the obstructive attitude of the Croatian Serbs towards the United Nations peacekeeping plan for Croatia. Also the Serbian refusal to implement the Vance plan had become a major problem for UNPROFOR in Croatia. The speaker welcomed the decision of the Croatian President to agree to a continued but modified presence of the United Nations. Germany shared the view of the Secretary-General that a three-phase process of negotiations — ceasefire; implementation of the Economic Agreement; and political negotiations — was the only practical path to durable peace. It welcomed the fact that that was also the basic approach underlying the mandate of UNCRO. He expressed concern at the continued refusal of the Government of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia to recognize Bosnia and Herzegovina and Croatia, which he suggested was effectively blocking the peace process. Finally, the speaker stressed that close cooperation between the three peacekeeping operations and NATO would be essential.⁵³⁷

The representative of the Russian Federation stated that the adoption of a new mandate for the operation in Croatia was absolutely necessary, but was only a first step. The Secretary-General had work of the utmost importance to do on continuing the consultations on the implementation of the mandate and the modalities for the operation, all aspects of which had to be acceptable to both parties. The Government of Croatia and local Serb authorities must demonstrate a constructive attitude to the discussions. Turning to the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina, the speaker urged the parties to abide strictly by the agreements on a ceasefire and the cessation of hostilities and to cooperate with UNPROFOR in carrying out the provisions of those agreements. He also urged the Bosnian Serbs to accept the Contact Group plan. He contended that the flare-up of hostilities in Bosnia and Herzegovina was linked to the illegal supplies of arms to the region, which were hardening the positions of the parties and creating the impression that the conflict could be resolved by military means. There must be a "clamp-down" in implementing the arms embargo against all the Republics of the former Yugoslavia, established by resolution 713 (1991). The Security Council must pay greater attention to the issue and the Committee on sanctions should take up the problem of the violations of the embargo, as the Council had instructed it to do. The Russian Federation attached particular importance to the fact that the Security Council, in reorganizing UNPROFOR and establishing three independent peacekeeping operations, had taken the important decision to maintain a unified political and military command for the three operations.⁵³⁸

The first draft resolution⁵³⁹ was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 981 (1995), which reads:

The second draft resolution⁵⁴⁰ was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 982 (1995), which reads as follows:

The Security Council,

The third draft resolution⁵⁴¹ was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 983 (1995), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolution 795 (1992) of 11 December 1992 and all subsequent relevant resolutions,

Affirming its commitment to the search for an overall negotiated settlement of the conflicts in the former Yugoslavia ensuring the sovereignty and territorial integrity of all the States there within their internationally recognized borders, and stressing the importance it attaches to the mutual recognition thereof,

Reaffirming its commitment to the independence, sovereignty and territorial integrity of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia,

Recalling its concern about possible developments which could undermine confidence and stability in the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia or threaten its territory,

Welcoming the positive role played by the United Nations Protection Force in the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, and paying tribute to the personnel of the Force in the performance of its mandate in the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia,

Taking note of the report of the Secretary-General of 22 March 1995,

1. Welcomes the report of the Secretary-General of 22 March 1995, and in particular approves the arrangements contained in paragraph 84 thereof;

2. Decides that the United Nations Protection Force within the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia shall be known as the United Nations Preventive Deployment Force, with the mandate set out in paragraph 85 of the report of the Secretary-General of 22 March 1995, and that the mandate of the United Nations Preventive Deployment Force shall continue for a period terminating on 30 November 1995;

3. Urges the United Nations Preventive Deployment Force to continue the current cooperation between the United Nations Protection Force and the mission of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe;

4. Calls upon Member States to consider favourably requests by the Secretary-General for necessary assistance to the United Nations Preventive Deployment Force in the performance of its mandate;

5. Requests the Secretary-General to keep the Council regularly informed of any developments on the ground and other circumstances affecting the mandate of the United Nations Preventive Deployment Force;

6. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of the United States stated that the creation of the new force in Croatia underlined the Council's commitment to the sovereignty and territorial integrity of that country within its internationally recognized borders. His Government was concerned that goods were crossing those borders in violation of paragraph 12 of resolution 820 (1993), without Croatia's permission or knowledge. In Bosnia, his Government was concerned by the recent violations of the ceasefire. With regard to Bosnia and Herzegovina, the speaker noted that the presence of United Nations forces there was not an end in itself: to have meaning, it must contribute to political progress. Such progress was dependent, in turn, on the will of the parties. Here the responsibilities for failure rested on the Bosnian Serb party for its unwillingness to enter into negotiations on the basis of the Contact Group Plan. He stated that the changes to UNPROFOR acknowledged that the circumstances in the three countries differed and that specifically tailored mandates were required. At the same time, by retaining important links between the forces the Council was recognizing that tensions and conflict in the region were closely connected and that the efficiency of the operations was essential.⁵⁴²

⁵⁴² S/PV.3512, pp. 20-22.

The representative of France stated that the resolution just adopted, in relation to the situation in Croatia, should permit UNCRO to carry out several essential missions: implementation of the ceasefire agreement, the application of the Economic Agreement, and the monitoring of Croatia's international borders, which reflected the Council's concern that its sovereignty and territorial integrity be preserved. Keeping UNPROFOR in Bosnia and Herzegovina was not an end in itself. Its sole purpose was to facilitate the conclusion of a political settlement. Referring to the restructuring of UNPROFOR into three distinct operations, the speaker stated that his delegation was satisfied that the solution chosen preserved the unity of command and political leadership over the entire theatre, as well as the logistical and organizational interrelationship between the three Forces. His delegation believed that respect for that principle of unity strengthened both the security of the troops deployed and the means available to the United Nations. It emphasized that the theatre commander must continue to exercise full authority over all the Blue Helmets deployed throughout the territories of successor States to the former Yugoslavia. That meant that the civilian authorities under the Special Representative of the Secretary-General would not assume responsibilities within the chain of military command, and that the theatre commander would have full responsibility for the implementation of the three mandates entrusted to the United Nations forces.⁵⁴³

The representative of the United Kingdom noted that UNCRO would need to continue to monitor the ceasefire, which was vital to continued stability, and it would also need to facilitate the implementation of the Economic Agreement and monitor Croatia's internationally recognized borders. The United Kingdom remained fully committed to Croatia's sovereignty and territorial integrity. At the same time, it was essential that a satisfactory autonomous status and protection for individual rights be firmly established for the Krajina Serbs. The deployment of UNCRO would clear the way for further talks on economic normalization and on a political solution. In Bosnia, the United Kingdom appealed to all sides to show restraint and to cooperate with UNPROFOR in implementing the cessation-of-hostilities agreement, which should be extended in order to permit the political process to continue. The United Kingdom also urged the parties to respond constructively to the proposals of the Contact Group.⁵⁴⁴

The President, speaking in his capacity as the representative of China, reiterated China's position that the sovereignty and territorial integrity of the States of the region should be respected. Settlement of the conflict would ultimately depend on the peoples of the region themselves and must be achieved through peaceful means, with the United Nations peacekeeping operations playing only a complementary role. China hoped that the division of UNPROFOR into three parts, as proposed by the Secretary-General, would give further impetus to the political settlement process. For those reasons, the Chinese delegation had voted in favour of the three resolutions just adopted. The President stated that the United Nations peacekeeping operations should conform strictly to the purposes and principles of the Charter and should enjoy the consent and support of the parties concerned. He also reiterated China's reservations in relation to enforcement action and the use of force in peacekeeping operations under Chapter VII of the Charter.⁵⁴⁵

resolution 998 (1995)

On 30 May 1995, pursuant to resolutions 982 (1995) and 987 (1995), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on UNPROFOR.⁵⁴⁶

The Secretary-General reported that hostilities had intensified in and around Sarajevo, particularly after the expiry of the cessation-of-hostilities agreement on 1 May 1995, despite the persistent efforts of his Special Representative to obtain its renewal. That had led to the sustained use of heavy weapons by the two sides, increased civilian and UNPROFOR casualties and mounting calls for stricter enforcement of the exclusion zone. As previous measures had failed and as neither side had appeared ready to stop fighting, UNPROFOR had decided to use all available means to restore compliance with the Sarajevo agreement of February 1994. At the expiration of an ultimatum by UNPROFOR addressed to both parties, air strikes had taken place on 25 and 26 May 1995. Bosnian Serb forces had reacted by surrounding additional weapons collection points, taking United Nations military observers into custody and using a number of them as human shields and by cutting electricity to the city. A relative calm had eventually prevailed in Sarajevo at a high cost for UNPROFOR. The ability of UNPROFOR, however, to operate effectively throughout Bosnia and Herzegovina was seriously compromised.

The Secretary-General noted that UNPROFOR remained deployed in a war situation where there was no peace to keep. Its position was complicated by the fact that its original peacekeeping mandate, which could not be implemented without the cooperation of the parties, had gradually been enlarged to include elements of enforcement, which caused it to be seen as a party to the conflict. The safe-areas mandate, for instance, required it to cooperate and negotiate with a party upon whom it was also expected to call air strikes. Similarly, the United Nations had imposed sanctions upon one party, whilst at the same time sending out a Force that was obliged to work with the consent and cooperation of that party. The result was that Bosnian Serb leaders had largely withdrawn their consent and cooperation from UNPROFOR, declaring that they were applying their own “sanctions” to the United Nations in response to United Nations sanctions on them. As a result of those contradictions, UNPROFOR found itself in an intolerable predicament. Urgent measures needed to be taken to release the hostages, to adapt the UNPROFOR mandate and its implementation to the political and operational realities on the ground and to relaunch the peace process.

The Secretary-General presented four options as to the future role of UNPROFOR: withdraw UNPROFOR, leaving only a small political mission, if the parties so wished; retain its existing tasks and methods; change the existing mandate to permit the greater use of force; or revise the mandate to include only those tasks that a peacekeeping operation could realistically be expected to perform in the circumstances prevailing in Bosnia and Herzegovina. The Secretary-General was of the opinion that the fourth option would give UNPROFOR a realistic mandate.

By a letter dated 9 June 1995 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁵⁴⁷ the Secretary-General conveyed a proposal by the Governments of France, the Netherlands and the United Kingdom to provide military reinforcements for UNPROFOR in order to reduce the vulnerability of its personnel and enhance its capacity to carry out its mandate.⁵⁴⁸ The three Governments had made it clear that their intention was that the reinforced UNPROFOR would continue to be a peacekeeping mission. The Secretary-General noted that the proposal would provide the Commander of UNPROFOR with well-armed and mobile forces, with which to respond promptly to threats to United Nations personnel. He therefore recommended that the Security Council accept the proposal, as it would enhance the ability of UNPROFOR to continue its humanitarian efforts, with less danger to its personnel. In order to accommodate the additional troops that would be required under the reinforcements, the Council would need to increase the authorized UNPROFOR troop levels by 12,500.

At its 3543rd meeting, on 16 June 1995, the Council included the above-mentioned report and letter in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representatives of Bosnia and Herzegovina, Croatia, Egypt, Malaysia and Turkey, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (Germany) then drew the attention of the Council members to the text of a draft resolution submitted by the Czech Republic, France, Germany, Honduras, the Netherlands, Oman and the United Kingdom.⁵⁴⁹ He also read out a revision that had been made to the draft in its provisional form, and referred to several other documents.⁵⁵⁰

The representative of Bosnia and Herzegovina stated that the measures offered to his country by the United Nations, which had helped to sustain its people, had almost totally “evaporated”. Sarajevo, Srebrenica, Zepa, Gorazde and Bihac were being denied any humanitarian assistance, and the “stranglehold” was tightening without response. Furthermore, Serbian forces had become so emboldened as to take United Nations personnel as human shields. In addition, the exclusion zone was being violated by the Serbs and ignored by those who were obligated to enforce it. The Government of Bosnia and Herzegovina looked forward to the deployment of the rapid-reaction force and expected that it would enable the United Nations mission to be fully and faithfully implemented.⁵⁵¹

The representative of Malaysia stated that by taking United Nations peacekeepers hostage and defying Security Council resolutions, the Bosnian Serbs were giving the impression that the United Nations, and in particular the Security Council, was ineffective in addressing a threat to international peace and security. His delegation did not agree with the attempt to characterize UNPROFOR as merely a peacekeeping operation and to downplay the Force's mandate relating to its enforcement responsibilities. The UNPROFOR mandate had been clearly spelled out in the relevant Security Council resolutions, including in the context of Chapter VII of the Charter and its enforcement. He further stated that the existing mandate was suffering from a lack of implementation, and UNPROFOR should be provided with the means necessary for its full implementation. Of the four options proposed by the Secretary-General, the Malaysian delegation favoured option C, being of the view that assertive action could be taken without changing the existing mandate. It did not agree that option D was the way to move forward and argued that that option would weaken the UNPROFOR mandate rather than strengthen it. Malaysia welcomed the establishment of the rapid reaction capacity to assist UNPROFOR in the robust implementation of its mandate. The rapid reaction capacity should also be used for the protection of the civilian population, particularly in the safe areas, with air support from NATO, in addition to the protection of UNPROFOR personnel. The rapid reaction capacity should also establish land corridors for humanitarian aid. It was also necessary to withdraw the United Nations military observers, who had become "pawns" in the Serb strategy to embarrass the United Nations. Malaysia also stressed the need for security guarantees for the Bosnian Government in terms of its right to self-defence, as provided for in the Charter, including by lifting the arms embargo.⁵⁵²

The representative of Egypt commented on some aspects of the Secretary-General's report. First, in order to ensure the credibility of the United Nations and to force the Serb party to respect international legality, the provisions of the Charter should be applied, and the resolutions of the Council should be implemented. Secondly, the international community must not accept the demilitarization of the safe areas. While the purpose of the safe area was to provide international protection for the territories and their population, their demilitarization would mean that they would be under the Serb forces' domination if the international forces withdraw or were unable to ensure their defence. Thirdly, the options available to the Council must be studied in the light of the detailed information contained in the report, because the four operations could not be studied in isolation from other options and possibilities. The third option would presuppose a strengthening of the mandate, but it would also mean modifying that mandate. That was not possible because the current mandate of UNPROFOR was sufficient. Lastly, Egypt supported the conclusions of the Secretary-General that the international mediation efforts had come to a standstill, and that the Council should therefore reassess the situation and adopt another initiative to relaunch the peace process.⁵⁵³

The representative of Croatia stated that his country welcomed the establishment of the rapid reaction force and was ready to provide logistical support. It was Croatia's understanding that, while the rapid reaction force would use some command and logistic facilities on the territory of Croatia, its theatre of operation would be exclusively on the territory of Bosnia and Herzegovina. The Government of Croatia was of the firm view that any operational use of the rapid reaction force on Croatian territory could proceed only with its prior consent.⁵⁵⁴

The representative of Turkey stated that the international community was committed, under General Assembly and Security Council resolutions, to preserving the territorial integrity, unity and independence of Bosnia and Herzegovina. He noted that almost all of the Security Council resolutions on Bosnia and Herzegovina referred to Chapter VII of the Charter and he contended that UNPROFOR had been established as a protection force and had therefore never been a traditional peacekeeping force. It was the strong conviction of his Government that UNPROFOR should be reinforced so that it could implement its existing mandate robustly and in full. Noting that the Force's commitment to protect the safe areas pursuant to resolutions 824 (1993) and 836 (1993) had yet to be carried out, he argued that UNPROFOR needed to be strengthened in such a way as to enable it to act vigorously to deter attacks on the safe areas. His delegation also supported the establishment of the rapid reaction force.⁵⁵⁵

⁵⁵² Ibid., pp. 3-5.

⁵⁵³ Ibid., pp. 5-6.

⁵⁵⁴ Ibid., pp. 6-7.

Speaking before the vote, the representative of Nigeria observed that, although all arguments seemed to militate in favour of a total withdrawal of the United Nations from Bosnia and Herzegovina, there was agreement that Bosnia should not be abandoned, that humanitarian assistance must continue to be rendered and that the civilian populations must be protected to the extent possible. There was also agreement that the war must be contained and that the credibility of the United Nations must not be allowed to suffer irreparably through a precipitate withdrawal. The Security Council's response to the report of the Secretary-General — to increase the number of troops in Bosnia to protect UNPROFOR better and enhance its ability to discharge its duties — did not answer some of the pertinent questions raised by the Secretary-General. Nigeria would go along with the draft resolution, however, due to its belief that countries in the region had a primary responsibility to resolve the crisis, and in the light of its commitment not to abandon Bosnia as it tried to defend its sovereignty and territorial integrity. The Government of Nigeria also hoped that initiatives on the diplomatic political track would resume and would be pursued with vigour.⁵⁵⁶

The representative of the Russian Federation stated that, while measures must be taken to prevent attacks against United Nations personnel, the main lessons to be drawn from the Bosnian crisis were that the use of force was not a panacea, and that decisive action was needed to achieve a breakthrough for a political settlement. In principle, the Russian Federation favoured enhancing the security of United Nations personnel, including through providing UNPROFOR with a rapid reaction capability. Strengthening the Force's ability to protect the lives and safety of its peacekeepers, however, should in no way make them a party to the conflict. Referring to the draft resolution, the speaker noted that it was of paramount importance that it called for the maintenance of the impartial, peacekeeping nature of UNPROFOR. He further noted that the sponsors of the draft resolution did take into account several proposals by the Russian Federation. The draft resolution, however, did not manage to avoid the impression that the rapid reaction force was intended to operate against one of the Bosnian parties. While sharing the anger of others over the inadmissible acts that had been committed by the Bosnian Serbs, his delegation could not fail to note that the Government of Bosnia and Herzegovina bore responsibility for provocations, for violating agreements and for direct attacks on UNPROFOR. His delegation had also proposed a reference to the inadmissible violations of the arms embargo in the former Yugoslavia, but it had not been incorporated. The Security Council must take genuine steps to put an end to such violations. The Russian Federation was also concerned at the haste with which the draft resolution had been brought before the Council, meaning that the Council had not had time to agree on reliable guarantees against attempts to use the rapid reaction force to involve UNPROFOR in the conflict. In the light of those circumstances, the Russian Federation would be forced to abstain in the voting.⁵⁵⁷

The representative of Indonesia stated that his delegation endorsed the paramount objective of the draft resolution, which was to provide UNPROFOR with the necessary means to implement its mandate. The establishment of the rapid reaction force was an important step in pursuing that objective. Although the support and cooperation of the parties was a prerequisite for any peacekeeping operation, in the case of Bosnia and Herzegovina that requirement had been manipulated by the Bosnian Serbs, thereby eroding the authority of UNPROFOR. It was necessary to address such tactics with decisiveness, in order to ensure the effective implementation of Security Council resolutions. The deployment of a rapid reaction force should enhance the capability of ⁵⁵⁷ Ibid., pp. 9-11.

UNPROFOR to ensure the security of the civilian population in the safe areas, which was one of its most important tasks. While his delegation was cognizant of the calls for the demilitarization of safe areas as a means to enhance the protection of the civilian population therein, it believed, however, that demilitarization which was confined to the safe areas was inherently unjust. It was tantamount to depriving the victims of the necessary means to protect themselves while leaving the aggressors free to continue and intensify their attacks from the surrounding areas. It was in that context that the Non-Aligned Movement caucus had proposed that demilitarization based on mutual agreements should apply not only to safe areas, but also to their immediate surroundings. The speaker further emphasized that the demilitarization of the safe areas and their surrounding areas should be carried out with due regard for the need to respect the sovereignty, territorial integrity and political independence of Bosnia and Herzegovina, in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations, including its right to defend itself.⁵⁵⁸

The representative of Honduras stated that the purpose of UNPROFOR was to keep the peace, not to impose it. A revision of the Force's mandate in order to allow it to take military action without the cooperation of one of the parties or to ensure the protection of its own personnel was not a viable possibility. His delegation supported the proposal for the integration of a rapid reaction force under United Nations command and available to UNPROFOR, not only because its objective was to strengthen the Force's capacity to fulfil its mandate, but also because it would enable UNPROFOR to continue as a peacekeeping operation. Referring to the question of the safe areas, the speaker argued that the military presence of the parties in the "safe areas" was totally inconsistent with the fundamental principles that should govern those areas. His delegation therefore agreed with the provisions of the draft resolution relating to the need to demilitarize the safe areas by mutual agreement.⁵⁵⁹

The representative of China stated that the establishment of the rapid reaction force under Chapter VII of the Charter was for the purpose of enforcement actions and therefore brought about a de facto change in the status of UNPROFOR. Once the force was put into action, UNPROFOR was bound to become a party to the conflict, thus depriving it of its status as a peacekeeping force. The establishment of the rapid reaction force would also increase substantially the peacekeeping expenditure of the United Nations. Given that the United Nations was experiencing a financial crisis, it was all the more necessary for the Security Council to act within the means available to it, without wilfully increasing the burden of the States Members of the United Nations. It was neither appropriate nor desirable to finance the establishment of the rapid reaction force from the United Nations peacekeeping budget. The Chinese delegation could not support the draft resolution, since many of its elements ran counter to its principled position. Taking into account, however, the fact that many developing countries wished the Security Council to take appropriate measures to alleviate the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina, as well as the fact that the draft resolution stressed the importance of a political settlement and of protecting the security of United Nations personnel, and as the draft had incorporated some of its proposed amendments, China would abstain from the subsequent vote.⁵⁶⁰

The representative of the Czech Republic stated that the draft resolution preserved the peacekeeping nature of UNPROFOR. It was easy to argue that there was no peace to keep in Bosnia and Herzegovina. The important aspect, however, was that, peace or not, UNPROFOR was not turning into a peacemaking or a peace-enforcement operation. The Czech delegation was satisfied that Chapter VII of the Charter was invoked only in the context of the Force's self-defence and freedom of movement. The Security Council would therefore be emphasizing once more, through the draft resolution, that peaceful negotiations, not war, were the way to settle the conflict.⁵⁶¹

The representative of the United States stated that her Government supported the deployment of a rapid reaction force for the purpose of defending UNPROFOR personnel and enabling the peacekeeping mission to fulfil its mandate in a more robust and successful fashion. However, because of the enormous cost of UNPROFOR and the existing budgetary situation in Washington, the United States could not agree to funding the rapid deployment force through the normal United Nations peacekeeping assessment process. Nevertheless, it stood ready to consider all reasonable alternatives.⁵⁶²

The draft resolution, as orally revised in its provisional form, was then put to the vote and adopted by 13 votes to none, with 2 abstentions (China, Russian Federation), as resolution 998 (1995), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling all its earlier relevant resolutions,

Reaffirming the mandate of the United Nations Protection Force as referred to in resolution 982 (1995) of 31 March 1995 and the need for its full implementation,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 30 May 1995,

Having considered also the letter dated 9 June 1995 from the Secretary-General to the President of the Security Council and the annex thereto,

Noting that the rapid reaction force referred to in the above-mentioned letter will be an integral part of the existing United Nations peacekeeping operation and that the status of the United Nations Protection Force and its impartiality will be maintained,

Deeply concerned by the continuing armed hostilities in the territory of the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina,

Expressing its deep regret that the situation in the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina has continued to deteriorate and that the parties were not able to agree to a further ceasefire following the breakdown of the ceasefire agreement of 23 December 1994 and its subsequent expiration on 1 May 1995,

Gravely concerned that the regular obstruction of deliveries of humanitarian assistance, and the denial of the use of Sarajevo airport by the Bosnian Serb side threaten the ability of the United Nations in Bosnia and Herzegovina to carry out its mandate,

Condemning in the strongest possible terms all attacks by the parties on United Nations Protection Force personnel,

Condemning also the increasing attacks on the civilian population by Bosnian Serb forces,

Determined to enhance the protection of the United Nations Protection Force and to enable it to carry out its mandate,

Noting the letter dated 14 June 1995 from the Minister for Foreign Affairs of the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina addressed to the President of the Security Council, welcoming the reinforcement of the United Nations Protection Force,

Stressing the importance at this juncture of renewed efforts to achieve an overall peaceful settlement,

Underlining once again the urgent need for acceptance by the Bosnian Serb party of the Contact Group peace plan as a starting point, opening the way to the negotiation of such an overall peaceful settlement,

Reaffirming the sovereignty, territorial integrity and political independence of the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina,

Reaffirming further that the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina, as a State Member of the United Nations, enjoys the rights provided for in the Charter of the United Nations,

Determining that the situation in the former Yugoslavia continues to be a threat to international peace and security,

Reaffirming its determination to ensure the security of the United Nations Peace Forces/United Nations Protection Force and freedom of movement for the accomplishment of all its missions, and, to these ends, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

1. Demands that the Bosnian Serb forces release immediately and unconditionally all remaining detained United Nations Protection Force personnel, and further demands that all parties fully respect the safety of Force personnel and others engaged in the delivery of humanitarian assistance and ensure their complete freedom of movement;

2. Emphasizes that there can be no military solution to the conflict, stresses the importance it attaches to vigorous pursuit of a political settlement, and reiterates its demand that the Bosnian Serb party accept the Contact Group peace plan as a starting point;

3. Calls upon the parties to agree without further delay to a ceasefire and a complete cessation of hostilities in the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina;

4. Demands that all parties allow unimpeded access for humanitarian assistance to all parts of the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina and, in particular, to the safe areas;

5. Demands also that the Bosnian Serb forces comply immediately with the agreement of 5 June 1992 and ensure unimpeded access by land to Sarajevo;

6. Demands further that the parties respect fully the status of the safe areas and, in particular, the need to ensure the safety of the civilian population therein;

7. Underlines the need for a mutually agreed demilitarization of the safe areas and their immediate surroundings and the benefits this would bring to all parties in terms of the cessation of attacks on the safe areas and of launching military attacks therefrom;

8. Encourages, in this context, the Secretary-General further to intensify efforts aimed at reaching agreement with the parties on the modalities for demilitarization, taking particular account of the need to ensure the safety of the civilian population, and calls upon the parties to cooperate fully with these efforts;

9. Welcomes the letter dated 9 June 1995 from the Secretary-General on the reinforcement of the United Nations Protection Force and the establishment of a rapid reaction capacity to enable the United Nations Peace Forces/United Nations Protection Force to carry out its mandate;

10. Decides accordingly to authorize an increase in United Nations Peace Forces/United Nations Protection Force personnel, acting under the present mandate and on the terms set out in the above-mentioned letter, by up to 12,500 additional troops, the modalities of financing to be determined later;

11. Authorizes the Secretary-General to carry forward the implementation of paragraphs 9 and 10 above, maintaining close contact with the Government of the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina and others concerned;

12. Requests the Secretary-General, in taking any decisions with respect to the deployment of United Nations Protection Force personnel, to take full account of the need to enhance their security and minimize the dangers to which they might be exposed;

13. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of the United Kingdom welcomed the resolution just adopted. The increase in reinforcements would provide United Nations commanders, for the first time, with a credible rapid reaction capability. He argued that it was clear that the UNPROFOR mission remained one of peacekeeping. Its purpose was to facilitate the delivery of humanitarian aid, to assist the parties in developing and implementing ceasefire agreements and to provide a “breathing space” for the political process. His Government was determined to do everything possible to ensure that UNPROFOR was able to remain in Bosnia. But, ultimately, whether it did so was up to the parties themselves, UNPROFOR could only be successful if it had the continued consent and cooperation of all sides. The speaker, however, warned that if the parties instead insist on embracing the military option, if UNPROFOR was prevented from carrying out its tasks or it faced unacceptable risks, then there might be no choice but to withdraw UNPROFOR. Turning to the draft resolution, he speaker noted that his delegation had accepted the addition of the words at the end of paragraph 10 because it understood the domestic political difficulties facing the United States at that time. He argued, however, that the Security Council had no locus to take decisions on financial questions, as the Charter reserved to the General Assembly the responsibility for budgetary and financial matters. Therefore, the amendment of paragraph 10 could not change the financial procedures followed by the Organization.⁵⁶³

The representative of France stated that providing UNPROFOR with new means had a twofold objective, to assure the security of its personnel and to enable UNPROFOR to fulfil its mission. He emphasized that the Force’s nature would not change. The elements of the rapid reaction force would act in support of UNPROFOR within the framework of its mandate. The missions of that force would consist essentially of emergency actions to help isolated or threatened units to help in the redeployment of UNPROFOR elements in order to make them less vulnerable or facilitate their freedom of movement. He noted that the resolution contained a provision relating to the subsequent determination of the financial modalities and stated that his country understood that provision to mean that it was not up to the Council itself to establish the modalities for financing an operation upon which it had decided. In view of the serious difficulties faced by UNPROFOR on the ground, the Governments of France, the United Kingdom and the Netherlands, rather than electing to withdraw from Bosnia, had proposed that additional means be made available to the United Nations. The Government of France expected these new means to be used judiciously, but not weakly.⁵⁶⁴

The representative of Argentina stated that his delegation agreed with the Secretary-General that the peace process should be relaunched and intensified through new political initiatives. It therefore attached particular importance to paragraph 2 of the resolution just adopted. Referring to the rapid reaction force, the speaker argued that the use of force should be restricted to self-defence and should be engaged in with great care, lest the line between peacekeeping and peace enforcement be crossed.⁵⁶⁵

Decision of 19 August 1995 (3568th meeting):
statement by the President

By a letter dated 17 August 1995 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁵⁶⁶ the Secretary-General reported that his Special Representative for the former Yugoslavia and the UNPF/UNPROFOR Force Commander had undertaken consultations with the Governments of Bosnia and Herzegovina and Croatia, with a view to facilitating the deployment of the additional troops authorized by the Council under resolution 998 (1995) and the freedom of movement of the units of the rapid reaction force. Both Governments had taken the position that the additional troops were not part of the UNPF/UNPROFOR and were therefore not covered by the relevant status-of-forces agreement. The Governments further maintained that resolution 998 (1995) had been adopted after the conclusion of the status-of-forces agreement. The Special Representative had outlined the position of the United Nations, which was that the Council's decision to authorize the addition of the rapid reaction force did not exclude the expanded UNPF/UNPROFOR from the scope of the status-of-forces agreement. Once the Council had authorized a peacekeeping operation, it could at any time reduce or expand the strength of the operation, without having to conclude additional agreements. The Secretary-General warned that the position of the two Governments had delayed the deployment of the rapid reaction force, which could have serious consequences for the United Nations forces already deployed. Furthermore, the local Croat authorities in Bosnia and Herzegovina had been demanding that the United Nations sign an agreement with them governing the status of the rapid reaction force. The United Nations was of the view that the status-of-forces agreement was applicable throughout the entire territory, and it was not necessary to enter into such an agreement with the Federation of Bosnia and Herzegovina. The Special Representative had suggested to the Bosnian authorities that supplementary arrangements, as envisaged in article VIII of the existing status-of-forces agreement, be concluded to cover the issues in question. The United Nations would require that the supplementary arrangements contain a clause providing that, in the event of conflict between the supplementary arrangements and the status-of-forces agreement, the latter should prevail.

⁵⁶⁶ S/1995/707.

At its 3568th meeting, on 19 August, the Council included the above-mentioned letter in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representatives of Bosnia and Herzegovina and Croatia, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (Indonesia) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a letter dated 18 August 1995 from the representative of Bosnia and Herzegovina addressed to the President of the Security Council⁵⁶⁷ and stated that, after consultations among members of the Security Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁵⁶⁸

The Security Council is deeply concerned by the contents of the letter dated 17 August 1995 from the Secretary-General regarding the continued impediments to the functioning and deployment of the rapid reaction force established by resolution 998 (1995) of 16 June 1995. The Council reaffirms in this regard that the rapid reaction force is an integral part of the United Nations Peace Forces/United Nations Protection Force and that its deployment is crucial for the strengthening of the capacity of the United Nations Protection Force to carry out its mandate in the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina. It shares the Secretary-General's view that the existing status-of-forces agreements constitute an appropriate and sufficient basis for the presence of the United Nations Peace Forces/United Nations Protection Force, including the rapid reaction force. The Council is deeply concerned at the implications of the continued impediments to the functioning of the rapid reaction force for the effectiveness of the United Nations mission in the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina. It calls upon the Governments of the Republic of Croatia and the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina immediately to remove all impediments and to give clear undertakings concerning the freedom of movement and provision of facilities for the rapid reaction force, in order that it may perform its tasks without further delay. It further calls upon them to resolve forthwith within the framework of the existing status-of-forces agreements any outstanding difficulties with the relevant United Nations authorities. The Council supports fully the efforts of the Secretary-General in this matter and will return to this question in the light of a further report which the Council requests the Secretary-General to submit no later than 24 August 1995.

Decision of 2 December 1993: letter from the President to the Secretary-General

By a letter dated 1 December 1993 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁵⁶⁹ the Secretary-General referred to the senior-level staffing of the United Nations peacemaking and peacekeeping efforts related to the former Yugoslavia. He recalled that in May 1993 Mr. Thorvald Stoltenberg had been appointed as both Special Representative of the Secretary-General and Co-Chairman of the Steering Committee of the International Conference on the Former Yugoslavia. At that time it had been hoped that the Vance-Owen plan for Bosnia and Herzegovina would shortly be agreed and that thereafter the main focus of United Nations activities in the former Yugoslavia would be implementation of that plan on the ground, together with continuing efforts to implement the Vance plan related to the United Nations Protected Areas in Croatia. However, as the members of the Council were aware, the Vance-Owen plan had not been accepted and Mr. Stoltenberg remained heavily engaged in continuing negotiations. That had left him insufficient time to carry out in full the functions of Special Representative of the Secretary-General and Chief of Mission of UNPROFOR. Accordingly, and after consulting Mr. Stoltenberg and contacting the heads of Government and other parties directly concerned in the former Yugoslavia, the Secretary-General had come to the conclusion that the resumption of negotiations in Geneva, following the meeting there between the Foreign Ministers of the European Union, the Co-Chairmen of the Steering Committee of the Conference and the parties on 29 November 1993, made it necessary to separate the functions of Co-Chairman of the Steering Committee and Special Representative. Therefore, it was the Secretary-General's intention that Mr. Stoltenberg should continue to serve as Co-Chairman and that Mr. Yasushi Akashi, until recently the Secretary-General's Special Representative for Cambodia, should be appointed to the post of Special Representative for the former Yugoslavia and Chief of Mission of UNPROFOR. The Secretary-General further stated that he had so informed the heads of Government and other parties directly concerned in the former Yugoslavia.

By a letter dated 2 December 1993,⁵⁷⁰ the President of the Security Council informed the Secretary-General of the following:

I have the honour to inform you that your letter dated 1 December 1993 concerning the staffing of the United Nations peace keeping and peacemaking efforts in the former Yugoslavia has been brought to the attention of the members of the Council.

⁵⁷⁰ S/26839.

They take note of the information contained in your letter and agree with the proposal mentioned therein.

E. Establishment of an international tribunal for the prosecution of persons responsible for serious violations of international humanitarian law committed in the territory of the former Yugoslavia

Initial proceedings

Decision of 22 February 1993 (3175th meeting): resolution 808 (1993)

At its 3175th meeting, on 22 February 1993, the Security Council included the item entitled "Establishment of an international tribunal for the prosecution of persons responsible for serious violations of international humanitarian law committed in the territory of the former Yugoslavia" in its agenda. The Council also included the following documents in its agenda: a letter dated 10 February 1993 from the representative of France addressed to the Secretary-General, transmitting the report of a Committee of French jurists set up to study the establishment of an international criminal tribunal to judge the crimes committed in the former Yugoslavia;⁵⁷¹ a letter dated 16 February 1993 from the representative of Italy addressed to the Secretary-General, forwarding a draft statute for a tribunal for war crimes and crimes against humanity committed in the territory of the former Yugoslavia;⁵⁷² and a letter dated 18 February 1993 from the representative of Sweden addressed to the Secretary-General, transmitting the decision by the States of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe (CSCE) on a proposal for an international war crimes tribunal for the former Yugoslavia made by the Rapporteurs under the CSCE Moscow Human Dimension Mechanism to Bosnia and Herzegovina and Croatia.⁵⁷³

Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representatives of Bosnia and Herzegovina and Croatia, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The

President (Morocco) then drew the attention of the Council members to several documents,⁵⁷⁴ and to the text of a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.⁵⁷⁵

Speaking before the vote, the representative of Brazil stated that the information gathered by the Commission of Experts and by the Special Rapporteur of the Commission on Human Rights had provided substantial evidence of grave breaches of humanitarian law being committed on a massive scale and in a systematic fashion. The international community could not allow that to continue unpunished. These grave breaches of the most elementary norms of humanity must be treated as what they were: criminal acts, crimes against women and children and other defenceless victims, but also crimes against humanity. Brazil favoured strong action to ensure the full ascertainment of the truth about each of the cases of war crimes and crimes against humanity committed in the territory of the former Yugoslavia and, in that regard, supported the establishment of an international criminal tribunal to bring to justice the individuals found to be responsible for such "abominable acts".

The speaker further observed that it was of particular importance that the international tribunal should rest on a solid legal foundation, in order to ensure the effectiveness of its actions. Addressing the question of the best method for establishing an ad hoc international criminal tribunal, he noted that the authority of the Security Council was not self-constituted but originated from a delegation of powers by the whole membership of the Organization. The Security Council, in the exercise of its responsibilities, acted on behalf of the States Members of the United Nations, in accordance with Article 24 (1) of the Charter. Its powers could not be created, recreated or reinterpreted by decisions of the Council itself, but must be based on specific Charter provisions. Because the Council exercised a delegated responsibility, the task of interpreting its competence called for extreme caution, in particular when invoking Chapter VII of the Charter. The Security Council should play a strong and positive role in promoting the implementation of the various elements that would contribute to the peace efforts developed by the International Conference on the Former Yugoslavia, but that role should remain within the scope of the powers expressly granted to the Security Council in accordance with the Charter. In a rapidly changing world, Brazil considered it increasingly important to promote the rule of law in international relations by acting to ensure strict respect for the provisions of the Charter and other norms of international law.⁵⁷⁶

The representative of China stated that his delegation supported the thrust of the draft resolution and would therefore vote in favour. That vote would not, however, prejudice China's position on future Security Council actions on the subject.⁵⁷⁷

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted as resolution 808 (1993), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolution 713 (1991) of 25 September 1991 and all subsequent relevant resolutions,

Recalling paragraph 10 of its resolution 764 (1992) of 13 July 1992, in which it reaffirmed that all parties are bound to comply with the obligations under international humanitarian law, in particular the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949, and that persons who commit or order the commission of grave breaches of the Conventions are individually responsible in respect of such breaches,

Recalling also its resolution 771 (1992) of 13 August 1992, in which, inter alia, it demanded that all parties and others concerned in the former Yugoslavia, and all military forces in Bosnia and Herzegovina, immediately cease and desist from all breaches of international humanitarian law,

Recalling further its resolution 780 (1992) of 6 October 1992, in which it requested the Secretary-General to establish, as a matter of urgency, an impartial commission of experts to examine and analyse the information submitted pursuant to resolutions 771 (1992) and 780 (1992), together with such further information as the commission may obtain, with a view to providing the Secretary-General with its conclusions on the evidence of grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions and other violations of international humanitarian law committed in the territory of the former Yugoslavia,

Having considered the interim report of the Commission of Experts established pursuant to resolution 780 (1992), in which the Commission observed that a decision to establish an ad hoc international tribunal in relation to events in the territory of the former Yugoslavia would be consistent with the direction of its work,

Expressing once again its grave alarm at continuing reports of widespread violations of international humanitarian law occurring within the territory of the former Yugoslavia, including reports of mass killings and the continuance of the practice of "ethnic cleansing",

Determining that this situation constitutes a threat to international peace and security,

Determined to put an end to such crimes and to take effective measures to bring to justice the persons who are responsible for them,

Convinced that in the particular circumstances of the former Yugoslavia the establishment of an international tribunal would enable this aim to be achieved and would contribute to the restoration and maintenance of peace,

Noting in this regard the recommendation by the Co-Chairmen of the Steering Committee of the International Conference on the Former Yugoslavia for the establishment of such a tribunal,

Taking note with grave concern of the report of the European Community investigative mission into the treatment of Muslim women in the former Yugoslavia,

Taking note of the report of the committee of jurists submitted by France, the report of the commission of jurists submitted by Italy, and the report transmitted by the Permanent Representative of Sweden on behalf of the Chairman in Office of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe,

1. Decides that an international tribunal shall be established for the prosecution of persons responsible for serious violations of international humanitarian law committed in the territory of the former Yugoslavia since 1991;

2. Requests the Secretary-General to submit for consideration by the Council at the earliest possible date, and if possible no later than sixty days after the adoption of the present resolution, a report on all aspects of this matter, including specific proposals and where appropriate options for the effective and expeditious implementation of the decision contained in paragraph 1 above, taking into account suggestions put forward in this regard by Member States;

3. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of France stated that the atrocities committed by all sides in the Yugoslav crisis had given rise to an intolerable situation which was fanning the flames of conflict and, therefore, constituted a threat to international peace and security. Prosecuting the guilty was necessary in order to do justice to the victims and to the international community. It would also send a clear message to those continuing to commit such crimes that they would be held responsible for their acts. For the United Nations and, particularly, for the Security Council, prosecuting the guilty was also a matter of doing their duty to maintain and restore peace. With those considerations in mind, the French Foreign Minister had asked a group of jurists to draw up a report on setting up an international criminal tribunal that could prosecute persons responsible for the serious violations of international humanitarian law that had been committed in the territory of the former Yugoslavia since the beginning of Yugoslavia's dissolution. The report had concluded that the creation of an international tribunal for the former Yugoslavia could be decided on by the Security Council, within the framework of its powers under Chapter VII of the Charter to maintain or restore international peace and security. France had endorsed that conclusion and had taken the initiative of proposing to the Security Council a draft resolution for its implementation. The speaker further observed that the Security Council had taken a decision of major significance. For the first time in history, the United Nations would be setting up an international criminal jurisdiction — one that would be competent to try those who had committed serious violations of international humanitarian law in the territory of the former Yugoslavia. The tribunal should be established as soon as possible, through a further decision of the Security Council under the provisions of Chapter VII, which established the Council's competence in the maintenance and restoration of international peace and security.⁵⁷⁸

The representative of the United States stated that her delegation strongly supported the historic resolution just adopted, which took the first step in establishing an ad hoc tribunal to prosecute persons accused of war crimes and other serious violations of international humanitarian law in the territory of the former Yugoslavia. Her delegation looked forward to working with the Secretary-General to accomplish

expeditiously his task of providing the Council with options for a statute and rules of procedure of the tribunal. Once the Secretary-General's report had been received, the United States would act quickly, along with the other members of the Council, to establish a tribunal under Chapter VII.⁵⁷⁹

The representative of the United Kingdom said that it was vital that an international legal mechanism be established to bring those accused of war crimes, from whatever party to the conflict, to justice. His delegation welcomed the valuable work that had been done on possible mechanisms and which would contribute to the study by the Secretary-General of the most effective and feasible way of establishing a tribunal or a court. The Secretary-General's task would not be easy. The Commission of Experts in its interim report had noted the difficulties of identifying the perpetrators of those crimes. It was vital that whatever court or tribunal was established would be provided with the necessary evidence. The Commission must therefore be given adequate resources to continue its work. He noted that the "court" was an ad hoc legal framework to deal with war crimes committed only in the territory of the former Yugoslavia.⁵⁸⁰

The representative of the Russian Federation stated that the resolution just adopted reflected the international community's will to exert its influence on all parties to the conflict in order to accelerate the peace process. The legal basis, status, composition and powers of the international tribunal, and the modalities for its establishment and functioning, would be decided by the Council subsequently, but already the resolution should serve the purpose of "bringing to their senses" those who were ready to sacrifice the lives and dignity of hundreds of thousands of innocent people. The Russian delegation believed that resolution 808 (1993) would also serve as a warning to those guilty of mass crimes and flagrant violations of human rights in other parts of the world.⁵⁸¹

The representative of Hungary considered the Security Council's decision of the previous October to set up a Commission of Experts charged with studying and analyzing information on the grave violations of international humanitarian law in the former Yugoslavia, to be of great importance. Information and reports from various sources confirmed that the gravity and massive nature of those violations constituted a threat to international peace and security. Consequently, there should be no doubt about the competence of the Security Council to deal with the matter.⁵⁸²

The representative of Spain stated that his delegation understood that some might harbour certain doubts about the competence of the Council to take the step of establishing a tribunal, as it was a novel one. Spain did not share those doubts, however, for it was a limited and precise action with the clear objective of restoring peace, which was perfectly in keeping with the competence of the Council. In fact, the Council was not attempting to establish a new jurisdictional or legislative framework of a permanent nature. It was not setting itself up as a permanent judge or legislator. It was only attempting to create an ad hoc mechanism that, by applying existing laws, would assign responsibility for acts committed in an ongoing conflict that had already been seen to threaten and undermine peace. That mechanism would contribute, by means of recourse to justice and punishment of the guilty, to restoring the peace and ensuring its maintenance, so as to deter the repetition of similar acts in the future. The speaker noted that Spain would have preferred the establishment of a criminal tribunal with universal jurisdiction, but it recognized that to create one would have required more time than was available. Nevertheless, the Spanish delegation was confident that the resolution just adopted was the first step towards the future creation of an international, universal, permanent criminal jurisdiction, and it would continue to support and promote the efforts towards that end being made in other forums within the Organization.⁵⁸³

On 3 May 1993, pursuant to resolution 808 (1993), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the establishment of an international tribunal to prosecute persons responsible for serious violations of international humanitarian law committed in the territory of the former Yugoslavia since 1991, to which was annexed a draft statute.⁵⁸⁴ The Secretary-

General believed that the international tribunal should be established by a decision of the Security Council on the basis of Chapter VII of the Charter. Such a decision would constitute a measure to maintain or restore international peace and security, following the requisite determination of the existence of a threat to the peace, breach of the peace or act of aggression. It would also have the advantage of being expeditious and of being immediately effective, as all States would be under a binding obligation to take whatever action was required to carry out a decision taken as an enforcement measure under Chapter VII. The Secretary-General also believed that the establishment of the tribunal by means of a Chapter VII decision would be legally justified, both in terms of the object and purpose of the decision and of past Security Council practice. He recalled, in that regard, that the Council had on various occasions adopted decisions under Chapter VII, aimed at restoring of maintaining international peace and security, which had involved the establishment of subsidiary organs for a variety of purposes.

The Secretary-General pointed out that the Security Council would be establishing a subsidiary organ within the terms of Article 29 of the Charter, but one of a judicial nature. The organ would have to perform its functions independently of political considerations; it would not be subject to the authority or control of the Security Council with regard to the performance of its judicial functions. As an enforcement measure under Chapter VII, however, the lifespan of the tribunal would be linked to the restoration and maintenance of international peace and security in the territory of the former Yugoslavia. In assigning to the tribunal the task of prosecuting persons responsible for serious violations of international humanitarian law, the Security Council would not, however, be creating nor purporting to “legislate” that law. Rather, the international tribunal would have the task of applying existing international humanitarian law. The Secretary-General therefore proposed that the Security Council, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, establish the international tribunal.

At its 3217th meeting, on 25 May 1993, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representatives of Bosnia and Herzegovina and Croatia, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (Russian Federation) drew the attention of the Council members to the text of a draft resolution submitted by France, New Zealand, the Russian Federation, Spain, the United Kingdom and the United States,⁵⁸⁵ and to several other documents.⁵⁸⁶

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 827 (1993), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolution 713 (1991) of 25 September 1991 and all subsequent relevant resolutions,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 3 and 17 May 1993 pursuant to paragraph 2 of resolution 808 (1993),

Expressing once again its grave alarm at continuing reports of widespread and flagrant violations of international humanitarian law occurring within the territory of the former Yugoslavia, and especially in the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina, including reports of mass killings, massive, organized and systematic detention and rape of women and the continuance of the practice of “ethnic cleansing”, including for the acquisition and the holding of territory,

Determining that this situation continues to constitute a threat to international peace and security,

Determined to put an end to such crimes and to take effective measures to bring to justice the persons who are responsible for them,

Convinced that in the particular circumstances of the former Yugoslavia the establishment as an ad hoc measure by the Council of an international tribunal and the prosecution of persons responsible for serious violations of international humanitarian law would enable this aim to be achieved and would contribute to the restoration and maintenance of peace,

Believing that the establishment of an international tribunal and the prosecution of persons responsible for the above-mentioned violations of international humanitarian law will contribute to ensuring that such violations are halted and effectively redressed,

Noting in this regard the recommendation by the Co-Chairmen of the Steering Committee of the International Conference on the Former Yugoslavia for the establishment of such a tribunal,

Reaffirming in this regard its decision in resolution 808 (1993) of 22 February 1993 that an international tribunal shall be established for the prosecution of persons responsible for serious violations of international humanitarian law committed in the territory of the former Yugoslavia since 1991,

Considering that, pending the appointment of the prosecutor of the international tribunal, the Commission of Experts established pursuant to resolution 780 (1992) should continue on an urgent basis the collection of information relating to evidence of grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions and other violations of international humanitarian law as proposed in its interim report,

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

1. Approves the report of the Secretary-General;

2. Decides hereby to establish an international tribunal for the sole purpose of prosecuting persons responsible for serious violations of international humanitarian law committed in the territory of the former Yugoslavia between 1 January 1991 and a date to be determined by the Security Council upon the restoration of peace and to this end to adopt the statute of the International Tribunal annexed to the report of the Secretary-General;

3. Requests the Secretary-General to submit to the judges of the International Tribunal, upon their election, any suggestions received from States for the rules of procedure and evidence called for in article 15 of the statute of the Tribunal;

4. Decides that all States shall cooperate fully with the International Tribunal and its organs in accordance with the present resolution and the statute of the Tribunal and that consequently all States shall take any measures necessary under their domestic law to implement the provisions of the present resolution and the statute, including the obligation of States to comply with requests for assistance or orders issued by a trial chamber under article 29 of the statute;

5. Urges States and intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations to contribute funds, equipment and services to the International Tribunal, including the offer of expert personnel;

6. Decides that the determination of the seat of the International Tribunal is subject to the conclusion of appropriate arrangements between the United Nations and the Netherlands acceptable to the Council, and that the Tribunal may sit elsewhere when it considers it necessary for the efficient exercise of its functions;

7. Decides also that the work of the International Tribunal shall be carried out without prejudice to the right of the victims to seek, through appropriate means, compensation for damages incurred as a result of violations of international humanitarian law;

8. Requests the Secretary-General to implement urgently the present resolution and in particular to make practical arrangements for the effective functioning of the International Tribunal at the earliest time and to report periodically to the Council;

9. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of Venezuela recalled that his delegation had voted in favour of resolution 808 (1993), because it had been convinced of the duty incumbent upon the international community to reaffirm that the commission of crimes such as those committed in the former Yugoslavia could not pass without political condemnation and penal sanctions. The Venezuelan delegation recognized that the Tribunal was intended to deal with a specific and limited crisis that the Council had been addressing under Chapter VII of the Charter. It also recognized that the Tribunal, as a subsidiary organ of the Council, would not be empowered with — nor would the Council be assuming — the ability to set down norms of international law or to legislate with respect to those rights. The Tribunal simply applied existing international humanitarian law. It further acknowledged that, in adopting the draft statute, the Council was also taking exceptional action. Venezuela believed that the ad hoc Tribunal had thus been established to act in support of the purposes and principles of the Charter.⁵⁸⁷

The representative of France noted that, through resolution 827 (1993), the Council had established an International Tribunal that would prosecute, judge and punish people from any community who had committed or continued to commit crimes in the territory of the former Yugoslavia. He also noted that resolution 827 (1993) had been adopted under Chapter VII of the Charter. The threat to international peace and security created by the situation in the former Yugoslavia justified recourse to those provisions. As a decision within the meaning of Article 25 of the Charter, that resolution applied to all States, meaning that all States were required to cooperate fully with the Tribunal, even if that obliged them to amend certain provisions of their domestic law. The speaker also made comments relating to the statute of the Tribunal.⁵⁸⁸

The representative of the United States stated that the crimes being committed in the former Yugoslavia were often the systematic and orchestrated crimes of Government officials, military commanders, and disciplined artillerymen and foot soldiers. The men and women behind those crimes were individually responsible for the crimes of those they purported to control; the fact that their power was often self-proclaimed did not lessen their culpability. Addressing those “who derided the tribunal as being powerless because the suspects may avoid arrest”, she argued that the tribunal would issue indictments whether or not suspects could be taken into custody. While they might be able to hide within the borders of Serbia or in parts of Bosnia or Croatia, they would be imprisoned for the rest of their lives within their own land. She further stressed that under the resolution just adopted every Government, including each one in the former Yugoslavia, would be obliged to hand over those indicted by the Tribunal. Regarding resolution 827 (1993), she made the following remarks. First, the Commission of Experts would continue to pursue its work of establishing a database and preparing evidence during the interim period before the appointment of the Tribunal’s Prosecutor, and hiring of staff to begin authoritative investigations and preparations for trials. At the appropriate time, her delegation expected that the Commission would cease to exist and its work would be “folded” into the Prosecutor’s office. Secondly, States were encouraged to submit proposals for the rules of evidence and procedure for consideration by the judges of the Tribunal. Thirdly, States should take measures under their domestic law to enable them to implement the provisions of the ⁵⁸⁸ Ibid., pp. 10-12.

Statute. The speaker also commented on the statute of the Tribunal.⁵⁸⁹

The representative of the United Kingdom stated that all parties in the former Yugoslavia shared some responsibility for the crimes committed and that it was important to emphasize that the Council’s action of that day was not aimed at one party alone. The Security Council had repeatedly demanded the immediate cessation of such atrocities, but those demands had not been heeded. It was essential that those who committed such acts be in no doubt that they would be held individually responsible and that those atrocities be investigated and the perpetrators called to account. The establishment of the Tribunal was an exceptional step needed to deal with exceptional circumstances. At the same time, the Government of the United Kingdom continued to support the work of the International Law Commission, which would result in the establishment of an international criminal court with general jurisdiction. Like the previous speakers, the speaker commented on the Statute of the Tribunal.⁵⁹⁰

The representative of New Zealand noted that the establishment of the Tribunal and the prosecution of persons suspected of crimes against international humanitarian law were closely related to the wider efforts to restore peace and security to the former Yugoslavia. He stressed that the Tribunal was a court, with the task of applying independently and impartially the rules of customary international law and conventional law applicable in the territory of the former Yugoslavia. The Tribunal must be left to carry out its work until it had discharged its mandate under its statute or until the Council decided that its work should be brought to an end.⁵⁹¹

The representative of Japan suggested that perhaps more extensive legal studies could have been undertaken on various aspects of the statute. At the same time, Japan fully shared the determination of the international community, which called for the exhaustion of all possible measures, including the expeditious establishment of the Tribunal, to put an end to the ongoing atrocities in the former Yugoslavia and to restore justice. That was why Japan supported the adoption of the resolution and why it intended to cooperate in its implementation to the best of its ability, in accordance with the spirit of international established principles on criminal matters and within its Constitution. The speaker contended that the statute of the Tribunal reflected the way of thinking of the Security Council. First, the commencement of activities by the Tribunal in no way relieved the parties of their obligation to enforce international humanitarian law. Secondly, such legal remedies in no way relieved the Security Council of its responsibility to address the Yugoslav crisis in its entirety. Thirdly, cooperation and assistance on the part of the States concerned was essential to guarantee the smooth functioning of the Tribunal. All States must exhaust all means to cooperate in good faith. Before concluding, the speaker stated that the Security Council was obliged to take the exceptional measures it was taking that day. Yet it could not be argued that those measures lay outside the Council's jurisdiction, for the complexity of the threat and the gravity of the crisis had made the Council's action inevitable. On the contrary, it might be argued that, without a comprehensive strategy on the part of the international community, the complex situation in the former Yugoslavia could not be properly addressed.⁵⁹²

The representative of Morocco noted that it had always been his delegation's view that an international tribunal must be but one element of a plan, based on the principles of the Charter, to put an end to Serb aggression, to demand the return of territory acquired by force and "ethnic cleansing" and fully to restore the territorial integrity, unity and sovereignty of Bosnia and Herzegovina. The Tribunal must seek to punish serious violations of international humanitarian law in the broadest sense as crimes against international peace and security. He argued that the legitimacy and legality of the Tribunal should not be questioned, and that the Tribunal should hand down deterrent sentences both for those who committed crimes and for their accomplices, and should not ignore appropriate compensations for victims and their families, nor the responsibility of States for breaches of international law attributable to them. He also stressed that States had the obligation to cooperate with and support the Tribunal.⁵⁹³

The representative of Cape Verde expressed the belief that the establishment of the Tribunal should be ⁵⁹² Ibid., pp. 23-26.

⁵⁹³ Ibid., pp. 26-28.

but the first step in a long and complex process. His delegation considered that the establishment of the Tribunal would be a positive step only if it was viewed as closely connected to a suitably comprehensive peace plan capable of preserving international peace and security throughout the territory of the former Yugoslavia. His delegation considered the establishment of the Tribunal to be an instrument for the promotion of international peace and security.⁵⁹⁴

The representative of Pakistan argued that "ethnic cleansing", genocide and other heinous crimes had been committed in Bosnia and Herzegovina, in flagrant violation of international humanitarian law, with the specific objective of acquiring territory and as a deliberate campaign to exterminate Bosnia and Herzegovina, a sovereign State Member of the United Nations. His delegation hoped that the establishment of the Tribunal would help to halt such crimes and would lead to the vacating by the aggressors of territories forcefully occupied and to the full restoration of the unity, territorial integrity and sovereignty of Bosnia and Herzegovina. Pakistan believed that the resolution just adopted was an important element of the Vance-Owen plan and fell squarely within its ambit. The speaker further stated that the international community must halt the aggression, reverse it through withdrawals from all territories occupied by the use of force and "ethnic cleansing" and restore international legality. He contended that the Security Council needed to move swiftly to take further appropriate and effective enforcement actions in that direction. The Pakistan delegation could not accept, even by implication, the status quo imposed by aggression, the use of force and "ethnic cleansing", as that would set a dangerous precedent for the civilized world.⁵⁹⁵

The representative of China stated that, bearing in mind the particular circumstances in the former Yugoslavia and the urgency of restoring and maintaining world peace, the Chinese delegation had voted in favour of the resolution just adopted. He cautioned, however, that that should not be construed as an endorsement of the legal approach involved. China had always held that, to avoid setting any precedent for abusing Chapter VII of the Charter, a prudent attitude should be adopted with regard to the establishment of an international tribunal by means of ⁵⁹⁵ Ibid., pp. 31-32.

Security Council resolutions under Chapter VII. It was the consistent position of the Chinese delegation that an international tribunal should be established by concluding a treaty so as to provide a solid legal foundation for it and ensure its effective functioning. Furthermore, the statute of the Tribunal just adopted was a legal instrument with the attributes of an international treaty, involving complicated legal and financial questions. It ought to become effective only after having been negotiated and concluded by sovereign States and ratified by their national legislative organs in accordance with domestic laws. Therefore, to adopt by a Security Council resolution a statute that gave the Tribunal both preferential and exclusive jurisdiction was not in compliance with the principle of State judicial sovereignty. The adoption of the Statute of the International Tribunal by the Security Council through a resolution invoking Chapter VII meant that United Nations Member States must implement it to fulfil their obligations under the Charter. That would bring many problems and difficulties both in theory and in practice. For that reason, China had consistently maintained its reservations. In short, the Chinese delegation emphasized that the Tribunal established in the current manner could only be an ad hoc arrangement, suited only to the special circumstances of the former Yugoslavia. It should not constitute a precedent.⁵⁹⁶

The representative of Brazil observed that the proposals for the establishment by the Security Council of an international tribunal had posed intricate and not unimportant legal difficulties, many of which had not been resolved to the satisfaction of his delegation. It had only been the consideration of the “unique and exceptionally serious circumstances” in the former Yugoslavia that had determined the vote cast by Brazil on the resolution just adopted. The positive Brazilian vote should not be construed as an overall endorsement of legal formulas involved in the foundation or in the statute of the Tribunal. The speaker believed that the matter should also have been brought to the attention of the General Assembly. The views of the Government of Brazil on the main legal issues had been expressed when the Council had adopted resolution 808 (1993). In particular, Brazil had expressed the view that the most appropriate and effective method for establishing the Tribunal would have been the conclusion of a convention setting up an ad hoc international criminal jurisdiction and containing the terms of reference for its exercise. The option of establishing the Tribunal through a resolution of the Security Council, which Brazil had not favoured, left unresolved a number of serious legal issues relating to the powers and competencies attributed to the Council by the Charter. It was the view of the Brazilian delegation that the resolution just adopted was aimed at addressing a specific and unique situation with a view to producing one specific result: bringing to justice the persons responsible for serious violations of international humanitarian law in the former Yugoslavia. Both the resolution and the statute it adopted were thus not meant to establish new norms or precedents of international law. The representative of Brazil stated that by adopting the resolution, the Council was not creating, nor purporting to legislate, international humanitarian law. Rather, the Tribunal would have the task of applying existing norms of international humanitarian law. Before concluding, the speaker noted that for the work of the Tribunal to be effective, it would need to receive the fullest cooperation from all States. That was a clear obligation resulting from the resolution just adopted.⁵⁹⁷

The representative of Spain stated that the statute of the Tribunal could be improved upon. Nevertheless, Spain had preferred to retain the form proposed by the Secretary-General in its entirety for several reasons. First, certain clarifications could be found by reading the statute in the light of the explanations provided in the Secretary-General’s report with respect to each article. Other clarifications could be contributed by the Tribunal itself when it drafted its rules of procedure and began carrying out its judicial activities. Moreover, the goal of restoring peace in the territory of the former Yugoslavia required prompt action, which might have been compromised through a prolonged and detailed discussion of a statute which satisfied the fundamental prerequisites for ensuring the achievement of that goal. Although the statute lacked express provisions in that respect, the tribunal was clearly an independent organ and that such independence was not at all incompatible with the Tribunal’s formal character as a subsidiary organ of the Council, as was borne out by the International Court of Justice with respect to the United Nations Administrative Tribunal and its relations with the General Assembly. Second, the Tribunal was an impartial body governed by the law itself in fulfilling its duties. Its jurisdiction encompassed all of the territory of the former Yugoslavia and actions by all parties involved in the conflict. Third, as there was a wish for the Tribunal to be effective, it was indispensable to impose upon States an obligation to cooperate with the Tribunal that was based upon Chapter VII of the Charter. That obligation implied the duty to promulgate any domestic legal measures that might be necessary. A particularly important feature of that obligation was the primacy accorded the Tribunal over national courts. Lastly, the resolution created an ad hoc body with a jurisdiction limited not only geographically and temporally, but also materially, in that it would be circumscribed to applying the international law in force. In fact, with the establishment of the Tribunal the aim was not to create new international law nor to change existing law, but to guarantee respect for that law.⁵⁹⁸

⁵⁹⁷ Ibid., pp. 34-37.

The President, speaking in his capacity as the representative of the Russian Federation, stated that his delegation favoured the establishment of the Tribunal because it saw it as an instrument of justice to restore international legality and the faith of the world community in the triumph of justice and reason. That was why the Security Council had assumed, in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations, the responsibility for implementing the appropriate specific measures contained in the resolution just adopted, including the establishment of the Tribunal. While supporting the tribunal, the Russian delegation believed that that body would not abolish nor replace national tribunals. The speaker further stated that the establishment of the Tribunal, apart from possessing great juridical meaning, also represented an important political act taken by the international community, which at the same time fulfilled a preventive function and promoted the restoration of peace in the region.⁵⁹⁹

Decision of 25 July 1994: letter from the President to the Secretary-General

By a letter dated 14 July 1994 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁶⁰³ the Secretary-General transmitted copies of the agreement between the United Nations and the Netherlands concerning the Headquarters of the International Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law in the Territory of the Former Yugoslavia since 1991 and requested that the Security Council confirm that the arrangements were acceptable and that the seat of the Tribunal had been determined to be at The Hague.

By a letter dated 25 July 1994,⁶⁰⁴ the President of the Security Council informed the Secretary-General of the following:

I have the honour to refer to your letter of 14 July 1994 transmitting copies of the agreement between the United Nations and the Kingdom of the Netherlands concerning the Headquarters of the International Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of the Former Yugoslavia since 1991 and the Agreement for Tenancy of Churchillplein 1, The Hague.

I have the honour to inform you that, in accordance with paragraph 6 of its resolution 827 (1993) of 25 May 1993 and without prejudice to consideration of the arrangements by the General Assembly, the Security Council finds the arrangements between the United Nations and the Netherlands acceptable. The Council confirms that the seat of the Tribunal has been determined to be in The Hague.

indication of their willingness to accept convicted persons. This information would be communicated to the Registrar of the International Tribunal who would prepare a list of States in which the enforcement of sentences would be carried out.

F. Participation of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) in the work of the Economic and Social Council

Initial proceedings

Decision of 28 April 1993 (3204th meeting): resolution 821 (1993)

At its 3204th meeting, on 28 April 1993, the Security Council included the item entitled "Participation of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) in the work of the Economic and Social Council" in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Pakistan) drew the attention of the Council members to the text of a draft resolution submitted by France, Spain and the United Kingdom,⁶⁰⁶ and read out a revision to be made to the draft in its provisional form. He also informed the Council members that the United States had joined as a sponsor of the draft resolution.

The draft resolution, as orally revised in its provisional form, was then put to the vote and adopted by 13 votes to none, with 2 abstentions (China, Russian Federation) as resolution 821 (1993), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolution 713 (1991) of 25 September 1991 and all subsequent relevant resolutions,

Considering that the State formerly known as the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia has ceased to exist, Recalling its resolution 757 (1992) of 30 May 1992, in which it noted that "the claim by the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) to continue automatically the membership of the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia in the United Nations has not been generally accepted",

Recalling also its resolution 777 (1992) of 19 September 1992, in which it recommended to the General Assembly that it decide that the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) should apply for membership in the United Nations and that it shall not participate in the work of the General Assembly,

Recalling further that the General Assembly in its resolution 47/1 of 22 September 1992, having received the recommendation of the Security Council of 19 September 1992, considered that the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) could not continue automatically the membership of the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia in the United Nations and therefore decided that the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) should apply for membership in the United Nations and that it shall not participate in the work of the General Assembly,

Recalling that in its resolution 777 (1992) it decided to consider the matter again before the end of the main part of the forty-seventh session of the General Assembly, and that in December 1992 the members of the Council agreed to keep the subject-matter of resolution 777 (1992) under continuous review and to consider it again at a later date,

1. Reaffirms that the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) cannot continue automatically the membership of the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia in the United Nations, and therefore recommends to the General Assembly that, further to the decisions taken in Assembly resolution 47/1, it decide that the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) shall not participate in the work of the Economic and Social Council;

2. Decides to consider the matter again before the end of the forty-seventh session of the General Assembly.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of China recalled that his delegation had always held that all the Republics of the former Yugoslavia should take their own seats in the United Nations, and that no Republic should be excluded lightly. His delegation considered that the resolution just adopted was a transitory arrangement. It hoped that the question of the seat of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia might be settled properly and that the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia would be able to obtain its own seat in the United Nations and the organs belonging to the United Nations system.⁶⁰⁷

The representative of the United States stated that her delegation had voted in favour of the resolution just adopted, as it continued to believe that the claim of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia to membership in international organizations was legally invalid. The United States would support the application of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia for membership in the United Nations only when Serbia and Montenegro met the criteria in the Charter of the United Nations. The Federal Republic of Yugoslavia therefore must show that it was a peace-loving State and must demonstrate its willingness to comply fully with Chapter VII resolutions of the Security Council. The Belgrade authorities must end their support for the Bosnian Serbs and for aggression in Bosnia and Croatia.⁶⁰⁸

The representative of Brazil recalled that his delegation had expressed its views on the question of the participation of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia when the issue had been taken up by the General Assembly the previous September. Brazil remained convinced that questions relating to admission, participation, suspension or expulsion affected the most basic rights of States in relation to the Organization, and that they should therefore be treated with the utmost care and attention, bearing in mind the fundamental need to follow the Charter strictly. It was only in extraordinary circumstances, such as the deteriorating situation in the territories of the former Yugoslavia, and particularly in Bosnia and Herzegovina, that the application of extraordinary measures could be justified. By voting in favour of the resolution just adopted, Brazil wished to signify its support for the urgent efforts of the Security Council to bring to an end to the conflict in the territory of the former Yugoslavia.⁶⁰⁹

The representative of the Russian Federation noted that his delegation had abstained in the voting on the resolution just adopted because it was against taking further steps to separate Belgrade, and excluding it from the international organizations. He contended that recent events in the Yugoslav crisis, combined with the fact that the leadership of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia had undertaken specific steps to apply pressure on the Bosnian Serbs in order to ensure that they adhered to the Vance-Owen plan, rendered inappropriate the idea of meting out further punishment to Belgrade. The speaker also cautioned that such action might give the impression that the international community regarded such punishment as an end in itself, to the detriment of ongoing efforts to seek a peaceful settlement.⁶¹⁰

Decision of 17 September 1993: letter from the President to the President of the General Assembly

By a letter dated 17 September 1993,⁶¹¹ the President of the Security Council informed the President of the General Assembly of the following:

I have the honour to inform you that in consultations in connection with Security Council resolution 821 (1993) of 28 April 1993, the members of the Council agreed to keep the subject-matter of that resolution under continuous review and to consider it again at a later date.

G. The situation in the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia

Decision of 18 June 1993 (3239th meeting): resolution 842 (1993)

At its 3239th meeting, on 18 June 1993, the Security Council included in its agenda the item entitled "The situation in the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia" as well as a letter dated 15 June 1993 from the Secretary-General addressed to the President of the Security Council.⁶¹² By that letter, the Secretary-General transmitted a letter dated 11 June 1993 from the representative of the United States, stating that the United States had decided to offer a reinforced company team of approximately 300 troops to operate with the United Nations Protection Force (UNPROFOR) stationed in the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Spain) drew the attention of the Council members to the text of a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.⁶¹³

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 842 (1993) which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolution 743 (1992) of 21 February 1992 and all subsequent resolutions relating to the United Nations Protection Force, ⁶¹¹ S/26466.

⁶¹² S/25954 and Add.1. For details see chapter V.

⁶¹³ S/25955.

Recalling in particular resolution 795 (1992) of 11 December 1992, by which it authorized the presence of the Force in the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia,

Welcoming the important contribution of the existing Force presence in the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia to stability in the region,

Seeking to support efforts for a peaceful resolution of the situation in the former Yugoslavia as it relates to the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia as provided for in the report of the Secretary-General of 9 December 1992 and approved in resolution 795 (1992) of 11 December 1992,

Noting with appreciation the offer made by a Member State (S/25954 and Add.1) to contribute additional personnel to the Force presence in the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, and the latter Government's favourable response thereto,

1. Welcomes the offer made by a Member State to contribute additional personnel to the presence of the United Nations Protection Force in the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, and decides to expand the size of the Force accordingly and to authorize the deployment of these additional personnel;

2. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Decision of 22 July 1993: letter from the President to the Secretary-General

On 13 July 1993, pursuant to Security Council resolution 795 (1992), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the deployment and activities of UNPROFOR in the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia prior to its expansion.⁶¹⁴ The Secretary-General noted that UNPROFOR had so far been successful in its preventive mandate in the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia. However, it was still too early to draw definitive conclusions about the effectiveness of that deployment in the highly volatile situation prevailing in the region. He recalled that in proposing the initial deployment of UNPROFOR in the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia on 9 December 1992, he had expressed the belief that a small preventive United Nations deployment would help the countries concerned "to make safe passage through a potentially turbulent and hazardous period".⁶¹⁵ That remained his hope at a time when the conflagration in other parts of the former Yugoslavia showed little sign of abating.

⁶¹⁵ See S/24923.

By a letter dated 22 July 1993,⁶¹⁶ the President of the Security Council informed the Secretary-General of the following:

The members of the Security Council have noted your report of 13 July 1993 pursuant to resolution 795 (1992) on the deployment and activities of the United Nations Protection Force (UNPROFOR) in the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, prior to its expansion in accordance with resolution 842 (1993) of 18 June 1993. They welcome the fact that, subsequent to the events recorded in your report, the further addition to UNPROFOR's strength pursuant to the latter resolution has now been completed. The members of the Council are conscious of the important contribution made by UNPROFOR in the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia to stability in the region. They welcome the establishment of close coordination with the CSCE missions there, as called for in paragraph 4 of resolution 795 (1992) of 11 December 1992, and welcome UNPROFOR's increased ability to fulfil its mandate in the implementation of all relevant resolutions of the Security Council.

The members of the Council look forward to receiving further reports in due course on UNPROFOR's activities in the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia.

Decision of 30 November 1995 (3602nd meeting): resolution 1027 (1995)

On 23 November 1995, pursuant to resolutions 981 (1995), 982 (1995) and 983 (1995), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on peacekeeping missions in the former Yugoslavia, including the United Nations Preventive Deployment Force (UNPREDEP) in the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia.⁶¹⁷ The report was intended to assist the Council in its deliberations on the future of the missions.

The Secretary-General noted that the preventive deployment role of UNPREDEP had contributed greatly to the peace and stability of the southern Balkans. The operation had proved that preventive deployment was an effective form of peacekeeping and that results could be achieved even with a small, almost symbolic deployment of United Nations peacekeepers, if it was done at the right time and with a clear mandate. He noted, however, that the Government of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia was of the opinion, which he shared, that the causes leading to the establishment of UNPREDEP had not ceased to exist. The continued presence of ⁶¹⁷ S/1995/987.

UNPREDEP, with basically the same mandate, strength and troop composition, was vital to the maintenance of peace and stability in the country. The Secretary-General recommended that the mandate of UNPREDEP should be renewed for a further 12-month period. He also noted that it was his intention to make, as soon as possible, recommendations relating to the establishment of UNPREDEP on “a fully independent footing”, reporting directly to New York.

At its 3602nd meeting, on 30 November 1995, the Council resumed its consideration of the item and included the above-mentioned report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representative of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (Oman) then drew the attention of the Council members to the text of a draft resolution submitted by Argentina, the Czech Republic, France, Germany, Italy, the Russian Federation, the United Kingdom, the United States and Honduras.⁶¹⁸

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1027 (1995), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling all its previous relevant resolutions and in particular its resolution 983 (1995) of 31 March 1995,

Reaffirming its commitment to the independence, sovereignty and territorial integrity of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia,

Recalling its concern about possible developments which could undermine confidence and stability in the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia or threaten its territory,

Welcoming the positive role played by the United Nations Preventive Deployment Force, and paying tribute to the personnel of the Force in the performance of their mandate,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 23 November 1995,

1. Welcomes the report of the Secretary-General;
2. Decides to extend the mandate of the United Nations Preventive Deployment Force for a period terminating on 30 May 1996;
3. Urges the Force to continue its cooperation with the mission of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe;

⁶¹⁸ S/1995/996.

4. Calls upon Member States to consider favourably requests by the Secretary-General for necessary assistance to the Force in the performance of its mandate;

5. Requests the Secretary-General to keep the Council regularly informed of any developments on the ground and other circumstances affecting the mandate of the Force, and in particular to submit, if possible by 31 January 1996, a report on all aspects of the Force, in the light of developments in the region, for review by the Council;

6. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia stated that it was his Government's view that UNPREDEP should become a completely independent United Nations operation reporting directly to the Secretary-General, with its base, military command and logistics structure located in Skopje. His Government also requested that the mandate of UNPREDEP be extended until 30 November 1996.⁶¹⁹

H. Applications made under Article 50 of the Charter of the United Nations as a consequence of the implementation of measures imposed against the former Yugoslavia

Initial proceedings

Decision of 18 June 1993 (3240th meeting): resolution 843 (1993)

At its 3240th meeting, on 18 June 1993, the Security Council included the item entitled “Applications made under Article 50 of the Charter of the United Nations as a consequence of the implementation of measures imposed against the former Yugoslavia” in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Spain) drew the attention of the Council members to the text of a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.⁶²⁰

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 843 (1993), which reads:

Noting that the Security Council Committee established pursuant to resolution 724 (1991), at its 65th meeting, set up a working group to examine the above-mentioned requests,

1. Confirms that the Committee established pursuant to resolution 724 (1991) is entrusted with the task of examining requests for assistance under the provisions of Article 50 of the Charter of the United Nations;

2. Welcomes the establishment by the Committee of its working group and invites the Committee, as it completes the examination of each request, to make recommendations to the President of the Security Council for appropriate action.

By a letter dated 2 July 1993 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁶²¹ the Acting Chairman of the Security Council Committee established pursuant to resolution 724 (1991) concerning Yugoslavia transmitted, pursuant to resolution 843 (1993), the recommendations of the Committee relating to the requests made by Bulgaria, Hungary, Romania, Uganda and Ukraine for assistance under the provisions of Article 50 of the Charter of the United Nations. In its recommendations, the Committee recognized the urgent need to assist the interested State and appealed to all States to provide immediate assistance to such State; invited the competent organs and specialized agencies of the United Nations system to consider how their assistance programmes and facilities might be helpful to the interested State; and requested the Secretary-General to report on the implementation of such recommendations.

By a letter dated 6 July 1993,⁶²² the President of the Security Council informed the Secretary-General of the following:

appropriate action, the text of the letter and its enclosures from the Chairman of the Committee.

I. Follow-up to resolution 817 (1993): letter dated 26 May 1993 from the Secretary-General addressed to the President of the Security Council

Initial proceedings

Decision of 18 June 1993 (3243rd meeting):

By a letter dated 26 May 1993 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁶²⁹ the Secretary-General transmitted, pursuant to resolution 817 (1993),⁶³⁰ his report of 14 May 1993 on the exercise of good offices by the Co-Chairmen of the Steering Committee of the International Conference on the Former Yugoslavia, in respect of the difference that had arisen in connection with the request for admission to membership in the United Nations of the State admitted as the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia.⁶³¹ In doing so, he drew the attention of the members of the Council to the fact that an early endorsement by the Council of the proposals contained in annex V to the report would help the parties to reach agreement. Annex V contained a draft Treaty proposed by the Co-Chairmen Confirming the Existing Frontier and Establishing Measures for Confidence Building, Friendship and Neighbourly Cooperation between the Republic of Greece and the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia.

The Secretary-General noted that the draft Treaty presented to the parties by the Co-Chairmen had been prepared on the basis of extensive consultations with the parties. The main outstanding point of contention remained the name to be used by the State that had been admitted to the United Nations with the provisional name "the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia". The Greek delegation's position was that the other party should not use, whether for domestic or international purposes, a name that included the word

⁶³⁰ Resolution 817 (1993) was adopted at the 3196th meeting of the Council on 7 April 1993 under the item "Admission of New Members". For more information, see chapter VII.

⁶³¹ S/25855, annex I.

“Macedonia”. It had indicated, however, that if that term were to be included in a name, then the name “Slavomacedonia” could be envisaged. The delegation of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, for its part, maintained that its name should be “The Republic of Macedonia”. It was, however, prepared to discuss the modalities of the use of an alternative name, but for international purposes only. The Co-Chairmen proposed the name “The Republic of Nova Makedonia”, to be used for all official purposes.

In two addenda to the report submitted on 3 June 1993, the Secretary-General transmitted to the Council a statement made by the Government of Greece on 27 May 1993 and a letter dated 29 May 1993 from the President of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, concerning the draft Treaty. In the statement the Government of Greece reiterated its position and added that the name proposed by the Co-Chairmen posed serious difficulties. In his letter, the President of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia raised objections to several provisions contained in the Co-Chairmen’s proposed draft Treaty and argued that the constitutional name, “The Republic of Macedonia”, did not imply territorial or other aspirations. On the contrary, confirmation of such a name would represent a significant contribution to the maintenance of peace and stability in the region, which was an essential requirement of resolution 817 (1993).

At its 3243rd meeting, on 18 June 1993, the Council included the item entitled “Follow-up to resolution 817 (1993)” and the above-mentioned report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Spain) drew the attention of the Council members to the text of a draft resolution⁶³² and to a letter dated 7 June 1993 from the representative of Albania addressed to the President of the Security Council.⁶³³

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 845 (1993), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolution 817 (1993) of 7 April 1993, in which it urged Greece and the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia to continue to cooperate with the Co-Chairmen of the Steering Committee of the International Conference on the Former Yugoslavia in order to arrive at a speedy settlement of their difference,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 28 May and 3 June 1993 submitted pursuant to resolution 817 (1993), together with the statement of the Government of Greece and the letter of the President of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia dated 27 and 29 May 1993, respectively, annexed thereto,

1. Expresses its appreciation to the Co-Chairmen of the Steering Committee of the International Conference on the Former Yugoslavia for their efforts, and commends to the parties as a sound basis for the settlement of their difference the proposals set forth in annex V to the report of the Secretary-General;

2. Urges the parties to continue their efforts under the auspices of the Secretary-General to arrive at a speedy settlement of the remaining issues between them;

3. Requests the Secretary-General to keep the Council informed on the progress of these further efforts, the objective of which is to resolve the difference between the two parties before the commencement of the forty-eighth session of the General Assembly, and to report to the Council on their outcome in good time, and decides to resume consideration of the matter in the light of the report.

Decision of 15 July 1993: letter from the President to the Secretary-General

By a letter dated 13 July 1993 addressed to the President of the Security Council, the Secretary-General reported that Mr. Cyrus Vance, the former Co-Chairman of the Steering Committee of the International Conference on the Former Yugoslavia, had accepted his request to continue his good offices to help the parties reach an agreement.⁶³⁴ Mr. Vance would begin his assignment on 1 August 1993. The Secretary-General hoped, as stated in resolution 845 (1993), that it would be possible to resolve the difference between the parties before the commencement of the forty-eight session of the General Assembly.

By a letter dated 15 July 1993,⁶³⁵ the President of the Security Council informed the Secretary-General of the following:

The members of the Council thank you for your letter of 13 July 1993 concerning Security Council resolution 845 (1993) and welcome the acceptance by Mr. Cyrus Vance of your invitation to continue his good offices with the objective of helping the parties to resolve the difference between them before the commencement of the forty-eighth session of the General Assembly.

Decision of 11 April 1994: letter from the President to the Secretary-General

By a letter dated 31 March 1994 addressed to the President of the Security Council, the Secretary-General updated the Council on the progress of further efforts under his auspices in relation to the difference between Greece and the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia.⁶³⁶ He reported that the parties had met separately with Mr. Vance in Geneva on 10 March 1994. Mr. Vance had told both parties that the situation had increased in gravity, and that time had been of the essence in reaching an agreement. In order to help the parties to find common ground, he had submitted a draft accord confirming the existing common frontier as an inviolable international border and establishing measures for confidence-building, friendship and neighbourly cooperation, based in substantial part on the draft treaty. Having expressed preliminary views on the draft, the parties had agreed that Mr. Vance should continue to assist them to reach a settlement on the remaining issues.

By a letter dated 11 April 1994,⁶³⁷ the President of the Security Council informed the Secretary-General of the following:

The members of the Security Council have considered your letter of 31 March 1994 in which you advised the Council of the progress of further efforts, under your auspices, in relation to the difference between Greece and the Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia.

The members of the Council have asked me to convey to you their support for your efforts and those of your Special Envoy, Mr. Cyrus Vance, and their hope that both parties will cooperate fully with you and Mr. Vance to resolve the difference between them.

The members of the Council request you to keep them fully informed of developments.

Decision of 7 June 1994: letter from the President to the Secretary-General

On 27 May 1994, pursuant to resolution 845 (1993), the Secretary-General submitted an interim report on the progress of further efforts taken under his auspices by his Special Envoy to resolve the difference between the Governments of Greece and the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia.⁶³⁸ He reported that his Special Envoy had held two series of discussions with the parties, with the aim of reaching an agreement on a draft interim accord. The draft interim accord was a condensation of the draft accord which Mr. Vance had given the parties on 10 March 1994. It addressed a limited number of issues, including the question of the frontier between the parties, the interpretation of the Constitution of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, the question of “hostile activities and propaganda”, and the “countermeasures” adopted by Greece. The other issues would be left to a second phase. However, it had still not been possible to reach agreement on all points. The parties had therefore agreed to participate in further talks, under the auspices of the Secretary-General’s Special Envoy, around 13 June 1994.

By a letter dated 7 June 1994,⁶³⁹ the President of the Security Council informed the Secretary-General of the following:

The members of the Security Council have considered your report of 27 May 1994 pursuant to resolution 845 (1993) concerning the difference between Greece and the Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia.

The members of the Council have asked me to convey to you their appreciation for your efforts and those of your Special Envoy, Mr. Cyrus Vance. They welcome the steps taken so far under your auspices and support your intention to proceed with further discussions as expeditiously as possible. They welcome the fact that both parties have agreed to take part in further talks at the Minister for Foreign Affairs level on or about 13 June 1994. They urge both parties to cooperate fully with you and Mr. Vance in order to reach agreement on outstanding issues as soon as possible.

The members of the Council welcome your intention to report further on the substance of Mr. Vance’s discussions after his meetings with the parties in June.

Decision of 17 August 1994: letter from the President to the Secretary-General

By a letter dated 5 August 1994 addressed to the President of the Security Council, the Secretary-General informed the Council on the progress of further efforts under his auspices, in relation to the difference between Greece and the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia.⁶⁴⁰ The talks planned for 13 June 1994 had been delayed, for reasons beyond the control of the parties. Instead, the Special Envoy of the Secretary-General had met separately with both parties between 10 and 13 July 1994, and had discussed with them the issue of the name. Both parties had agreed to resume discussions with the Special Envoy in the autumn. The Secretary-General himself had met with the Foreign Minister of Greece on 12 July, and with the Foreign Minister of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia on 13 July 1994. He had emphasized to both parties his concern that they reach an early agreement on a solution to their difference. Both Ministers had confirmed their Government's desire to continue with the discussions under his auspices and had expressly stated their strong preference that Mr. Vance should continue his mission of good offices.

By a letter dated 17 August 1994,⁶⁴¹ the President of the Security Council informed the Secretary-General of the following:

The members of the Security Council have considered your letter of 5 August 1994 pursuant to resolution 845 (1993) concerning the difference between Greece and the Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia.

The members of the Council have asked me to convey to you their continuing appreciation for your efforts and those of your Special Envoy, Mr. Cyrus Vance. They note that at the latest round of discussions both parties thoroughly reviewed a number of proposals addressing the principal difference of substance, the name.

The members of the Council expressed some concern that, in spite of several rounds of discussions between the parties following the adoption of resolution 845 (1993) on 18 June 1993, the principal difference of substance — the name — remains unresolved. They were also concerned at the possible consequences that continuation of the current situation might have for the maintenance of peace and stability in the region. They fully shared the views you expressed on 12 and 13 July to the Ministers for Foreign Affairs of Greece and the Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia that the parties should reach an early agreement on a solution to the difference between them.

The members of the Council welcome the desire of both parties to continue with discussions under your auspices, and their commitment to resume those discussions with Mr. Vance this autumn. They call upon both parties to cooperate fully with you and Mr. Vance in order to reach agreement on outstanding issues as soon as possible.

Decision of 15 September 1995 (3579th meeting): statement by the President

By a letter dated 13 September 1995 addressed to the President of the Security Council, the Secretary-General informed the Council that the Foreign Ministers of Greece and the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia had signed a wide-ranging interim accord that day at United Nations Headquarters in New York, in the presence of himself and Mr. Vance.⁶⁴² Article 5 of the accord provided, inter alia, that the parties would continue negotiations, under the auspices of the Secretary-General and pursuant to resolutions 817 (1993) and 845 (1993), to resolve the difference between them with respect to the name of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia.

At its 3579th meeting, on 15 September 1995, the Council resumed its consideration of the item and included in its agenda the sub-item entitled "Interim Accord between Greece and the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia". Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Italy) stated that, after consultations among members of the Security Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁶⁴³

The Security Council welcomes the signing of the Interim Accord between Greece and the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia and looks forward to the establishment of a new relationship between the parties based on international law and peaceful, friendly relations. The Council believes the Accord will promote the strengthening of stability in the region.

The Council commends both parties, the Secretary-General, the Special Envoy of the Secretary-General, Mr. Cyrus Vance, and the United States envoy, Mr. Matthew Nimetz, for their efforts in bringing about this important achievement, pursuant to Council resolutions 817 (1993) and 845 (1993). The Council encourages them to continue their efforts to resolve the remaining differences between the parties and urges the parties to implement fully the Interim Accord.

J. Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe missions in Kosovo, Sandzak and Vojvodina, the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro)

Initial proceedings

Decision of 9 August 1993 (3262nd meeting): resolution 855 (1993)

By a letter dated 20 July 1993 addressed to the President of the Security Council, the representative of Sweden transmitted a letter of the same date from the Chairman-in-Office of the Council of Ministers of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe (CSCE), in which, in accordance with Article 54 of the Charter, he informed the Council that at the end of June 1993, the Government of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) had withdrawn its acceptance of the CSCE missions in Kosovo, Sandzak and Vojvodina and its cooperation with them.⁶⁴⁴ The Chairman-in-Office also noted that it was the considered opinion of the CSCE participating States that the decision by the Belgrade authorities aggravated the existing threats to peace and security in the region.

By a letter dated 23 July 1993 addressed to the President of the Council, the representative of Sweden transmitted a letter of the same date from the Chairman-in-Office addressed to the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Yugoslavia, as well as a related statement by the Chairman-in-Office.⁶⁴⁵ In his letter, the Chairman-in-Office called upon the authorities of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia to revoke its decision not to allow the CSCE missions to continue their activities and display its willingness to live up to the norms and principles it had accepted as a CSCE participating State.

At its 3262nd meeting, on 9 August 1993, the Council included in its agenda the item entitled "Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe (CSCE) missions in Kosovo, Sandzak and Vojvodina, the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro)" and the two above-mentioned letters. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited Ambassador Dragomir Djokic, at his request, to take a seat at the Council table during the course of the discussion of the item. The President (United States) then drew the attention of the Council members to the text of a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations,⁶⁴⁶ as well as to two letters dated 28 July and 3 August 1993 from the representative of Yugoslavia addressed to the Secretary-General.⁶⁴⁷ The letters transmitted letters dated 28 and 29 July 1993 from the Minister for Foreign Affairs of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia addressed to the President of the Security Council and the Chairman-in-Office of the CSCE Council, respectively, in which the Minister objected to the fact that the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia had been suspended from participating in CSCE activities since 8 July 1992 and made the point that his Government was willing and ready to continue to cooperate with CSCE and would allow the CSCE missions back, should Serbia and Montenegro be reintegrated into CSCE.

Speaking before the vote, the representative of China contended that the issue of Kosovo was an internal affair of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and that the sovereignty, political independence and territorial integrity of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia should be respected, in line with the basic principles of the Charter of the United Nations and international law. Based on that consideration, his delegation believed that the Council should exercise extreme prudence and should act in strict conformity with the purposes and the principles of the Charter, especially the principle of non-interference in the internal affairs of sovereign States. The speaker also contended that recourse to preventive diplomacy, as part of the pacific settlement of conflicts embodied in Chapter VI of the Charter, should be carried out at the explicit request or with the prior consent of the States and parties concerned, and should never be imposed against their will. Practice over the years had shown that the consent and cooperation of the parties concerned were essential factors in ensuring the success of the endeavours of the United Nations and regional organizations. The dispute should therefore be solved through continued dialogue and consultation, without outside interference or pressure. The speaker observed that, when differences arose between a regional organization and a sovereign State, it was important to consider the question whether the Security Council should involve itself and, if so, according to what principle. He noted that, in the spirit of consensus, the Chinese delegation had offered specific amendments to the draft resolution. As those amendments had not been accepted, however, it would abstain from the voting on the draft resolution.⁶⁴⁸

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted by 14 votes to none, with 1 abstention (China) as resolution 855 (1993), which reads:

The Security Council,

Taking note of the letters of 20 and 23 July 1993 from the Chairman in Office of the Council of Ministers of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe,

Also taking note of the letters of 28 July and 3 August 1993 circulated by the authorities of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro),

Deeply concerned at the refusal of the authorities in the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) to allow the CSCE missions of long duration to continue their activities,

Bearing in mind that the CSCE missions of long duration are an example of preventive diplomacy undertaken within the framework of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe and have greatly contributed to promoting stability and counteracting the risk of violence in Kosovo, Sandzak and Vojvodina, the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro),

Reaffirming its relevant resolutions aimed at putting an end to conflict in the former Yugoslavia,

Determined to avoid any extension of the conflict in the former Yugoslavia, and in this context attaching great importance to the work of the CSCE missions and to the continued ability of the international community to monitor the situation in Kosovo, Sandzak and Vojvodina, the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro),

Stressing its commitment to the territorial integrity and political independence of all States in the region,

1. Endorses the efforts of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe as described in the letters noted above from the Chairman in Office of the Council of Ministers of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe;

2. Calls upon the authorities in the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) to reconsider their refusal to allow the continuation of the activities of the CSCE missions in Kosovo, Sandzak and Vojvodina, the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro), to cooperate with the Conference by taking the practical steps needed for the resumption of the activities of these missions and to agree to an increase in the number of monitors as decided by the Conference;

3. Also calls upon the authorities in the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) to assure the monitors' safety and security and to allow them free and unimpeded access necessary to accomplish their mission in full;

4. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of Hungary stated that the CSCE missions had proved extremely valuable in promoting stability and counteracting the risk of ethnically motivated violence in Kosovo, Sandzak and Vojvodina. The Hungarian delegation strongly believed that transparency in the protection of human rights was an important factor of stability and security, being a litmus test of a Government's fulfilment of its obligations under the Charter and other relevant international instruments. Hungary, like the CSCE community as a whole, was of the view that the expulsion of the CSCE missions was an act that further aggravated the threat to peace and security in the Balkan region. It considered the Council's call to the Belgrade Government to re-examine its position to be "a perfectly legitimate and sound action".⁶⁴⁹

The representative of Brazil stated that his delegation had voted in favour of the resolution just adopted, bearing in mind that the consideration of the substantive aspects of the dispute fell within the competence of the regional arrangement represented by the relationship between CSCE and its member States. The Brazilian delegation hoped that the resolution just adopted would help to create conditions for the adoption of measures of cooperation and ultimately for the solution of the differences between the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and CSCE.⁶⁵⁰

The representative of France stated that his delegation was pleased that the Council was giving its support to CSCE, so that the activities of its missions could continue. As stated in the letters of the Chairman-in-Office, it was a question of ensuring the stability of the region. As the resolution just adopted emphasized, the activities of the missions were in no way aimed at affecting the sovereignty of a State, but were designed to ensure respect for the fundamental principles to which all the member States of CSCE, ⁶⁴⁹ Ibid., pp. 5-6.

⁶⁵⁰ Ibid., pp. 6-7.

⁶⁴⁸ S/PV.3262, pp. 3-5.

including the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, had committed themselves. The presence of the missions contributed to avoiding any extension of the conflict in the former Yugoslavia to Kosovo, Sandzak and Vojvodina.⁶⁵¹

The representative of the United Kingdom reminded the authorities in Belgrade that they continued to be bound by obligations which had been entered into in the context of CSCE and the binding commitment under the “Moscow mechanisms”. The missions were a source of objective information and they promoted security and dialogue between the communities, and would avoid the spread of conflict to other parts of the former Yugoslavia.⁶⁵²

The President, speaking in her capacity as the representative of the United States, stated that the United States strongly supported the activities of the CSCE missions, as they were vital to the international community’s efforts to prevent the spread of the conflict in the former Yugoslavia. By monitoring the human rights situation in Kosovo, Sandzak and Vojvodina, those missions had announced clearly to the authorities in Belgrade that the international community would not tolerate Serbian oppression of local non-Serb populations. She warned that the United States was prepared to respond against Serbia in the event of a conflict in Kosovo caused by Serbian action. She also stressed that human rights abuse would simply delay Serbia and Montenegro’s return to the community of nations.⁶⁵³

In the course of the debate, other speakers shared the view that the CSCE missions were fundamental to the maintenance of peace and stability in the region and that their departure would further aggravate the existing threat to that peace and stability.⁶⁵⁴

K. The situation in Croatia

Initial proceedings

Decision of 14 September 1993 (3275th meeting): statement by the President

At its 3275th meeting, on 14 September 1993, the Security Council began its consideration of the item entitled “The situation in Croatia”. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representative of Croatia, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (Venezuela) then stated that, after consultations among members of the Security Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁶⁵⁵

The Security Council expresses its profound concern at the reports from the Secretariat of recent military hostilities in Croatia, in particular the escalation of the means employed, and the grave threat they pose to the peace process in Geneva and overall stability in the former Yugoslavia.

The Council reaffirms its respect for the sovereignty and territorial integrity of the Republic of Croatia, and calls on both sides to accept the proposal of the United Nations Protection Force for an immediate ceasefire. It calls on the Government of Croatia to withdraw its armed forces to positions occupied before 9 September 1993, on the basis of that proposal, and calls on the Serbian forces to halt all provocative military actions.

Decision of 7 February 1995 (3498th meeting): statement by the President

At its 3498th meeting, on 7 February 1995, the Council resumed its consideration of the situation in Croatia. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representative of Croatia, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (Botswana) drew the attention of the members of the Council to several documents.⁶⁵⁶ The President then stated that, after consultations among members of the Security Council, ⁶⁵⁶ Letter dated 18 January 1995 from the representative of Croatia addressed to the President of the Security Council (S/1995/56); and letters dated 25 and 31 January 1995, respectively, from the representative of Croatia addressed to the Secretary-General (S/1995/82 and S/1995/93).

he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁶⁵⁷

The Security Council reiterates its support for the efforts to bring about a political settlement in the Republic of Croatia which ensures full respect for the sovereignty and territorial integrity of the Republic of Croatia and which guarantees the security and rights of all communities living in a particular area irrespective of whether they constitute in this area the majority or a minority.

The Council strongly supports the recent efforts of representatives of the International Conference on the Former Yugoslavia, the European Union, the Russian Federation and the United States of America aimed at achieving a political settlement in the Republic of Croatia. The Council calls upon the Government of the Republic of Croatia and the local Serb authorities in the United Nations Protected Areas to enter urgently and without preconditions into negotiations on such a settlement, benefiting from proposals now made to them as part of these efforts. It calls upon all other relevant parties to support this process.

The Council reaffirms its commitment to the search for an overall negotiated settlement of the conflicts in the former Yugoslavia ensuring the sovereignty and territorial integrity of all the States there within their internationally recognized borders and stresses the importance it attaches to the mutual recognition thereof.

The Council reaffirms its view that the continued and effective presence of the United Nations Protection Force in the Republic of Croatia is of vital importance for regional peace and security and expresses its desire that discussions over the weeks ahead will lead the Government of the Republic of Croatia to re-examine its position taken on 12 January 1995 in relation to the continuing role of the Force in the Republic of Croatia.

Decision of 28 April 1995 (3527th meeting):
resolution 990 (1995)

On 18 April 1995, pursuant to resolution 981 (1995), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the implementation of the mandate of the United Nations Confidence Restoration Operation in Croatia (UNCRO).⁶⁵⁸ The report contained a detailed plan for the implementation of the UNCRO mandate, as well as an assessment of the resources needed, indicating that the strength of the United Nations forces currently in Croatia could be reduced to 8,750 troops and that their deployment could be completed by 30 June 1995.⁶⁵⁹

⁶⁵⁷ S/PRST/1995/6.

⁶⁵⁸ S/1995/320.

⁶⁵⁹ For further details see S/1995/320, paras. 11 to 29.

The Secretary-General observed that the plan did not have the formal acceptance and the full support of either the Government of Croatia or the local Serbs authorities. Thus there was a risk that either or both sides would fail to cooperate with the United Nations in its implementation. On the other hand, the plan provided for the pragmatic implementation of paragraph 3 of resolution 981 (1995), and the alternative to its adoption would be the withdrawal of United Nations forces and the resumption of war. If the two sides seriously wished to avoid a renewal of the conflict, it was up to them to provide the necessary conditions for the new operation to discharge its responsibilities successfully. He therefore recommended that the Council approve the arrangements contained in the report and authorize the deployment of UNCRO to secure their implementation.

At its 3527th meeting, on 28 April 1995, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representative of Croatia, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (Czech Republic) then drew the attention of the Council members to the text of a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations⁶⁶⁰ and to a letter dated 28 April 1995 from the representative of Croatia addressed to the President of the Security Council.⁶⁶¹

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and was adopted as resolution 990 (1995), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling all its previous relevant resolutions on the conflicts in the territory of the former Yugoslavia, in particular resolutions 981 (1995) and 982 (1995) of 31 March 1995,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 18 April 1995,

Bearing in mind the importance of any information relevant to the implementation of all its previous resolutions being made available to the Secretary-General,

Reaffirming its determination to ensure the security and freedom of movement of personnel of United Nations peacekeeping operations in the territory of the former Yugoslavia, and, to these ends, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations, ⁶⁶⁰ S/1995/334.

⁶⁶¹ S/1995/339.

1. Welcomes the report of the Secretary-General, and in particular approves the arrangements in paragraphs 11 to 28 thereof for the implementation of the mandate of the United Nations Confidence Restoration Operation in Croatia, which is known as UNCRO;

2. Decides to authorize the deployment of UNCRO as set out in paragraph 29 of the above-mentioned report;

3. Calls upon the Government of the Republic of Croatia and the local Serb authorities to cooperate fully with UNCRO in the implementation of its mandate;

4. Expresses its concern that an agreement on the status of forces and other personnel has not yet been signed, calls once again on the Government of the Republic of Croatia to conclude expeditiously such an agreement, and requests the Secretary-General to report to the Council no later than 15 May 1995;

5. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Decision of 1 May 1995 (3529th meeting):
statement by the President

At its 3529th meeting, on 1 May 1995, the Council continued its consideration of the item. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representative of Croatia, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (France) then stated that, after consultations among members of the Security Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁶⁶²

The Security Council is deeply concerned by the resumption of hostilities in the Republic of Croatia over the last few days.

The Council demands that the Government of the Republic of Croatia put an end immediately to the military offensive launched by its forces in the area of Western Slavonia known as Sector West, which started on the morning of 1 May 1995 in violation of the ceasefire agreement of 29 March 1994.

The Council also demands that the parties respect the economic agreement signed between them on 2 December 1994 and, in particular, take all necessary steps to ensure the safety and security of the Zagreb-Belgrade highway and its immediate environs.

The Council urges the parties to cease hostilities and comply with the existing ceasefire agreement.

The Council calls upon the parties to respect fully the safety and freedom of movement of all United Nations and European Community Monitoring Mission personnel in the area concerned, in the area known as Sector South and elsewhere, and therefore to remove all restrictions placed on United Nations personnel.

The Council urges the parties, in order to achieve these objectives, to accept without delay the proposals put to them by the Special Representative of the Secretary-General.

The Council expresses its full support to the Secretary-General and his Special Representative in their efforts. The Council further requests the Secretary-General to keep it informed of developments on the ground as well as in the ongoing talks.

Decision of 4 May 1995 (3531st meeting):
statement by the President

At its 3531st meeting, on 4 May 1995, the Council resumed its consideration of the item. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representative of Croatia, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (France) drew the attention of the members of the Council to two letters⁶⁶³ dated 2 and 3 May respectively from the representative of Croatia addressed to the President of the Security Council. The President then stated that, after consultations among members of the Security Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁶⁶⁴

The Security Council is deeply concerned at the continuation of hostilities in the Republic of Croatia.

The Council reaffirms in this context its statement of 1 May 1995 in all its aspects and demands that the parties comply with the requirements set out therein immediately and in full.

The Council condemns the incursions into the zone of separation by the forces of the Government of the Republic of Croatia in Sectors North and South and by both sides in Sector East. It demands that the forces in question withdraw immediately.

The Council also condemns the bombardment of Zagreb and other centres of civilian population by the forces of the local Serb authorities and demands that they cease immediately.

The Council further condemns acts of harassment and intimidation against United Nations personnel and reminds the parties of their obligations to respect such personnel at all times and to ensure their safety, security and freedom of movement.

The Council calls upon the parties to cooperate fully with the United Nations Confidence Restoration Operation in Croatia, which is known as UNCRO, the Office of the United Nations

⁶⁶⁴ S/PRST/1995/26.

High Commissioner for Refugees and the International Committee of the Red Cross in protecting and assisting the local civilian population and any displaced persons. The Council is deeply concerned by reports that the human rights of the Serb population of Western Slavonia are being violated. It demands that the Government of the Republic of Croatia respect fully the rights of the Serb population concerned, in conformity with internationally recognized standards.

The Council insists that the authority of UNCRO be re-established and respected in Sector West and other areas affected by the hostilities.

The Council demands that the parties act in accordance with the proposals put to them by the Special Representative of the Secretary-General, that they cease all hostilities immediately and that they cooperate fully with the Special Representative of the Secretary-General and with UNCRO.

The Council further calls upon the parties to enter without delay into the discussions at Geneva to which they have been invited by the Co-Chairmen of the Steering Committee of the International Conference on the Former Yugoslavia.

The Council will remain actively seized of the matter and will be ready to consider further steps as necessary.

Decision of 17 May 1995 (3537th meeting):
resolution 994 (1995)

At its 3537th meeting, on 17 May 1995, the Council resumed its consideration of the item. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representative of Croatia, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (France) drew the attention of the Council members to the text of a draft resolution submitted by France, Germany, Italy, the Russian Federation, the United Kingdom and the United States⁶⁶⁵ and read out some revisions that had been made to the draft. He also drew the attention of the Council members to several other documents.⁶⁶⁶

The draft resolution, as orally revised in its provisional form, was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 994 (1995), which reads:

⁶⁶⁵ S/1995/395.

⁶⁶⁶ Letters dated 8 and 17 May 1995, respectively, from the representative of Croatia addressed to the President of the Security Council (S/1995/363 and S/1995/397); and letter dated 10 May 1995 from the representative of Yugoslavia addressed to the President of the Security Council (S/1995/383).

The Security Council,

Recalling all its previous resolutions on the conflicts in the territory of the former Yugoslavia and in particular resolutions 981 (1995) and 982 (1995) of 31 March 1995 and 990 (1995) of 28 April 1995,

Deeply concerned that the objectives set out in the statements by the President of the Security Council of 1 May and 4 May 1995 have not been implemented in all their aspects and that the agreement reached by the parties on 7 May 1995 through the mediation of the United Nations Peace Forces headquarters has been violated, in particular regarding the withdrawal of forces from the zones of separation,

Emphasizing the necessity for full compliance by the parties with the ceasefire agreement of 29 March 1994, and stressing the importance of such compliance for the implementation of the mandate of the United Nations Confidence Restoration Operation in Croatia, which is known as UNCRO,

Emphasizing further that withdrawal from the zones of separation is a condition for the implementation of the mandate of UNCRO,

Affirming its commitment to the search for an overall negotiated settlement of the conflicts in the former Yugoslavia ensuring the sovereignty and territorial integrity of all the States there within their internationally recognized borders, stressing the importance it attaches to the mutual recognition thereof, and in this context welcoming all international efforts to facilitate a negotiated solution to the conflict in the Republic of Croatia,

Emphasizing that full observance of human rights, including appropriate international monitoring thereof, in particular in the area of Western Slavonia known as Sector West, is an essential step towards restoration of confidence between the parties and building a durable peace,

Condemning in the strongest terms all unacceptable acts which were directed at the personnel of the United Nations peacekeeping forces, and determined to obtain strict respect of the status of such personnel in the Republic of Croatia as provided for in the Agreement between the United Nations and the Government of the Republic of Croatia signed on 15 May 1995,

Reaffirming its determination to ensure the security and freedom of movement of the personnel of United Nations peacekeeping operations in the territory of the former Yugoslavia, and, to these ends, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

1. Reaffirms the statements by the President of the Security Council of 1 May and 4 May 1995 issued as a result of the military offensive launched by the forces of the Government of Croatia in the area of Western Slavonia known as Sector West on 1 May 1995 in violation of the ceasefire agreement of 29 March 1994;

2. Notes with satisfaction the steps taken so far as to meet the requirements set out in the above-mentioned statements, but demands that the parties complete without further delay the withdrawal of all their troops from the zones of separation and refrain from any further violations of those zones;

3. Stresses the need for the early re-establishment of the authority of UNCRO, in accordance with its mandate;

4. Requests the Secretary-General to make the necessary arrangements in order to ensure full deployment of UNCRO, after the withdrawal of the troops of the parties, as provided for in its mandate established by resolutions 981 (1995) and 990 (1995);

5. Demands that the status and the mandate of UNCRO as well as the safety and security of its personnel be respected;

6. Demands also that the Government of the Republic of Croatia respect fully the rights of the Serb population, including their freedom of movement, and allow access to this population by international humanitarian organizations, in conformity with internationally recognized standards;

7. Requests the Secretary-General, in cooperation with the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights, the International Committee of the Red Cross and other relevant international humanitarian institutions, to assess the humanitarian situation of the local Serb population in Sector West, including the problem of refugees, and to report thereon as soon as possible;

8. Fully supports the efforts of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General to achieve the objectives outlined in the statements by the President of the Security Council of 1 and 4 May 1995, and requests the parties to cooperate fully to this end;

9. Calls upon the parties to respect the economic agreement signed by them on 2 December 1994, and in particular to take all necessary steps to ensure the safety and security of the Zagreb-Belgrade highway and its immediate environs as provided for in that agreement;

10. Demands that the parties refrain from taking any further military measures or actions that could lead to the escalation of the situation, and warns that in the event of failure to comply with this demand it will consider further steps needed to ensure such compliance;

11. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the Council for its consideration within two weeks on the implementation of the provisions of the present resolution, including on the modalities for the implementation of the mandate of UNCRO in Sector West;

12. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of Italy stated that the resolution just adopted could and must encourage the parties to speed up their complete and unconditional withdrawal from the zones of separation in order to allow the complete and immediate deployment of UNCRO, and the full implementation of its mandate as outlined in resolutions 981 (1995) and 990 (1995). Nevertheless, resolution 994 (1995) was not merely an attempt to remedy a situation created on the ground by the recent Croatian offensive: it also looked to the future. In that regard, the speaker emphasized the importance of paragraph 10, which contained a firm warning to the parties, demanding that they refrain from taking any further military initiatives that could lead to a new escalation of the conflict. If the parties did not refrain from such initiatives, the Council should not hesitate to consider further measures to ensure compliance with that demand.⁶⁶⁷

The representative of the United Kingdom noted that the resolution just adopted condemned in the strongest possible terms any action against United Nations personnel. Progress towards the withdrawal of troops from the zones of separation was welcome, but it was essential that such a withdrawal be completed forthwith. Otherwise, there was little chance of getting the political process back on track, and only when withdrawal had been completed would UNCRO be able to redeploy so as to begin its tasks of implementing its mandate. It was also essential that the United Nations and other international bodies be given full access to Western Slavonia, so as to lay to rest concerns about human rights. The report of the Secretary-General on the implementation of resolution 994 (1995), to be submitted within the following two weeks, would be important as the Council would need to consider at that stage how best to ensure full deployment of UNCRO in accordance with its mandate.⁶⁶⁸

The representative of the Russian Federation stated that it was the non-compliance with the demands set forth in the presidential statements of 1 and 4 May, that had forced his delegation to consider the real need to adopt a resolution that would demonstrate that the Council did not intend to go along with violations of its decisions. His delegation assumed that the adoption of resolution 994 (1995) would lead to: a full restoration of the mandate of UNCRO; a full withdrawal of the forces of all sides from the zones of separation; and the appropriate implementation of the ceasefire agreement and the economic agreement. Referring to paragraph 6 of that resolution, the speaker said that the Russian Federation expected that the Secretary-General would carry out the request to prepare a report on the humanitarian situation of the Serb population in Sector West. He further noted that his delegation would have preferred the resolution to contain a clearer assessment of the situation that had arose as a result of the Croatian attacks, such as the failure to observe the military embargo against Croatia. He concluded by pointing out that the resolution just adopted did not in any way conclude the Council's consideration of Croatia. In that regard, he referred to paragraph 10 of the resolution in which the Council warned the parties that in the event they would not comply with the demand contained in that paragraph, it would consider additional steps.⁶⁶⁹

The President, speaking in his capacity as the representative of France, recalled that the Council had demanded in clear terms, in its presidential statements of 1 and 4 May, that an end be put to the armed incursions in the zones of separation in Croatia. He noted that, in spite of the commitments announced in that respect by the Croatian authorities, concrete withdrawal operations on the ground had been partial and delayed. That was why France had voted in favour of resolution 994 (1995) which demanded that a total withdraw be completed without further delay. That demand was also addressed to the Croatian Serb forces which were still in the zones of separation. The situation could not truly be stabilized unless both parties respect the buffer zones.⁶⁷⁰

Decision of 16 June 1995 (3545th meeting):
statement by the President

On 9 June 1995, pursuant to resolution 994 (1995), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the implementation of that resolution, including on the modalities for the implementation of the mandate in Sector West of UNCRO, and on the humanitarian situation of the local Serb population in Sector West.⁶⁷¹

⁶⁶⁹ Ibid., pp. 5-6.

⁶⁷⁰ Ibid., p. 7.

⁶⁷¹ S/1995/467.

The Secretary-General noted that the Croatian military offensive in Sector West on 1 May 1995 had underlined the reality that peacekeeping forces could not keep the peace without the cooperation of the parties. While the presence of United Nations forces was critical for achieving the cessation-of-hostilities agreement of 3 May 1995, for preventing escalation and for monitoring the subsequent humanitarian and human rights situation of Serbs in the Sector, it had not been sufficient to prevent the sequence of events leading to the Croatian offensive nor to forestall the offensive itself. In these circumstances, he had seriously re-examined the role of UNCRO. In meetings with his Special Representative, both sides had stated their desire that the peacekeeping mission should continue. But cooperation on the ground had been unsatisfactory and UNCRO personnel had been put at risk. Concerning the UNCRO mandate, there appeared to be common ground between the parties that the mission should fulfil the tasks arising from the ceasefire and economic agreements and from its humanitarian and human rights mandates. The redeployment of the mission by 30 June 1995 was no longer possible however.

The Secretary-General stated that the parties' request that UNCRO should stay was a positive deployment. He therefore intended to monitor closely the continuing level of the parties' cooperation with UNCRO and particularly the extent to which they complied with the ceasefire agreement, allowed UNCRO full freedom of movement and made serious efforts to protect its personnel. UNCRO would coordinate closely with the Croatian Government as well as with international organizations and agencies, to ensure full respect for the human rights of the Serb minority in Sector West and to report on the extent to which purposeful policies of reconciliation and confidence-building were being implemented in the Sector. The Secretary-General was conscious that there remained, on both sides, influential elements that continued to be unreconciled to the objectives of the international community and who were inclined to pursue their ends by military means.

At its 3545th meeting, on 16 June 1995, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representative of Croatia, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (Germany) then stated that, after consultations among members of the Security Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁶⁷²

The Security Council has considered the report of the Secretary-General of 9 June 1995 submitted pursuant to its resolution 994 (1995) of 17 May 1995. It is concerned at the situation described therein, and at the continuing failure of the parties to cooperate satisfactorily with the United Nations Confidence Restoration Operation in Croatia, which is known as UNCRO, and to comply fully with the demands of the Council. It condemns in particular the continuation of offensive actions and the intimidation of UNCRO personnel in violation of its resolution 994 (1995).

The Council looks to the parties to cooperate fully and unconditionally with UNCRO in the performance of its mandate and to ensure the safety, security and freedom of movement of its personnel. The Council demands that they fulfil their commitment under the ceasefire agreement of 29 March 1994, in particular in respect of the withdrawal of all forces and heavy weapons from the zones of separation, and fully implement the agreement of 2 December 1994 on economic confidence-building measures. It calls upon the parties, and in particular the Government of Croatia, to cease all military action in and around Sector South. It also calls upon all parties to respect fully the international border between the Republic of Croatia and the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina and to stop any action that extends the conflict across this border, since this is in violation of the Council's resolutions. It reiterates its warning that in the event of failure to comply with the demand in its resolution 994 (1995) that the parties refrain from taking any further military measures or actions that could lead to the escalation of the situation, it will consider further steps needed to ensure such compliance.

The Council requests the Committee established under resolution 724 (1991) of 15 December 1991 to continue to investigate, in accordance with its mandate, reports of violations of resolution 713 (1991) of 25 September 1991.

The Council welcomes the agreement of the Government of Croatia to a continued UNCRO presence in the area of Western Slavonia known as Sector West for the purposes of implementing its mandate, in particular in respect of human rights, to which it continues to attach great importance. It endorses the Secretary-General's view as to the necessity for reconciliation and confidence-building in that Sector. It stresses the importance it attaches to full respect for the human rights of the Serb population there. It encourages the Secretary-General to continue his coordination with the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights as well as other international organizations and agencies in this regard.

The Council notes the Secretary-General's judgement that completion of the redeployment of United Nations peacekeeping personnel in the Republic of Croatia by 30 June 1995 envisaged in its resolution 982 (1995) of 31 March 1995 is no longer possible. It requests the Secretary-General to proceed as expeditiously as possible with this redeployment with the aim of fulfilling all tasks under the mandate of UNCRO. It demands that the parties cooperate with the efforts of UNCRO to implement fully its mandate.

The Council notes the fact that both parties have stated their desire that the peacekeeping mission should continue and that they are seeking the assistance of UNCRO. It welcomes the Secretary-General's intention to monitor closely their cooperation with UNCRO and their compliance with the ceasefire agreement of 29 March 1994, and requests him to keep the Council fully informed. Such cooperation and compliance are essential for the implementation of the mandate of UNCRO and for progress towards a negotiated settlement which respects fully the sovereignty and territorial integrity of the Republic of Croatia and which guarantees the security and rights of all communities.

The Council could not countenance moves by the local Serb authorities in the Republic of Croatia and the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina to establish a union between them, since this would be inconsistent with the Council's commitment to the sovereignty and territorial integrity of the Republic of Croatia and the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina.

The Council stresses that there can be no military solution to the conflict and calls upon the parties to reaffirm their commitment to a peaceful resolution of their differences.

The Council notes with distress the loss of life and casualties which have been suffered by UNCRO and extends its condolences to the families of the bereaved.

The Council will remain seized of the matter.

Decision of 3 August 1995 (3560th meeting):
statement by the President

At its 3560th meeting, on 3 August 1995, the Council resumed its consideration of the item. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representative of Croatia, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (Indonesia) then stated that, after consultations among members of the Security Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁶⁷³

The Security Council is deeply concerned at the deterioration in the situation in and around the Republic of Croatia.

The Council fully supports the efforts of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General and of the Co-Chairman of the Steering Committee of the International Conference on the Former Yugoslavia to defuse the situation, in line with the Council's previous resolutions.

The Council stresses that there can be no military solution to the conflict in Croatia and welcomes the holding of talks between the parties at Geneva earlier today. It calls on both parties to commit themselves fully to that process and to acceptance of the draft agreement drawn up by the Co-Chairman as a basis for continuing those talks.

The Council demands that the parties halt all military actions and exercise the utmost restraint.

Decision of 4 August 1995 (3561st meeting):
statement by the President

At its 3561st meeting, on 4 August 1995, the Council resumed its consideration of the item. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representatives of Bosnia and Herzegovina and Croatia, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (Indonesia) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a letter dated 4 August 1995 from the representative of Croatia addressed to the President of the Security Council, transmitting a letter of the same date from the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister for Foreign Affairs of Croatia.⁶⁷⁴

The President then stated that, after consultations among members of the Security Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁶⁷⁵

The Security Council is deeply concerned at the resumption of hostilities in and around the Republic of Croatia. The Council recalls the statement by its President of 3 August 1995. It strongly deplores the decision by the Croatian Government to launch a broad military offensive, thereby unacceptably escalating the conflict, with the risk of further consequent attacks by whatever party, and demands that all military action cease immediately and that there be full compliance with all Council resolutions including resolution 994 (1995).

The Council condemns any shelling of civilian targets. It demands that no military action be taken against civilians and that their human rights be fully respected. It reminds the parties of their responsibilities under international humanitarian law and reiterates that those who commit violations of international humanitarian law will be held individually responsible in respect of such acts. The Council calls on the parties to cooperate fully with the United Nations Confidence Restoration Operation in Croatia, which is known as UNCRO, the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees and the International Committee of the Red Cross in ensuring access and protection to the local civilian population as appropriate.

The Council strongly condemns attacks by Croatian Government forces on personnel of the United Nations peacekeeping forces, which have resulted in casualties, including the death of one member of the peacekeeping forces. It demands that such attacks cease immediately and that all detained personnel be released. It also reminds the parties, and in particular the Croatian Government, that they have an obligation to respect United Nations personnel, to ensure their safety and freedom of movement at all times and to enable UNCRO to fulfil its mandate in accordance with the relevant Council resolutions. The Council expresses condolences to the Government of Denmark and to the family of the member of the United Nations peacekeeping forces who lost his life.

The Council deeply regrets the breakdown of the talks which began at Geneva on 3 August 1995. It calls upon the Croatian Government to return to the talks. It reiterates that there can be no military solution to the conflict in Croatia. It reaffirms its call for an unreserved commitment to the search for a negotiated settlement and to resumption of talks on the basis of the draft agreement drawn up by the Co-Chairman of the Steering Committee of the International Conference on the Former Yugoslavia.

The Council will remain seized of the matter and will consider any further measures that may be necessary.

Decision of 10 August 1995 (3563rd meeting):
resolution 1009 (1995)

On 3 August 1995, pursuant to resolution 981 (1995), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the situation in Croatia, including on the ability of UNCRO to implement its mandate.⁶⁷⁶ The Secretary-General reported that, although there had been no large-scale hostilities since May 1995, there had been almost continuous skirmishes, exchanges of fire, incidents and troop deployments within the zones of separation, and an increased number of violations of the heavy weapons withdrawal zones. Those actions, by both sides, had eroded the credibility of the ceasefire agreement to the point where neither side appeared committed to its key provisions. Moreover, the existing military situation, coupled with restrictions on freedom of movement constantly imposed by both sides, had prevented UNCRO from taking any significant remedial action and, in some cases, from even monitoring the situation. Peacekeepers had been unable to position themselves between the warring factions and had been prevented from deploying along the international border. The Secretary-General concluded that, given the high degree of uncertainty concerning developments in Croatia, it was not possible at that time to make a recommendation as to the future of UNCRO. It was his intention, however, to revert to the Security Council with such a recommendation at an appropriate time in the future.

By a letter dated 7 August 1995 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁶⁷⁷ the Secretary-General reported that on 4 August, the Croatian Army had launched a major offensive against the Krajina region, and a significant number of United Nations observation posts had been overrun by the Croatian Army, with some coming under fire. On two occasions, United Nations troops and Serb prisoners had been used as human shields by Croatian Army units. Subsequently, the United Nations had suffered a total of 18 casualties, three of which had been fatal. On 6 August, the Co-Chairmen of the International Conference on the Former Yugoslavia and representatives of the European Union had met in Geneva with the Foreign Minister of Croatia, who had expressed confidence that the Croatian military operation would be completed within 24 hours and had indicated that Croatia would investigate incidents in which United Nations troops had been attacked. The Minister had also given assurances about granting humanitarian organizations access to civilians displaced by the fighting. The Secretary-General further noted that a refugee crisis of major proportions had begun. Tensions remained high and the possibility of continuing hostilities could not be ruled out.

At its 3563rd meeting, on 10 August 1995, the Council included the above-mentioned report and letter in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representatives of Bosnia and Herzegovina and Croatia, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The Council also invited Ambassador Dragomir Djokic, at his request, to address the Council in the course of the subsequent discussion. The President (Indonesia) then drew the attention of the Council members to the text of a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations⁶⁷⁸ and to several other documents.⁶⁷⁹

The representative of Croatia stated that Croatia's action had been carried out mostly on its internationally recognized territory and in part of the territory of Bosnia and Herzegovina, at the express request of that Government, arguing that establishing sovereignty and security on its own territory and coming to the aid of a friendly Government were fully consistent with the Charter of the United Nations. The speaker further claimed that the siege of Bihac, which had been a serious concern for the international community, had been resolved at minimal cost to the international community and to the civilian population in the area. Croatia therefore regretted that the Council had not accepted an amendment that would have acknowledged that the siege of Bihac had been successfully lifted. His Government had accepted responsibility for those and other casualties amongst United Nations personnel and had taken appropriate measures to remedy the costs of individual "indiscretions" and criminal acts against the peacekeepers. His Government also fully supported the new initiative by the United States to restart the negotiating process in a timely manner, and it would support a new conference along the lines suggested by President Yeltsin of the Russian Federation. The new negotiations should be based on the principle of mutual recognition among all successor States of the former Yugoslavia and on the linkage of the sanctions regime against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia to its role in the implementation of a negotiated settlement for the Serbian minority in Croatia. Such a linkage would be important in respect of a successful resolution to the problem of the remaining occupied territory in Croatia — the Vukovar region (the former Sector East). The speaker also contended that the Belgrade occupation of that territory could not be more evident and warned that the premature easing of the sanctions regime before that problem had been resolved might leave the Government of Croatia with no option other than a military one. Before concluding, the speaker noted that Croatia would look to UNCRO to assist it in resolving the problem of the Vukovar region peacefully. As UNCRO redefined its role in the “reintegrated areas” of Croatia, the Government of Croatia would welcome a redeployment of its excess resources to the international border in the Vukovar region.⁶⁸⁰

The representative of Bosnia and Herzegovina argued that Croatia’s action had been in defence of its territories and rights and in promotion of peace and stability within its borders and had preserved the Bihac safe area. That was a victory of the Croatian army over the terrorists and criminals among the Serbians who wanted to carry out violence against innocent civilians on both sides.⁶⁸¹

Mr. Djokic stated that, by opting for “all-out aggression”, Croatia had not simply attacked the Serb population, but also flagrantly violated the Security Council resolutions establishing the United Nations protected areas in Krajina, and had breached the Vance plan. The Government of Croatia had acted in total disregard of the unambiguous and clear-cut demands of the Security Council, that it refrain from taking any further actions that could lead to the escalation of the situation, and particularly that it cease all military actions in and around sector South. It was particularly worrisome that the Security Council and the international community had not condemned the “brutal” Croatian aggression. Particular responsibility lay with the Security Council, whose primary role under Chapter VII of the Charter was to maintain peace and security and protect the victims of aggression, to take “concrete and resolute measures” against Croatia. The speaker noted that it was particularly distressing that the Council did not demand that Croatian troops withdraw to the positions held prior to 4 August 1995 and that the calls for the introduction of comprehensive actions against Croatia had been ignored. He further urged the Security Council to make Croatia allow access to representatives of the United Nations and humanitarian organizations to the territories of Krajina in order to conduct a thorough and objective investigation into the events that had taken place during the Croatian offensive, including alleged massacres, torture, opening fire on refugees, and the use of United Nations personnel and Serb soldiers and civilians as human shields. He added that the draft resolution before the Council represented a totally inadequate response to the drama that had been unfolding in Krajina.⁶⁸²

Speaking before the vote, the representative of Germany stated that his delegation deplored the Croatian Government’s decision to use military means to regain those territories previously known as Sector South and Sector North. At the same time it was ready to acknowledge that Croatia’s patience had been tested severely by the intransigence of the Croatian Serb leadership and by the great number of ceasefire violations committed by Croatian Serb forces and their pattern of cross border attacks, in particular in the area of Bihac. From the German view, there were now three priorities. First, the urgent humanitarian needs must be addressed, and full respect for human rights must be ensured. Second, the situation in and around Croatia must be stabilized. Third, the conflicting parties must be brought back to the negotiating table. In concluding, the speaker stated that Croatia needed to ensure that the human rights and minority rights of the Serbs of the former Sector East and Sector North were fully respected. Germany was deeply concerned about the fate of the Croatian Serb refugees and considered it crucial that Croatia guarantee the right of those refugees to return, and that the Croatian authorities do everything in their power to create circumstances and a climate conducive to such a return.⁶⁸³

The representative of China stated that his delegation would vote in favour of the draft resolution because it urged the parties to stop hostilities immediately and resume negotiations at an early date, it called for an urgent solution to humanitarian problems, and it called upon the parties to ensure the freedom of movement of UNCRO personnel. China maintained its reservation, however, with regard to the references in the draft resolution to Chapter VII of the Charter and resolution 816 (1993).⁶⁸⁴

The representative of the Russian Federation stated that the Croatian offensive had brought to naught the efforts of the international community to find a political solution. He argued that Zagreb had taken a stance of integrating Serb-populated regions by force, meaning that the principle of a just solution had been sacrificed to a philosophy of fait accompli. The Russian Federation believed that such an approach would have harmful consequences both for the settlement of the Yugoslav crisis and for the role to be played by the United Nations in maintaining and restoring international peace and security. The speaker stated that the gravity of the situation required the adoption of urgent measures. The Russian Federation therefore had taken an active part in the preparation of the draft resolution. Of special importance in the Russian Federation's view was the demand that Croatia cease immediately all hostilities and comply with all relevant Council resolutions, including resolution 994 (1995), and that it fully respect the rights of the local Serb population. No less important was the demand by the Council that Croatia respect the status of United Nations personnel, put an end to attacks on it and punish those guilty of perpetrating them. Noting that the draft resolution referred with concern to reports of violations of resolution 713 (1991), the speaker stated that the tragic events in Croatia had reaffirmed that if violations of the arms embargo went unpunished, the parties would be tempted to try to solve disputes not around the negotiating table, but by force of arms. It was therefore necessary to adopt additional measures to ensure effective compliance with resolution 713 (1991). Another clear conclusion was that the United Nations peacekeeping operations in Croatia must continue in order to prevent a complete humanitarian catastrophe and to ensure objective international observation of the actions of the Croatian authorities with regard to the Serbian population that had come under its control. In that regard, any violations of international law required the adoption of effective and impartial measures, including by the Council. The situation in Croatia had to remain under the close scrutiny of the Council which would be prepared to consider further measures to achieve compliance with the draft resolution. There were such measures that the Council could take, and that should be remembered by those who believed that the Council's decision were not binding on them.⁶⁸⁵

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and was adopted unanimously as resolution 1009 (1995), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling all its previous resolutions on the conflicts in the territory of the former Yugoslavia, in particular resolutions 981 (1995) of 31 March 1995, 990 (1995) of 28 April 1995 and 994 (1995) of 17 May 1995,

6. Demands that the Government of the Republic of Croatia fully respect the status of United Nations personnel, refrain from any attacks against them, bring to justice those responsible for any such attacks and ensure the safety and freedom of movement of United Nations personnel at all times, and requests the Secretary-General to keep the Council informed of steps taken and decisions rendered in this regard;

7. Urges the parties and others concerned to exercise maximum restraint in and around Sector East, and requests the Secretary-General to keep the situation there under review;

8. Reminds all parties of their obligation to comply fully with the provisions of resolution 816 (1993) of 31 March 1993;

9. Reiterates its call for a negotiated settlement that guarantees the rights of all communities, and urges the Government of the Republic of Croatia to resume talks under the auspices of the Co-Chairmen of the Steering Committee of the International Conference on the Former Yugoslavia;

10. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the Council within three weeks of the adoption of the present resolution on its implementation and on the implications of the situation for the United Nations Confidence Restoration Operation in Croatia, which is known as UNCRO, and expresses its readiness to consider promptly his recommendations in relation to UNCRO;

11. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter and to consider further measures to achieve compliance with the present resolution.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of France noted that while Sector North and Sector South, where the Croatian offensive unfolded, were part of Croatia, the Serb population in these regions did have rights recognized by the international community. In that regard, he recalled that recognition of Croatia by the European Union was made expressly contingent on recognition by that State of the rights of the Serb minority. The speaker further stated that the resolutions of the Security Council made it incumbent upon the Croatian authorities to turn to negotiation to bring about reintegration within the Republic of the territories in question. By putting an end to discussions in Geneva with the Serb party in Croatia and deliberately choosing the military option to restore their authority in these sectors, the Zagreb authorities had taken a decision contrary to their international obligations. Turning to the resolution, the speaker noted that the resolution just adopted was timely and fitting for three reasons. First, it placed very special emphasis on respect for the rights of civilians. The Serb populations must be free to move about and those who had fled must be able to come back in satisfactory conditions of safety and security to their region of origin. It was also essential that humanitarian organizations be able to monitor the situation. Secondly, the resolution embodied a very forceful condemnation of the behaviour of Croatian Government forces towards United Nations forces. Those responsible for violations of the laws of war would have to be brought to justice. Finally, the resolution clearly warned that hostilities should not be pursued in the direction of Sector East, because that would raise by yet another notch the escalation and the risk of generalization of the conflict.⁶⁸⁶

⁶⁸⁶ Ibid., pp. 16-17.

The representative of the United States noted that her Government regretted the decision by the Government of Croatia to launch an offensive against the Krajina region. It also urged all parties to refrain from further attacks, whether within Croatia or Bosnia and Herzegovina. The speaker urged that it must be a priority for all parties to protect civilian refugees who had been forced to flee the military operations. The rights of those Serbs who chose to remain in Croatia must also be respected and it was essential that international agencies had unimpeded access to observe conditions in Krajina and provide humanitarian relief where needed. The United States expected the war-crimes Tribunal to investigate allegations of abuse against unarmed civilians, and it joined in condemning the wrongful acts committed against United Nations peacekeepers. The resolution just adopted reminded Croatia of its obligation to create conditions conducive to the safe return of those persons who had fled their homes, and it stressed the importance of granting the International Committee of the Red Cross access to those who had been detained. At the same time, while the United States regretted the means used, it was also necessary to recognize that the new safe area of Bihac was now open to humanitarian relief.⁶⁸⁷

The President, speaking in his capacity as the representative of Indonesia, stated that his delegation had voted in favour of the resolution just adopted since it embodied principles that Indonesia had consistently espoused, including commitment to the search for a comprehensive negotiated settlement of the conflicts in the former Yugoslavia, the need to respect international humanitarian law and the inviolability of all United Nations personnel, as well as the sovereignty and territorial integrity of all States of the former Yugoslavia.⁶⁸⁸

Decision of 29 August 1995: letter from the President to the Secretary-General

On 23 August 1995, pursuant to resolution 1009 (1995), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the implications of the situation in Croatia on the mandate of UNCRO.⁶⁸⁹

⁶⁸⁷ Ibid., p. 20.

⁶⁸⁹ S/1995/730.

The Secretary-General reported that since his last report of 3 August and his letter of 7 August, neither party had ceased military actions, nor had they complied fully with relevant Security Council resolutions. Tensions had remained high, especially in Sector East, and the Croatian Army had not always prosecuted its campaigns with sufficient regard for the safety of United Nations personnel or Krajina Serb civilians. Croatia's reintegration by force of the former Sectors West, South and North had eliminated the need for infantry battalions in these areas. The Theatre Force Commander had therefore initiated the immediate reduction of the UNCRO troop strength. The Secretary-General observed that UNCRO's immediate task in Sector East was to try to re-establish the regime created by the ceasefire agreement. If that could be achieved, he would be inclined to think that there would be a continuing role for United Nations forces in Sector East. He had instructed his Special Representative to consult with the Government of Croatia and the local Serb leadership in Sector East, in order to define a possible mandate for UNCRO. He had also requested him to discuss with the Government of Croatia what tasks, if any, UNCRO could perform elsewhere in Croatia. The Secretary-General recommended that the Security Council approve the further repatriation, during the existing mandate, of all remaining battalions, with the exception of two in Sector East.⁶⁹⁰

By a letter dated 29 August 1995,⁶⁹¹ the President of the Security Council informed the Secretary-General of the following:

The members of the Security Council have considered your report of 23 August 1995 pursuant to resolution 1009 (1995).

The members of the Council agree with your recommendation set out in paragraph 32 of that report concerning the repatriation of remaining battalions of the United Nations Confidence Restoration Operation in Croatia, which is known as UNCRO, with the exception of the two in Sector East. They support the views you express concerning the possible future configuration and tasks of UNCRO and urge you to continue your contacts in this regard. They express their readiness to consider further recommendations in the light of those contacts. Pending such consideration, they stress the importance they attach to the retention of the current configuration and tasks of UNCRO in Sector East. They underline the need for a new spirit of cooperation with UNCRO there and elsewhere in the Republic of Croatia.

The members of the Council fully support you in your efforts to ensure that the parties and others concerned exercise maximum restraint in and around Sector East and pursue a negotiated solution.

The members of the Council note with concern the difficulties you report concerning implementation by the Croatian Government of the agreement on the status of forces. They look to the Croatian Government to implement fully and unconditionally the terms of that agreement in all aspects.

The members of the Council express their concern over the humanitarian problems described in your report. They stress the importance they attach to fulfilment of the provisions of the Council's resolutions in this regard and to efforts by the international community to alleviate the plight of refugees and displaced persons.

Decision of 7 September 1995 (3573rd meeting):
statement by the President

At its 3573rd meeting, on 7 September 1995, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General of 23 August 1995 in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representative of Croatia, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (Italy) then stated that, after consultations among members of the Security Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁶⁹²

The Security Council has considered the report of the Secretary-General of 23 August 1995 submitted pursuant to its resolution 1009 (1995) of 10 August 1995 and in particular the humanitarian situation and human rights violations described therein.

The Council expresses its deep concern at the grave situation of refugees and persons displaced during the Croatian offensive and at reports of violations of international humanitarian law as described in the report of the Secretary-General. The Council shares the view of the Secretary-General that the mass exodus of the local Serb population has created a humanitarian crisis of significant proportions. The Council is also concerned by reports of human rights violations, including the burning of houses, looting of property and killings, and demands that the Government of Croatia immediately investigate all such reports and take appropriate measures to put an end to such acts.

The Council reiterates its demand that the Government of the Republic of Croatia respect fully the rights of the local Serb population, including their right to remain or return in safety.

⁶⁹² S/PRST/1995/44.

The Council welcomes efforts made by the Secretary-General in coordination with international humanitarian organizations in response to this acute humanitarian situation. It calls upon all Member States to provide urgent humanitarian relief and assistance to those refugees and displaced persons.

The Council reiterates that all those who commit violations of international humanitarian law will be held individually responsible in respect of such acts. The Council reiterates in this context that all States shall cooperate fully with the International Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of the Former Yugoslavia since 1991, established pursuant to its resolution 827 (1993), and its organs.

The Council will remain actively seized of the matter.

Decision of 3 October 1995 (3584th meeting):
statement by the President

At its 3584th meeting, on 3 October 1995, the Council continued its consideration of the item. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representatives of Bosnia and Herzegovina and Croatia, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (Nigeria) then stated that, after consultations among members of the Security Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁶⁹³

The Security Council expresses its concern at the humanitarian situation in and around the Republic of Croatia, including the situation of refugees from the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina.

The Council is particularly concerned at the withdrawal of refugee status from and the consequent ending of assistance to many refugees from the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina at present in the Republic of Croatia. The decisions of the Government of Croatia in this regard may lead to the involuntary return of tens of thousands of people to an area that is neither safe nor prepared to receive them. The Council stresses the importance of the principle of non-refoulement set out in the 1951 Geneva Convention relating to the Status of Refugees, to which Croatia is a party. The Council urges the Government of Croatia to continue to provide asylum to all refugees regardless of their origin.

The Council is also seriously concerned at the situation of the refugees from the Republic of Croatia wishing to return, as well as of those ethnic Serbs who have chosen to remain in the Republic of Croatia. It reiterates its demands, contained, inter alia, in its resolution 1009 (1995), that the Government of Croatia respect fully the rights of the local Serb population, including their right to remain or return in safety, investigate all reports of human rights violations and take appropriate measures to put an end to such acts. The Council calls upon the Government of Croatia to lift any time-limits placed on the return of refugees to Croatia to reclaim their property. The Council also calls upon the Government to cooperate with international humanitarian organizations in the creation of conditions conducive to the repatriation of refugees in safety and dignity.

The Council will remain actively seized of the matter.

Decision of 10 October 1995: letter from the President to the Secretary-General

On 29 September 1995, pursuant to resolution 1009 (1995), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on consultations held by his Special Representative with the Government of Croatia, Belgrade and the local Serb authorities in Sector East on the tasks of UNCRO.⁶⁹⁴ He reported that, after intensive consultations, his Special Representative had been assured by the parties that they were willing to resolve the issue of Sector East through negotiation. In addition, both sides had undertaken to improve their level of compliance with existing agreements, and specific regard to cooperation with UNCRO. Following his discussions, his Special Representative had proposed a plan based on the six following main tasks: (a) performing fully the functions envisaged in the Ceasefire Agreement between Croatia and the local Serb authorities in Sector East; (b) facilitating the implementation of the sections of the Economic Agreement of 2 December 1994 which were relevant to Sector East, and arranging local economic initiatives as appropriate; (c) facilitating the implementation of all relevant Council resolutions, including the functions identified in paragraph 72 of the Secretary-General's report of 22 March 1995, in particular the continuation of confidence-building and humanitarian tasks, such as assistance to refugees and displaced persons and the monitoring of the treatment of ethnic minorities; (d) assisting in controlling, by monitoring and reporting, the crossing of military personnel, equipment, supplies and weapons, over the international borders between Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia at the border crossings where UNCRO was deployed; (e) monitoring the demilitarization of the Prevlaka peninsula in accordance with resolution 779 (1992); and (f) observing and reporting on military incidents in the vicinity of the international border between Croatia and ⁶⁹⁴ S/1995/835.

Bosnia and Herzegovina. The Secretary-General therefore recommended that the Council approve the plan. It would apply to the remainder of the current mandate of UNCRO, pending ongoing negotiations on the ultimate future of Sector East in the context of an overall political settlement of the crisis in the former Yugoslavia.

By a letter dated 10 October 1995,⁶⁹⁵ the President of the Security Council informed the Secretary-General of the following:

The members of the Security Council have considered your report of 29 September 1995 submitted pursuant to Council resolution 1009 (1995). The members of the Council agree with the arrangements set out in that report for the remainder of the current mandate of the United Nations Confidence Restoration Operation in Croatia, which is known as UNCRO, pending, in the case of Eastern Slavonia, the outcome of the ongoing negotiations on the subject.

Decision of 22 November 1995 (3596th meeting): resolution 1023 (1995)

By a letter dated 15 November 1995 addressed to the Secretary-General, the representative of Croatia transmitted the text of the Basic Agreement on the Region of Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium, signed by the Government of Croatia and the local Croatian Serb authorities in Eastern Slavonia on 12 November 1995.⁶⁹⁶ The Agreement provided, inter alia, that there would be a transitional period of 12 months, extendable to 24 months if one of the parties so requested, and that the Security Council would establish a Transitional Administration and an international force, respectively, to govern the region during that transitional period and to maintain peace and security.

At its 3596th meeting, on 22 November 1995, the Council included the letter in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representative of Croatia, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (Oman) then drew the attention of the Council members to the text of a draft resolution submitted by Argentina, the Czech Republic, France, Germany, Honduras, Italy, the Russian Federation,

⁶⁹⁶ S/1995/951.

Rwanda, the United Kingdom and the United States,⁶⁹⁷ as well as to several other documents.⁶⁹⁸

Speaking before the vote, the representative of the Russian Federation pointed out that the Basic Agreement on the Region of Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium had been made possible by the parties' realism and sense of responsibility, as well as the considerable contribution of international mediators and States members of the Contact Group. The Basic Agreement provided for restoration of security guarantees that had been undermined for the entire population during the years of conflict, securing for Croats, Serbs and representatives of other nationalities, in equal measure, basic human rights and freedoms, adequate conditions for the return of refugees, and normalization of life. The Agreement also removed the obstacles to the full normalization of relations between Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, which was of decisive significance for a comprehensive settlement of the crisis in the Balkans. In that regard, the Russian Federation believed that the draft resolution before the Council was appropriate and timely. In its view, the United Nations must play an important role in the promotion of the peace process, including the creation of a Transitional Administration and an international force. The Russian Federation, for its part was prepared to continue its contribution to ensuring peace and security in the region. It also supported the continuation and expansion of international efforts to ensure human rights in Croatia.⁶⁹⁹

The representative of China stated that his delegation would vote in favour of the draft resolution on the basis of its position that, in any settlement of the Croatian question, the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Croatia should be respected and that the Government of Croatia and the local Serbian authorities should seek a solution acceptable to both sides to the conflict, through peaceful negotiation. Noting that the Agreement contained requests to the United Nations and the Security Council concerning authorization by the Council of a Transitional Administration and an international force, the speaker

⁶⁹⁸ Letter dated 6 October 1995 from the representative of Croatia addressed to the President of the Security Council (S/1995/843); and letter dated 15 November 1995 from the representative of Ukraine addressed to the Secretary-General (S/1995/964).

cautioned that those requests involved many complicated political and legal issues, thus making it necessary to conduct careful studies and to refrain from making hasty decisions as to how the United Nations might facilitate and participate in the implementation of the peace plan in the region.⁷⁰⁰

The representative of the Czech Republic stated that the cornerstone of the Basic Agreement was the setting up of a Transitional Administration in Sector East for one year. His delegation had noted with concern, however, the generality of many of the provisions of the Basic Agreement. It understood from that fact that the parties had agreed on general language but had been divided on the details, thus passing over to the Council the "hot potato" of the details. The parties were eager to pass the responsibility for the consent of their Agreement to the Council, even while the Czech delegation had always argued that the prime responsibility for shaping their future must reside with the parties in conflict themselves.⁷⁰¹

The representative of Germany observed that the Basic Agreement was based on two important principles. On the one side, the sovereignty of Croatia with regard to Eastern Slavonia was acknowledged. On the other hand, there needed to be full protection of and guarantees for the rights of the local Serb population. The speaker cautioned, however, that there should be no misunderstanding: the Basic Agreement would enter into force only upon the Council's adoption of a resolution establishing a Transitional Administration and authorizing an international force. Thus, the Basic Agreement conferred upon the Security Council important responsibilities. In the following days and weeks, the members of the Council would have to work intensively on the details and modalities of the envisaged international force and Transitional Administration. Ultimately, however, it was only the Government of Croatia and the local Serb party that could make the Basic Agreement a success. It was therefore right that the draft resolution stressed the need for them to cooperate fully on the basis of the Agreement and to refrain from any measures that might hinder its implementation. That also held true for the Government of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia.⁷⁰²

⁷⁰² Ibid., pp. 4-5.

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and was adopted unanimously as resolution 1023 (1995), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling all its earlier relevant resolutions,

Reaffirming its commitment to the search for an overall negotiated settlement of the conflicts in the former Yugoslavia, ensuring the sovereignty and territorial integrity of all the States there within their internationally recognized borders, and stressing the importance it attaches to the mutual recognition thereof,

Reaffirming once again its commitment to the independence, sovereignty and territorial integrity of the Republic of Croatia, and emphasizing in this regard that the territories of Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium, known as Sector East, are integral parts of the Republic of Croatia,

Affirming the importance it attaches to full respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms of all in those territories,

Commending the continuing efforts of the representatives of the United Nations, the European Union, the Russian Federation and the United States of America to facilitate a negotiated solution to the conflict in the Republic of Croatia,

1. Welcomes the Basic Agreement on the Region of Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium between the Government of the Republic of Croatia and the local Serb representatives, signed on 12 November 1995 in the presence of the United Nations mediator and the United States Ambassador to the Republic of Croatia;

2. Recognizes the request to it contained in the Basic Agreement to establish a transitional administration and authorize an appropriate international force, stands ready to consider the above request expeditiously in order to facilitate the implementation of the Agreement, and invites the Secretary-General to maintain the closest possible contact with all those concerned in order to assist with its work on the matter;

3. Stresses the need for the Government of the Republic of Croatia and the local Serb party to cooperate fully on the basis of the Basic Agreement and refrain from any military activity or any measure that might hinder the implementation of the transitional arrangements set out in it, and reminds them of their obligation to cooperate fully with the United Nations Confidence Restoration Operation in Croatia, which is known as UNCRO, and to ensure its safety and freedom of movement;

4. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of France stated that the principle goal of the resolution just adopted, was to establish and guarantee a just and lasting peace for all the inhabitants of Eastern Slavonia. It was necessary to show that the international community supported the peace process under way and the principles that had inspired it, including: the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Croatia; the recognition and protection of the fundamental rights of the whole population of the region; the need for the rapid return of all displaced persons and refugees; and the guarantee that all the inhabitants of Eastern Slavonia would be able to live in peace and dignity.⁷⁰³

The representative of the United States noted that the resolution just adopted was an important step in building confidence between Croats and Serbs, but much still remained to be done before a final peace was established. The parties to the Basic Agreement had asked the international community not only to underwrite, but also to administer the region in its transition period. That was a large undertaking, which would require consultation, planning and coordination between interested parties. Before concluding, the speaker noted that the efforts of the Security Council, including establishing and enforcing sanctions, authorizing peacekeeping forces, and responding aggressively to human rights violations on all sides, had finally come to fruition, through the initialling of the Dayton Agreement and the adoption of the Basic Agreement.⁷⁰⁴

The President, speaking in his capacity as the representative of Oman, while welcoming the signing of the Basic Agreement, cautioned that the Agreement was not an end in itself. Rather, it was a first step towards establishing peace and the normalization of relations in that region. Referring to the resolution just adopted, he stated that the most important provision was the reference to mutual recognition between all States in the area of the former Yugoslavia. Such recognition would ensure the sovereignty and territorial integrity of all the States within their internationally recognized borders, helping to establish confidence between the States of the region.⁷⁰⁵

Decision of 30 November 1995 (3600th meeting): resolution 1025 (1995)

On 23 November 1995, pursuant to resolutions 981 (1995), 982 (1995) and 983 (1995), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the peacekeeping missions in the former Yugoslavia.⁷⁰⁶ The report was intended to assist the Council in its deliberations on the future of those missions, as their mandates were due to terminate on 30 November 1995. The Secretary-General observed that the Basic Agreement on the Region of Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium was a landmark accomplishment that provided for the peaceful integration into Croatia of the region known as Sector East. Recalling that the Basic Agreement requested the Council to establish a transitional administration and to authorize an international force, he stressed that timeliness of its implementation was of the essence for the present momentum of peace to be sustained and required full international support. Addressing the future of UNCRO, the Secretary-General stated that there appeared to be only two realistic options. Either the Security Council could decide to terminate the functions of UNCRO when its mandate expired on 30 November 1995, in the expectation that interested States, international organizations and other institutions would assume responsibility for implementing the Basic Agreement on the Region of Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium (the former Sector East), or the Council could decide to maintain UNCRO for a limited period, during which it would perform its existing tasks until the transitional administration was established and an international force deployed.

The Secretary-General further noted that, the President of Croatia had stated clearly that he could not agree to a further extension of the UNCRO mandate, although he would agree to retain the two currently deployed UNCRO battalions as a transitional arrangement. The President of Croatia had also insisted that the implementation of the Basic Agreement, particularly its demilitarization aspects, begin on 1 December. The Secretary-General warned, however, that to terminate the UNCRO mandate on 30 November 1995, without certainty that other institutions were able to assume responsibility for the implementation of the Basic Agreement, could severely destabilize the area. He therefore recommended that the Council confirm the presence of UNCRO, for a period of two months, as a transitional arrangement pending the establishment of an international force; designate, as quickly as possible, a civilian transitional administrator for the region; and determine the date on which implementation of the Basic Agreement should begin.

At its 3600th meeting, on 30 November 1995, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representative of Croatia, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (Oman) then drew the attention of the Council members to the text of a draft resolution submitted by Argentina, the Czech Republic, France, Germany, Honduras, Italy, the Russian Federation, the United Kingdom and the United States,⁷⁰⁷ and to a letter dated 15 November 1995 from the representative of Croatia addressed to the Secretary-General.⁷⁰⁸

Speaking before the vote, the representative of China said that his delegation agreed in principle with the Secretary-General's proposal that the mandate of the three United Nations peacekeeping operations in the former Yugoslavia be extended so that studies might be conducted on ways and means for the United Nations to participate in peacekeeping operations in that region in the future, and would vote in favour of the draft resolutions before the Council. The speaker pointed out that many lessons had been learned from the United Nations peacekeeping operations in the region. For instance, mandatory action under Chapter VII of the Charter involving the use of force, including air power, had been "most improper" and had affected the legal and neutral status of those peacekeeping operations. Noting that the Basic Agreement and the Dayton Agreement both contained requests for the implementation of peace in that region, the speaker also observed that the United Nations and the Council would undoubtedly have to shoulder important responsibilities, since those requests involved many complex political, legal, military and financial questions. The Council therefore needed to study those questions carefully and to discuss them thoroughly, in order to take a sound decision. Referring to recent discussion on the potential deployment of implementation forces in the former Yugoslavia, the speaker cautioned that such deployment could amount to a major operation. He argued that those operations should be placed under the control and guidance of the Council, so that it could prevent the operations from departing from the principles governing United Nations peacekeeping operations and avoid the “abuse of force” and involvement in the conflict. He cautioned that the Council should not become a “rubber stamp” with regard to matters beyond its control and that no “blank cheques” should be written. In addressing such questions, the Council should adopt a prudent and responsible approach, rather than rushing into any commitments or decisions.⁷⁰⁹

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and was adopted unanimously as resolution 1025 (1995), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling all its previous relevant resolutions and in particular its resolution 981 (1995) of 31 March 1995,

Recalling also the report of the Secretary-General of 29 September 1995 and the letter dated 10 October 1995 from the President of the Security Council to the Secretary-General,

Reaffirming its resolution 1023 (1995) of 22 November 1995,

Reaffirming once again its commitment to the independence, sovereignty and territorial integrity of the Republic of Croatia, and emphasizing in this regard that the territories of Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium, known as Sector East, are integral parts of the Republic of Croatia,

Affirming the importance it attaches to full respect for the human rights and fundamental freedoms of all in those territories and elsewhere in the Republic of Croatia,

Welcoming again the Basic Agreement on the Region of Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium between the Government of the Republic of Croatia and the local Serb representatives, signed on 12 November 1995,

Welcoming the positive role played by the United Nations Confidence Restoration Operation in Croatia, which is known as UNCRO, and paying tribute to the personnel of UNCRO in the performance of their mandate,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 23 November 1995,

Reaffirming its determination to ensure the security and freedom of movement of the personnel of United Nations peacekeeping operations in the territory of the former Yugoslavia, and, to these ends, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

1. Welcomes the report of the Secretary-General of 23 November 1995;

2. Requests the Secretary-General to submit for consideration by the Council at the earliest possible date and no later than 14 December 1995 a report on all aspects of the establishment by the Council of an operation consisting of a transitional administration and a transitional peacekeeping force to implement the relevant provisions of the Basic Agreement on the Region of Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium, including on the possibilities for assistance from the host country in offsetting the costs of the operation;

3. Decides that, in order to allow for the orderly establishment of the operation referred to in paragraph 2 above, the mandate of UNCRO shall terminate after an interim period ending on 15 January 1996 or when the Council has decided on the deployment, including on the necessary period for the transfer of authority, of the transitional peacekeeping force referred to in that paragraph, whichever is sooner;

4. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Decision of 22 December 1995 (3615th meeting):
statement by the President

On 21 December 1995, pursuant to resolution 1019 (1995), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the human rights situation in Croatia.⁷¹⁰ The Secretary-General observed that human rights violations continued to be reported in the former Sectors North and South. The right of Krajina Serbs to remain in their homes had not been adequately safeguarded. The remaining Serbs had faced extensive harassment and intimidation; looters and armed thieves had robbed Serb residents of both their property and their sense of security. Furthermore, the rights of the Serb population who had fled during the military operation to return to their homes were being seriously curtailed by the absence of constructive measures to facilitate their return. In addition, the rights of the minority population in Croatia were being restricted by changes in the Constitution. New legal provisions, such as the law concerning the return and reclamation of property, were inhibiting the full enjoyment of human rights and fundamental freedoms. It was therefore necessary to ensure that the rights of the Serb minority were adequately safeguarded in Croatia's legal and constitutional framework.

At its 3615th meeting, on 22 December 1995, the Council included the report in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representative of Croatia, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (Russian Federation) then stated that, after consultations among members of the Security Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁷¹¹

The Security Council takes note of the report of the Secretary-General of 21 December 1995, which it has just received.

The Council, as a matter of urgency, expresses its grave concern that, according to information in that report, the Government of the Republic of Croatia has ignored the call of the Council in the statement by its President of 3 October 1995 that it lift any time-limits placed on the return of refugees to reclaim their property. The requirement that owners must reclaim their property by 27 December 1995 constitutes a virtually insurmountable obstacle for most Serb refugees.

The Council strongly demands that the Government of the Republic of Croatia lift immediately any time-limits placed on the return of refugees to reclaim their property.

The Council shall continue its consideration of the report of the Secretary-General.

L. The situation prevailing in and around the safe area of Bihac

Initial proceedings

Decision of 19 November 1994 (3461st meeting): resolution 958 (1994)

At its 3461st meeting, on 19 November 1994, the Security Council included the item entitled “The situation prevailing in and around the safe area of Bihac” in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representatives of Bosnia and Herzegovina, Croatia and Germany, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (United States) then drew the attention of the Council members to the text of a draft resolution submitted by France, Germany, the Russian Federation, Spain, the United Kingdom and the United States,⁷¹² as well as to a letter dated 18 November 1994 from the representative of Croatia to the President of the Council, transmitting two letters of the same date from the President of Croatia addressed to the President of the Security Council and the Secretary-

General of NATO,⁷¹³ and a letter dated 19 November 1994 from the representative of Bosnia and Herzegovina addressed to the President of the Council.⁷¹⁴ In the letter to the President of the Council,⁷¹⁵ the President of Croatia reported that rebel Serb forces had been attacking Bosnia and Herzegovina from the United Nations Protected Areas in Croatia, including via air strikes, artillery barrages and cross-border ground troop attacks. His Government urgently requested assistance from the United Nations in ending those attacks, in the form of air strikes against the attacking Serb forces. In the letter to the Secretary-General of NATO,⁷¹⁶ the President of Croatia noted that, in order to end the attacks on Bosnia and Herzegovina from Croatian soil by rebel Serb forces in the United Nations Protected Areas, his Government approved the use of NATO air strikes against those forces for a period of one week.

The representative of Croatia stated that the actions by the so-called Krajina Serb forces in Croatia could no longer be tolerated and he urged that, upon its adoption, the draft resolution should be fully implemented. His delegation was pleased that the draft resolution would further strengthen Croatia’s territorial integrity and sovereignty. The speaker further stated that Croatia would continue to play its constructive role in the peace process so long as the international community continued to uphold its commitment to Croatia in full compliance with the relevant Security Council resolutions but he warned that his country would not wait for ever. He argued that the continuing violations of Croatia’s borders, such as the violations of resolution 820 (1993) and of the border-monitoring mission arrangements of the International Conference on the Former Yugoslavia, contributed to the escalation of activities in the Bihac region by providing fuel for those attacking Bihac. Croatia demanded that the illegal trans-shipment of fuel and goods stop immediately.⁷¹⁷

The representative of Bosnia and Herzegovina said that his delegation was not convinced that the draft resolution was necessary in order to allow an appropriate response to the attacks against the Bihac safe area. He contended that the basis for such action already existed. He added that the actions by the so-called Krajina Serbs were also violations of the no-fly zone, of the supposedly demilitarized status of the United Nations Protected Areas in Croatia, and of the territorial integrity of Bosnia and Herzegovina. Any attack against the territory of Bosnia and Herzegovina would amount to a violation of its territorial integrity, requiring the necessary response to such aggression as a threat to international peace and security, regardless of whether or not it involved a safe area. The speaker also expressed the view that, under the draft resolution, any cross-border attack against civilians or UNPROFOR targets within the Bihac region would meet with a response. He urged the Council to adopt further measures to improve the situation, provide the necessary practical support for UNPROFOR within the Bihac area, and put an end to measures inconsistent with the peace process. In particular, he urged the Council to foreclose all flows of fuel to the Krajina Serbs from Serbia and Montenegro through the occupied areas of Bosnia and Herzegovina and Croatia. He referred to estimates that Bosnian Serb forces needed 5 to 15 truckloads of fuel per day to pursue their war effort and noted that, according to reports from the Border Monitoring Mission of the International Conference on the Former Yugoslavia, between 15 and 20 fuel trucks were in fact being allowed across the border from Serbia and Montenegro each day. That fuel was enough for both the so-called Bosnian Serbs and Krajina Serbs to carry out the attacks that the Council was seeking to confront with the draft resolution before it.⁷¹⁸

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and was adopted unanimously as resolution 958 (1994), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling all its earlier relevant resolutions, in particular its resolution 836 (1993) of 4 June 1993,

Recalling also the statements by the President of the Security Council of 13 November and 18 November 1994, and reiterating its concern about the deteriorating situation in and around the safe area of Bihac,

Having considered the letter dated 18 November 1994 from the Permanent Representative of the Republic of Croatia addressed to the President of the Security Council,

Reaffirming its commitment to the sovereignty and territorial integrity of the Republic of Croatia,

Determining that the situation in the Former Yugoslavia continues to constitute a threat to international peace and security, and determined to support the United Nations Protection Force in the performance of its mandate set out in paragraphs 5 and 9 of resolution 836 (1993), and to this end acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations, Decides that the authorization given in paragraph 10 of its resolution 836 (1993) to Member States, acting nationally or through regional organizations or arrangements, to take, under the authority of the Security Council and subject to close coordination with the Secretary-General and the United Nations Protection Force, all necessary measures, through the use of air power, in and around the safe areas in the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina referred to in its resolution 824 (1993) of 6 May 1993, to support the Force in the performance of its mandate set out in paragraphs 5 and 9 of its resolution 836 (1993) shall apply also to such measures taken in the Republic of Croatia.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of the United Kingdom contended that the resolution just adopted was needed to close the gap revealed by the air attacks launched by Krajina Serb forces in Bihac and was in line with the approach the Council had received from President Tudjman and the Croatian authorities. He added that the resolution was clear and straightforward and simply extended the provisions of resolution 836 (1993), in relation to the use of air power, to Croatian territory. The resolution mirrored in every way paragraph 10 of resolution 836 (1993), and the procedures to implement it would similarly mirror these set in place to implement that resolution. It made possible the extension of the geographical scope of existing procedures for the use of air power rather than creating new ones.⁷¹⁹

The representative of France recalled that the UNPROFOR Commander had asked for an appropriate response, with the use of air strikes, to the aerial bombardment of Bihac. His Government took the view that resolutions 836 (1993) and 908 (1994) made it possible to respond favourably to that request. His delegation regretted that none of the options proposed by the UNPROFOR Commander had been adopted. France believed that, in situations that clearly identified the aggressor and the victim, the response called for by UNPROFOR should be put into effect as soon as possible. He also believed that the resolution would contribute to that.⁷²⁰

⁷¹⁸ Ibid., pp. 3-4.

The representative of the Russian Federation stated that his delegation voted in favour of the resolution just adopted, because it believed that the order which had been established for the use of air power in Bosnia and Herzegovina and surrounding areas and which had now been extended to the territory of Croatia to ensure the protection of the Bihac safe area, fully corresponded to the rules for the use of air power in the other safe areas. It was important that the resolution confirmed that the appropriate measures would be taken under the guidance of the Security Council and in close coordination with the Secretary-General and UNPROFOR. In that context, the speaker stressed that the use of air power by the United Nations forces should be impartial, regardless of who might be the violator. It was also important that the main principle of the safe areas be fully and consistently implemented. These areas were intended for the protection of the civilian population and could not be used for offensive military action or for preparations for such action. The best solution would be the demilitarization of the safe areas.⁷²¹

The representative of China stated that his delegation had voted in favour of the resolution just adopted because it was aimed at protecting the safe area of Bihac and the safety of the civilians there, as well as at ensuring that the UNPROFOR mandate was successfully implemented. He, however, expressed his delegation's reservations concerning the mandatory actions authorized by invoking Chapter VII of the Charter in the resolution and said that the Security Council should be extremely prudent and cautious regarding the use of air power in Croatia. Air power should be used only for the purpose of self-defence to protect the safety and security of UNPROFOR personnel and the civilians in the safe area. It should not be "abused" for punitive or pre-emptive purposes. Moreover, in the use of air power, strict measures should be taken to avoid harming innocent civilians.⁷²²

The representative of Brazil stated that, while his delegation concurred with the need for a technical adjustment to resolution 836 (1993) in order to protect the safe area of Bihac, it was nevertheless concerned that the "extraordinary" recourse to air power was being extended to another country. He reiterated his delegation's reservations on the use of the expression

"all necessary measures", which seemed to be becoming a standard expression of the Council associated with the use of military force, to the detriment of diplomatic efforts. It was also his delegation's understanding, as had been confirmed by the sponsors of the resolution, that the requirement contained in paragraph 11 of resolution 836 (1993), relating to the need for Member States cooperating with UNPROFOR to report to the Council through the Secretary-General, also applied to the resolution just adopted.⁷²³

The President, speaking in her capacity as the representative of the United States, stated that the Council had clarified that the use of air power was authorized to attack targets in Croatia that threatened safe areas in Bosnia or United Nations troops operating in Bosnia. Referring to the fact that the previous day, after the Krajina Serbs had attacked Bosnia, the United Nations Commander for the Former Yugoslavia had raised the issue of a NATO response from the air, she noted that her Government believed that an immediate, affirmative response would have been legally authorized by previous resolutions of the Council.⁷²⁴

M. Letter dated 14 December 1994 from the Chairman of the Security Council Committee established pursuant to resolution 724 (1991) concerning Yugoslavia addressed to the President of the Security Council

Initial proceedings

Decision of 14 December 1994 (3480th meeting): resolution 967 (1994)

By a letter dated 14 December 1994 addressed to the President of the Security Council, the Chairman of the Security Council Committee established by resolution 724 (1991) concerning Yugoslavia, reported that the Acting Executive Director of United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF) had informed the Committee that several countries in Central Asia and Eastern Europe were facing a major resurgence of diphtheria and that the only available stocks of antiserum to combat this serious condition were located in the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia.⁷²⁵ The Acting Executive Director of UNICEF had therefore requested that the Committee facilitate the shipment of 12,000 vials of diphtheria antiserum from the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia for use in the affected countries. The Chairman noted that, taking into account the exceptional humanitarian circumstances of the situation, the Committee had decided to recommend that the Council adopt a resolution permitting, for a period of 30 days, the export from the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia of 12,000 vials of diphtheria antiserum. The Committee had also recommended that any payments for such authorized shipments should be made only into frozen accounts.

At its 3480th meeting, on 14 December 1994, the Council began its consideration of the item. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Rwanda) drew the attention of the Council members to the text of a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.⁷²⁶ The draft resolution was then put to the vote and was adopted unanimously as resolution 967 (1994), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling all its previous relevant resolutions on the situation in the Former Yugoslavia, in particular its resolution 757 (1992) of 30 May 1992,

Taking note of the letter dated 14 December 1994 from the Chairman of the Security Council Committee established pursuant to resolution 724 (1991) concerning Yugoslavia and the communication from the Acting Executive Director of the United Nations Children's Fund of 13 December 1994 annexed thereto, in which the Council is informed of a major resurgence of diphtheria and that the only available stocks of antiserum to combat this serious condition are located in the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro),

Recognizing that the export of antiserum from the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) will require an exemption from the provisions of resolution 757 (1992) of 30 May 1992, and acting in this respect under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

1. Decides to permit, for a period of thirty days from the date of the adoption of the present resolution, the export of 12,000 vials of diphtheria antiserum from the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro);
2. Decides further that any payments for such authorized shipments shall be made only into frozen accounts;
3. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

N. The situation in the former Yugoslavia

Initial proceedings

Decision of 6 October 1995 (3585th meeting): statement by the President

At its 3585th meeting, on 6 October 1995, the Security Council included the item entitled "The situation in the former Yugoslavia" in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representatives of Bosnia and Herzegovina and Croatia, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

The President (Nigeria) then stated that, after consultations among members of the Security Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁷²⁷

The Security Council welcomes the 5 October 1995 agreement by the Bosnian parties to a ceasefire, including the agreement to terminate all hostile military activities throughout the territory of the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina, as of 10 October 1995, provided that full gas and electrical utility service is restored to Sarajevo. It welcomes all efforts to restore such service and calls upon the parties to cooperate fully with such efforts. The Council urges the parties fully to comply with all provisions in the ceasefire agreement once they come into effect.

The Council also welcomes the decision of the Governments of the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina, the Republic of Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) to attend proximity peace talks by the end of this month, to be followed by a peace conference. It reiterates that there can be no military solution to the conflict in the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina and strongly urges the parties to negotiate in good faith on the basis of the Agreed Basic Principles signed at Geneva on 8 September 1995, and the Further Agreed Principles of 26 September 1995.

The Council also welcomes the agreement of 3 October 1995 by the Government of the Republic of Croatia and the local Croatian Serb authorities in Eastern Slavonia to guiding basic principles for negotiations. It strongly urges both parties to negotiate in good faith towards a peaceful final settlement to the conflict consistent with the Council's resolutions.

Decision of 9 November 1995 (3591st meeting):
resolution 1019 (1995)

At its 3591st meeting, on 9 November 1995, the Council resumed its consideration of the situation in the former Yugoslavia. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representatives of Bosnia and Herzegovina and Croatia, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The Council also invited Mr. Vladislav Jovanovic, at his request, to take a seat at the side of the Council chamber.

The President (Oman) then drew the attention of the Council members to the text of a draft resolution submitted by Argentina, the Czech Republic, France, Germany, Italy, the Russian Federation, the United Kingdom and the United States.⁷²⁸ He also drew the attention of the Council members to a letter dated 31 October 1995 in which the President of the International Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of the Former Yugoslavia informed the President of the Council that an indictment against an individual named Dragan Nikolic had been issued on 4 November 1994, and that the Tribunal had requested that both the Government of Bosnia and Herzegovina and the Bosnian Serb administration issue a warrant for his arrest.⁷²⁹ The Government of Bosnia and Herzegovina had indicated that Mr. Nikolic was residing in territory outside their control, but the Bosnian Serb administration had not responded to the Tribunal's request. The letter noted that, under Article 29 of the statute of the Tribunal, States were obligated to cooperate with the Tribunal. It also recalled that, in resolution 771 (1992), the Council had decided, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, that all parties in the former Yugoslavia, and all military forces in Bosnia and Herzegovina, should comply with the resolution, failing which the Council would need to take further measures under the Charter. The letter further noted that, in order for the Tribunal to succeed in its mandate of prosecuting serious violations of international humanitarian law, all States in the region — including self-proclaimed entities de facto exercising governmental functions — must comply with their legal obligation to cooperate with the Tribunal.

Speaking before the vote, the representative of Germany recalled that his delegation had taken the initiative in October for another attempt to establish the fate and the whereabouts of the missing Bosnian men from Srebrenica, Zepa and the Banja Luka area. That initiative had led to the draft resolution before the Council. Noting that the draft resolution also addressed the human rights situation in Croatia, the speaker stated that, while his delegation was deeply concerned about the situation in Croatia, it was also aware of the different qualitative and quantitative dimensions of the violations of international humanitarian law and human rights committed by the Bosnian Serbs. He pointed out that the Croatian side had consistently granted access to human rights observers to the Krajina region, whereas the Bosnian Serbs had systematically blocked all access to the Bosnian Serb sites in question. That attitude had led to the formal request from the President of the Tribunal for the Security Council to consider further measures to achieve cooperation by the Bosnian Serbs with the Tribunal. Germany felt that there was an urgent need for the Council to react to the strong indications of war crimes and to prevent further human rights violations in the area. It welcomed the request in the draft resolution to the Secretary-General to submit a written report on recent violations of international humanitarian law in Srebrenica, Zepa and the wider Banja Luka area as such a report would provide a solid base of information upon which the Security Council could act.⁷³⁰

The representative of China stated that, as the main purpose of the draft resolution was to call for the early settlement of the questions regarding persons detained or reported missing, his delegation would vote in favour of it. He argued, however, that each United Nations body had its own responsibilities and functions and should act accordingly to fulfil its own mandate, as set forth in the Charter. The Security Council should not, in principle, deal with questions of human rights. Moreover, the Council should refrain from involving itself in the Tribunal's work, as the Tribunal had its own explicit provisions for the prosecution of persons responsible for serious violations of international humanitarian law. The Chinese delegation therefore

⁷²⁹ S/1995/910.

⁷³⁰ S/PV.3591, pp. 2-3.

had reservations with regard to the relevant portions of the draft resolution.⁷³¹

The representative of the United Kingdom stated that the draft resolution underlined the importance the Council attached to the highest respect for human rights and international humanitarian law in the former Yugoslavia, making it clear that there were no exceptions and that all parties must comply with their obligations. Against that background, however, it was right that the Council should address three recent and deeply disturbing events: the disappearance of large numbers of civilians following the fall of Srebrenica and Zepa to Bosnian Serb forces; the brutal campaign of “ethnic cleansing” in the Banja Luka region; and systematic violations of the rights of Croatian Serbs in the Krajinas. The speaker reminded the parties of their obligation to cooperate fully with the work of the Tribunal, calling on the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia to facilitate the establishment of an office of the Tribunal in that country without delay, and on the Bosnian Serbs to comply with the Tribunal’s orders and decisions.⁷³²

The representative of Botswana expressed the strong disquiet of his delegation at the reported incidents of human rights violations perpetrated by the Bosnian Serbs and insisted that they abide by the resolutions of the Council, and cooperate fully with the International Committee of the Red Cross and other international humanitarian organizations. Against that background Botswana would vote in favour of the draft resolution. The speaker noted, however, that while it was almost impossible to draw a line between the political and human rights aspects of the war in Bosnia, it was important that the Security Council guard against the possibility of infringing on the responsibility of the competent bodies of the United Nations, especially the International Tribunal. It was also important that the temptation to politicize human rights be avoided. Botswana believed that all human rights violations in Bosnia and Herzegovina and Croatia should be investigated and those found responsible should be brought to justice.⁷³³

The representative of the Russian Federation strongly supported the draft resolution’s condemnation of all violations of international humanitarian law and human rights in the territory of the former Yugoslavia, regardless of who committed them. The Russian Federation was seriously concerned by reports on violations of international humanitarian law in Srebrenica and Zepa, as well as by the fact that representatives of the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees and the International Committee of the Red Cross had still not been allowed access to the regions where those violations were thought to have occurred. The wording of the draft resolution in that respect was “tough but fair”, while setting out clearly the Council’s conviction that there must not be a selective approach to the protection of human rights in the former Yugoslavia. Before concluding, the speaker noted that the Russian Federation supported the demand to all States and parties in the former Yugoslavia to cooperate with the Tribunal, and confirmed his delegation’s position with regard to the inadmissibility of the use of the Tribunal’s activities to “demonize” any parties to the conflict. He argued that it was the task of the Tribunal to elucidate the truth and to punish appropriately those specific persons whose guilt of crimes against humanity had been established, regardless of their ethnic or religious affiliation.⁷³⁴

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and was adopted unanimously as resolution 1019 (1995), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling all its earlier resolutions on the situation in the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina, and reaffirming its resolutions 1004 (1995) of 12 July 1995 and 1010 (1995) of 10 August 1995 and the statements by its President of 7 September 1995 and 12 October 1995, and deeply concerned that, despite repeated calls that it should do so, the Bosnian Serb party has not complied with the demands contained therein,

Gravely concerned at reports, including by the representative of the Secretary-General, of grave violations of international humanitarian law and of human rights in and around Srebrenica and in the areas of Banja Luka and Sanski. Most, including reports of mass murder, unlawful detention and forced labour, rape, and deportation of civilians,

Recalling all its earlier relevant resolutions on the situation in the Republic of Croatia, and reaffirming its resolution 1009 (1995) of 10 August 1995 and the statements by its President of 7 September 1995, and 3 October 1995,

Deeply concerned at reports, including by the United Nations Confidence Restoration Operation in Croatia, which is known as UNCRO, and United Nations humanitarian agencies, of serious violations of international humanitarian law and of human rights in the former Sectors West, North, and South, in the Republic of Croatia, including burning of houses, looting of property, and killings of civilians,

Reiterating its strong support for the efforts of the International Committee of the Red Cross in seeking access to displaced persons and to persons detained or reported missing, and condemning in the strongest possible terms the failure of the Bosnian Serb party to comply with its commitments in respect of such access,

Commending the efforts of the United Nations Peace Forces and other United Nations personnel in the former Yugoslavia, in particular in the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina, despite extreme difficulties,

Taking note of the letter dated 31 October 1995 to the President of the Security Council from the President of the International Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of the former Yugoslavia since 1991, established pursuant to resolution 827 (1993) of 25 May 1993,

Expressing its strong support for the work of the International Tribunal,

1. Condemns in the strongest possible terms all violations of international humanitarian law and of human rights in the territory of the former Yugoslavia, and demands that all concerned comply fully with their obligations in this regard;

2. Reaffirms its demand that the Bosnian Serb party give representatives of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, the International Committee of the Red Cross and other international agencies immediate and unimpeded access to persons displaced and to persons detained or reported missing from Srebrenica, Zepa and the regions of Banja Luka and Sanski Most who are within the areas of the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina under the control of Bosnian Serb forces and that the Bosnian Serb party permit representatives of the International Committee of the Red Cross (a) to visit and register any persons detained against their will, whether civilians or members of the forces of the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina, and (b) to have access to any site it may deem important;

3. Also reaffirms its demand that the Bosnian Serb party respect fully the rights of all such persons, ensure their safety and release them immediately;

4. Reaffirms the obligation of all the parties to ensure the complete freedom of movement of personnel of the United Nations and other relevant international organizations throughout the territory of the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina at all times;

5. Demands that all detention camps throughout the territory of the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina be immediately closed;

6. Reaffirms its demand that the Government of the Republic of Croatia take urgent measures to put an end to violations of international humanitarian law and of human rights and investigate all reports of such violations so that those responsible in respect of such acts may be judged and punished;

7. Reiterates its demand that the Government of the Republic of Croatia respect fully the rights of the local Serb population, including their right to remain or return in safety, and reiterates also its call upon the Government of the Republic of Croatia to lift any time-limits placed on the return of refugees to Croatia to reclaim their property;

8. Demands that all States, in particular those in the region of the former Yugoslavia, and all parties to the conflict in the former Yugoslavia comply fully and in good faith with the obligations contained in paragraph 4 of resolution 827 (1993) to cooperate fully with the International Tribunal established pursuant to that resolution, including by providing access to individuals and sites the Tribunal deems important for its investigations and by complying with requests for assistance or orders issued by a Trial Chamber under article 29 of the statute of the Tribunal, and calls upon them to allow the establishment of offices of the Tribunal;

9. Demands that all parties, and in particular the Bosnian Serb party, refrain from any action intended to destroy, alter, conceal, or damage any evidence of violations of international humanitarian law and that they preserve such evidence;

10. Reaffirms its support for the actions of the United Nations Peace Forces and other United Nations personnel, including the great importance of their contribution in the humanitarian field, and demands that all parties fully ensure their safety and cooperate fully with them;

11. Requests the Secretary-General to submit to the Council as soon as possible a written report based on all information available to the United Nations concerning recent violations of international humanitarian law in the areas of Srebrenica, Zepa, Banja Luka and Sanski Most;

12. Also requests the Secretary-General to continue to inform the Council on a regular basis of measures taken by the Government of the Republic of Croatia to implement resolution 1009 (1995) and the present resolution;

13. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of the United States stressed that the Bosnian Serb side must allow access to the sites and individuals which the Tribunal deemed important for its investigations and that it must grant international agencies access to the refugees displaced from the regions. He also stated that the authorities in Belgrade should allow the Tribunal to establish an office in Belgrade. His Government also strongly believed that the Government of Croatia must take steps to ensure that the rights of all its citizens were respected, whether they were Croats or Serbs. The United States Government recognized that all violations of human rights were deplorable. It was also necessary, however, to recognize the differences in the circumstances and magnitude of crimes. The murder of large numbers of civilians by Bosnian Serb forces had not been the act of a few individuals acting alone. The systematic and apparently planned nature of the atrocities was evidence of an active and “astonishingly brutal” Bosnian Serb policy.⁷³⁵

Decisions of 22 November 1995 (3595th meeting): resolutions 1021 (1995) and 1022 (1995)

At its 3595th meeting, on 22 November 1995, the Council resumed its consideration of the item. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representatives of Bosnia and Herzegovina, Brazil, Canada, Colombia, Croatia, Egypt, the Islamic Republic of Iran, Japan, Malaysia, Morocco, Norway, Pakistan, the Republic of Korea, Slovenia, Spain, the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, Turkey and Ukraine, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The Council also invited Mr. Vladislav Jovanovic, at his request, to address it in the course of the subsequent discussion.

The President (Oman) then drew the attention of the Council members to the texts of two draft resolutions. The first draft resolution had been submitted by Argentina, France, Germany, Honduras, Indonesia, Italy, Oman, Rwanda, the United Kingdom and the United States,⁷³⁶ and the second draft resolution by Argentina, the Czech Republic, France, Germany, Honduras, Italy, the Russian Federation, Rwanda, the United Kingdom and the United States.⁷³⁷ The President then drew the attention of the members of the Council to a letter dated 20 November 1995 from the representative of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia addressed to the Secretary-General, transmitting a letter of the same date from the

Speaking before the vote, the representative of the United Kingdom welcomed the Peace Agreement on Bosnia and Herzegovina, which had been endorsed by the parties the previous day at Dayton, Ohio. The speaker argued that the existence of the Peace Agreement was “the clearest possible vindication” of the Council’s use of economic sanctions to bring about change. It was therefore right that the Council should reward Belgrade’s contribution to the successful outcome of the Dayton negotiations by granting substantial sanctions relief. He cautioned, however, that the Council was giving a conditional reward. One of the draft resolutions before the Council held out the prospect of the permanent removal of sanctions, once the Agreement had been implemented and free and fair elections had been held. It also provided that sanctions relief could be retracted if there was a failure to cooperate in the implementation of the Agreement. In addition, the draft resolution did not prejudice the complex issue of succession to the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, providing that frozen assets subject to claims by any of the successor States should remain frozen until such claims had been resolved. In that context, the British Government would when implementing the resolution interpret the reference to “claims” as meaning those raised in the current legal proceedings. The speaker further argued that the Council was also right to allow a phased lifting of the arms embargo, in the context of the implementation of the Peace Agreement and given the shared interest of all the States in the region in concluding regional arms controls arrangements. There could be no doubt that both the economic sanctions and the arms embargo had played an important part in containing the conflict and persuading the parties to negotiate in earnest. Finally, the draft resolutions referred only briefly to one very important aspect of the Council’s policy towards the situation in Bosnia, namely the work of the International Tribunal. It was as important as ever that all sides cooperate fully with the Tribunal, as the process of rebuilding a war-torn society required not just reconciliation, but also justice. No Government should suppose that it was at liberty to obstruct the Tribunal’s work.⁷³⁹

⁷³⁹ S/PV.3595, pp. 2-4.

The representative of Germany stated that the draft resolutions before the Council marked the first step in the implementation of the Peace Agreement. Noting that the arms embargo, which had not always been easy to reconcile with Article 51 of the Charter as it had simultaneously covered both attacker and defender, would be lifted in three phases, the speaker contended that both the arms embargo and the economic sanctions had proved to be important in the peace process. The German delegation shared the view that the sanctions regime had essentially been effective. The speaker expressed the hope that the “defreezing” of funds and assets that could be allocated to the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, would enable it to re-establish trade links and commerce with other countries as soon as the sanctions had been suspended. He noted, however, that the draft resolution requested that assets and funds subject to third-party claims should remain impounded or frozen. Germany urged the successor States to seek agreement on disputed assets, funds and liabilities as soon as possible, so that they could be released and therefore contribute to the positive development of the economy in the countries concerned and the region as a whole. Germany also stressed the importance of achieving substantial arms control agreements, as outlined in Annex 1B of the Dayton Agreement, to offset the danger that the lifting of the arms embargo might trigger a new regional arms race.⁷⁴⁰

The representative of Indonesia expressed the hope that the parties would make the Peace Agreement work and that that Agreement would lead to the achievement of the ultimate goal not only of preserving Bosnia and Herzegovina as a single State under international law, but also of preserving the people of Bosnia and Herzegovina as one nation. Recalling that his delegation had consistently called on the Council to pronounce itself unequivocally on the non-applicability of resolution 713 (1991) to Bosnia and Herzegovina, he contended that the arms embargo had had the unintended effect of freezing the advantage in weapons in favour of the Bosnian Serbs, thus denying Bosnia and Herzegovina the right to defend itself, as enshrined in the Charter. Long-term security could only be realized through confidence-building measures rather than by a massive arms build-up undertaken to compensate for perceived vulnerability and insecurity. The international community therefore needed to encourage mutual confidence and trust among the parties in the former Yugoslavia, and Indonesia hoped that the Agreement on Regional Stabilization, set out in Annex 1B of the Dayton Agreement, would contribute to peace and security in the region. The speaker acknowledged the limitations of sanctions as an instrument to maintain or restore international security. Nevertheless, Indonesia believed that the Council had succeeded in clearly defining the objectives of the sanctions. The sanctions had not been punitive measures designed to inflict hardship on the people of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, but rather had been intended to encourage Belgrade to modify its policy by playing a constructive role in the peace process. Indonesia welcomed the more positive role that had been played recently by the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and hence deemed it appropriate for the Council to suspend the sanctions. Nevertheless, it emphasized that the continuation of the suspension of sanctions was contingent upon the fulfilment by the Bosnian Serbs of their obligations under the Peace Agreement. With regard to the provisions contained in the draft resolution relating to funds and assets frozen or impounded by Security Council’s resolutions, his delegation cautioned that funds or assets should not be unfrozen prematurely, as hasty action might preempt a consensual agreement among the successor States as to the disposition of such funds and assets.⁷⁴¹

The representative of China stated that his delegation was of the view that any action by the Council should contribute to, rather than undermine, the consolidation of the negotiation results. China feared that lifting the arms embargo at that stage might have an adverse impact on peace and stability in the region. Furthermore, China had never favoured exerting pressure by means of sanctions in the former Yugoslavia. It supported the early lifting of the sanctions, believing that the international community should acknowledge the efforts made by the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia to promote the Bosnian peace process. The speaker contended that it was inappropriate to link the lifting of sanctions with the holding of elections in Bosnia, as it would set a bad precedent. His delegation therefore expressed serious reservations. He also argued that the status of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia in the United Nations should be reconsidered, once all parties had signed the Peace Agreement. The Chinese delegation would vote in favour of the two draft resolutions, however, based on its position of supporting the peaceful settlement of the question of the former Yugoslavia.⁷⁴²

The representative of Nigeria expressed the hope that none of the parties would view the lifting of the arms embargo as a license to relaunch any military campaign. Rather, Nigeria hoped that the termination of the embargo would play a positive and reassuring role, by ensuring that all States of the region had the means to defend their sovereignty and territorial integrity. The speaker further stated that the suspension of the sanctions against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia was consistent with his delegation's belief that sanctions should not be punitive, but should be designed to modify the behaviour of Governments. Nigeria hoped that such a flexible approach to sanctions would be applied to other sanctions regimes, as objective conditions on the ground changed.⁷⁴³

The representative of the Czech Republic noted that the draft resolution easing the sanctions against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia left open the possibility for reversing the suspension should the subjects of the sanctions fail to take the steps anticipated of them in Dayton. Noting that the draft resolution mentioned, in the preamble but not in the operative section of the draft, compliance with requests and orders of the International Tribunal as an essential aspect of implementing the Peace Agreement, he warned against interpreting that fact as diminishing its importance. Individual responsibility, established by and punished by the Tribunal, was necessary not only for justice to be done, but also to prevent the emergence in Bosnia and Herzegovina of a culture of impunity. The speaker further noted that one of the difficult issues among the south Slav States was the matter of succession. In that regard, the draft resolution rightly stressed the need for successors to the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia to reach agreements on the distribution of funds and assets. He also observed that his Government was uncertain about the wisdom of lifting the arms embargo at a time when the implementation force would be deployed in Bosnia and Herzegovina. The Czech Republic was concerned about the potential for suffering casualties as a result of a fresh inflow of weapons into Bosnia and Herzegovina.⁷⁴⁴

The representative of the Russian Federation noted that his delegation attached particular importance to the fact that, immediately after the initialling of the Dayton Agreement, the provision of the draft resolution relating to the indefinite suspension of the sanctions against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and the Bosnian Serbs should come into operation. The Russian Federation believed that the conclusion of the "economic blockade" against Yugoslavia was timely, as the humanitarian crisis there had worsened considerably over the preceding few months and required immediate steps. The speaker further observed that the draft resolution was a balanced document which envisaged various situations, including the possibility of the reintroduction of sanctions, should there be any gross violation of the commitments made under the Peace Agreement. He noted, in that regard, that the Security Council would decide whether such violations were taking place, based upon reports arising from joint consultations of senior leaders of the international military and civilian structures in Bosnia. Referring to the draft resolution on the lifting of the arms embargo, the speaker noted that his country had serious doubts, even though the draft had certain merits, including an even approach to all the parties and the fact that the Security Council would be exercising control over measures to prevent an arms race in the region. Nevertheless, neither the spirit nor the letter of the text of the draft was in harmony with the logic of the political process, which aimed to end military confrontation in the region. The Russian Federation was in favour not of an arms build-up in the region, but of restriction and reduction of arms. Furthermore, it would have preferred the draft to provide for a more clear-cut mechanism that would operate in the event that the peace process was derailed. Of particular importance in that connection would be the reports from the Secretary-General to the Council that the parties were in fact fulfilling their obligations on arms limitation. Nevertheless, in view of the fact that the first draft resolution was an integral part of the Dayton Agreement package, the Russian Federation would abstain in the voting.⁷⁴⁵

The first draft resolution was then put to the vote and was adopted by 14 votes to none, with 1 abstention (Russian Federation), as resolution 1021 (1995), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling all its previous relevant resolutions concerning the conflicts in the former Yugoslavia, in particular its resolutions 713 (1991) of 25 September 1991 and 727 (1992) of 8 January 1992,

Reaffirming its commitment to a negotiated political settlement of the conflicts in the former Yugoslavia, preserving the territorial integrity of all States there within their internationally recognized borders,

Welcoming the initialling of the General Framework Agreement for Peace in Bosnia and Herzegovina and the annexes thereto (collectively the "Peace Agreement") by the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina, the Republic of Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and the other parties thereto on 21 November 1995 at Dayton, Ohio, signifying agreement between the parties to sign formally the Peace Agreement,

Welcoming also the commitments of the parties set out in annex 1-B (Agreement on Regional Stabilization) of the Peace Agreement,

Determining that the situation in the region continues to constitute a threat to international peace and security,

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

1. Decides that the embargo on deliveries of weapons and military equipment imposed by resolution 713 (1991) shall be terminated as follows, beginning from the day the Secretary-General submits to the Council a report stating that the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina, the Republic of Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia have formally signed the Peace Agreement:

(a) During the first ninety days following the submission of such a report, all the provisions of the embargo shall remain in place;

(b) During the second ninety days following the submission of such a report, all provisions of the arms embargo shall be terminated, except that the delivery of heavy weapons (as defined in the Peace Agreement), ammunition therefore, mines, military aircraft and helicopters shall continue to be prohibited until the arms control agreement referred to in annex 1-B has taken effect;

(c) After the one hundred and eightieth day following the submission of such a report and after the submission of a report from the Secretary-General on the implementation of annex 1-B as agreed by the parties, all provisions of the arms embargo terminate unless the Council decides otherwise;

2. Requests the Secretary-General to prepare in a timely way and to submit to the Council the reports referred to in paragraph 1 above;

3. Maintains its commitment to progressive measures for regional stability and arms control and, if the situation requires, to consider further action;

4. Requests the Security Council Committee established pursuant to resolution 724 (1991) to review and to amend its guidelines in the light of the provisions of the present resolution;

5. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

The second draft resolution was then put to the vote and was adopted unanimously as resolution 1022 (1995), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling all its previous relevant resolutions concerning the conflicts in the former Yugoslavia,

Reaffirming its commitment to a negotiated political settlement of the conflicts in the former Yugoslavia, preserving the territorial integrity of all States there within their internationally recognized borders,

Commending the efforts of the international community, including those of the Contact Group, to assist the parties in reaching a settlement,

Praising the decision of the Governments of the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina, the Republic of Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia to attend and participate constructively in proximity talks in the United States of America, and acknowledging with appreciation the efforts made by these Governments to reach a lasting peace settlement in Bosnia and Herzegovina,

Welcoming the initialling of the General Framework Agreement for Peace in Bosnia and Herzegovina and the annexes thereto (collectively the "Peace Agreement") by the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina, the Republic of Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and the other parties thereto on 21 November 1995 at Dayton, Ohio, signifying agreement between the parties to sign formally the Peace Agreement,

Taking note of the Concluding Statement issued at the adjournment of the proximity talks, in which all parties undertook, inter alia, to assist in locating the two French pilots missing in Bosnia and Herzegovina and to ensure their immediate and safe return,

Stressing the need for all parties to comply fully with all provisions of the Peace Agreement,

Noting that compliance with the requests and orders of the International Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of the Former Yugoslavia since 1991 constitutes an essential aspect of implementing the Peace Agreement,

Recognizing the interests of all States in the implementation of the suspension and subsequent termination of measures imposed by the Council and, in particular, the interests of the successor States to the State formerly known as the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, with respect to the disposition of assets affected by the fact that that State has ceased to exist, and the desirability of accelerating the process now under way under the auspices of the International Conference on the Former Yugoslavia to reach a consensual agreement among the successor States as to the disposition of such assets,

Determining that the situation in the region continues to constitute a threat to international peace and security,

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

1. Decides that the measures imposed by or reaffirmed in resolutions 757 (1992) of 30 May 1992, 787 (1992) of 16 November 1992, 820 (1993) of 17 April 1993, 942 (1994) and 943 (1994) of 23 September 1994, 988 (1995) of 21 April 1995, 992 (1995) of 11 May 1995, 1003 (1995) of 5 July 1995 and 1015 (1995) of 15 September 1995 are suspended indefinitely with immediate effect subject to the provisions of paragraphs 2 to 5 below, and provided that, if the Secretary-General reports to the Council that the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia has failed formally to sign the Peace Agreement on the date announced by the Contact Group for such purpose and that the other parties thereto have expressed their readiness so to sign, the measures described above shall be automatically reimposed from the fifth day following the date of such report;

2. Decides also that the suspension referred to in paragraph 1 above shall not apply to the measures imposed on the Bosnian Serb party until the day after the commander of the international force to be deployed in accordance with the Peace Agreement, on the basis of a report transmitted through the appropriate political authorities, informs the Council through the Secretary-General that all Bosnian Serb forces have withdrawn behind the zones of separation established in the Peace Agreement, and urges all parties concerned to take all necessary measures to assist in locating the two French pilots mission in Bosnia and Herzegovina, and to ensure their immediate and safe return;

3. Decides further that if at any time, with regard to a matter within the scope of their respective mandates and after joint consultation if appropriate, either the High Representative described in the Peace Agreement, or the commander of the international force to be deployed in accordance with the Peace Agreement, on the basis of a report transmitted through the appropriate political authorities, informs the Council through the Secretary-General that the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia or the Bosnian Serb authorities are failing significantly to meet their obligations under the Peace Agreement, the suspension referred to in paragraph 1 above shall terminate on the fifth day following the Council's receipt of such a report, unless the Council decides otherwise taking into consideration the nature of the non-compliance;

4. Decides that it will terminate the measures described in paragraph 1 above on the tenth day following the occurrence of the first free and fair elections provided for in annex 3 of the Peace Agreement, provided that the Bosnian Serb forces have withdrawn from, and have continued to respect, the zones of separation as provided in the Peace Agreement;

5. Decides also that, so long as the measures referred to in paragraph 1 above remain suspended or are terminated by a subsequent Council decision in accordance with paragraph 4 above, all funds and assets previously frozen or impounded pursuant to resolutions 757 (1992) and 820 (1993) may be released by States in accordance with law, provided that any such funds and assets that are subject to any claims, liens, judgements or encumbrances, or which are the funds or assets of any person, partnership, corporation or other entity found or deemed insolvent under law or the accounting principles prevailing in such State, shall remain frozen or impounded until released in accordance with applicable law, and decides further that obligations of States related to freezing or impounding funds and assets contained in such resolutions shall be suspended pursuant to paragraph 1 above with respect to all funds and assets not currently frozen or impounded until the measures concerned are terminated by a subsequent Council decision;

6. Decides further that the suspension or termination of obligations pursuant to the present resolution is without prejudice to claims of successor States to the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia with respect to funds and assets, stresses the need for the successor States to reach agreement on the distribution of funds and assets and the allocation of liabilities of the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, encourages all States to make provision under their national law for addressing competing claims of States, as well as claims of private parties affecting funds and assets, and further encourages States to take appropriate measures to facilitate the expeditious collection of any funds and assets by the appropriate parties and the resolution of claims related thereto;

7. Decides that all States shall continue to take the necessary measures to ensure that there shall be no claim in connection with the performance of any contract or other transaction where such performance was affected by the measures imposed by the resolutions referred to in paragraph 1 above and related resolutions;

8. Requests the Security Council Committee established pursuant to resolution 724 (1991) to review and to amend its guidelines in the light of the provisions of this resolution;

9. Pays tribute to the neighbouring States, the mission of the International Conference on the Former Yugoslavia, the European Union/Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe Sanctions Coordinator, the Sanctions Assistance Missions Communications Centre and the Sanctions Assistance Missions, the Western European Union operation on the Danube and the North Atlantic Treaty Organization/Western European Union Sharp Guard operation in the Adriatic Sea for their significant contribution to the achievement of a negotiated peace;

10. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of the United States contended that it was logical to lift the embargo against Bosnia, as an embargo should not be maintained against a country whose only crime had been to preserve its sovereignty and defend its people. She noted, however, that the Council's plan was to discourage an arms race and to encourage a stable balance of military power. Thus the Framework Agreement placed restrictions on the military forces and heavy weapons of each party, established an arms control mechanism, and called for talks on measures to increase the confidence of all sides so that no side would seek to evade or take military advantage of the Agreement. Turning to resolution 1022 (1995), the speaker observed that the suspension of the economic sanctions was a conditional step, as the sanctions would be reimposed if Belgrade failed to sign the formal Peace Agreement, or if Belgrade or the Bosnian Serbs failed to meet their obligations under the Agreement. She underscored that the international community needed to be vigilant in monitoring compliance with the terms of the Agreement and in heeding the explicit language of the resolution, which noted that compliance with the requests and orders of the International Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia was an essential part of the Agreement's implementation. She also noted that the suspension of sanctions would not apply immediately to measures imposed on the Bosnian Serbs. Those measures would remain in effect until all Bosnian Serb military forces had withdrawn behind the zones of separation established in the Peace Agreement. The speaker further observed that the adoption of resolution 1022 (1995) reflected not a change in policy, but a change in circumstances. The Council had imposed economic sanctions for the explicit purpose of encouraging Serbia to choose the path of peace, and the sanctions appeared to have achieved their purpose. Indeed, the much-criticized sanctions tool had proved critical in bringing about the decision in Dayton, and the leverage it had brought the Council would continue to serve it well in the complicated task of implementation. The speaker noted, however, that the terms of resolution 1022 (1995) were calibrated to the realities of the situation in the former Yugoslavia. If the Government in Belgrade or the Pale Serbs were to fail to fulfil their obligations, then the sanctions would be reimposed. With that possibility in mind, the United States believed that the infrastructure established and a cadre of personnel assigned to monitor sanctions enforcement should remain in place until sanctions were fully and finally lifted. The United States also believed that there should be an orderly and equitable distribution of the real and financial property of the former Yugoslavia between the successor States. To that end, it did not intend to release any assets itself until all assets had been examined against possible claims by the successor States and against outstanding commercial or private claims.⁷⁴⁶

The representative of Bosnia and Herzegovina argued that the arms embargo should have been lifted much earlier. He underlined that the Council should make sure that the suspension of sanctions be understood as a reprieve and not as an exoneration. Failure to honour the peace or Bosnia's sovereignty and territorial integrity would result in the immediate reversal and re-imposition of sanctions. The speaker also warned that the sanctions could not be terminated until the Peace Agreement had been implemented fully and there was genuine compliance on the part of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia with human rights and democratic standards within its territory, as well as full compliance with the International Tribunal. He contended that without such compliance the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia could not be admitted as a Member of the United Nations or other international institutions.⁷⁴⁷

The representative of Croatia stated that his country supported the resolutions just adopted. The sanctions regime had been a just and necessary mechanism to make leaders accept responsibility for the "ills" they had brought upon the people in Croatia and Bosnia and Herzegovina. It was Croatia's understanding that paragraphs 5 and 6 of resolution 1022 (1995) would prevent the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia from transferring and using common funds until there was agreement among all successor States on the succession and distribution of such assets and approval by the Council of such an agreement. The speaker argued that the Council should act immediately to endorse the existing succession and distribution agreement proposed by the European Union and the Russian Federation. He also expressed the hope that resolution 1021 (1995), lifting the arms embargo, would achieve its goal of maintaining a balance of power in the region and that it would not become a new source of instability. In that regard, Croatia called for prudent use of the resolution, within a broader framework of collective security arrangements in Europe.⁷⁴⁸

Mr. Jovanovic stated that the sanctions against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia should cease immediately, and that the rights of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia in the United Nations should be restored quickly. He contended that the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia had demonstrated unequivocally its commitment to peace and to ending the civil war in Bosnia and Herzegovina by its active contribution to the negotiation of the Peace Agreement, and by its acceptance of all previous peace proposals in connection with the Bosnian crisis. The international community should treat all sides equally since equality was an essential element of the Peace Agreement and a basic precondition if the Agreement was to be fully implemented by all sides.⁷⁴⁹

Referring to resolution 1022 (1995), the representative of Slovenia argued that it was crucial that the suspension of sanctions did not apply to the frozen assets that were the common property of the States of the former Yugoslavia, and he noted that the issue was addressed in operative paragraphs 5 and 6 of the resolution. Slovenia requested that States consider all assets owned or controlled by the Government or governmental agencies of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia to be assets on which Slovenia had a legal and legitimate claim. It urged that such assets remain frozen until a final resolution regarding the distribution of those assets and liabilities had been reached by the successor States. The speaker warned that any unilateral disposal of the relevant funds would force Slovenia to take appropriate legal steps to have such transactions declared null and void. Slovenia welcomed resolution 1021 (1995), lifting the arms embargo and expected the immediate termination of the arms embargo as far as Slovenia was concerned.⁷⁵⁰

22. Complaint by Ukraine regarding the Decree of the Supreme Soviet of the Russian Federation concerning Sevastopol

Initial proceedings

Decision of 20 July 1993 (3256th meeting): statement by the President

By a letter dated 16 July 1993 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹ the representative of Ukraine transmitted to the Council the text of a letter dated 14 July 1993 from the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Ukraine, addressed to the President of the Council, requesting an urgent meeting of the Security Council, to consider the situation which had been created as a result of the adoption, on 9 July 1993, of a decree of the Supreme Soviet of the Russian Federation concerning the Ukrainian city of Sevastopol. The decree cited "Russian federal status for the city of Sevastopol within the administrative and territorial borders of the city district as of December 1991", and entrusted the Russian Government with the task of working out a State programme to ensure the status of Sevastopol.

In his letter, the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Ukraine stated that the Supreme Soviet's action was in flagrant disregard of universally recognized principles and norms of international law, in particular Article 2 (4) of the Charter. It also constituted an overt encroachment on the territorial inviolability of Ukraine, an interference in its internal and external affairs, and was incompatible with the aims and principles of the United Nations. The letter concluded by rejecting any territorial claims and appealed to the Security Council to use its full authority to have the "illegal decision" cancelled by the Parliament of the Russian Federation and to warn it against taking further decisions, which could jeopardize international peace and security.

In an earlier letter dated 13 July 1993 addressed to the President of the Security Council,² the representative of Ukraine had transmitted to the Council the text of a statement issued on 9 July 1993 by the President of Ukraine on the decision of the Supreme Soviet (Parliament) of the Russian Federation, by which the Ukrainian city of Sevastopol was proclaimed as belonging to the Russian Federation. The President of Ukraine contended that the decision represented an open interference in the internal affairs of Ukraine, and an infringement of its territorial integrity and the inviolability of its borders. Moreover, it violated the international obligations resulting from the membership of the Russian Federation in the United Nations, its participation in the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe (CSCE), and bilateral Ukrainian-Russian agreements, particularly the treaty on friendship, good-neighbourliness and cooperation signed at Kiev, on 19 November 1990, which had been ratified by the Russian Parliament and registered with the United Nations Secretariat.

By a letter dated 19 July 1993 addressed to the President of the Security Council,³ the representative of the Russian Federation transmitted the text of a statement, issued on 11 July by its Ministry of Foreign Affairs, in connection with the resolution of the Russian Supreme Council regarding the status of the city of Sevastopol. The statement contended that the resolution departed from the policy followed by the President and the Government of the Russian Federation in upholding Russian interests as regards matters relating to the Black Sea fleet and in maintaining bases for the navy of the Russian Federation in Ukraine, in the Crimea and in Sevastopol. It also emphasized that territorial problems could be settled only through political dialogue, taking into consideration the opinions and interests of the various population groups. Any settlement should also strictly observe all treaties and agreements entered into with the Ukrainian side, as well as the principles of CSCE and the United Nations.

At its 3256th meeting, on 20 July 1993, the Security Council included in its agenda an item entitled "Complaint by Ukraine regarding the Decree of the Supreme Soviet of the Russian Federation concerning Sevastopol" and the letters mentioned above. After the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representative of Ukraine, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (United Kingdom) then drew the attention of the members of the Council to two letters dated 13 and 19 July 1993,⁴ respectively, from the representatives of Ukraine and the Russian Federation, addressed to the President of the Security Council.

The representative of Ukraine contended that the "irresponsible" decision by the Russian Parliament could only be described as a "flagrant flouting" of the fundamental principles and norms of international law, in particular Article 2 (4) of the Charter of the United Nations. It constituted a clear encroachment on Ukraine's territorial inviolability, a revision of existing boundaries, interference in its internal affairs and was, in both spirit and letter, incompatible with the purposes and principles of the United Nations. The decision was also a flagrant violation of the international commitments flowing from the Russian Federation's membership in the United Nations, its participation in CSCE, and the Kiev Treaty. The decree was, in essence, a "time bomb" which should not be understated. He warned that, if the Russian authorities attempted to implement it, Ukraine might be forced to take "appropriate actions" to defend its sovereignty, territorial integrity and inviolability, which could have unforeseeable consequences and seriously threaten the maintenance of international peace and security. Invoking Article 34 of the Charter, the speaker called on the Council to use its full authority to condemn the decree and declare it invalid, and to warn against further steps that might threaten peace and international security. The lack of such a response, he said, could undermine confidence in the Council's authority. The Council had to carry out an act of preventive diplomacy and prevent an escalation of illegal actions.⁵

The representative of the Russian Federation emphasized that the decree adopted on 9 July 1993 by the Supreme Soviet concerning the status of Sevastopol diverged from the policy of the President and the Government of the Russian Federation. He contended that his country remained dedicated to the principle of the inviolability of the borders within the Commonwealth of Independent States and would strictly abide by its obligations under international law, the Charter and the principles of CSCE. Regarding its relations with Ukraine, the Russian Federation would continue to be guided by its bilateral treaties and agreements and in particular those concerning respect for each other's sovereignty and territorial integrity. He emphasized that the Russian Federation felt that any problem, no matter how complex, could be resolved only within the framework of political dialogue, taking into account the views and interests of the various sectors of the population and in strict compliance with treaties and agreements with the Ukrainian side and the principles of CSCE and the United Nations.⁶

The President stated that, after consultations among the members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁷

The Security Council has considered the letters dated 13 and 16 July 1993 from the Permanent Representative of Ukraine to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council, transmitting a statement by the President of Ukraine on the Decree adopted by the Supreme Soviet of the Russian Federation on 9 July 1993 concerning Sevastopol and a letter from the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Ukraine on the same matter.

The Council has also considered the letter dated 19 July 1993 from the Permanent Representative of the Russian Federation to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council, circulating a statement by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the Russian Federation concerning the aforementioned Decree.

The Council shares the deep concern, and welcomes the position, expressed by the President and the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Ukraine concerning the Decree of the Supreme Soviet of the Russian Federation. In this context, it also welcomes the position taken by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs on behalf of the Government of the Russian Federation.

The Council reaffirms in this connection its commitment to the territorial integrity of Ukraine, in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations. The Council recalls that in the Treaty between the Russian Federation and Ukraine, signed at Kiev on 19 November 1990, the High Contracting Parties committed themselves to respect each other's territorial integrity within their currently existing frontiers. The Decree of the Supreme Soviet of the Russian Federation is incompatible with this commitment as well as with the purposes and principles of the Charter, and without effect.

The Council welcomes the efforts of the Presidents and the Governments of the Russian Federation and Ukraine to settle any differences between them by peaceful means and urges that they take all steps to ensure the avoidance of tension.

The Council will remain seized of the matter.

23. Items relating to the situation between Iraq and Kuwait

A. The situation between Iraq and Kuwait

Decision of 8 January 1993 (3161st meeting): statement by the President

At its 3161st meeting, on 8 January 1993, the Security Council resumed its consideration of the item. After the adoption of the agenda, the President (Japan) stated that, following consultations among the members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:¹

The Security Council is deeply disturbed by the Government of Iraq's recent notes to the Office of the Special Commission in Baghdad and to the Headquarters of the United Nations Iraq Kuwait Observation Mission (UNIKOM) that it will not allow the United Nations to transport its personnel into Iraqi territory using its own aircraft.

The Council refers to its resolution 687 (1991) of 3 April 1991 requiring Iraq to permit the Special Commission and the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) to undertake immediate on site inspection of any locations designated by the Commission. The agreement on facilities, privileges and immunities between the Government of Iraq and the United Nations and resolutions 707 (1991) of 15 August 1991 and 715 (1991) of 11 October 1991 elaborated on Iraq's obligations by demanding, inter alia, that the Special Commission and the IAEA be allowed, as they determined necessary, to use their own aircraft throughout Iraq and any airfield in Iraq without interference or hindrance of any kind. Concerning UNIKOM, Iraq is obligated by resolution 687 (1991) and committed by an exchange of letters dated 15 April 1992 and 21 June 1992 to the unrestricted freedom of entry and exit without delay or hindrance of its personnel, property, supplies, equipment, spare parts and means of transport.

The implementation of the measures set out in the recent communications of the Iraqi Government would seriously impede the activities of the Special Commission, the IAEA and UNIKOM. Such restrictions constitute an unacceptable and material breach of the relevant provisions of resolution 687 (1991), which established the cease fire and provided the conditions essential to the restoration of peace and security in the region, as well as of other relevant resolutions and agreements.

The Council demands that the Government of Iraq abide by its obligations under all relevant Security Council resolutions and cooperate fully with the activities of the Special Commission, the IAEA and UNIKOM. In particular, it demands that the Government of Iraq not interfere with the currently envisaged United Nations flights. The Council warns the Government of Iraq, as it has done in this connection in the past, of the serious consequences which would ensue from failure to comply with its obligations.

By a letter dated 10 January 1993 addressed to the President of the Council,² the representative of Iraq transmitted a letter dated 9 January 1993 from the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Iraq, in which the latter specified that his Government's decision concerning the discontinuance of the use of foreign aircraft by the Special Commission was a temporary decision dictated by the United States threat to Iraq. His Government had already requested the Chairman of the Special Commission to use Iraqi aircraft for United Nations missions in Iraq and had discussed the matter with the Secretary-General. The Foreign Minister rejected as incorrect the allegations that Iraq had stopped or hampered the missions of the Special Commission in Iraq and noted that the dealings of the United Nations with a free and sovereign State ought to be marked by propriety.

Decision of 11 January 1993 (3162nd meeting): statement by the President

On 10 January 1993, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a special report on the United Nations Iraq-Kuwait Observation Mission (UNIKOM),³ in which he reported a number of serious developments concerning the Mission. On 10 January 1993, some 200 Iraqis had forced entry into ammunition bunkers in a former Iraqi naval base at Umm Qasr, on Kuwaiti territory, and had taken away most of their contents, including 4 HY-2G anti-ship missiles, in contravention of the Security Council's decision of 3 November 1992,⁴ in which it was stipulated that the contents of the bunkers should be destroyed by or under the supervision of UNIKOM. He also noted that up to 500

Iraqi personnel continued to dismantle prefabricated buildings also on Kuwaiti territory and to remove the parts, in violation of the procedure established by the Council for the removal of Iraqi property and assets and conveyed to the Secretary-General in a letter dated 8 January 1993.⁵ The Secretary-General further reported that, on 4 January 1993, Iraqi authorities had raised the question of the retrieval by them of the prefabricated buildings which Iraq had made available to UNIKOM in Camp Khor, although the government previously had agreed that the land and premises made available to UNIKOM should be made inviolate and subject to the exclusive control and authority of the United Nations. The Secretary-General noted that that was taking place at a time when the Council was already actively seized of other aspects of the situation, such as Iraq's ban against United Nations aircraft. While Iraq's cooperation was essential for UNIKOM to perform its tasks effectively, those developments cast doubt on Iraq's continued willingness to cooperate with UNIKOM and to abide by its commitments in that respect.

At its 3162nd meeting, on 11 January 1993, the Council included the special report of the Secretary-General⁶ in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President drew the attention of the members of the Council to the letter dated 10 January 1993 from the representative of Iraq.⁷ He then stated that, following consultations among the members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁸

The Security Council notes that there have been a number of recent actions by Iraq as part of its pattern of flouting relevant Council resolutions. One was the series of border incidents involving the United Nations Iraq Kuwait Observation Mission (UNIKOM), another was the incident concerning the Special Commission and UNIKOM flights.

The Council is deeply concerned at the incidents reported in the special report of the Secretary-General of 10 January 1993 on UNIKOM. It recalls the provisions of its resolution 687 (1991) of 3 April 1991 that established the demilitarized zone between Iraq and Kuwait and demanded that both countries respect the inviolability of the international boundary between them. It reaffirms that the boundary was at the very core of the conflict and that, in resolutions 687 (1991) and 773 (1992) of 26 August 1992, it guaranteed the inviolability of the boundary and undertook to take as appropriate all necessary measures to that end in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations.

The Council condemns the action taken by Iraq on 10 January 1993 to remove equipment by force from the Kuwaiti side of the demilitarized zone without prior consultation with UNIKOM, and through UNIKOM with the Kuwaiti authorities, as set out in the letter dated 8 January 1993 from the President of the Council to the Secretary-General. In particular, the Council draws attention to the removal by Iraq of four HY 2G anti ship missiles and other military equipment from the six bunkers in the former Iraqi naval base at Umm Qasr in Kuwaiti territory, in spite of the objections of UNIKOM and their efforts to prevent this. This action is a direct challenge to the authority of UNIKOM and amounts to clear-cut defiance by Iraq of the Council, which stipulated in the letter dated 3 November 1992 from its President to the Secretary-General that the military equipment in the six bunkers should be destroyed by or under the supervision of UNIKOM. The Council demands that the anti ship missiles and other military equipment removed by force from the six bunkers at Umm Qasr in Kuwaiti territory be returned immediately to the custody of UNIKOM for destruction, as previously decided.

The Council also condemns further Iraqi intrusions into the Kuwaiti side of the demilitarized zone on 11 January 1993. It demands that any future retrieval mission be in accordance with the terms set out in the letter dated 8 January 1993 from the President of the Council to the Secretary-General. On the UNIKOM facilities at Camp Khor, the Council stresses that the land and premises occupied by UNIKOM shall be inviolate and subject to the exclusive control and authority of the United Nations.

The Council invites the Secretary-General, as a first step, to explore on an urgent basis the possibilities for restoring UNIKOM to its full strength and to consider in an emergency such as this the need for rapid reinforcement as set out in paragraph 18 of his report of 12 June 1991, as well as any other suggestions that he might have to enhance the effectiveness of UNIKOM, and to report back to the Council.

The Council is also alarmed by Iraq's refusal to allow the United Nations to transport its Special Commission and UNIKOM personnel into Iraqi territory using its own aircraft. In this connection the Council reiterates the demand in its statement of 8 January 1993 that Iraq permit the Special Commission and UNIKOM to use their own aircraft to transport their personnel into Iraq. It rejects the arguments contained in the letter dated 9 January 1993 from the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Iraq to the President of the Security Council.

These latest developments concerning the activities of UNIKOM and the Special Commission constitute further material breaches of resolution 687 (1991), which established the ceasefire and provided the conditions essential for the restoration of peace and security in the region, as well as other relevant resolutions and agreements. The Council demands that Iraq cooperate fully with UNIKOM, the Special Commission and other United Nations agencies in carrying out their mandates, and again warns Iraq of the serious consequences that will flow from such continued defiance. The Council will remain actively seized of the matter.

Decision of 25 January 1993: statement by the President

Following consultations held on 25 January 1993, the President of the Security Council issued the following statement on behalf of the members of the Council:⁹

The members of the Security Council held informal consultations on 25 January 1993 pursuant to paragraph 21 of Council resolution 687 (1991).

After hearing all the opinions expressed in the course of the consultations, the President of the Council concluded that there was no agreement that the necessary conditions existed for a modification of the regimes established in paragraph 20 of resolution 687 (1991), as referred to in paragraph 21 of that resolution.

Decision of 5 February 1993 (3171st meeting): resolution 806 (1993)

On 18 January 1993, pursuant to the presidential statement of 11 January 1993, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a further special report on UNIKOM,¹⁰ in which he suggested ways to enhance the effectiveness of the Mission. He noted that UNIKOM, whose observers were unarmed, had neither the authority nor the means to enforce the Council's decisions and relied on the cooperation of the Governments of Iraq and Kuwait. With regard to the incidents which had taken place in the area of operation since the beginning of the month, the Secretary-General stated that UNIKOM had performed the function for which it was designed and for which its strength was sufficient. Should the Council, however, decide that the UNIKOM mandate did not permit an adequate response to such violations and that it should be able to prevent and redress them, then UNIKOM would require the capacity to take physical action to prevent or, if that failed, to redress small-scale violations in the demilitarized zone; violations of the boundary between Iraq and Kuwait, for example by civilian police; and problems that might arise from the presence of Iraqi installations and Iraqi citizens and their assets in the demilitarized zone on the Kuwaiti side of the newly demarcated boundary.¹¹ To be able to perform those tasks, UNIKOM would have to be provided with infantry in sufficient numbers to be present on the ground on a permanent basis, as well as with adequate airlift capacity and, as the case may be, with naval assets. UNIKOM could not be authorized to initiate enforcement action as it could not use its weapons, except in self-defence. The Secretary-General noted that both the Governments of Iraq and Kuwait would be expected to cooperate with the Mission. Without such cooperation, it would become impossible for the restructured Mission to carry out its functions, in which case the Council would need to consider alternative measures.

At its 3171st meeting, on 5 February 1993, the Council included the special report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Morocco), drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's consultations.¹²

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 806 (1993), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolution 687 (1991) of 3 April 1991, in particular paragraphs 2 to 5 thereof, and its resolutions 689 (1991) of 9 April 1991 and 773 (1992) of 26 August 1992, and its other resolutions on this matter,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 18 and 19 January 1993,

Noting with approval that work is being completed on the realignment of the demilitarized zone referred to in paragraph 5 of resolution 687 (1991) to correspond to the international boundary demarcated by the United Nations Iraq Kuwait Boundary Demarcation Commission,

Deeply concerned at recent actions by Iraq in violation of relevant Security Council resolutions, including the series of border incidents involving the United Nations Iraq Kuwait Observation Mission,

Recalling the statements made by the President on behalf of the Council on 8 and 11 January 1993,

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

Decision of 29 March 1993: statement by the President

Following consultations held on 23 and 29 March 1993, the President of the Council issued the following statement on behalf of the members of the Council:¹³

The members of the Security Council held informal consultations on 23 and 29 March 1993 pursuant to paragraphs 21 and 28 of Council resolution 687 (1991) and paragraph 6 of Council resolution 700 (1991).

After hearing all the opinions expressed in the course of the consultations, the President of the Council concluded that there was no agreement that the necessary conditions existed for a modification of the regimes established in paragraph 20 of resolution 687 (1991), as referred to in paragraph 21 of that resolution; in paragraphs 22 to 25 of resolution 687 (1991), as referred to in paragraph 28 of that resolution; and in paragraph 6 of resolution 700 (1991).

Decision of 13 April 1993: letter from the President to the Secretary-General

On 2 April 1993, pursuant to resolution 689 (1991), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on UNIKOM covering the period from 1 October 1992 to 31 March 1993.¹⁴ The Secretary-General observed that, while the UNIKOM area of operations had, for the most part, been calm during the past six months, the events of January 1993 had

demonstrated the value of the United Nations presence on the border between Iraq and Kuwait as well as the need that it continue. He therefore recommended to the Council that it maintain UNIKOM for a further six-month period.¹⁵ The Secretary-General added that it had not been possible so far to identify a Member State which was in a position to provide the mechanized infantry battalion to be deployed in the first phase of the strengthening of UNIKOM in accordance with resolution 806 (1993) of 5 February 1993.¹⁶

By a letter dated 13 April 1993,¹⁷ the President of the Council (Pakistan) informed the Secretary-General of the following:

In accordance with the provisions of Security Council resolution 689 (1991) of 3 April 1991, and in the light of your report, the members of the Council have reviewed the question of termination or continuation of the United Nations Iraq Kuwait Observation Mission (UNIKOM), as well as its modalities of operation.

I have the honour to inform you that the members of the Council concur with your recommendations, in particular that contained in paragraph 32 of your report.

With reference to paragraph 33 of your report, the members of the Council urge you to continue your efforts to identify a troop contributor for the mechanized infantry battalion to be deployed in the first phase of strengthening UNIKOM in accordance with resolution 806 (1993) of 5 February 1993.

Decision of 24 May 1993: statement by the President

Following consultations held on 24 May 1993, the President of the Council (Russian Federation) issued the following statement on behalf of the members of the Council:¹⁸

The members of the Security Council held informal consultations on 24 May 1993 pursuant to paragraph 21 of resolution 687 (1991).

After hearing all the opinions expressed in the course of the consultations, the President of the Council concluded that there was no agreement that the necessary conditions existed for a modification of the regimes established in paragraph 20 of resolution 687 (1991), as referred to in paragraph 21 of that resolution.

Decision of 27 May 1993 (3224th meeting):

By a letter dated 21 May 1993 addressed to the President of the Council,¹⁹ the Secretary-General transmitted the final report on the demarcation of the international boundary between the Republic of Iraq and the State of Kuwait by the United Nations Iraq-Kuwait Boundary Demarcation Commission, dated 20 May 1993, conveying the final results of the work of the Commission, together with the list of geographic coordinates demarcating the boundary and the map of the area.²⁰ The Secretary-General recalled that, in accordance with its mandate and terms of reference, the Commission was called to perform a technical and not a political task and had made every effort to strictly confine itself to that objective. Through the technical process of demarcation, the Commission was not reallocating territory between Iraq and Kuwait, but had performed the technical task necessary to demarcate the international boundary between the two countries set out in the “Agreed Minutes between the State of Kuwait and the Republic of Iraq regarding the restoration of friendly relations, recognition and related matters” signed at Baghdad on 4 October 1963.²¹ He noted that the geographic coordinates established by the Commission were final and pointed out that, in accordance with resolution 687 (1991), both Iraq and Kuwait should respect the international boundary’s inviolability, which would be guaranteed by the Council. Noting further that the demarcation of the international boundary had direct implications for the implementation of resolution 687 (1991) relating to the establishment of a demilitarized zone along that boundary, the Secretary-General reported that he was instructing UNIKOM to finalize the realignment of that zone with the entire international boundary demarcated by the Commission. He would also make the necessary arrangements for maintenance of the physical representation of the boundary, as recommended by the Commission.²² He believed that the work of the Commission would have a beneficial effect on the restoration of international peace and security in the area concerned.

At its 3224th meeting, on 27 May 1993, the Council included the letter from the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Russian Federation), drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council’s consultations.²³

Speaking in explanation of vote, the representative of Venezuela stated that the process of demarcation of the Iraq-Kuwait boundary was being carried out in the special circumstances following Iraq’s invasion of Kuwait, which posed a threat to international peace and security and which had been condemned by the international community. In that context, Venezuela understood that the draft resolution was not intended in any way to establish any precedent affecting the general principle set forth in Article 33 of the Charter, according to which it was the parties directly involved in a dispute who must negotiate and reach necessary agreement to overcome their differences.²⁴

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 833 (1993), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolution 687 (1991) of 3 April 1991, in particular paragraphs 2 to 4 thereof, and its resolutions 689 (1991) of 9 April 1991, 773 (1992) of 26 August 1992, and 806 (1993) of 5 February 1993,

Recalling the report of the Secretary-General of 2 May 1991 concerning the establishment of the United Nations Iraq Kuwait Boundary Demarcation Commission, the subsequent exchange of letters between the Secretary-General and the President of the Security Council dated 6 and 13 May 1991, and the acceptance of the report by Iraq and Kuwait,

Having considered the letter dated 21 May 1993 from the Secretary-General to the President of the Security Council transmitting the final report of the Commission,

Recalling in this connection that through the demarcation process the Commission was not reallocating territory between Kuwait and Iraq, but was simply carrying out the technical task necessary to demarcate for the first time the precise coordinates of the boundary set out in the “Agreed Minutes between the State of Kuwait and the Republic of Iraq regarding the restoration of friendly relations, recognition and related matters” signed by them on 4 October 1963, and that this task was carried out in the special circumstances following Iraq’s invasion of Kuwait and pursuant to resolution 687 (1991) and the report of the Secretary-General regarding implementation of paragraph 3 of that resolution,

Reminding Iraq of its obligations under resolution 687 (1991), in particular paragraph 2 thereof, and under other relevant resolutions of the Council, and of its acceptance of the Council resolutions adopted pursuant to Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations, which acceptance forms the basis for the ceasefire,

Noting with approval the Secretary-General's instruction to the United Nations Iraq-Kuwait Observation Mission to finalize the realignment of the demilitarized zone with the entire international boundary between Iraq and Kuwait demarcated by the Commission,

Welcoming the Secretary-General's decision to make the necessary arrangements for the maintenance of the physical representation of the boundary, as recommended by the Commission in section X.C of its report, until other technical arrangements are established between Iraq and Kuwait for this purpose,

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter,

1. Welcomes the letter dated 21 May 1993 from the Secretary-General to the President of the Council and the 20 May 1993 report of the United Nations Iraq-Kuwait Boundary Demarcation Commission transmitted therewith;

2. Welcomes also the successful conclusion of the work of the Commission;

3. Expresses its appreciation to the Commission for its work on the land part of the boundary as well as the Khawr 'Abd Allah or offshore section of the boundary, and welcomes its demarcation decisions;

4. Reaffirms that the decisions of the Commission regarding the demarcation of the boundary are final;

5. Demands that Iraq and Kuwait, in accordance with international law and relevant Security Council resolutions, respect the inviolability of the international boundary, as demarcated by the Commission, and the right to navigational access;

6. Underlines and reaffirms its decision to guarantee the inviolability of the above mentioned international boundary which has now been finally demarcated by the Commission and to take as appropriate all necessary measures to that end in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations, as provided for in paragraph 4 of resolution 687 (1991) and paragraph 4 of resolution 773 (1992);

7. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

After the vote, the representative of Brazil recalled that his country had consistently supported action taken by the United Nations with a view to ensuring full respect for the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Kuwait. Any attempt to challenge that sovereignty and integrity was unacceptable. It was the understanding of his Government that the decisions taken by the Council concerning the international boundary between Iraq and Kuwait in resolution 687 (1991) and subsequent resolutions could be justified only in the light of the exceptional and unique circumstances in which those decisions had been taken and did not establish a precedent for future action by the Council in other matters pertaining to the definition or demarcation of boundaries between Member States. Brazil's support for resolution 833 (1993) and other decisions in that matter was without prejudice to its reservations regarding the competence of the Council in questions related to the definition or demarcation of boundaries between Member States, which should be settled directly by the States concerned.²⁵

Similarly, the representative of China stated, with respect to the question of boundaries, that the countries concerned should, in accordance with international law and the Charter, seek a peaceful solution in agreements or treaties arrived at through negotiation and consultation. The existing demarcation of the boundary between Iraq and Kuwait was a special case arising from the specific historical circumstances involved and, as such, was not generally applicable. For that reason, the Council's invocation of Chapter VII of the Charter with respect to the demarcation of the disputed boundary between the two countries must not be viewed as setting a precedent.²⁶

Other speakers said that the delimitation of the boundary would have a beneficial impact on peace and security in the region.²⁷ Some noted that the Commission had carried out the technical task of demarcating a boundary and that it had not attributed any territory to one side or the other and had not encroached on the sovereignty of either State in any way.²⁸ established pursuant to paragraph 9 (b) (i) of resolution 687 (1991),³⁰ in which the latter presented an account of the Government of Iraq's attitude on certain aspects of implementation of its obligations under section C of that resolution and subsequent relevant resolutions and agreements. The Executive Chairman reported on the refusal of the Government of Iraq to accept installation by the Special Commission of monitoring cameras at rocket test sites and to move chemical weapons production equipment to a designated site for destruction. He noted that Iraq's obstruction in those two instances was a further failure by Iraq to fulfil its obligations under resolution 687 (1991) and other relevant decisions of the Council resolutions and agreements with the Special Commission. Furthermore, Iraq's insistence that the Special Commission limit itself to activities under resolution 687 (1991) was a direct challenge to the authority of the Security Council and the force of its resolutions adopted under Chapter VII of the Charter. The Executive Chairman concluded by stating that such developments fitted with a general pattern of statements and behaviour on the part of Iraq concerning those aspects of resolution 687 (1991) and subsequent resolutions which dealt with the long-term monitoring of Iraq's obligations not to reacquire the weapons capabilities prohibited under the terms of the ceasefire resolution. While not explicitly rejecting the monitoring provisions, Iraq's actions in seeking to renegotiate their terms had, in effect, prevented the initiation of implementation of the plans for ongoing monitoring and verification adopted under resolution 715 (1991) and amounted to a de facto rejection of the Council's resolutions and decisions in that regard.

At its 3242nd meeting, on 18 June 1993, the Council included the note by the Secretary-General in its agenda. After the adoption of the agenda, the President (Spain) stated that, following consultations among the members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:³¹

The Security Council is deeply concerned by the de facto refusal of the Government of Iraq to accept installation by the United Nations Special Commission of monitoring devices at rocket test sites and to transport chemical-weapons-related equipment to a designated site for destruction, as set out in a report from the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission to the President of the Security Council.

The Council refers to its resolution 687 (1991) of 3 April 1991 requiring Iraq to permit the Special Commission and the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) to undertake immediate on-site inspection of any locations designated by the Commission. The agreement on facilities, privileges and immunities between the Government of Iraq and the United Nations, and Council resolutions 707 (1991) of 15 August 1991 and 715 (1991) of 11 October 1991 clearly establish Iraq's obligation to accept the presence of monitoring equipment designated by the Special Commission and that it is for the Special Commission alone to determine which items must be destroyed under paragraph 9 of resolution 687 (1991).

Iraq must accept installation by the Special Commission of monitoring devices at the rocket test sites in question and transport the chemical-weapons-related equipment concerned to a designated site for destruction.

The Council reminds Iraq that in resolution 715 (1991) it approved plans for monitoring by the Special Commission and the IAEA which clearly require Iraq to accept the presence of such monitoring equipment at Iraqi sites, designated by the Special Commission, to ensure continuing compliance with its obligations under resolution 687 (1991).

Iraq's refusal to comply with decisions of the Special Commission, as set out in the report of the Executive Chairman, constitutes a material and unacceptable breach of the relevant provisions of resolution 687 (1991), which established the ceasefire and provided the conditions essential to the restoration of peace and security in the region, as well as violation of resolutions 707 (1991) and 715 (1991) and the plans for future ongoing monitoring and verification approved thereunder. In this context, the Council recalls its statements of 8 and 11 January 1993, and warns the Government of Iraq of the serious consequences of material breaches of resolution 687 (1991) and violations of its obligations under resolution 715 (1991) and the above-mentioned plans.

The Council reminds the Government of Iraq of its obligations under Security Council resolutions and its undertakings to provide for the safety of inspection personnel and equipment. The Council demands that the Government of Iraq immediately comply with its obligations under resolutions 687 (1991), 707 (1991) and 715 (1991) and cease its attempts to restrict the Commission's inspection rights and operational capabilities.

Decision of 28 June 1993 (3246th meeting):
statement by the President

By a letter dated 7 June 1993 addressed to the Secretary-General,³² the representative of Iraq transmitted a letter dated 6 June 1993 from the

Minister for Foreign Affairs of Iraq, in which the latter conveyed his Government's initial viewpoint on resolution 833 (1993). He drew attention to a number of shortcomings in the work of the United Nations Iraq-Kuwait Boundary Demarcation Commission, with regard to its decision on the demarcation of the offshore boundary in the Khawr Abdullah and the endorsement thereof by the Council in resolution 833 (1993). He contended that the improper intervention and influence on the work of the Commission in that matter had given rise to a number of legal questions, including that the Council had no right, pursuant to its functions and powers under the Charter, to impose a boundary delimitation on a Member State because, under international law, that sphere of competence was governed by the principle of agreement between the States concerned and because it had, with the precision legally required, no relation to questions of the maintenance of international peace and security that were the sphere of competence of the Council. He further contended that the Council had thus acted ultra vires. Regarding the overall outcome of the work of the Commission and resolution 833 (1993), the Minister reaffirmed his Government's position according to which the decisions adopted by the Commission represented, inter alia, a purely political decision imposed by the Powers dominating the Security Council and the United Nations, which would constitute a dangerous precedent contrary in substance and consequences to the duties and responsibilities entrusted to the Council by the Charter.³³

By a letter dated 16 June 1993, addressed to the Secretary-General,³⁴ the representative of Kuwait transmitted the text of a statement issued by the Kuwaiti Council of Ministers whereby Kuwait affirmed, inter alia, that it would honour and be bound by resolution 833 (1993) and all relevant Security Council resolutions.

At its 3246th meeting, on 28 June 1993, the Council resumed its consideration of the item. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President drew the attention of the members of the Council to the above-mentioned letters from the representatives of Iraq and Kuwait. He then stated that, following consultations among the members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:³⁵

The Security Council has noted with particular concern the letter dated 6 June 1993 from the Minister for Foreign Affairs of the Republic of Iraq to the Secretary-General concerning resolution 833 (1993) of 27 May 1993.

The Council recalls in this connection that the United Nations Iraq-Kuwait Boundary Demarcation Commission did not reallocate territory between Kuwait and Iraq, but simply carried out the technical task necessary to demarcate the precise coordinates for the first time, on the basis of the "Agreed Minutes between the State of Kuwait and the Republic of Iraq regarding the restoration of friendly relations, recognition and related matters" signed by them on 4 October 1963, which was registered with the United Nations. The Council reminds Iraq that the Boundary Demarcation Commission acted on the basis of resolution 687 (1991) of 3 April 1991 and the Secretary-General's report on implementing paragraph 3 of that resolution, both of which were formally accepted by Iraq. In its resolution 833 (1993), the Council reaffirmed that the decisions of the Commission were final and demanded that Iraq and Kuwait respect the inviolability of the international boundary as demarcated by the Commission and the right to navigational access.

The Council also reminds Iraq of its acceptance of resolution 687 (1991), which forms the basis for the ceasefire. The Council wishes to stress to Iraq the inviolability of the international boundary between Iraq and Kuwait, demarcated by the Commission and guaranteed by the Council pursuant to resolutions 687 (1991), 773 (1992) of 26 August 1992 and 833 (1993), and the serious consequences that would ensue from any breach thereof.

Decision of 21 July 1993: statement by the President

On 21 July 1993, after consultations with the members of the Council, the President made the following statement on behalf of the members of the Council:³⁶

The members of the Security Council held informal consultations on 21 July 1993 pursuant to paragraphs 21 and 28 of resolution 687 (1991) and paragraph 6 of resolution 700 (1991).

After hearing all the opinions expressed in the course of the consultations, the President of the Council concluded that there was no agreement that the necessary conditions existed for a modification of the regimes established in paragraph 20 of resolution 687 (1991), as referred to in paragraph 21 of that resolution; in paragraphs 22 to 25 of resolution 687 (1991), as referred to in paragraph 28 of that resolution; and in paragraph 6 of resolution 700 (1991).

Decision of 20 September 1993: statement by the President

On 20 September 1993, after consultations with the members of the Council, the President made the following statement on behalf of the members of the Council:³⁷

The members of the Security Council held informal consultations on 20 September 1993 pursuant to paragraph 21 of resolution 687 (1991).

After hearing all the opinions expressed in the course of the consultations, the President of the Council concluded that there was no agreement that the necessary conditions existed for a modification of the regimes established in paragraph 20 of resolution 687 (1991), as referred to in paragraph 21 of that resolution.

Decision of 11 October 1993: letter from the President to the Secretary-General

On 1 October 1993, pursuant to resolution 689 (1991), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on UNIKOM covering the period from 1 April to 30 September 1993.³⁸ The Secretary-General reported that the UNIKOM area of operations had been calm during the past six months and that the Mission had received the cooperation of both Iraqi and Kuwaiti authorities in discharging its responsibilities. However, the calm along the Iraq-Kuwait border should not obscure the fact that tensions persisted and peace had yet to be restored in the area. Noting that the presence of UNIKOM remained an important factor of stability along the border, he recommended that the Mission be maintained for a further six-month period.³⁹ He noted with appreciation the decision of the Government of Kuwait to defray the cost of two thirds of the UNIKOM budget.

By a letter dated 11 October 1993,⁴⁰ the President of the Council (Brazil) informed the Secretary-General of the following:

In accordance with the provisions of Security Council resolution 689 (1991) and in the light of your report, the members of the Council have reviewed the question of termination or continuation of the United Nations Iraq Kuwait Observation Mission, as well as its modalities of operation.

Decision of 18 November 1993: statement by the President

On 18 November 1993, after consultations among members of the Council, the President (Cape Verde) issued the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁴¹

The members of the Security Council held informal consultations on 18 November 1993 pursuant to paragraphs 21 and 28 of resolution 687 (1991) and paragraph 6 of resolution 700 (1991).

After hearing all the opinions expressed in the course of the consultations, the President of the Council concluded that there was no agreement that the necessary conditions existed for a modification of the regimes established in paragraph 20 of resolution 687 (1991), as referred to in paragraph 21 of that resolution; in paragraphs 22 to 25 of resolution 687 (1991), as referred to in paragraph 28 of that resolution; and in paragraph 6 of resolution 700 (1991).

Decision of 23 November 1993 (3319th meeting): statement by the President

At its 3319th meeting, on 23 November 1993, the Council resumed its consideration of the item. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President drew the Council's attention to two letters dated 16 November 1993 and another letter dated 22 November 1993 addressed to the President of the Council by the representative of Kuwait,⁴² and to a letter dated 15 November 1993 addressed to the President of the Council by the representative of Iraq,⁴³ in which the representatives of Iraq and Kuwait, respectively, alleged violations of the demilitarized zone along the Iraq-Kuwait boundary. The President then stated that, following consultations among the members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁴⁴

The Security Council is seriously concerned about recent violations of the Iraq-Kuwait boundary as reported by the United Nations Iraq-Kuwait Observation Mission (UNIKOM), most notably those on 16 and 20 November 1993, when large numbers of Iraqi nationals crossed the boundary illegally. The Council holds the Government of Iraq responsible for these breaches of paragraph 2 of resolution 687 (1991) of 3 April 1991.

The Council reminds Iraq of its obligations under resolution 687 (1991), the acceptance of which forms the basis of the ceasefire, and under other relevant resolutions of the Council, including most recently resolution 833 (1993) of 27 May 1993.

The Council demands that Iraq, in accordance with international law and relevant Council resolutions, respect the inviolability of the international boundary and take all necessary measures to prevent any violations of that boundary.

Decision of 3 December 1993: letter from the President to the representative of Iraq

By a letter dated 26 November 1993, addressed to the President of the Council,⁴⁵ the representative of Iraq transmitted a letter of the same date from the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Iraq, conveying Iraq's decision to accept its obligations under resolution 715 (1991) and to comply with the provisions of the plans for monitoring and verification as contained therein. With its acceptance of resolution 715 (1991) and following other positive developments, his Government hoped that the Council would discharge its obligations towards it under resolution 687 (1991) and trusted, above all, that paragraph 22 of that resolution would be implemented speedily and in full and without obstacles, restrictions or additional conditions.

By a letter dated 3 December 1993,⁴⁶ the President of the Council (China) informed the representative of Iraq of the following:

I have the honour to acknowledge receipt of your communication dated 26 November 1993.

You thereby sent me the letter addressed to me by the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Iraq, which conveys to me unconditional acknowledgement of Iraq's obligations under resolution 715 (1991) of 11 October 1991.

The members of the Council welcome this development. They will continue to follow closely Iraq's cooperation with the Special Commission and the International Atomic Energy Agency as they carry out the plans for ongoing monitoring and verification over a sustained period.

Decision of 18 January 1994: statement by the President

After consultations held on 18 January 1994, the President of the Council (Czech Republic) issued the following statement on behalf of the members of the Council:⁴⁷

The members of the Security Council held informal consultations on 18 January 1994 pursuant to paragraph 21 of resolution 687 (1991) of 3 April 1991.

After hearing all the opinions expressed in the course of the consultations, the President concluded that there was no agreement that the necessary conditions existed for a modification of the regime established in paragraph 20 of resolution 687 (1991), as referred to in paragraph 21 of that resolution.

Decision of 4 March 1994 (3343rd meeting):

By a letter dated 22 February 1994 addressed to the President of the Council,⁴⁸ the Secretary-General referred to his letter of 23 November 1992 to the President of the Council, in which he had brought to the Council's attention some issues arising from the demarcation of the Iraq-Kuwait boundary and, in particular, the matter of the Iraqi private citizens and their assets which had remained on Kuwaiti territory. The Secretary-General noted that encouraging developments had taken place for the resolution of that matter. Kuwait had agreed to pay into a trust fund an amount of compensation to those Iraqi nationals affected by the demarcation. The Secretary-General was confident that the Council would concur with his view that the compensation payments would fall within the definition of "payments exclusively for strictly ... humanitarian purposes" provided for in resolution 661 (1990) as an exception to the general prohibition against the remittal of funds to persons or bodies within Iraq.

At its 3343rd meeting, on 4 March 1994, the Council included the letter from the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (France) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.⁴⁹

⁴⁸ S/1994/240.

⁴⁹ S/1994/252.

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 899 (1994), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolution 833 (1993) of 27 May 1993,

Having considered the letter from the Secretary-General dated 22 February 1994 concerning the matter of the Iraqi private citizens and their assets which remained on Kuwaiti territory following the demarcation of the international boundary between Iraq and Kuwait, and welcoming the developments and arrangements described therein,

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

Decides that the compensation payments to be made pursuant to the arrangements described in the letter from the Secretary-General dated 22 February 1994 may be remitted to the private citizens concerned in Iraq, notwithstanding the provisions of resolution 661 (1990) of 2 August 1990.

Decision of 8 April 1994: letter from the President to the Secretary-General

On 4 April 1994, pursuant to resolution 689 (1991), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on UNIKOM covering the period from 1 October 1993 to 31 March 1994.⁵⁰ The Secretary-General reported that during the last six months, the UNIKOM area of operations had, for the most part, been calm. He noted that the resolution of the issue arising from the demarcation of the Iraq-Kuwait boundary concerning the Iraqi nationals and their assets remaining in Kuwaiti territory had significantly reduced tension in the area and that the reinforced capacity of UNIKOM, together with arrangements on the ground, were factors contributing to stability. He cautioned, however, that tension still persisted and that incidents in the area indicated the value of the United Nations presence, as well as the need for it to continue. The Secretary-General therefore recommended that the Council maintain UNIKOM for a further 12 months.

By a letter dated 8 April 1994,⁵¹ the President of the Council (New Zealand) informed the Secretary-General of the following:

In accordance with the provisions of Security Council resolution 689 (1991) of 9 April 1991 and in the light of your report of 4 April 1994, the members of the Security Council have reviewed the question of termination or continuation of the United Nations Iraq-Kuwait Observation Mission, as well as its modalities of operation.

I have the honour to inform you that the members of the Council concur with your recommendation that the Mission be maintained. In accordance with resolution 689 (1991), they have decided to review the question once again by 8 October 1994.

Decision of 11 May 1994: letter from the President to the Secretary-General

By a letter dated 28 April 1994 addressed to the President of the Council,⁵² the Secretary-General brought to the Council's attention his concern over the financial emergency which the United Nations Compensation Commission was facing after almost three years of intensive work to fulfil its mandate. The Secretary-General suggested, in that regard, that the Council might wish to consider exploring ways in which funds might be obtained for the Compensation Fund from such sources including Iraq's petroleum and petroleum products that were in some countries after the embargo and were impounded, sold or used months after the adoption of resolution 778 (1992). He further stated that he would be prepared, at the Council's request, to seek from oil companies information which would make it possible to identify funds due to Iraq for shipments of oil prior to the imposition of sanctions by the Council and arrange their transfer to the United Nations escrow account. He concluded by urging the Council to act swiftly to facilitate the transfer to the Compensation Fund of Iraqi oil-related frozen funds or proceeds from the sale of oil.

By a letter dated 11 May 1994,⁵³ the President of the Council (Nigeria) informed the Secretary-General of the following:

The members of the Council have considered your letter of 28 April 1994 relating to the financial emergency of the United Nations Compensation Commission. The members of the Council share the concerns expressed in your letter and agree with the proposal in your letter, while requesting you to keep the States concerned duly informed of your démarches.

Decision of 21 July 1994: letter from the President to the Secretary-General

By a letter dated 11 July 1994, addressed to the President of the Council,⁵⁴ the Secretary-General transmitted to the Council the text of a letter which he had sent to a number of Governments to seek all relevant information from petroleum companies and their subsidiaries under their respective jurisdiction regarding the whereabouts and amounts of Iraqi petroleum and petroleum products imported by those companies on or after June 1990, pursuant to the letter from the President of the Council dated 11 May 1994.⁵⁵

By a letter dated 21 July 1994,⁵⁶ the President of the Council (Pakistan) informed the Secretary-General of the following:

I have the honour to inform you that your letter dated 11 July 1994 concerning the United Nations Compensation Commission has been brought to the attention of the members of the Security Council.

Decision of 7 October 1994: letter from the President to the Secretary-General

On 29 September 1994, pursuant to resolution 689 (1991), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on UNIKOM covering the period from 1 April to 29 September 1994.⁵⁷ The Secretary-General reported that during the period under review the situation in the demilitarized zone had been very calm. UNIKOM had enjoyed the effective cooperation of the Iraqi and Kuwaiti authorities in carrying out its functions and had contributed to the calm which had prevailed along the Iraq-Kuwait border. He recommended that the Mission be maintained.

By a letter dated 7 October 1994,⁵⁸ the President of the Council (United Kingdom) informed the Secretary-General of the following:

In accordance with the provisions of Security Council resolution 689 (1991) of 9 April 1991 and in the light of your report of 29 September 1994, the members of the Security Council have reviewed the question of termination or continuation of the United Nations Iraq-Kuwait Observation Mission, as well as its modalities of operation.

I have the honour to inform you that the members of the Council concur with your recommendation that the Mission be maintained. In accordance with resolution 689 (1991), they have decided to review the question once again by 8 April 1995.

Decision of 8 October 1994 (3435th meeting):
statement by the President

By a letter dated 6 October 1994 addressed to the President of the Council,⁵⁹ the representative of Kuwait drew the Council's attention to a statement issued on the same day by the Revolution Command Council of Iraq.⁶⁰ According to the representative of Kuwait, the statement was a clear and unequivocal threat directed not only at Kuwait but also at the relations between Iraq and the United Nations with regard to Iraq's compliance with the Security Council resolutions concerning the Iraqi aggression against Kuwait. He warned that the Iraqi regime might be seeking to evade its legal responsibilities under resolution 687 (1991) and carry out another act of aggression against the sovereignty and independence of Kuwait. It therefore called upon the Council to exercise its authority and respond to such threat, to condemn it and ask Iraq to refrain from repeating it while fulfilling all its obligations under the relevant resolutions of the Council.

At its 3435th meeting, on 8 October 1994, the Council resumed its consideration of the item. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President drew the attention of the members of the Council to the letter from the representative of Kuwait. He then stated that, following consultations among the members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁶¹

The Security Council notes with grave concern the statement issued on 6 October 1994 by the Revolution Command Council of Iraq. It underlines the complete unacceptability of the implication therein that Iraq may withdraw cooperation from the United Nations Special Commission. The Council emphasizes the necessity of full implementation of all its relevant resolutions, including full cooperation by Iraq, without interference, with the Special Commission's vital mission.

The Council has also received with grave concern reports that substantial numbers of Iraqi troops, including units of the Iraqi Republican Guard, are being redeployed in the direction of the border with Kuwait.

The Council therefore requests the Secretary-General to ensure that the United Nations Iraq-Kuwait Observation Mission redoubles its vigilance and reports immediately any violation of the demilitarized zone established under resolution 687 (1991) of 3 April 1991 or any potentially hostile action.

The Council reaffirms its commitment to the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Kuwait. It underlines Iraq's full responsibility to accept all the obligations contained in all its relevant resolutions and to comply fully therewith.

Decision of 15 October 1994 (3438th meeting):

By a letter dated 10 October 1994 addressed to the President of the Council,⁶² the representative of Iraq transmitted the text of a statement to the press issued on the same day by the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Iraq, whereby, in view of a number of facts and at the request of a number of friends, and without questioning Iraq's sovereignty and freedom of action within its national territory, it had been decided to redeploy units of the Republican Guard in Basra to different positions in the rear in order to complete planned exercises. According to the statement, it was hoped that such diplomatic efforts would produce tangible results in the form of a lifting of the sanctions and the affirmation of Iraq's rights.

By a letter dated 14 October 1994 addressed to the President of the Council,⁶³ the representatives of Iraq and the Russian Federation transmitted the text of a joint communiqué on the outcome of the meeting held on 13 October 1994 between the President of Iraq and the Minister for Foreign Affairs of the Russian Federation. The joint communiqué provided, inter alia, that the Russian Federation had advocated the adoption of decisive measures to prevent an escalation of the tension and to resume the political and diplomatic efforts that would ultimately bring security and real stability to the region, the lifting of the sanctions against Iraq and the establishment of good-neighbourly relations between Iraq and Kuwait. Iraq had announced officially that, on 12 October 1994, it had completed the withdrawal of its troops to rearguard positions and had affirmed its readiness to resolve in a positive manner the issue of recognizing Kuwait's sovereignty and borders, as laid down in resolution 833 (1993). The joint communiqué further provided that, following Iraq's official recognition of Kuwait's sovereignty and borders, the Russian Federation would support the official start of the long-term monitoring provided for in resolution 715 (1991) and the simultaneous initiation of a limited test period, which should not exceed six months, to verify the effectiveness of the monitoring, after which the Council would take a decision concerning the implementation of paragraph 22 of resolution 687 (1991) in its entirety, without imposing further conditions. The Russian Federation affirmed that, subject to Iraq's implementation of the relevant resolutions, it would advocate the lifting of other sanctions.

By a letter dated 14 October 1994, addressed to the President of the Council,⁶⁴ the representative of Kuwait transmitted the text of a statement issued on the same day by the Kuwaiti Council of Ministers concerning the most recent Iraqi military threat to Kuwait and to the States of the region, as well as media reports concerning the joint communiqué issued, on 13 October 1994, by Iraq and the Russian Federation. The statement of the Council of Ministers provided, inter alia, that Kuwait, while appreciating the efforts of the Russian Federation, considered that the persistent mobilization of Iraqi military forces in their current positions continued to pose a serious threat to its security and sovereignty. It also considered that the talk of lifting the economic sanctions, imposed on the Iraqi regime contrived by the latter following the recent escalation, represented a reward for its action and encouragement to continue violating Security Council resolutions. Kuwait therefore requested the Council to take effective steps under Chapter VII of the Charter to guarantee its security, respect for its sovereignty and independence and the integrity of its international frontiers, and the security of the States of the region.

At its 3438th meeting, on 15 October 1994, the Council resumed its consideration of the item. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representative of Kuwait, at his request, to participate in the discussion, without the right to vote. The President drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution submitted by Argentina, France, Oman, Rwanda, the United Kingdom and the United States,⁶⁵ and read out revisions that had been made to the draft in its provisional form. He also drew their attention to the above-mentioned letters and to a letter dated 6 October 1994 addressed to the President of the Security Council by the representative of

Kuwait,⁶⁶ and a letter dated 14 October 1994 addressed to the Secretary-General by the representative of Saudi Arabia,⁶⁷ transmitting the final declaration issued by the Ministerial Council of the Gulf Cooperation Council, at a special session, held on 12 October 1994, at the request of Kuwait.

Speaking in explanation of vote, the representative of Nigeria stated that his Government took note of the announcement by the Government of Iraq that it was redeploying its forces to different positions. In that light he would support the draft resolution before the Council.⁶⁸

The representative of the Russian Federation recalled that his delegation had suggested that the Security Council not take any decisions on Iraq until the Minister for Foreign Affairs of the Russian Federation had completed his visit to the region and had come to New York to participate in the Council's meeting. He noted with regret that the Council had acted hastily when it had been possible to wait a few hours. At the same time, the sponsors of the draft resolution did take into account some of the Russian Federation's concerns and, in particular, the draft did not contain any provisions that could have served as justification for the use of force. It was important that the draft resolution reflect the results of the visit of the Minister for Foreign Affairs to the region and, in particular, that it welcome diplomatic efforts to find a political solution to the crisis, as well as Iraq's willingness to resolve positively the question of the recognition of the sovereignty and borders of Kuwait.⁶⁹

The draft resolution, as orally revised in its provisional form, was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 949 (1994), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling all its previous relevant resolutions, and reaffirming resolutions 678 (1990) of 29 November 1990, 686 (1991) of 2 March 1991, 687 (1991) of 3 April 1991, 689 (1991) of 9 April 1991 and 833 (1993) of 27 May 1993, and in particular paragraph 2 of resolution 678 (1990),

Recalling that Iraq's acceptance of resolution 687 (1991), adopted pursuant to Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations, forms the basis of the ceasefire, Noting past Iraqi threats and instances of actual use of force against its neighbours,

Recognizing that any hostile or provocative action directed against its neighbours by the Government of Iraq constitutes a threat to peace and security in the region,

Welcoming all diplomatic and other efforts to resolve the crisis,

Determined to prevent Iraq from resorting to threats and intimidation of its neighbours and the United Nations,

Underlining the fact that it will consider Iraq fully responsible for the serious consequences of any failure to fulfil the demands in the present resolution,

Noting that Iraq has affirmed its readiness to resolve in a positive manner the issue of recognizing Kuwait's sovereignty and its borders as endorsed by resolution 833 (1993), but underlining the fact that Iraq must unequivocally commit itself by full and formal constitutional procedures to respect Kuwait's sovereignty, territorial integrity and borders, as required by resolutions 687 (1991) and 833 (1993),

Reaffirming the commitment of all Member States to the sovereignty, territorial integrity and political independence of Kuwait and Iraq,

Reaffirming its presidential statement of 8 October 1994,

Taking note of the letter dated 6 October 1994 from the Permanent Representative of Kuwait to the United Nations, regarding the statement by the Revolution Command Council of Iraq of 6 October 1994,

Taking note also of the letter dated 10 October 1994 from the Permanent Representative of Iraq to the United Nations, announcing that the Government of Iraq had decided to withdraw the troops recently deployed in the direction of the border with Kuwait,

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

1. Condemns recent military deployments by Iraq in the direction of the border with Kuwait;
2. Demands that Iraq immediately complete the withdrawal of all military units recently deployed to southern Iraq to their original positions;
3. Demands that Iraq not again utilize its military or any other forces in a hostile or provocative manner to threaten either its neighbours or United Nations operations in Iraq;
4. Demands therefore that Iraq not redeploy to the south the units referred to in paragraph 2 above or take any other action to enhance its military capacity in southern Iraq;
5. Demands that Iraq cooperate fully with the United Nations Special Commission;
6. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

After the vote, the representative of the United States stated that the Iraqi deployment of troops to Kuwait's border was a blatant attempt by Iraq to bully the Security Council into negotiating on its terms the lifting of oil-export sanctions. Had Iraq complied with all resolutions and proven its "peaceful intentions", the easing of sanctions would have occurred in its own proper time. The speaker further stated that Iraq's statement, about its readiness to recognize Kuwaiti sovereignty and borders, was unconvincing. That statement needed to be followed by unambiguous action through a formal recognition of Kuwait's sovereignty, territorial integrity and borders in the same constitutional manner as it had purported to annex Kuwait. Iraq must withdraw all military units deployed to the south to their original positions, and must not take any actions to enhance its military capabilities in southern Iraq. It must never again use its military to threaten its neighbours or the United Nations operation and it must cooperate with the Special Commission. The speaker concluded by stating that, pursuant to the Council's resolutions and Article 51 of the Charter, her Government would take all appropriate action if Iraq failed to comply with the demands of resolution 949 (1994).⁷⁰

Similarly, the representative of France stated that Iraq must fully withdraw the forces it had deployed in recent days in the direction of the Kuwaiti border and abstain in the future from undertaking similar actions. He noted that the resolution required that Iraq refrain from adopting a hostile or provocative stance with regard to its neighbours and the United Nations. It would be the task of the Council to take up any action on the part of Iraq which could be regarded as non-compliance with resolution 949 (1994). He further noted that resolution 949 (1994) properly reminded Iraq of all its obligations. Those relating to the fate of prisoners and missing persons as well as those relating to the respect of human rights in Iraq remained of the greatest importance to the French authorities.⁷¹

According to the representative of New Zealand, Iraq's recent deployment of troops constituted a threat to regional peace and security. The situation was further compounded by the fact that Iraq defied its legal obligations under the Charter by virtue of the Council's resolutions. In the face of such an aggressive threat, it was necessary for the Council to again exercise its responsibilities under Chapter VII of the Charter. New Zealand rejected the argument that Iraq was free to deploy its forces, however it wished, within its borders. Given its past aggressive wars, its equivocation about the sovereignty of its neighbours and its recent threatening moves, the Council had a responsibility to take certain protective measures, including requiring Iraq not to redeploy its forces to the south again.⁷²

The representative of China recalled that his Government had all along stood for a peaceful settlement of the problems left over from the Gulf war, on the basis of the full implementation of the relevant resolutions of the Council, so as to achieve lasting peace and stability in the region, as early as possible. He reaffirmed that Kuwait's sovereignty and territorial integrity should be respected by the international community and urged Iraq to continue to cooperate with the United Nations in fully and practically implementing the Council's relevant resolutions in order to create favourable conditions for the early easing and lifting of sanctions. He stressed that his delegation's support for resolution 949 (1994) did not signify any change in its reservations regarding other relevant resolutions, including resolution 678 (1990).⁷³

The President, speaking in his capacity as the representative of the United Kingdom, stated that the presidential statement of 8 October 1994 and resolution 949 (1994) represented a classic example of preventive diplomacy. With regard to Iraq's attempt to justify its behaviour by speaking of its sovereign right to deploy its troops wherever it liked within its own territory, he quoted Article 2(4) of the Charter as requiring all Member States to refrain "from the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any state". Iraq's recent military deployment was a threat to Kuwait and represented a breach of the provisions of the Charter. He noted that the Council also required, inter alia, that Iraq remedy its human rights situation and cease any involvement in State-sponsored terrorism. He further deplored the suffering of the Iraqi people, for which the President of Iraq, not the United Nations, was responsible.⁷⁴

The representative of Kuwait stated that, given the intentions of the Iraqi regime, the deployment of large units of the Iraqi army could not be considered a purely internal affairs or one that fell within the purview of inviolable sovereignty, particularly in the light of the statement issued on 6 October 1994 by the Revolution Command Council of Iraq. That statement contained a clear threat to Kuwait and the States of the region and an attack against the role and authority of the Council and the United Nations Special Commission. Because of these developments, and because of the threat they posed to the security and stability of the region, the Ministers for Foreign Affairs of the States of the Gulf Cooperation Council had held a special meeting in Kuwait and had taken practical steps to deter the aggressor. He noted that the resolution the Council had just adopted supported and reinforced these steps. He noted that resolution 949 (1994) arose from the Council's legal and political responsibilities for the maintenance of security and stability in the Gulf region, safeguarding the inviolability of the international borders between Kuwait and Iraq, preventing Iraq from using force and ensuring its acceptance of and compliance with all resolutions relating to its aggression against Kuwait. Resolution 949 (1994) was thus a proper expression of preventive diplomacy and use of the authority and means available to the Council to prevent any threat to peace and security and the need to warn against the consequences of such actions. As such, it was a practical deterrent to any repetition by Iraq of such actions.⁷⁵

(3439th meeting)

At its 3439th meeting, on 17 October 1994, the Council resumed its consideration of the item. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representative of Kuwait to take a seat at the Council table, in accordance with the decision taken at its 3438th meeting. It also invited the representative of Iraq, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

The representative of the Russian Federation conveyed to the Council his impressions concerning the trip which he had just completed to the region of the Persian Gulf and his talks with the leaders of a number of States, including Iraq and Kuwait. The aim of that trip was to defuse the crisis as well as to address the question of progress towards a comprehensive settlement in the region. Referring to the joint communiqué issued by Iraq and the Russian Federation on 13 October 1994,⁷⁶ he contended that Iraq, for the first time, had officially recognized the need for a positive resolution of the question of recognizing the sovereignty and borders of Kuwait in accordance with resolution 833(1993), without any preconditions. The document included the first acknowledgement that Iraq must comply with the relevant resolutions of the Council. The control period for the long-term monitoring of Iraq, in accordance with resolution 715 (1991), could begin after Iraq's official recognition of the sovereignty and borders of Kuwait. On condition that Iraq cooperated honestly with the United Nations, it would then be possible for the Council to take a decision on lifting the oil embargo, as provided in paragraph 22 of resolution 687 (1991), and to consider lifting or mitigating the remaining sanctions as Iraq complied with all the appropriate resolutions of the Council.

The speaker also expressed some views concerning the improvement of the Council's activities in settling crisis situations and conflicts on a broader level and in particular the use of sanctions. He noted that a whole range of instrumentalities had been elaborated that had shown the Council's effectiveness in exerting an impact on the parties to conflicts. To a great extent, that experience had been innovative. Sanctions remained the most powerful non-military means, in accordance with the Charter, of exerting an impact on those who violated the international legal order. The Russian Federation believed that certain corrections must be made in the Council's practice regarding the application of sanctions, including greater attention to ensuring that, when sanctions were adopted, a procedure was, at the same time, determined for halting or lifting them; that thought should be given to the question of how sanctions might be aimed at political élites, thereby reducing to a minimum the suffering of broad strata of the population; and the laying down clear humanitarian limits in determining sanctions. In that regard, the side-effects of sanctions on third countries should be taken into account more carefully, and attention paid to ensuring that those countries' neighbours, who were often already suffering from the conflict situation, should not find themselves, in addition, the victims of the implementation of sanctions. He cited peacekeeping as another area where there were great extremes in terms of decision-making and where the practice of the Council could be improved as by avoiding the use of double standards in carrying out peacekeeping operations. He requested the members of the Council to give thought to further exchanges of opinions on the question of improving the work of the Council, including on those questions. In that connection, he welcomed a proposal by the President of Argentina to hold a meeting of the Council at the summit or ministerial or other level in January 1995.⁷⁷

The representative of France stated that his Government demanded that Iraq pledge solemnly, explicitly and unconditionally to respect the independence, sovereignty and territorial integrity of Kuwait as well as the inviolability of the international boundary. Furthermore, the Iraqi authorities would have to make these gestures by means of the same constitutional procedure it used to annex Kuwait. He stressed that more than a legal procedure, what was demanded of Iraq was a public political gesture showing that it was entering a new stage in its relations with Kuwait. Cooperation with the United Nations Special Commission was indispensable and a condition for the Council's continued consideration of the application of the sanctions it decreed. The lifting of the other sanctions imposed on Iraq — apart from the application in due course of paragraph 22 of resolution 687 (1991) — would depend on Iraq's fulfilment of all of its other obligations, including respect for the rights of minorities and, more generally, for human rights to which France attached the highest importance. France was very aware of the suffering endured by the Iraqi population and deplored the fact that the Government of Iraq had never wished to take advantage of the possibilities offered it under resolutions 706 (1991) and 712 (1991).⁷⁸

Similarly, the representative of the United States stated that Iraq must formally respect Kuwait's sovereignty, territorial integrity and borders in the same constitutional manner as it had purported to annex Kuwait. She welcomed statements by Council members according to which the only way forward to the lifting of sanctions was through full implementation of all relevant resolutions. The Council should categorically reject the approach promoted by some whereby Iraq should be rewarded for partial compliance with some of its obligations. Iraq must not be led to believe that it could choose in an à la carte fashion among those obligations. She added that the threshold question the Council faced was not how long must Iraq cooperate with United Nations requirements on weapons of mass destruction before the oil embargo was suspended but rather whether Iraq would continue to cooperate with United Nations inspectors after the embargo was suspended. Turning to the question of sanctions generally, she agreed with the statement by the representative of the Russian Federation on the need to rationalize the Council's approach to sanctions and noted that the members of the Council were becoming increasingly engaged in a discussion aimed at improving the sanctions tool. She agreed also that guidelines should be established to ensure consistency and rationality in decisions on peacekeeping. Although the best choice to address many regional conflicts was a United Nations peacekeeping force, sometimes that was not the possible or responsible choice. Sometimes the best that could be done was to endorse a coalition of States to act on behalf of the Council. While the Council kept flexibility and a pragmatic approach, it should make sure that there was no double standard and that all peacekeeping operations, as well as those coalition forces legitimized by Council resolutions, took place or were created according to recognized international peacekeeping rules and with international observers present.⁷⁹

According to the representative of Spain, sanctions regimes were not an end in themselves but rather an instrument designed to obtain certain objectives delimited by the Council. As those objectives were met, the Council could and must draw the appropriate conclusions, bearing in mind, first and foremost, the principles defended by the international community and the effects on the populations concerned and on neighbouring countries. In the case of Iraq, it was incumbent upon the Iraqi authorities to improve the situation of their people by taking concrete steps to convince the international community of its peaceful intentions. At the same time, the Council must be prepared to respond appropriately to an actual change in the attitude of the Iraqi authorities.⁸⁰

The President, speaking in his capacity as the representative of the United Kingdom, noted that much remained to be done before any general easing of the sanctions against Iraq could be contemplated. In that regard, there could be no question of package deals between the Council and Iraq. He noted that the plight of the Iraqi people was real and was no matter of indifference to the Council. In exchange for a declaration of acceptance by the representative of Iraq of the provisions of resolutions 706 (1991) and 712 (1991), he offered that the Council update these resolutions and give them renewed effect within the same week. With regard to the need in due course to lift the oil embargo, as referred to by some, he queried whether that was a desirable objective in its own right and raised a number of questions which needed to be answered before such a course of action could be pursued.⁸¹

The representative of Iraq called upon the Council to base its work on a number of documented fundamental facts concerning the situation under consideration. These included elements contained in the joint communiqué issued by Iraq and the Russian Federation on 13 October 1994, as well as the fact that the Iraqi forces that had recently been deployed and pulled back to their rear position were on Iraqi soil. Other facts were that Iraq had complied with section C of resolution 687 (1991) and had cooperated and continued to do so with the Special Commission and the International Atomic Energy Agency. The sound approach to that matter, consistent with the essence of the Council's resolutions, the Charter and the unanimous objective of the international community, namely the establishment of peace, security and stability in the region, was for the Council to keep these facts in sight and to work in accordance with the correct legal and equitable interpretation of its own resolutions so that it may uphold justice and safeguard the legitimate rights of all parties.⁸²

According to the representative of Kuwait, it had become clear that the Council regarded its relevant resolutions as one indivisible political and legal whole that allowed of no permissiveness. The Council could not accept the practice of the Iraqi regime of selecting certain paragraphs that were irrelevant to the essence of the problem. He listed a number of obligations which had not yet been discharged by Iraq, including official recognition of Kuwait's sovereignty, independence and territorial integrity; recognition of Kuwait's international borders as laid down in resolution 833 (1993); the destruction of all Iraq's weapons of mass destruction; refraining from terrorism or from supporting terrorism; and refraining from pursuing a policy of suppressing or violating human rights. He also explained Kuwait's view concerning the following points: Iraq was under an obligation to implement unconditionally all relevant Security Council resolutions; any expression of intent to implement could not be accepted as a substitute for actual implementation; any formula that could be interpreted as making Iraq's compliance with the Council's demands contingent upon its receiving a promise from the Council to implement counter-obligations must be rejected; Iraq should not be allowed to negotiate with the Council or with any other party or parties concerning resolutions adopted by the Council or the means of implementing them; the notion that blackmail and the threat or use of force could result in the securing of rights by those who engage in such activities or could be used as a reason for shrugging off responsibilities should be rejected; Iraq should not be allowed to implement its obligations selectively or to refer those remaining for bilateral solution or to frameworks outside the Council; there was a need to make sure, through agreed controls, of the good intentions of Iraq. In the light of recent events, it was imperative that the Council gauge the implementation by Iraq of its obligations and that it develop controls and procedures to prevent it from renegeing on its commitments regarding implementation. He noted further that the suffering of the Iraqi people was caused by the Iraqi regime itself because of its refusal to implement its obligations and its rejection of the authorization given to it by the Council under resolutions 706 (1991) and 712 (1991).⁸³

By a letter dated 13 November 1994 addressed to the Secretary-General,⁸⁴ the representative of Iraq transmitted a letter dated 12 November 1994 from the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Iraq transmitting copies of the Declaration of the Iraqi National Assembly of 10 November 1994 and Decree No. 200 of the Revolution Command Council of Iraq, which affirmed Iraq's recognition of the sovereignty, territorial integrity and political independence of Kuwait and of its international boundaries, as demarcated by the United Nations Iraq-Kuwait Boundary Demarcation Commission, in accordance with resolution 833 (1993). The Minister for Foreign Affairs stated that Iraq was proceeding from the premise that the Council would operate in accordance with the legal interpretation of its resolutions and consistent with the principles of justice and fairness, principally through the lifting of the comprehensive embargo and, as a first step, the implementation of paragraph 22 of resolution 687 (1991) in full and without further restrictions or conditions.

By a letter dated 13 November 1994,⁸⁵ addressed to the President of the Council, the representative of Kuwait transmitted a communiqué issued on 12 November 1994 by the Council of Ministers of Kuwait regarding the two decrees issued by the Iraqi National Assembly and the Revolution Command Council of 10 November 1994. The Council of Ministers affirmed that the aforementioned decrees were a step in the right direction towards Iraq's implementation of all relevant resolutions and a result of the insistence of the international community, as represented in the Security Council, on the necessity of such implementation and its affirmation of the political and legal unity enshrined in these resolutions. It further affirmed the importance and necessity of that step being followed by similar steps towards the implementation of all relevant resolutions, including resolution 949 (1994), in order that Iraq might prove its good intentions towards the State of Kuwait and neighbouring States.

At its 3459th meeting, on 16 November 1994, the Council resumed its consideration of the item. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (United States) drew the attention of the members of the Council to the above-mentioned letters from the representatives of Iraq and Kuwait. The President then stated that, following consultations among the members of the Council, she had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁸⁶

The Security Council has received the letter dated 12 November 1994 addressed to the President of the Security Council by the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Iraq transmitting copies of Revolution Command Council decision No. 200 of 10 November 1994, signed by its Chairman, Mr. Saddam Hussein, and the declaration of the Iraqi National Assembly, also of 10 November 1994, which confirm Iraq's irrevocable and unqualified recognition of the sovereignty, territorial integrity and political independence of the State of Kuwait, and of the international boundary between the Republic of Iraq and the State of Kuwait as demarcated by the United Nations Iraq-Kuwait Boundary Demarcation Commission, and confirm Iraq's respect for the inviolability of that boundary, in accordance with Council resolution 833 (1993) of 27 May 1993.

The Council welcomes this development and the President has written to the Permanent Representative of Iraq accordingly in a letter dated 16 November 1994. The Council notes that Iraq has taken this action in compliance with Council resolution 833 (1993) and has unequivocally committed itself by full and formal constitutional procedures to respect Kuwait's sovereignty, territorial integrity and borders, as required by Council resolutions 687 (1991) of 3 April 1991, 833 (1993) and 949 (1994) of 15 October 1994.

The Council considers this decision by Iraq to be a significant step in the direction towards implementation of the relevant Council resolutions. In the above-mentioned letter, the President informed the Government of Iraq that the members of the Council will follow closely Iraq's implementation of its decision; they will also continue to keep under review Iraq's actions to complete its compliance with all the relevant Council resolutions.

Decision of 10 April 1995: letter from the President to the Secretary-General

On 31 March 1995, pursuant to resolution 689 (1991), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on UNIKOM covering the period from 1 October 1994 to 31 March 1995.⁸⁷ The Secretary-General reported that, during the period under review, calm had generally prevailed along the border and in the demilitarized zone between Iraq and Kuwait. He noted that, in the performance of its functions, UNIKOM had enjoyed the effective cooperation of the Iraqi and Kuwaiti authorities. He recommended that the Mission be maintained.

By a letter dated 10 April 1995,⁸⁸ the President of the Council (Czech Republic) informed the Secretary-General of the following:

In accordance with the provisions of Security Council resolution 689 (1991) and in the light of your report, the members of the Security Council have reviewed the question of termination or continuation of the United Nations Iraq-Kuwait Observation Mission, as well as its modalities of operation.

I have the honour to inform you that the members of the Council concur with your recommendation that the Mission be maintained. In accordance with resolution 689 (1991) they have decided to review the question once again by 7 October 1995.

I should also like to convey to you the view of the members of the Council that they have taken note of the statement in your report that "in the performance of its functions, ... [the Mission] has enjoyed the effective cooperation of the Iraqi and Kuwaiti authorities". The members stressed that Iraq and Kuwait should comply with their commitments to do everything necessary to facilitate fully the freedom of movement of the Mission necessary for the performance of its tasks. The members of the Council also expressed the hope that Iraq and Kuwait will heed the regulations and suggestions of the Mission designed to reduce the risk of incidents along the border.

Decision of 14 April 1995 (3519th meeting):

At its 3519th meeting, on 14 April 1995, the Council resumed its consideration of the item. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representative of Japan, at his request, to participate in the discussion, without the right to vote. The President drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution submitted by Argentina, Oman, Rwanda, the United Kingdom and the United States.⁸⁹

Speaking before the vote, the representative of Italy stated that his delegation's support for the draft resolution was based on the conviction that while sanctions remained one of the most effective tools provided by the Charter to enforce compliance with international law, they should not lead to the extreme consequence of inflicting misery and starvation on an entire civilian population. Furthermore, experience had shown that sanctions, if applied indiscriminately, tended to rally people around the targeted Government rather than against it. That did not mean that sanctions should not be adopted or applied but that, to be effective, they should always be applied with caution and parsimony, and, above all, be precisely targeted in order to avoid serious negative side-effects. He noted also that the draft resolution resulted from a common effort to produce a balanced text which did not infringe on the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Iraq.⁹⁰

The representative of China stated that while Iraq should continue to cooperate in the implementation of the relevant resolutions, the Council should proceed to discuss, at an early date, the lifting of the oil embargo against Iraq, on the basis of humanitarian considerations and in the light of Iraq's implementation of the resolutions, so as to ease the humanitarian situation in Iraq. In addressing that matter, the sovereignty, territorial integrity and the political independence of all countries in the region, including Iraq, should be fully respected by the international community, as reaffirmed in the draft resolution before the Council. The main purpose of the draft resolution was the easing of the humanitarian situation in Iraq, which was merely a temporary measure. China's support for the draft resolution was based on the understanding that once the conditions were ripe, the Council should start to consider easing or removing the sanctions against Iraq. At the same time, China expressed reservations on the provisions in the draft resolution regarding the channel of shipment for Iraqi oil exports and the distribution of humanitarian funds to Iraq's three northern Governorates, both matters which were within the purview of Iraq's sovereignty and to which a proper solution should be found in consultation with Iraq to ensure the implementation of the mechanism embodied in the draft resolution.⁹¹

The representative of Honduras stated that in his delegation's view, a sanctions regime, when effectively applied, was an important tool for restoring international peace and security and was preferable to the use of force. However, when sanctions were imposed, one should consider specific measures to mitigate their impact on an innocent civilian population; the longer the sanctions took to achieve their intended effect, the more serious that impact became. While there must always be a humanitarian price to pay when sanctions were imposed, one should discuss measures to minimize the harm done to vulnerable sectors of the affected society. In that connection, he noted that the decision to impose economic sanctions was taken within the framework of the international legal order. Account should therefore be taken of humanitarian law, which included norms relating to humanitarian assistance applied to different categories of protected persons.⁹²

The representative of Indonesia expressed his delegation's regret that the draft resolution before the Council fell short of its expectations. While the principles of sovereignty and territorial integrity had been incorporated into the draft resolution, he noted that its content was not consistent with those principles. In that regard, he drew attention to paragraph 6 which stipulated that "the larger share of the petroleum and petroleum products" should be shipped via the Kirkuk-Yumurtalik pipeline, stating that Iraq's sovereignty and integrity must be respected and that it should be able to decide on the use of its pipelines for transportation and production purposes. Furthermore, the application of Chapter VII of the Charter should be specifically addressed to peace and security in the region, and should not be applied so as to interfere in the internal affairs of Iraq. His delegation also expressed reservations regarding paragraph 8 (b), which described Iraq's obligation to complement the distribution of humanitarian relief and to provide an amount exceeding 10 per cent of its oil production revenue. The speaker pointed out that it would be more appropriate not to mention a specific amount to be allocated for the three northern Governorates within Iraq. That provision constituted an infringement on the principle of non-interference in the internal affairs of sovereign States, as it would provide encouragement to separatist movements in the northern part of Iraq. In his delegation's view, the humanitarian situation in Iraq should be dealt with in a comprehensive manner and humanitarian considerations should prevail. Having stated these reservations, Indonesia would support the draft resolution.⁹³

According to the representative of Nigeria, sanctions were not meant to be punitive of whole populations, but to modify the behaviour of the leadership of a country or of a party whose actions threatened international peace and security. An important aspect of the draft resolution was the need to respect explicitly the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Iraq. Having insisted that Iraq must recognize the sovereignty and territorial integrity of its neighbours, the Council should not promote policies or take actions that could be construed as undermining the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Iraq. Care must also be taken that the draft resolution did not in any way prejudice or detract from the provisions of earlier resolutions. He noted further that, unlike resolutions 706 (1991) and 712 (1991), the present draft resolution was implementable. With reference to paragraph 6 of the draft text, his delegation would have wished further concessions, to the effect that no reference would be made to the proportion of the oil to be shipped through any particular pipeline. However, his delegation was fully aware that the situation under consideration was not a normal one: Iraq was in a unique position; it was under sanctions and therefore could not be given a veto over the Council's decisions. While the draft resolution was a humanitarian one, it was not unrelated to the larger issues concerning the situation between Iraq and Kuwait. Hence the need to recognize the basic principles of the Charter regarding the sovereignty, independence and territorial integrity of all States in the region as non-negotiable, and to reject unequivocally the use or threat of use of force to settle disputes between States.⁹⁴

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 986 (1995), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its previous relevant resolutions,

Concerned by the serious nutritional and health situation of the Iraqi population, and by the risk of a further deterioration in this situation,

Convinced of the need to provide, as a temporary measure, for the humanitarian needs of the Iraqi people until the fulfilment by Iraq of the relevant Security Council resolutions, notably resolution 687 (1991) of 3 April 1991, allows the Council to take further action with regard to the prohibitions referred to in resolution 661 (1990) of 6 August 1990, in accordance with the provisions of those resolutions,

Convinced also of the need for equitable distribution of humanitarian relief to all segments of the Iraqi population throughout the country,

Reaffirming the commitment of all Member States to the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Iraq,

10. Decides that, since the costs of the exports and activities authorized under paragraph 9 above are precluded by paragraph 4 of resolution 661 (1990) and by paragraph 11 of resolution 778 (1992) from being met from funds frozen in accordance with those provisions, the cost of such exports and activities may, until funds begin to be paid into the escrow account established for the purposes of the present resolution, and following approval in each case by the Committee established pursuant to resolution 661 (1990), exceptionally be financed by letters of credit drawn against future oil sales the proceeds of which are to be deposited in the escrow account;

11. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the Council ninety days after the date of entry into force of paragraph 1 above, and again prior to the end of the initial one hundred and eighty-day period, on the basis of observation by United Nations personnel in Iraq and on the basis of consultations with the Government of Iraq, on whether Iraq has ensured the equitable distribution of medicine, health supplies, foodstuffs, and materials and supplies for essential civilian needs, financed in accordance with paragraph 8 (a) above, including in his reports any observations he may have on the adequacy of the revenues to meet Iraq's humanitarian needs and on Iraq's capacity to export sufficient quantities of petroleum and petroleum products to produce the sum referred to in paragraph 1 above;

12. Requests the Committee established pursuant to resolution 661 (1990), in close coordination with the Secretary-General, to develop expedited procedures as necessary to implement the arrangements in paragraphs 1, 2, 6, 8, 9 and 10 of the present resolution and to report to the Council ninety days after the date of entry into force of paragraph 1 above and again prior to the end of the initial one hundred and eighty-day period on the implementation of those arrangements;

13. Requests the Secretary-General to take the actions necessary to ensure the effective implementation of the present resolution, authorizes him to enter into any necessary arrangements or agreements, and requests him to report to the Council when he has done so;

14. Decides that petroleum and petroleum products subject to the present resolution shall while under Iraqi title be immune from legal proceedings and not be subject to any form of attachment, garnishment or execution, and that all States shall take any steps that may be necessary under their respective domestic legal systems to assure this protection and to ensure that the proceeds of the sale are not diverted from the purposes laid down in the present resolution;

15. Affirms that the escrow account established for the purposes of the present resolution enjoys the privileges and immunities of the United Nations;

16. Affirms that all persons appointed by the Secretary-General for the purpose of implementing the present resolution enjoy privileges and immunities as experts on mission for the United Nations in accordance with the Convention on the Privileges and Immunities of the United Nations, and requires the Government of Iraq to allow them full freedom of movement and all necessary facilities for the discharge of their duties in the implementation of the present resolution;

17. Affirms that nothing in the present resolution affects Iraq's duty scrupulously to adhere to all its obligations concerning servicing and repayment of its foreign debt, in accordance with the appropriate international mechanisms;

18. Also affirms that nothing in the present resolution should be construed as infringing the sovereignty or territorial integrity of Iraq;

19. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of Argentina stated that resolution 986 (1995), which constituted an exception to the sanctions regime imposed on Iraq, had a humanitarian objective: it was designed to alleviate the humanitarian situation of all the Iraqi people. He recalled, in that regard, that his delegation had proposed the elaboration of a temporary, simple and flexible regime to replace the regime established under resolutions 706 (1991) and 712 (1991), which had the same purpose but which had never been implemented by the Government of Iraq.⁹⁵

The representative of the United States stated that the drafting of resolution 986 (1995) had been guided by the following principles. Firstly, the purpose of the resolution was to address humanitarian needs, not to meet political or other extraneous objectives. Secondly, the resolution was not an easing or lifting of sanctions, but an exception to the sanctions regime for a specified purpose. Thirdly, the resolution was to be greatly simplified, building on both the positive and negative lessons from resolutions 706 (1991) and 712 (1991) and other experiences. Lastly, full account had to be taken of the fact that Iraq had not proven trustworthy in implementing previous resolutions. She noted further that resolution 986 (1995) did not prejudice in any way any subsequent actions the Council might take with regard to Iraq's attitude vis-à-vis all the Council's resolutions.⁹⁶

Similarly, the representative of the United Kingdom stated that the aim of the sponsors of resolution 986 (1995) was purely humanitarian. Iraq would remain subject to a regime of sanctions imposed under Chapter VII of the Charter until it complied fully with all the Council's relevant resolutions. That was why the sponsors of the resolution had provided for independent inspections agents to ensure that Iraq did not export more oil than it is entitled to under the provisions of that resolution and did not under-price it. They had insisted that all the proceeds of the oil sales should be deposited in an escrow account. The Secretary-General had also been asked to ensure that there was equitable distribution of the humanitarian assistance to all the Iraqi people. The Council had been compelled in that resolution to allocate a certain amount to be spent in the three northern Governorates of Iraq to ensure that all Iraqis, and not some of them, benefited from the sale of the oil provided for in that resolution. He noted also that in case there were shortcomings in the resolution, a review of all aspects of the scheme had been provided three months after it started.⁹⁷

⁹⁷ Ibid., pp. 11-12.

The representative of France stated that resolution 986 (1995) responded to a serious humanitarian situation, it respected Iraq's sovereignty and territorial integrity, and it did not prejudice decisions the Council would take towards reducing or lifting the sanctions once the necessary conditions were met. France believed that sanctions were not a punishment but, rather, were designed to induce a State to behave in a certain way. The effects of sanctions on the peoples must therefore be attenuated, as much as possible, with regard to the resolution. He noted, in particular, that the Council had chosen to revise the general conditions for the implementation of resolution 986 (1995) three months after the start of its entry into force, on the basis of a report from the Secretary-General. He further stressed that the resolution did not affect the implementation, when the time came, of paragraph 22 of resolution 687 (1991), or of the other texts relating to the reduction or lifting of the sanctions. The regime established under resolution 986 (1995) was valid solely within the framework of the arrangements of that resolution.⁹⁸

The representative of the Russian Federation stated that his country was extremely concerned over the acute humanitarian situation in Iraq, which had reached the critical mark because of the effects of sanctions, and believed that those sanctions must be eased in response to the constructive steps already taken by Iraq. He further stated that it was important that resolution 986 (1995) affirmed the obligation of all States to respect the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Iraq and provided for the Government of Iraq to participate in agreeing specific ways of implementing that act of humanitarian relief. The resolution clearly stated that its measures were temporary and did not substitute for any future agreement to lift the oil embargo, pursuant to paragraph 22 of resolution 687 (1991). With specific reference to paragraph 6 of the resolution, which touched on issues in the bilateral relations between Iraq and Turkey, he noted that such issues should be resolved within that framework.⁹⁹

The President, speaking in his capacity as the representative of the Czech Republic, noted that the Council, by adopting resolution 986 (1995), was not prejudging further developments that, in the future, might lead to the modification of the sanctions regime. In particular, the resolution did not preclude the implementation of paragraph 22 of resolution 687 (1991) and reaffirmed the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Iraq. He further noted that doubts had sometimes been cast on the entire philosophy of sanctions, precisely because many observers felt that their burden fell unjustly and preponderantly on weaker strata of the targeted country's population. Resolution 986 (1995) might show a way of refining the generally blunt instrument of sanctions for other situations around the world.¹⁰⁰

⁹⁹ Ibid., p. 14.

Decision of 23 June 1995: letter from the President to the Secretary-General

By a letter dated 1 June 1995 addressed to the President of the Council,¹⁰¹ the Secretary-General reported that he had been informed, on 15 May 1995, by the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Iraq that his Government would not implement resolution 986 (1995) because it objected, inter alia, to the proportion of petroleum to be exported via the Kirkuk-Yumurtalik pipeline and to the modalities for distribution of humanitarian relief in three northern governorates. After conducting a thorough review of the steps required to implement the resolution, the Secretary-General had concluded that cooperation from the Government of Iraq was an essential prerequisite. He believed it appropriate, therefore, to postpone preparation of the report required of him pursuant to resolution 986 (1995) until further progress had been made in discussions on the subject with Iraq.

By a letter dated 23 June 1995,¹⁰² the President of the Council (Germany) informed the Secretary-General of the following:

The members of the Security Council are grateful for your letter of 1 June 1995 about the implementation of resolution 986 (1995).

The members of the Council accept your conclusions, including that cooperation from the Government of Iraq is an essential prerequisite for the implementation of the resolution and, in the absence of such cooperation, they endorse your decision to postpone preparation of the report requested in paragraph 13 of the resolution.

The members of the Council hope that you will take the opportunity of your contacts with the Government of Iraq to obtain its agreement to the implementation of the resolution, which represents a temporary measure to provide for the humanitarian needs of the Iraqi people.

Decision of 6 October 1995: letter from the President to the Secretary-General

On 2 October 1995, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on UNIKOM covering the period from 1 April to 30 September 1995.¹⁰³ The Secretary-General reported that during the period under review, the Iraq-Kuwait border and the demilitarized zone had been generally calm. He noted that in carrying out its tasks UNIKOM had enjoyed the effective cooperation of the Iraqi and Kuwaiti authorities. He recommended that the Mission be maintained.

By a letter dated 6 October 1995,¹⁰⁴ the President of the Council (Nigeria) informed the Secretary-General of the following:

In accordance with the provisions of Security Council resolution 689 (1991) and in the light of your report of 2 October 1995, the members of the Council have reviewed the question of termination or continuation of the United Nations Iraq-Kuwait Observation Mission, as well as its modalities of operation.

I have the honour to inform you that the members of the Council concur with your recommendation that the Mission be maintained. In accordance with resolution 689 (1991) they have decided to review the question once again by 6 April 1996.

I should also like to inform you that the members of the Council agree with your proposal to have Germany become a contributor to the Mission.

B. United States notification of 26 June 1993 measures against Iraq

Deliberations of 27 June 1993 (3245th meeting)

By a letter dated 26 June 1993 addressed to the President of the Council,¹⁰⁵ the representative of the United States reported, that, in accordance with Article 51 of the Charter, her country had exercised its right of self-defence by responding to the Government of Iraq's unlawful attempt to murder the former President of the United States and to its continuing threat to United States nationals. Based on clear and compelling evidence, the United States had reached the conclusion that the Government of Iraq bore direct responsibility for the failed assassination attempt. It had decided to respond, as a last resort, to the attempted attack and the threat of further attacks, by striking at an Iraqi military and intelligence target, so as to minimize risks of collateral damage to civilians. It hoped that such limited and proportionate action might frustrate future unlawful actions on the part of the Government of Iraq and discourage or preempt such activities. In light of the above, the United States Government requested an urgent meeting of the Security Council.

By a letter dated 27 June 1993 addressed to the President of the Council,¹⁰⁶ the representative of Iraq transmitted a letter of the same date from the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Iraq, in which the latter alleged that the United States had committed, on that day, an act of military aggression against Iraq, which had left a large number of dead and wounded among the Iraqi civilian population. The Minister for Foreign Affairs stated that that was a deliberate terrorist act perpetrated by the Government of the United States with the complicity of Kuwait on grounds which were spurious and unjustified. He also contended that the flight of an American U-2 spy plane over Baghdad, on the pretext of carrying out reconnaissance operations as part of the activities of the United Nations Special Commission, constituted irrefutable evidence of espionage operations in preparation for the American attack. Iraq condemned the act of aggression and called on the Council and the international community to associate themselves with such condemnation and to assume their responsibilities by halting the repeated attacks against Iraq and other countries.

At its 3245th meeting, on 27 June 1993, held in response to the request of the United States, the Council included in its agenda the item entitled "United States notification of 26 June 1993 measures against Iraq" and the letter from the representative of the United States. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representative of Iraq, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (Spain) drew the attention of the members of the Council to the letter dated 27 June 1993 from the representative of Iraq.

The representative of the United States charged that the attempt against the life of the President of the United States, during his visit to Kuwait in April 1993, was an attack on the United States. Describing in detail the planned attack on the former President, she specified that she was not asking the Council for any action, but, in her delegation's judgment, every Member State would regard an assassination attempt against its former Head of State as an attack against itself, and would react. The United States responded directly, as it was entitled to do under Article 51 of the Charter, which provided for the exercise of self-defence in such cases. The response had been proportionate and aimed at a target directly linked to the operation against the former President of the United States. It was designed to damage the terrorist infrastructure of the Iraqi regime, reduce its ability to promote terrorism and deter further acts of aggression against the United States. She stressed that the action of the United States had not been directed against the Iraqi people and expressed regret for the loss of civilian life. However, one had to keep in mind that, had the Iraqi attempt in Kuwait succeeded, hundreds of civilians could have died. Although the United States had taken action under Article 51 of the Charter, there was the broader context of Iraq's repeated and consistent refusal to comply with the resolutions of the Council since its invasion of Kuwait in 1990. Only recently, Iraq was found again to be in material breach of resolution 687 (1990). Through a policy of firmness and consistency, including readiness to use force if necessary, the international community had to frustrate Iraq's efforts to ignore the will of the Council.¹⁰⁷

The representative of Iraq stated that, on 27 June 1993, the United States had committed another act of aggression against Iraq and had tried to justify it by linking it to the story of the alleged attempt to assassinate its former President, a story which was completely fabricated by the Kuwaiti regime. The Government of Iraq had denied, and continued to deny, any role with respect to the alleged attempt and challenged the parties concerned to produce any clear evidence acceptable to an impartial third party. Pointing out that the United States Government had accused and sentenced Iraq without providing evidence against it or inviting it to clarify its position, he stated that the rules of international law gave the United States no right to overlook the principle of due process of law or the provisions of the Charter. With that act of aggression, the United States had breached its responsibility as a permanent member of the Council and had violated the norms of international law and of the Charter. Iraq believed that the Council must not allow some of its members, by taking military action, to usurp its principal role of maintaining international peace and security. That could threaten peace and security world-wide and impose on the world an unprecedented case of blackmail and terrorism. Noting that Iraq had both rights and duties under the Charter, he stressed that the resolutions of the Council could not deny it its rights. Iraq therefore appealed to the Council to safeguard its rights as a Member State and called upon it to condemn the act of aggression of the United States and take the action necessary to prevent a repetition in the future.¹⁰⁸

The representative of France stated that his Government fully understood the reasons for the unilateral action by the United States forces, in the circumstances under which it was carried out. Having always condemned all forms of terrorism, it approved policies that combat it. He specified that the Government of France sought neither the destabilization nor the dismemberment of the Iraqi State, whose territorial integrity was a factor for regional balance. It supported United Nations action to induce the Government of Iraq to moderate its behaviour and, fulfilling all the obligations imposed on it by the resolutions of the Council, to renounce all aggressive and terrorist conduct and cease to be a threat to the security of the region and the world.¹⁰⁹

Speaking on behalf of the non-aligned countries members of the Council, the representative of Cape Verde stated that the caucus was firmly opposed to, and condemned, terrorism in all its forms and manifestations, whether directed or promoted by or against individuals or States. Its members called for restraint by all States, consistent with the principles of the Charter and, in particular, for the maintenance of international peace and security and the avoidance of the use of force inconsistent with the purposes of the United Nations. They also stood for the full and faithful implementation of all Council resolutions and believed that they should be implemented in a non-discriminatory manner in the interests of preserving the credibility and moral authority of the Council.¹¹⁰

The representative of China stated that China had always held that disputes between or among countries should be settled through peaceful means of dialogue and consultation. China was opposed to any action that could contravene the Charter and norms of international relations. It did not endorse any action that might intensify the tension in the region, including the use of force.¹¹¹

The representative of the United Kingdom said that his Government viewed the action by the United States as proper and proportionate. He also drew attention to the following points: first, pursuant to resolution 687 (1991), Iraq had given an undertaking that it would in no way support State terrorism; secondly, at the Security Council meeting of Heads of State or Government on 31 January 1992, the Council had decided that State terrorism was a threat to international peace and security.¹¹²

The representative of the Russian Federation stated that the actions by the United States were justified since they arose from the right of States to individual and collective self-defence, in accordance with Article 51 of the Charter.¹¹³

The President adjourned the meeting, noting that no proposal had been submitted on which the Council was required to take action.

24. The situation in the Middle East

Decisions of 28 January 1993 (3167th meeting): resolution 803 (1993) and statement by the President

By a letter dated 18 January 1993,¹ the representative of Lebanon informed the Secretary-General of his Government's request to the Security Council to extend the mandate of the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon (UNIFIL), which was to expire on 31 January 1993, for a further period of six months, on the basis of the provisions of resolutions 425 (1978), 426 (1978), 501 (1982), 508 (1982) and 509 (1982) and of all other relevant decisions of the Council. The representative of Lebanon noted that auspicious developments had taken place since the last renewal of UNIFIL, including the formation of a new government, which was welcomed by the Arab world and the international community. He also reported that perfect coordination existed between the command of UNIFIL and the Lebanese Army, whose priority was to deploy to the entire south of the country up to its internationally recognized boundaries. He stated however, that in spite of those positive developments, Israel had intensified its efforts to destabilize Lebanon by perpetuating its brutal occupation of the south, including the deportation of Palestinian civilians to Lebanon, in violation of Lebanese sovereignty and territorial integrity and the principles of the Charter. That action had been strongly condemned by the Council in its resolution 799 (1992), which Israel had refused to implement. He further reported that despite the efforts of Lebanon to secure the implementation of resolution 425 (1978), Israel had also refused to implement that resolution and all pertinent resolutions. He stated that the time had come for the Council to invoke Chapter VII of the Charter to force Israel's compliance with its resolutions as Israel could not "remain above the law", and that Lebanon implored the Council to take new and vigorous steps to bring an end to Israel's "renegade status" through the prompt implementation of its resolution 425 (1978) and the galvanization of its mechanism set out in resolution 426 (1978), which would enable the Lebanese Government to extend its authority over the entire south of the country up to its internationally recognized boundaries. He also stated that the presence of UNIFIL remained of utmost necessity to provide assistance and international support to the civilian population. However, that could not be a substitute for the fulfilment of the original UNIFIL mandate as stipulated in resolution 425 (1978), which was to ensure the withdrawal of Israeli forces from Lebanon and to assist the Government of Lebanon, through the Lebanese army and internal security forces, in re-establishing its legitimate and effective authority in the area.

On 22 January 1993, pursuant to resolution 768 (1992), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on UNIFIL for the period from 22 July 1992 to 22 January 1993.² The Secretary-General reported that southern Lebanon had witnessed periods of high tension and that the situation in the area was characterized by volatility and unpredictability. UNIFIL had continued to prevent its area from being used for hostile activities and had done what it could to protect the inhabitants from the effects of the conflict. He further noted that, in carrying out its tasks, UNIFIL had again been severely hampered by the amount of firing directed at it and reiterated his appeal to all parties concerned to respect the international and impartial status of UNIFIL. The hostilities that had taken place in the UNIFIL area of operation had again drawn attention to Israel's occupation of parts of southern Lebanon, which had continued despite the Council's repeated calls for Israel's withdrawal. As a consequence, UNIFIL had continued to be prevented from implementing its mandate. Israel's general attitude to the situation in southern Lebanon and to the UNIFIL mandate remained as described in previous reports. According to the Israeli authorities, Israel had no territorial claims in Lebanon and the "security zone" was a temporary arrangement which was needed for the purpose of ensuring the security of northern Israel so long as the Government of Lebanon was not able to exercise effective authority and prevent its territory from being used to launch attacks against Israel. The Israeli authorities also considered that all issues between Israel and Lebanon should be dealt with in bilateral talks within the framework of the peace talks, leading to a peace treaty between the two countries. The Secretary-General observed that although UNIFIL had not been able to make progress towards the implementation of its mandate, its contribution to stability and the protection it was able to afford the population of the area nevertheless remained important. He therefore recommended that the Council accept the request of the Government of Lebanon and extend the UNIFIL mandate for another period of six months, until 31 July 1993.

At its 3167th meeting, on 28 January 1993, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. The President (Japan) drew the attention of the members of the Council to the letter from the representative of Lebanon and to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's consultations.³

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 803 (1993), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolutions 425 (1978) and 426 (1978) of 19 March 1978, 501 (1982) of 25 February 1982, 508 (1982) of 5 June 1982, 509 (1982) of 6 June 1982, and 520 (1982) of 17 September 1982, as well as all its resolutions on the situation in Lebanon,

Having studied the report of the Secretary-General of 22 January 1993 on the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon and taking note of the observations expressed therein,

Taking note of the letter dated 18 January 1993 from the Permanent Representative of Lebanon to the United Nations addressed to the Secretary-General,

Responding to the request of the Government of Lebanon,

1. Decides to extend the present mandate of the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon for a further interim period of six months, that is, until 31 July 1993;

2. Reiterates its strong support for the territorial integrity, sovereignty and independence of Lebanon within its internationally recognized boundaries;

3. Re-emphasizes the terms of reference and general guidelines of the Force as stated in the report of the Secretary-General of 19 March 1978, approved by resolution 426 (1978), and calls upon all parties concerned to cooperate fully with the Force for the full implementation of its mandate;

4. Reiterates that the Force should fully implement its mandate as defined in resolutions 425 (1978), 426 (1978) and all other relevant resolutions;

5. Requests the Secretary-General to continue consultations with the Government of Lebanon and other parties directly concerned with the implementation of the present resolution and to report to the Security Council thereon.

Subsequent to the adoption of resolution 803 (1993), the President stated that, following consultations among members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁴

The members of the Security Council have noted with appreciation the report of the Secretary-General on the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon (UNIFIL) submitted in conformity with resolution 768 (1992).

They reaffirm their commitment to the full sovereignty, independence, territorial integrity and national unity of Lebanon within its internationally recognized boundaries. In this context, they assert that any State shall refrain from the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any State, or in any other manner inconsistent with the Purposes of the United Nations.

As the Council extends the mandate of UNIFIL for a further interim period on the basis of resolution 425 (1978), the members of the Council again stress the urgent need for the implementation of that resolution in all its aspects. They reiterate their full support for the Taif Agreement and for the continued efforts of the Lebanese Government to consolidate peace, national unity and security in the country, while successfully carrying out the reconstruction process. The members of the Council commend the Lebanese Government for its successful efforts to extend its authority in the south of the country in full coordination with UNIFIL.

The members of the Council express their concern over the continuing violence in southern Lebanon, regret the loss of civilian life, and urge all parties to exercise restraint.

The members of the Council take this opportunity to express their appreciation for the continuing efforts of the Secretary-General and his staff in this regard and commend UNIFIL's troops and troop-contributing countries for their sacrifices and commitment to the cause of international peace and security under difficult circumstances.

Decisions of 26 May 1993 (3220th meeting): resolution 830 (1993) and statement by
the President

On 21 May 1993, pursuant to resolution 790 (1992), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the United Nations Disengagement Observer Force (UNDOF) for the period from 20 November 1992 to 21 May 1993.⁵ The Secretary-General noted that UNDOF had continued to perform its functions effectively, with the cooperation of the Israeli and Syrian authorities. However, despite the quiet in the

Israel-Syria sector, the situation in the Middle East as a whole continued to be potentially dangerous and was likely to remain so, unless and until a comprehensive settlement covering all aspects of the Middle East problem could be reached. In the prevailing circumstances, he considered the continued presence of UNDOF in that area to be essential and recommended that the Council extend the mandate of the Force for a further six months, until 30 November 1993, as agreed to by the Governments of the Syrian Arab Republic and Israel.

At its 3220th meeting, on 26 May 1993, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. The President (Russian Federation) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's consultations.⁶

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 830 (1993), which reads:

The Security Council,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 21 May 1993 on the United Nations Disengagement Observer Force,

Decides:

(a) To call upon the parties concerned to implement immediately its resolution 338 (1973) of 22 October 1973;

(b) To renew the mandate of the United Nations Disengagement Observer Force for another period of six months, that is, until 30 November 1993;

(c) To request the Secretary-General to submit, at the end of this period, a report on the development in the situation and the measures taken to implement resolution 338 (1973).

Following the adoption of resolution 830 (1993), the President stated that he had been authorized to make the following complementary statement on behalf of the Council:⁷

As is known, the report of the Secretary-General on the United Nations Disengagement Observer Force states, in paragraph 21: "Despite the present quiet in the Israel-Syria sector, the situation in the Middle East as a whole continues to be potentially dangerous and is likely to remain so, unless and until a comprehensive settlement covering all aspects of the Middle East problem can be reached." That statement of the Secretary-General reflects the view of the Security Council.

Decisions of 28 July 1993 (3258th meeting):
resolution 852 (1993) and statement by
the President

By a letter dated 14 July 1993,⁸ the representative of Lebanon informed the Secretary-General of his Government's request to the Council to extend the mandate of UNIFIL for a further period of six months. The representative noted that since the last renewal of UNIFIL, major positive developments had accelerated the establishment of national peace, stability and security, including the upgrading of the Lebanese army and internal security forces deployed throughout the country, except in the Israeli-occupied area, the rigorous enforcement of law and order, safe and unrestricted travel through the country, and the Government's efforts to resettle displaced persons. The command of UNIFIL and the Lebanese Army also continued to cooperate in perfect harmony with the goal of deploying the latter throughout the south of the country up to its internationally recognized borders. Despite the participation of both Lebanon and Israel in the ongoing bilateral peace negotiations, Israel was continuing to perpetuate its occupation of the south irrespective of the significant achievements made by Lebanon to consolidate national unity and central authority. He reiterated the position of the Lebanese Government, adding that the people of Lebanon would exercise their legal right of individual and collective resistance against occupation, as sanctioned by the Charter, until Israel withdrew its forces from all Lebanese territory, as stated in resolution 425 (1978). It remained incumbent upon the Council, in particular on its five permanent members, to demonstrate that its resolutions were respected and implemented.

On 20 July 1993, pursuant to resolution 803 (1993), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on UNIFIL covering the period from 23 January to 20 July 1993.⁹ The Secretary-General noted that the situation in southern Lebanon, although unchanged overall, was marked by an increased level of hostilities. The attacks by armed elements against Israeli and associated military targets on Lebanese territory had been generally more effective than in the past, and the severity of Israeli retaliation had risen concomitantly. UNIFIL was again severely hampered by firing directed against its own positions and personnel, both by the armed elements and the Israel Defense Forces and the de facto forces. The Secretary-General reiterated, in that regard, that respect by all concerned for the international and impartial status of UNIFIL was essential for it to function effectively. He observed, however, that the situation in the other parts of Lebanon had improved and that the handover of a part of the UNIFIL area of operations to the Lebanese army was a step forward. On the other hand, the hostilities in the UNIFIL area of operation and to the north of it highlighted Israel's continuing occupation of parts of southern Lebanon, despite the Council's repeated calls for Israel's withdrawal. As a consequence, UNIFIL continued to be prevented from implementing its mandate. Israel's general attitude to the situation in southern Lebanon and to the UNIFIL mandate remained as described in previous reports. For its part, the Government of Lebanon took pride in the progress it had made in restoring law and order, resettling displaced persons and moving forward towards the rehabilitation of the country. It considered that there could be no possible justification for the continuation of Israel's occupation of Lebanese territory, which it viewed as the root cause of the continuing hostilities in the southern part of the country. The Secretary-General reiterated that although UNIFIL had not been able to make visible progress towards the implementation of its mandate, its contribution to stability and the protection it was able to afford the population of the area nevertheless remained important. He therefore recommended that the Council accept the request of the Government of Lebanon and extend the mandate of UNIFIL for another period of six months, until 31 January 1994.

At its 3258th meeting, on 28 July 1993, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. The President (United Kingdom) drew the attention of the members of the Council to the letter from the representative of Lebanon and to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's consultations.¹⁰

The resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 852 (1993), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolutions 425 (1978) and 426 (1978) of 19 March 1978, 501 (1982) of 25 February 1982, 508 (1982) of 5 June 1982, 509 (1982) of 6 June 1982 and 520 (1982) of 17 September 1982, as well as all its resolutions on the situation in Lebanon,

Having studied the report of the Secretary-General of 20 July 1993 on the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon, and taking note of the observations expressed therein,

Taking note of the letter dated 14 July 1993 from the Permanent Representative of Lebanon to the United Nations addressed to the Secretary-General,

Responding to the request of the Government of Lebanon,

1. Decides to extend the present mandate of the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon for a further interim period of six months, that is, until 31 January 1994;

2. Reiterates its strong support for the territorial integrity, sovereignty and independence of Lebanon within its internationally recognized boundaries;

3. Re-emphasizes the terms of reference and general guidelines of the Force as stated in the report of the Secretary-General of 19 March 1978, approved by resolution 426 (1978), and calls upon all parties concerned to cooperate fully with the Force for the full implementation of its mandate;

4. Reiterates that the Force should fully implement its mandate as defined in resolutions 425 (1978), 426 (1978) and all other relevant resolutions;

5. Requests the Secretary-General to continue consultations with the Government of Lebanon and other parties directly concerned with the implementation of the present resolution and to report to the Security Council thereon.

Subsequent to the adoption of resolution 852 (1993), the President stated that, following consultations among members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:¹¹

The members of the Security Council have noted with appreciation the report of the Secretary-General on the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon (UNIFIL) submitted in conformity with resolution 803 (1993) of 28 January 1993.

They reaffirm their commitment to the full sovereignty, independence, territorial integrity and national unity of Lebanon within its internationally recognized boundaries. In this context, they assert that any State shall refrain from the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any State, or in any other manner inconsistent with the purposes of the United Nations.

As the Council extends the mandate of UNIFIL for a further interim period on the basis of resolution 425 (1978) of 19 March 1978, the members of the Council again stress the urgent need for the implementation of that resolution in all its aspects. They reiterate their full support for the Taif Agreement and for the continued efforts of the Lebanese Government to consolidate peace, national unity and security in the country, while successfully carrying out the reconstruction process. The members of the Council commend the Lebanese Government for its successful efforts to extend its authority in the south of the country in full coordination with UNIFIL.

The members of the Council express their concern over the continuing violence in southern Lebanon, regret the loss of civilian life, and urge all parties to exercise restraint.

The members of the Council take this opportunity to express their appreciation for the continuing efforts of the Secretary-General and his staff in this regard and commend UNIFIL's troops and troop-contributing countries for their sacrifices and commitment to the cause of international peace and security under difficult circumstances.

Decisions of 29 November 1993 (3320th meeting): resolution 887 (1993) and statement by the President

On 22 November 1993, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on UNDOF for the period from 22 May to 22 November 1993.¹² The Secretary-General noted that UNDOF had continued to perform its functions effectively, with the cooperation of the parties. Despite the quiet in the Israel-Syria sector, however, the situation continued to be potentially dangerous and was likely to remain so, unless and until a comprehensive settlement covering all aspects of the Middle East problem could be reached. In the circumstances, the Secretary-General considered the continued presence of UNDOF in the area to be essential and recommended that the Council extend the mandate of the Force for a further six months, until 31 May 1994, as agreed to by the Governments of the Syrian Arab Republic and Israel.

At its 3320th meeting, on 29 November 1993, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. The President (Cape Verde) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's consultations.¹³

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 887 (1993), which reads:

¹³ S/25808.

The Security Council,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 22 November 1993 on the United Nations Disengagement Observer Force,

Decides:

(a) To call upon the parties concerned to implement immediately its resolution 338 (1973) of 22 October 1973;

(b) To renew the mandate of the United Nations Disengagement Observer Force for another period of six months, that is, until 31 May 1994;

(c) To request the Secretary-General to submit, at the end of this period, a report on the development in the situation and the measures taken to implement Council resolution 338 (1973).

Subsequent to the adoption of resolution 887 (1993), the President stated that, following consultations among members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following complementary statement on behalf of the Council:¹⁴

As is known, the report of the Secretary-General on the United Nations Disengagement Observer Force states, in paragraph 19: "Despite the present quiet in the Israel-Syria sector, the situation continues to be potentially dangerous and is likely to remain so, unless and until a comprehensive settlement covering all aspects of the Middle East problem can be reached." That statement of the Secretary-General reflects the view of the Security Council.

Decisions of 28 January 1994 (3331st meeting): resolution 895 (1994) and statement by the President

By a letter dated 13 January 1994,¹⁵ the representative of Lebanon informed the Secretary-General of his Government's request to the Council to extend the mandate of UNIFIL for a further period of six months. He noted that since the last renewal of UNIFIL the situation in Lebanon had continued to improve with the consolidation of national reconciliation. UNIFIL and the Lebanese army continued to coordinate in perfect harmony towards the end of deploying the latter throughout the south of the country up to the internationally recognized boundaries. He also reported that in spite of those positive developments, the Israeli occupation of southern Lebanon, while "wreaking havoc", continued to thwart and preclude Lebanon's complete recovery, including through heavy bombardment of southern Lebanon, which also caused damage and injury to UNIFIL. The representative otherwise reiterated the position of the Government of Lebanon, as previously outlined,¹⁶ emphasizing that it was Lebanon's clear understanding that the Middle East peace process would provide the framework in which Israel would implement resolution 425 (1978).

On 20 January 1994, pursuant to resolution 852 (1993), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on UNIFIL for the period from 21 July 1993 to 20 January 1994.¹⁷ The Secretary-General noted that the situation in southern Lebanon continued to be tense and volatile. The exceptionally heavy Israeli bombardment at the end of July had been followed by a lull, but in September hostilities had returned to earlier levels. However, from August onwards, the shelling of civilian targets had been much reduced, compared to previous mandate periods. UNIFIL was again severely hampered by firing directed at its own positions and personnel. The Secretary-General reiterated in that regard that respect by all concerned for the international and impartial status of UNIFIL was essential for it to function effectively. He further noted that Lebanon continued on the path of normalization outside the UNIFIL area of operations and that the deployment in that area of a Lebanese army unit for maintaining law and order was a step towards the restoration of government authority. On the other hand, Israel maintained its occupation of parts of southern Lebanon, despite the Council's repeated calls for its withdrawal. Hostilities had continued and UNIFIL remained unable to implement its mandate. The Secretary-General further reported that Israel's general attitude to the situation in southern Lebanon and to the UNIFIL mandate remained as described in previous reports. For its part, the Lebanese Government remained fully engaged in the process of reconstruction of the country and national reconciliation. Its position was described in the letter dated 13 January 1994. The Secretary-General reiterated that although UNIFIL had not been able to make visible progress towards the implementation of its mandate, its contribution to stability and the protection it was able to afford the population of the area nevertheless remained important. He therefore recommended that the Council accept the request of the Government of Lebanon and extend the mandate of UNIFIL for another period of six months, until 31 July 1994. While he did not propose to reduce the strength of the Force, he hoped that at the end of the following six months the ongoing peace talks would have made sufficient progress to justify a further reduction in the strength of UNIFIL.

At its 3331st meeting, on 28 January 1994, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. The President (Czech Republic) drew the attention of the members of the Council to the letter from the representative of Lebanon and to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's consultations.¹⁸

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 895 (1994), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolutions 425 (1978) and 426 (1978) of 19 March 1978, 501 (1982) of 25 February 1982, 508 (1982) of 5 June 1982, 509 (1982) of 6 June 1982 and 520 (1982) of 17 September 1982, as well as all its resolutions on the situation in Lebanon, directly concerned with the implementation of the present resolution and to report to the Security Council thereon.

Subsequent to the adoption of resolution 895 (1994), the President stated that, following consultations among members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:¹⁹

The members of the Security Council have noted with appreciation the report of the Secretary-General on the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon submitted in conformity with resolution 852 (1993) of 28 July 1993.

The members of the Council reaffirm their commitment to the full sovereignty, independence, territorial integrity and national unity of Lebanon within its internationally recognized boundaries. Decisions of 26 May 1994 (3382nd meeting):
resolution 921 (1994) and statement by
the President

On 22 May 1994, pursuant to resolution 887 (1993), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on UNDOF for the period from 23 November 1993 to 22 May 1994.²⁰ The Secretary-General, inter alia, noted that UNDOF had continued to perform its functions effectively, with the cooperation of the parties. Despite the quiet in the Israel-Syria sector, however, the situation in the Middle East as a whole continued to be potentially dangerous and was likely to remain so, unless and until a comprehensive settlement covering all aspects of the Middle East problem could be reached. In the prevailing circumstances, the Secretary-General considered the continued presence of UNDOF in the area to be essential and recommended that the Council extend the mandate of the Force for a further six months, until 31 May 1994, as agreed to by the Governments of the Syrian Arab Republic and Israel.

At its 3382nd meeting, on 26 May 1994, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. The President (Nigeria) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's consultations.²¹

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 921 (1994), which reads:

The Security Council,

Decisions of 28 July 1994 (3409th meeting):
resolution 938 (1994) and statement by
the President

By a letter dated 13 July 1994,²³ the representative of Lebanon informed the Secretary-General of his Government's request to the Council to extend the mandate of UNIFIL for a further interim period of six months. He noted that since the last renewal of the UNIFIL mandate major positive developments had accelerated the national reconstruction and rehabilitation process in Lebanon. UNIFIL and the Lebanese army continued to coordinate in perfect harmony towards the end of deploying the latter throughout the south of the country up to the internationally recognized boundaries. However, in spite of those positive developments, Israel's occupation of the south and "continued aggression against Lebanon" and its citizens remained the major obstacle to national recovery. He otherwise reiterated the position of the Government of Lebanon, as previously outlined,²⁴ emphasizing that the implementation of resolution 425 (1978) was the only way to stop the violence in southern Lebanon. To that end, the Council could play a positive role in securing peace for the region by demonstrating the inviolability of its resolutions and undertaking long overdue measures to implement resolution 425 (1978).

On 20 July 1994, pursuant to resolution 895 (1994), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on UNIFIL for the period from 21 January to 20 July 1994.²⁵ The Secretary-General noted that the situation in southern Lebanon continued to be tense and volatile. Attacks by armed elements against Israeli and associated military forces on Lebanese territory continued. There were also a few incidents of rockets being fired into northern Israel. The Israel Defense Forces and de facto forces responded to attacks with heavy shelling, on a number of occasions causing casualties among the civilian population. The Israeli forces had, in recent weeks, increasingly taken the initiative in the fighting, including air raids against targets deep inside Lebanese territory. On a few occasions, UNIFIL had been the target of violence. In that regard, the Secretary-General stressed once again the obligation of all concerned to respect the international and impartial status of UNIFIL. He, inter alia, noted that notwithstanding the Council's repeated calls for its withdrawal, Israel had maintained its occupation of parts of southern Lebanon, and its general attitude to the situation in the area and to the UNIFIL mandate remained as described in previous reports. For its part, the Government of Lebanon contrasted the progress made in reconstruction and rehabilitation elsewhere in the country with Israel's continuing occupation in the south. It considered that to be the major obstacle to national recovery and emphasized that the implementation of resolution 425 (1978) was the only way to stop the violence. The Secretary-General also noted that UNIFIL continued to be prevented from fulfilling its mandate. Nevertheless, within the limits imposed on it by the circumstances, the Force's contribution to stability and the protection it was able to afford the population in the area where it was deployed remained important. He therefore recommended that the Council accept the request of the Government of Lebanon and extend the UNIFIL mandate for another period of six months, until 31 January 1995. Although there had been no visible progress in the ongoing peace talks, the Secretary-General felt compelled to seriously consider the possibility of a further reduction in the strength of UNIFIL, for financial reasons.

At its 3409th meeting, on 28 July 1994, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. The President (Pakistan) drew the attention of the members of the Council to the letter from the representative of Lebanon and to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's consultations.²⁶

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted by 14 votes in favour²⁷ as resolution 938 (1994), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolutions 425 (1978) and 426 (1978) of 19 March 1978, 501 (1982) of 25 February 1982, 508 (1982) of 5 June 1982, 509 (1982) of 6 June 1982 and 520 (1982) of 17 September 1982, as well as all its resolutions on the situation in Lebanon,

Decisions of 29 November 1994 (3467th meeting): resolution 962 (1994) and statement by the President

On 18 November 1994, pursuant to resolution 921 (1994), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on UNDOF for the period from 23 May to 18 November 1994.²⁹ The Secretary-General noted that UNDOF had continued to perform its functions effectively, with the cooperation of the parties. Despite the quiet in the Israel-Syria sector, however, the situation in the Middle East continued to be potentially dangerous and was likely to remain so, unless and until a comprehensive settlement covering all aspects of the Middle East problem could be reached. In the prevailing circumstances, he considered the continued presence of UNDOF in the area to be essential and recommended that the Council extend the mandate of the Force for a further six months, until 31 May 1995, as agreed to by the Governments of the Syrian Arab Republic and Israel.

At its 3467th meeting, on 29 November 1994, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. The President (United States) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's consultations.³⁰

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 962 (1994), which reads:

That statement of the Secretary-General reflects the view of the Security Council.

Decision of 24 January 1995: statement by the President

Following consultations, on 24 January 1995, the President (Argentina) made the following statement to the media on behalf of the members of the Council:³²

The members of the Security Council strongly condemn the terrorist attack which took place in Nordiya, Israel, on Sunday, 22 January 1995, with the clear purpose of trying to undermine the Middle East peace efforts.

The members of the Council extend their condolences to the families of those who died as a consequence of the explosions and wish a speedy recovery of the wounded.

The members of the Council call upon all parties to continue their efforts to consolidate the peace process. The members of the Council believe that common ground can be found only through the practice of dialogue, respect and tolerance.

Decisions of 30 January 1995 (3495th meeting): resolution 974 (1995) and statement by the President

By a letter dated 16 January 1995,³³ the representative of Lebanon informed the Secretary-General of his Government's request to the Council to extend the mandate of UNIFIL for a further interim period of six months. The representative noted that the national reconstruction and rehabilitation process in Lebanon was proceeding and that UNIFIL and the Lebanese army continued to coordinate in perfect harmony with the goal of deploying throughout the south of the country up to the internationally recognized boundaries. In spite of those positive developments, however, Israel's occupation of the south and "continued aggression against Lebanon and its citizens" remained the major obstacle to national recovery. He reiterated the position of the Government of Lebanon,³⁴ emphasizing the repeated violations of Lebanese sovereignty and territorial integrity through constant shelling of villages and towns in the south, and Israel's refusal to allow the International Committee of the Red Cross to visit Lebanese detainees held in Israeli jails and detention camps in Al-Khaim and Marjayoun in violation of the Fourth Geneva Convention of 1949.

By a letter dated 18 January 1995 addressed to the Secretary-General,³⁵ the representative of Israel referred to the above-mentioned letter from the representative of Lebanon as reiterating allegations contained in previous communications. He drew attention to a letter dated 1 August 1994 addressed to the Secretary-General,³⁶ in which the position of Israel regarding the situation in southern Lebanon was outlined. In that letter, the representative of Israel rebutted the contents of the letter dated 13 July 1994 from the representative of Lebanon by stating that the international community was fully aware that armed members of Hizbullah and other terrorist organizations functioned with impunity in Lebanon and were free to plan and carry out attacks and shellings in northern Israel and Lebanon,³⁷ which also affected UNIFIL. He further noted that all that had occurred without any serious attempt by the Government of Lebanon to act effectively in order to prevent such activities. He contended that if Lebanon was indeed committed to peacefully settling its dispute with Israel through bilateral negotiation within the peace process, then it should not undermine that process by openly sanctioning terror against Israel. Lebanon's policy concerning Hizbullah and similar organizations stood in clear contradiction to the Declaration on Principles of International Law concerning Friendly Relations and Cooperation among States in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations,³⁸ which forbade States to allow their territory to be used for acts directed against neighbouring States. He also noted that the security measures which Israel had taken in southern Lebanon had to be viewed in the light of Israel's right to self-defence. Being actively engaged in a peace process aimed at achieving a peaceful settlement of its dispute with Israel, Lebanon was estopped from attempting to internationalize that dispute by raising in the Security Council issues that were properly addressed in the framework of the bilateral negotiations. Israel was encouraged by the historic progress made towards peace that had occurred during the past year, both in the bilateral and multilateral tracks of the peace process and hoped to see progress as well in its negotiations with Lebanon, and called on the Government of Lebanon to take the necessary steps that would enable the negotiations to lead to the conclusion of a formal peace treaty between Israel and Lebanon.

On 23 January 1995, pursuant to resolution 938 (1994), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on UNIFIL for the period from 21 July 1994 to 20 January 1995.³⁹ The Secretary-General noted that the situation in southern Lebanon, which continued to be tense and volatile, had remained essentially unchanged and that the decisions of the Council contained in resolution 425 (1978) and subsequent resolutions remained unfulfilled. Israel had maintained its occupation of parts of southern Lebanon, where the Israeli forces and their Lebanese auxiliary continued to be the targets of attacks by armed groups that had proclaimed their resistance against the occupation. While UNIFIL continued, to the best of its ability, to limit the conflict and to protect inhabitants, it also continued to be prevented from fulfilling its mandate. The Secretary-General reiterated that although there had been no progress towards the implementation of the UNIFIL mandate, the Force's contribution to stability in the area and the protection it was able to afford the inhabitants remained important. He therefore recommended that the Council accept the request of the Government of Lebanon and extend the UNIFIL mandate for a further period of six months, until 31 July 1995. He also drew attention to the shortfall in the funding of the Force and noted that possibilities for streamlining and achieving economies in the areas of maintenance and logistics support had been identified and that he intended to pursue them and report thereon to the Council.

At its 3495th meeting, on 30 January 1995, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. The President (Argentina) drew the attention of the members of the Council to the letters dated 16 and 18 January 1995, respectively, from the representatives of Lebanon and Israel. He also drew their attention to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's consultations.⁴⁰

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 974 (1995), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolutions 425 (1978) of 19 March 1978, 426 (1978) of 19 March 1978, 501 (1982) of 25 February 1982, 508 (1982) of 5 June 1982, 509 (1982) of 6 June 1982 and 520 (1982) of 17 September 1982, as well as all its resolutions on the situation in Lebanon,

Having studied the report of the Secretary-General of 23 January 1995 on the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon, and taking note of the observations expressed therein,

Taking note of the letter dated 16 January 1995 from the Permanent Representative of Lebanon to the United Nations addressed to the Secretary-General,

Responding to the request of the Government of Lebanon,

1. Decides to extend the present mandate of the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon for a further interim period of six months, that is until 31 July 1995;

2. Reiterates its strong support for the territorial integrity, sovereignty and independence of Lebanon within its internationally recognized boundaries;

3. Re-emphasizes the terms of reference and general guidelines of the Force as stated in the report of the Secretary-General of 19 March 1978, approved by resolution 426 (1978), and calls upon all parties concerned to cooperate fully with the Force for the full implementation of its mandate;

4. Reiterates that the Force should fully implement its mandate as defined in resolutions 425 (1978), 426 (1978) and all other relevant resolutions;

5. Endorses the Secretary-General's intention to pursue the possibilities for streamlining and achieving economies in the areas of maintenance and logistic support;

6. Requests the Secretary-General to continue consultations with the Government of Lebanon and other parties directly concerned with the implementation of the present resolution and to report to the Security Council thereon.

Subsequent to the adoption of resolution 974 (1995), the President stated that, following consultations among members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁴¹

The Security Council has noted with appreciation the report of the Secretary-General of 23 January 1995 on the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon, submitted in conformity with resolution 938 (1994) of 28 July 1994.

The Council reaffirms its commitment to the full sovereignty, independence, territorial integrity and national unity of Lebanon within its internationally recognized boundaries. In this context, the Council asserts that any State shall refrain from the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any State, or in any other manner inconsistent with the purposes of the United Nations.

As the Council extends the mandate of the Force for a further interim period on the basis of resolution 425 (1978), the Council again stresses the urgent need for the implementation of that resolution in all its aspects. It reiterates its full support for the Taif Agreement of 22 October 1989 and for the continued efforts of the Lebanese Government to consolidate peace, national unity and security in the country, while successfully carrying out the reconstruction process. The Council commends the Lebanese Government for its successful effort to extend its authority in the south of the country in full coordination with the Force.

The Council expresses its concern over the continuing violence in southern Lebanon, regrets the loss of civilian life and urges all parties to exercise restraint.

The Council takes this opportunity to express its appreciation for the continuing efforts of the Secretary-General and his staff in this regard and commends the troops of the Force and troop-contributing countries for their sacrifices and commitment to the cause of international peace and security under difficult circumstances.

Decisions of 30 May 1995 (3541st meeting):
resolution 996 (1995) and statement by
the President

On 17 May 1995, pursuant to resolution 962 (1994), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on UNDOF for the period from 22 November 1994 to 22 May 1995.⁴² The Secretary-General noted that UNDOF had continued to perform its functions effectively, with the cooperation of the parties. Despite the quiet in the Israel-Syria sector, however, the situation in the Middle East continued to be potentially dangerous and was likely to remain so, unless and until a comprehensive settlement covering all aspects of the Middle East problem could be reached. In the prevailing circumstances, he considered the continued presence of UNDOF in the area to be essential and recommended that the Council extend the mandate of the Force for a further six months, that is, until 30 November 1995, as agreed to by the Governments of the Syrian Arab Republic and Israel.

At its 3541st meeting, on 30 May 1995, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. The President (France) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's consultations.⁴³

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 996 (1995), which reads:

The Security Council,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 17 May 1995 on the United Nations Disengagement Observer Force,

Decides:

(a) To call upon the parties concerned to implement immediately its resolution 338 (1973) of 22 October 1973;

(b) To renew the mandate of the United Nations Disengagement Observer Force for another period of six months, that is, until 30 November 1995;

(c) To request the Secretary-General to submit, at the end of this period, a report on the development in the situation and the measures taken to implement Security Council resolution 338 (1973).

Subsequent to the adoption of resolution 996 (1995), the President stated that, following consultations among members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following complementary statement on behalf of the Council:⁴⁴

As is known, the report of the Secretary-General of 17 May 1995 on the United Nations Disengagement Observer Force states, in paragraph 18: "Despite the present quiet in the Israel-Syria sector, the situation in the Middle East continues to be potentially dangerous and is likely to remain so, unless and until a comprehensive settlement covering all aspects of the Middle East problem can be reached." That statement of the Secretary-General reflects the view of the Security Council.

Decisions of 28 July 1995 (3558th meeting):
resolution 1006 (1995) and statement by
the President

By a letter dated 10 July 1995,⁴⁵ the representative of Lebanon informed the Secretary-General of his Government's request to the Council to extend the mandate of UNIFIL for a further interim period of six months. The representative, inter alia, noted that the national reconstruction and rehabilitation process in Lebanon was proceeding, and that UNIFIL and the Lebanese army continued to coordinate in perfect harmony with the goal of deploying the latter throughout the south of the country up to the internationally recognized boundaries. Despite the satisfactory economic performance and acceleration of reconstruction, Israel's continuous occupation of south Lebanon and "continued aggression against Lebanon and its citizens" remained the major obstacle to comprehensive national recovery. The Israeli Army continued to shell villages and towns in Lebanon. Aerial bombardments had taken place in 1995, killing and injuring many civilians and destroying property, in repeated violation of Lebanese sovereignty and territorial integrity. Moreover, for the previous five months, Israel had blockaded the southern coastline of Lebanon, in violation of the Charter, Security Council resolutions and international law. That blockade constituted a major economic and social problem. The representative otherwise reiterated the position of the Government of Lebanon.⁴⁶

On 19 July 1995, pursuant to resolution 974 (1995), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on UNIFIL for the period from 21 January to 19 July 1995.⁴⁷ The Secretary-General noted that the situation in southern Lebanon, which continued to be tense and volatile, had remained essentially unchanged and the decisions of the Council contained in resolution 425 (1978) and subsequent resolutions remained unfulfilled. The level of hostilities in the area had increased since the Secretary-General's last report. Of particular concern was the number of civilians who had been killed or injured. UNIFIL continued to make every effort to limit the conflict and to protect inhabitants from the hostilities. The Secretary-General reiterated that although there had been no progress towards the implementation of the UNIFIL mandate, the Force's contribution to stability in the area remained important. He therefore recommended that the Council accept the request of the Government of Lebanon and extend the UNIFIL mandate for another period of six months, until 31 January 1996. Further, he intended, with the concurrence of the Council, to carry out the streamlining of UNIFIL outlined in paragraphs 11 and 12 of his report.

At its 3558th meeting, on 28 July 1995, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. The President (Honduras) drew the attention of the members of the Council to the letter from the representative of Lebanon and to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's consultations.⁴⁸

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1006 (1995), which reads:

Decisions of 28 November 1995 (3599th meeting): resolution 1024 (1995) and statement by the President

On 17 November 1995, pursuant to resolution 996 (1995), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on UNDOF for the period from 17 May to 17 November 1995.⁵⁰ The Secretary-General noted that UNDOF had continued to perform its functions effectively, with the cooperation of the parties. Despite the quiet in the Israel-Syria sector, however, the situation in the Middle East continued to be potentially dangerous and was likely to remain so, unless and until a comprehensive settlement covering all aspects of the Middle East problem could be reached. The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1024 (1995), which reads:

25. The situation in the occupied Arab territories

Decision of 18 March 1994 (3351st meeting): resolution 904 (1994)

By a letter dated 25 February 1994,¹ the observer of Palestine² informed the Secretary-General that a group of Israeli settlers had opened fire at Palestinian worshippers in a mosque in Al-Haram Al-Ibrahimi in Al-Khalil (Hebron), which had resulted in more than 50 killed and more than 200 wounded. The massacre was followed by the killing of more than 10 Palestinians in confrontations with the Israeli army in Al-Khalil and other locations throughout the occupied Palestinian territory and by the closure of several areas by the Israeli authorities. The Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO) believed that the underlying cause of those actions remained the official Israeli policy regarding settlements in the occupied Palestinian territory and that the Government of Israel should be held responsible for the massacre. In that connection, it recalled Security Council resolutions which considered settlements to be illegal and obstacles to peace, and which called for their dismantlement. The PLO called upon the international community to bring an end to such acts committed against the Palestinian people and reiterated its request for international protection through a direct international presence in the occupied Palestinian territory. It also called upon the Council to fulfil its responsibilities and to take the necessary measures in reaction to the situation in a meeting to be held immediately.

² For details concerning the use of the designation "Palestine" in lieu of Palestine Liberation Organization, see General Assembly resolution 43/177.

By a letter also dated 25 February 1994 addressed to the President of the Council,³ the representative of Egypt, in his capacity as Chairman of the Arab Group, referred to the above-mentioned letter from the observer of Palestine and requested that the Council be convened immediately to discuss the serious situation in the occupied Palestinian territories, including Jerusalem. By a letter of the same date addressed to the President of the Council,⁴ the representative of Pakistan, in his capacity as Chairman of the Organization of the Islamic Conference (OIC) Group at the United Nations, transmitted a statement adopted at a meeting of the States members of OIC at which they had, inter alia, requested that the Council be convened immediately in order to discuss the grave situation resulting from the attack in a mosque in Al-Khalil. The States members of OIC also called for an investigation of the situation which could have serious implications for peace and security in the region as well as for the ongoing peace process.

At its 3340th meeting, on 28 February 1994, the Council included the letters from the representatives of Egypt and Pakistan in its agenda. The Council considered the item at its 3340th, 3341st, 3342nd and 3351st meetings, on 28 February and 1, 2 and 18 March 1994.

The Council invited the following, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote: at the 3340th meeting, the representatives of Afghanistan, Algeria, Egypt, Greece, Indonesia, the Islamic Republic of Iran, Israel, Jordan, Kuwait, Lebanon, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Malaysia, Qatar, the Sudan, the Syrian Arab Republic, Tunisia, Turkey and the United Arab Emirates; at the 3341st meeting, the representatives of Bahrain, Bangladesh, Japan, Mauritania and Ukraine; and at the 3342nd meeting, the representative of Bosnia and Herzegovina. The Council also decided to invite, at its 3340th meeting, the observer of Palestine, at his request, to participate in the proceedings without the right to vote. The Council also extended an invitation under rule 39 of its provisional rules of procedure at its 3340th meeting to the observer of OIC and at its 3341st meeting to the Chairman of the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People.

At the 3340th meeting, the President (Djibouti) drew the attention of the members of the Council to several documents.⁵

The representative of Palestine welcomed the fact that the Council had unanimously agreed to allow him to participate in its work, without the right to vote. At the same time, he regretted the Council's delay in taking decisive measures with respect to the question before it and stressed the need for the Council to act quickly. He contended that what had taken place at the Ibrahimi mosque was the result of the campaign of illegitimate Israeli settlements, which climate that that had created, and not an isolated act, regardless of the numbers involved in the commission of the crime. His delegation believed that the Council should rapidly adopt a new resolution condemning the massacre perpetrated against the Palestinian people and assuming responsibility for the protection of the Palestinian people in the occupied territories, in accordance with previous resolutions, in particular, resolution 681 (1990). His delegation reaffirmed that Israel and the Government of Israel were responsible for the events at Al-Khalil, given the fact that the Israeli army was usually present in considerable strength in the area and did nothing to prevent it, and called upon the Government of Israel to adopt a number of measures reflecting a real change in its policy regarding settlements. He stressed that the settlers had to be disarmed, all the settlements dismantled and the activities of the settlers in all the occupied territories, including Jerusalem, stopped; it was not a question of merely limiting or reducing the number of settlements. They had to be immediately offered the possibility of leaving the territories quickly, after receiving compensation from the Israeli Government. Furthermore, in the framework of the Declaration of Principles on Interim Self-Government Arrangements signed by Israel and the Palestine Liberation Organization, at Washington, on 13 September 1993,⁶ the pace of the negotiations on the settlements had to be accelerated, in accordance with certain priorities, in order to defuse the "explosive situation" which existed due to the illegal settlements.⁷

The representative of Egypt, in his capacity as Chairman of the Group of Arab States, referred to the events at the Ibrahimi mosque as an unprecedented development since the beginning of the Israeli occupation. Besides referring to a draft resolution tabled by the Group, requesting, inter alia, the deployment of an international commission to investigate that incident, the representative asked the international community to face the following issues: first, full attention should be given to providing protection for the Palestinian people until it achieved its complete independence through the peace process, and to reaffirming that the Government of Israel, as the "occupying authority", was fully responsible for providing protection for Palestinians in the occupied territories in accordance with the 1949 Fourth Geneva Convention. Secondly, attention should be paid to the security requirements of the Palestinian people. Thirdly, no party interested in the establishment of peace in the Middle East should allow a biased, extremist minority to impose its will on the overwhelming majority that aspired to put an end to the violence. The speedy achievement of an Israeli-Palestinian agreement on the implementation of the Declaration of Principles could be a first step in that regard. Fourthly, the international community should convey to the Palestinian people a clear message of solidarity. The representative hoped that the Council would unanimously adopt a resolution condemning the events at the Ibrahimi mosque and reaffirming the need to provide stability and security for the Palestinian people until the end of the occupation.⁸

The representative of Israel stated that Israel regretted and condemned the criminal murder of worshippers in Hebron perpetrated by a “fanatic individual”. Extremists on both sides were wrong in believing that they could derail the peace process by creating a vicious circle of violence. The fact was that the point of no return had been passed on the way to a new era of peace, security and cooperation. Following the formation of the Israeli Government on 13 July 1992, Israel had made far-reaching changes in its order of national priorities. Also, at two meetings on 25 and 27 February 1994, the Israeli Cabinet had discussed the massacre in Hebron and had authorized a number of steps in that regard, including the establishment of a commission of inquiry to fully investigate the massacre and a series of measures against radical elements among Israeli residents in the territories. The representative stressed that the Government of Israel was fully committed to doing its utmost to protect Arabs and Jews alike. Once the implementation of the Israeli-Palestinian agreement began, the Palestinian police would take its part in ensuring security. The Government believed that the only solution to the conflict was to enhance the implementation of the agreement between Israel and the PLO. In that connection, the Security Council had a responsibility to support the proponents of peace by calling for accelerated progress towards implementing the agreement.⁹

The representative of Pakistan, in his capacity as Chairman of the OIC group in New York, condemned that “cold-blooded and wanton attack directed against the people of Palestine”. He called on the Government of Israel to put an immediate end to the “repressive measures against the people of Palestine” and to take the necessary steps to ensure the safety and protection of the Palestinians in the occupied Palestinian territories, in accordance with the Fourth Geneva Convention of 12 August 1949.¹⁰

¹⁰ Ibid., pp. 21-24.

The representative of Tunisia condemned the killing as an “abominable crime” and called for an impartial inquiry. He stressed the absolute need for the disarmament of the Israeli settlers, the dismantlement of Israeli settlements and for an international presence to protect the lives of civilians in the Palestinian territories.¹¹

The representative of Jordan said that beyond condemnation, the Council should meet its responsibilities, including, as a matter of urgency, by dispatching a commission of inquiry to investigate the massacre and taking the necessary steps to ensure the commission’s ability to carry out its work successfully and report back to the Council. The representative called on the Council to examine what had occurred, considering the fact that Israel’s settlement policy was illegal and that Israel did not abide by the Geneva Convention Relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War. In order to remove the root causes of violence, the Council had to provide protection for Palestinian civilians. It should be guided by its resolutions concerning the illegality of the Israeli settlements, particularly resolution 465 (1980), which determined that Israel’s settlement policy constituted a serious obstruction to achieving a comprehensive, just and lasting peace in the Middle East. While the issue of the settlements fell within the purview of the Declaration of Principles and was to be discussed directly by those involved in the negotiations, the issue of disarming the settlers and safeguarding Palestinian lives, however, should in no way be linked or be subjected to any criteria: the right to life must be protected, legally and morally, at all times, including under occupation, and it was the duty of the Council to safeguard that right without delay. Furthermore, it was incumbent upon the Council to uphold the application of the Fourth Geneva Convention to the territory of Palestine, as provided in resolutions 605 (1987), 681 (1990) and 726 (1992), which were still in force. The Council was called upon to provide an appropriate mechanism for implementing the provisions of the Fourth Geneva Convention. Among the measures which the Council could take, what was urgently required was to provide effective and constant protection to the Palestinian people so long as they were suffering under occupation. The representative also expressed his discontent with the work of the Security Council and held the latter responsible for not having forced Israel to abide by the above-mentioned Geneva Convention and to implement its own resolutions on that issue. Therefore, he accused the Council of not having lived up to its responsibility to protect the Palestinian people.¹²

The representative of OIC stated that the States members of OIC extended their full support for the Palestinian people in their struggle until they achieved their inalienable national rights, including their right to return, to self-determination and to the establishment of their independent State on their national homeland, with its capital Al-Quds Al-Sharif (Jerusalem), under the leadership of the PLO as their sole legitimate representative. OIC called upon the United Nations to continue to play an active role in the peace process and for the immediate implementation of the relevant resolutions, in particular resolution 681 (1990), and recalled that the occupying Power had a responsibility to protect the Palestinian people in accordance with the Fourth Geneva Convention, which was applicable to the occupied Palestinian territory, including Jerusalem. OIC demanded an immediate end to the Israeli policies of repression against the Palestinian people and called for effective international protection to be provided to the Palestinian people in the occupied territories and the disarming of the Israeli settlers as a step towards the dismantling of the Israeli settlements in the occupied territories, which were illegal. The States members of OIC appealed to the Council to adopt a resolution of determination.¹³

At the 3341st and 3342nd meetings, held on 1 and 2 March 1994 respectively, the President (France) drew the attention of the members of the Council to several documents.¹⁴

At the 3342nd meeting, the representative of Greece, speaking on behalf of the European Union, expressed the Union's outrage over the abominable act of terrorism that had taken place in Hebron. While noting with satisfaction the strong condemnation of the acts by the Government of Israel, he recalled that it had responsibility for ensuring the protection and safety of the Palestinian population in the occupied territories in accordance with the 1949 Fourth Geneva Convention. The European Union welcomed the measures announced by the Government of Israel to end the illegal acts by Israeli settlers and appealed to the Israeli authorities to continue their efforts to establish the necessary conditions for stabilizing the situation. It would, in particular, call on the parties to conclude an agreement on a temporary international or foreign presence, as provided for in the Declaration of Principles.¹⁵

At the same meeting, the Chairman of the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People stated that the Committee, while noting the measures already taken by the Government of Israel, was convinced that steps had to be taken to put an end to violent activities by settlers and to begin dismantling the settlements in accordance with international law and numerous Security Council resolutions. The Committee fully supported the Palestinian requests for an international presence in the occupied territory and for measures aimed at disarming the settlers and urged the Security Council to take the necessary measures in that regard. It believed that only rapid and consistent progress in the negotiations leading to the disengagement of Israeli forces and self-rule for Palestinians would prevent the situation from deteriorating further.¹⁶

Many other speakers who participated in the debate stressed the responsibility of Israel under the Fourth Geneva Convention to protect the Palestinian people in the occupied territories, including Jerusalem and called upon Israel to abide by its provisions. They also called for the disarmament of the settlers and the dismantlement of the Israeli settlements in the occupied territories.¹⁷ Some called for an international inquiry to investigate the events.¹⁸ Some were in favour of an international presence in the occupied territories.¹⁹

At the 3351st meeting, on 18 March 1994, the President drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution submitted by Djibouti, on behalf of the non-aligned members of the Council, as well as France, the Russian Federation, Spain and the United Kingdom.²⁰ He further drew their attention to several other documents,²¹ including a letter dated 14 March 1994 from the representative of Israel to the Secretary-General, transmitting the text of a decision of the Government of Israel of 13 March 1994, taking measures, including outlawing two Israeli terrorist organizations.

The representative of Djibouti welcomed the initial reaction of the Israeli Government, including the strong public condemnation, the announced intention of disarming selected individual settlers and the outlawing of two of the most extreme settler organizations. He also called for an international presence in the occupied territories to assure Palestinians of their safety. In explanation of vote, the representative said that the delay in the Council's reaction was unfortunate and could only damage its credibility. Nevertheless, his delegation supported the draft resolution which would have a mandatory effect, like any other resolution adopted by the Council.²² That view was shared by the representative of Oman.²³

The representative of Spain welcomed the measures adopted by the Government of Israel to ensure the security and protection of all inhabitants of the occupied territories and stated that such measures must be complemented and implemented diligently. His delegation stressed that an impartial and complete investigation should be conducted and that effective measures should be taken to control all extremist elements among the Israeli settlers and noted, in that regard, the decisions of the Israeli authority to establish a commission of investigation and to declare illegal two extremist Israeli organizations. His delegation believed that the presence of international observers in the occupied territories was appropriate as an important confidence-building measure to facilitate implementation of the Declaration of Principles and encouraged the parties to reach agreement as soon as possible on the composition and modalities of that temporary presence. Spain believed that the draft resolution duly reflected the range of measures aimed at ensuring the security of the population in the occupied territories and at making it possible for the peace process to resume.²⁴

The Council then proceeded to a paragraph-by-paragraph vote on the draft resolution.²⁵ All paragraphs were adopted unanimously except the second and sixth preambular paragraphs which were each adopted by 14 votes in favour, with 1 abstention (United States). The draft resolution as a whole was then adopted without a vote as resolution 904 (1994), which reads:

The Security Council,

Shocked by the appalling massacre committed against Palestinian worshippers in the Mosque of Ibrahim in Hebron, on 25 February 1994, during the holy month of Ramadan,

Gravely concerned by the consequent Palestinian casualties in the occupied Palestinian territory as a result of the massacre, which underlines the need to provide protection and security for the Palestinian people,

Determined to overcome the adverse impact of the massacre on the peace process currently under way,

Noting with satisfaction the efforts undertaken to guarantee the smooth proceeding of the peace process, and calling upon all concerned to continue their efforts to this end,

Noting the condemnation of this massacre by the entire international community,

Reaffirming its relevant resolutions, which affirmed the applicability of the fourth Geneva Convention of 12 August 1949 to the territories occupied by Israel in June 1967, including Jerusalem, and the Israeli responsibilities thereunder,

1. Strongly condemns the massacre in Hebron and its aftermath which took the lives of more than fifty Palestinian civilians and injured several hundred others;

2. Calls upon Israel, the occupying Power, to continue to take and implement measures, including, inter alia, confiscation of arms, with the aim of preventing illegal acts of violence by Israeli settlers;

3. Calls for measures to be taken to guarantee the safety and protection of the Palestinian civilians throughout the occupied territory, including, inter alia, a temporary international or foreign presence, which was provided for in the Declaration of Principles on Interim Self-Government Arrangements, signed by the Government of Israel and the Palestine Liberation Organization at Washington, D.C. on 13 September 1993, within the context of the ongoing peace process;

4. Requests the co-sponsors of the peace process, the United States of America and the Russian Federation, to continue their efforts to invigorate the peace process and to undertake the necessary support for the implementation of the above-mentioned measures;

5. Reaffirms its support for the peace process currently under way, and calls for the implementation of the Declaration of Principles without delay.

After the vote, the representative of the United States stated that her Government condemned the massacre in Hebron in the strongest possible terms. The only answer to that massacre was for Israel and the PLO to promptly conclude their negotiations and begin the implementation of the Declaration of Principles as rapidly as possible. It was precisely to serve and protect the peace process that her Government had — with great reluctance — made the difficult decision to allow resolution 904 (1994) to pass, despite the existence of some language it found objectionable. For at the same time, the United States Government had announced steps that would serve to restart the stalled Middle East process. The United States supported the operative paragraphs of resolution 904 (1994). However, it had sought a paragraph-by-paragraph vote on the resolution because it wanted to record its objections to language introduced there. The United States did not accept the description of the territories occupied by Israel in the 1967 war as “occupied Palestinian territory”, as that language could be taken to indicate sovereignty. That was a matter which both Israel and the PLO had agreed must be decided in negotiations on the final status of the territories. Similarly, while the United States Government reaffirmed its view that the 1949 Fourth Geneva Convention applied to territories occupied by Israel since 1967, it opposed the specific reference to Jerusalem in resolution 904 (1994) and would continue to oppose such reference in the future. Instead of exercising its veto, the United States had chosen to disavow that language and express its opposition by abstaining on the second and sixth preambular paragraphs. It was up to Israel and the Palestinians — not the United Nations — to negotiate in order to achieve peace on the ground. The representative also said that the provision in resolution 904 (1994) concerning measures to be taken to guarantee the safety and protection of Palestinian civilians, possibly to include a temporary international or foreign presence, was a reference to the Declaration of Principles, which provided for the possibility of such a presence, if agreed to by the parties. She concluded by stating that without the confidence that the peace process would shortly resume, positive action on resolution 904 (1994) would not have been possible.²⁶

According to the representative of the Russian Federation, resolution 904 (1994) would play an important part in the resumption of the peace process and in the implementation of all necessary measures in the interest of the prompt normalization of the situation in the occupied territories. He deplored, however, that the Council did not act with the swiftness required by the circumstances. The Russian Federation stressed that the Council’s adoption of resolution 904 (1994)

was an indispensable step, failing which the resumption of the negotiating process would be impossible. There was an understanding in principle on that point between the parties to the negotiating process, and between the sponsors thereof.²⁷

The representative of the United Kingdom regretted the delay in adopting resolution 904 (1994) that was caused by the need to resolve satisfactorily a number of very difficult and sensitive issues. Disunity in the Council suited nobody but the extremists on both sides. His Government believed that the United Nations Observer Mission in South Africa could provide a good model for an international civilian presence in the occupied territories which would usefully contribute to improving the safety and protection of the Palestinian inhabitants as foreseen in the Declaration of Principles. He stressed, however, that while an international presence could help to defuse tension, it could not be a substitute for the responsibility of the Israeli authorities to provide protection for all the inhabitants of the occupied territories.²⁸

The President, speaking in his capacity as the representative of France, noted that the Council had been prompted to meet urgently to debate the situation and to examine the measures necessary to continue the peace process, at the same time as discussions were in progress on its formal reaction, whereby it would voice its condemnation and make its decisions public. His delegation had repeatedly insisted that the Council take an official stand as soon as possible. Turning to resolution 904 (1994), he said that his Government attached particular importance to provisions recommending that measures to protect Palestinians civilians be taken, in particular through a temporary foreign or international presence in the occupied territories. Such a presence could take the form of the dispatch of civilian observers of the United Nations with a monitoring and verification mission, the details of which remained to be defined. His Government also attached importance to the provisions which urged the parties to step up the peace negotiations in order to implement the Declaration of Principles. In that regard, the question of settlements and their possible regrouping must be the subject of negotiations.²⁹

²⁹ Ibid., pp. 16-17.

The representative of Israel stated that his Government shared the Council's support for the ongoing peace process and called for the implementation of the Declaration of Principles without delay. He stressed that security must be guaranteed for all residents of the territories and that the best way to achieve that was by implementing article VIII of the Declaration of Principles which provided for the establishment of a strong police force by the Palestinian Council. The Declaration of Principles also provided for the possibility of a temporary international or foreign presence. His delegation maintained that nothing in resolution 904 (1994) prejudiced that provision in the Declaration of Principles. His delegation also noted that the reference in the resolution to Jerusalem was not compatible with the Declaration of Principles, whereby both parties had agreed to address the issue not later than the beginning of the third year of the interim period. The reference to Jerusalem was also at variance with Israel's position regarding the city's status at that time and in the future, according to which Jerusalem would remain united under Israeli sovereignty as Israel's eternal capital. Finally, Israel remained fully committed to advancing towards peace on the basis of Security Council resolutions 242 (1967) and 338 (1973), and the Declaration of Principles.³⁰

The representative of Palestine noted that the lengthy delay, which had elapsed since the massacre of 25 February 1994, had undoubtedly generated a great deal of suspicion and many questions regarding the Council's desire — or, for that matter, its ability, because of the position of one permanent member — effectively to fulfil its responsibilities with the required speed when it came to the question of Palestine and the situation in the Middle East. He said that since the massacre in Al-Khalil, the Israeli army had continued to take repressive measures, including extensive curfews and indiscriminate shooting. He also referred to the problem of the illegal presence of settlers in the occupied territory, to which there could be no solutions without the adoption of new policies aimed at the reversal of the existing situation and, at a later stage, the dismantlement of the settlements. Another issue he raised was the reference in resolution 904 (1994) to Jerusalem as part of the occupied territories since 1967 and the relationship between that reference and the Declaration of Principles. Such reference had been a consistent practice of the Council, as formulated in every single resolution relating to the Palestinian issue adopted by it, in preambular and in operative paragraphs alike. The Council's adoption of the same language in resolution 904 (1994) only reflected a continuation of that policy, and any attempt to change that language posed the danger of a change in its policy. His delegation was disappointed and deeply concerned at the United States abstention in the vote on resolution 904 (1994) and hoped that it did not signal a departure from its long-held consistent position on that issue. The speaker further stated that resolution 904 (1994) was undoubtedly an essential step forward and demonstrated that the Council had upheld its own responsibilities towards the situation in the occupied Palestinian territories, including Jerusalem. The main question was the provision of protection for the Palestinian civilians under occupation. The fact that the Council had not gone into the details of such protection did not absolve it from its responsibilities towards the implementation of the resolution in the direction defined by the Council in its resolutions, particularly resolution 681 (1990). He added that resolution 904 (1994) could not be viewed in isolation from the peace process and that it would have a positive impact on that process. However, the real and qualitative impact would take place with the implementation of the resolution, not only with its adoption. That could be achieved by means of the international presence mentioned in the resolution. He concluded by taking due note of the measures taken by the Government of Israel, which were steps in the right direction, but definitely fell short of meeting the requirements for rescuing the peace process.³¹

Deliberation of 28 February 1995
(3505th meeting)

By a letter dated 9 January 1995,³² the observer of Palestine informed the Secretary-General that Israel had continued the illegal policy and practice of building settlements in the occupied Palestinian territory and allowing more settlers to move to those settlements, in violation of the Fourth Geneva Convention of 1949 and numerous resolutions of the Council, particularly resolutions 446 (1979), 452 (1979) and 465 (1980). Such a policy and practice was also a clear attempt to create additional illegal facts which pre-empted negotiations on a final settlement between the two sides, in violation of the spirit and letter of the Declaration of Principles. The international community and the Security Council bore a special responsibility in that regard to guarantee the integrity of international law and that of the Council's own resolutions. The two sponsors of the peace process, particularly the United States, should fulfil their duties in preserving the integrity of the agreements that had been reached in a way which would guarantee the successful outcome of the process. Referring to a letter dated 6 January 1995 addressed to the Secretary-General by the Chairman of the Group of Arab States,³³ he called upon the Council to formally and urgently deal with the issue of Israeli illegal settlements and to take steps to end that threat to the peace process. He also called upon the Secretary-General to use his good offices in that regard.

³¹ Ibid., pp. 18-20.

By a letter dated 31 January 1995,³⁴ the observer of Palestine informed the Secretary-General of a decision by the Government of Israel of 24 January 1995 to approve further settlement activity in the occupied Palestinian territory. That decision came at a time when the implementation of the second stage of the Declaration of Principles had been delayed for six months, including the redeployment of Israeli forces outside populated areas in the West Bank and the election of the Palestinian Council. He reiterated that the Israeli settlements were illegal under the Fourth Geneva Convention which was applicable to all the territory occupied since 1967, including Jerusalem, as repeatedly confirmed in resolutions of the Council. Moreover, the continued settlement activity violated the letter and spirit of the agreements reached between the two sides and threatened the integrity of the peace process at a critical stage. The PLO therefore believed that it was imperative for the Council to take quick and concrete action to bring an effective end to all settlement activities by Israel in the occupied Palestinian territory, including Jerusalem.

By a letter dated 22 February 1995 addressed to the President of the Council,³⁵ the representative of Djibouti, in his capacity as Chairman of the Group of Arab States, requested that a meeting of the Council be convened urgently to consider the question of the establishment of Israeli settlements in the territories occupied since 1967, including Jerusalem, and the dangerous consequences of these activities for the Palestinian people and the Middle East peace process.

At its 3505th meeting, held on 28 February 1995 in response to the request from the representative of Djibouti, the Council included the letter from the representative of Djibouti in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representatives of Algeria, Brunei Darussalam, Djibouti, Egypt, the Islamic Republic of Iran, Israel, Japan, Jordan, Malaysia, Morocco, Pakistan, the Sudan, the Syrian Arab Republic, Tunisia, Turkey and the United Arab Emirates, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The Council also decided to invite the observer of Palestine, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. It further extended an invitation under rule 39 of its provisional rules of procedure to the Chairman of the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People and to Mr. Ansay, the observer of OIC. The President (Botswana) drew the attention of the members of the Council to several documents.³⁶

The representative of Palestine stated that the Council had a fundamental responsibility regarding the question of Israeli settlements in the occupied Palestinian territory, including the preservation of the integrity of international law and international humanitarian law and of its previous resolutions. It had the responsibility to ensure that justice was achieved by bringing a final and comprehensive end to any and all settlement activity in the occupied territories. With reference to the signing of the Declaration of Principles and the subsequent agreement on the implementation thereof, he stated that no one had imagined that the Israeli Government would actually continue carrying out its settlement policy while seeking to move forward in the peace process: the two things simply could not be reconciled. The PLO believed that any settlement activity constituted a flagrant violation of the letter and spirit of the Declaration of Principles, the Fourth Geneva Convention and relevant resolutions of the Council. What was needed was the immediate and total cessation of all settlement activity, whatever its nature or volume. The alternative could seriously undermine the peace process. The basic responsibility of the Council therefore was to guarantee the continuation and integrity of the peace process, as it had done in resolution 904 (1994). In addition to the question of settlements, the speaker referred to other Israeli practices that violated the human rights of the Palestinian people, including the repeated closures of the occupied territory, the isolation of Jerusalem and the delays in the implementation of agreements between the two sides. In that regard, he questioned the connection between the closures and Israeli security concerns and Israel's right to unilaterally and without warning close the border crossings agreed upon in the Declaration of Principles. He stated that the closure constituted an act of revenge and punishment against the Palestinian people and violated many provisions of the agreement reached by the two sides. Other outstanding issues included Israeli delays in completing implementation of all the provisions of the Gaza-Jericho Agreement and of the second phase of the Declaration of Principles. Israeli positions and practices represented a policy aimed at delaying the implementation of the agreements reached. He concluded by warning that the peace process was experiencing a real crisis. The process must be salvaged and that could be achieved only through the complete fulfilment of the parties' contractual obligations emanating from the agreements reached, including the timeframe, which was an integral part of the agreements.³⁷

Speaking in his capacity as Chairman of the Group of Arab States, the representative of Djibouti stated that the draft resolution before the Council was moderate and balanced, and was a positive reflection of the desire of the Arab Group to restart the negotiations in good faith. He noted the lack of progress in the negotiations between the Palestinians and Israeli authorities since the signing of the Declaration of Principles and stated that the Arab Group could not accept the Israeli position that, unless the Palestinian Authority demonstrated its ability to control all acts of terrorism, the terms of the agreement could not be implemented. If the issue of terrorism was to be employed to halt progress, then surely the factors contributing to it must be emphasized. There was a direct correlation between the violence in the occupied territories and the continued expansion of Jewish settlements in the West Bank. It was therefore necessary for the peace process to resume in a meaningful manner that the settlements in the West Bank be immediately frozen and these in Gaza dismantled. Contrary to the expectations implicit in the Declaration of Principles that Israeli settlements would cease during the interim period of negotiations, the ongoing confiscation of Palestinian territory pre-empted the negotiations and deliberately complicated the issues at stake. Israel's settlement policy and related activities were contrary to international law, United Nations resolutions and the Fourth Geneva Convention. He concluded by stating that for the Arab world, the issue of self-rule in Palestine needed to be resolved before there could be sustained peace elsewhere in the Middle East. At that stage, however, there was much to question regarding Israel's good faith in desiring genuine accord with the Palestinians and, by extension, with the rest of the Arab world.³⁸

The representative of Israel emphasized that the PLO initiative to debate the issue of settlements in the Security Council was incompatible with its signed commitments vis-à-vis Israel, whereby all outstanding permanent-status issues, such as settlements and Jerusalem, would be resolved in direct and bilateral negotiations at a specific time — namely, in the negotiations on permanent status, at the final stage of the process. He stated that immediately after it had been formed in July 1992, the Government of Israel had substantially changed Israel's settlement policy. No new settlements had been established in the territories since then, nor would they be. The Government had stopped allocating public resources to support the extension of existing settlements and no land had been confiscated to establish new settlements. Meanwhile, Israelis had the right to continue to build in Jerusalem, as did the Arabs. Pointing to the progress achieved over the past year towards comprehensive peace in the region, he noted that the Israel Defense Forces had already withdrawn from the Gaza Strip and the Jericho area, and the Palestinian Authority had been established there. Israel had signed three agreements with Jordan and established formal relations with Morocco and Tunisia. At the same time, opposition to the peace process had become more violent, and terrorism was at present the major obstacle to peace. The most important task, therefore, was to credibly address the growing sense in the Israeli public opinion that the Palestinians were unable to meet their commitments to fighting terrorism. While Israel believed that the Palestinian Authority also did not want terrorism to hold the peace process hostage, it was convinced that the Palestinian Authority could and should do more to respect its commitments in that respect. On the question of closure, the speaker noted that it was neither a policy nor an act of collective punishment, but rather an act of self-defence in the face of repeated terrorist attacks. Certain measures to ease the closure were under way in order to continue with Israel's policy of normalization. He concluded by stating that differences between the two sides must be addressed at the negotiating table, as agreed.³⁹

The representative of Egypt stated that in confronting the crisis facing the peace process, and in view of Israel's lack of commitment to ending settlement activities, recourse to the Security Council had become necessary in order to secure respect for the provisions of the Geneva Conventions. On the political side, the policy of establishing settlements constituted a rejection of the "land for peace" formula, which was the basis of resolution 242 (1967). On the legal side, the norms of the 1949 Fourth Geneva Convention were rules of jus cogens which could not be derogated from. No party could therefore argue that any bilateral agreement, of whatever kind, allowed it to deny the right of the international community to discharge its fundamental responsibility for guaranteeing the implementation of such basic rules. The Council must send a clear and unambiguous message that Israeli settlement activity was a grave legal violation that would abort the peace negotiations. The Government of Israel should respect its international commitments and immediately put an end to all construction and establishment of settlements.⁴⁰

The representative of France stated that continuing the expansion of the Israeli settlements in the West Bank and Jerusalem in addition to ignoring the Fourth Geneva Convention ran counter to the spirit of the Oslo Agreements and was therefore contributing to the difficulties currently being encountered in the peace process. France encouraged the Government of Israel to find a way to halt the work on expanding the settlements, which was being carried out by private interests and with private financing. At the same time, France understood that Israeli public opinion, traumatized by the resurgence of terrorism, doubted the choice made at Oslo. For that reason, it called on the Palestinian Authority to do all it could, within the framework of the responsibilities entrusted to it, to prevent and to punish acts of terrorism.⁴¹

⁴⁰ Ibid., pp. 10-12.

According to the representative of Italy, the request for a meeting of the Council was justified, procedurally and substantively. Legally, Articles 34 and 35 of the Charter and rules 2 and 3 of the Council's provisional rules of procedures provided for the President's calling a meeting at the request of any member of the Council and, moreover, any Member State might bring to the Council's attention any dispute or situation that might lead to international friction or give rise to a dispute. Politically, the Council could not ignore a request emanating from 21 Member States. The Council's debate ought not to interfere with the ongoing negotiations between Israel and the PLO, but should provide an opportunity for a constructive exchange.⁴²

The representative of the United Kingdom expressed his Government's regret that the question of settlements had had to come before the Council again. One of the major achievements of the peace process was that it had enabled the parties concerned to resolve problems by direct negotiations. The British Government's position was that the settlements were illegal, contravened the Fourth Geneva Convention and represented an obstacle to an overall peace. The Declaration of Principles defined settlements as a final status issue, which implied that the status quo would remain in the meantime. Any expansion of existing settlements thus went against the spirit of the Declaration of Principles. At the same time, his Government did not underestimate Israel's legitimate security concerns which, however, must not be allowed to hold up progress towards peace.⁴³

According to the representative of the United States, the ultimate test for activities in the Security Council must be whether the actions served the cause of peace. His Government doubted that Council activity on the present subject at that time was likely to pass that test. It would not be productive or useful for the Council to involve itself in a question that the parties had agreed to cover when they addressed permanent status issues in their negotiations. At a time when the parties were making serious efforts to find a balance that addressed both Israel's security concerns and the Palestinians' political and economic concerns, debate in the Council could only sour the atmosphere and deflect them from working together. While the United States remained actively engaged with the parties to help them work through these concerns, his delegation must oppose any activity that would only complicate efforts to spur the negotiating process. The United States Government acknowledged and respected the interests of the United Nations and the Security Council in the peace process and supported the vital work of the United Nations agencies and the United Nations Special Coordinator to improve economic conditions. It disapproved, however, of any effort to redirect the negotiating process agreed to previously by the parties. The authority of the Security Council should, however, be invoked only wisely, sparingly, and at the proper time.⁴⁴

The representative of the Russian Federation stated that the question of the expansion of settlements, primarily those around Jerusalem, had had an adverse effect on the talks on the implementation of the Declaration of Principles, according to which it was considered desirable to avoid bringing up that sort of particularly sensitive problem. His delegation condemned the violations of human rights in the occupied territories and the terrorist methods employed by certain extremist groups. It believed that it was essential for the parties to refrain from any acts that would prejudice a Palestinian-Israeli settlement and disturb the status quo. The best way of resolving the problems that had arisen was through direct dialogue between the Israelis and the Palestinians using the machinery that had been set up in the course of the peace process.⁴⁵

Speaking on behalf of the European Union, the representative of France stated that Israel's concern over security matters was quite legitimate. The Palestinian Authority must provide itself with the necessary means and take every possible step, while respecting human rights, to monitor the activities of extremists in the regions that it administered. However, the question of security must not become an obstacle to progress in the negotiations. The Israeli settlements were in contravention of The Hague and Geneva Conventions. Although the decision of the Government of Israel to put a freeze on the settlements was in accordance with the Israeli-Palestinian agreements, the authorization for new construction on the West Bank and around Jerusalem was at variance with the Declaration of Principles. The European Union appealed to the Government of Israel to find ways to settle the matter, with respect for international law and commitments solemnly undertaken. It also issued a plea for the prompt conclusion of the main discussions currently under way between the Government of Israel and the Palestinian Authority.⁴⁶

The Chairman of the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People stated that the Committee considered that the increasing expansion and consolidation of settlements created facts on ground inconsistent with Security Council resolutions 242 (1967) and 338 (1973), which the current peace process sought to implement, and seriously compromised the agreements between the two sides. The Committee appealed to the Council, to the sponsors of the peace process and to all concerned to exert their influence on the Government of Israel to end its settlement policy, as an indispensable step towards the attainment of peace. The Committee hoped that the debate in the Council would culminate in a clear demonstration of the Council's determination to find ways and means to reinvigorate the peace process.⁴⁷

The representative of OIC stated that, instead of taking steps that would contribute to a confidence-building atmosphere, and begin reversing their expansionist settlement policies, the Israeli authorities were continuing with their policy of establishing settlements as well as expanding existing ones in the occupied territories, in flagrant violation of the relevant international resolutions. The Seventh Islamic Summit Conference in Casablanca had adopted several resolutions calling, inter alia, for the dismantling of the settlements already established and for a halt to further settlements in occupied Palestinian and Arab territories. The States members of OIC believed that by adopting a new series of measures of determination, the Council could help all the parties involved in the peace process, but it could especially assist Israel to take the required bold measures conducive to accomplishing a lasting peace in the region.⁴⁸

The representative of Lebanon stated that there could be no doubt that the crisis in which the peace process found itself derived from Israel's insistence on a policy aimed at maintaining its hold over the territories and maintaining peace at the same time. Currently, Israel was imposing a sea blockade against several ports in Lebanon and was also engaged in continuing aggression through the use of weapons and air power. The continuation of those violations of Lebanese territorial integrity was part of an Israeli practice aimed at imposing its hegemony over its neighbours and at totally rejecting resolution 425 (1978). Noting that the Israeli settlement policy in the Palestinian territories and the explosive situation in southern Lebanon were a major threat to the peace process, he hoped to see the Council play a decisive role by taking the necessary measures to put an end to that situation.⁴⁹

The representative of Palestine expressed regret at the fact that, despite serious efforts made to ensure that the Council would adopt clear and specific measures on the matter before it, such an outcome was not achieved for reasons to do with the situation in the Council and probably with the position of one of its permanent members. The PLO understood that the sponsors of the process, particularly the United States, planned to intensify their efforts to achieve that result. The speaker hoped for an end to settlements and for the implementation of the agreements between the two sides. However, if the ongoing efforts did not yield tangible results, the PLO would have to turn once again to the Council.⁵⁰

Other speakers who participated in the debate emphasized that Israeli settlement activities in the occupied territories had an adverse effect on the peace process, violated the Fourth Geneva Convention and contravened Security Council resolutions as well as the Declaration of Principles.⁵¹ While some representatives saw bilateral negotiations between the parties as the appropriate channel for solving issues such as the settlements,⁵² others stressed the role of the Security Council and its responsibilities in the peace process and called upon the Council to adopt practical measures.⁵³

Decision of 17 May 1995 (3538th meeting):
rejection of a draft resolution

By a letter dated 28 April 1995,⁵⁴ the observer of Palestine informed the Secretary-General that the Government of Israel had declared confiscation orders in respect of 53 hectares of Palestinian land within the area of illegally annexed East Jerusalem. The Government of Israel had also declared that the land would be appropriated to build further illegal settlements. The letter noted that such an action flagrantly violated international humanitarian law and relevant Security Council resolutions as well as the Declaration of Principles, endangered negotiations and represented a clear attempt to prejudge their outcome. The letter also referred to other illegal actions by the Israeli authorities in and around Jerusalem, including the continuing seizure and closure of the city, Israeli excavations which threatened the integrity and foundations of the Al-Aqsa mosque, and attacks and attempts by illegal settlers and religious fanatics to impose their presence on and overtake that area. The PLO called upon the Council to take urgent measures to redress that grave situation and to bring an end to the above-mentioned Israeli violations. The Council had the duty to order the Israeli authorities to desist from taking any further illegal measures and to rescind the declared confiscation orders.

By a letter dated 8 May 1995 addressed to the President of the Council,⁵⁵ the representatives of Morocco and the United Arab Emirates requested that an urgent meeting of the Council be convened to discuss the situation in the occupied Arab territories, as well as to take the necessary measures for revocation of the recent Israeli confiscation orders in respect of Palestinian land situated in the area of East Jerusalem. By a letter of the same date addressed to the President of the Council,⁵⁶ the representative of Morocco, in his capacity as Chairman of the Islamic Group at the United Nations, conveyed the Islamic Group's position towards the confiscation orders of the Government of Israel and its announcement that such land was to be allocated for building more Israeli settlements, in contravention of international law and the relevant resolutions of the Council. He also informed the Council that, at a meeting on 4 May 1995, the Islamic Group had decided to request an urgent meeting of the Council to discuss the grave situation concerning Jerusalem.

At its 3536th meeting, held on 12 and 15 May 1995 in response to the request of the representatives of Morocco and the United Arab Emirates, the Council included the letters of 8 May 1995 in its agenda. The Council continued its consideration of the item at its 3538th meeting, on 17 May 1995.

The Council invited the following, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote: the representatives of Algeria, Australia, Bangladesh, Canada, Cuba, Djibouti, Egypt, Iraq, Israel, the Islamic Republic of Iran, Japan, Jordan, Kuwait, Lebanon, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Malaysia, Morocco, Pakistan, Qatar, Saudi Arabia, the Sudan, the Syrian Arab Republic, Tunisia, Turkey and the United Arab Emirates. The Council also invited the observer of Palestine, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. It further extended an invitation under rule 39 of its provisional rules of procedure to the Acting Chairman of the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People. The President (France) drew the attention of the members of the Council to several documents.⁵⁷

The representative of Palestine stated that the ordering by the Israeli authorities of the confiscation of 53 hectares of land located in the area of occupied East Jerusalem constituted a flagrant violation of the relevant resolutions of the Council and of the Fourth Geneva Convention, as well as of the Declaration of Principles. Reviewing the stages through which the central issue of Jerusalem had gone, both within the United Nations and outside, he contended that Israel's actions had all been done in spite of the clear positions taken by the international community, in defiance of the United Nations and in violation of relevant resolutions of the Council, including resolutions 250 (1968), 252 (1968), 267 (1969), 271 (1969), 298 (1971), 476 (1980), 478 (1980) and 672 (1990). He recalled that, in the Declaration of Principles, the two parties had agreed on a transitional period and to postpone negotiations on several issues, including Jerusalem, until the second phase. As such, they had also agreed to negotiate the issue of Jerusalem within a specific timeframe. The minimum level of compliance with the contractual obligations of the parties and negotiation in good faith required that the parties did not make changes on the ground that prejudged or influenced the results of the negotiations. Neither one of the parties should undertake hostile actions which caused extreme damage to the other side. He stated that Israel had to understand that the Declaration of Principles had been reached between two parties representing two equal peoples and therefore the rights and aspirations of both of them should be respected, not only those of one side at the expense of the other. The PLO believed that the sponsors of the peace process, especially the United States, had to intensify their efforts to rescue the process and to guarantee its progress. What was required was that the Council assumed its duty to guarantee the rescinding of the Israeli confiscation orders through the adoption of a clear resolution. The representative expressed the hope that the Council would succeed in assuming its responsibilities, in contrast to its failure to do so on 28 February 1995. Referring to attempts in the United

States Congress to move the American embassy in Israel to Jerusalem, he warned that the PLO response would in part be within the framework of the United Nations system, including the Security Council and the International Court of Justice, to which it would turn for an advisory opinion or some other form of involvement.⁵⁸

The representative of the United Arab Emirates described the measures adopted by the Government of Israel in the occupied Palestinian territories as illegitimate and expansionist, aimed at bringing about radical demographic change and forcing the international community to deal with such practices as a fait accompli, based on force alone. That was done without any legal basis and to gain further territory by expropriating Arab land and establishing settlements at the expense of the legitimate rights of the Arab-Palestinian people in their homeland. Referring to the position of the League of Arab States, he called upon the Council to consider the following measures: first, there should be an international condemnation of the Government of Israel's decision to confiscate additional Palestinian land in Al-Quds (Jerusalem) and outside the city; second, Israel should be obliged to rescind the decision to confiscate that land, end its settlement policies and plans, dismantle its existing settlements, stop closing off the city and end all Israeli excavations which threatened the foundations of Al-Aqsa mosque; third, none of the changes made by Israel to the legal status, demographic structure or geographical dimensions of Al-Quds should be recognized and any claims that Al-Quds is the eternal capital of Israel should be rejected; and fourth, the Arab and Palestinian presence should be supported, as should their institutions in Al-Quds, and international security measures should be taken to protect Arab and Palestinian territories. The United Arab Emirates hoped that the Council would adopt the draft resolution before it which provided for appropriate machinery to deal with decisions on settlement and confiscation in Al-Quds.⁵⁹

The representative of Israel said that the recent decision to "expropriate, not to confiscate, land for construction in Jerusalem — not for settlements" was based on Israel's long-standing policy to ensure that development in Jerusalem kept pace with the changes that were a natural feature of any living city. Construction and development for all residents had always been regular features of Jerusalem life and would continue to be in the future. It was inconceivable that the people of Jerusalem — Jews and Arabs alike — should be deprived of sufficient schools, roads, housing, workplaces, etc. He contended that there was no contradiction between Israel's policy and bilateral agreements it had signed, including the Declaration of Principles. Israel remained committed to the Declaration, which contained no reference to any prohibition of development activity in Jerusalem and in which it was agreed that permanent status issues would be negotiated by the parties themselves at a later stage. Neither was there any contradiction between the peace process and continued development in Jerusalem for the benefit of all its residents. Any difference on the matter should be appropriately addressed in the framework of the bilateral negotiations. He also recalled that Israel and the PLO had agreed that differences and disputes arising out of the application or the interpretation of the agreements should be settled between the parties themselves according to an agreed process. Accordingly, Israel believed that any attempts to address the issue outside the agreed-upon framework contradicted the letter and spirit of the agreements signed by Israel and the PLO and the principles of the peace process. It therefore called upon Council members not to take any action on the matter.⁶⁰

The representative of the Russian Federation noted that his delegation was among those that supported the request for a meeting of the Council on that matter. According to the Declaration of Principles, the future of Jerusalem was to be the subject of future negotiations on the final status of the Palestinian territories. Until then, any action to alter the status quo in Jerusalem could be viewed only as contravening the spirit of the Palestinian-Israeli agreements and of the peace process as a whole. His delegation understood that the necessary legal machinery for Israel's reconsideration of the confiscation order did exist and hoped that the Government of Israel would reconsider its view on the issue of confiscating Palestinian lands in Jerusalem.⁶¹

The representative of the United States said that, in regard to the Israeli notice to expropriate land in the Jerusalem area, his Government had publicly stated that such actions were not particularly helpful and that it was difficult to see how they promoted the peace process. However, the United States did not believe that the Security Council was the appropriate forum for dealing with the issue, which was for the parties to address. Israel and the Palestinians were engaged in important negotiations to implement the next stage of the Declaration of Principles. Debate in the Council on issues which were for the parties to address would only distract attention from their efforts and have a negative impact on the process. It was therefore incumbent on Council members that they not undercut the peace process with a divisive debate or hasty action. On the question of the American embassy in Israel, he stated that although the Palestinian Observer had correctly noted the position of the United States Government with regard to legislation before Congress, it was regrettable that an issue internal to United States decision-making was brought into the debate in a threatening and distorted manner.⁶²

Speaking on behalf of the European Union and Bulgaria, the Czech Republic, Hungary, Poland, Romania and Slovakia, the President stated that the expropriation decision of the Israeli authorities was contrary to the spirit of the Declaration of Principles and was likely to jeopardize the peace process. That decision was an act whereby the public authority demonstrated the sovereignty that it claimed. The Israeli authorities thereby seemed to reaffirm their de facto hold on Jerusalem and blatantly to modify the status quo in that city, whereas the spirit of the Declaration of Principles was to maintain the situation as it stood so long as negotiations on the final settlement had not been concluded. The European Union had also repeatedly held that the settlements were illegal under international law, particularly under the Fourth Geneva Convention, and jeopardized the peace process. It was regrettable that the expropriations that were announced were designed to develop such settlements. The European Union therefore called upon the Government of Israel to reverse its decision and to refrain in the future from taking any such measures. The speaker further noted that it was unfortunate that the question could not be resolved directly by the parties and had to be brought before the Council.

However, the fact that the parties had agreed that certain items should be dealt with during the discussions on the final settlement did not mean that international law no longer applied to those issues nor that the serious developments that affected them should not be brought up by the international community.⁶³

The representative of Egypt stated that the international community, through the Security Council, must reaffirm the position it had always held, that the Israeli measures intended to alter the status of Arab Jerusalem were inadmissible. He pointed out that Israel had no right under resolution 478 (1980) to annex Jerusalem and urged all States not to send diplomatic delegations to Jerusalem. He recalled that the Ministerial Conference of the League of Arab States, which had met on 6 May 1995, had decided to demand, based on international law and on the relevant Security Council resolutions, that the Security Council declare the Israeli confiscation order illegal and that Israel must rescind its decision to expropriate Arab territories in Jerusalem and in other areas so as to put an end to Israel's annexationist programmes and plans, the encirclement of the city and the diggings that were endangering the foundations of Al-Aqsa mosque. The Conference also urged the Council to reaffirm the need for security measures to be taken to protect the Palestinian Arab territories, while still granting Jerusalem its special status.⁶⁴

The Acting Chairman of the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People said that the Committee considered that the confiscation of land in East Jerusalem and the increasing expansion and consolidation of settlements created a de facto situation inconsistent with Security Council resolutions 242 (1967) and 338 (1973) and seriously compromised the agreements between Israel and the PLO. The Committee appealed to the Council, to the sponsors of the peace process and to all concerned to exert their influence on the Government of Israel to desist from taking any further measures that undermined the peace process and to rescind its decision to confiscate Palestinian land in East Jerusalem and end its settlement policy. It also hoped that the debate would culminate in a clear demonstration of the Council's determination to find ways and means to reinvigorate the peace process.⁶⁵

Other speakers who participated in the debate stressed that the Israeli Government's expropriation order violated international law, the Fourth Geneva Convention, the Charter and relevant resolutions of the Council, and ran contrary to the spirit of the peace process, including the Declaration of Principles. They called upon Israel to reconsider its decision.⁶⁶ Some representatives stressed the Council's responsibility to consider the matter and take action on it.⁶⁷

At the 3538th meeting, on 17 May 1995, the President drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution submitted by Botswana, Honduras, Indonesia, Nigeria, Oman and Rwanda.⁶⁸ Under the draft resolution, in its preambular part, the Council, inter alia, would have reaffirmed its previous resolutions on the status of Jerusalem; expressed concern over the recent declaration of Israeli expropriation orders of 53 hectares of land in East Jerusalem; reaffirmed the applicability of the Fourth Geneva Convention to all territories occupied by Israel since 1967, including Jerusalem; and expressed its awareness of the negative impact of the expropriation on the Middle East peace process and that Israel and the PLO agreed in the Declaration of Principles to postpone negotiations on final status issues, including Jerusalem, until the second stage of the peace process. In the operative part of the draft resolution, the Council would have (i) confirmed that the expropriation of land by Israel, the occupying Power, in East Jerusalem, was invalid and in violation of its relevant resolutions and the provisions of the Fourth Geneva Convention; (ii) called upon the Government of Israel to rescind the expropriation orders and to refrain from such action in the future; (iii) expressed its full support for the Middle East peace process and its achievements, including the Declaration of Principles as well as the following implementation agreements; and (iv) urged the parties to adhere to the provisions of the agreements reached and to follow up with the full implementation of these agreements.

Speaking before the vote, the representative of Oman said that the draft resolution before the Council was the fruit of the efforts made and extensive consultations conducted by the Non-Aligned Movement caucus. He believed that the Council's adoption of the draft resolution accorded with the Council's responsibility, with the Charter and with the relevant Security Council resolutions. Furthermore, it would give a positive impetus to the ongoing peace process. On the other hand, the Council's inability to take action in that respect, despite the calls of the more than 40 nations that participated in the general debate, would raise doubts about the credibility and the international legitimacy of the relevant resolutions and cast a shadow over future negotiations in the peace process in the region.⁶⁹

The representative of the Russian Federation stated that the question of Jerusalem had to be the subject of future negotiations on the final status of the Palestinian territories, as provided for in the Declaration of Principles. Until then, any action to alter the status quo in Jerusalem could not be considered otherwise than as contravening the spirit of the Palestinian-Israeli agreements and the peace process as a whole. Although the best possible course would have been to achieve a consensus reaction to Israel's actions in the form of a statement by the President, the Russian Federation would support the draft resolution, with which it fully concurred.⁷⁰

The representative of the Czech Republic said that his delegation took note of the decision by the Government of Israel of 14 May 1995 according to which it had no intention of carrying out additional expropriations of land in East Jerusalem. It would have preferred that decision to be reflected in the draft resolution. While the Declaration of Principles envisaged resolving issues such as that one between the parties themselves, it did not prevent the Council from dealing with a matter that violated the Declaration. It was therefore proper to debate the issue in the Council and to vote on the draft resolution.⁷¹

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and received 14 votes in favour and 1 against (United States), and was not adopted, owing to the negative vote of a permanent member of the Council.

After the vote, the representative of the United States stated that she had cast a veto on an issue of principle for the United States. The only path to achieve a just, lasting and comprehensive peace in the Middle East was direct talks between the parties. Her Government was compelled to oppose the draft resolution because the Council sought to declare itself on the permanent-status issue of Jerusalem and thus violated that principle. Those issues had to be resolved by the parties, with the support of the international community, but without its interference. The Council was not able — and should not seek — to try to resolve sensitive issues in the Middle East peace process. She stressed that at that point, progress towards peace in the Middle East did not depend on what the United Nations did, but on what the parties agreed to. While it was necessary and appropriate that the Council, the General Assembly and Member States continue to express support for the Middle East peace process and for the Declaration of Principles, passage of the draft resolution would have had the Council intrude upon the agreed political process set out in the Declaration of Principles, which would have yielded no positive result. The United States had expressed the view that the Israeli expropriation notice was unhelpful and clearly did not move the peace process in the right direction. The international community had an important role to play in supporting the efforts of the parties to the Middle East process. But to be effective, the support of the international community must also be discreet, maintaining a certain distance from the details of the negotiations. She stressed that the United States did not vote against the draft resolution because it supported the Israeli decision on land expropriation, for it did not. Its vote was a result of its consistent position regarding what it could and could not support in the Council. She reiterated that her Government would not agree to a resolution that prejudged or prejudiced the outcome of negotiations over such a sensitive issue as Jerusalem. Nor would it agree to any Council action that overstepped the Council's appropriate role as supporter of the negotiations aimed at achieving a lasting settlement to the conflict.⁷²

⁷¹ Ibid., pp. 5-6.

The representative of the United Kingdom expressed the view that the draft resolution represented a calm but clear statement of the legal position. Moreover, the text avoided any reference to wider issues, apart from a clear declaration of support for the peace process. While he understood the attachment to Jerusalem of the Israeli people, he believed that the Government of Israel should recognize that others felt equally strongly about the city, and should refrain from taking actions which sought to change the status quo on that most sensitive of all issues before the conclusion of the final-status negotiations. His delegation regretted that that issue had caused divisions in the Council and did not believe that would be helpful to the peace process. The fact that all members of the Council had expressed concern about the Israeli expropriation orders, however, was an important message for the Government of Israel and his delegation hoped that it would consider its future actions carefully in the light of it.⁷³

The representative of China noted that, although the draft resolution had not been adopted, the Government of Israel should understand that the fact that there were 14 votes in favour of the draft text forcefully demonstrated that its decision to confiscate land in East Jerusalem was wrong and could not be accepted by the international community or the Security Council.⁷⁴

The representative of Israel reaffirmed that the issue before the Council was for the parties to deal with, based on the Declaration of Principles. From the outset, Israel maintained that the Council was not the appropriate forum in which to address that issue and that, accordingly, it should take no action in that regard. Israel therefore considered that the outcome of the Council's deliberations was appropriate.⁷⁵

The representative of Palestine noted that the overwhelming support for the draft resolution by 14 Council members was a genuine demonstration of the clear and decisive position of the international community against the illegal Israeli action to confiscate land in occupied East Jerusalem. Nevertheless, the Council was intentionally and by coercion prevented from expressing itself and from assuming its duties and implementing its responsibilities — responsibilities which remained in place either within or without the peace process. The PLO did not accept the position of the United States, which seemed to consider that the existence of the peace process would marginalize the Council's role and responsibilities regarding the situation in the Middle East. The use by the United States of its right of veto represented a clear backing of the illegal Israeli action and an attempt to legalize it, and would only complicate the peace process in so far as it ran counter to the foundations of the process and to the Palestinian participation therein. He called upon the President to follow up the matter and to continue to fulfil his obligations as President in order to ensure that the Israeli confiscation orders were rescinded.⁷⁶

26. The situation in the Republic of Yemen

Initial proceedings

Decision of 1 June 1994 (3386th meeting): resolution 924 (1994)

By a letter dated 27 May 1994 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹ the representatives of Bahrain, Egypt, Kuwait, Oman, Saudi Arabia and the United Arab Emirates requested that the Council be convened to discuss the situation in Yemen and the resulting loss of civilian lives. By a letter dated 29 May 1994 addressed to the President of the Security Council,² the representative of Qatar made the same request.

By a letter dated 31 May 1994 addressed to the President of the Security Council,³ the representative of Yemen stated that his Government considered the request to convene a meeting of the Security Council to discuss the situation in Yemen to be interference in its internal affairs, contrary to Article 2 (7) of the Charter of the United Nations.

At its 3386th meeting, on 1 June 1994, the Council included in its agenda the item entitled "The situation in the Republic of Yemen". Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representatives of Bahrain, Egypt, Kuwait, Qatar, Saudi Arabia, the United Arab Emirates and Yemen, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (Oman) then drew the attention of the Council members to the text of a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations,⁴ and to several other documents.⁵

Speaking before the vote, the representative of China expressed anxiety over the developments taking place in Yemen. He urged those concerned to cease fighting and to resume negotiations as soon as possible.

China had always maintained that all conflicts should be settled peacefully through negotiation. He stated that, based on that consistent position, the Chinese delegation would vote in favour of the draft resolution. Welcoming the efforts made by the countries concerned in the region, the Gulf Cooperation Council and the League of Arab States, the speaker hoped that they would continue to play an active role of mediation. He also emphasized that, in its consideration of any issue of concern, the Security Council should respect the relevant views of the countries or parties concerned. It was the view of his delegation that the consideration of the situation of the Republic of Yemen by the Council under the current special circumstances should not constitute a precedent for the handling of other similar issues.⁶

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 924 (1994), which reads:

The Security Council,

Having considered the situation in the Republic of Yemen,

Having regard to the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations,

Deeply concerned at the tragic death of innocent civilians,

Appreciating the efforts of the League of Arab States, the Gulf Cooperation Council, the Organization of the Islamic Conference, the neighbouring States and other concerned States to contribute to a peaceful resolution of the conflict and to ensure peace and stability in the Republic of Yemen,

Considering that the continuance of the situation could endanger peace and security in the region,

1. Calls for an immediate ceasefire;
2. Urges an immediate cessation of the supply of arms and other materiel which might contribute to the continuation of the conflict;
3. Reminds all concerned that their political differences cannot be resolved through the use of force, and urges them to return immediately to negotiations which will permit a peaceful resolution of their differences and a restoration of peace and stability;
4. Requests the Secretary-General to send a fact-finding mission to the area as soon as practicable to assess

Decision of 29 June 1994 (3394th meeting):
resolution 931 (1994)

On 27 June 1994, pursuant to resolution 924 (1993), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the situation in Yemen,⁷ in which he informed the Council that a fact-finding mission, led by his Special Envoy,⁸ had visited Yemen from 8 to 19 June 1994. The mission had also travelled to Saudi Arabia, Oman, the United Arab Emirates, Qatar, Jordan and Egypt. The Secretary-General noted that his Special Envoy had been well received by both parties, which had repeatedly expressed support for his mission. The Acting Prime Minister of Yemen had indicated that, despite his country's reservation that the Security Council had discussed the internal situation of his country, which might set a grave precedent, he nevertheless welcomed the adoption by the Council of resolution 924 (1994). He believed that the resolution had affirmed legitimacy within the framework of the Republic of Yemen and linked the ceasefire with a number of steps that his country regarded as an integral part of the resolution. There was a general consensus among the parties that (a) a ceasefire was necessary and urgent; (b) a mechanism to supervise the ceasefire should be organized and; (c) once the ceasefire was effective, dialogue should resume, with the help of the Secretary-General and his Special Envoy. With respect to the mechanism for supervising the ceasefire, both sides had already agreed that it should be a joint commission, that it should include a number of officers from both sides, and that it would involve the participation of representatives from Jordan and Oman as well as the military attachés of France and the United States in Sana'a. However, there were still differences between the two sides concerning representation from other countries. The Secretary-General further noted that it was a matter of serious concern that, almost four weeks after the adoption of resolution 924 (1994), fighting had not stopped in Yemen and repeated commitments to the ceasefire had not been honoured. Indeed, fighting had intensified in Aden with increased casualties. A major humanitarian crisis was imminent unless a political solution was found or a ceasefire was put into force as soon as possible. Neighbouring countries were following developments in Yemen with growing concern. While they had no intention of interfering in the internal affairs of their neighbours, they considered the situation to be a serious threat to peace and security in the region and the continuation of the fighting to be unacceptable.

The Secretary-General, stressing the importance of the call made in resolution 924 (1994) concerning the delivery of arms to the warring parties, stated that the most urgent task ahead was to put an end to the fighting and to start providing urgent aid to the people who needed it. He suggested that the Security Council might wish to make it clear that the existing state of affairs could not be tolerated, that the ceasefire needed to enter into force without delay and that the two parties needed to be urgently requested to cooperate with his Special Envoy in the establishment, within the following few days, of the mechanism to supervise the ceasefire.

The Secretary-General also stated that, should the parties so desire, he would be prepared to recommend to the Council the deployment of United Nations military observers, once a ceasefire was in place. The observers could supplement whatever supervisory mechanism might be agreed upon between the two parties. He also suggested that the Council might request the parties to start immediately after a dialogue, which his Special Envoy could organize in consultation with them, at a mutually agreed venue such as Geneva.

At its 3394th meeting, on 29 June 1994, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representative of Yemen, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (Oman) drew the attention of the Council members to the report of the Secretary-

General, to the text of a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations,⁹ and to several other documents.¹⁰

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 931 (1994), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolution 924 (1994) of 1 June 1994 on the situation in the Republic of Yemen,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 27 June 1994 on the fact-finding mission to Yemen,

Welcoming the efforts of the Secretary-General, his Special Envoy and the League of Arab States, Strongly supporting the call of the Secretary-General for an immediate and complete halt to the shelling of the city of Aden, and condemning the failure to heed this call,

Deeply disturbed that no ceasefire has been implemented or sustained despite several ceasefire declarations by both sides,

Deeply concerned at the situation in Yemen and, in particular, the deteriorating humanitarian situation in many parts of the country,

Alarmed by reports of the continuing provision of arms and other materiel,

1. Reiterates its call for an immediate ceasefire;

2. Stresses the importance of the existence and effective implementation of a ceasefire covering all ground, naval and air operations, including provisions on the positioning of heavy weapons out of range of Aden;

3. Strongly deplores the infliction of civilian casualties and destruction resulting from the continuing military assault on Aden;

4. Requests the Secretary-General and his Special Envoy to continue talks under their auspices with all concerned, with a view to implementing a durable ceasefire and to the possible establishment of a mechanism acceptable to both sides, preferably involving countries of the region, to monitor, encourage respect for, help to prevent violations of the ceasefire and report to the Secretary-General;

5. Reiterates its call for an immediate cessation of the supply of arms and other materiel;

6. Reiterates that political differences cannot be resolved through the use of force, deeply regrets the failure of all concerned to resume their political dialogue and urges them to do so immediately and without preconditions, thus permitting a peaceful resolution of their differences and the restoration of peace and stability, and requests the Secretary-General and his Special Envoy to examine appropriate ways of facilitating these aims;

7. Expresses its deep concern at the humanitarian situation resulting from the conflict, requests the Secretary-General to use the resources at his disposal, including those of the relevant United Nations agencies, to address urgently the needs of those affected by the conflict, in particular the inhabitants of Aden and those displaced by the conflict, and urges all concerned to provide humanitarian access and facilitate the distribution of relief supplies to those in need wherever they may be located;

8. Requests the Secretary-General to provide a progress report to the Council on the implementation of the present resolution as soon as possible and in any event within fifteen days of the adoption of the present resolution;

9. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of France stated that, in adopting a new resolution, the Security Council had affirmed its determination to contribute to the peaceful settlement of a dispute that was "unleashing a humanitarian disaster and shaking the foundations of regional security". That was why the Council was stressing the immediate cessation of military operations, in particular the shelling of Aden, and the distribution of urgently needed aid. It had also sought to respect the freedom of action of the Secretary-General and of the parties by remaining as open as possible in defining the ceasefire monitoring mechanism. On that point, it had limited itself to extending the mandate of the Secretary-General and his Special Envoy and to requesting them to define, in agreement with the parties, a credible mechanism. Accordingly, the mechanism would be under United Nations auspices, but it would be up to the Secretary-General, in agreement with the interested parties, to choose the concrete manifestations of that general principle. Noting that the Secretary-General and his Special Envoy were also requested to facilitate the resumption of political dialogue in Yemen, the speaker stated that there was no military solution to the crisis. It was for the people of Yemen to redefine the conditions of their coexistence. His delegation also stressed the importance of the provision of the resolution by which the Council requested an immediate cessation of the supply of arms and other materiel. The United Nations would continue to lend the Yemenis its support, but they needed to refrain from fighting and to resume dialogue.¹¹

The representative of the United Kingdom also believed that the United Nations should take urgent steps to address the deteriorating humanitarian situation in Yemen, and in particular in Aden. He hoped that the adoption of the resolution by the Council would demonstrate to the parties the seriousness with which the international community viewed the situation and that they would draw the appropriate conclusions. The best outcome of all would be if those concerned could reach immediate agreement on three vital points — a ceasefire, the mechanism to sustain it and a resumed political dialogue — and could then set about implementing those agreements.¹²

The representative of the United States stated that those responsible for the conflict needed to seek a resolution of their differences through political dialogue and negotiation. The United States called for a ceasefire and supported the concept of a mutually agreed mechanism of supervision reporting to the Secretary-General. The speaker also underscored that the United Nations was facing a pressing financial situation, at a time of greatly increased peacekeeping efforts throughout the world. The United States looked to the nations closest to the conflict in Yemen, which had the greatest stake in resolving the conflict, as well as to others who might be interested, to offer on a voluntary basis the resources needed to implement such a mechanism.¹³

The representative of the Russian Federation stated that his country strongly supported the efforts undertaken by the world community, primarily in the Security Council, with a view to normalizing the situation in Yemen, restoring a peaceful dialogue and establishing an appropriate mechanism for monitoring the ceasefire. He reported that on that same day, in Moscow, a tripartite meeting had been held between the Ministers for Foreign Affairs of the Russian Federation and the Republic of Yemen, and a member of the Southern Yemen leadership, on the initiative of the Russian Government and on the request of the two parties. Attention had focused on the question of a ceasefire. All participants had agreed that the conflict could not be solved militarily and that it was essential to reach a political settlement on the basis of resolution 924 (1994). It had also been agreed that contacts would continue, with Russian mediation and facilitation.¹⁴

The President, speaking in his capacity as the representative of Oman, stated that his country hoped that the two parties could resolve their differences through dialogue and peaceful negotiations. Oman deeply regretted the continuation of the war, which had brought dangerous and negative consequences, not only for Yemen, but for the region as a whole. The speaker recalled that his country had joined five other countries of the region in calling for the convening of a meeting of the Security Council to address the situation in Yemen. That meeting had culminated in the adoption of resolution 924 (1994), calling for an immediate ceasefire and requesting the parties to go back to the negotiating table, as the most appropriate means of resolving their differences. Oman believed that the resolution was very balanced in its demands and that, if it had been implemented fully by the parties, it could have helped the parties to settle their differences. In the resolution just adopted, the Council reiterated the same calls as those contained in resolution 924 (1994), and, given the worsening of the situation and the intensification of the war, especially the random shelling of Aden, it also expressed its condemnation and called for the withdrawal of the forces surrounding Aden. It also requested the Secretary-General and his Special Envoy to continue their mediation between the parties, with a view to implementing a durable ceasefire and establishing a mechanism for its supervision. He called upon all leaders of Yemen to cooperate with the Secretary-General and his special envoy in the implementation of that resolution.¹⁵

Decision of 30 June 1994 (3396th meeting):
statement by the President

At its 3396th meeting, on 30 June 1994, the Council resumed its consideration of the situation in the Republic of Yemen. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representative of Yemen, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (Oman) then drew the attention of the Council members to a letter dated 30 June 1994 from the representative of the Russian Federation addressed to the Secretary-

General,¹⁶ transmitting the text of the agreement on a ceasefire in the Republic of Yemen, signed in Moscow on 30 June 1994, as well as to a letter dated 30 June 1994 from the representative of Yemen addressed to the President of the Security Council.¹⁷

He then stated that, after consultations among members of the Security Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:¹⁸

The Security Council reaffirms its resolutions 924 (1994) of 1 June 1994 and 931 (1994) of 29 June 1994 on the situation in the Republic of Yemen.

The Council welcomes the agreement on the ceasefire signed by both sides in Moscow on 30 June 1994, which was achieved through the mediation of the Minister for Foreign Affairs of the Russian Federation. The Council demands that all concerned fully implement that agreement.

The Council welcomes the efforts of the international community, including those of the Secretary-General and his Special Envoy, the neighbouring countries and the League of Arab States, as well as those of States Members of the United Nations, aimed at helping the parties to achieve and implement a durable ceasefire and to prevent violations of the ceasefire.

The Council further demands that both sides fully implement the provisions of Council resolutions 924 (1994) and 931 (1994), and urges all concerned to cooperate fully with the Secretary-General and his Special Envoy, in particular for the possible establishment of a mechanism to sustain the ceasefire.

The Council remains deeply concerned at the situation in the Republic of Yemen and in particular the deteriorating humanitarian situation in Aden.

The Council will remain actively seized of the matter.

Decision of 18 July 1994: letter from the President to the Secretary-General

On 12 July 1994, pursuant to resolution 931 (1993), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the situation in Yemen.¹⁹ The report described the progress achieved in the resolution of the conflict in Yemen.

The Secretary-General reported that on 7 July 1994 he had been handed a letter from the Acting Prime Minister of the Republic of Yemen in which the authorities in Sana'a had committed themselves to an immediate cessation of all military activities and a comprehensive amnesty, compensation for lost property and war victims, continuation of respect for democracy and human rights and continuation of national dialogue and promotion of close cooperation with the States in the region. On 8 July 1994, the other side had delivered a letter stating that hostile actions were still being conducted by Sana'a and stressing the necessity, inter alia, to implement Security Council resolutions 924 (1994) and 931 (1994) and effectively cease all military activities and to start negotiations between the two sides under the auspices of the Special Envoy of the Secretary-General. On 9 July 1994, both parties had met in the presence of his Special Envoy and had agreed to keep in contact through him.

The Secretary-General further reported that while the phase of an all-out war seemed to have ended, there had, however, been disturbing reports of looting and lawlessness. The war had resulted in loss of life and property, and severe damage upon the infrastructure of the country. Firm action was urgently needed to put an end to such acts. The Secretary-General noted that the people of Yemen expected the international community, through international and regional organizations, as well as through bilateral cooperation, to extend a helping hand to them as they embarked on reconstruction. The international community, for its part, expected the Yemeni leaders to address seriously and urgently the problems that lay at the root of the crisis, and to ensure a lasting solution and credible stability. Such a solution would be achieved only through political dialogue, as had been urgently requested by resolutions 924 (1994) and 931 (1994). In conclusion, the Secretary-General stated that, in the positions publicly proclaimed by the two parties and communicated to the United Nations, there was enough common ground to permit such a dialogue to be initiated. He remained ready to use his good offices and to extend all possible help and cooperation as soon as the two parties agreed to his playing that role.

By a letter dated 18 July 1994,²⁰ the President of the Security Council informed the Secretary-General of the following:

I have the honour to refer to your report of 12 July 1994 on the situation in Yemen. The members of the Security Council welcome this report and are grateful to you and your Special Envoy for your efforts pursuant to Council resolutions 924 (1994) of 1 June 1994 and 931 (1994) of 29 June 1994.

The members of the Council agree that the cessation of fighting in the Republic of Yemen, in itself, will not bring a lasting solution to the crisis in that country and that it is essential to start a process of political dialogue between the parties.

The members of the Council expect the Government of the Republic of Yemen to fulfil the commitments and decisions contained in the letter from the Acting Prime Minister, referred to in paragraph 15 of your report, in accordance with resolutions 924 (1994) and 931 (1994), which have been accepted by the Government of the Republic of Yemen, and international humanitarian law. Refugees and displaced persons must be allowed to return in safety to their homes.

The members of the Council are concerned at reports of continuing looting in Aden. They agree that firm action is urgently needed to put an end to such acts. They also remain concerned at the humanitarian situation in the Republic of Yemen and look forward to the United Nations inter-agency assessment of the humanitarian needs of the country.

The members of the Council welcome your readiness to continue to use your good offices, including through your Special Envoy, to bring about reconciliation in Yemen and to extend all possible help and cooperation, and urge the parties to cooperate fully with you to this end.

A. An agenda for peace: preventive diplomacy, peacemaking and peacekeeping

Decision of 28 January 1993 (3166th meeting): statement by the President

At its 3166th meeting, on 28 January 1993, the Security Council included in its agenda the report of the Secretary-General of 17 June 1992 entitled “An agenda for peace: preventive diplomacy, peacemaking and peacekeeping”,¹ which was submitted pursuant to the statement adopted at the summit meeting of the Security Council on 31 January 1992.² Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Japan) stated that, following consultations with the members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:³

The Security Council has continued its examination of the Secretary-General’s report entitled “An Agenda for Peace”.

The Council notes with appreciation the views of the Secretary-General, as presented in paragraphs 63, 64 and 65 of his report, concerning cooperation with regional arrangements and organizations.

Bearing in mind the relevant provisions of the Charter of the United Nations, the pertinent activities of the General Assembly and the challenges to international peace and security in the new phase of international relations, the Council attaches great importance to the role of regional arrangements and organizations and recognizes the need to coordinate their efforts with those of the United Nations in the maintenance of international peace and security.

While reaffirming its primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security and being aware of the variety of mandate, scope and composition of regional arrangements and organizations, the Council encourages and, where appropriate, supports such regional efforts as undertaken by regional arrangements and organizations within their respective areas of competence in accordance with the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations.

The Council therefore invites, within the framework of Chapter VIII of the Charter, regional arrangements and organizations to study, on a priority basis, the following:

- ways and means to strengthen their functions to maintain international peace and security within their areas of competence, paying due regard to the characteristics of their respective regions. Taking into account the matters of which the Council has been seized and in accordance with the Charter, they might consider, in particular, preventive diplomacy including fact-finding, confidence-building, good offices and peacebuilding and, where appropriate, peacekeeping;
- ways and means further to improve coordination of their efforts with those of the United Nations. Being aware of the variety of mandate, scope and composition of regional arrangements and organizations, the Council stresses that the forms of interaction of these arrangements and organizations with the United Nations should be flexible and adequate to each specific situation. These may include, in particular, the exchange of information and consultations with the Secretary-General or, where appropriate, his special representative, with a view to enhancing the United Nations capability including monitoring and early-warning; participating as observers in the sessions and the work of the General Assembly; secondment of officials to the United Nations Secretariat; making timely and specific requests for United Nations involvement; and a readiness to provide necessary resources.

The Council requests the Secretary-General:

- to transmit this statement to those regional arrangements and organizations which have received a standing invitation to participate in the work of the General Assembly as observers, and to other regional arrangements and organizations, with a view to promoting the aforementioned studies and encouraging the replies to the United Nations;
- to submit to the Council as soon as possible and preferably by the end of April 1993 a report concerning the replies from the regional arrangements and organizations.

The Council invites the States which are members of regional arrangements and organizations to play a constructive role in the consideration by their respective arrangements and organizations of ways and means to improve coordination with the United Nations.

In discharging its responsibilities, the Council will take into account the replies as well as the specific nature of the issue and the characteristics of the region concerned. The Council considers it important to establish such forms of cooperation between the United Nations and the regional arrangements and organizations, in the area of maintaining peace and security, that are appropriate to each specific situation.

The Council, noting the constructive relationship it has maintained with the League of Arab States, the European Community, the Organization of the Islamic Conference, the Organization of American States and the Organization of African Unity, supports the intention of the Secretary-General as described in paragraph 27 of his report to ask regional arrangements and organizations that have not yet sought observer status at the United Nations to do so.

The Council notes the importance of the understanding reached at the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe to consider the CSCE a regional arrangement in the sense of Chapter VIII of the Charter of the United Nations and of the further examination within the framework of the CSCE of the practical implications of this understanding. The Council welcomes the role of the CSCE, together with the European Community, in the implementation of action required to carry out the pertinent resolutions of the Council.

The Council intends to continue its consideration of the report of the Secretary-General, as indicated in the President's statement of 29 October 1992.

Decision of 26 February 1993 (3178th meeting):
statement by the President

At its 3178th meeting, on 26 February 1993, the Council included in its agenda the report of the Secretary-General of 17 June 1992.⁴ Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Morocco) stated that, following consultations with the members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁵

The Security Council has continued its examination of the report of the Secretary-General entitled "An Agenda for Peace".

The Council welcomes the observations contained in "An Agenda for Peace" concerning the question of humanitarian assistance and its relationship to peacemaking, peacekeeping and peacebuilding, in particular those contained in paragraphs 29, 40 and 56 to 59. It notes that in some particular circumstances there may be a close relationship between acute needs for humanitarian assistance and threats to international peace and security.

In this respect, the Council notes the Secretary-General's assessment that the impartial provision of humanitarian assistance could be of critical importance in preventive diplomacy.

Recalling its statement on fact-finding in connection with "An Agenda for Peace", the Council recognizes the importance of humanitarian concerns in conflict situations and thus recommends that the humanitarian dimension should be incorporated in the planning and dispatching of fact-finding missions. It also recognizes the need to include this aspect in connection with information-gathering and analysis, and encourages Member States concerned to provide the Secretary-General and the Governments concerned with relevant humanitarian information.

The Council notes with concern the incidence of humanitarian crises, including mass displacements of population, becoming or aggravating threats to international peace and security. In this connection, it is important to include humanitarian considerations and indicators within the context of early-warning information capacities as referred to in paragraphs 26 and 27 of "An Agenda for Peace". The Council emphasizes the role of the Department of Humanitarian Affairs in coordinating the activities of the various agencies and functional offices of the United Nations. It believes that this capacity should be utilized systematically at a pre-emergency phase to facilitate planning for action to assist Governments in averting crises that could affect international peace and security.

The Council notes the ongoing and constructive collaboration between the United Nations and various regional arrangements and organizations, within their respective areas of competence, in identifying and addressing humanitarian emergencies, in order to solve crises in a manner appropriate to each specific situation. The Council also notes the important role which is being played by non-governmental organizations, in close cooperation with the United Nations, in the provision of humanitarian assistance in emergency situations around the world. The Council commends this cooperation and invites the Secretary-General to further explore ways in which this cooperation can be advanced in order to enhance the capacity of the United Nations to prevent and respond to emergency situations.

The Council expresses concern about the increased incidence of deliberate obstruction of delivery of humanitarian relief and violence against humanitarian personnel, as well as misappropriation of humanitarian assistance, in many parts of the world, in particular in the former Yugoslavia, Iraq and Somalia, where the Council has called for secure access to affected populations for the purpose of providing humanitarian assistance. The Council stresses the need for adequate protection of personnel involved in humanitarian operations, in accordance with relevant norms and principles of international law. The Council believes that this matter requires urgent attention.

The Council believes that humanitarian assistance should help establish the basis for enhanced stability through rehabilitation and development. The Council thus notes the importance of adequate planning in the provision of humanitarian assistance in order to improve prospects for rapid improvement of the humanitarian situation. It also notes, however, that humanitarian considerations may become or continue to be relevant during periods in which the results of peacemaking and peacekeeping efforts are beginning to be consolidated. The Council thus recognizes the importance of ensuring a smooth transition from relief to development, and notes that the provision of coordinated humanitarian assistance is among the basic peacebuilding tools available to the Secretary-General. In particular, it fully endorses the Secretary-General's observations in paragraph 58 of "An Agenda for Peace" regarding the problem of land mines and invites him to address this as a matter of special concern.

The Council intends to continue its consideration of the report of the Secretary-General, as indicated in the President's statement of 29 October 1992.

Decision of 31 March 1993 (3190th meeting):
statement by the President

At its 3190th meeting, on 31 March 1993, the Council resumed its consideration of the item. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President

(New Zealand) stated that, following consultations with the members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁶

The Security Council has continued its examination of the report of the Secretary-General entitled "An Agenda for Peace", including the problem identified in paragraphs 66 to 68 — the safety of United Nations forces and personnel deployed in conditions of strife. The Council has considered this question with regard to persons deployed in connection with a Council mandate.

The Council commends the Secretary-General for drawing attention to this problem, including the unconscionable increase in the number of fatalities and incidents of violence involving United Nations forces and personnel. The Council shares fully the Secretary-General's concerns.

The Council recognizes that increasingly it has found it necessary, in discharging its responsibility for the maintenance for international peace and security, to deploy United Nations forces and personnel in situations of real danger. The Council greatly appreciates the courage and commitment of these dedicated people who accept considerable personal risk in order to implement the mandates of this Organization.

The Council recalls that it has been necessary on a number of occasions to condemn incidents directed against United Nations forces and personnel. It deplores the fact that, despite its repeated calls, incidents of violence continue.

The Council considers that attacks and other acts of violence, whether actual or threatened, including obstruction or detention of persons, against United Nations forces and personnel are wholly unacceptable and may require the Council to take further measures to ensure the safety and security of such forces and personnel.

The Council reiterates its demand that States and other parties to various conflicts take all possible steps to ensure the safety and security of United Nations forces and personnel. It further demands that States act promptly and effectively to deter, prosecute and punish all those responsible for attacks and other acts of violence against such forces and personnel.

The Council notes the particular difficulties and dangers that can arise where United Nations forces and personnel are deployed in situations where the State or States concerned are unable to exercise jurisdiction in order to ensure the safety and security of such forces and personnel, or where a State is unwilling to discharge its responsibilities in this regard. In such an eventuality, the Council may consider measures appropriate to the particular circumstances to ensure that persons responsible for attacks and other acts of violence against United Nations forces and personnel are held to account for their actions.

The Council requests the Secretary-General to report as soon as possible on the existing arrangements for the protection of United Nations forces and personnel, and the adequacy thereof, taking into account, inter alia, relevant multilateral instruments and status of forces agreements concluded between the United Nations and host countries, as well as comments he may receive from Member States, and to make such recommendations as he considers appropriate for enhancing the safety and security of United Nations forces and personnel.

The Council will consider the matter further in the light of the Secretary-General's report and of work done in the General Assembly and its subsidiary bodies, including, in particular, the Special Committee on Peacekeeping Operations established pursuant to General Assembly resolution 2006 (XIX). In that regard, the Council recognizes the need for all relevant bodies of the Organization to take concerted action to enhance the safety and security of United Nations forces and personnel.

The Council intends to continue its consideration of the report of the Secretary-General entitled "An Agenda for Peace", as indicated in the President's statement of 29 October 1992.

Decision of 30 April 1993 (3207th meeting):
statement by the President

At its 3207th meeting, on 30 April 1993, the Council resumed its consideration of the item. Subsequent to the adoption of the agenda, the President (Pakistan) stated that, following consultations with the members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁷

Continuing its examination of the Secretary-General's report entitled "An Agenda for Peace", the Security Council during the month of April 1993, emphasizing the importance of building strong foundations for peace in all countries and regions of the world, considered the subject of post-conflict peacebuilding.

The Council supports the view that the United Nations, in order to meet its responsibilities in the context of international peace and security, should view its objectives in respect of economic and social cooperation and development with the same sense of responsibility and urgency as its commitments in the political and security areas.

The Council stresses that, in examining the question of post-conflict peacebuilding, it wishes to highlight the importance and the urgency of the work of the United Nations in the field of development cooperation, without prejudice to the recognized priorities for the activities of the United Nations in that field as defined by the competent bodies.

The Council took note of the Secretary-General's observation that, to be truly successful, peacemaking and peacekeeping operations "must come to include comprehensive efforts to identify and support structures which will tend to consolidate peace and advance a sense of confidence and well-being among people". It agreed that in addition to the specific measures mentioned by the Secretary-General in paragraph 55 of his report, "An Agenda for Peace", activities such as disarming and demobilization of belligerent forces and their reintegration into society, electoral assistance, the restoration of national security through formation of national defence and police forces and mine-clearing, where appropriate and within the framework of comprehensive settlements of conflict situations, strengthen national political structures and enhance institutional and administrative capabilities and are important in restoring a sound basis for sustainable peace.

The Council further agrees that in the aftermath of an international conflict, peacebuilding may, inter alia, include measures and cooperative projects linking two or more countries in mutually beneficial undertakings which contribute not only to economic, social and cultural development but also enhance mutual understanding and confidence that are so fundamental to peace.

In discharging its responsibilities in the prevention of breaches of peace and in the resolution of conflicts, the Council encourages coordinated action by other components of the United Nations system to remedy the underlying causes of threats to peace and security. The Council is convinced that the organizations and agencies of the United Nations system, in the development and implementation of their programmes, need to be constantly sensitive to the goal of strengthening international peace and security as envisaged in Article 1 of the Charter.

The Council recognizes that post-conflict peacebuilding, in the context of overall efforts to build the foundations of peace, in order to be effective, also needs adequate financial resources. The Council, therefore, recognizes that it is important for Member States and financial and other United Nations bodies and agencies, as well as other organizations outside the United Nations system, to make all possible efforts to have adequate funding available for specific projects, such as the earliest possible return of refugees and displaced persons to their homes of origin, in post-conflict situations.

The Security Council, as the organ having primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security, fully recognizes, as stated in paragraph 59 of "An Agenda for Peace", that social peace is as important as strategic or political peace and supports the Secretary-General's view that there is a new requirement for technical assistance for the purposes described in that paragraph.

The Council intends to continue its consideration of the Secretary-General's report entitled "An Agenda for Peace", as indicated in the President's statement of 29 October 1992.

Decision of 28 May 1993 (3225th meeting):
statement by the President

At its 3225th meeting, on 28 May 1993, the Council resumed its consideration of the item. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Russian Federation) stated that, following consultations with the members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁸

In accordance with its statement of 29 October 1992, the Security Council held a special meeting devoted to the Secretary-General's report entitled "An Agenda for Peace". This meeting concluded the present stage of the examination of this report by the Council. On this occasion, the Council wishes to express once again its gratitude to the Secretary-General for this report.

The Security Council recommends that all States make participation in and support for international peacekeeping a part of their foreign and national security policy. It considers that United Nations peacekeeping operations should be conducted in accordance with the following operational principles consistent with the provisions of the Charter of the United Nations: a clear political goal with a precise mandate subject to periodic review and to change in its character or duration only by the Council itself; the consent of the government and, where appropriate, the parties concerned, save in exceptional cases; support for a political process or for the peaceful settlement of the dispute; impartiality in implementing Security Council decisions; readiness of the Security Council to take appropriate measures against parties which do not observe its decisions; the right of the Security Council to authorize all means necessary for United Nations forces to carry out their mandate and the inherent right of United Nations forces to take appropriate measures for self-defence. In this context, the Security Council emphasizes the need for the full cooperation of the parties concerned in implementing the mandates of peacekeeping operations as well as relevant decisions of the Council and stresses that peacekeeping operations should not be a substitute for a political settlement nor should they be expected to continue in perpetuity.

The Council has studied thoroughly the recommendations of the Secretary-General contained in "An Agenda for Peace". It pays tribute to the valuable contributions made by the Special Committee on Peacekeeping Operations and other relevant bodies of the General Assembly. These discussions and consultations make it possible to formulate more clearly the common priorities of the Member States.

In the context of the rapid growth in and new approaches to peacekeeping operations, the Council commends the initial measures taken by the Secretary-General to improve the capacity of the United Nations in this field. It believes that bold new steps are required and invites all Member States to make their views known to the Secretary-General. It also invites the Secretary-General to submit by September 1993 a further report addressed to all the Members of the United Nations containing specific new proposals for further enhancing these capabilities including:

- the strengthening and consolidation of the peacekeeping and military structure of the Secretariat, including creation of a plans and current operations directorate reporting to the Under-Secretary-General for Peacekeeping Operations to facilitate planning and to enhance coordination;
- notification by Member States of specific forces or capabilities which, with the approval of their national authorities, they could make available on a case-by-case basis to the United Nations for the full spectrum of peacekeeping or humanitarian operations; in this context the Council welcomes the Secretary-General's effort to ascertain the readiness and availability of Member States' forces or capabilities for peacekeeping operations and encourages Member states to cooperate in this effort;
- the feasibility of maintaining a limited revolving reserve of equipment commonly used in peacekeeping or humanitarian operations;
- elements for inclusion in national military or police training programmes for peacekeeping operations to prepare personnel for a United Nations peacekeeping role, including suggestions concerning the feasibility of conducting multinational peacekeeping exercises;
- refinement of standardized procedures to enable forces to work together more effectively;
- developing the non-military elements of peacekeeping operations.

In view of the mounting cost and complexity of peacekeeping operations, the Security Council also requests the Secretary-General in his report to address measures designed to place them on a more solid and durable financial basis, taking into account where appropriate the Volcker-Ogata report and addressing the necessary financial and managerial reforms, diversification of funding, and the need to ensure adequate resources for peacekeeping operations and maximum transparency and accountability in the use of resources. In this context the Council recalls that, in accordance with the Charter and the relevant resolutions of the General Assembly, financing of peacekeeping operations is the collective responsibility of all Member States. It calls upon all Member States to pay their assessed contributions in full and on time and encourages those States which can do so to make voluntary contributions.

The Council expresses gratitude to the soldiers and civilians who have served or are serving in United Nations peacekeeping operations. It pays tribute to the courageous nationals of dozens of States who have been killed or wounded while fulfilling their duty to the United Nations. It also strongly condemns attacks on United Nations peacekeepers and declares its determination to undertake more decisive efforts to ensure the security of United Nations personnel in the course of fulfilling their duties.

In accordance with Chapter VI of the Charter, the Security Council notes the necessity to strengthen the United Nations potential for preventive diplomacy. It welcomes General Assembly resolution 47/120 of 24 November 1992. It notes with satisfaction the increased use of fact-finding missions. It invites Member States to provide the Secretary-General with relevant detailed information on situations of tension and potential crisis. It invites the Secretary-General to consider appropriate measures for strengthening the Secretariat capacity to collect and analyse information. The Council recognizes the importance of new approaches to prevention of conflicts, and supports preventive deployment, on a case-by-case basis, in zones of instability and potential crisis the continuance of which is likely to endanger the maintenance of international peace and security.

The Council underlines the close link which may exist, in many cases, between humanitarian assistance and peacekeeping operations and highly appreciates recent efforts by the Secretary-General aimed at further improvement of coordination among Member States and relevant agencies and organizations, including non-governmental organizations. It reiterates, in this context, its concern that humanitarian personnel should have unimpeded access to those in need.

The Council reaffirms the importance it attaches to the role of regional arrangements and organizations and to coordination between their efforts and those of the United Nations in the maintenance of international peace and security. The Council welcomes the readiness of Member States, acting nationally or through regional organizations or arrangements, to cooperate with the United Nations and other Member States by providing their particular resources and capabilities for peacekeeping purposes. The Council, acting within the framework of Chapter VIII of the Charter of the United Nations, calls upon regional organizations and arrangements to consider ways and means of enhancing their contributions to the maintenance of peace and security. For its part the Council expresses its readiness to support and facilitate, taking into account specific circumstances, peacekeeping efforts undertaken in the framework of regional organizations and arrangements in accordance with Chapter VIII of the Charter. The Council looks forward to the report of the Secretary-General on cooperation between the United Nations and regional organizations.

The Council draws attention to the increasing significance of post-conflict peacebuilding. The Council is convinced that in present circumstances peacebuilding is inseparably linked with the maintenance of peace.

The Council stresses the value of high-level meetings of the Security Council and expresses its intention to convene such a meeting on the subject of peacekeeping in the near future.

Decision of 20 January 1994: letter from the President to the Secretary-General

By a letter dated 20 January 1994,⁹ the President of the Security Council informed the Secretary-General of the following:

The members of the Security Council have reviewed your report concerning the cooperation between the United Nations and regional arrangements and organizations with regard to international peace and security.¹⁰ This is a subject the members of the Council consider very important.

On behalf of the members of the Council, I wish to thank you for your report and for the efforts that went into soliciting and collating the documents it contains. The members of the Council request you to convey to regional arrangements and organizations concerned their gratitude for their contributions, and to send them copies of the report in question.

The members of the Council recall that the United Nations is at this very moment in a number of instances engaged in such cooperation, in efforts to resolve difficult problems in various parts of the world.

The members of the Council would welcome any further responses from regional arrangements and organizations. They would also welcome an addendum to the report in which you would elaborate on your views on this subject and present your analysis and assessment of the actual experiences of cooperation that have taken place and on the prospect for such cooperation in the future.

During the consideration of the report, it was suggested that it might be useful to hold a seminar on these issues, with the participation of interested delegations, of the Secretariat and of representatives of interested regional arrangements and organizations.

Decision of 3 May 1994 (3372nd meeting): statement by the President

On 14 March 1994, pursuant to the presidential statement of 28 May 1993,¹¹ the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on improving the capacity of the United Nations for peacekeeping.¹² The report contained a number of proposals in the area of budget and finance and several suggestions as to how each Member State could enhance its capacity to contribute to effective peacekeeping. Outlining the vital role played by Member States in peacekeeping, the Secretary-General urged those States to establish appropriate legal and administrative mechanisms so that they could act promptly once the decision to contribute to an operation had been taken. Noting the inevitable delays in the initial establishment of peacekeeping operations, he suggested that the difficulty could be reduced by having a more precise understanding between the United Nations and each Member State regarding the capabilities the latter would be prepared to make available, should it agree to contribute to an operation. It was with that in mind that he had established a special team to devise a system of "national standby forces and other capabilities", which Member States could maintain at an agreed state of readiness as a possible contribution to a United Nations peacekeeping operation.

He also referred to the issue of personnel, noting that recent multidimensional operations required additional sources of qualified and readily available civilian personnel. While rosters of experts were being developed by the Secretariat it was hoped that the Member States which had begun to help fill the gap would continue to do so. It had also proved difficult to obtain police in the numbers required and trained to serve in peacekeeping operations. As a first step towards the establishment of standard procedures, a handbook was under preparation that would serve as a standard manual for preparing police for United Nations service and would also be used for the guidance of civilian police in the field. He stressed however that training of personnel provided by Member States would remain primarily the responsibility of Governments and encouraged the practice of cooperation among Member States in training their personnel in peacekeeping, including multilateral training arrangements. The Secretary-General further noted that members of peacekeeping operations had to be under the exclusive operational command of the United Nations during the period of their assignment. Any views and concerns of troop-contributing countries concerning a particular operation should be raised at the United Nations Headquarters, and, if necessary, could be brought by the Secretary-General to the attention of the Security Council for decision. The recent practice of members of the Council attending meetings of troop-contributing countries was a step towards the development of improved mechanisms for effective consultation.

Addressing the budgetary and financial aspects of peacekeeping operations, he noted that under Article 17 of the Charter the payment of all assessed contributions, as decided upon and apportioned by the General Assembly, was an unconditional international legal obligation for all Member States and not simply a commitment of a political or voluntary nature. However, a large amount of revenues for peacekeeping remained outstanding. The main reason advanced as to why Member States were in arrears of their payments was that United Nations assessments for peacekeeping operations came at irregular times of the year and were not in step with national budget cycles. That difficulty could be ameliorated by (a) increasing the Peacekeeping Reserve Fund to accommodate better the needs of peacekeeping operations; and (b) the establishment by individual Member States of their own respective reserves for unforeseen peacekeeping assessments. In order to provide a sufficient level of funding to meet the immediate start-up costs of new peacekeeping operations, the Secretary-General proposed for approval by the General Assembly that Member States be assessed for one third of the total amount included in the estimate of financial implications provided to the Security Council. With regard to ongoing peacekeeping operations, the Secretary-General proposed that the budget period of operations be "de-linked" from the mandate period so as to allow all ongoing missions that have reached stability in their operation to be normally budgeted for at maintenance level and on an annual basis.

In his observations, the Secretary-General noted that while Member States increasingly supported and participated in peacekeeping activities, the same level of support had not been extended to the payment of the financial contributions assessed on Member States in order to meet the peacekeeping expenses of the Organization. Noting also that a number of Member States had had difficulty providing their troops with the equipment they required in order to function, he did not believe that the United Nations should take upon itself the task of providing the troops made available to it with essential equipment, but stated that it had to remain the responsibility of each Member State. At the same time, Governments contributing troops or other personnel for United Nations service had the right to expect timely reimbursement from the organization. That had not always been possible, however, because of the shortfall in assessed contributions. Acknowledging the concern of Member States about the level of guidance and support peacekeeping operations in the field received from United Nations Headquarters, the Secretary-General shared the view that the Secretariat units directly involved in peacekeeping needed to be significantly strengthened.

At its 3372nd meeting, on 3 May 1994, the Council included in its agenda the report of the Secretary-General of 14 March 1994 and the addenda thereto.¹³ Subsequent to the adoption of the agenda, the President (Nigeria) stated that, following consultations with the members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:¹⁴

Aware of its primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security, the Security Council has begun its consideration of the report of the Secretary-General entitled "Improving the capacity of the United Nations for peacekeeping" of 14 March 1994. The Council welcomes the useful account the report provides of the measures the Secretary-General has taken to strengthen the capacity of the United Nations to undertake peacekeeping operations. The Council notes that this report follows the report of the Secretary-General entitled "An Agenda for Peace" and that it responds to the statements made by successive Presidents of the Security Council on "An Agenda for Peace", including in particular the statement made by the President of the Security Council on 28 May 1993.

The Council notes that the report entitled "Improving the capacity of the United Nations for peacekeeping" has been transmitted to the General Assembly and also notes that the Special Committee on Peacekeeping Operations has made recommendations on the report.

Establishment of peacekeeping operations

The Security Council recalls that in the statement made by its President on 28 May 1993 it was stated, inter alia, that United Nations peacekeeping operations should be conducted in accordance with a number of operational principles, consistent with the provisions of the Charter of the United Nations. In that context, the Council is conscious of the need for the political goals, mandate, costs, and, where possible, the estimated time frame of United Nations peacekeeping operations to be clear and precise, and of the requirement for the mandates of peacekeeping operations to be subject to periodic review. The Council will respond to situations on a case-by-case basis. Without prejudice to its ability to do so and to respond rapidly and flexibly as circumstances require, the Council considers that the following factors, among others, should be taken into account when the establishment of new peacekeeping operations is under consideration:

(a) Whether a situation exists, the continuation of which is likely to endanger or constitute a threat to international peace and security;

(b) Whether regional or subregional organizations and arrangements exist and are ready and able to assist in resolving the situation;

(c) Whether a ceasefire exists and whether the parties have committed themselves to a peace process intended to reach a political settlement;

(d) Whether a clear political goal exists and whether it can be reflected in the mandate;

(e) Whether a precise mandate for a United Nations operation can be formulated;

(f) Whether the safety and security of United Nations personnel can be reasonably ensured, including in particular whether reasonable guarantees can be obtained from the principal parties or factions regarding the safety and security of United Nations personnel; in this regard it reaffirms the statement by the President of the Security Council of 31 March 1993 and its resolution 868 (1993) of 29 September 1993.

The Council should also be provided with an estimate of projected costs for the start-up phase (initial ninety days) of the operation and the first six months, as well as for the resulting increase in total projected annualized United Nations peacekeeping expenditures, and should be informed of the likely availability of resources for the new operation.

The Council emphasizes the need for the full cooperation of the parties concerned in implementing the mandates of peacekeeping operations as well as relevant decisions of the Council.

Ongoing review of operations

The Security Council notes that the increasing number and complexity of peacekeeping operations, and of situations likely to give rise to proposals for peacekeeping operations, may require measures to improve the quality and speed of the flow of information available to support Council decision-making. The Council will keep this question under consideration.

The Council welcomes the enhanced efforts made by the Secretariat to provide information to the Council and underlines the importance of further improving the briefing for Council members on matters of special concern.

Communication with non-members of the Security Council (including troop contributors)

The Security Council recognizes the implications which its decisions on peacekeeping operations have for the States Members of the United Nations and in particular for troop-contributing countries.

The Council welcomes the increased communication between members and non-members of the Council and believes that the practice of monthly consultations between the President of the Security Council and competent groups of Member States on the Council's programme of work (which includes matters relating to peacekeeping operations) should be continued.

¹³ S/26450 and Add.1 and Corr.1 and Add.2.

The Council is conscious of the need for enhanced consultations and exchange of information with troop-contributing countries regarding peacekeeping operations, including their planning, management and coordination, particularly when significant extensions in an operation's mandate are in prospect. Such consultations can take a variety of forms involving Member States, troop-contributing countries, members of the Council and the Secretariat.

The Council believes that when major events occur regarding peacekeeping operations, including decisions to change or extend a mandate, there is a particular need for members of the Council to seek to exchange views with troop contributors, including by way of informal communications between the Council's President or its members and troop contributors.

The recent practice of the Secretariat of convening meetings of troop contributors in the presence, as appropriate, of Council members, is welcome and should be developed. The Council also encourages the Secretariat to convene regular meetings for troop contributors and Council members to hear reports from special representatives of the Secretary-General or force commanders and, as appropriate, to make situation reports on peacekeeping operations available at frequent and regular intervals.

The Council will keep under review arrangements for communication with non-members of the Council.

Standby arrangements

The Security Council attaches great importance to improving the capacity of the United Nations to meet the need for rapid deployment and reinforcement of peacekeeping operations.

In this context the Council welcomes the recommendations in the Secretary-General's report of 14 March 1994 concerning standby arrangements and capabilities. The Council notes the intention of the Secretary-General to devise standby arrangements or capabilities which Member States could maintain at an agreed state of readiness as a possible contribution to a United Nations peacekeeping operation and welcomes the commitments undertaken by a number of Member States.

The Council welcomes the request by the Secretary-General to Member States to respond positively to this initiative and encourages Member States to do so insofar as possible.

The Council encourages the Secretary-General to continue his efforts to include civilian personnel, such as police, in the present standby arrangements planning initiative.

The Council also encourages the Secretary-General to ensure that the Standby Arrangements Management Unit carries on its work, including the periodic updating of the list of units and resources.

The Council requests the Secretary-General to report by 30 June 1994, and thereafter at least once a year, on progress with this initiative.

The Council will keep this matter under review in order to make recommendations or take decisions required in this regard.

Civilian personnel

The Security Council welcomes the observations made by the Secretary-General in his report in respect of civilian personnel, including civilian police, and invites Member States to respond positively to requests to contribute such personnel to United Nations peacekeeping operations.

The Council attaches importance to full coordination between the different components, military and civilian, of a peacekeeping operation, particularly a multifaceted one. This coordination should extend throughout the planning and implementation of the operation, both at United Nations Headquarters and in the field.

Training

The Security Council recognizes that the training of personnel for peacekeeping operations is essentially the responsibility of Member States, but encourages the Secretariat to continue the development of basic guidelines and performance standards and to provide descriptive materials.

The Council notes the recommendations of the Special Committee on Peacekeeping Operations on training of peacekeeping personnel. It invites Member States to cooperate with each other in the provision of facilities for this purpose.

Command and control

The Security Council stresses that as a leading principle United Nations peacekeeping operations should be under the operational control of the United Nations.

The Council welcomes the call by the General Assembly that the Secretary-General, in cooperation with the members of the Council, troop-contributing States and other interested Member States, take urgent action on the question of command and control, notes the comments of the Secretary-General in his report of 14 March 1994 and looks forward to his further report on the matter.

Financial and administrative issues

Bearing in mind the responsibilities of the General Assembly under Article 17 of the Charter of the United Nations, the Security Council notes the Secretary-General's observations and recommendations on budgetary matters relating to peacekeeping operations in his report of 14 March 1994 and notes also that his report has been referred to the General Assembly for its consideration.

The Council confirms that estimates of the financial implications of peacekeeping operations are required from the Secretariat before decisions on mandates or extensions are taken so that the Council is able to act in a financially responsible way.

Conclusion

The Security Council will give further consideration to the recommendations contained in the report of the Secretary-General.

Decision of 27 July 1994 (3408th meeting):
statement by the President

At its 3408th meeting, on 27 July 1994, the Council included in its agenda the report of the Secretary-General of 30 June 1994 on progress made on standby arrangements with Member States concerning their possible contribution to United Nations peacekeeping operations,¹⁵ which was submitted pursuant to the presidential statement of 3 May 1994.¹⁶

In the report, the Secretary-General recalled that the purpose of standby arrangements was to have a precise understanding of the forces and other capabilities a Member State would have available at an agreed state of readiness, should it agree to contribute to a peacekeeping operation. For planning purposes, the Secretariat would maintain a comprehensive database of detailed information regarding the numbers, volume and size of the units and other capabilities involved in the standby arrangement system, especially with regard to transport and possible procurement requirements. The Secretary-General informed the Council that 21 Member States so far had confirmed their willingness to provide standby resources totalling some 30,000 personnel and 27 other Member States were expected to do so. He noted, however, that these commitments did not yet cover adequately the spectrum of resources required to mount and execute future peacekeeping operations. He therefore urged those Member States which were not already doing so to participate in the system.

After the adoption of the agenda, the President (Pakistan) stated that, following consultations with the members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:¹⁷

The Security Council has considered the report of the Secretary-General of 30 June 1994 concerning standby arrangements for peacekeeping, submitted pursuant to the statement by the President of the Council of 3 May 1994.

The Council reiterates the importance it attaches to improving the capacity of the United Nations for rapid deployment and reinforcement of peacekeeping operations. The recent history of United Nations peacekeeping operations demonstrates that such an effort is essential.

In this context, the Council is grateful for the efforts undertaken by the Secretary-General in respect of standby arrangements and welcomes the responses so far received from Member States. It also welcomes the intention of the Secretary-General to maintain a comprehensive database of the offers made, including the technical details of these offers.

The Council notes that one of the major limiting factors in the timely deployment of troops for United Nations peacekeeping is the lack of readily available equipment. It stresses the importance of urgently addressing the issue of availability of equipment both in the context of standby arrangements and more broadly.

The Council notes the Secretary-General's view that the commitments made so far do not yet cover adequately the spectrum of resources required to mount and execute future peacekeeping operations. It also notes that additional commitments are expected from other Member States. In this context, it welcomes the Secretary-General's call to those Member States which are not already doing so to participate in the arrangements.

The Council looks forward to a further and more comprehensive report on the progress of the standby arrangements initiative.

Decision of 19 December 1995 (3609th meeting):
statement by the President

At its 3609th meeting, on 19 December 1995, the Council included in its agenda a further report of the Secretary-General on standby arrangements for peacekeeping,¹⁸ which was submitted pursuant to the presidential statement of 3 May 1994.¹⁹ The Secretary-General described the progress made on standby arrangements with Member States concerning their possible contribution to United Nations peacekeeping operations. He stated that significant progress had been achieved since his report of 30 June 1994.²⁰ As at 31 October 1995, 47 Member States had confirmed their willingness to provide standby resources involving a total of 55,000 personnel.²¹ Two of them, Denmark and Jordan, had formalized their standby arrangements through a memorandum of understanding. The Secretary-General indicated that the Secretariat would continue its discussion to seek the broadest possible participation by Member States as well as to arrive at a proper mix of troops and supporting units. He further informed the Council that the Secretariat was currently aiming to improve and expand its database with detailed information to be provided by participating Governments. The Secretary-General underlined the importance of providing information on the level and status of equipment at the time a standby arrangement was agreed upon. He reiterated his suggestion that partnerships be established between Governments that needed equipment and those ready to provide it. Referring to the problem of the delays between the decision to establish an operation and the arrival of troops and equipment in the mission area, he indicated that the Secretariat had begun to register response times, according to the declared individual capacities of Member States. That information would enable the Secretariat to call on all potential troop contributors, since units with longer response times may be planned for employment in the later stages of a peacekeeping operation. Another important factor in rapid deployment was the time needed to deploy resources in the field once they were ready. Deployment could be shortened dramatically if sea/airlift resources were to be made available by Member States having that capacity.

After the adoption of the agenda, the President (Russian Federation) stated that, following consultations with the members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:²²

The Security Council has noted with interest and appreciation the report of the Secretary-General of 10 November 1995 on standby arrangements for peacekeeping operations. It recalls earlier statements by its President on this subject and strongly supports the efforts of the Secretary-General to enhance the capacity of the United Nations for the planning, rapid deployment and reinforcement and logistical support of peacekeeping operations.

The Council encourages Member States not yet doing so to participate in the standby arrangements. It invites them, and those States already participating in the arrangements, to provide information in as detailed a manner as possible on those elements which they are ready to make available to the United Nations. It also invites them to identify components, such as logistic support elements and sea/airlift resources, presently underrepresented in the arrangement. In this context the Council welcomes the initiative undertaken by the Secretariat for the creation of a standby headquarters component within the Mission Planning Service of the Department of Peacekeeping Operations.²³ The Council also joins with the Secretary-General in suggesting the establishment of partnerships between those troop-contributing countries that need equipment for units that may be provided to the United Nations and those Governments ready to provide such equipment and other support.

The Council looks forward to further reports from the Secretary-General on the progress of the standby arrangements initiative and undertakes to keep the matter under review.

B. An agenda for peace: peacekeeping

Decision of 4 November 1994 (3448th meeting): statement by the President

By a letter dated 15 September 1994, addressed to the President of the Security Council,²⁴ the representatives of Argentina and New Zealand requested, in accordance with rule 2 of the Council's provisional rules of procedure, that the Council be convened to consider various procedural questions that concerned the operation of the Council. Specifically, the letter referred to the presidential statement of 3 May 1994 in which the Council stated that it would keep under review its consideration of a number of proposals designed to improve the procedures that it employed in its consideration of peacekeeping matters.²⁵ In particular, the Council had considered the need for consultations with interested States, especially with troop-contributing countries, and the need to further improve the briefing methods for Council members. On that basis, the representatives of Argentina and New Zealand proposed that the Council decide to structure certain procedures as follows: (a) to improve its internal procedure the President or a member of his delegation would convene on a weekly basis an informal working group of the members of the Council to review the “Weekly digest of peacekeeping missions”; the group would be convened on a more regular basis as necessary if and when daily situation reports from the Department of Peacekeeping Operations suggested this was desirable; staff of the Department would be invited to participate in the meeting; (b) to provide for appropriate consultation with countries outside the Council: (i) the President (or a member of his delegation) would convene, normally in the second week of every month, informal discussions involving the members of the Council and all troop-contributing countries to review the digest of peacekeeping missions and the monthly forecast of the Council’s programme of work; an agenda for the meeting would be circulated a week in advance; (ii) in the event that this regular meeting revealed areas of substantial concern which warranted further discussion, the Presidency would convene specific ad hoc meetings of the troop-contributing countries involved in the operation in question; (iii) the President would consider also inviting to participate in such specific ad hoc meetings neighbouring or regional States whose interests were or might be specially affected; and (iv) representatives of the Secretary-General would be requested to participate in the regular and specific meetings and invited to brief delegations and respond to questions as appropriate.

At its 3448th meeting, on 4 November 1994, the Council included in its agenda the letter dated 15 September 1994 from the representatives of Argentina and New Zealand.²⁶ Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (United States) drew the attention of the members of the Council to several other documents.²⁷ The President then stated that, following consultations with the members of the Council, she had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:²⁸

The Security Council has given further consideration to the question of communication between members and non-members of the Council, in particular troop-contributing countries, which was addressed in the statement by the President of the Council of 3 May 1994. The Council remains conscious of the implications that its decisions on peacekeeping operations have for troop-contributing countries. Having regard to the increase in the number and complexity of such operations, it believes that there is a need for further enhancement, in a pragmatic and flexible manner, of the arrangements for consultation and exchange of information with troop-contributing countries.

To this end, the Council has decided in future to follow the procedures set out in the present statement:

(a) Meetings should be held as a matter of course between members of the Council, troop-contributing countries and the Secretariat to facilitate the exchange of information and views in good time before the Council takes decisions on the extension or termination of, or significant changes in, the mandate of a particular peacekeeping operation;

(b) Such meetings would be chaired jointly by the presidency of the Council and a representative of the Secretariat nominated by the Secretary-General;

(c) The monthly tentative forecast of work of the Council made available to Member States will in future include an indication of the expected schedule of such meetings for the month;

(d) In the context of their review of the tentative forecast, the members of the Council will examine this schedule and communicate any suggested changes or proposals as to the timing of meetings to the Secretariat;

(e) Ad hoc meetings chaired jointly by the presidency of the Security Council and a representative of the Secretariat nominated by the Secretary-General may be convened in the event of unforeseen developments in a particular peacekeeping operation which could require action by the Council;

(f) Such meetings will be in addition to those convened and chaired solely by the Secretariat for troop contributors to meet with special representatives of the Secretary-General or force commanders or to discuss operational matters concerning particular peacekeeping operations, to which members of the Council will also be invited;

(g) An informal paper, which includes topics to be covered and draws attention to relevant background documentation, will be circulated by the Secretariat to the participants well in advance of each of the various meetings referred to above;

(h) The time and venue of each meeting with members of the Council and troop contributors to a peacekeeping operation should, where possible, appear in advance in the Journal of the United Nations;

(i) The President will, in the course of informal consultations of members of the Council, summarize the views expressed by participants at each meeting with troop contributors.

The Security Council recalls that the arrangements described herein are not exhaustive. Consultations may take a variety of forms, including informal communication between the President or the members of the Council and troop-contributing countries and, as appropriate, with other countries especially affected, for example countries from the region concerned.

The Council will keep arrangements for the exchange of information and views with troop contributors under review and stands ready to consider further measures to enhance arrangements in the light of experience.

The Council will also keep under review arrangements to improve the quality and speed of the flow of information available to support Council decision-making, bearing in mind the conclusions contained in the statement by the President of the Security Council of 3 May 1994.

At its 3449th meeting, also on 4 November 1994, the Council resumed its consideration of the letter dated 15 September 1994 from the representatives of Argentina and New Zealand. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representatives of Australia, Austria, Belgium, Canada, Egypt, Germany, Greece, Ireland, Italy, Japan, Malaysia, the Netherlands, Sweden, Turkey and Ukraine, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

Referring to the presidential statement adopted on the same day, the representative of France stated that the formula that had been worked out demonstrated progress in the way in which briefing sessions had been held so far with troop contributors and was entirely supported by his delegation. When consultations dealt with establishment, extension or substantial modification of the mandate of an operation, a co-chairmanship formula would be used whereas in all other cases the current formula would be used. It was the view of his delegation that there should be no question of removing the operational conduct of operations away from the Secretariat. On questions of deployment or withdrawal of forces, it would merely be a question of the Secretariat providing information. On questions of briefings, the presence in the room of members of the Security Council and at the rostrum of the President of that body would help to avoid the impression that certain troop contributors had of being insufficiently heeded by the Security Council. That would not prejudice the principles governing the Council's procedures according to which that body remained the sole master of its decisions, for there would be no setting up of a subsidiary body of the Council, no creating of a category of members with special prerogatives, and no encroachment on missions entrusted only to the Secretary-General. The speaker, however, underlined that the briefing was still a partial, insufficient solution to the general problem of transparency in the activities of the Council. His delegation believed that the Council should return to the principle of the rules of procedure whereby the Council meets in public unless it decides otherwise. The non-public work should eventually be limited to what was necessary in order to reach a broadly acceptable decision as speedily as possible.²⁹

The representative of Argentina stated that the procedure adopted by the Security Council opened a new era in the history of the Council's procedures because it created a foreseeable procedure for communication between the Council, troop-contributing countries and the Secretariat. That mechanism did not in his view prejudice either the direct decision-making process of the Council or the fundamental role played by the Secretariat with respect to the management of peacekeeping operations. In enabling troop-contributing countries to have the opportunity for dialogue, the Council was acting in accordance with the spirit implied in Article 44 of the Charter itself, although in a somewhat different context. The procedures contained in the presidential statement responded to requests which, above all, were concerned with the principle of representativeness of the Security Council vis-à-vis the Members of the Organization, as implied in Article 24(1) of the Charter. They also responded to the need to make the work of the Council more efficient and all of its procedures more transparent, thereby strengthening its legitimacy and efficiency.³⁰

The representative of New Zealand recalled that his delegation's original proposal was for the establishment of a Council committee in accordance with Article 29 of the Charter. The proposal was based on the precedent established by subsidiary organs of the Security Council, such as the sanctions committees, which conducted consultations with Member States that were not on the Security Council, even allowing them to participate in the meetings. However, in the face of firm opposition to the establishment of a specific institution for that purpose, New Zealand had agreed to look at alternative options provided that there was a clear decision that consultation would become the norm, that it would be systematized and institutionalized even if it could not be within the framework of a new institution. Furthermore, the question had to be viewed as a procedural matter regulated solely by Article 27(2) of the Charter, as a decision on which only the affirmative vote of nine members were required. Addressing the argument according to which the initial proposal would have resulted in a shift of power within the Organization away from the Secretariat and the Security Council and in favour of the wider membership of the United Nations, he stated that the intention had never been to change the power relationships prescribed in the Charter. On the contrary, the intention was rather to give proper effect to the provisions of the Charter and the power relationships envisaged in it. Notwithstanding technical arguments, which were unsound and quite wrong in law, against the relevance or applicability of Article 44 of the Charter, that provision was very important in as much as it reflected the intention of the Charter founders that troop-contributing countries would participate in decisions taken by the Council. That was quite different from the formulation used in Article 31, which provides only that States whose interests are specially affected may participate in the discussion, without the right to vote, or in Article 32, which provides only that States that are parties to disputes may participate. Therefore, it was clear that the Charter envisaged a much higher level of participation by troop-contributing countries in Council decisions. Compliance with the Charter actually did involve a shift in the balance of power which had prevailed, and the diminution of assumed prerogatives. He concluded by reiterating that his country's original proposal for an institutionalised approach to the oversight of peacekeeping operations would, because of the information flows that would occur, significantly enhance the quality of Security Council policy decisions.³¹

The representative of the United Kingdom stated that the rapid growth in the scale, complexity and danger of peacekeeping operations had made evident the need for a more regular and predictable pattern of consultations between troop contributors, the Secretariat and Council members. However, any steps taken to develop, regularize and make more predictable the pattern of consultations should respect the different roles and responsibilities of the Security Council, the Secretary-General and the troop-contributing countries. It should also avoid the creation of procedures which might lead to micromanagement of peacekeeping operations by the Security Council or to disruption of the chain of command running through the force commander and the Secretary-General's special representative to the Secretary-General. It was on this basis that his delegation had circulated an informal paper combining the ideas contained in the Argentina and New Zealand proposal and those of other delegations.³²

The representative of the Russian Federation stated that his delegation was prepared to expand the existing practice of consultations. He supported the idea that the exchange of views with troop contributors should focus on questions that require special attention, especially with regard to any extension or change in existing mandates and the deployment of new peacekeeping operations, so that operational questions could be discussed with the special representatives of the Secretary-General or troop commanders. The mechanism for consultations with troop-contributing countries should, however, be applied in a flexible and pragmatic way and take into account the authority of the Security Council and the Charter.³³

The representative of China stated that the primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security entrusted to the Council under the Charter demonstrated that the Council should be responsible to the Member States in carrying out its duties. Before making such major decisions as one authorizing a peacekeeping operation, the Security Council should engage in a timely exchange of information with Member States and with the Secretariat and should listen to the views of all — in particular, the parties directly involved, as well as the neighbouring countries and the regional organizations concerned. He contended that that would not only increase transparency and democratization in the Council's work and improve its efficiency and efficacy, but more important — further enhance the authenticity of its decision. However, links between the Council and the States Members of the Organization — especially the troop-contributing countries, should continue to be strengthened in a flexible and practical manner.³⁴

The President, speaking in her capacity as the representative of the United States, stated that fuller and more regular exchanges between Security Council members, troop contributors and the Secretariat were a necessary step in ensuring that Council decisions to extend, terminate or significantly change peacekeeping mandates were taken with the benefit of the views of those Member States whose personnel were most directly involved. The action taken by the Security Council in its presidential statement would significantly enhance the working relationship between the Council and troop contributors. First, it created predictability since meetings between the Council, troop contributors and the Secretariat would be held on a regular basis and, whenever possible, announced in advance in the United Nations Journal whenever mandate extensions, terminations or significant changes were in view. Secondly, it initiated a monthly review by the Council of the expected schedule of meetings involving the Secretariat, troop contributors and Council members. Thirdly, it provided for enhanced opportunities for timely and urgent exchanges of information and views in the event of unforeseen developments profoundly affecting peacekeeping operations. Fourthly, it provided for a discussion that was well informed and well focused by providing an agenda in advance to all participants. And finally, it provided the basis for more direct exchanges between the troop contributors and Council members by means of meetings jointly chaired by the President of the Security Council and a representative of the Secretariat. The speaker emphasized, however, that the procedural changes introduced by the presidential statement did not and could not in any way alter the fundamental division of competence and responsibility between the Secretariat and the Security Council. The meetings with troop-contributing countries would not supplant, but be an addition to, the normal troop-contributor consultations concerning operational and similar matters. Furthermore, the new procedures were to be pursued in a pragmatic and flexible manner, in order not to overburden the Council or to encroach on its primary security tasks. Finally, it would remain the Council's unique responsibility to mandate peacekeeping operations, as it would remain the Secretariat's task to implement and manage them.³⁵

The representative of Sweden, speaking on behalf of the four Nordic troop-contributing countries, Denmark, Finland, Norway and Sweden, expressed the view that consultations with troop-contributors should be structured, focused on areas of particular concern and take place on a regular basis, as well as when extensions and/or modifications of existing mandates are being considered. Efforts should also be considered to engage in consultation those countries that realistically may be in a position to contribute troops to a new peacekeeping operation before a decision is taken by the Council to launch the new operation in question.³⁶

The representative of Italy expressed the view that the presidential statement was an important step forward but did not represent the achievement of the final goal. The focus of the discussion should be on three needs: consultation with troop-contributing countries before the Council made any decision, dual representation by the Secretary-General and the Council at the highest level, and a steady flow of information and regular announcements of meetings before they take place. Moreover, it was necessary to define consultation procedures in a precise and binding fashion. Without underestimating the importance of the presidential statement, he felt that a resolution would have been more appropriate. He also contended that some parts of the text led to misinterpretation.³⁷

Welcoming the procedures set forth in the presidential statement, the representative of Turkey referred to Article 25 of the Charter, under which Member States agreed to accept and carry out the decisions of the Security Council, and stated that the authority of the Council emanated from the fact that it acted on behalf of all Members of the United Nations, in accordance with Article 24. The fact that Council decisions must have an adequate consensual base was also inherent in the letter and spirit of Article 1(4) of the Charter, which described “harmonizing the actions of nations” as one of the purposes of the United Nations. It was in that context that the lack of a sufficient consultation mechanism undermined the legitimacy of Council decisions on peacekeeping operations.³⁸

According to the representative of Ukraine, the proposal to convene informal discussions involving the members of the Council and all troop-contributing countries every second week of the month, contained in the joint proposal by Argentina and New Zealand, should be supported. Also deserving consideration were the issues of participation by regional organizations engaged in peacekeeping operations in the specific and ad hoc meetings provided for in the presidential statement as well as the procedures for the formation of a United Nations force.³⁹

Other speakers emphasized the importance that they attached to improving procedures for the exchange of information and consultations between the Council, the Secretariat and troop-contributing countries. Many contended that that would enhance the effectiveness and transparency of the work of the Security Council as well as its credibility and authority.⁴⁰ Some speakers further contended that the new procedures did not prejudice in any way the respective competences of the Security Council and the Secretariat with regard to peacekeeping operations.⁴¹ Some argued that the arrangements fell within the ambit of Article 44 of the Charter.⁴² Several speakers called for inclusion of countries or groups of countries other than troop-contributors in the consultation procedures.⁴³ A number of speakers supported the proposal of New Zealand and Argentina on the establishment of a subsidiary organ of the Security Council, in accordance with Article 29 of the Charter.⁴⁴

Decision of 25 November 1994: letter from the President to the Secretary-General

By a letter dated 25 November 1994,⁴⁵ the President of the Security Council informed the Secretary-General of the following:

The members of the Security Council express their appreciation for your letter dated 14 November 1994 (S/1994/1349) regarding meetings of members of the Council, troop contributors and the Secretariat pursuant to the statement I made as President of the Security Council on 4 November 1994.

The members of the Council welcome your designation of Mr. Chinmaya Gharekhan to co-chair these meetings on the Secretariat side.

The members of the Council believe that in order fully to serve the purpose of these meetings it is important that the co-chairmen, members of the Council and troop contributors for the operation be able to draw upon the expertise and information provided by senior members of the Secretariat dealing directly with peacekeeping operations. In that regard, they also welcome your intention to assign senior officials from the Department of Peacekeeping Operations and the Department of Political Affairs to attend the meetings as well. They attach particular importance to attendance at the meetings of the Under-Secretary-General or one of the Assistant Secretaries-General for Peacekeeping Operations.

(3611th meeting)

By a letter dated 8 December 1995, addressed to the President of the Council,⁴⁶ the representatives of Algeria, Argentina, Australia, Austria, Belgium, Brazil, Canada, Chile, the Czech Republic, Denmark, Egypt, Finland, France, Germany, Greece, Honduras, Ireland, Italy, Japan, Malaysia, the Netherlands, New Zealand, Nigeria, Norway, Pakistan, Poland, Portugal, Romania, Spain, Sweden, Turkey, Ukraine, the United Kingdom and the United States requested that the Council be convened to examine specifically the issue of consultations between the Security Council and troop-contributing countries in order to consider further measures to enhance the mechanism introduced under the presidential statement of 4 November 1994.⁴⁷ The letter also referred to the current General Assembly debate on the issue as reflecting, on the one hand, the usefulness of the mechanism and, on the other hand, the need both to review the implementation of the presidential statement and to improve the efficiency, effectiveness and representativity of the consultations, in the interest of creating the broadest possible support among Member States for peacekeeping operations mandated by the Council.

At its 3611th meeting, on 20 December 1995, the Council included the above-mentioned letter in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representatives of Algeria, Australia, Austria, Brazil, Canada, Colombia, Cuba, Egypt, Greece, India, Ireland, Japan, Luxembourg, Malaysia, New Zealand, Norway, Pakistan, the Republic of Korea, Spain, Tunisia, Turkey, Ukraine and Zimbabwe, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (Russian Federation) then drew the attention of the members of the Council to a letter dated 18 December 1995 from the representative of Djibouti addressed to the President of the Council⁴⁸ requesting that Djibouti be added to the signatories of the letter dated 8 December 1995.

The representative of Argentina stated that, while the consultations mechanism between troop contributors and the Security Council introduced pursuant to the presidential statement of 4 November 1994 was recognized as useful, there was a feeling that it should be reviewed, in order to improve the efficiency, effectiveness and representativity of these consultations. A number of Member States had been meeting informally to address the issue.⁴⁹ Those States were of the opinion that there should be a more formal and institutionalized mechanism of consultations, through the establishment of a subsidiary organ of the Council, as foreseen in Article 29 of the Charter. The mechanism should include the following features: (a) each consultations meeting should be held between Council members and the contributors of troops to the peacekeeping operation in question, assisted by the Secretariat; (b) when the Council considers establishing a new operation, it should consult potential troop contributors already approached by the Secretariat; (c) the existing practice of inviting to these meetings Member States which make special contributions to peacekeeping operations other than troops should be continued; (d) the mechanism of consultations should be chaired by a member of the Council specially appointed every year and the chairman could be assisted by one or more additional members of the Council, as appropriate; (e) the meeting should be held in good time before the Council takes decisions on the extension, modification or termination of the mandate of a particular peacekeeping operation; such meetings should also be convened in the event of unforeseen developments in a particular operation which could require action by the Council; (f) in those operations where the mandate is routinely renewed, the chairman of the mechanism could decide, after consulting with the troop contributors, whether or not to hold a meeting; (g) meetings should be included in the monthly tentative forecast of work of the Council and should be announced in the Journal of the United Nations; (h) those meetings would be in addition to those convened and chaired solely by the Secretariat for troop contributors to meet with Special Representatives of the Secretary-General or Force Commanders, or to discuss operational matters concerning particular peacekeeping operations; (i) members of the Council would also be invited to those meetings; (j) background information and a clear agenda should be provided by the Secretariat and/or the Presidency or the chairman of such meetings to all participants well in advance; (k) the chairman of the mechanism should report to the Council the views expressed by participants at each meeting with troop contributors; and, (l) the Security Council should periodically report to the General Assembly on the work of the mechanism.⁵⁰

The representative of the United States stated that the positive effects of the changes introduced in November 1994 included a higher degree of predictability and a more meaningful opportunity for a timely exchange of views between the Council, troop contributors and the Secretariat. He noted, however, that the mechanism intended to promote a more dynamic and substantive discussion than was the case, as well as greater participation by the Security Council President. With a view to strengthening the mechanism, he suggested the following: First, Council Presidents should be encouraged to take a greater part in the discussion. Secondly, the President should brief orally the Council members on the views of troop contributors in order to ensure that the information got to all Council members in a timely manner. Thirdly, the distribution of relevant papers, the timing of meetings with troop contributors and of Council “informals” should be scheduled so as to give the fullest opportunity for an informed discussion. Finally, troop contributors would benefit from somewhat greater consultations among themselves ahead of meetings on the major peacekeeping missions. He concluded by stating that efforts should be directed towards the strengthening of the existing basic format rather than setting it aside in favour of new arrangements.⁵¹

The representative of the United Kingdom stated that, while the arrangements established by the presidential statement of 4 November 1994 represented a considerable step forward, they were not working as well as they should. He stressed that the meetings with troop contributors should not only be an opportunity for the Secretariat to brief on developments in operations but should also be the occasion for serious discussion between troop contributors and members of the Council on the mandates of those peacekeeping operations. Moreover, the meetings should be held in good time and be provided with adequate documentation. Troop contributors had to make their voices heard and most important their views needed to inform the work of the Council. For those reasons, the President of the Council should report back to its members during their informal consultations, on the views expressed by troop contributors. It was unfortunate that that provision had not been as fully respected over recent months as the system permitted. He noted that while there was little disagreement on the need to make the existing system of consultations more dependable and effective, differences existed, however, on the means by which that should be done. For example, the proposal to establish a subsidiary organ under Article 29 of the Charter was a matter which his delegation viewed differently from Argentina. Furthermore, the operational responsibilities of the Secretary-General, as well as the decision-making ability of the Security Council itself, had to be protected and preserved.⁵²

The representative of France stressed the importance to find improved consultation procedures that were consistent with the balances established by the Charter and to make it possible for those States which undertook the effort of making personnel available for United Nations peacekeeping operations to be appropriately heard as to the use that might be made of their contingents. He stated that the Security Council could, in that regard, either consider, through its working group on procedures, what action should be taken with regard to the existing format of meetings of troop contributors (which would not automatically require institutional reform); or it could consider adopting a presidential statement, which was the way the Council customarily took a stand on its own procedural practices. He recalled certain principles to which his delegation was dedicated in respect of the issue. In that connection, it was important that the Secretariat preserve its prerogatives in any exercise relating to the conduct of peacekeeping operations. It had never been the practice of the Council to assume responsibility for the conduct of operations. The Secretary-General should therefore be associated under all circumstances with the chairmanship of meetings that were of concern to him. It was also untimely to make of troop contributors an abstract category of Member States which, for all operations, would have the right to participate in the decisions of the Security Council, whereas other Member States would not have that right. The consequence of that concern to comply with the Charter was that the consultation procedures had to be established operation by operation. His delegation was also reluctant to accept the idea of "potential contributors" to an operation, since any Member State was, in principle, a potential contributor. Consequently, the idea of consultations held prior to the adoption of the mandate of a force did not seem realistic. Furthermore, it had doubts about the advantages to be derived from turning consultation and information sessions into a form of Security Council meetings, and expressed reservations about resorting to Article 29 of the Charter for that purpose. He recommended maintaining a clear distinction between, on the one hand, debates with a political flavour, in which all Members of the Organization should be able to express their views and which, accordingly, had to be held as public meetings under Articles 31 and 32 of the Charter and, on the other hand, dialogue of a more practical and technical nature between the Secretariat, the troop contributors and the members of the Security Council. While it was possible to make better use of the existing framework, his delegation was not convinced that it was inadequate or must be changed in order to improve matters.⁵³

⁵² Ibid., pp. 4-5.

Referring to the Security Council's primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security under the Charter, the representative of China stated that the decisions and the decision-making process of the Council should reflect the will and wishes of the general membership. He took note of the proposals made by troop contributors and hoped that the Council could enhance its efficiency, improve its working methods and increase its transparency to better fulfil its functions.⁵⁴

The representative of Germany stated that troop-contributing countries were really interested in having more of a political impact on decisions taken by the Security Council. His delegation supported the suggestions made by Argentina and particularly the idea of appointing a chairman from among the members of the Council for the period of one year in order to give more continuity to the relationship with the troop contributors. The idea of nominating a chairman for each operation or group of operations could also be looked at. In his view, none of the proposals submitted unduly infringed on the prerogatives of the Security Council.⁵⁵

The representative of Italy pointed out that the establishment of a structured mechanism would assure not only a constant flow of information between Council members and troop-contributing countries but also consultation on matters of substance. That corresponded to the expectations that full use be made of the possibilities offered by the Charter. Furthermore, the consultation mechanism should not only invest the political sphere, but should be extended to the military sphere as well. He suggested, in that regard, consideration of the idea of revitalizing the Military Staff Committee, providing for inclusion in it of the countries that contributed troops to each operation.⁵⁶

The President, speaking in his capacity as the representative of the Russian Federation, stated that innovations in the working methods and procedures of the Security Council, which were necessary, should not work against the Council's functions under the Charter or its prerogatives in the maintenance of international peace and security. The most important thing was not the formalization of meetings as a goal in itself, but rather making it possible for the view of all potential participants in a given operation to be effectively taken into account. He favoured timely involvement, prior to the adoption by the Council of decisions on a given operation, in particular on the deployment of a new operation, by countries contributing not only troops but also equipment and other services. The Special Representatives of the Secretary-General and force commanders should also be invited to certain meetings. Overall, the consultative mechanism should help the Council in carrying out its Charter functions.⁵⁷

The representative of Japan pointed out that the Security Council, in the final analysis, was the master of its own procedures. While his country did not insist on the creation of a subsidiary organ under Article 29 of the Charter, it believed that a further institutionalization of the consultation mechanism, along the lines described in the statement made by the representative of Argentina, would be highly desirable. That could include measures relating to adequate prior notice and information, periodicity, and reports to the Council on the views expressed by the contributing countries in the course of such consultations. Japan also attached great importance to the current practice whereby the concept of “troop-contributing countries” included countries making various contributions of a substantive nature, including but not limited to the contribution of troops. His delegation suggested that the countries contributing to peacekeeping operations could exchange ideas among themselves beforehand, with a view to preparing themselves for the consultations. That, however, would be possible only if ample advance notice were given of the forthcoming consultative meetings.⁵⁸

While endorsing the Argentinean proposal, the representative of New Zealand suggested, as a next step, that an informal joint working group be established, involving Council members and troop contributors, to discuss how best to ensure progress on the issue under consideration. He emphasized that it was a procedural issue rather than a matter of substance. In reaction to the concern expressed by France about establishing new separate groups of Member States, he noted that Article 44 of the Charter already recognized the existence of a particular group of Member States that could and did make special contributions to international peace and security. Addressing another concern of France about the prerogatives of the Secretary-General, he noted that there was a distinction between peacekeeping forces operating in a benign environment and those inserted into a situation of active hostilities. It was in the latter case that troop-contributors needed to be involved in the decision-making process concerning a given operation. Those decisions could either be taken “behind the scenes” through informal, non-existent, non-institutional processes, or in a clearly open and transparent process involving all those with serious interests engaged. While the Security Council had the final responsibility to decide, troop-contributing countries were responsible to contribute input to that decision. He also reiterated his country’s support for an earlier proposal by France for further orientation meetings. That practice, which should be reinvigorated, was precisely one which provided an opportunity for participation by those Members of the United Nations that had no other opportunity to make a contribution.⁵⁹

The representative of Canada expressed his delegation’s belief that a distinction needed to be drawn between the discussion of political and mandate issues, on the one hand, and of operational issues, on the other. While the former were the concern of the Council and should be discussed directly with it, the latter were the responsibility of the Secretariat and needed to be addressed between it and troop contributors. The current process of joint Secretariat and Council chairmanship of meetings with troop contributors tended to confuse political and operational issues. Consultations with the Security Council on mandate issues should therefore be chaired by the Council with the Secretariat present as a matter of course. In the context of enhancing the United Nations rapid-reaction capability, he also stressed the need for the Council to consult potential troop contributors, identified by the Secretariat, before launching an operation.⁶⁰

The representative of Luxembourg, speaking on behalf of the Benelux countries, proposed the following measures in order to make the meetings with the troop contributors more effective: First, meetings should be announced in the Journal early enough to allow delegations to prepare themselves adequately; secondly, the necessary documentation should also be made available to delegations before meetings; thirdly, the Secretary-General’s reports on an operation under consideration should be distributed to the delegations concerned to enable them to study the options suggested by the Secretary-General; fourthly, consultations with troop-contributors should take place on a systematic basis, and early enough to be useful, every time a peacekeeping operation was created, modified, expanded or terminated; fifthly, records of the meetings with troop contributors should be circulated among all the members of the Council. In conclusion, the speaker noted that in order to formalize those modalities for consultation and cooperation, it would be appropriate to adopt a resolution.⁶¹

The representative of Colombia stated that any solution to the issue under consideration should emerge from the Working Group on the reform of the Security Council or from the Working Group on the Strengthening of the United Nations System. He observed that the proposed consultation mechanism, although aimed at broadening the participation of Member States in the discussion on peacekeeping operations, reinforced the tendency to make discussions on peacekeeping operations exclusive instruments of the Security Council, thereby marginalizing other main organs of the United Nations. It was his delegation view that any effort to enhance the transparency of the Council should proceed from the premise that it was necessary to strengthen the role of the General Assembly on issues of international peace and security. It was inadvisable to deny an organ authorized to order the deployment of peacekeeping operations the ability to contribute to their success. As for the Secretariat, it was advisable for it to retain the role of Co-Chairman which it enjoyed. His delegation saw no advantage in diminishing the role of the Secretariat as the organ responsible for implementing operations, nor did it favour establishing a subsidiary organ of the Security Council under Article 29 of the Charter, contending that the proposed mechanism required flexibility and that nothing would be gained simply by making the mechanism more formal.⁶²

The representative of India stated that his delegation had found the existing mechanism quite satisfactory although it could be improved and streamlined. Emphasizing that the Security Council and the Secretary-General were two important agents responsible for the implementation of the Council's decisions, he contended that without the presence of the Secretary-General's representative as Co-Chairman, the existing balance between political responsibility and operational control would be missing. He did not believe that granting this task to a subsidiary body of the Council or keeping the Secretary-General's representative on the sidelines would enhance the effectiveness of such consultations.⁶³

Other speakers stressed the need to further develop the existing consultation system into a more formal and institutionalized mechanism and supported the proposals put forward by Argentina, including the establishment of a subsidiary organ under Article 29 of the Charter. They contended that such a mechanism would not infringe upon the Council's prerogatives and would improve the representative character of the decision-making process in the Council which acted on behalf of the membership in accordance with Article 24 of the Charter. Moreover, such a mechanism would give full effect to Article 44 of the Charter.⁶⁴ Several speakers emphasized that consultations with troop contributors should be held before decisions are taken to launch new operations.⁶⁵

C. An Agenda for Peace

Decision of 22 February 1995 (3503rd meeting): statement by the President

At its 3492nd meeting, on 18 and 19 January 1995, the Council included in its agenda the document entitled "Supplement to an Agenda for Peace: position paper of the Secretary-General on the occasion of the fiftieth anniversary of the United Nations".⁶⁶ The Secretary-General noted that the purpose of his position paper was not to revise "An Agenda for Peace" but rather to highlight selectively certain areas where unforeseen, or only partly unforeseen, difficulties had arose and where there was a need for the Member States to take "hard decisions". Those areas included preventive diplomacy and peacemaking, peacekeeping, peacebuilding, disarmament, sanctions and peace enforcement. Recalling the Security Council's statement of 31 January 1992,⁶⁷ he pointed out that while collectively Member States encouraged him to play an active role in preventive diplomacy, individually they were often reluctant that he should do so when they were a party to the conflict. That was as true of inter-State conflicts as it was of internal ones, even though United Nations action on the former was fully within the Charter, whereas in the latter case it had to be reconciled with Article 2(7) of the Charter. Clearly, the United Nations could not impose its preventive and peacemaking services on Member States who did not want them. In that regard, he called for the development of an ethos within the international community in which the norm would be for Member States to accept an offer of United Nations good offices. More specifically, he noted two practical problems that had emerged in that field. The first was the difficulty of finding qualified senior persons willing to serve as special representative or special envoy of the Secretary-General. The second related to the establishment and financing of small field missions to support the work of special envoys in the field. There was no clear view among Member States, however, about whether legislative authority for such matters rested with the Security Council or the General Assembly, nor were existing budgetary procedures well geared to that need. Possible solutions included the inclusion in the regular budget of a contingency provision for such activities or the enlargement of the existing provision for unforeseen and extraordinary activities made available for all preventive and peacemaking activities.

In relation to peacekeeping, the Secretary-General recalled three principles essential to the success of any operation: the consent of the parties; impartiality; and the non-use of force, except in self-defence. Recently, however, peacekeeping operations had been led to forfeit those principles because of additional mandates given to them requiring the use of force. In that regard, the Secretary-General stated that peacekeeping and the use of force (other than in self-defence) should be seen as alternative techniques and not as adjacent points on a continuum, permitting easy transition from one to another. He also noted that a number of practical problems had arisen during the last three years, especially relating to command and control, to the availability of troops and equipment and to the information capacity of peacekeeping operations. Concerning command and control, he noted that there had been an increasing tendency in recent years for the Security Council to micromanage peacekeeping operations. At the same time, it was right and proper that the Council be closely consulted and informed. That should not, however, lead to any blurring of the three distinct levels of authority: overall political direction, which belonged to the Security Council, executive direction and command, for which he was responsible; and command in the field, which was entrusted by him to the chief of mission. Unity of command was also necessary for a peacekeeping operation to function as an integrated whole. On the question of the availability of troops and equipment, the Secretary-General had come to the conclusion that the United Nations needed to give serious thought to the idea of a rapid reaction force. Such a force would be the Security Council's strategic reserve for deployment when there was an emergency need for peacekeeping troops. Equipment and adequate training was another area of growing concern. The principle was that contributing Governments were to ensure that their troops be fully operational. Increasingly, however, Member States provided troops without the necessary equipment and training. The Secretary-General offered, in that regard, to establish within the United Nations a reserve stock of standard peacekeeping equipment and partnerships between Governments needing equipment and those ready to provide it. In connection with the information capacity of peacekeeping operations, he had instructed that, in the planning of future operations, the possible need for an effective information capacity be examined at an early stage and the necessary resources included in the proposed budget.

With regard to post-conflict peacebuilding, the Secretary-General noted that the timing and modalities of the departure of a peacekeeping operation and the transfer of its peacebuilding functions to others should be carefully managed in consultation with the Government concerned. While the resumption of activities in the economic, social, humanitarian, and human rights fields might initially be entrusted to a multifunctional peacekeeping operation, the relevant programmes, funds, offices and agencies of the United Nations system should re-establish themselves and gradually take over responsibility, as the peacekeepers succeeded in restoring normal conditions. In such a case, it might be necessary to arrange the transfer of decision-making responsibility from the Security Council to the General Assembly or other intergovernmental bodies with responsibility for civilian peacebuilding activities. In cases where a peacekeeping deployment did not take place, the Secretary-General pointed out that the early warning had to lie with the United Nations Headquarters, using all the information available to it. The Secretary-General, acting on the basis of his general mandate for preventive diplomacy, peacemaking and peacebuilding, could then take the initiative of sending a mission, with the Government's agreement, to discuss with it measures it could usefully take.

Concerning disarmament, the Secretary-General stated that progress made since 1992 in the area of weapons of mass destruction and major weapons systems had to be followed by parallel progress in conventional arms, particularly with respect to light weapons responsible for most of the deaths in current conflicts. The practical disarmament in the context of the conflicts the United Nations was actually dealing with, otherwise called "micro-disarmament", required that the problem be urgently addressed as effective solutions would take a long time. He intended to play his full part in that regard.

In relation to sanctions, the Secretary-General recalled Article 41 of the Charter as the legal basis for the application of sanctions by the Security Council in order to underline that the purpose of sanctions was to modify the behaviour of a party that is threatening international peace and security and not to punish or otherwise exact retribution. The Council's greatly increased use of this instrument had brought to light a number of difficulties, relating especially to the objectives of sanctions, the monitoring of their application and impact, and their unintended effects. While recognizing that the Council was a political body rather than a judicial organ, he stated that it was of great importance that when it decided to impose sanctions it should at the same time define objective criteria for determining that their purpose had been achieved. With a view to alleviating some of the negative effects of sanctions, he proposed two possibilities for the Member States' consideration: firstly, that whenever sanctions were imposed, provision be made to facilitate the work of humanitarian agencies; secondly, to respond to the expectations raised by Article 50 of the Charter. On the latter point, since sanctions were a measure taken collectively by the United Nations to maintain or restore international peace and security, the cost involved in their application should be borne equitably by all Member States and not exclusively by the few who had the misfortune to be neighbours or major economic partners of the targeted country. In order to address these and other problems, the Secretary-General suggested the establishment of a mechanism which would assist the Security Council by carrying out the following five functions: (a) to assess at the request of the Council, and before sanctions are imposed, their potential impact on the target country and on third countries; (b) to monitor the application of the sanctions; (c) to measure their effects in order to enable the Council to fine tune them; (d) to ensure the delivery of humanitarian aid to vulnerable groups; and (e) to explore ways of assisting Member States that suffered collateral damage and to evaluate claims submitted by them under Article 50.

Regarding enforcement action, the Secretary-General noted that neither the Security Council nor he himself currently had the capacity to deploy, direct, command and control operations for the purpose of taking enforcement action under the Charter against those responsible for threats to the peace, breaches of the peace or acts of aggression. While he believed it would be desirable in the long term for the United Nations to develop such a capacity, it would however be folly to attempt to do so at the present time when the Organization lacked resources and was hard pressed to handle the less demanding peacemaking and peacekeeping responsibilities entrusted to it. Recent experience had demonstrated both the value and the difficulties of the Security Council entrusting enforcement tasks to groups of Member States. On the positive side, that arrangement provided the Organization with an enforcement capacity it would not otherwise have and was greatly preferable to the unilateral use of force by Member States without reference to the United Nations. On the other hand, the arrangement could have a negative impact on the Organization's stature and credibility. There was also the danger that the States concerned might claim international legitimacy and approval for forceful actions that had not in fact been envisaged by the Council when it had given its authorization to them.

Addressing issues of coordination, and in particular the cooperation between the United Nations and regional organizations under Chapter VIII of the Charter, the Secretary-General identified the following principles on which such a relationship should be based: (a) agreed mechanisms for consultations should be established; (b) the primacy of the United Nations, as set out in the Charter, should be respected; (c) the division of labour had to be clearly defined and agreed; and (d) there had to be consistency by members of regional organizations that are also Members of the United Nations in dealing with a common problem.

Finally, the Secretary-General stressed that none of the various instruments for peace and security could be used unless Governments provided the necessary financial resources. He referred to a package of proposals, ideas and questions on finance and budgetary procedures which he had put to the Member States in October 1994.⁶⁸

Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representatives of Australia, Belgium, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Brazil, Bulgaria, Canada, Colombia, Egypt, Hungary, India, Ireland, Japan, Latvia, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Malaysia, the Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Pakistan, Poland, Romania, Sierra Leone, Slovenia, Sri Lanka, Turkey and Ukraine, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

The representative of the United Kingdom recalled that his country had long championed greater recourse by the United Nations to preventive action. While recognizing that more such action had been taken presently than a few years ago, he believed the United Nations could still be more imaginative and more proactive in that regard. Greater coordination between the different parts of the United Nations was needed to identify potential crises as well as a greater willingness to address such crises, before they escalated into armed conflicts. Noting that preventing conflicts, although not cost-free, might be cheaper than resolving them after they broke out, he expressed doubts about the idea of a fixed contingency provision for preventive action in the regular budget, but was willing to consider enlarging the existing provision for unforeseen and extraordinary activities. Greater use of voluntary contributions to finance longer term preventive missions could also be considered. Small United Nations support missions could be a useful model to follow. Turning to peacekeeping matters, he said that peacekeeping was most likely to be successful when it was strictly impartial and based upon the consent of the parties. Unity of command was also vital, as complemented by the fullest possible information to troop contributors as well as the development of an effective information capacity. Referring to the proposal of the Secretary-General for a rapid reaction force, he stated that it was not necessarily the most cost-effective or realistic way of approaching the issue of rapid deployment. More needed to be done on the “embryo system” of standby arrangements, including the provision of equipment to those troops in need thereof, through the development of a planning database. Also, better-equipped contributors with high-readiness forces could be deployed quickly at the outset of a United Nations operation, to be replaced by other troop contributors that might need more time to prepare for deployment. In relation to post-conflict peacebuilding, he supported the Secretary-General’s integrated approach of making best use of the United Nations system as a whole. With regard to disarmament, he noted that the Secretary-General in his report had focused attention primarily on “micro-disarmament”. While supporting efforts to address the problem of proliferation of small arms and anti-personnel landmines, he said that the question of the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction should not be neglected, pointing out the fundamental role of the Council in this area. Stressing that the cooperation between the United Nations and regional organizations was crucial in many of the areas relating to the maintenance of international peace and security, he welcomed the Secretary-General’s offer to assist regional organizations, particularly in the field of peacemaking and peacekeeping.

With reference to Chapter VII of the Charter, he stated that armed force should be used only as a last resort, in cases of aggression or support for terrorism. Short of that, sanctions remained a valid and sometimes necessary option. While it was important to devise sanctions regimes that had the greatest effect on the target Government and its supporters and the least effect on innocent civilians, one should not be seduced by partially and narrowly targeted “smart sanctions”. These were, in general, difficult to enforce and were therefore unlikely to have the desired effect of bringing about a change of policy. Addressing the issue of conflict between sanctions and development raised by the Secretary-General, he noted that a decision to impose sanctions under Chapter VII presupposed that there was a threat to international peace and security, which, in itself, was inimical to the parties’ development goals. In his view, the Council had to be able to impose sanctions at short notice and without undue delay. While he did not concur with all the points made on sanctions by the Secretary-General, he did agree that there was a need to strengthen the Secretariat to address the issues of monitoring the application and effects of sanctions and the delivery of humanitarian assistance in a more coherent and effective manner.⁶⁹

The representative of France stated that in order to improve the United Nations capacity to maintain international peace and security, special attention should be given to preventive diplomacy and peacemaking, rapid deployment of peacekeeping operations and imposition of sanctions. Preventive diplomacy should be used to forestall the outbreak or aggravation of conflicts and to settle their underlying disputes. At the same time, stable funding should be provided for the initiation and conduct of preventive diplomacy missions and peacemaking, including long-term missions. The preventive deployment of peacekeeping troops was also one way to help stabilize tense situations, including deployment on one side of the border when there was a lack of consent by all the Governments concerned. Pointing out that peacebuilding activities were a necessary corollary to preventive action and peacemaking, he noted that they could occur during, or as a continuation of, a peacekeeping operation and could be initiated independently from such an operation. Regarding the rapid deployment of peacekeeping operations, he contended that the concept of standby forces put forward by his Government was an excellent way of reducing the time required for deployment, on condition that a sufficient number of Member States committed themselves to it. Arrangements for standby forces should be maintained and the inter-operational nature of the forces should be developed. He took note with great interest of the Secretary-General's proposal regarding the creation of United Nations rapid reaction force, although questions concerning agreements between the Governments concerned and the United Nations, the command of the force and its financing had not yet been spelled out. With reference to Article 41 of the Charter, he stated that sanctions were the only enforcement instruments available to the Security Council short of recourse to military force. That explained why their use was not subject to any restriction. The Charter only referred to the ability of third States to consult the Council over specific economic difficulties they may encounter. While the imposition of sanctions had to have a specific aim and criteria for lifting sanctions should be stipulated from the outset, it was necessary to preserve the Security Council's autonomy in decision-making. In that respect, he stated that his Government was not able to endorse the proposal of the Secretary-General to establish a mechanism whose primary function would be to evaluate, prior to any decision of the Council, the potential impact of planned sanctions and to measure their effects as implemented, arguing that it would lead to all sorts of pressure being exerted on the Council.⁷⁰

The representative of Indonesia, speaking on behalf of the Movement of Non-Aligned Countries, noted that the "Supplement to an Agenda for Peace" was relatively silent on the role of the General Assembly in contributing to the maintenance of international peace and security, as specified in the Charter and reaffirmed in General Assembly resolutions 47/120 A and 47/120 B. It was important, in that regard, that respect for State sovereignty be recognized as one of the basic principles in the conduct of international relations. He concurred with the Secretary-General that commitment to development was the best means to uproot the fundamental causes of conflicts that posed threats to international peace and security. In relation to peacekeeping, he called for the strengthening of the following traditional principles of peacekeeping operations: support of the general membership of the Organization; consent of the States involved; non-intervention in the internal affairs of States; impartiality; non-use of force; equitable opportunity for all States to participate; and, above all, a clearly-defined mandate, time-frame and secure financing. He also emphasized that coercive measures and military means had to remain the last resort, and agreed that unity of command and control was a sine qua non for peacekeeping operations to proceed effectively and safely. As a matter of principle, peacekeeping operations should be under the operational control of the United Nations. The concept of multifunctional peacekeeping operations required further clarification. Similarly, in order to avoid any challenges to the sovereignty and independence of States, the idea of a rapid reaction force required greater clarity regarding the scope and circumstances under which it could be deployed, as well as cost implications, modality of establishment and use, the need for consent before deployment as well as command and control structure. It was not clear, for instance, what types of emergency were referred to and who would determine the existence of such crises. In addition, the concept of enforcement action needed to be further evaluated, inter alia, on the basis of the Secretary-General's report. Equally important were the consultations with troop-contributing countries which should focus on political and military objectives, the responsibilities and expectations of their troops and the conduct of the operations in general. Further specific improvements, including the possible expansion of the consultative mechanism to any other interested countries, would depend on how effective the new set-up would prove to be.

Turning to the funding of peacekeeping operations, the speaker stated that the costs of peacekeeping operations should continue to be calculated, in accordance with the existing scale of assessments established by General Assembly resolution 3101 (XXVIII), which took into account the special responsibility of some Member States and economic considerations. Those arrangements should be institutionalized and in conformity with Article 17(2) of the Charter. In addition, the Secretariat should continue to facilitate prompt reimbursement to troop-contributing countries. He also noted the Secretary-General's proposals with regard to preventive diplomacy and peacemaking. Concerning the Secretary-General's reference in his report to a norm for Member States to accept offers of United Nations good offices, he felt such a rule could only be created by the free will and consent of the States concerned. In relation to disarmament, he reaffirmed the importance of the non-proliferation of weapons of mass destruction. With regard to sanctions, he noted that Member States were obligated to comply with Security Council decisions concerning sanctions, in conformity with Article 41 of the Charter. Several issues, however, needed clarification prior to the imposition of sanctions, including their potential impact, timeframe, clearly defined objectives, humanitarian aspects and special provisions to minimize collateral damage. With respect to the latter, he stressed that more extensive use of Article 50 of the Charter had become essential as a means to limit the impact of sanctions, including through compensation. It was the Security Council, rather than the Bretton Woods institutions, which had the responsibility of providing relief. In conclusion, he welcomed close cooperation between the United Nations and regional organizations in the resolution of conflicts in their region, on the basis of Chapter VIII of the Charter and within their respective mandates and spheres of competence.⁷¹

The representative of China contended that, in fulfilling their responsibilities for the maintenance of international peace and security, the United Nations and the Security Council, in particular, had to strictly abide by the following purposes and principles of the Charter: respect for State sovereignty and non-interference in the internal affairs of States; peaceful settlement of disputes; cooperation and coordination among United Nations agencies in accordance with the Charter; a more effective role for the General Assembly in the maintenance of international peace and security; and the Security Council's fulfilment of its responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security on behalf of all Member States. Noting the recent "conditional involvement" of the United Nations in the settlement of internal disputes, he observed that such involvement risked making the United Nations a party to such conflicts. He deemed it imperative to establish certain principles which should include the following: conflicts or disputes should pose a real threat to international or regional peace; a United Nations operation had to be at the request and obtain the consent of the parties concerned; the United Nations role should be confined to assisting in the settlement of disputes or conflicts by peaceful means; and full play should be given to the role of neighbouring countries and relevant regional organizations. Regarding peacekeeping operations, which he clearly distinguished from peace enforcement actions, he agreed that the consent of the parties concerned, impartiality and the non-use of force, except in self-defence, were essential principles to ensuring successful operations. He noted an increasing number of cases in which the Security Council, invoking Chapter VII of the Charter on "flimsy grounds", resorted to, or authorized a few countries to take, enforcement actions. Stressing that his Government had never endorsed such peace enforcement actions, he maintained that they should only be used against acts of aggression that endanger or undermine peace, in accordance with Chapter VII, and that they should have a clear-cut mandate and the political guidance of the Council, as well as be placed under the unified command of the United Nations. His Government was not in favour of using sanctions to exert pressure.

⁷¹ Ibid., pp. 7-10.

Sanctions should not be used as a punitive means and their objectives, scope and time limit should be clearly defined. At the same time, appropriate mechanisms should be established to reduce the impact of sanctions on the population of the countries concerned and to resolve, in accordance with Article 50 of the Charter, the problems faced by third countries. As far as preventive diplomacy and post-conflict peacebuilding were concerned, he stressed the need to respect State sovereignty and obtain the consent of the States concerned. Moreover, the Security Council should not take over the responsibilities of United Nations agencies in post-conflict rehabilitation, reconstruction and other follow-up activities or get involved in what was beyond its terms of reference. He also expressed the need to distinguish and define, within the framework of the Charter, the concept, scope and mutual relationship of economic, social, development, humanitarian and other activities in relation to activities for the maintenance of peace and security, "so as to provide them with a solid legal basis".⁷²

The representative of the Russian Federation concurred with the Secretary-General's conclusion that there should be greater use of preventive diplomacy. In that regard, he saw some rationality in the idea of creating small field missions, provided that the consent of the country concerned had been obtained. The Secretary-General should define the general criteria for establishing and making use of such missions. Stressing the importance of determining primary conditions for conducting peacekeeping operations he expressed concern that, despite decisions taken by the Security Council, it had so far been impossible to adopt standard criteria and conditions for involving the United Nations "in extinguishing various hotbeds of tension". He agreed with the views expressed by the Secretary-General on the need to observe the principle of unity of command and to determine three levels of authority. On the latter, he assumed that the Secretary-General would be guided by the political instructions of the Security Council as well as keep the Council informed and consult it on any steps of a political nature. At the same time, troop-contributing countries should be kept informed about all aspects of the operation at all times. Overall, he emphasized the Council's exclusive authority under the Charter over the mandate of peacekeeping operations. He also called for perfecting the system of standby arrangements and expressed his Government's readiness to consider the proposal to create rapid reaction forces. Such a proposal would require taking into account the provisions of Article 43 of the Charter and would entail a greater role for the Military Staff Committee. On the issue of sanctions, the speaker stated that one should be clear about the goals of the sanctions imposed, the need for a timely agreement on precise conditions and machinery for lifting them once they had fulfilled their purpose, the inadmissibility of tightening sanctions if that would hinder the process of a political settlement, and the vital need to consider humanitarian factors. In connection with Article 50, and taking into account the possibilities afforded by Article 65 of the Charter, his delegation was prepared to consider the creation of a special mechanism within the Secretariat to address sanctions issues. His delegation supported the further strengthening of cooperation with regional organizations in accordance with Chapter VIII of the Charter, while maintaining the statutory role and responsibility of the Security Council. He specified that in all instances of regional peacekeeping carried out in accordance with Article 52 of the Charter, United Nations involvement should be on the basis of voluntary, equitable cooperation without any monitoring or attempt to interfere in the settlement process, without having responsibility, political or financial, for the outcome of that process. Referring to post-conflict peacebuilding, he pointed out the need to study the whole range of possibilities open to the United Nations, to carry out both preventive and post-conflict peacebuilding, based on major improvements in coordination and on the division of labour between all relevant organs and institutions, taking into account the sphere of competence of each.⁷³

The representative of the United States stated that peacekeeping operations established since 1988 had provided a number of lessons, among which the most important was that peacekeeping operations inside a country made different and greater demands on peacekeepers than did missions that separated two hostile States. Another important lesson was the need for rigorous decision-making in deciding whether, and how, to initiate a peace operation. In that context, she rejected the Secretary-General's contention that the Security Council was engaged in micromanagement because it sought information about a peace operation. She stressed that it was the Council's responsibility to create, extend, alter or terminate peace operations. Those decisions could be made only on the basis of complete, accurate and timely information provided by the Secretariat. Therefore, there should be no question about providing such information. A third important area of United Nations experience related to the appropriate use of force by United Nations peacekeepers. She fully agreed with the Secretary-General that peacekeeping and peace enforcement were not adjacent points on a continuum and emphasized that it was essential that when the Council turned to individual Member States or coalitions, it should retain the capacity to monitor such operations to ensure that they were conducted in accordance with international standards. Regarding peacebuilding, the speaker recalled that she had proposed the exploration of a mechanism whereby the Economic and Social Council would work in partnership with the Security Council to better identify and address economic and social tensions before the outbreak of conflict or after its conclusion. In relation to sanctions, she cautioned that procedures designed to mitigate the unintended effects of sanctions should not render them useless as a means for influencing the behaviour of a given Government. Finally, she pointed out that further major progress was required to improve the overall capacity of the United Nations to conduct and manage peace operations. In that regard, she questioned whether a rapid reaction force was the right course of action at that time to enhance the United Nations readiness for peacekeeping operations.⁷⁴

Speaking on behalf of the European Union, the representative of France stated that the European Union attached particular importance to preventive diplomacy and supported the intensification of efforts between the United Nations system and regional organizations in order to better identify situations that might give rise to conflicts. He also recalled the European Union's support for the preventive deployment of troops, including stationing them on only one side of a border, in order to help stabilize a tense situation, where the consent of all the Governments concerned was lacking. With regard to peacekeeping, he noted the importance of maintaining a presence on the ground after the end of a given operation. Moreover, the transfer to the competent bodies of the peacebuilding functions assumed within the framework of a peacekeeping operation should be planned and organized, so as to allow a transitional phase between an operation under the auspices of the Security Council and actions that were the responsibility of other parts of the United Nations system. On the issue of rapid deployment of peacekeeping operations, the European Union favoured the idea of studying the stockpiling of reserves of the United Nations to use material left over from already completed operations as well as calling upon Member States to equip and train troops provided by other States. Although standby forces did not guarantee that contingents would be provided for a given operation, since States which agreed to participate were under no obligation to respond automatically, the European Union saw it as an appropriate response to rapid deployment. Other measures to improve the capacity of rapid deployment could be considered within a regional framework. The Secretary-General's proposal to create a United Nations rapid reaction force needed to be examined more carefully. On the issue of sanctions, the European Union agreed on the need to develop precise goals and criteria for their termination, to evaluate them regularly, as well as to study their humanitarian impact and effect on third States. On the latter point, the European Union noted the possibility to resort to the expertise of the Bretton Woods institutions. With regard to enforcement action, he stated that the international community should never exclude the possibility — in the absence of the consent of the parties, and even against their will, if the situation so required — of the United Nations deciding to have recourse to the enforcement measures provided for in Chapter VII of the Charter. Finally, the European Union supported the development of the coordination and cooperation with regional organizations consistent with the following principles: primacy of the United Nations in accordance with the Charter; clear-cut division of labour; and consistency, especially with regard to the norms for peacekeeping. Furthermore, the European Union considered that the United Nations could, on a case-by-case basis, benefit from the delegation by the Security Council of certain operational tasks to regional organizations and arrangements. The Security Council, to which any Member State could bring any dispute which posed a threat to international peace and security, should be kept informed of action taken or contemplated in this area by regional organizations. The speaker recalled, in that regard, that only the Security Council could mandate enforcement action in the case of a threat to the peace, breach of the peace or act of aggression.⁷⁵

Other speakers expressed interest in the Secretary-General's call for the development of a norm according to which Member States would accept an offer of United Nations good offices.⁷⁶ Some pointed out that such a norm was already enshrined in the Charter, citing Article 37.⁷⁷ Some, however, observed that good offices were efforts under Chapter VI of the Charter and, hence, were predicated on the principle of consent of the parties concerned. They warned that the creation of norms, automatically applicable, would lead to the dilution of that principle.⁷⁸

Several speakers supported or expressed interest in the Secretary-General's proposal to establish a mechanism to assess, monitor and measure the effects of sanctions imposed under Article 41,⁷⁹ and to explore ways of assisting Member States that were suffering collateral damage and to evaluate claims of such States under Article 50. Some suggested the establishment of a compensation fund in that regard.⁸⁰ Some expressed doubts about the practicability of conducting an in-depth assessment before sanctions were imposed, in the light of the urgency imposed by events giving rise to sanctions. They also warned that such a mechanism would unduly delay the imposition of sanctions.⁸¹

A number of speakers endorsed or expressed interest in the Secretary-General's concept of the role that regional organizations should play and of the principles that should guide relations between the United Nations and the latter in the maintenance of international peace and security.⁸² Some, however, stressed that most regional organizations lacked the structures for establishing, financing and directing peacekeeping operations and called for adequate assistance from the United Nations, in order to fully implement Chapter VIII of the Charter.⁸³ A few also called for closer cooperation between the Economic and Social Council and the United Nations, in particular the Security Council.⁸⁴

At its 3503rd meeting, on 22 February 1995, the Council resumed its consideration of the item. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Botswana) stated that, following consultations among Council members, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁸⁵

The Security Council welcomes the position paper of the Secretary-General entitled "Supplement to an Agenda for Peace" as an important contribution to the debate on the development of the United Nations activities related to international peace and security in all its aspects at the beginning of the year in which the Organization celebrates its fiftieth anniversary. The Council notes that the paper contains a wide range of conclusions and recommendations with regard to instruments for resolving conflict. The Council is of the view that in the light of recent developments and experience gained, efforts should be made to further enhance the Organization's ability to perform the tasks laid down for it under the Charter. The Council reiterates that, in performing the above-mentioned tasks, the purposes and principles of the Charter should always be strictly observed.

The Council welcomes and shares the priority given by the Secretary-General to action to prevent conflict. It encourages all Member States to make the fullest possible use of instruments of preventive action, including the Secretary-General's good offices, the dispatch of special envoys of the Secretary-General and the deployment, with the consent as appropriate of the host country or countries, of small field missions for preventive diplomacy and peacemaking. The Council believes that adequate resources must be made available within the United Nations system for these actions. It notes the problem identified by the Secretary-General in finding senior persons to act as his special representative or special envoy and encourages Member States which have not yet done so to provide the Secretary-General with the names of persons who might be considered by him for such posts, together with other resources both human and material which might be useful to such missions. It encourages the Secretary-General to make full use of resources thus put at his disposal.

The Council endorses the view expressed by the Secretary-General concerning the crucial importance of economic and social development as a secure basis for lasting peace. Social and economic development can be as valuable in preventing conflicts as in healing the wounds after conflicts have occurred. The Council urges States to support the efforts of the United Nations system with regard to preventive and post-conflict peacebuilding activities and, in this context, to provide necessary assistance for the economic and social development of countries, especially those which have suffered or are suffering from conflicts.

The Council welcomes the analysis of the Secretary-General regarding peacekeeping operations. It recalls the statement made by its President on 3 May 1994 which, inter alia, listed factors to be taken into account in establishing peacekeeping operations. It notes that in resolving conflicts, primary emphasis should continue to be placed on the use of peaceful means rather than force. Without prejudice to its ability to respond to situations on a case-by-case basis, and rapidly and flexibly as the circumstances require, it reiterates the principles of consent of the parties, impartiality and the non-use of force except in self-defence. It underlines the need to conduct peacekeeping operations with a clearly defined mandate, command structure, time frame and secure financing, in support of efforts to achieve a peaceful solution to a conflict: it stresses the importance of the consistent application of these principles to the establishment and conduct of all peacekeeping operations. It stresses the importance it attaches to the provision of the fullest possible information to the Council to assist it in making decisions regarding the mandate, duration and termination of current operations. It also emphasizes the importance of providing troop contributors with the fullest possible information.

The Council shares the concern of the Secretary-General regarding the availability of troops and equipment for peacekeeping operations. It recalls earlier statements by the President of the Council on the subject and reiterates the importance of improving the capacity of the United Nations for rapid deployment and reinforcement of operations. To that end, it encourages the Secretary-General to continue his study of options aimed at improving the capacity for such rapid deployment and reinforcement. The Council believes that the first priority in improving the capacity for rapid deployment should be the further enhancement of the existing standby arrangements, covering the full spectrum of resources, including arrangements for lift and headquarters capabilities, required to mount and execute peacekeeping operations. It strongly encourages the Secretary-General to take further steps in this regard, including the establishment of a comprehensive database to cover civilian as well as military resources. In this context, it considers that particular attention should be given to the greatest possible interoperability between elements identified in such arrangements. The Council reiterates its call to Member States not already doing so to participate in the standby arrangements. While affirming the principle that contributing Governments should ensure that their troops arrive with all the equipment needed to be fully operational, the Council also encourages the Secretary-General and Member States to continue to consider means, whether in the context of standby arrangements or more broadly, to address the requirements of contingents which may need additional equipment or training.

The Council strongly supports the Secretary-General's conclusion that peacekeeping operations need an effective information capacity, and his intention to address this requirement in future peacekeeping operations from the planning stage.

The Council welcomes the ideas of the Secretary-General regarding post-conflict peacebuilding. It agrees that an appropriately strong overall United Nations contribution needs to be sustained after the successful conclusion of a peacekeeping operation, and encourages the Secretary-General to study ways and means of ensuring effective coordination between the United Nations and other agencies involved in post-conflict peacebuilding, and to take active steps to ensure that such coordination takes place in the immediate aftermath of a peacekeeping operation. The measures described by the Secretary-General may also be required, with the consent of the State or States concerned, after successful preventive action and in other cases where an actual peacekeeping deployment does not take place.

The Council shares the assessment of the Secretary-General of the paramount importance of preventing the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction. Such proliferation is a threat to international peace and security. Appropriate measures will be taken in this respect in particular where international treaties provide for recourse to the Council when their provisions are violated. The Council underlines the need for all States to fulfil their obligations in respect of arms control and disarmament, in particular in regard to weapons of mass destruction.

The Council takes note of the assessment of the Secretary-General of the importance of "micro-disarmament", as described in his paper, in the solution of conflicts with which the United Nations is currently dealing and of his view that small arms are probably responsible for most of the deaths in these conflicts. It shares the concern of the Secretary-General at the negative consequences for international peace and security which often arise from the illicit traffic in conventional weapons, including small arms, and takes note of his view that the search for effective solutions to this problem should begin now. In this context the Council stresses the vital importance of the strict implementation of existing arms embargo regimes. It welcomes and supports efforts with regard to international measures to curb the spread of anti-personnel landmines and to deal with the landmines already laid, and in this regard welcomes General Assembly resolutions 49/75 D of 15 December 1994 and 49/215 of 23 December 1994. It reaffirms its deep concern over the tremendous humanitarian problems caused by the presence of mines and other unexploded devices to the populations of mine-infested countries and emphasizes the need for an increase in mine-clearing efforts by the countries concerned and with the assistance of the international community.

The Council stresses the importance it attaches to the effective implementation of all measures taken by it to maintain or restore international peace and security including economic sanctions. It agrees that the object of economic sanctions is not to punish but to modify the behaviour of the country or party which represents a threat to international peace and security. The steps demanded of that country or party should be clearly defined in Council resolutions, and the sanctions regime in question should be subject to periodic review and it should be lifted when the objectives of the appropriate provisions of the relevant Council resolutions are achieved. The Council remains concerned that, within this framework, appropriate measures are taken to ensure that humanitarian supplies reach affected populations and appropriate consideration is given to submissions received from neighbouring or other States affected by special economic problems as a result of the imposition of sanctions. The Council urges the Secretary-General, when considering the allocation of resources available to him within the Secretariat, to take appropriate steps to reinforce those sections of the Secretariat dealing directly with sanctions and their various aspects so as to ensure that all these matters are addressed in as effective, consistent and timely a manner as possible. It welcomes the efforts of the Secretary-General to study ways and means of addressing the various aspects related to sanctions in his report.

The Council reaffirms the importance it attaches to the role that regional organizations and arrangements can play in helping to maintain international peace and security. It underlines the need for effective coordination between their efforts and those of the United Nations in accordance with Chapter VIII of the Charter. It recognizes that the responsibilities and capacities of different regional organizations and arrangements vary, as well as the readiness and competence of regional organizations and arrangements, as reflected in their charters and other relevant documents, to participate in efforts to maintain international peace and security. It welcomes the willingness of the Secretary-General to assist regional organizations and arrangements as appropriate in developing a capacity for preventive action, peacemaking and, where appropriate, peacekeeping. It draws particular attention in this regard to the needs of Africa. It encourages the Secretary-General and Member States to continue to consider ways and means of improving practical cooperation and coordination between the United Nations and regional organizations and arrangements in these areas. The Council encourages the Secretary-General to continue the practice of meetings on cooperation between the United Nations and regional and other organizations.

The Council recognizes the crucial importance of the availability of the necessary financial resources both for preventive action and operations undertaken to sustain international peace and security. It therefore urges Member States to honour their financial obligations to the United Nations. At the same time, the Council emphasizes the continuing necessity for careful control of peacekeeping costs and for the most efficient possible use of peacekeeping funds and other financial resources.

The Council will keep the Secretary-General's paper under consideration. The Council invites all interested Member States to present further reflections on United Nations peacekeeping operations, and in particular on ways and means to improve the capacity of the United Nations for rapid deployment. It invites the Secretary-General to keep it closely informed of the action he takes in follow-up to the paper and to the present statement. It hopes that the General Assembly, as well as other organizations and entities, will give consideration of the paper a high degree of priority and will take decisions on those matters which fall within their direct responsibility.

28. Security of United Nations operations

Initial proceedings

Decision of 29 September 1993 (3283rd meeting): resolution 868 (1993)

On 27 August 1993, pursuant to a request made by the Security Council in the presidential statement of 31 March 1993,¹ the Secretary-General submitted a report to the Council on the security of United Nations operations in which he described the existing arrangements for the protection of United Nations forces and their adequacy.²

The Secretary-General pointed out that developments in the past year had revealed certain gaps in the existing security system and the need to strengthen it in certain areas. The operating conditions for United Nations personnel had become extremely hazardous, particularly in areas lacking adequate government authority. Moreover, personnel were more often at risk because of their very association with the work of the Organization. As a result, casualties had mounted from one fatality per month in 1992 to one every two weeks in 1993. The establishment of multidimensional operations involving military operations, humanitarian and electoral assistance, human rights monitoring and development projects had also revealed certain gaps. The United Nations had come to rely to an unprecedented extent on personnel who were not staff of the Organization but who ran similar risks as the regular staff and therefore also required protection. Finally, a new feature involved the use by the Security Council of its enforcement powers under Chapter VII of the Charter. That had led to the establishment of United Nations operations which were not based on consent and cooperation and might face outright opposition.

In view of those developments, the Secretary-General proposed the following set of measures: (a) a fresh effort would be made to achieve the necessary integration and accountability to ensure effectiveness. In particular, security matters would become an integral part of the planning for new operations; (b) priority would be given to the improvement and standardization of communications and the training of staff in security matters; (c) expert staff would be recruited to assist the Security Coordinator at Headquarters and designated officials in the field; (d) the "situation room" being established by the Department of Peacekeeping Operations would ensure that security staff could be reached at all times; (e) the Security Coordinator would review regulations to ensure that security measures were adequate and would include categories of personnel not covered under the existing arrangements, but who worked on behalf of the Organization and shared the same risks as United Nations staff.

The Secretary-General also noted that, in the long term, a new international instrument could be elaborated to codify and further develop international law relating to the security and safety of United Nations forces and personnel. Since security and safety issues required more immediate action, however, a short-term strategy should also be considered. He proposed in that regard that the Security Council, when setting up a new operation, should consider including, in the relevant resolution the necessary conditions relating to security and safety, inter alia, (a) the application to the operation of the provisions of the Convention on the Privileges and Immunities of the United Nations; (b) confirmation of the host Government's obligation to take all necessary measures to ensure the security and safety of the United Nations operation and its personnel; (c) extension of those responsibilities to contractors, non-governmental organizations and their personnel engaged in United Nations operations; (d) a timetable for the conclusion of an agreement on the status of the operation in the host country; (e) a statement reaffirming that attacks against United Nations personnel would be considered interference with the exercise of the responsibilities of the Security Council under the respective provisions of the Charter and might require the Council to consider measures it deemed appropriate; and (f) a statement indicating that if the authorities of the host State failed to meet their obligations with regard to the safety and security of the United Nations operation and its personnel, the Council might consider measures to ensure such security and safety. In conclusion, the Secretary-General said that, pending the conclusion of a new international instrument, the General Assembly could adopt a declaration aimed at drawing attention to the critical importance of the security and safety of United Nations forces and personnel, thus increasing international awareness and commitment.

At its 3283rd meeting, on 29 September 1993, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. After the adoption of the agenda, the President (Venezuela) drew the attention of the members of the Council to the text of a draft resolution prepared in the course of its prior consultations.³ He also drew their attention to a letter dated 13 September 1993 from the representative of New Zealand addressed to the President of the Security Council.⁴

Speaking before the vote, the representative of New Zealand stated that his Government had made the issue of the safety of United Nations personnel a particular priority since it began its term on the Council at the beginning of the year. The Secretary-General's report confirmed that the protection of United Nations personnel was a multifaceted issue which had to be tackled on a number of fronts. Moreover, it required concerted action by the Security Council, the General Assembly and the Secretary-General. The draft resolution before the Council reaffirmed that attacks on personnel engaged in operations mandated by the Security Council would be considered interference in the exercise of its responsibilities. It also warned that the Council would take appropriate measures in any such case, and confirmed that if a host country failed or was unable to adequately protect United Nations personnel, the Council would take appropriate action. He noted that, in line with the Secretary-General's proposals and with suggestions New Zealand had put forward before the Council in March 1993, the current draft resolution put special emphasis on those matters which the Council should address when deciding to establish or to renew a peacekeeping operation. It determined that the host country would now be required to take appropriate steps to ensure the safety of all persons engaged in the operation, and to conclude without delay an agreement establishing the legal framework under which United Nations personnel would operate. In conclusion, the speaker said that, at New Zealand's initiative, the Sixth Committee of the General Assembly had on its agenda a new item on responsibility for attacks on United Nations staff and associated personnel and measures to ensure that those responsible for such attacks were brought to justice. His Government would also propose that the Assembly adopt a new international convention which would establish criminal responsibility for such attacks. He was gratified to note that the Secretary-General in his report had endorsed that proposal and that the draft resolution welcomed New Zealand's initiative in the General Assembly.⁵

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and was adopted unanimously as resolution 868 (1993), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling the statement of 31 March 1993 made on its behalf by the President of the Security Council in connection with the Council's consideration of the item entitled "An agenda for peace: preventive diplomacy, peacemaking and peacekeeping",

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 27 August 1993 on the security of United Nations operations,

Recalling the provisions of the Charter of the United Nations concerning privileges and immunities and the Convention on the Privileges and Immunities of the United Nations, as applicable to United Nations operations and persons engaged in such operations,

Expressing grave concern at the increasing number of attacks and use of force against persons engaged in United Nations operations, and resolutely condemning all such actions,

Welcoming the initiatives being taken in the General Assembly to consider the elaboration of new instruments relating to the security and safety of United Nations forces and personnel, and noting the proposals of the Secretary-General in this regard,

1. Welcomes the report of the Secretary-General of 27 August 1993 on the security of United Nations operations;

2. Encourages the Secretary-General to take forward those measures proposed in his report falling within his responsibilities, with a view, in particular, to ensuring that security matters are an integral part of the planning for an operation and that any such precautions extend to all persons engaged in the operation;

3. Urges States and parties to a conflict to cooperate closely with the United Nations to ensure the security and safety of United Nations forces and personnel;

4. Confirms that attacks and the use of force against persons engaged in a United Nations operation authorized by the Security Council will be considered interference with the exercise of the responsibilities of the Council and may require the Council to consider measures it deems appropriate;

5. Confirms also that if, in the view of the Council, the host country is unable or unwilling to meet its obligations with regard to the safety and security of a United Nations operation and personnel engaged in the operation, the Council will consider what steps should be taken appropriate to the situation;

6. Determines that, when considering the establishment of future United Nations operations authorized by the Council, the Council will require, inter alia:

(a) That the host country take all appropriate steps to ensure the security and safety of the operation and personnel engaged in the operation;

(b) That the security and safety arrangements undertaken by the host country extend to all persons engaged in the operation;

(c) That an agreement on the status of the operation and all personnel engaged in the operation in the host country be negotiated expeditiously and come into force as near as possible to the outset of the operation;

7. Requests the Secretary-General, when recommending the establishment or renewal of a United Nations operation by the Security Council, to take into account the provisions of the present resolution;

8. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of France said that the resolution just adopted showed the Council's will to take appropriate measures to ensure the security of an operation from its very start, or to respond to situations in which the host countries were unable or unwilling to discharge their obligations. In the latter case, the Council would envisage measures that are called for in each situation, without excluding any a priori. That could, for example, involve a reconsideration of the operation in the context of its possible withdrawal or, on the other hand, of its strengthening.⁶

The representative of Brazil said that his country fully supported the efforts undertaken by both the Security Council and the General Assembly to enhance the safety and security of all persons engaged in United Nations operations. In that regard, it was very important for the Assembly, the Council and the Secretariat to coordinate their efforts to address the relevant issues within their respective spheres of competence in a mutually reinforcing manner. He also emphasized that United Nations missions and operations were established in the name, not of the Security Council alone, but of the United Nations as a whole. Brazil particularly valued provisions in the resolution designed to serve as guidelines for the future work of the Council.⁷

The representative of the United Kingdom stated that it was unacceptable that United Nations personnel were being attacked just because they worked for the Organization. The perpetrators of such acts should be prosecuted and punished. He stressed that security had to be an integral part of operations and that all personnel who worked for the Organization in peacekeeping operations shared the same risks and should therefore be afforded the same protection. Moreover, it was no longer acceptable for host countries to "drag their feet" in establishing the status-of-forces agreements. He also welcomed New Zealand's initiative to consider an international instrument relating to the security of United Nations personnel and the prosecution of those who attacked persons engaged in its operations.⁸

The representative of China said that his delegation was in favour of appropriate action by the Council, within its mandate, to ensure the security and safety of peacekeeping personnel. In taking such action, the United Nations should, however, respect the sovereignty of the host country and refrain from interfering in its internal affairs.⁹

29. Security Council action regarding the terrorist attacks in Buenos Aires and London

Initial proceedings

Decision of 29 July 1994: statement by the President

On 29 July 1994, following consultations with the members of the Security Council, the President (Pakistan) issued the following statement to the media on behalf of the members of the Council:¹

The members of the Security Council recall the statement issued on the occasion of the Security Council Summit of 31 January 1992, expressing deep concern over acts of international terrorism, and emphasizing the need for the international community to deal effectively with all such acts.

The members of the Council strongly condemn the terrorist attack which took place in Buenos Aires on 18 July 1994, which resulted in great loss of human life.

The members of the Council express their sympathy and condolences to the victims and their families and to the people and Government of Argentina, who have suffered the consequences of this terrorist act.

The members of the Council also strongly condemn the terrorist attacks in London on 26 and 27 July 1994, and express their sympathy to the victims and their families, and to the people and Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland.

The members of the Council demand an immediate end to all such terrorist attacks. They stress the need to strengthen international cooperation in order to take full and effective measures to prevent, combat and eliminate all forms of terrorism, which affect the international community as a whole.

30. Proposal by China, France, the Russian Federation, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the United States of America on security assurances

Initial proceedings

Decision of 11 April 1995 (3514th meeting): resolution 984 (1995)

By a letter dated 6 April 1995 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹ the representative of the Russian Federation requested, as coordinator and on behalf of the permanent members of the Council, that the following item be included in the Council's agenda: "Proposal by China, France, the Russian Federation, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the United States of America on security assurances".

At its 3514th meeting, on 11 April 1995, the Council included in its agenda the letter from the Russian Federation. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representatives of Algeria, Egypt, Hungary, India, the Islamic Republic of Iran, Malaysia, Pakistan, Romania and Ukraine, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. At the same meeting, the President (Czech Republic) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution submitted by China, France, the Russian Federation, the United Kingdom and the United States.² He also drew their attention to several letters dated 6 April 1995,³ addressed to the Secretary-General from, respectively, the representatives of China, France, the Russian Federation, the United Kingdom and the United States, transmitting those countries' respective national declarations on security assurances for non-nuclear-weapon States parties to the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons. France, the Russian Federation, the United Kingdom and the United States all affirmed or reaffirmed that they would not use nuclear weapons against non-nuclear weapons States parties to the Treaty except in the case of an invasion or any other attack on their country, their territory, their armed forces or other troops, or against their allies or a State towards which they had a security commitment, carried out or sustained by such a State in alliance or association with a nuclear-weapon State. China undertook not to use nuclear weapons against non-nuclear-weapon States parties to the Treaty or that had entered into any comparable international binding commitment, at any time or under any circumstances. They also provided non-nuclear-weapon States parties to the Treaty with positive assurances.

The representative of India stated that, while maintenance of peace and security was the primary responsibility of the Security Council, preservation of national security was the primary responsibility of all Governments of States Members of the United Nations. He welcomed the debate on the question of security assurances but voiced scepticism about the motivation which had prompted the debate. Recalling Security Council resolution 255 (1968) of 19 June 1968, he affirmed that the nuclear-weapon Powers were then canvassing for signatures to the proposed non-proliferation treaty. Now, he said, they were canvassing for votes for indefinite extension of the Treaty. Quoting the statement made at that time by his country, the representative of India said that “any security assurances that might be offered by nuclear-weapon States could not and should not be regarded as a quid pro quo for the signature of a non-proliferation treaty”. He further quoted that “the basis for any action by the Security Council for the maintenance of international peace and security is the Charter of the United Nations. Any linking of security assurances to the signature of a non-proliferation treaty would be contrary to its provisions, because the Charter does not discriminate between those who might adhere to a particular treaty and those who might not do so”. He also quoted that “while the permanent members of the Council have a special obligation and responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security, they are precluded from adopting a discriminatory approach in situations involving the security of States, including that arising from the threat or the use of nuclear weapons against non-nuclear weapon States”. In the speaker’s view, it was the clear responsibility of the nuclear-weapon States that were also permanent members of the Security Council to go to the assistance of any State threatened with or victim of nuclear attack, and not merely those that might be signatories to the Treaty. For these reasons, he believed that the draft resolution was discriminatory and felt short of the requirement for a binding international legal convention on the elimination of nuclear weapons which was the only security against the threat or use of nuclear weapons. The representative of India also recalled that the General Assembly at its forty-ninth session had sought an advisory opinion from the International Court of Justice on whether the threat or use of nuclear weapons was permissible under international law under any circumstances. He maintained that use of nuclear weapons would cause such indiscriminate suffering and destruction that it was contrary to the rules of international law and the Charter of the United Nations.⁴

The representative of Egypt stated that what was really at stake was the ability of the Security Council to discharge its primary responsibility in the maintenance of international peace and security. Article 26 of the Charter specifically conferred upon the Security Council the crucially important task of formulating plans for the establishment of a system for the regulation of armaments. The elaboration and adoption of credible security assurances would therefore fall squarely within the ambit of the Council’s mandate. Turning to the draft resolution, the speaker, who was of the view that Article 1 (1) of the Charter addressed only conventional weapons, stated that whenever a State threatened another with such weapons, the Security Council was, as stipulated under Article 1 (1), duty-bound to take effective measures for the removal of the threat and the suppression of the aggression. Therefore, in a conventional threat situation, the response of the Council could be confined to “bringing the matter to the attention of the Council” and “seeking Council action to provide necessary assistance” whereas, in the case of a nuclear threat, this should trigger the collective security system set out in Chapter VII of the Charter. He further stated that the fact that the Council’s response to a nuclear threat was subject to the regular voting procedure provided for under the Charter, specifically in the provisions of Article 27 (3), which pertains to the concurring votes of the five permanent members, constituted a most grave factor. The magnitude of the devastation that could be caused by nuclear weapons necessitated a degree of “automaticity” if credibility was to be conferred. In his view, the draft resolution should undoubtedly be beyond the scope of application of the veto in order to ensure credibility. He pointed out that the draft resolution should contain an explicit reference to the fact that aggression with nuclear weapons, or the threat of such aggression against a non-nuclear State party to the Treaty constituted a threat to international peace and security, and would automatically trigger an immediate response by the Security Council in conformity with Article 39 of the Charter and in a manner consistent with the substance and spirit of the relevant Articles of the Chapter VII. He also said that the issue of protection should be clearly enunciated in the form of a mechanism for enforcement of the security assurances which would indicate the mandatory action to be adopted by the Security Council to redress a situation where a non-nuclear State was the object of a nuclear attack or threat of an attack. In this connection, the speaker stressed that the territorial integrity and the political independence of any non-nuclear-weapon State, as well as the survival of its population, will be guaranteed as a matter of right and not as recognition of an interest — whether or not we term them as legitimate — to receive security assurances.

The speaker summed up his arguments by stating that the draft resolution failed to determine that the use or threat of use of nuclear weapons constituted a threat to international peace and security and lacked a trigger mechanism to ensure Security Council response to threats or attacks by nuclear weapons. It also lacked a commitment by the Council, as stated in the Charter, to take effective collective measures for the prevention and removal of threats to the peace, and for the suppression of acts of aggression or other breaches of the peace. The adoption by the Council, however, of a draft resolution which lacked credibility in those respects did not suggest that the Security Council was not the right forum to enunciate the question of security assurances. On the contrary, it was perhaps the course dictated by the Charter. In his view, the draft resolution contained, however, three positive elements: it was endorsed by all the permanent members; it addressed the element of technical assistance in a more comprehensive manner than resolution 255 (1968), albeit in voluntary language. Operative paragraphs 5 and 6 invited Member States of the United Nations to provide assistance to any State that was victim of an act of aggression by nuclear weapons and recognized

The representative of Pakistan observed that linking security assurances to certain criteria would militate against the objective of providing assurances on a universal basis. Similarly, relying on a subjective decision-making process for extending security assurances could result in arbitrary and selective application of those assurances. In his view, security assurances should become operational whenever there was any use or threat of use of nuclear weapons. It needed to be ensured, therefore, that the provisions of security assurances were in full conformity with the Charter — especially Article 51 — which provided that the Security Council shall act without discrimination, whenever international peace and security is threatened.⁶

Referring to the draft resolution, the representative of Malaysia reminded the Council that such obligations as coming to the assistance of non-nuclear-weapon States in the event of aggression were already stipulated in Articles 39, 41 and 42 of the Charter, regardless of the type of weapons used. Aggression was aggression, and to discriminate against States not parties to the Treaty in giving assistance on the basis of the type of weapons used was against the fundamental provisions of the Charter for the maintenance of international peace and security. His delegation could not support the inclusion of operative paragraph 9 since it sidestepped the question of the legality of the use of nuclear weapons and justified the use or threat of use of nuclear weapons in cases of “self-defence”. Given the fact that all the nuclear-weapon States were also permanent members of the Security Council, and that the Council had the power to determine whether or not a threat was an act of aggression or of self-defence, the assurance contained in the draft was at best questionable, if not hollow political expedience.⁷

Others speakers repeated the arguments invoked by the above-mentioned speakers that the draft resolution lacked a prior determination that a threat or attack by nuclear weapons constituted a threat to international peace and security, as well as a trigger mechanism to ensure a Security Council response to such threats or attacks. In their view, the draft resolution should have been placed firmly under the framework of Chapter VII of the Charter.⁸ Still others were of the view that the draft resolution constituted an important step in that, for the first time, all non-nuclear-weapon parties to the Treaty were given positive and negative security assurances by all five permanent members.⁹ They also welcomed the fact that, for the first time also, options for action to be taken by the Security Council with regard to the positive assurances were specified in detail. Attention was drawn by one of the speakers to the fact that procedures concerning compensation to victims of aggression, as mentioned in the draft, should be extended to third countries that suffered as a result of actions by an aggressor and that additional security assurances could have been given such as the renunciation of the unanimity principle when dealing with issues in the Security Council on the use or threat of use of nuclear weapons.¹⁰

⁷ Ibid., pp. 15-16.

Before the vote, the representative of Indonesia, speaking on behalf of the States parties to the Treaty that were members of the Movement of Non-Aligned Countries, noted, inter alia, that the draft resolution recognized the legitimacy of the demand of the non-nuclear-weapon States for security assurances and called for appropriate measures to safeguard their security. It also contemplated the initiation of measures to counter aggression involving the use of nuclear weapons and sought to render necessary assistance to victims of such aggression. He regretted however that the draft had failed to acknowledge the right of the non-nuclear-weapon States to unconditional security assurances in an international convention. He also questioned how a veto-bound Council could conceivably stem aggression committed by a nuclear-weapon State and take appropriate measures against that State. Another lacuna was the failure to include the Non-Aligned Movement's proposal that nuclear aggression or the threat of such aggression against a non-nuclear-weapon State party to the Treaty constituted a threat to international peace and security and necessitated immediate measures on the part of the Council in conformity with Article 39 of the Charter and consistent with the substance and spirit of the relevant Articles of Chapter VII. This failure had rendered actions and measures envisaged in the draft insignificant. He concluded by recognizing that the draft resolution, none the less, constituted an initial step in the process of nuclear disarmament towards a legally binding international instrument.¹¹

The representative of Nigeria placed on record his disappointment that the draft resolution failed to prescribe clearly defined and specific action to be taken in the case of aggression with nuclear weapons, the specific obligations of nuclear-weapon States, the specific form of assistance to be provided by the Council as a duty, rather than as a request from a victim State, and the action to be taken by the Council should the aggressor be a nuclear-weapon State which is also a permanent member of the Council. The draft resolution also failed to commit all members of the Council to the necessity of adopting in the immediate future negative security assurances in a legally binding instrument. He stated, inter alia, that his delegation looked forward to a set of guarantees that would not be vulnerable to the use of the veto by the permanent members of the Security Council.¹²

The representative of China was of the view that the draft resolution was only one step towards the conclusion of a legally binding international instrument providing assurances for non-nuclear-weapon States and nuclear-weapon-free zones against the use or threat of use of nuclear weapons. He reiterated the position of his Government on security assurances for non-nuclear-weapon States: firstly, complete and thorough destruction of nuclear weapons to usher in a nuclear-weapon-free world; secondly, all nuclear-weapon States should undertake in a concerted way not to use or threaten to use such weapons against non-nuclear-weapon States; thirdly, an unconditional commitment by all nuclear-weapon States not to be the first to use nuclear weapons; fourthly, China fully understood and supported the demand of the vast numbers of non-nuclear-weapon States for security assurances.¹³

The representative of Oman, referring to his country's initiative to include, in the agenda of the 1995 Review and Extension Conference of the Parties to the Treaty, the issue of the transfer of nuclear technology for peaceful uses and its applications in the non-nuclear developing countries, stated that the draft resolution would have been more integrated had this issue been better accommodated. Furthermore, the inclusion of that issue in the draft resolution would have encouraged other countries with peaceful nuclear programmes to adhere to the Treaty — not to mention the positive impact such an effort would have had on the developing countries, which would have been led to believe that the preferential regime of the Treaty as currently established in the field of the transfer of technology for peaceful purposes was not an immediate threat to their security.¹⁴

¹³ Ibid., pp. 23-24.

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 984 (1995), which reads:

The Security Council,

Convinced that every effort must be made to avoid and avert the danger of nuclear war, to prevent the spread of nuclear weapons, to facilitate international cooperation in the peaceful uses of nuclear energy with particular emphasis on the needs of developing countries, and reaffirming the crucial importance of the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons to these efforts,

Recognizing the legitimate interest of non-nuclear-weapon States parties to the Treaty to receive security assurances,

Welcoming the fact that more than one hundred and seventy States have become parties to the Treaty, and stressing the desirability of universal adherence to it,

Reaffirming the need for all States parties to the Treaty to comply fully with all their obligations,

Taking into consideration the legitimate concern of non-nuclear-weapon States that, in conjunction with their adherence to the Treaty, further appropriate measures be undertaken to safeguard their security,

Considering that the present resolution constitutes a step in this direction,

Considering also that, in accordance with the relevant provisions of the Charter of the United Nations, any aggression with the use of nuclear weapons would endanger international peace and security,

1. Takes note with appreciation of the statements made by each of the nuclear-weapon States," in which they give security assurances against the use of nuclear weapons to non-nuclear-weapon States that are parties to the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons;

2. Recognizes the legitimate interest of non-nuclear weapon States parties to the Treaty to receive assurances that the Security Council, and above all its nuclear-weapon State permanent members, will act immediately in accordance with the relevant provisions of the Charter of the United Nations, in the event that such a State is the victim of an act of, or object of a threat of, aggression in which nuclear weapons are used;

3. Recognizes also that, in case of aggression with nuclear weapons or the threat of such aggression against a non-nuclear-weapon State party to the Treaty, any State may bring the matter immediately to the attention of the Security Council to enable the Council to take urgent action to provide assistance, in accordance with the Charter, to the State victim of an act of, or object of a threat of, such aggression, and recognizes further that the nuclear weapon State permanent members of the Council will bring the matter immediately to the attention of the Council and seek Council action to provide, in accordance with the Charter, the necessary assistance to the State victim;

4. Notes the means available to it for assisting such a non-nuclear-weapon State party to the Treaty, including an investigation into the situation and appropriate measures to settle the dispute and restore international peace and security;

5. Invites Member States, individually or collectively, if any non-nuclear-weapon State party to the Treaty is a victim of an act of aggression with nuclear weapons, to take appropriate measures in response to a request from the victim for technical, medical, scientific or humanitarian assistance, and affirms its readiness to consider what measures are needed in this regard in the event of such an act of aggression;

6. Expresses its intention to recommend appropriate procedures, in response to any request from a non-nuclear-weapon State party to the Treaty that is the victim of such an act of aggression, regarding compensation under international law from the aggressor for loss, damage or injury sustained as a result of the aggression;

7. Welcomes the intention expressed by certain States to provide or support immediate assistance, in accordance with the Charter, to any non-nuclear-weapon State party to the Treaty that is a victim of an act of, or an object of a threat of, aggression in which nuclear weapons are used;

8. Urges all States, as provided for in article VI of the Treaty, to pursue negotiations in good faith on effective measures relating to nuclear disarmament and on a treaty on general and complete disarmament under strict and effective international control, which remains a universal goal;

9. Reaffirms the inherent right, recognized under Article 51 of the Charter, of individual and collective self-defence if an armed attack occurs against a Member of the United Nations, until the Security Council has taken measures necessary to maintain international peace and security;

10. Underlines the fact that the issues raised in the present resolution remain of continuing concern to the Council.

¹⁴ Ibid., pp. 25-26.

Speaking after the vote, the representatives of the United States, the United Kingdom, France and the Russian Federation pointed out that for the first time the five veto Powers had acted together to provide a common positive security assurance and by setting out through the resolution some of the Council's measures which might be taken in response to a request from the victim of an act of nuclear aggression.¹⁵

The representative of the United States pointed out that, under the resolution, although any State could bring the matter of a threat or use of nuclear forces to the Council's attention, the nuclear-weapon States — which were also permanent members of the Security Council — promised that they would do so. He stressed that the coordinated sponsorship of the resolution by all permanent members and the positive and negative security assurances were significant advances over the Council's effort 25 years ago, when resolution 255 (1968) had not been co-sponsored or voted for by all nuclear-weapon States parties to the Treaty, nor had it incorporated both positive and negative security assurances.¹⁶

Emphasizing the historic importance of the resolution, the representative of the United Kingdom stated that it made a significant step forward beyond the terms of Council resolution 225 (1968). For the first time, the five nuclear Powers had acted together to provide both positive and negative assurances as reflected in the resolution.¹⁷

The representative of France indicated that, in the course of the numerous consultations in the preparation of the draft resolution, concern had been expressed as to whether the joint commitments made by the nuclear Powers concerning the so-called positive assurances could ensure the matter's being brought before the Council. France's declaration left no doubt about that. It stated that France considered that any aggression accompanied by the use of nuclear weapons would threaten international peace and security and that as a permanent member of the Security Council, it would immediately inform the Security Council of such an aggression and act within the Council to ensure that the latter took immediate steps to provide, in accordance with the Charter, necessary assistance to any State victim of such an act or threat of aggression. It also stated the inherent right, recognized in Article 51 of the Charter, of individual or collective self-defence if an armed attack, including an attack with use of nuclear weapons, occurred against any Member of the United Nations until the Security Council had taken measures necessary to maintain international peace and security.¹⁸

The representative of the Russian Federation stated that the Security Council was, for the first time since 1968, considering the question of security assurances for non-nuclear-weapon States. He stressed that the unanimously adopted resolution 984 (1995) went significantly further than resolution 255 (1968) since, for the first time, all five nuclear-weapon States had joined in sponsoring a draft resolution providing both positive and negative security assurances.¹⁹

The President, speaking in his capacity as the representative of the Czech Republic, welcomed the fact that, in the event of aggression or threat of aggression with nuclear weapons, the matter would be brought immediately to the attention of the Council in order to provide the necessary assistance to the State in question. He also welcomed the Council's mandate to investigate the situation and adopt appropriate measures to settle the core dispute and restore international peace and security.²⁰

31. Commemoration of the end of the Second World War in Europe

Initial proceedings

Decision of 9 May 1995 (3532nd meeting): statement by the President

At its 3532nd meeting, on 9 May 1995, the Security Council included the item entitled “Commemoration of the end of the Second World War in Europe” in its agenda. After the adoption of the agenda, the President (France) made the following statement on behalf of the members of the Council:¹

Fifty years ago, Europe saw the end of a war that afflicted the entire planet. It was primarily to preserve future generations from this scourge that the United Nations was created. The Security Council was given a special role in that effort, in that the Charter of the United Nations entrusts it with the principal responsibility for maintaining international peace and security.

For this reason, it seems appropriate for the Security Council to pay tribute on this anniversary to all the victims of the Second World War and to recall the Council’s firm desire to make every possible effort to help to mitigate the human suffering that results from war.

32. Commemoration of the end of the Second World War in the Asia-Pacific region

Initial proceedings

Decision of 15 August 1995 (3565th meeting): statement by the President

At its 3565th meeting, on 15 August 1995, the Security Council included the item entitled “Commemoration of the end of the Second World War in the Asia-Pacific region” in its agenda. After the adoption of the agenda, the President (Indonesia) made the following statement on behalf of the members of the Council:¹

It was fifty years ago that the Asia-Pacific region saw the end of the Second World War, a devastating war that shattered

the lives of tens of millions of people in this region. On this solemn occasion, we pay tribute to those who laid down their lives and the other victims of the war.

Having survived the catastrophe of the Second World War, mankind sought to embrace new means to prevent the recurrence of such a tragedy. To this end, the United Nations was established, with the primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security conferred on the Security Council by the Charter.

Unity and harmony among nations would be the most honourable and noble way to pay tribute to those who sacrificed their lives for peace during the Second World War. For this reason, it is appropriate for the Security Council to pay homage on this anniversary to all the victims of the Second World War in the Asia-Pacific region.

Chapter IX

Decisions taken by the Security Council in the exercise of its other functions and powers

Note

During the period under review, the Security Council took a number of decisions in the exercise of its functions and powers other than those relating to the maintenance of international peace and security. The Council took decisions relating to (a) the election of members of the International Court of Justice; (b) the termination of a trusteeship agreement and the completion of the mandate of the Trusteeship Council under the Charter, which are dealt with in chapter VI; (c) the question of the admission of new Members to the United Nations, which is dealt with in chapter VII; and (d) the consideration of the draft annual report of the Security Council to the General Assembly.

Introductory note

This chapter deals with the practice of the Security Council in relation to the pacific settlement of disputes within the framework of Articles 33 to 38 of Chapter VI and Articles 11 and 99 of the Charter.

As chapter VIII of this volume sets out a full account of Council proceedings with regard to the pacific settlement of disputes, this chapter will not discuss the practice of the Council aimed at the peaceful settlement of disputes in a comprehensive manner. Instead, this chapter will focus on selected material which may best serve to highlight how the provisions of Chapter VI of the Charter were interpreted in deliberations and applied in the relevant decisions of the Council.

The manner of presenting and classifying the relevant material has been devised to set forth the practices and procedures to which the Council has had recourse in a readily accessible form. As in the previous volume of the Repertoire covering the period 1989-1992, the material has been categorized under thematic headings rather than individual Articles of the Charter, so as to avoid ascribing to specific Articles of the Charter Council proceedings or decisions which do not themselves refer to any such Article.

Thus, part I illustrates how, under Article 35, Member States and non-Member States have brought new disputes and situations to the attention of the Security Council. Part II sets out investigative and fact-finding activities performed and initiated by the Council that may be deemed to fall under the scope of Article 34. Part III provides an overview of Council recommendations and decisions, under the relevant Articles of the Charter, with regard to the pacific settlement of disputes. Specifically, it will illustrate Council recommendations to the parties to a conflict. Finally, part IV will reflect constitutional discussions within the Council on the interpretation or application of the provisions of Chapter VI of the Charter.

Article 11, paragraph 3

The General Assembly may call the attention of the Security Council to situations which are likely to endanger international peace and security.

Article 33

1. The parties to any dispute, the continuance of which is likely to endanger the maintenance of international peace and security, shall, first of all, seek a solution by negotiation, enquiry, mediation, conciliation, arbitration, judicial settlement, resort to regional agencies or arrangements, or other peaceful means of their own choice.
2. The Security Council shall, when it deems necessary, call upon the parties to settle their dispute by such means.

Article 34

The Security Council may investigate any dispute, or any situation which might lead to international friction or give rise to a dispute, in order to determine whether the continuance of the dispute or situation is likely to endanger the maintenance of international peace and security.

Article 35

1. Any Member of the United Nations may bring any dispute, or any situation of the nature referred to in Article 34, to the attention of the Security Council or of the General Assembly.
2. A state which is not a Member of the United Nations may bring to the attention of the Security Council or of the General Assembly any dispute to which it is a party if it accepts in advance, for the purposes of the dispute, the obligations of pacific settlement provided in the present Charter.
3. The proceedings of the General Assembly in respect of matters brought to its attention under this Article will be subject to the provisions of Articles 11 and 12.

Article 36

1. The Security Council may, at any stage of a dispute of the nature referred to in Article 33 or of a situation of like nature, recommend appropriate procedures or methods of adjustment.
2. The Security Council should take into consideration any procedures for the settlement of the dispute which have already been adopted by the parties.
3. In making recommendations under this Article the Security Council should also take into consideration that legal disputes should as a general rule be referred by the parties to the International Court of Justice in accordance with the provisions of the Statute of the Court.

Article 37

1. Should the parties to a dispute of the nature referred to in Article 33 fail to settle it by the means indicated in that Article, they shall refer it to the Security Council.
2. If the Security Council deems that the continuance of the dispute is in fact likely to endanger the maintenance of international peace and security, it shall decide whether to take action under Article 36 or to recommend such terms of settlement as it may consider appropriate.

Article 38

Without prejudice to the provisions of Articles 33 to 37, the Security Council may, if all the parties to any dispute so request, make recommendations to the parties with a view to a pacific settlement of the dispute.

Article 99

The Secretary-General may bring to the attention of the Security Council any matter which in his opinion may threaten the maintenance of international peace and security.

Part I

Referral of disputes and situations to the Security Council

Note

Within the framework of the Charter, Articles 35, 37 (1) and 38 are generally regarded as the provisions on the basis of which States may or, in the case of Article 37 (1), shall, refer disputes to the Security Council. During the period under review, considerably fewer such referrals were made to the Council than during the preceding period (1989-1992). While Article 35 was expressly referred to in a small number of communications,¹ most communications did not cite any specific Article as the basis on which they were submitted.

Under Articles 11 (3) and 99 of the Charter, the General Assembly and the Secretary-General, respectively, may refer matters to the Security Council. During the period under review, the General Assembly did not refer any matters to the Council under Article 11 (3),² nor did the Secretary-General as provided for under Article 99.³

² See chapter VI, part I.B, for more details.

³ See chapter VI, part V.B, for more details. For example, by a letter dated 1 February 1995 addressed to the President of the Council (S/1995/120), the Secretary-General brought information regarding the situation in Sierra Leone to the attention of the members of the Council. According to his letter, the exploratory mission to Sierra Leone, dispatched on 15 December 1994, had noted that the conflict in that country would further complicate the problem of bringing peace to Liberia and could have a more general destabilizing effect in the region, if it continued. By a letter dated 7 February 1995 addressed to the Secretary-General (S/1995/121), the President of the Council informed the Secretary-General that his letter had been brought to the attention of the

Referrals by States

Situations were referred to the Security Council most often by directly affected States, either exclusively⁴ or simultaneously with communications from third States.⁵ A notable exception was the referral of the situation in Yemen by neighbouring countries. In that case, the Government of Yemen, by a letter dated 31 May 1994 from the representative of Yemen addressed to the Secretary-General,⁶ explicitly resisted the referral of the situation to the Security Council, as it considered the referral of the matter and its consideration by the Council as interference in its internal affairs.

Nature of matters referred to the Security Council

According to Article 35, which, in the absence of evidence pointing to other provisions of the Charter, is commonly regarded as the basis on which matters are referred to the Security Council by States, any Member State may bring to the Council's attention any "dispute", or "any situation which might lead to international friction or give rise to a dispute". During the period under review, several new matters were brought to the Council's attention, most of which were members of the Council. At its 3597th meeting, on 27 November 1995, the Council included in its agenda the item entitled "The situation in Sierra Leone".

referred to as a “situation”.⁷ In some instances, the subject matter of the communications was referred to by a different term, such as “incident”,⁸ or described in a narrative form.⁹

It should also be noted that, while the provisions setting out the basis on which States may bring matters concerning international peace and security to the attention of the Council form part of Chapter VI of the Charter, the subject matter of communications submitted to the Council and the type of action requested in relation thereto are not limited by the scope of that Chapter. During the period under review, several communications submitted to the Council described situations as threatening regional or international peace and security,¹⁰ or as acts of aggression.¹¹ Situations in which the Council did indeed determine the existence of a threat to the peace, a breach of the peace or an act of aggression are considered in chapter XI.

Action requested of the Security Council

In most of their communications to the Security Council, States requested the Council to convene an urgent meeting.¹² In some cases, more concrete actions requested of the Council were specified. For instance, in connection with the situation in Georgia, in a note verbale dated 25 December 1992 from the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of Georgia addressed to the Secretary-General,¹³ Georgia requested a formal debate in the Council, and the adoption of a resolution by which the Council would decide to urgently send a peacekeeping force to Abkhazia. In another instance, by a letter dated 4 March 1993 addressed to the President of the Council,¹⁴ the representative of Rwanda requested an immediate meeting of the Council to consider ways of ensuring the cessation of the fighting in the country, the observance of the ceasefire agreement between the parties, and the continuation of the search for a negotiated political solution.

Communications

Disputes and situations were generally submitted to the Security Council by means of a communication to the President of the Security Council. In several instances, matters were brought to the Council’s attention through a communication addressed to the civil war with incalculable consequences for international peace and security”.

¹⁰ For example, in a letter dated 14 July 1994 addressed to the President of the Council (S/1994/823) the representative of France stated that the deteriorating situation in Rwanda might lead to a further humanitarian disaster and threaten peace and security in the region; in connection with the situation in Burundi, in a letter dated 25 October 1993 addressed to the President of the Council (S/26626), the representative of Burundi stated that if nothing was done to stop massacres of all kinds, “the country [ran] the risk of becoming engulfed in a

Communications by which new disputes or situations were referred to the Council and on the basis of which the Council convened meetings under new agenda items during the period under review are listed in the table below. It should be borne in mind that the designation of a new agenda item does not necessarily imply the existence of a new dispute or situation, as it can be a change in the formulation of an item which has been before the Council.²⁰ Communications by which Member States merely conveyed information, but did not request a Council meeting or other specific Council action, have not been included in the table, as such communications cannot be considered referrals under Article 35. Furthermore, in contrast to the previous volume of the Repertoire covering the period 1989-1992, the table does not include communications referring to disputes or situations considered by the Council under existing agenda items so as not to codify or classify new developments and deterioration of situations in the ongoing conflicts. It should be noted that these delimitation criteria have been utilized only for the purpose of the table.

²⁰ For example, while an item entitled "The situation in Afghanistan" was added to the list of matters of which the Council was seized during the period 1993-1995, the subject had previously been considered under an item entitled "The situation relating to Afghanistan".

Investigation of disputes and fact-finding

Article 34 provides that “the Security Council may investigate any dispute, or any situation which might lead to international friction or give rise to a dispute, in order to determine whether the continuation of the dispute or situation is likely to endanger the maintenance of international peace and security”. Article 34 does not however exclude other organs from performing investigative functions nor does it limit the Council’s general competence to obtain knowledge of the relevant facts of any dispute or situation by dispatching a fact-finding mission.

During the period under review, the Council performed and initiated a number of investigative and fact-finding activities that may be deemed to fall within the scope of Article 34 or be related to its provisions.

In several instances, the Council dispatched missions consisting of Council members to conflict areas, including Bosnia and Herzegovina,²¹ Burundi,²²

Mozambique,²³ Rwanda,²⁴ Somalia²⁵ and Western Sahara.²⁶ Those missions were not expressly charged with concrete investigative tasks, but did allow the Council, inter alia, to form an impression of the respective situations on the ground. For example, the Council mission to Bosnia and Herzegovina was specifically mandated by resolution 819 (1993) to “ascertain the situation and report thereon to the Security Council”.

Furthermore, during the period under review, the Council also requested the Secretary-General to initiate or perform fact-finding or investigative functions, or to establish a body to be entrusted with such functions, examples of which are set out in the table below.

- ²³ The mission visited Mozambique from 7 to 12 August 1994. The Council decided to dispatch the mission by a statement by the President of the Council dated 19 July 1994 (S/PRST/1994/35). For details, see the mission report (S/1994/1009).
- ²⁴ The mission visited Rwanda on 12 and 13 February 1995. For details, see the mission report (S/1995/164).
- ²⁵ The mission visited Somalia on 26 and 27 October 1994. For details, see the mission report (S/1994/1245).
- ²⁶ The mission visited Western Sahara from 3 to 9 June 1995. The Council decided to dispatch the mission by resolution 995 (1995). For details, see the mission report (S/1995/498).

In other instances, the Security Council, through resolutions and statements by its President, welcomed, supported or noted with satisfaction the dispatch by the Secretary-General of fact-finding missions to countries in conflict,²⁷ including Afghanistan, Burundi, Georgia, Liberia, Rwanda and Tajikistan.²⁸

On a number of occasions, requests made by Member States for investigations did not result in the establishment or dispatch of investigative bodies or fact-finding missions, for example in relation to items settlement to the dispute, and, by resolution 877 (1993), the Council demanded that all parties refrain from the use of force and from any violations of international humanitarian law and welcomed the decision of the Secretary-General to send a fact-finding mission to Georgia in that regard, in particular to investigate reports of "ethnic cleansing". In connection with the situation in Liberia, by resolution 950 (1994), the Council welcomed the Secretary-General's intention to send a high-level mission to consult with ECOWAS member States on how the international community could best continue to assist the peace process in Liberia, and, also by resolution 1014 (1995), the Council welcomed the Secretary-General's intention to dispatch a mission to Liberia to consult with the Liberian leaders and other interested parties on the requirements in the evolving implementation of the Abuja Agreement. In connection with the situation concerning Rwanda, by a statement by the President dated 10 September 1993 (S/26425), the Council welcomed the decision taken by the Secretary-General to send a reconnaissance mission to Rwanda and hoped to have the report of the Secretary-General based on the recommendations of the mission in the next few days so that it could consider the contribution the United Nations could make to facilitate the implementation of the Arusha Peace Agreement signed on 4 August 1993. In connection with the situation in Tajikistan and along the Tajik-Afghan border, by a statement by the President dated 23 August 1993 (S/26341), in the light of the unstable situation on the Tajik-Afghan border, the Council welcomed the Secretary-General's decision to dispatch his Special Envoy to Afghanistan and other countries in the region.

²⁸ In connection with the situation in Afghanistan, by a statement by the President of the Council dated 24 January 1994 (S/PRST/1994/4), the Council noted General Assembly resolution 48/208 of 21 December 1993, in which the Assembly had requested the Secretary-General to dispatch as soon as possible a United Nations special mission to Afghanistan to canvass a broad spectrum of Afghanistan's leaders to solicit their views on how the United Nations could best assist Afghanistan in facilitating national rapprochement and reconstruction, and welcomed the reaffirmation of support for such a mission issued on 12 January 1994 by the Secretary-General and his intention to dispatch the mission. In connection with the situation in Burundi, by a statement by the President dated 25 October 1993 (S/26631), the Council took note with appreciation of the dispatch by the Secretary-General of a Special Envoy to Burundi, and, by a statement by the President dated 16 November 1993 (S/26757), the Council noted with satisfaction the immediate response of the Secretary-General to the situation by dispatching a Special Envoy in a good offices mission to facilitate the return of the country to constitutional rule. In connection with the situation in Georgia, by a statement by the President dated 17 September 1993 (S/26463), the Council welcomed the Secretary-General's intention to send his Special Envoy for Georgia to Moscow and to the area to assess the situation and to establish a way forward to a peaceful such as the situation in Angola and the situation in the occupied Arab territories.²⁹

The following case studies set out details of the decision-making process leading to the establishment of a commission of experts to examine information relating to grave violations of international humanitarian law committed in Rwanda; and the establishment of an international commission of inquiry in connection with the assassination of the President of Burundi on 21 October 1993 and the acts of violence that followed.

Case 1

The situation concerning Rwanda

Establishment of the Commission of Experts to examine information with a view to providing the Secretary-General with its conclusions on the evidence of grave violations of international humanitarian law in Rwanda

In connection with the situation concerning Rwanda, the Security Council, by a statement by the President of the Council dated 30 April 1994,³⁰ condemned all breaches of international humanitarian law in Rwanda, particularly those perpetrated against the civilian population, and recalled that persons who instigated or participated in such acts were individually responsible. It further recalled, in that context, that the killing of members of an ethnic group with the intention of destroying such group, in whole or in part, constituted a crime punishable under international law.

²⁹ In connection with the situation in Angola, at the 3168th meeting, on 29 January 1993, the representative of Angola requested the Security Council to conduct “an international investigation” to look into the involvement of South Africa and Zaire in the internal affairs of Angola (S/PV.3168, p. 11). In connection with the situation in the occupied Arab territories, at the 3340th meeting, on 28 February 1994, the representative of Egypt, speaking as the Chairman of the Group of Arab States, called upon the Security Council to send an international commission to investigate the killing of Palestinian worshippers in the Mosque of Ibrahim in Hebron, on 25 February 1994, and to take the necessary measures to enable the commission to carry out its mandate (S/PV.3340, p. 11). The request was supported by the representative of Jordan (ibid., p. 29).

By that statement, the Council requested the Secretary-General to make proposals for investigation of the reports of serious violations of international humanitarian law during the conflict.

By resolution 918 (1994) of 17 May 1994, the Council reiterated its condemnation of the continued killing of civilians with impunity, and recalled that such killings constituted a crime punishable under international law. By the same resolution, the Council requested the Secretary-General to present a report as soon as possible on the investigation of serious violations of international humanitarian law committed in Rwanda during the conflict. By resolution 925 (1994) of 8 June 1994, the Council noted with grave concern the reports indicating that acts of genocide had occurred in Rwanda and recalled that genocide constituted a crime punishable under international law.

In his report on the situation in Rwanda, the Secretary-General noted that massacres and killings were continuing in a systematic manner throughout that country, and indicated that “only a proper investigation [could] establish the facts and definite culpability”. The Secretary-General concluded, on the basis of the findings and evidence of the special mission to Rwanda, that there could be little doubt that the large-scale killings of communities and families belonging to a particular ethnic group constituted genocide.³¹

By resolution 935 (1994) of 1 July 1994, the Council, recalling the requests it had addressed to the Secretary-General in the statement by the President of the Council of 30 April 1994 and in resolution 918 (1994), concerning the investigation of serious violations of international humanitarian law committed in Rwanda during the conflict, requested the Secretary-General to establish, as a matter of urgency, an impartial Commission of Experts to examine and analyse information submitted pursuant to resolution 935 (1994), together with such further information as the Commission might obtain through its own investigations or the efforts of other persons or bodies, including the information made available by the Special Rapporteur for Rwanda of the Commission on

Human Rights,³² with a view to providing the Secretary-General with its conclusions on the evidence of grave violations of international humanitarian law committed in the territory of Rwanda, including the evidence of possible acts of genocide; requested the Secretary-General to report to the Council on the establishment of the Commission of Experts; and further requested him, within four months from the establishment of the Commission, to report to the Council on the conclusions of the Commission and to take account of those conclusions in any recommendations for further appropriate steps.

In the deliberations held in connection with the adoption of resolution 935 (1994), several Council members supported the establishment of a commission of experts. The representative of Spain considered that the establishment of such a commission would contribute to clarifying the facts with respect to the killings in Rwanda and to the carrying out of justice, and would also “make it possible to facilitate a political settlement” by focusing responsibility on specific persons rather than on ethnic, social or political groups.³³ The representative of the United States stressed that the Council’s goal must be “individual accountability and responsibility for grave violations of international humanitarian law in Rwanda”. He further stated that the Council must be ready to respond as quickly as possible to the commission’s report and that it was imperative that it

avoid any unnecessary delay in bringing to justice those responsible for serious breaches of international humanitarian law.³⁴ Touching upon the question of jurisdiction, the representative of France argued that the establishment of a commission of experts to investigate human rights violations in Rwanda should make it possible to identify those responsible for those crimes so that the Council could then decide, on the basis of the Secretary-General’s recommendations, “under which jurisdiction they [could] be dealt with”.³⁵ In a similar vein, the representative of New Zealand stated that genocide and other grave breaches of humanitarian law were international crimes which were subject to universal jurisdiction and stressed that there was the need to ensure that information on the killings was collected and organized so that there was at least “a basis upon which subsequent prosecutions, whether undertaken internationally or through the Rwandan legal system”, could proceed.³⁶ On the other hand, the representative of China held that the establishment of the Commission of Experts as authorized by the resolution was “an exceptional action” adopted in line with the special situation in Rwanda, and therefore should not be considered as a precedent.³⁷

In his report of 26 July 1994 on the establishment of the Commission of Experts pursuant to paragraph 1 of resolution 935 (1994),³⁸ the Secretary-General expressed the hope that, given the urgency of the matter, the report would be submitted no later than 30 November 1994, as provided for in that resolution. To that end, he envisaged that the work of the Commission would be in two stages: in a first stage, the members of the Commission would review and update the information that was available from all sources and carry out its own investigations in Rwanda to complement those already undertaken by the Special Rapporteur. The second stage of the Commission’s work would be to draw up its conclusions on the evidence of specific violations of international humanitarian law, in particular acts of genocide, on the basis of which identification of persons responsible for those violations could be made. In the light of those conclusions, the Commission would examine the question of the jurisdiction, international or national, before which such persons should be brought to trial. Therefore, the Secretary-General decided to establish a Commission of Experts to be composed of three members, taking into account their qualifications in the areas of human rights, humanitarian law, criminal law and prosecution, as well as their integrity and impartiality. Subsequently, by a letter dated 29 July 1994 addressed to the President of the Council,³⁹ the Secretary-General informed the Council that, following extensive consultations, he had decided to appoint the three members of the Commission.

By a letter dated 1 October 1994 addressed to the President of the Council,⁴⁰ the Secretary-General submitted the interim report of the Commission of Experts covering its preliminary investigations and activities prior to 30 September 1994. The Commission recommended that the Council take all necessary and effective action to ensure that the individuals responsible for the grave violations of human rights in Rwanda during the armed conflict were brought to justice before “an independent and impartial international criminal tribunal”. In order to enhance the fair and consistent interpretation, application and adjudication of international law on individual responsibility for serious human rights violations and to achieve the most efficient allocation of resources, the Commission further recommended that the Security Council amend the statute of the International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia so that it could consider crimes under international law committed during the armed conflict in Rwanda.

By a statement by the President of the Council dated 14 October 1994,⁴¹ the Council, reaffirming its view that those responsible for serious breaches of international humanitarian law and acts of genocide must be brought to justice, stated that it was considering the recommendations of the Commission of Experts in respect of the establishment of an international tribunal and would act expeditiously in the matter.

By resolution 955 (1994) of 8 November 1994, the Council expressed appreciation for the work of the Commission of Experts established pursuant to resolution 935 (1994), in particular its preliminary report on violations of international humanitarian law in Rwanda transmitted by the Secretary-General’s letter of 1 October 1994,⁴² and considered that the Commission should continue the collection of information relating to evidence of grave violations of international humanitarian law and should submit its final report to the Secretary-General by 30 November 1994. By the same resolution, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, the Council decided, having received the request of the Government of Rwanda,⁴³ to establish an international tribunal for the sole purpose of prosecuting persons responsible for genocide and other serious violations of international humanitarian law committed in the territory of Rwanda and Rwandan citizens responsible for genocide and other such violations committed in the territory of neighbouring States, between 1 January 1994 and 31 December 1994.⁴⁴

The final report of the Commission of Experts was transmitted by the Secretary-General by a letter dated 9 December 1994 addressed to the President of the Council,⁴⁵ in which he summarized as follows the conclusions of the Commission: there existed overwhelming evidence to prove that acts of genocide against the Tutsi ethnic group had been committed by Hutu elements, and that crimes against humanity and serious violations of international humanitarian law had been committed by individuals on both sides of the conflict, but there was no evidence to suggest that acts committed by Tutsi elements had been perpetrated with an intent to destroy the Hutu ethnic group as such, within the meaning of the Genocide Convention; the Commission recommended that investigation of violations of international humanitarian law and of human rights law attributed to the Rwandese Patriotic Front be continued by the Prosecutor of the International Tribunal for Rwanda established by resolution 955 (1994).⁴⁶

In the above-mentioned letter, the Secretary-General also said he believed that, in view of resolution 955 (1994), the Commission's recommendations, namely, the establishment of an international tribunal and the continuation of the investigation into allegations of violations of international humanitarian law, had been already acted upon. Therefore, he considered that the Commission had discharged the mandate entrusted to it by the Council in its resolution 935 (1994).

The situation in Burundi

Dispatch of a Council mission to Burundi from 10 to 11 February 1995 and subsequent establishment of the International Commission of Inquiry in connection with the assassination on 21 October 1993 of the President of Burundi and the acts of violence that followed

As recorded in the note by the President of the Council dated 6 February 1995,⁴⁷ Council members, at the consultations of the whole of that date, decided to send a mission to Burundi and Rwanda. The mission's terms of reference in Burundi were (a) to hold consultations with the Special Representative of the Secretary-General on the situation regarding the political and security developments in Burundi and his efforts in that regard, and additional ways in which the United Nations might further underpin his efforts; (b) to hold talks with the President, the Prime Minister, the leadership of the security forces and the leaders of the opposition parties as well as United Nations agencies, members of the diplomatic corps, non-governmental organizations, the Office of the Organization of African Unity and other interested parties and convey to them the serious concerns of the Security Council over the recent political developments in Burundi; (c) to stress to all the parties the strong support of the Council for the Convention on Governance of 10 September 1994⁴⁸ and the Government constituted on the basis of it and for the process of national reconciliation, and the Council's rejection of all attempts to undermine them or to destabilize the region; and (d) to submit a report to the Council. The mission followed up on work done by an earlier Security Council mission to Burundi, on 13 and 14 August 1994.

By a letter dated 28 February 1995 addressed to the President of the Council,⁴⁹ the members of the Security Council mission to Burundi transmitted the report on their mission, which was conducted on 10 and 11 February 1995. As one of its recommendations, the mission suggested that an international commission of inquiry into the coup attempt of October 1993 and the massacres that had followed, as proposed by the Government of Burundi in accordance with the Convention on Governance, should be established as soon as possible.

By a statement by the President of the Council dated 9 March 1995,⁵⁰ the Council considered the report of its mission to Burundi, which had visited Bujumbura on 10 and 11 February,⁵¹ and welcomed the observations and recommendations contained therein. The Council reaffirmed the view that impunity was a fundamental problem in Burundi, one which seriously endangered security in the country, and stressed the importance it attached to assistance being given to help strengthen the national judicial system. It underlined the role that could be played by an international commission of inquiry into the 1993 coup attempt and into the massacres that had followed, established in accordance with the Convention on Governance.

By a statement by the President of the Council dated 29 March 1995,⁵² the Council recalled the statement by the President of 9 March 1995 and requested the Secretary-General to report to the Council on an urgent basis on what steps should be taken to establish an impartial commission of inquiry.

By a letter dated 28 July 1995 addressed to the President of the Council,⁵³ the Secretary-General submitted to the Council the report of his Special Envoy on the options for the establishment of an international commission of inquiry. The report concluded that neither a commission on the truth based on the Salvadoran model nor an international judicial commission of inquiry whose mandate was limited to purely judicial matters would be an adequate response to the need to put an end to impunity in Burundi. An international judicial commission of inquiry, however, could be viable and useful if its mandate would guarantee that its conclusions and recommendations would be put into effect and achieve the objective of prosecuting and punishing those responsible for the assassination of the President of Burundi on 21 October 1993, for the massacres that had followed and for other serious acts of violence and political crimes committed since October 1993. It also concluded that the international commission should be mandated not only to undertake a judicial inquiry but also to make recommendations of an institutional nature in the legal, political and/or administrative fields. On the basis of the conclusions, the Secretary-General recommended to the Council to establish such a commission by adopting a resolution as soon as possible.

By letters dated 8 and 23 August 1995 addressed to the President of the Council,⁵⁴ the representative of Burundi informed the Council that his Government had taken note with great interest of the contents of the report of the Secretary-General of 28 July 1995, and transmitted a statement of motives for the request for the constitution of an international commission of inquiry, together with the terms of reference of the Commission.

During the deliberations held in connection with the adoption of resolution 1012 (1995), the representative of Burundi stated that the initiative for establishing the commission came from the Burundi political actors in search of an impartial international arbiter. He stressed that the success of the work of the commission would depend on close and steady cooperation with the Government of Burundi in general and with the security forces and the national judicial system in particular. The commission would have to resist any temptation to exceed the mandate and the field of action delineated in the terms of reference proposed by the Government of Burundi and set out in the draft resolution. That code of conduct was dictated by a concern to prevent any compromise of national sovereignty, any interference in the internal affairs of Burundi and any possible mingling of matters within the commission's mandate with subjects outside its area of competence.⁵⁵

The representative of China stated that his country was of the view that the international community, in assisting with the settlement of the Burundi question, should fully respect the independence and sovereignty of Burundi and should not interfere in its internal affairs. Therefore, it was very important to heed and respect the views of the Government of Burundi in connection with the establishment of the commission. His delegation noted that while the mandate of the commission was extensive, touching on certain aspects upon Burundi's sovereignty and internal affairs, and although China had certain reservations about some elements of the mandate, it could be treated as a special case, in view of the acceptance by the Government of Burundi and of the special circumstances in that country.⁵⁶

The representative of the United States, stating that the resolution was drafted in close consultation with the Burundi authorities, underlined that it was the hope and intent of the Council that the commission would help to set Burundi firmly on the path to renewed peaceful and democratic governance along with respect for human rights. The commission would recommend measures to prevent any repetition of deeds similar to those investigated by the commission and to eradicate impunity in Burundi. It would remain up to the Government of Burundi to decide on what measures were taken.⁵⁷

The representative of Rwanda maintained that his delegation had important questions with respect to the role of the commission and the result it would be able to achieve.⁵⁸

By resolution 1012 (1995), which was adopted unanimously, the Council requested the Secretary-General to establish, as a matter of urgency, an international commission of inquiry, with the mandate (a) to establish the facts relating to the assassination of the President of Burundi on 21 October 1993, the massacres and other related serious acts of violence which followed; and (b) to recommend measures of a legal, political or administrative nature, as appropriate, after consultation with the Government of Burundi, and measures with regard to the bringing to justice of persons responsible for those acts, to prevent any repetition of deeds similar to those investigated by the commission and, in general, to eradicate impunity and promote national reconciliation in Burundi. In addition, the Council recommended that the international commission of inquiry be composed of five impartial and internationally respected, experienced jurists who should be selected by the Secretary-General and should be furnished with adequate expert staff, and that the Government of Burundi be duly informed. The Council also requested the Secretary-General to report to the Council on the establishment of the commission of inquiry, and further requested him, within three months from the commission's establishment, to submit an interim report to the Council on the work of the commission and to submit a final report when the commission completed its work.

By a letter dated 22 September 1995 addressed to the President of the Council,⁵⁹ the Secretary-General informed the Council that, in accordance with resolution 1012 (1995), he had appointed five members of the Commission. The President of the Council, by a letter dated 27 September 1995 addressed to the Secretary-General,⁶⁰ informed the Secretary-General that his letter had been brought to the attention of the members of the Council, who took note of the decision contained therein.

Part III

Decisions of the Security Council concerning the pacific settlement of disputes

Note

Chapter VI of the Charter contains various provisions according to which the Security Council may make recommendations to the parties to a dispute or situation. According to Article 33 (2) of the Charter, the Council may call on the parties to settle their disputes by such peaceful means as provided for in Article 33 (1). According to Article 36 (1) the Council may "recommend appropriate methods or procedures of adjustment". Article 37 (2) envisages that the Council may "recommend such terms of settlement as it may consider appropriate", and Article 38 provides that it may "make recommendations to the parties with a view to a pacific settlement of the dispute".

As part of its efforts aimed at the peaceful settlement of conflicts within the framework of Chapter VI of the Charter, the Council frequently endorsed or supported peace agreements concluded by the parties to a conflict, or recommended various methods or procedures of settlement, such as bilateral or multilateral negotiations,⁶¹ mediation or conciliation

Front to resume the negotiations on 15 March 1993 as agreed, in order to resolve the pending questions with a view to signing a peace agreement at the beginning of April 1993 at the latest. In connection with the situation in the Republic of Yemen, by resolution 924 (1994), the Council reminded all concerned that their political differences could not be resolved through the use of force, and urged them to return immediately to negotiations which would permit a peaceful resolution of their differences and a restoration of peace and stability. In connection with the situation in Tajikistan, by a statement by the President of the Council dated 6 November 1995 (S/PRST/1995/54), the Council called upon the Tajik parties to begin as a matter of urgency "the continual round of talks with the aim of concluding a general agreement" in accordance with the provisions of the Protocol on the fundamental principles for establishing peace and national accord in Tajikistan signed by the President of Tajikistan and the leader of the Tajik opposition on 17 August 1995 (S/1995/72, annex).

⁶¹ For instance, in connection with the situation concerning Rwanda, by resolution 812 (1993), stressing the need for a negotiated political solution, in the framework of the agreements signed by the parties in Arusha, in order to put an end to the conflict in Rwanda, the Council urged the Government of Rwanda and the Rwandese Patriotic efforts undertaken by the Secretary-General⁶² or by regional arrangements.⁶³

Relevant appeals and recommendations were in general addressed to the parties involved or concerned, which were not only States but also, in several instances, non-State actors. For instance, in connection with the situation in Tajikistan, by a statement by the President of the Council dated 23 August 1993,⁶⁴ the Council urged “the Government of Tajikistan and all opposition groups” to accept as soon as possible the need for an overall political solution and to participate ⁶² For example, in connection with the situation in Cyprus, by resolution 839 (1993), the Council called on both parties to carry forward expeditiously and in a constructive manner the intercommunal talks under the auspices of the Secretary-General. In connection with the situation in Tajikistan, by a statement by the President of the Council dated 8 November 1994 (S/PRST/1994/65), the Council reaffirmed its support for the efforts by the Secretary-General and his Special Envoy to facilitate the political dialogue between the Government of Tajikistan and the Tajik opposition aimed at achieving national reconciliation. In connection with the situation in Sierra Leone, by a statement by the President of the Council dated 27 November 1995 (S/PRST/1995/57), the Council expressed its appreciation to the Secretary-General for his offer of good offices in Sierra Leone and urged the Revolutionary United Front to take advantage of that offer, thus enabling both parties to enter into negotiations.

in a negotiating process for the early establishment of a ceasefire and eventual national reconciliation with the widest possible participation of all political groups and all the regions of the country. In connection with the situation in Burundi, by a statement by the President dated 22 December 1994,⁶⁵ the Council encouraged “the Government, the National Assembly, the political parties and all others concerned in Burundi, and in particular the army”, to respect and give support to the Convention on Governance of 10 September 1994. In connection with the situation in Liberia, by resolution 972 (1995), the Council called on “the Liberian leaders and factions” to demonstrate their commitment to the peace process by maintaining the ceasefire, which had come into effect on 28 December 1994.

This part of the chapter will aim to provide an overview of the Council’s practice in relation to the peaceful settlement of disputes by setting out examples of the most relevant decisions adopted by the Council during the period under review. As it is not always possible to ascertain the concrete basis within the framework of the Charter on which individual Council decisions have been made, the overview will aim to set out relevant decisions without ascribing them to specific Articles of the Charter. Council decisions related to investigation and fact-finding missions have been already covered in part II of this chapter.

A. Recommendations relating to terms, methods or procedures of settlement

The following overview sets out instances in which the Council proposed or endorsed terms of settlement, or recommended procedures or methods of settlement.

The situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina

By resolution 820 (1993) of 17 April 1993, the Council commended the peace plan for Bosnia and Herzegovina in the form agreed to by two of the Bosnian parties and set out in the report of the Secretary-General of 26 March 1993,⁶⁶ namely the Agreement on Interim Arrangements, the nine Constitutional Principles, the provisional provincial map and the Agreement for Peace in Bosnia and Herzegovina.

⁶⁵ S/PRST/1994/82.

By resolution 942 (1994) of 23 September 1994, the Council expressed its approval of the proposed territorial settlement for the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina which had been put to the Bosnian parties as part of an overall peace settlement.

In a statement by the President of the Council dated 6 January 1995,⁶⁷ the Council deemed it imperative to intensify efforts under the auspices of the Contact Group to achieve an overall settlement on the basis of the acceptance of the peace plan of the Contact Group as a starting point.

In a statement by the President of the Council dated 8 September 1995,⁶⁸ the Council welcomed the joint statement issued at the conclusion of the meeting held under the auspices of the Contact Group in Geneva on the same day between the Foreign Ministers of Bosnia and Herzegovina, Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) and in particular the agreement by the parties on the Declaration of Principles.

By resolution 1031 (1995) of 15 December 1995, the Council welcomed and supported the General Framework Agreement for Peace in Bosnia and Herzegovina and the Annexes thereto (collectively the "Peace Agreement"),⁶⁹ signed on 14 December 1995 at the Paris Peace Conference.

The situation in Burundi

In a statement by the President of the Council dated 9 March 1995,⁷⁰ the Council reaffirmed its support for the Convention on Governance and for the coalition Government established under it, and the implementation of the provisions of the Convention calling for the holding of a national debate with the participation of all segments of the society in Burundi, as a means of fostering political dialogue.

The situation in Tajikistan

In a statement by the President of the Council dated 25 August 1995,⁷¹ the Council welcomed the protocol on the fundamental principles for establishing peace and national accord in Tajikistan signed by the President of Tajikistan and the leader of the Tajik opposition on 17 August 1995,⁷² and supported the agreement of the parties to conduct the continual round of talks due to begin on 18 September 1995, with the aim of concluding a general agreement on the establishment of peace and national accord in Tajikistan.

The situation in Afghanistan

In a statement by the President of the Council dated 30 November 1994,⁷³ the Council welcomed the acceptance by the warring parties and other Afghan representatives of a step-by-step process of national reconciliation through the establishment of a fully representative and broad-based Authoritative Council, which would (a) negotiate and oversee a ceasefire, (b) establish a national security force to collect and safeguard heavy weapons and provide for security throughout the country and (c) form a transitional government to lay the groundwork for a democratically chosen government, possibly utilizing traditional decision-making structures such as a "Grand Assembly".

The situation relating to Nagorny Karabakh

In a statement by the President of the Council dated 6 April 1993,⁷⁴ the Council expressed its support for the peace process of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe (CSCE). Similar expressions of support were made in the subsequent decisions.⁷⁵

Complaint by Ukraine regarding the Decree of the Supreme Soviet of the Russian Federation regarding Sevastopol

In a statement by the President of the Council dated 20 July 1993,⁷⁶ the Council welcomed the efforts of the Presidents and the Governments of the Russian Federation and Ukraine to settle any differences between them by peaceful means.

The situation in the Middle East

Throughout the reporting period, in statements by the President of the Council accompanying the resolutions by which the Council extended the mandate of the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon, the Council reiterated its full support for the Taif Agreement.⁷⁷

The situation in the occupied Arab territories

By resolution 904 (1994) of 18 March 1994, the Council reaffirmed its support for the peace process under way and called for the implementation of the Declaration of Principles, signed by the Government of Israel and the Palestine Liberation Organization on 13 September 1993 in Washington, D.C., without delay.

Agreement signed on 4 April 1994 between the Governments of Chad and the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya

By resolution 910 (1994) of 14 April 1994 and similarly by resolution 915 (1994) of 4 May 1994, the Council welcomed the agreement signed at Surt, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, on 4 April 1994 by the Governments of Chad and the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya concerning the practical modalities for the implementation of the Judgment delivered by the International Court of Justice on 3 February 1994 regarding the Aouzou Strip.⁷⁸

The situation in Georgia

In a statement by the President of the Council dated 8 April 1994,⁷⁹ the Council considered the signing in Moscow on 4 April 1994 of the Declaration on Measures for a Political Settlement of the Georgian/Abkhaz Conflict⁸⁰ and the Quadripartite Agreement on Voluntary Return of Refugees and Displaced Persons⁸¹ as an encouraging event, laying the basis for further progress towards the settlement of the conflict.

In a statement by the President of the Council dated 2 December 1994,⁸² the Council called upon all parties, in particular the Abkhaz side, to reach substantive progress in the negotiations under the auspices of the United Nations and with the assistance of the Russian Federation as facilitator and with the participation of representatives of CSCE aimed at achieving a comprehensive political settlement of the conflict, including on the political status of Abkhazia, respecting fully the sovereignty and territorial integrity of the Republic of Georgia, based on the principles set out in all the relevant resolutions of the Council. By resolution 993 (1995) of 12 May 1995, the Council reiterated such a call.

The situation in Liberia

By resolution 813 (1993) of 26 March 1993, the Council reaffirmed its belief that the Yamoussoukro IV Accord of 30 October 1991 offered the best possible framework for a peaceful resolution of the Liberian conflict by creating the necessary conditions for free and fair elections in Liberia.⁸³

By resolution 856 (1993) of 10 August 1993, the Council welcomed the signing under the auspices of the Economic Community of West African States, on 25 July 1993, at Cotonou, Benin, of a Peace Agreement between the Interim Government of National Unity of Liberia, the National Patriotic Front of Liberia and the United Liberation Movement for Democracy.⁸⁴

By resolution 1014 (1995) of 15 September 1995, the Council welcomed the Abuja Agreement signed by the Liberian parties on 19 August 1995,⁸⁵ which amended and supplemented the Cotonou Agreement and the Akosombo Agreement⁸⁶ as subsequently clarified by the Accra Agreement.⁸⁷

⁷⁸ In his report on the United Nations Aouzou Strip Observer Group (UNASOG) of 6 June 1994, the Secretary-General stated that the accomplishment of the mandate of UNASOG to observe the implementation of the Agreement amply demonstrated "the useful role, as envisaged by the Charter, which the United Nations [could] play in the peaceful settlement of disputes when the parties cooperate[d] fully with the Organization" (S/1994/672, para. 8).

The situation in Angola

In a statement by the President of the Council dated 21 November 1994,⁸⁸ the Council welcomed the signing of the Lusaka Protocol⁸⁹ by the representatives of the Government of Angola and UNITA at Lusaka on 20 November 1994, and stated that the Protocol together with the Bicesse Accords should lay the foundation for lasting peace in Angola.

B. Decisions involving the Secretary-General in the Council's efforts at the pacific settlement of disputes

Article 99 of the Charter provides that the Secretary-General may bring to the attention of the Security Council "any matter which in his opinion may threaten the maintenance of international peace and security". The Council's efforts aimed at the pacific settlement of disputes frequently require the involvement of the Secretary-General, who, in coordination with the Council or upon its request, in many instances, facilitates peace efforts in various ways, such as his "good offices" function, diplomatic efforts for promotion of a political settlement, dispatch and command of peacekeeping operations, and establishment of international criminal tribunals. Council decisions related to these efforts by the Secretary-General, including the Council's endorsement and support for them during the period under review, are covered in chapter VI, part V.

C. Decisions involving regional arrangements or agencies

During the period under review, the Security Council not only called upon the parties to cooperate with regional arrangements, but also, in accordance with Article 52 of the Charter, frequently expressed its support and appreciation for the peace efforts undertaken by regional arrangements or requested the Secretary-General to undertake such efforts in conjunction with regional arrangements. Council decisions regarding the joint or parallel efforts undertaken by the Council and regional agencies or arrangements in the pacific settlement of disputes during the period under review are covered in detail in chapter XII.

Part IV
Constitutional discussion bearing on the interpretation or application of the provisions of Chapter VI of the Charter

Note

This part of the chapter aims to highlight the most important aspects and arguments raised in deliberations of the Security Council with regard to the interpretation of specific provisions of the Charter concerning the Council's role in the peaceful settlement of disputes. This includes in particular discussions concerning the competence of the Council to consider a dispute or situation and its power to make appropriate recommendations within the framework of Chapter VI of the Charter.

In accordance with the relevant provisions of Chapter VI, the Council shall, when it deems necessary, make recommendations in relation to disputes or situations which are likely to endanger international peace and security. Accordingly, this part will focus on discussions concerning the existence of a dispute or situation within the meaning of Chapter VI of the Charter.

When making recommendations to the parties, the Council is also required, pursuant to Article 36 of the Charter, to take into consideration (a) procedures for settlement which have already been adopted by the parties, and (b) the general rule that disputes of a legal nature ought to be referred to the International Court of Justice. Instances in which the requirements stipulated by Article 36 (2) and (3) became the subject of deliberations will, therefore, also be considered below.

Since the referral of a situation or dispute to the Council was challenged by Member States on the basis of distinct arguments, some items are considered under several subheadings.

Assertion that international peace and security are not endangered

In several instances, Member States, by asserting that a dispute or situation did not pose a threat to international peace and security, also challenged the Council's general competence, under Chapter VI, to consider certain matters or make recommendations in relation thereto. Such instances may therefore be illustrated in this section, even though the expression "threat to the peace" usually indicates the consideration of a situation before the Council under Chapter VII of the Charter.

With regard to the situation in the Republic of Yemen, by a letter dated 31 May 1994 addressed to the President of the Council,⁹⁰ the Government of Yemen conveyed its "great surprise and sorrow" that the Council was addressing the internal issue of Yemen on the basis of "erroneous information and through intermediaries who [were] not involved", despite the fact that Yemen, a Member State, had yet to make any request to the Council in that regard. The Council was urged to reject all requests made by any party with regard to the issue between the Yemeni people and the rebels which was "an internal matter within the meaning of Article 2 (7) of the Charter". In its view, the provisions of the Charter affirmed that no Member State might submit the matter of an internal conflict other than in the case "where its interests [were] harmed or where the dispute [threatened] international peace and security". The Government of Yemen stressed that neither of those requirements was met in the case of the Yemen question. Therefore, the Council was urged to deal with the situation in Yemen as an internal matter in accordance with Article 2 (7); reject any request for a discussion of the question of Yemen that was not made by its Government; and bring pressure on the Member States that were "trying to find a foothold" for themselves in the situation in Yemen to refrain from interfering in the internal affairs of Yemen, since it was likely to "inflame the situation and prolong the warfare and widen its scope".

On 1 June 1994, the Council held its 3386th meeting to consider, for the first time, the situation in the Republic of Yemen and adopted resolution 924 (1994), by which it considered that the continuance of the situation "could endanger peace and security in the region".

In deliberations concerning the decision by the Democratic People's Republic of Korea in respect of the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons, the representative of the Democratic People's Republic of Korea argued that his Government's withdrawal from the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons and the problems in implementing the safeguards agreement could not be considered to "wreck world peace and threaten the security of other countries"; it was a "self-defence measure" based on its "right under the Treaty" in the exercise of its national sovereignty. He further stressed that "no legal or technical grounds" could be found to discuss the so-called "nuclear problem" in the Council, and opposed such a discussion. The draft resolution before the Council was encroaching upon his country's sovereignty and ignored the "requirements of the Charter", the statute of the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) and the norms of international law that disputes should be resolved through dialogue and negotiations, as stipulated in Article 33 of the Charter.⁹¹

On the other hand, the representative of the Republic of Korea underlined that by refusing IAEA inspections of suspected nuclear sites and by deciding to pull out of the Treaty, the Democratic People's Republic of Korea posed "a serious threat to international peace and security, in both the global and regional contexts".⁹² The representative of the Russian Federation considered that the withdrawal of the Democratic People's Republic of Korea from the Treaty would be "a serious threat to regional and international security" and emphasized that the consideration of the issue in the Council was of particular importance.⁹³

At the end of deliberations, the Council adopted resolution 825 (1993), by which it called upon the Democratic People's Republic of Korea to reconsider the announcement contained in the letter of 12 March 1993 from the representative of that country addressed to the President of the Council⁹⁴ and thus to reaffirm its commitment to the Non-Proliferation Treaty.

The legal nature of disputes, in the light of Article 36 (3) of the Charter

Article 36 (3) of the Charter provides that the Security Council, in making recommendations under Article 36, should “take into consideration that legal disputes should as a general rule be referred by the parties to the International Court of Justice in accordance with the provisions of the Statute of the Court”.

In the following instance, Member States questioned the competence of the Security Council to consider a dispute, owing to its alleged legal nature, or advanced arguments in favour of a referral of such dispute to the International Court of Justice.

In deliberations concerning items relating to the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, the representative of that country challenged the fact that the Council was meeting to consider a matter that threatened international peace and security. His delegation held that, whereas the Council was meeting to consider a draft resolution⁹⁵ that sought to intensify the sanctions imposed by resolution 748 (1992) under the pretext of the non-compliance of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya with resolution 731 (1992), his country had in fact fully responded to the requirements of the latter resolution. The sole unresolved question, arising from the demand by the United States and the United Kingdom that the two alleged suspects in the bombing of Pan Am flight 103 over Lockerbie, Scotland, be extradited, remained outstanding because of a legal wrangle over which country had the competence to try those individuals. In his country’s view, the question was essentially settled by the provisions of the Montreal Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Acts against the Safety of Civil Aviation, of 1971, which stipulated jurisdiction regarding the trial of the accused to the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya. That country had therefore submitted the question of the application of the Convention’s rules to the International Court of Justice, the decision of which was still pending.⁹⁶

The representative of the Sudan, speaking on behalf of the League of Arab States, expressed the view that the dispute was legal in nature and belonged in the courts and institutions directly concerned, and not in the Security Council, which was not mandated by the Charter to exercise such a function. This legal dispute, between the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya and France, the United Kingdom and the United States, regarding the extradition of the two accused, should be dealt with in a court of law, specifically by the International Court of Justice. In this regard, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya had expressed its willingness to accept the pending decision of the Court and had also expressed its eagerness to “respond to international efforts aimed at resolving the conflict through negotiations, mediation, and legal settlement, in accordance with Article 33 of the Charter”. His delegation argued that the draft resolution before the Council⁹⁵ was not the best way to end the dispute. It would lead to negative results and could shake the confidence of the smaller countries in the Council’s neutrality because of overlapping competence of the mechanisms engaged in the settlement of international disputes. The interpretation of legal texts, especially the Charter, should be carried out only by judicial organs, and no other body could arrogate that competence for itself.⁹⁷

Reference to peaceful means of settlement of disputes adopted by the parties, in the light of Article 33 (1) of the Charter

Article 33 (1) requires the parties to a dispute, the continuance of which is likely to endanger the maintenance of international peace and security, first of all to seek a solution by peaceful means, such as negotiation, conciliation or arbitration.

During the period under review, by a letter dated 4 March 1994 from the representative of Nigeria addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁹⁸ the Government of Nigeria expressed its hope that, concerning the border dispute between Nigeria and Cameroon, the Council would encourage “the initiative for bilateral resolution of the dispute”, in accordance with Article 33 (1) of the Charter, namely the summit talks to which the two countries had committed themselves.

Relevance of procedures for the settlement of disputes adopted by the parties, in the light of Article 33 (2) of the Charter

Article 33 (2) provides that “the Security Council shall, when it deems necessary, call upon the parties to settle their disputes by such means” as referred to in Article 33 (1), namely, negotiation, enquiry, mediation, conciliation, arbitration, judicial settlement, resort to regional agencies or arrangements, or other peaceful means of their choice. The importance placed on the parties’ efforts to reach a settlement is also reflected in Article 36 (2), which provides that “the Security Council should take into consideration any procedures for the settlement of the dispute which have already been adopted by the parties”.

In one instance, a Member State called upon the Security Council to take action under Article 33 (2). By a letter dated 29 June 1995 from the representative of the Sudan addressed to the President of the Council,⁹⁹ the Government of the Sudan called on the Council, in connection with “the aggression on the Sudanese territory of Halaib by the Arab Republic of Egypt”, to urge the Government of Egypt to make an immediate start towards resolving the dispute through “negotiations” by peaceful means based on the previous agreements between the two countries, and in accordance with Article 33 (2) of the Charter.

In the following instances, the deliberations of the Security Council turned to the question whether the priority accorded to the parties’ own efforts by the above-mentioned provisions may, in certain circumstances, restrict the Council’s competence to consider a dispute.

In deliberations concerning the decision by the Democratic People’s Republic of Korea in respect of the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons, the representative of the Democratic People’s Republic of Korea stressed that the very convening of the Council blocked the efforts towards dialogue. In his view, if the Council adopted the draft resolution before it,¹⁰⁰ that would result in heightened tension in the situation on the Korean peninsula and pose a threat to the peace and security of the world.¹⁰¹

The representative of the United States indicated that her Government would be willing to meet with the Democratic People’s Republic of Korea to help resolve, as part of the international community’s efforts, the situation resulting from actions it had taken in the nuclear area.¹⁰² The representative of the United Kingdom stated the view of his Government that it was essential that the issue be treated “multilaterally as well as bilaterally”. His Government accepted that there was an important role to be played by bilateral contacts, but also underlined that it was “absolutely right and proper” that the Council should play its role in handling the multilateral aspect. While welcoming the efforts of IAEA and the prospect of contacts between the Democratic People’s Republic of Korea and other States, the speaker stressed that the Council must remain seized of the matter and that it might need to be prepared to consider further action as necessary.¹⁰³ In the view of the Russian Federation, multilateral efforts should work in tandem with a search for a solution to the problem through bilateral channels between interested parties.¹⁰⁴

By resolution 825 (1993), the Council welcomed recent signs of improved cooperation between the Democratic People’s Republic of Korea and IAEA and the prospect of contacts between the Democratic People’s Republic of Korea and other Member States.

In deliberations concerning the situation in the occupied Arab territories, at the 3505th meeting, which was held in response to the request in a letter dated 22 February 1995 from the representative of Djibouti addressed to the President of the Council,¹⁰⁵ the observer of Palestine argued that the Council had a fundamental responsibility regarding the settlement activity in the occupied Palestinian territory, including the preservation of the integrity of international law, international humanitarian law and its previous resolutions. It also had the responsibility of guaranteeing the continuation and integrity of the peace process, as it had done with the adoption of resolution 904 (1994). The speaker stressed that, in order to achieve the ultimate goal of peace, the total cessation of all settlement activities was called for and that, in that respect, the backing and support of the Council was needed.¹⁰⁶ Other speakers also stressed the role of the Security Council and its responsibilities in the peace process and called upon the Council to adopt specific measures.¹⁰⁷

On the other hand, the representative of Israel emphasized that the initiative of the Palestine Liberation Organization to debate the issue of settlements in the Council was “incompatible” with its signed commitments vis-à-vis Israel, whereby all outstanding permanent status issues, such as settlements and Jerusalem, would be resolved in direct and bilateral negotiations at a specific time, namely, in the negotiations on permanent status, at the final stage of the process. These commitments were made throughout the agreements including the Declaration of Principles and the Gaza-Jericho Agreement. Therefore, the place to address the differences between the two parties must be at the negotiating table as agreed.¹⁰⁸ The representative of the United States stated that it would not be productive or useful for the Council to involve itself in a question that the parties had agreed to cover when they addressed permanent status issues in their negotiations. His Government believed that debate in the Council could only sour the atmosphere of the ongoing talks and deflect the parties from the need to work together, and therefore opposed any activity that would only complicate efforts to spur the negotiating process.¹⁰⁹ A similar argument was heard from other speakers who stressed that the bilateral negotiations between the parties were as the appropriate channel for solving issues such as the settlements.¹¹⁰

The representative of Italy expressed the opinion that the request for the meeting by Djibouti, on behalf of the Group of Arab States, was justified procedurally and substantively. Legally, Articles 34 and 35 of the Charter and rules 2 and 3 of the Council’s provisional rules of procedure provided for the President’s calling a meeting at the request of any member of the Council and, moreover, provided that any Member of the United Nations might bring to the Council’s attention any dispute or any situation that might lead to international friction or give rise to a dispute. Politically, the Council could not ignore a request emanating from 21 Member States.¹¹¹

No action was taken at the end of the deliberations at the 3505th meeting.

Introductory note

This chapter deals with action taken by the Security Council with respect to threats to the peace, breaches of the peace and acts of aggression, within the framework of Chapter VII of the Charter.

During the period under review, Chapter VII of the Charter was invoked by the Security Council in a greater number of its decisions than in the previous period. Most of those decisions related to the situation in the former Yugoslavia and the situation concerning Rwanda, but the Council also adopted measures under Chapter VII in connection with the situation in Somalia, the situation in Liberia and the question concerning Haiti, and in order to ensure the full cooperation of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya in surrendering the suspects in the terrorist attacks against Pan Am flight 103 and UTA flight 772.

This chapter will focus on material selected to highlight how the provisions of Chapter VII of the Charter were interpreted by the Council in its deliberations and applied in its decisions. Given the increase during the period in the number of decisions in which the Council invoked Chapter VII, and in order to give due focus to the key elements that arose in its decisions or deliberations, several Articles that were grouped together in previous Supplements have been dealt with individually in separate parts of this chapter. Thus, parts I to IV of the chapter focus on the practice of the Council in accordance with Articles 39 to 42, while part V focuses on Articles 43 to 47, part VI deals with Article 48, part VII addresses the obligations of Member States under Article 49, and parts VIII and IX deal, respectively, with the practice of the Council with respect to Articles 50 and 51. Each section treats the different aspects of the Council's consideration of the Article in focus, under relevant subheadings. This structure is intended to better organize the material relevant to each Article.

Part I

Determination of a threat to the peace, breach of the peace, or act of aggression under Article 39 of the Charter

Article 39

The Security Council shall determine the existence of any threat to the peace, breach of the peace, or act of aggression and shall make recommendations, or decide what measures shall be taken in accordance with Articles 41 and 42, to maintain or restore international peace and security.

Note

During the period under review, the Security Council adopted several resolutions determining, or expressing concern at, the existence of threats to regional and/or international peace and security in connection with the situation in Angola; the question concerning Haiti; and the situation concerning Rwanda. While resolutions were adopted that referred to threats to peace and security, there was no explicit invocation of Article 39 of the Charter. The continuance of threats to international peace and security was determined in connection with the situation in the former Yugoslavia, and in connection with the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, while the continuance of threats to regional peace and security was determined in connection with the situation in Liberia and the situation in Somalia. In all of those instances, the Council adopted measures under Chapter VII of the Charter.

In several other instances, Member States, in correspondence addressed to the President of the Council, sought to bring to the attention of the Council matters which they alleged posed a threat to the peace.¹

No corresponding determination was made by the Council in those cases. While a meeting was requested in each correspondence, the only meeting convened to discuss the alleged threat was in response to a letter from the representative of Burundi requesting an urgent meeting to consider an impending "civil war" after the military coup d'état in Burundi, on 21 October 1993.² In that letter, the representative indicated to the Council that the situation there could have "incalculable consequences for international peace and security".

In the absence of express references to Article 39, it is not always possible to ascribe to the Council with any certainty decisions concerning that Article. The Council decisions discussed below may, however, help to shed light on the Council's interpretation and application of Article 39. Sections A and B provide an overview of the Council's decisions that may be interpreted as having reference to the principles contained in Article 39. Section C contains, in cases 1 alleged interference of Pakistan in the internal affairs of Afghanistan (S/1995/1014); (d) letter dated 27 October 1993 from the President of Tajikistan to the President of the Council urging the Council to consider the ongoing tension along the Tajik-Afghan border (S/26659); (e) letter dated 21 June 1993 from the representative of the Sudan to the President of the Council alleging blatant aggression of Egyptian authorities against the Sudanese sovereignty in the Halayib area (S/25978); the same allegations were asserted in a letter dated 6 July 1995 from the representative of the Sudan to the President of the Council (S/1995/544); (f) letter dated 17 May 1994 from the representative of Rwanda to the President of the Council concerning the alleged aggression committed by Uganda against Rwanda (S/1994/586).

² Letter dated 25 October 1993 (S/26626). At the 3297th meeting, on 25 October 1993, the members of the Council, through a statement made by the President of the Council (S/26631), inter alia, condemned the acts of violence and the loss of life which had been caused by the perpetrators of the military coup. The Council demanded that they desist forthwith from taking any action which would exacerbate tension and plunge the country into more violence and bloodshed, which could have serious implications for peace and stability in the region.

and 2, a summary of relevant constitutional discussions.

A. Decisions of the Security Council determining the existence of a threat to the peace

The situation in Angola. By resolution 864 (1993) of 15 September 1993, the Council determined that, as a result of the military actions of the National Union for the Total Independence of Angola (UNITA), the situation in Angola constituted a threat to international peace and security.

The question concerning Haiti. By resolution 841 (1993) of 16 June 1993, the Council expressed concern that the “mass displacements of population” in Haiti could become or aggravate threats to international peace and security. It determined that, in those unique and exceptional circumstances, the continuation of the situation threatened international peace and security in the region. By resolution 873 (1993) of 13 October 1993, the Council determined that the failure of the military authorities and police to fulfil obligations under the Governors Island Agreement constituted a threat to peace and security in the region. By resolution 875 (1993) of 16 October 1993, the Council reaffirmed its determination that, in those unique and exceptional circumstances, the failure of the military authorities in Haiti to fulfil their obligations under the Governors Island Agreement constituted a threat to peace and security in the region. In two subsequent statements made by the President of the Council on behalf of the members of the Council, the Council reaffirmed that the Governors Island Agreement remained fully in force as the only valid framework for the solution of the crisis in Haiti, which continued to threaten peace and security in the region.³ By resolution 917 (1994) of 6 May 1994, the Council again reaffirmed its determination that, in those unique and exceptional circumstances, the situation created by the failure of the military authorities in Haiti to fulfil their obligations under the Governors Island Agreement and to comply with relevant Council resolutions constituted a threat to peace and security. By resolution 940 (1994) of 31 July 1994, the Council expressed concern at the significant deterioration of the humanitarian situation in Haiti, and determined that the situation continued to constitute a threat to peace and security in the region.

The situation in Rwanda. By resolution 918 (1994) of 17 May 1994, the Council stated that it was deeply disturbed by the magnitude of the human suffering caused by the conflict, and concerned that the situation in Rwanda constituted a threat to peace and security in the region. By resolution 929 (1994) of 19 June 1994, the Council determined that the magnitude of the humanitarian crisis in Rwanda constituted a threat to peace and security in the region. By resolution 955 (1994) of 8 November 1994, the Council expressed concern at the reports indicating that genocide and other systematic, widespread and flagrant violations of international humanitarian law had been committed in Rwanda, and determined that the situation in Rwanda continued to constitute a threat to international peace and security.

Establishment of an international tribunal for the prosecution of persons responsible for serious violations of international humanitarian law committed in the territory of the former Yugoslavia. The Council expressed its grave alarm at the continued reports of widespread violations of international humanitarian law occurring within the territory of the former Yugoslavia, and determined that the situation constituted a threat to international peace and security.⁴

The situation in Liberia. By resolution 813 (1993) of 26 March 1993, the Council condemned the armed attacks against the peacekeeping forces of the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS) in Liberia by one of the parties to the conflict, and determined that the deterioration of the situation in Liberia constituted a threat to international peace and security, particularly in the region of West Africa.

B. Decisions of the Security Council determining a continuing threat to the peace

Items relating to the situation in the former Yugoslavia

The situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina. In a statement made by the President on behalf of the Security Council,⁵ the Council demanded that all sides immediately cease all forms of military action throughout Bosnia and Herzegovina, cease acts of violence against civilians, comply with their previous commitments including the ceasefire, and redouble their efforts to settle the conflict. Having determined in the relevant resolutions that the situation constituted a threat to international peace and security, the Council insisted that those steps had to be taken. By resolution 816 (1993) of 31 March 1993, the Council was deeply concerned by the various reports of the Secretary-General concerning violations of the ban on military flights in the airspace of Bosnia and Herzegovina, and determined that the grave situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina continued to be a threat to international peace and security. By resolution 836 (1993) of 4 June 1993, the Council was deeply concerned by the continued armed hostilities in the territory of Bosnia and Herzegovina which ran totally counter to the peace plan, and determined that the situation continued to be a threat to international peace and security. By resolution 859 (1993) of 24 August 1993, the Council was deeply concerned at the deterioration of humanitarian conditions in Bosnia and Herzegovina, including in and around Mostar, and determined that the grave situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina continued to be a threat to international peace and security. By resolution 913 (1994) of 22 April 1994, the Council recalled all its previous relevant resolutions on the conflict in Bosnia and Herzegovina, and determined that the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina continued to constitute a threat to international peace and security. By resolution 941 (1994) of 23 September 1994, the Council emphasized that the practice of ethnic cleansing by the Bosnian Serbs constituted a clear violation of international humanitarian law and posed a serious threat to the peace effort, and determined that the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina continued to constitute a threat to international peace and security. By resolution 942 (1994) of 23 September 1994, the Council condemned the decision by the Bosnian Serb party to refuse to accept the proposed territorial settlement, and determined that the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina continued to constitute a threat to international peace and security. By resolution 1031 (1995) of 15 December 1995, having considered the report of the Secretary-General,⁶ the Council determined that the situation in the region continued to constitute a threat to international peace and security.

United Nations Protection Force (UNPROFOR). In two subsequent resolutions,⁷ the Council was deeply concerned by the repeated violations by the parties and others concerned of their ceasefire obligations, and determined that the situation thus created constituted a threat to peace and security in the region. By resolution 998 (1995) of 16 June 1995, the Council was deeply concerned by the continuing armed hostilities in the territory of Bosnia and Herzegovina, and determined that the situation in the former Yugoslavia continued to be a threat to international peace and security.

The situation prevailing in and around the safe area of Bihac. By resolution 958 (1994) of 19 November 1994, the Council reiterated its concern about the deteriorating situation in and around the safe area of Bihac, and determined that the situation in the former Yugoslavia continued to constitute a threat to international peace and security.

The situation in the former Yugoslavia. By resolutions 1021 (1995) and 1022 (1995), both of 22 November 1995, the Council recalled all its previous relevant resolutions concerning the conflicts in the former Yugoslavia, and determined that the situation in the region continued to constitute a threat to international peace and security.

Letters dated 20 and 23 December 1991 from France, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the United States of America⁸

By resolution 883 (1993) of 11 November 1993, the Council determined that the continued failure by the Government of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya to demonstrate by concrete actions its renunciation of terrorism, and in particular its continued failure to respond fully and effectively to the requests and decisions contained in resolutions 731 (1992) and 748 (1992), constituted a threat to international peace and security.

⁷ See, respectively, resolutions 807 (1993) and 815 (1993).

⁸ Decisions on this question were also adopted by the Council in 1991 and 1992.

The situation in Somalia

By resolution 814 (1993) of 26 March 1993, the Council noted with deep regret and concern the continuing reports of widespread violations of international humanitarian law and the general absence of the rule of law, and determined that the situation in Somalia continued to threaten peace and security in the region. By resolution 837 (1993) of 6 June 1993, the Council was gravely alarmed at the premeditated armed attacks launched by forces apparently belonging to the United Somali Congress/Somali National Alliance against the personnel of the United Nations Operation in Somalia II (UNOSOM II), and determined that the situation in Somalia continued to threaten peace and security in the region. In three subsequent resolutions, the Council condemned the acts of violence and armed attacks against persons engaged in humanitarian and peacekeeping efforts, and determined that the situation in Somalia continued to threaten peace and security in the region.⁹ By resolution 954 (1994) of 4 November 1994, the Council recognized that the lack of progress in the Somali peace process and in national reconciliation, in particular the lack of sufficient cooperation from the Somali parties over security issues, had fundamentally undermined the United Nations objectives in Somalia, and determined that the situation in Somalia continued to threaten peace and security.

C. Constitutional discussions arising in connection with the principles contained in Article 39

During the period under review, in the course of the Council's deliberations relating to the adoption of the resolutions referred to in this part of the chapter, a number of speakers described the various situations on the Council's agenda as constituting a threat to international peace and security.¹⁰ This section will highlight the deliberations in the Council pertaining to whether the situation in question did, indeed, constitute a threat to international peace and security and the Council's responsibility in that regard. In both case 1 and case 2 below, the Council's deliberations related to a resolution adopted under Chapter VII of the Charter.

In the deliberations held in connection with the adoption of resolution 841 (1993),¹¹ the Council considered a letter from the representative of Haiti to the President of the Council,¹² in which the representative of Haiti stated that, despite efforts by the international community, constitutional order had yet to be re-established in Haiti, given the de facto authorities' continued obstruction of proposed initiatives, and requested that the Council make universal and mandatory the sanctions imposed by the Organization of American States (OAS). The President drew the Council's attention to a letter from the representative of Cuba, in which the latter informed the Council of his Government's view of resolution 841 (1993),¹³ pointing out that the resolution characterized the question of the Haitian refugees as a threat to international peace and security in the region. He noted that Cuba, being one of Haiti's closest neighbours, had received thousands of refugees from Haiti and had never considered that the flow of refugees threatened peace and security in the geographical region. It was considered as a purely humanitarian question which needed to be resolved, through the international organizations and bodies dealing with refugees and displaced persons and, as such, did not fall under the mandate of the Council.

The representative of Venezuela stated that the situation in Haiti was "undoubtedly a threat to international peace and security, in particular in the Caribbean basin, and that it was not a question of interference in Haiti's internal affairs".¹⁴ He also noted that the situation in Haiti marked the first time that the Council had adopted a resolution implementing to the adoption of the resolutions referred to in part I of the present chapter set out in chapter VIII.

Chapter VII in connection with a country in the American hemisphere. A number of speakers supported the imposition of limited sanctions by resolution 841 (1993),¹⁵ for the purpose of advancing the negotiating process.

In deliberations held in connection with the adoption of resolution 940 (1994),¹⁶ the Council considered a letter addressed to the Secretary-General from the representative of Haiti,¹⁷ transmitting a letter from President Aristide, in which the international community was called on to take “prompt and decisive action” regarding the situation in Haiti. Members of OAS participating in the meeting similarly viewed the crisis in Haiti as not being a threat to international peace and security that would warrant the use of force. The representative of Mexico stated that, in the opinion of his delegation, the crisis in Haiti was “not a threat to peace, a breach of the peace or an act of aggression such as would warrant the use of force in accordance with Article 42 of the Charter”.¹⁸ The representative of Uruguay stated that, with a view to the restoration of law, order and democracy, his country had, in the past, supported the imposition of economic sanctions under Article 41, but did not support military action provided for in Article 42. He explained that Uruguay did not believe that the internal political situation in Haiti projected externally in such a way as to represent a threat to international peace and security, and stressed the need to pursue avenues of dialogue and negotiation which had still not been exhausted.¹⁹ The representative of Brazil described the crisis in Haiti as being of “a unique and exceptional character” which could not be put on a par with other situations in which international peace and security had been threatened.²⁰

On the other hand, the representative of Nigeria stated that the overriding rationale for the proposed action under Chapter VII in resolution 940 (1994) was predicated on the failure of the military Government in Haiti to honour the Governors Island Agreement, and its failure to fully implement previous Council resolutions, both of which failures threatened peace and security in the region.²¹ This opinion was shared by some other Council members who viewed the situation in Haiti as being a threat to peace and security in the region.²²

The representative of Djibouti was of the view that the mounting impact of the Haitian crisis on many countries of the region clearly constituted a threat to regional peace and security.²³ The representative of the Czech Republic noted that the situation in Haiti constituted a real and growing threat to peace, security and stability in the region, given that the international community’s efforts to restore democracy to Haiti through peaceful, political means and through the imposition of economic sanctions had clearly failed.²⁴

By a letter addressed to the President of the Council,²⁵ the representative of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya alleged that the threat of the use of force by the United States and its preparations for the invasion of Haiti constituted “a grave precedent that threatened international peace and security”. He further stated that the events in Haiti were an internal affair and did not constitute a threat to the peace or breach of the peace, nor an act of aggression justifying the use of force.

Further to the adoption of resolution 940 (1994), the Council convened a meeting²⁶ to discuss a letter from the representative of the United States addressed to the President of the Council containing the report of the United States to the Council pursuant to paragraph 13 of that resolution.²⁷ In the deliberations, the representative of the United States noted that, since the 1991 coup d’etat, the Council had viewed the overthrow of democracy in Haiti as a threat to regional security and to international norms. He added that the exercise of military force, pursuant to resolution 940 (1994), allowed for an agreement for the peaceful restoration of democracy, which made the United

In the deliberations held in connection with the adoption of resolution 883 (1993),³⁰ the representative of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya challenged the fact that the Council was meeting to consider a matter that threatened international peace and security. According to the representative, the Council “sought to intensify sanctions” against his country, “under the pretext that it had not complied with resolution 731 (1993)”.³¹

In opposing the resolution, the representative of the Sudan, speaking on behalf of the League of Arab States, pointed out that the crisis was a legal dispute that should be dealt with on the basis of Article 33 (Chapter VI) and not under Chapter VII of the Charter. He further described as “curious” the fact that the resolution was based on Chapter VII of the Charter, which addressed situations of aggression that threaten international peace and security and was not applicable to the dispute before the Council, as it was a legal dispute that dealt with the extradition of two accused Libyan nationals. Such a dispute, he contended, should be dealt with in a court of law, specifically by the International Court of Justice. Alternatively, it should be addressed in conformity with Chapter VI of the Charter. He added that, in dealing with the crisis, the League had based itself on the Charter, which stipulated that all international disputes should be settled by peaceful means and without endangering international peace and security.³² The representative of Brazil stated that the action taken by the Council involved determination of the existence of a threat to international peace and security as a result of two incidents of the utmost gravity, as it involved a number of legal questions that had been the subject of controversial debate within and outside the Council.³³ Most Council members supported resolution 883 (1993), since it demonstrated the Council’s commitment to the eradication of international terrorism, and since it was taking action to deal with a situation that affected international peace and security.³⁴

Part II Provisional measures under Article 40 of the Charter

Article 40

In order to prevent an aggravation of the situation, the Security Council may, before making the recommendation or deciding upon the measures provided for in Article 39, call upon the parties concerned to comply with such provisional measures as it deems necessary or desirable. Such provisional measures shall be without prejudice to the rights, claims, or position of the parties concerned. The Security Council shall duly take account of failure to comply with such provisional measures.

Note

During the period under consideration, the Security Council did not adopt any resolution explicitly under Article 40. In a number of resolutions adopted under Chapter VII, the Council, without expressly referring to Article 40, called upon the parties to comply with certain provisional measures in order to prevent an aggravation of the situation concerned. The types of measures called for included (a) the withdrawal of armed forces; (b) the cessation of hostilities; (c) the conclusion or observance of a ceasefire; (d) the negotiation of differences and disputes; (e) compliance with obligations under international humanitarian law; (f) the creation of the conditions necessary for unimpeded delivery of humanitarian assistance; and (g) cooperation with peacekeeping efforts and humanitarian assistance. Some of the specific measures that the Council called upon the parties concerned to take are summarized below. In some cases provisional measures were adopted concurrently with or after the imposition of measures under Article 41 of the Charter, and were therefore aimed at preventing a further aggravation of the situation.³⁵

A number of Council resolutions contained the warning that, in the event of failure to comply with the terms of those resolutions, the Council would meet again and consider further steps. Those warnings, which might be considered as falling under the last sentence of Article 40, were expressed in various ways. Most frequently, the Council warned that it would consider taking further measures if its calls were not heeded.³⁶

During the Council's deliberations in the period under review there was no significant constitutional discussion regarding Article 40.

A. Provisional measures called for by the Security Council

The situation in the former Yugoslavia (situation in Croatia and the situation prevailing in and adjacent to the United Nations Protected Areas in Croatia)

By resolution 802 (1993) of 25 January 1993, the Council, reaffirming its resolution 713 (1991) of 25 September 1991, in which the situation in the former Yugoslavia was defined as a threat to international peace and security, demanded an immediate cessation of hostile activities by Croatian armed forces within or adjacent to the United Nations Protected Areas and their withdrawal from those areas, an end to attacks against UNPROFOR personnel, the return of all heavy weapons seized from UNPROFOR-controlled storage areas, and strict compliance by all parties with the terms of ceasefire arrangements.

³⁵ See, for example, the situation in Angola, the question concerning Haiti and the situation concerning Rwanda.

³⁶ See, for example, in connection with the situation in Angola, resolutions 864 (1993), para. 26; 903 (1994), para. 10; and 932 (1994), para. 5; and, in connection with the situation in Croatia, resolution 994 (1995).

By resolution 807 (1993) of 19 February 1993, the Council, expressing once more its concern that the situation created in Yugoslavia constituted a threat to international peace and security, reiterated its demand that the parties comply with their ceasefire obligations and refrain from positioning their forces in the proximity of the units of UNPROFOR in the United Nations Protected Areas and pink zones. In other decisions, the Council reiterated its calls for the cessation of hostilities, the observance of the ceasefire agreements, the withdrawal of armed forces and full respect by the parties of United Nations personnel and international humanitarian law.³⁷

By resolution 981 (1995) of 31 March 1995, the Council established as an interim arrangement the United Nations Confidence Restoration Operation (UNCRO) to replace UNPROFOR in Croatia. In its presidential statement of 1 May 1995, the Council demanded that the Government of Croatia put an end immediately to the military offensive launched by its forces in violation of the ceasefire agreement.³⁸ By resolution 994 (1995) of 17 May 1995, the Council demanded that the status and the mandate of UNCRO, as well as the safety and security of its personnel, be respected. In addition, it called upon the parties to respect the economic agreement signed by them on December 1994, and demanded that they "refrain from taking any further military measures or actions that could lead to an escalation of the situation" and warned that "in the event of failure to comply with this demand it [would] consider further steps needed to ensure such compliance".

In its presidential statement of 4 August 1995, the Council demanded that no military action be taken against civilians and that their human rights be fully respected. The Council also demanded that the parties respect the economic agreement signed by them on 2 December 1994.³⁹

By resolution 1009 (1995) of 10 August 1995, deploring the fact that those demands had not been complied with, the Council demanded that the Government of Croatia cease immediately all military actions and fully comply with all Council resolutions. It also demanded that the Government of Croatia (a) fully respect the rights of the local Serb population; (b) allow access to that population by international humanitarian organizations; (c) create conditions conducive to the return of those persons who had left their homes; and (d) fully respect the status of the United Nations personnel.

The situation in the former Yugoslavia
(situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina)

By resolution 819 (1993) of 16 April 1993, the Council, reaffirming its resolution 713 (1991) of 25 September 1991, in which it affirmed that the situation in Yugoslavia constituted a threat to international peace and security, demanded that all parties and others concerned treat Srebrenica and its surroundings as a safe area which should be free from any armed attack or any other hostile act. It demanded the immediate withdrawal of Bosnian Serb paramilitary units from areas surrounding Srebrenica and the cessation of armed attacks against the town.⁴⁰ It also demanded that the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia cease the supply of military arms and equipment to the Bosnian Serb paramilitary units. In addition, it demanded the unimpeded delivery of humanitarian assistance to all parts of Bosnia and Herzegovina, in particular to the population of Srebrenica, as well as the safety and freedom of movement of the United Nations personnel and members of humanitarian organizations.⁴¹ By the same resolution, the Council decided, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, to consider further steps to achieve a solution in conformity with the relevant resolutions.

⁴⁰ The Council reiterated these demands in its presidential statement of 21 April 1993 (S/25646).

By resolution 824 (1993) of 6 May 1993, the Council, declaring that Sarajevo and other threatened areas should be treated as safe areas, demanded the end of armed attacks and the withdrawal of all Bosnian Serb military or paramilitary units. It further demanded that all parties and others concerned cooperate fully with UNPROFOR and take any necessary measures to respect the safe areas.⁴² The Council reiterated those demands in other decisions.⁴³

The Council, in a presidential statement of 7 January 1994, demanded an immediate end to attacks against Sarajevo, which had resulted in a large number of civilian casualties, disrupted essential services and aggravated an already severe humanitarian situation. It further demanded that all parties allow for unimpeded access of humanitarian relief assistance; in this context, the Council again expressed its readiness to consider further measures to ensure that all parties in Bosnia and Herzegovina abided by their commitments.⁴⁴

In a statement by the President on 3 February 1994, the Council demanded that Croatia withdraw forthwith all elements of the Croatian Army along with military equipment and fully respect the territorial integrity of Bosnia and Herzegovina.⁴⁵ On 23 February 1994, the Government of Bosnia and Herzegovina and the Bosnian Croat sides signed a ceasefire agreement. By resolution 900 (1994) of 4 March 1994, the Council called on all parties to cooperate with UNPROFOR in the consolidation of the ceasefire in and around Sarajevo. Further, it called upon them to achieve complete freedom of movement for the civilian population and humanitarian goods. Condemning the shelling and attacks by Bosnian Serb forces against the safe area of Gorazde, the Council demanded the withdrawal of those forces and their weapons to a distance from which they could cease to threaten the

⁴³ Resolution 859 (1993) of 24 August 1993 and the presidential statements of 28 October 1993 (S/26661) and 9 November 1993 (S/26716).

safe area.⁴⁶ It demanded the immediate conclusion of a ceasefire agreement in Gorazde and throughout Bosnia and Herzegovina under the auspices of UNPROFOR leading to an agreement on cessation of hostilities.⁴⁷ The Council also demanded an end to any provocative action in and around the safe areas,⁴⁸ the immediate release of all United Nations personnel held by Bosnian Serb forces and unimpeded freedom of movement for UNPROFOR.⁴⁹

By resolution 941 (1994) of 23 September 1994, the Council demanded that the Bosnian Serb authorities immediately cease their campaign of ethnic cleansing and accord unimpeded access of humanitarian assistance to a number of areas of concern. By resolution 959 (1994) of 19 November 1994, the Council, condemning violations of the international border between Croatia and Bosnia and Herzegovina, demanded that all parties, in particular the so-called Krajina Serbs, fully respect the border and refrain from hostile acts across it.

The Council called upon the Bosnian parties to agree to an extension of the agreements on a ceasefire and on a complete cessation of hostilities concluded in December 1994.⁵⁰ By resolution 998 (1995) of 16 June 1995, once again determining that the situation in the former Yugoslavia continued to be a threat to international peace and security, the Council made a number of demands on the parties. It demanded that (a) Bosnian Serb forces release immediately and unconditionally all remaining detained UNPROFOR personnel and that they respect the safety of Force personnel and others engaged in humanitarian assistance; (b) all parties allow unimpeded access for humanitarian assistance to all parts of Bosnia and Herzegovina; (c) the parties fully respect the status of the safe areas; and (d) the parties agree to a ceasefire.

The Council, gravely concerned about the deterioration of the situation in the safe area of Srebrenica, made a number of demands on the parties and others concerned. It demanded that (a) the Bosnian Serb forces cease their offensive and withdraw immediately from the safe area of Srebrenica; (b) the respect of the status of Srebrenica as a safe area; (c) the release by Bosnian Serb forces of UNPROFOR personnel and the full respect of their safety; and (d) unimpeded access of humanitarian assistance for the international humanitarian agencies to the area of Srebrenica.⁵¹

The Council reiterated its demands regarding the unimpeded access of humanitarian assistance to all the areas of concern by UNPROFOR and humanitarian organizations and agencies as well as its call on all the parties to guarantee their freedom of movement and safety.⁵²

By resolution 814 (1993) of 26 March 1993, the Council expressed its concern that the situation in Somalia continued to threaten international peace and security in the region. It demanded that all Somali parties comply fully with the commitments undertaken in the agreements they had concluded at the informal preparatory meeting on Somali political reconciliation

⁴⁶ The Council had already demanded the immediate cessation of attacks against the safe area of Gorazde and its population in its presidential statement of 6 April 1994 (S/PRST/1994/14).

⁴⁹ The Council had already demanded that all parties allow UNPROFOR unimpeded freedom of movement and guarantee its safety and security in its presidential statements of 14 March 1994 (S/PRST/1994/11) and 14 April 1994 (S/PRST/1994/19). See, further, throughout the remainder of the year, the Council constantly demanded that all the parties cooperate with UNPROFOR in the fulfilment of its mandate as well as ensure its safety. For example, the presidential statement of 1 June 1994 (S/PRST/1994/26), resolution 959 (1994) of 19 November 1994 and the presidential statement of 26 November 1994 (S/PRST/1994/71).

⁵⁰ In its presidential statement issued on 17 February 1995 (S/PRST/1995/8), the Council had demanded that all forces in the Bihac area cease fighting and cooperate fully with UNPROFOR in achieving an effective ceasefire. See also the presidential statement of 6 January 1995 (S/PRST/1995/1).

⁵² See, for instance, the presidential statements of 14 July 1995 (S/PRST/1995/32), 20 July 1995 (S/PRST/1995/33) and 25 July 1995 (S/PRST/1995/34), resolution 1010 (1995) of 10 August 1995, the presidential statements of 18 September 1995 (S/PRST/1995/47) and 5 October 1995 (S/PRST/1995/52) and resolutions 1031 (1995) of 15 December 1995 and 1034 (1995) of 21 December 1995.

at Addis Ababa. Further, it demanded that all parties take all measures to ensure the safety of the personnel of the United Nations and its agencies as well as of the other humanitarian organizations operating in the country. Finally it reiterated its demand that the Somali parties cease and desist from all breaches of international humanitarian law.⁵³ By resolution 837 (1993), adopted on 6 June 1993 after a Pakistani contingent of UNOSOM II was attacked, resulting in the deaths of at least 18 Pakistani peacekeepers, the Council strongly condemned the attack and reiterated its demand that all Somali parties, including factions and movements, comply fully with the ceasefire and disarmament agreement reached in Addis Ababa. By resolution 897 (1994) of 4 February 1994, in expanding the UNOSOM II mandate to assistance for reconciliation and reconstruction, the Council demanded that all Somali parties refrain from any acts of intimidation or violence against personnel engaged in humanitarian or peacekeeping work in the country.⁵⁴

Having determined, in March 1993, that the deterioration of the situation in Liberia constituted a threat to international peace and security, the Council by resolution 813 (1993) of 26 March 1993, called upon the parties to the conflict to abide by and implement the ceasefire and the various accords of the peace process. In addition, it demanded that the parties concerned refrain from any action that might impede or obstruct the delivery of humanitarian assistance, and called upon the parties to ensure the safety of all personnel involved in international humanitarian assistance as well as to respect strictly the provisions of international humanitarian law.

⁵³ Also by resolution 814 (1993), the Council, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, endorsed the mandate for the expanded UNOSOM (UNOSOM II), authorizing it to use force if necessary to ensure its mandate. UNOSOM II was mandated to secure a stable environment for the delivery of humanitarian assistance and to assist in the reconstruction of economic, social and political life.

⁵⁴ In view of the deteriorating security situation in Somalia, with attacks and harassment directed against UNOSOM II and other international personnel serving in Somalia, the Council reiterated this demand in resolutions 923 (1994) of 31 May 1994 and 954 (1994) of 4 November 1994.

The situation in Angola

In September 1993, as a result of UNITA military actions, the Council determined that the situation in Angola constituted a threat to international peace and security.⁵⁵ In its presidential statement issued on 1 November 1993,⁵⁶ the Council called upon the parties to cooperate fully in ensuring the unimpeded delivery of humanitarian assistance to all Angolans throughout the country and to take all the necessary measures to ensure the security and safety of United Nations and other personnel involved in humanitarian relief operations, and to strictly abide by applicable rules of international humanitarian law. The Council also expressed its readiness to consider the immediate imposition of further measures under the Charter at any time it observed that UNITA was not cooperating in good faith to make the ceasefire effective and implement the Peace Accords. By resolution 890 (1993) of 15 December 1993, the Council, deeply concerned that an effective ceasefire had not been attained, urged the parties to stop immediately all military actions as well as to agree on the modalities for the establishment of an effective and sustainable ceasefire. The Council subsequently reiterated its calls for the establishment of a ceasefire, the cessation of all offensive military operations and the unimpeded delivery of humanitarian assistance.⁵⁷

The situation in Rwanda

The Council, having determined that the situation in Rwanda constituted a threat to peace and security in the region, demanded that all parties to the conflict immediately cease hostilities and agree to a ceasefire. Further, it strongly urged the parties to cooperate fully with the United Nations Assistance Mission for Rwanda (UNAMIR) in the implementation of its mandate and demanded that they refrain from any acts of violence against personnel engaged in humanitarian and peacekeeping work.⁵⁸ By resolution 929 (1994) of 22 June 1994, reiterating that the magnitude of the humanitarian crisis in Rwanda constituted a threat to peace and security in the region, the Council demanded that all parties to the conflict and others concerned immediately bring to an end all killings of civilian populations in areas under their control. By resolution 965 (1994) of 30 November 1994, the Council strongly urged the Government of Rwanda to continue its cooperation with UNAMIR in the implementation of its mandate and in particular in ensuring unimpeded access to all areas of the country by UNAMIR forces, personnel of the International Tribunal for Rwanda and human rights officers.

The situation in Haiti

By resolution 917 (1994) of 6 May 1994, the Council expressed its concern that the situation created by the failure of the military authorities in Haiti to fulfil their obligations under the Governors Island Agreement and to comply with relevant Council resolutions constituted a threat to peace and security in the region. It called upon the parties concerned to fully cooperate with the Special Envoy of the Secretaries-General of the United Nations and OAS to bring about the full implementation of the Governors Island Agreement.

Part III

Measures not involving the use of armed force under Article 41 of the Charter

Article 41

The Security Council may decide what measures not involving the use of armed force are to be employed to give effect to its decisions, and it may call upon the Members of the United Nations to apply such measures. These may include complete or partial interruption of economic relations and of rail, sea, air, postal, telegraphic, radio, and other means of communication, and the severance of diplomatic relations.

Note

During the period under review, the Council did not invoke Article 41 explicitly in any of its decisions. The Council, however, imposed measures under Chapter VII of the Charter, in line with the provisions of Article 41, against Haiti, Rwanda, UNITA and the former Yugoslavia. The Council also reaffirmed the measures previously imposed against Iraq, Liberia, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya and Somalia, which were based on the principles set out in Article 41. In connection with these and other issues, during the deliberations of the Council, members made implicit references to Article 41 regarding economic sanctions and judicial measures.⁵⁹ The Council also terminated the sanctions previously imposed under Article 41 against South Africa. It should be noted that the Security Council Committee established by resolution 421 (1977) to monitor the arms embargo against South Africa was the longest standing sanctions Committee ever established.

The decisions of the Council by which measures based on the principles of Article 41 were imposed are set out in section A; section B reflects salient issues that were raised in the deliberations of the Council.

⁵⁹ The International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia and the International Tribunal for Rwanda are the first international judicial organs created by the United Nations to prosecute crimes against humanity. One of the most innovative recommendations of the Secretary-General was that of establishing the Tribunal through the exercise of the Security Council's powers under Chapter VII of the Charter. This will be further discussed in section B, which will focus on decisions and debate among Council members in relation to Article 41.

A. Decisions of the Security Council relating to Article 41

1. Sanctions

Measures taken in connection with Haiti

By resolution 841 (1993) of 16 June 1993, the Council decided that all States should prevent the sale or supply, by their nationals or from their territories or using their flag vessels or aircraft, of petroleum or petroleum products or arms and related materiel of all types, including weapons and ammunition, military vehicles, police equipment and spare parts, to any person or body in Haiti. The Council also decided that States were to freeze all funds in the name of the Government of Haiti to ensure that they were not made available directly or indirectly to or for the benefit of the de facto authorities in Haiti. By the same resolution, the Council established a Committee charged with monitoring the implementation of those measures and reporting on its work to the Council with its observations and recommendations.

By resolution 861 (1993) of 27 August 1993, the Council decided that the measures set out in paragraphs 5 to 9 of resolution 841 (1993) would be suspended with immediate effect, and requested all States to act consistently with that decision. The Council also confirmed its readiness to terminate the suspension of measures if the terms of the Governors Island Agreement were not fully implemented.

By resolution 873 (1993) of 13 October 1993, the Council decided to terminate the suspension of the measures set out in paragraphs 5 to 9 of resolution 841 (1993), unless the Secretary-General reported to the Council that the parties to the Governors Island Agreement had implemented in full the agreement to reinstate the legitimate Government and enable the United Nations Mission in Haiti (UNMIH) to carry out its mandate. The Council also confirmed its readiness to consider additional sanctions if the parties to the Agreement continued to impede the activities of UNMIH, or had not complied fully with relevant Council decisions and the provisions of the Agreement.

By resolution 917 (1994) of 6 May 1994, the Council expanded the embargo against the military authorities in order to secure their compliance with previous Council decisions and the provisions of the Agreement. Those measures included a call on all States to deny permission to any aircraft originating in or destined for Haiti, a call on all States to prevent certain persons, including all officers of the Haitian military and police, from entering their territory, and a call on all States to freeze the assets of those persons.

By resolution 944 (1994) of 29 September 1994, the Council decided to terminate the measures set out in resolutions 841 (1993), 873 (1993) and 917 (1994) relating to sanctions, following the return to Haiti of President Jean-Bertrand Aristide. It also dissolved the Committee established pursuant to resolution 841 (1993) concerning Haiti.

Measures taken in connection with the National Union for the Total Independence of Angola

By resolution 864 (1993) of 15 September 1993, the Council prohibited all sale or supply to the National Union for the Total Independence of Angola (UNITA) of arms and related materiel and military assistance, as well as petroleum and petroleum products. The Council also expressed its readiness to consider further measures, such as economic sanctions and a travel ban, unless by 1 November 1993 the Secretary-General had reported that an effective ceasefire had been established and that the Peace Accords for Angola and relevant Security Council resolutions had been fully implemented. By the same resolution, the Council established a Security Council Committee charged with monitoring the implementation of those measures.

By resolution 976 (1995) of 8 February 1995 the Council reminded all States that they must continue to comply with the embargo.

Measures taken in connection with the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya

By resolution 883 (1993) of 11 November 1993, the Council strengthened the measures imposed against the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya by its previous resolution:⁶⁰ governmental assets and assets of public authorities and any Libyan undertakings related to them were frozen; an equipment embargo against the Libyan oil industry was established; all States were required to close down all offices of the Libyan Arab Airlines within their territories; and the supply of material and services related to civilian or military flight services and airfields was suspended.

Measures taken in connection with Liberia

By resolution 985 (1995) of 13 April 1995, the Council urged all States, in particular all neighbouring States, to comply fully with the embargo on all deliveries of weapons and military equipment to Liberia imposed by resolution 788 (1992), and decided to establish a Committee to monitor its implementation.

By resolution 1001 (1995) of 30 June 1995, the Council reminded all States of their obligations to comply strictly with the embargo on all deliveries of weapons and military equipment to Liberia imposed by resolution 788 (1992) and to bring all instances of violations of the arms embargo before the Committee established pursuant to resolution 985 (1995).

Measures taken in connection with Rwanda

By resolution 918 (1994) of 17 May 1994, the Council decided that all States had to prevent the sale or supply to Rwanda by their nationals or from their territories or using their flag vessels or aircraft of arms and related materiel of all types, including weapons and ammunition, military vehicles and equipment, paramilitary police equipment and spare parts. By that resolution, the Council also established a Committee to monitor the implementation and possible violation of the sanctions imposed.

By resolution 1011 (1995) of 16 August 1995, the Council lifted those restrictions with regard to the sale or supply of arms and related materiel to the Government of Rwanda through named points of entry. The Council also confirmed the continuing prohibitions in respect of the sale or supply of arms and related materiel to non-governmental forces, or to persons in neighbouring States, for use in Rwanda.

Measures taken in connection with the former Yugoslavia

By resolution 816 (1993) of 31 March 1993, the Council extended the ban imposed by resolution 781 (1992) on military flights to cover flights by all additional categories of aircraft in the airspace of Bosnia and Herzegovina. It also authorized Member States, seven days after the adoption of the resolution, acting nationally or through regional arrangements, to take, under the authority of the Security Council and subject to close coordination with the Secretary-General and UNPROFOR, "all necessary measures" in the airspace of Bosnia and Herzegovina to ensure compliance with the ban on flights, and proportionate to the specific circumstances and the nature of flights.

By resolution 820 (1993) of 17 April 1993, the Council strengthened the implementation of the measures imposed by its previous resolutions. The Council prohibited imports to, exports from, and transshipment of goods through the United Nations Protected Areas in Croatia, and those areas of Bosnia and Herzegovina under the control of Serb forces unless specifically authorized by the Committee established pursuant to resolution 724 (1991). Moreover, assets of Yugoslav entities were to be frozen, and the provision of services, both financial and non-financial, for the purposes of business carried on in Yugoslavia was prohibited. Exceptions were made for telecommunications, postal services and certain legal services. Nonetheless, all maritime traffic was prohibited from entering Yugoslavia's territorial sea.

By resolution 942 (1994) of 23 September 1994, the Council reinforced the measures imposed by its previous resolutions with regard to those areas of Bosnia and Herzegovina under the control of Bosnian Serb forces. It decided that the supply of services to any person or body in the area was prohibited, except for the supply of humanitarian aid and goods and services specifically allowed by the Committee established pursuant to resolution 724 (1991) or the Government of Bosnia and Herzegovina. Moreover, the Council also called on States to tighten controls on the shipment of goods to the former Yugoslavia, so as to prevent the diversion of goods to those parts of Bosnia and Herzegovina occupied by Bosnian Serb forces. Those measures were aimed at preventing the economic activities of and links with Bosnian Serb entities found in areas under the control of the Bosnian Serb military.

By resolution 943 (1994) of 23 September 1994, the Council suspended certain sanctions on the former Yugoslavia for an initial period of 100 days beginning on 5 October 1994, following a report of the Co-Chairmen of the Steering Committee of the International Conference on the Former Yugoslavia transmitted by the Secretary-General to the Security Council. By the same resolution, the Council suspended the ban on all civilian passenger flights to and from Belgrade airport, allowed the re-introduction of a ferry service to Italy, and the participation of the former Yugoslavia in sports and cultural exchanges.

By resolution 1021 (1995) of 22 November 1995, the Council set out the terms of the termination of the arms embargo. It specified, in particular, that the embargo on deliveries of weapons and military equipment imposed by resolution 713 (1991) should be terminated beginning from the day the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report stating that Bosnia and Herzegovina, Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia had formally signed the Peace Agreement.

By resolution 1022 (1995) of 22 November 1995, following the signing of the Dayton Peace Agreement, the Council indefinitely suspended the sanctions against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia.

Measures taken in connection with Iraq

By resolution 986 (1995) of 14 April 1995, the Council authorized Iraq to export a certain quantity of petroleum and to sell it on foreign markets. The proceeds of the sale were to be used to “meet the humanitarian needs of the Iraqi population”. The major part of the funds was to be used to finance the import of medicine, health supplies, foodstuffs and supplies for essential civilian needs.

Measures taken in connection with South Africa

By resolution 919 (1994) of 25 May 1994, the Council terminated the arms embargo and other restrictions imposed on South Africa by resolution 418 (1977). By the same resolution, the Council dissolved the Committee established pursuant to resolution 421 (1977) concerning the question of South Africa.

Measures taken in connection with Somalia

By resolution 814 (1993) of 26 March 1993, the Council requested the Secretary-General to support from within Somalia the implementation of the arms embargo established by resolution 733 (1992), utilizing as available and appropriate the UNOSOM II forces authorized by the resolution, and to report on the subject, with any recommendations regarding more effective measures if necessary. It also called on all States to cooperate in the implementation of the arms embargo established by resolution 733 (1992).

By resolutions 886 (1993) of 18 November 1993, 897 (1994) of 4 February 1994, 923 (1994) of 31 May 1994 and 954 (1994) of 4 November 1994, the Council reaffirmed the obligations of States to implement fully the embargo on all deliveries of weapons and military equipment to Somalia imposed by resolution 733 (1992).

2. Judicial measures

Establishment of the International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia

By resolution 827 (1993) of 25 May 1993, the Council decided to establish an international tribunal for the sole purpose of prosecuting persons responsible for serious violations of international humanitarian law committed in the territory of the former Yugoslavia between 1 January 1991 and a date to be determined by the Security Council upon the restoration of peace.

Establishment of the International Tribunal for Rwanda

By resolution 955 (1994) of 8 November 1994, the Council decided, having received the request of the Government of Rwanda,⁶¹ to establish an international tribunal for the sole purpose of prosecuting persons responsible for genocide and other serious violations of international humanitarian law committed in the territory of Rwanda and Rwandan citizens responsible for genocide and other such violations committed in the territory of neighbouring States between 1 January 1994 and 31 December 1994.

B. Salient issues raised in the deliberations of the Security Council

The cases below outline the practice of the Council which may be viewed as illustrating its interpretation of the principles set out in Article 41. Cases 3 to 9 relate to the Council’s practice concerning the measures imposed against Haiti, Angola (UNITA), the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Liberia, Rwanda, the former Yugoslavia and Iraq. Case 10 relates to the termination of sanctions imposed against South Africa; case 11 deals with the establishment of international tribunals. Case 12 is relevant to the discussion of the Secretary-General’s position paper entitled “Supplement to an Agenda for Peace”, in which the question of collateral damage due to the imposition of sanctions, particularly their humanitarian impact, is examined. Case 13 addresses the rationalization of the sanctions tool as discussed at the 3439th meeting of the Council.

Case 3

Measures taken in connection with Haiti

The objectives of the sanctions measures imposed on Haiti were to ensure the departure of the de facto authorities and the restoration of the legitimate institutions in Haiti. The sanctions regime in Haiti may be considered to have been the first example of sanctions targeted against decision makers who had seized power unconstitutionally.

In the deliberations held in connection with the adoption of resolution 841 (1993), a number of speakers argued that the measures set out in the resolution were necessary as a result of the threat to international peace and security.⁶² The representative of Canada stated that her Government considered it legitimate and necessary that the Council respond positively to the call by President Aristide, and impose an embargo on the delivery of oil supplies in order to bring about a speedy conclusion to the tragic and volatile situation.⁶³ The French delegation hoped that the adoption of sanctions against Haiti would make it possible to bring the perpetrators of the coup d'état to the negotiating table, in order to restore constitutional order in Haiti.⁶⁴ In a similar vein, the representative of the United States noted that sanctions alone were not a solution to the Haitian tragedy. Rather, the adoption of tough sanctions represented a further step by the international community to put pressure on those who stood in the way of a solution.⁶⁵

In a letter to the Secretary-General of 15 July 1993,⁶⁶ the President of the Security Council confirmed the readiness of the Council to suspend the sanctions imposed against Haiti under resolution 841 (1993), immediately after the ratification of the Prime Minister and his assumption of his functions in Haiti.

The President further stated that the Council agreed that provision would need to be made for the automatic termination of such suspension if, at any time, the Secretary-General, having regard to the views of the Secretary-General of OAS, reported to the Council that the parties to the Governors Island Agreement or any authorities in Haiti had failed to comply in good faith with the Agreement. The Council also declared its readiness to terminate the sanctions upon receipt of a report from the Secretary-General immediately after the return of President Aristide to Haiti. As was pointed out in resolution 861 (1993), failure by those responsible for the military and security machinery in Haiti to fulfil the commitments entered into would lead to the imposition of sanctions.

In the deliberations held in connection with the adoption of resolution 861 (1993), the representative of Spain stated that the establishment of the Government of Robert Malval was of great importance to Haiti and its people. It was also a source of gratification for the United Nations, for it implied that the Security Council's action in adopting the sanctions regime set out in resolution 841 (1993) had proved commensurate with the circumstances and laid the foundation for the restoration of the Haitian people's democratic freedoms.⁶⁷ The President of the Council, speaking in her capacity as representative of the United States, noted that the Council's actions in suspending sanctions immediately upon ratification of the new Haitian Government showed that that economic tool was both flexible and effective, and that the Council could act quickly and decisively.⁶⁸

In the deliberations held in connection with the adoption of resolution 917 (1994), by which the Council expanded the embargo against the military authorities, the representative of Spain stated that the ultimate objective of the sanctions was to facilitate the restoration of democracy in Haiti and the return of President Aristide.⁶⁹ The representative of the United States noted that the draft resolution was the product of full cooperation among the Latin American and Caribbean States, the members of the Council, and the democratically elected Government of Haiti.⁷⁰ Following the vote, the representative of France stated that his delegation wished to ensure that the imposition of new sanctions was seen first of all as a means to achieve a political result, and not as an end in itself. The objective sought was clear: to ensure that democracy regained its course in Haiti and to foster the return of President Aristide to his own country.⁷¹

Measures taken in connection with the National Union for the Total Independence of Angola

With respect to the measures imposed against UNITA, the question arose how and when to target the Angolan non-State actor. The sanctions regime imposed against UNITA was requested by the Government of Angola.

Question of targeting the non-State actor UNITA

In the deliberations held in connection with the adoption of resolution 864 (1993), Council members unanimously condemned the military operations of UNITA in Angola and its failure to implement the Angola Peace Accords. The representative of Angola proposed that the following measures be taken against UNITA, under Chapter VII: a mandatory comprehensive arms embargo; a ban on the sale or supply of petroleum and petroleum products; the closure of the foreign offices or any form of representation of UNITA; and a ban on its political and propaganda activities. The Council should also seize and freeze UNITA bank accounts, and take appropriate measures, under Chapter VII, to guarantee the delivery of humanitarian assistance to the population. He stated: “we can say unhesitatingly that the time has come to impose mandatory sanctions on UNITA in order to force them to stop the war and resume a frank and serious dialogue which will not only bring lasting peace to the martyred Angolan people but also enable UNITA itself to participate in the democratic process and in the social and economic reconstruction of the country”.⁷²

The representative of the Russian Federation stated that his delegation believed that it was essential, if there should be no progress in the peace process, for the Council to consider additional steps under the Charter, including trade measures against UNITA and restrictions on the travel of its representatives and a ban on all air, land and sea deliveries to Angola, with the exception of those previously authorized by the Government of Angola. In addition, the Council should also consider the possibility of freezing the foreign bank accounts of UNITA and its leaders.⁷³ The representative of China emphasized that the sanctions to be imposed by the Council on UNITA were measures taken in line with the special circumstances in Angola. The sanctions themselves were not the end, but rather only the means designed to urge UNITA to resume negotiations with the Government of Angola as soon as possible and bring the civil war to an end at an early date.⁷⁴

In the deliberations held in connection with the adoption of resolution 932 (1994), the representative of Angola stated that it was up to the Council to use all the means at its disposal to prevent the intransigence of UNITA leading to the failure of the opportunity for peace. His Government firmly supported the measures referred to in paragraph 5 of resolution 932 (1994), although it considered the grace period to be excessive, since his Government had been negotiating in Lusaka for about eight months.⁷⁵

The representative of the Russian Federation stated that, by systematically escalating its demands and disregarding the decisions of the Council and the recommendations of the mediator and the three observer States, UNITA was forcing the Council to consider very seriously the question of introducing additional sanctions, as provided for in paragraph 26 of resolution 864 (1993).⁷⁶ The representative of Brazil further stated that the scope of the measures that the Council would adopt, if UNITA failed to accept in due time the proposals put forward by the mediation, reflected not only the seriousness of the situation, but also the determination of the Council with regard to the prompt and successful conclusion of the peace process.⁷⁷ Some speakers emphasized that the Council would consider the question of introducing additional sanctions as provided for in resolution 864 (1993), if UNITA failed to accept the proposals in the peace agreement.⁷⁸

Following the acceptance by both the Government of Angola and UNITA of the complete set of proposals on national reconciliation, the President of the Council, in a presidential statement,⁷⁹ underlined that, in that context, the Council had agreed not to consider the imposition of additional measures against UNITA.

Measures taken in connection with the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya

By resolution 883 (1993) the Council, in view of the “continued failure by the Libyan Government to demonstrate by concrete actions its renunciation of terrorism”, and, considering the failure of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya to fully and effectively respond to the request and decisions in resolutions 731 (1992) and 748 (1992), tightened the sanctions imposed on that country through, inter alia, the freezing of Libyan funds and financial resources in other countries and a ban on the provision to the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya of equipment for oil refining and transportation. The Council also cited the country’s non-compliance with its demands that it cooperate with the authorities of France, the United Kingdom and the United States in establishing responsibility for the terrorist bombings of two commercial airliners in 1988 and 1989.

In the deliberations held in connection with the adoption of resolution 883 (1993), the representative of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya stated that his Government had complied with resolution 731 (1992) except for the fact that it had not extradited two alleged suspects in the terrorist attacks against Pan Am flight 103 and UTA flight 772. In his view, there was an attempt by the three countries to have a draft resolution adopted under Chapter VII of the Charter on a matter which should have been dealt with under Chapter VI, since the issue in question was a legal dispute over which country had competence to try the accused, a dispute which had essentially been settled by the provisions of the Montreal Convention of 1971.⁸⁰

The representative of the Sudan, speaking on behalf of the League of Arab States, was of the opinion that the crisis between the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, on one hand, and the United States, France and the United Kingdom, on the other hand, was a legal dispute which should be dealt with on the basis of Article 33, (Chapter VI). Chapter VII concerned threats to international peace and security and not legal disputes. The interpretation of legal texts, especially the Charter, should be carried out only by judicial organs.⁸¹

The representative of the United States noted that, for the pursuit of justice, sanctions by the Security Council must be adopted when necessary. She stated that, by strengthening sanctions, the Council had again shown the flexibility of sanctions as a diplomatic tool. She further stated: “the more we demonstrate that this Council can impose, lift, suspend or strengthen sanctions at will, the better the sanctions stick can serve our diplomacy”.⁸² Some speakers also emphasized that by strengthening sanctions the Council was taking action to deal with a situation that threatened international peace and security. They also expressed the hope that the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya would comply with the relevant Council resolutions.

The Chinese delegation was of the view, however, that the only effective means that could lead to a solution of this question was negotiation and consultation. He stated that to intensify sanctions against the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya would not help to settle the question. On the contrary, it would further complicate the matter, by making the Libyan people suffer more, and creating even greater economic difficulties for the neighbouring and other countries concerned.⁸³ In a similar vein, the representative of Pakistan was unable to support resolution 883 (1993).⁸⁴

Measures taken in connection with Liberia

In the Council’s deliberations held in connection with the adoption of resolution 985 (1995), a number of speakers were concerned about the absence of progress towards peace in Liberia and believed that the establishment of the sanctions Committee would contribute to the peace process in Liberia.⁸⁵ The representative of Nigeria stated that his delegation supported measures aimed at tightening the current regime limiting the flow of arms into the country, and endorsed the paragraph of the draft resolution which established a sanctions committee to monitor compliance with the arms embargo regime.⁸⁶ The representative of the United States urged all invited Heads of State to attend the Abuja summit in the interest of harmonizing their policies on Liberia, and particularly to halt the flow of arms into Liberia, thereby facilitating an end to the war.⁸⁷

The representative of the Russian Federation emphasized that the decision to set up a sanctions committee to monitor the compliance with the embargo would help to normalize the situation not only in Liberia but in the region as a whole.⁸⁸ Other Council members were concerned about the absence of progress towards peace in Liberia and believed that the establishment of the sanctions Committee would contribute to the peace process in Liberia.

In the deliberations held in connection with the adoption of resolution 1001 (1995), the representative of Liberia expressed concern about the violation by some Member States of the arms embargo imposed on Liberia by resolution 788 (1992).⁸⁹ Several Council members expressed concern over the continued flow of arms into Liberia, in violation of resolution 788 (1992), across the borders and from sources within Liberia.⁹⁰ In this regard, they unanimously supported the request of the ECOWAS leaders to the ECOWAS Monitoring Group and the United Nations Observer Mission in Liberia to improve the monitoring mechanism so as to stem the flow of arms into the country. Council members reminded all States that they must comply strictly with the embargo on all deliveries of weapons and military equipment to Liberia.

Measures taken in connection with Rwanda

With regard to the measures imposed against Rwanda, the question which arose concerned the imposition of sanctions and its relation to the principle of national sovereignty and the right of self-defence.

In the deliberations held in connection with the adoption of resolution 918 (1994), speakers unanimously supported the call in that resolution on Member States to restrict the sale or delivery of arms to any of the Rwandan parties.⁹¹ The representative of Rwanda was of the opinion that the arms embargo contained in the resolution should be imposed on Uganda, following its alleged involvement in the conflict. He also believed that an arms embargo against Rwanda would be in violation of the Charter, as the Charter laid down the principle of self-defence under Article 51.⁹²

The representative of the Russian Federation viewed as particularly important the provision of resolution 918 (1994) with respect to the imposition of an arms embargo: this was critical in the absence of a ceasefire. He stated that special responsibility for effective implementation would lie with neighbouring African States, particularly with respect to not permitting the sale or delivery of weapons and not permitting the transit of weapons through their territory.⁹³

By resolution 1011 (1995), as a result of the progress made by the Government of Rwanda in stabilizing conditions within the country, the Council lifted the embargo on the supply of arms to Rwanda. During the debate, the Government of Zaire made it clear that it opposed the lifting of the arms embargo on Rwanda, given the deterioration of the security situation.⁹⁴

On the other hand, the representative of Nigeria stated that his delegation had supported the request of Rwanda that restrictions on the acquisition of arms imposed under resolution 918 (1994) be lifted, as part of measures aimed to stabilize the situation and assure the Government of Rwanda of its own security. He explained that this would not only enable the Government to defend itself and its citizens, but also serve “to deter military adventurism from opponents of the Government from outside”.⁹⁵ Other speakers pointed out that the embargo was clearly intended against a former government and that the new government should be able to defend itself.⁹⁶ They also supported the safeguard that was included in resolution 1011 (1995) which established a controlled removal of the embargo for one year. France favoured a more general lifting of the embargo that dealt on a priority basis with equipment for maintaining order, especially for equipping the police and the gendarmerie.⁹⁷

Measures taken in connection with the former Yugoslavia

In connection with the arms embargo imposed against the former Yugoslavia, two questions arose in the deliberations of the Council that may be interpreted as being in relation to Article 41. The first concerned the strengthening of measures in resolution 820 (1993), which contributed to the effectiveness of sanctions. The second question included the lifting of the arms embargo on the sale or transfer of arms to States within the former Yugoslavia.

Strengthening of measures imposed against the former Yugoslavia

By resolution 820 (1993), the Council decided to strengthen significantly the sanctions regime imposed against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro), effective nine days after the date of adoption of the resolution, unless the Bosnian Serb party signed the peace plan and ceased its military attacks in Bosnia and Herzegovina. During the debate, the majority of Council members supported the additional measures imposed against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, because it increased the effectiveness of the sanctions and at the same time opened up other prospects if there was a radical change in the attitude of the Bosnian Serbs. The representative of the Russian Federation, who abstained from voting, reasoned that it was “important to give the parties to the conflict the possibility, through international mediation, of reaching an agreement on the Vance-Owen plan, and of completing the intensive negotiations in this regard that are going on at this moment”.⁹⁸

In the deliberations held in connection with the adoption of resolution 942 (1994), the majority of the Council members supported the provisions of the resolution, in particular the strengthening of all measures against the Bosnian Serbs. The representative of Bosnia and Herzegovina stated that his delegation supported resolution 942 (1994) on the enhancement of sanctions with respect to the Bosnian Serbs. However, he questioned the effectiveness of the measure in securing the desired objectives, especially the reversal of the consequences of aggression and ethnic cleansing.⁹⁹ The representative of China, who abstained from voting, stated that his delegation was not in favour of using sanctions or mandatory measures to resolve the conflict in the former Yugoslavia, because experience had proved that this would not help to solve the problem.¹⁰⁰

By resolution 943 (1994), the Council suspended some of the sanctions imposed against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. The representative of Croatia, expressing serious reservations about the draft resolution, stated that the sanctions regime should be suspended only after the Council received concrete and undisputed evidence about real progress on the ground. Croatia could not accept mere political declarations as a basis for suspending the most efficient mechanism the international community had used to pursue a peaceful solution to the problems in the region.¹⁰¹ Other non-members of the Council were of the view that easing the sanctions imposed on Serbia and Montenegro would be premature, inappropriate and perilous, and likely to encourage aggression that violated the fundamental principles of the Charter.¹⁰² The representative of Pakistan, who had voted against the draft resolution, stated that his delegation considered the timing for the submission of the draft resolution to be most inopportune, inappropriate and premature, and counter-productive for the peace process.¹⁰³ The representative of the United States pointed out that, in preparing to ease sanctions on the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, the Council acknowledged that the Federal Republic had taken an important step to persuade the Bosnian Serbs to accept the negotiated settlement that had been proposed.¹⁰⁴ The representative of the Russian Federation stated that resolution 943 (1994) sent a clear signal to the effect that the Council was not captive to old stereotypes and was prepared properly to re-evaluate the situation, depending on changes in the policy of the parties, and to encourage those who were trying through practical deeds to achieve peace.¹⁰⁵

In the deliberations held in connection with the adoption of resolution 1021 (1995), which provided for the phased lifting of the embargo on the sale or transfer of arms to States within the former Yugoslavia, and resolution 1022 (1995), by which the Council indefinitely suspended the sanctions against Serbia and Montenegro, the representative of Germany stated that those measures marked the first step of the implementation of the Peace Agreement reached in Dayton.¹⁰⁶ The representative of the Russian Federation, who abstained from voting, stated that his delegation would have preferred resolution 1021 (1995) to provide for a more clear-cut mechanism to operate in the event the peace process should be derailed.¹⁰⁷ By adopting resolution 1021 (1995), Council members welcomed the commitments of the parties set out in the Agreement on Regional Stabilization, in terms of arms control, ceilings for categories of weapons and confidence-building measures. The representative of the United States emphasized that by suspending economic sanctions, the Council had given the parties the support they needed to sign the Peace Agreement and ensure its effective implementation. He further stated that “the Council imposed economic sanctions for the explicit purpose of encouraging Serbia to choose the path of peace. The sanctions appear to have achieved their purpose. Indeed, this much-criticized sanctions tool has proved critical in bringing about the decision in Dayton, and the leverage it brings us will continue to serve us well in the complicated task of implementation”.¹⁰⁸

Measures taken in connection with Iraq

A number of questions arose concerning the application of measures against Iraq under Chapter VII of the type provided for in Article 41. The first concerned the question of lifting or easing measures against Iraq, that is, changing the sanctions regime; the second concerned the extent to which the Council should act to minimize the humanitarian impact of measures mandated under Article 41; the third question concerned the relationship between sanctions and the principles of national sovereignty and territorial integrity.

Question of lifting measures against Iraq

During the period under review, no resolution was adopted in which the sanctions regime imposed upon Iraq was altered. The issue was however discussed during Council meetings before and after various resolutions on Iraq were adopted.

At the 3439th meeting, the representative of the Russian Federation referred to the joint communiqué issued by Iraq and the Russian Federation on 13 October 1994.¹⁰⁹ He pointed out that lifting the sanctions imposed on Iraq, which were having a serious economic effect on ordinary people and on the country’s situation, was linked not to military efforts or to the struggle against a foreign plot but only to the strict implementation of the relevant resolutions of the Council. If Iraq were to comply with all the demands in all the resolutions, then the sanctions regime would cease to have any sense, as implied in the joint communiqué. On condition that Iraq cooperated honestly with the United Nations, it would then be possible for the Council to take a decision on lifting the oil embargo, as provided in paragraph 22 of resolution 687 (1991), and, eventually, to consider lifting or mitigating the remaining sanctions.¹¹⁰

The representative of the United States welcomed the statement by the Russian Federation to the effect that the only way forward to the lifting of sanctions was through full implementation of all relevant Security Council resolutions. She stated that the Council should categorically reject the approach promoted by some whereby Iraq should be rewarded for partial compliance with some of its obligations. The representative added that the threshold question the Council faced was not how long Iraq must cooperate with United Nations requirements on weapons of mass destruction before the oil embargo was suspended but rather whether Iraq would continue to cooperate with United Nations inspectors after the embargo was suspended.¹¹¹

According to the representative of Spain, it was incumbent upon the Iraqi authorities to improve the situation of their people by taking concrete steps to convince the international community of their peaceful intentions. At the same time, the Council must be prepared to respond appropriately to an actual change in the attitude of the Iraqi authorities.¹¹²

The representative of the United Kingdom noted that much remained to be done before any general easing of the sanctions against Iraq could be contemplated. In that regard, he added that there could be no question of package deals between the Council and Iraq.¹¹³

The representative of Iraq noted that his Government had complied with its commitments in accordance with section C of resolution 687 (1991), as stated in the reports of the United Nations Special Commission and the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA). In addition, the Iraqi authorities had fully cooperated with the Special Commission and IAEA, in accordance with the monitoring system instituted by Council resolution 715 (1991). Other facts included elements contained in the joint communiqué issued by Iraq and the Russian Federation on 13 October 1994. He called on the Council to base its work on these fundamental facts which were substantiated by those official documents.¹¹⁴

After the Council received a letter from the representative of Iraq concerning the country's recognition of Kuwait and its international boundaries, the President declared that that recognition entailed a significant step towards the implementation of all relevant Security Council resolutions.

Question of the humanitarian impact of measures under Article 41

By resolution 986 (1995) the Council expressed its concern about the nutritional and health situation of the Iraqi population. It allowed countries to permit the import of petroleum and petroleum products originating from Iraq under certain conditions. A special escrow account was established, which the Secretary-General could use to finance the export to Iraq of medicine, health supplies, foodstuffs, and materials and supplies for essential civilian needs. Resolution 986 (1995) might be viewed as a humanitarian resolution aimed at providing for the essential humanitarian needs of the Iraqi population.

During the deliberations held in connection with the adoption of resolution 986 (1995), the representative of Italy pointed out that sanctions should not lead to the extreme consequence of inflicting misery and starvation on an entire civilian population. They remained one of the most effective tools provided by the Charter to enforce compliance with international law, but they should be applied with caution and parsimony and be precisely targeted to avoid serious negative side effects.¹¹⁵

The representative of China was of the opinion that while Iraq continued to cooperate in the implementation of Council resolutions the Council should discuss the lifting of the oil embargo against Iraq, especially to ease the humanitarian situation in Iraq.¹¹⁶ The representative of Honduras underlined the importance of effective economic sanctions, but felt that, when sanctions were imposed, specific measures to mitigate their impact on the innocent civilian population should be considered.¹¹⁷

Several Council members also emphasized that the measures did not constitute an exception to the sanctions regime,¹¹⁸ but rather an exemption with the purpose of humanitarian relief. The Russian Federation was extremely concerned over the humanitarian situation in Iraq and the effects of the sanctions and believed that sanctions should be eased in response to the constructive steps taken by Iraq, thereby motivating Iraq to comply fully with Council resolutions.¹¹⁹ The representative of the Czech Republic referred to the resolution as a way of refining the generally blunt instrument of sanctions for other situations around the world.¹²⁰

In a letter dated 15 May 1995 addressed to the Secretary-General,¹²¹ the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Iraq informed the Secretary-General that the Government of Iraq would not implement resolution 986 (1995) because it objected, inter alia, “to the proportion of petroleum to be exported via the Kirkuk-Yumurtalik pipeline and to the modalities for distribution of humanitarian relief in three northern governorates”.

Question of sanctions and national sovereignty

Resolution 986 (1995), paragraph 6, provides that “the larger share of the petroleum and petroleum products should be shipped via the Kirkuk-Yumurtalik pipeline”.

In the deliberations held in connection with the adoption of resolution 986 (1995), the representative of Indonesia argued that Iraq should be able to decide on the use of its pipelines. He further stated that “the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Iraq” must be respected, and that “Iraq should therefore be able to decide on the use of its pipelines for transportation and production purposes”.¹²² These views were shared by the representative of Nigeria, who said that his delegation would have preferred that no reference be made to the proportion of the oil to be shipped through any particular pipeline or terminal.¹²³ In his view, this should have been left to market forces. The representative of the Russian Federation also underlined this point, stating that the principles of sovereignty reaffirmed in the resolution were not always backed up by specific procedures for giving practical effect to those principles.¹²⁴ The representative of Argentina, on the other hand, was of the opinion that the regime established could in no way be interpreted as harmful to Iraq’s sovereignty and territorial integrity.¹²⁵

Termination of sanctions imposed against South Africa

The main objective of the sanctions imposed by resolution 418 (1977) was the complete transformation of the South African political system. In September 1993, following the establishment of the Transitional Executive Council to allow all South Africans to participate in government decisions pending elections, the Security Council was willing to lift sanctions. The Council, however, did not formally lift all sanctions until after the first multi-racial elections in April 1994.

Lifting of sanctions imposed under Article 41

In the deliberations held in connection with the adoption of resolution 919 (1994), by which the Council decided to terminate the arms embargo and other restrictions related to South Africa imposed by its previous resolution, the representative of South Africa, the First Executive Deputy President of South Africa, Mr. Thabo Mbeki, recalled that when the embargo was imposed pursuant to the provisions of Chapter VII, it was “because the prevailing system of government in our country and the actions carried out by that Government constituted, demonstrably, a threat to international peace and security”.¹²⁶ His delegation viewed the decision of the Council to lift the embargo as an acceptance by the international community that South Africa had become a democratic country that could adhere to the pursuit of the important goals of international peace and security. Council members agreed that sanctions were an effective tool in the liberation of South Africa, which opened opportunities for the region. They were also of the view that the termination of the arms embargo was appropriate and timely, in the light of the changes that were taking place in South Africa. The representative of the Russian Federation stated that his delegation would support the adoption of the draft resolution, since it fully corresponded to the task of assisting in the speedy reintegration of the new democratic South African Republic into the international community.¹²⁷ The representative of the United States emphasized that the United Nations arms embargoes and related restrictions imposed against South Africa had contributed significantly to the demise of apartheid. Now that apartheid had been dismantled and non-racial democracy was taking root, those restrictions were simply no longer appropriate.¹²⁸

Judicial measures under Article 41

The Council decided to address the serious violations of international humanitarian law, such as mass murder, torture and rape, that characterized the conflicts in the former Yugoslavia and Rwanda by establishing international tribunals.

International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia

By resolution 827 (1993), the Council, acting under Chapter VII, established an International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia, to prosecute persons responsible for war crimes, crimes against humanity and genocide committed in the territory of the former Yugoslavia since 1991.

During the deliberations held in connection with the adoption of resolution 827 (1993), speakers were unanimous in expressing support for the establishment of the tribunal. Some Council members expressed the view that the crisis in the former Yugoslavia constituted a threat to international peace and security which therefore justified the Council's decision under Chapter VII to establish the Tribunal.¹²⁹ The representative of Hungary stated that this was the first time that the United Nations established an international criminal jurisdiction to prosecute persons responsible for grave violations of international humanitarian law.¹³⁰ The representative of New Zealand stated that, as was noted in the resolution and in the Secretary-General's report, "the establishment of the Tribunal and the prosecution of persons suspected of crimes against international humanitarian law is closely related to the wider efforts to restore peace and security to the former Yugoslavia".¹³¹ The representative of the Russian Federation emphasized that his delegation supported the international tribunal because they saw it as an instrument of justice which was called upon to restore international legality and the faith of the world community in the triumph of justice and reason.¹³² While supporting the resolution by which the Tribunal was established, and given the particular circumstances in the former Yugoslavia and "the urgency of restoring and maintaining world peace", the representative of China stated that that political position of the Council should not be construed as endorsement of the legal approach involved. He stated China's view that, to avoid setting any precedent for abusing Chapter VII of the Charter, a prudent attitude should be adopted with regard to the establishment of an international tribunal by means of Security Council resolutions under Chapter VII. He stated the consistent position of the Chinese delegation that an international tribunal should be established by concluding a treaty, and emphasized that the Tribunal established in the manner in which it had been established could only be an ad hoc arrangement suited to the special circumstances of the former Yugoslavia and was not to constitute any precedent.¹³³

International Tribunal for Rwanda

During the deliberations held in connection with the adoption of resolution 955 (1994), the majority of Council members believed that the establishment of a tribunal was a signal of the international community's determination that offenders must be brought to justice, and considered that the Tribunal would contribute to the process of reconciliation in Rwanda. The representative of Brazil stated that the invocation of Chapter VII of the Charter for the purpose of establishing an international tribunal went, in his delegation's view, beyond the competence of the Council as clearly defined in the Charter.¹³⁴ The representative of France noted that, because of their particular seriousness, the offences that fell within the competence of the Tribunal were a threat to international peace and security, which justified recourse to Chapter VII of the Charter.¹³⁵ On the other hand, the representative of Rwanda, who voted against the resolution, expressed his Government's concern about the following issues: the Tribunal refusing to consider the causes of genocide in Rwanda and its planning, his delegation found the composition and structure of the Tribunal inappropriate and ineffective; some countries had taken an active part in the genocide; and the draft statute of the tribunal proposed that those condemned be imprisoned outside Rwanda.¹³⁶ The representative of China, who had abstained from voting, explained that his Government was not in favour of invoking at will Chapter VII of the Charter to establish an international tribunal through the adoption of a Security Council resolution.¹³⁷

Agenda for Peace

In his position paper entitled "Supplement to an Agenda for Peace",¹³⁸ the Secretary-General noted that the objectives of sanctions had not always been clearly defined. He pointed out that it was of great importance that, when the Council decided to impose sanctions, it should define objective criteria for determining that, their purpose had been achieved. He also noted that by interfering with the work of humanitarian agencies and the economies of neighbouring countries, sanctions often appeared to contradict the development objectives of the Organization of improving humanitarian conditions and promoting economic development. The Secretary-General called on Member States to consider ways of ensuring that the work of humanitarian agencies was facilitated when sanctions were imposed. He proposed that, when Member States imposed sanctions, provisions should be considered to facilitate the work of humanitarian agencies. It was, therefore, necessary to avoid banning imports that were required by local health industries and that applications for exemptions for humanitarian supplies were quickly processed.

The Secretary-General also recalled the proposals contained in his earlier report entitled "An Agenda for Peace",¹³⁹ concerning collateral damage due to sanctions. He noted that, while the heads of the international financial institutions acknowledged the collateral effects of sanctions, they proposed that this should be dealt with under existing mandates for providing aid to affected countries. The Secretary-General believed, however, that special provisions should be made and, in that connection, proposed the establishment of a new mechanism that would carry out the following five functions: assess the potential impact of sanctions on the target country and on third countries; monitor application of the sanctions; measure their effect; ensure the delivery of humanitarian assistance to vulnerable groups; and explore ways of assisting Member States suffering collateral damage.

In a presidential statement adopted in relation to the Secretary-General's position paper entitled "Supplement to an Agenda for Peace",¹⁴⁰ the President of the Council affirmed that the steps demanded of a country or party should be clearly defined in Council resolutions, and that the sanctions regime in question should be subject to periodic review. He further affirmed that once the objectives of the appropriate provisions of the relevant Council resolutions were achieved, sanctions should be lifted. The President stated: "the Council remains concerned that, within this framework, appropriate measures should be taken to ensure that humanitarian supplies reach affected populations and appropriate consideration is given to submissions received from neighbouring or other States affected by special economic problems as a result of the imposition of sanctions". The Council urged the Secretary-General, when considering the allocation of resources available to him within the Secretariat, to take appropriate steps to reinforce those sections of the Secretariat dealing directly with sanctions and their various aspects so as to ensure that all those matters were addressed in as effective, consistent and timely a manner as possible.

Rationalization of the sanctions tool

At its 3439th meeting, on 17 October 1994, the Council considered the situation between Iraq and Kuwait and also touched upon two questions related to the application and lifting of sanctions. The first question concerned the rationalization of the sanctions tool, most notably with regard to the application and termination of sanctions. The second concerned the unilateral withdrawal from a sanctions regime by the actor concerned.

Question of the rationalization of the application and termination of sanctions

The representative of the Russian Federation pointed out that sanctions remained the most powerful non-military means of exerting an impact in accordance with the Charter on those who violated the international legal order. Like any powerful weapon, however, sanctions required a very careful and responsible attitude and their use must be very carefully directed. It was most important that the criteria to be taken into consideration should be the achievement of the goals set by the Council, a solid legal basis, and consistency and rigour in the interpretation of decisions taken. The Russian Federation believed that certain corrections must be made in the sphere of application of sanctions, primarily with regard to developing and improving the machinery for applying and lifting sanctions. In his view the Council's experience in that respect reflected a significant inconsistency. In some cases, sanctions were lifted as a kind of advance, counting on the fact that the situation would develop in accordance with the best possible scenario. In other cases, the question of lifting or suspending sanctions was connected to a great number of fact-finding missions of all kinds, the submission of reports and so on. Such a varied and not fully systematized practice often laid the Council open to charges of "double standards", which was damaging to its prestige in the eyes of public opinion. According to the representative of the Russian Federation, the Council should devote greater attention to ensuring that, when sanctions were adopted, a procedure was at the same time determined for halting or lifting them, in accordance with the implementation of the relevant demands. He added that sanctions were not a punishment of peoples, but a reaction of the international community to concrete actions on the part of the ruling circles if they violated international law and order. Thought must therefore be given to the question how sanctions might be aimed at political elites, thereby reducing to a minimum the sufferings of broad strata of the population, including its most vulnerable categories, who were perhaps the least capable of righting the situation.¹⁴¹

The representative of the United States agreed with the need to rationalize the Council's approach to sanctions and noted that the members of the Council were becoming increasingly engaged in a discussion aimed at improving the sanctions tool.¹⁴²

According to the representative of Spain, sanctions regimes were not an end in themselves but rather an instrument designed to obtain certain objectives delimited by the Council. As those objectives were met, the Council could and must draw the appropriate conclusions, bearing in mind, first and foremost, the principles defended by the international community and the effects on the populations concerned and on neighbouring countries.¹⁴³

Question of unilateral withdrawal from a sanctions regime

With regard to what the Russian Federation described as "a new phenomenon" whereby a country sometimes called for unilateral withdrawal from a sanctions regime, the representative of the Russian Federation noted that the Council could find a way of reaffirming what was an axiom of the Charter, namely, that decisions of the Council could be repealed only by the Council itself. He stated that sanctions were a kind of sentence passed by the international community but, as distinct from clearly defined conditions for the end of periods of punishment provided for by norms of criminal law, "these elements in our case [were] very often missing". The very logic of law required that clarity be introduced on that point.¹⁴⁴

Part IV Consideration of the provisions of Article 42 of the Charter

Article 42

Should the Security Council consider that measures provided for in Article 41 would be inadequate or have proved to be inadequate, it may take such action by air, sea, or land forces as may be necessary to maintain or restore international peace and security. Such action may include demonstrations, blockade, and other operations by air, sea, or land forces of Members of the United Nations.

Note

During the period under review, the Security Council did not explicitly invoke Article 42 in any of its decisions. The Council did, however, adopt a number of resolutions by which it called on Member States to use “all necessary measures” to enforce its demands relating to the restoration of international peace and security and which may be of relevance to the Council’s interpretation and application of the principle in Article 42.¹⁴⁵ Action taken by the Council during the period under review may give insights into its interpretation and invocation of Article 42. The case of Haiti, for example, relates to action authorized by the Council to restore democracy in a Member State. In the cases of Rwanda and Somalia, the Council authorized enforcement action for the achievement of humanitarian purposes.

This section will briefly examine six case studies in which the Council authorized the use of force. Cases 14 to 16 relate to the Council’s authorization of enforcement action to maintain and restore international peace and security in Somalia and in the former Yugoslavia. In case 17, the authorization of the use of force in the restoration of the democratically elected government of Haiti is examined, while cases 18 and 19 relate to such authorization by the

A. Enforcement action necessary to maintain or restore international peace and security

The situation in Somalia

Following the attacks on 5 June 1993 against UNOSOM II personnel by Somali militiamen which resulted in the deaths of 25 members of UNOSOM II from Pakistan, the Council, by resolution 837 (1993), “gravely alarmed at the premeditated armed attacks launched by Somali militiamen against the personnel of UNOSOM II”, reaffirmed that the Secretary-General was authorized under resolution 814 (1993) to “take all necessary measures against all those responsible for the armed attacks referred to in paragraph 1 of that resolution, including against all those responsible for publicly inciting such attacks, to establish the effective authority of UNOSOM II throughout Somalia, including to secure the investigation of their actions and their arrest and detention for prosecution, trial and punishment”.

In the deliberations held in connection with the adoption of resolution 837 (1993), Council members condemned the attack and regarded it as an attack against the international community which should be responded to by a prompt United Nations action. The representative of the United States noted that the resolution reaffirmed the existing authority of UNOSOM II to take strong and forceful action to safeguard international forces, to punish those who attack them and to restore security and, further, that appropriate measures included the disarming or detention of persons posing a threat to United Nations forces or obstructing their operations. She stated that those who challenged the authority of the Security Council to enforce its resolutions must know that it stood firm in its resolve to bring peace and reconciliation to Somalia.¹⁴⁶

The representative of France stated that what had just taken place in Somalia was unacceptable and required from the Council the strongest possible reaction. His delegation was pleased that the resolution went beyond mere condemnation and that it affirmed the necessity for putting into practice concrete measures. He stated that the United Nations Operation in Somalia was, in effect, “entrusted with adopting all necessary measures against those responsible and also with neutralizing their media”, whose propaganda had played a decisive role in the unfolding of the tragedy.¹⁴⁷ The representative of the United Kingdom stated that the resolution sent a clear signal that the international community would not tolerate renewed attempts by the warlords in Somalia to challenge UNOSOM in the exercise of its mandate. He further stated that it provided for the use of all necessary measures against those responsible for the attacks against the Pakistani soldiers.¹⁴⁸ The representative of Spain recalled that the mandate of UNOSOM II set out in resolution 814 (1993) authorized the Secretary-General “to adopt such measures as would lead to the detention, prosecution and punishment of those responsible for ceasefire violations and undermining the security of United Nations forces”. In the light of this, he stated that UNOSOM II should therefore “take all necessary measures to prevent similar actions in the future by disarming the factions and neutralizing the means of communication which incite violence in that country”.¹⁴⁹

The situation in the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina

Following violations of a ban on military flights in the airspace of Bosnia and Herzegovina imposed by resolution 781 (1992), the Council at its 3191st meeting considered measures to be taken against those parties responsible.

By resolution 816 (1993), the Council authorized Member States, seven days after the adoption of that resolution, acting nationally or through regional organizations or arrangements, “to take, under the authority of the Security Council and subject to close coordination with the Secretary-General and UNPROFOR, all necessary measures in the airspace of the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina, in the event of further violations to ensure compliance with the ban on flights referred to in paragraph 1 above, and proportionate to the specific circumstances and the nature of the flights”.

During the deliberations held in connection with the adoption of resolution 816 (1993), several Council members expressed support for the use of force to implement its previous resolutions. Several speakers emphasized that the resolution envisaged the application of enforcement measures to those who violated the airspace of Bosnia and Herzegovina.

The representative of France stated that the Council would adopt under Chapter VII a resolution authorizing the use of force to ensure compliance with the ban on flights established by resolution 781 (1992), the repeated violation of which the Council had deplored in recent weeks. He further stated that it was essential that the Serbian side understand that a new stage in the conflict ravaging Bosnia and Herzegovina had been reached, and that the Council had decided to have recourse to force to see that its decisions were respected.¹⁵⁰

The representative of the United Kingdom underlined the significance of the resolution before the Council at a very important moment in the “horrendous story” of Bosnia and Herzegovina. He emphasized that the resolution was important because it signalled that the Council was not prepared to have its resolutions flouted. His delegation believed that the Council should be slow to authorize the use of force, but the combat flights against the eastern Bosnian villages a few days earlier represented “a step too far to tolerate under any circumstances”.¹⁵¹ The representative of the Russian Federation defended the authorization to use force as a necessary step to counter violations of previous resolutions. He stated that his delegation believed that no one had the right to violate Security Council resolutions, and yet all three Bosnian parties, notwithstanding the ban, had perpetrated acts that ran counter to the demands of the Council.¹⁵²

The representative of Brazil stated that his country had consistently favoured the settlement of disputes by peaceful and negotiated means and believed that enforcement action under Chapter VII should be a last resort, after the clear and confirmed demonstration of its necessity. He recalled that resolution 781 (1992) had been aimed at ensuring safety for the delivery of humanitarian assistance and at helping to promote a cessation of hostilities in Bosnia and Herzegovina, and that, at that time, the Council had undertaken “to consider, urgently, measures necessary to enforce the ban in the event of violations”. Violations had, however, persisted, and the adoption of resolution 816 (1993) derived “not only from the non-compliance with previous relevant resolutions but also from the changes perceived in the qualitative nature of the violations”.¹⁵³

The representative of Spain stated that the draft resolution before the Council was of “great political importance” and, further, that with the authorization of the use of force implied by the authorization of “all necessary measures”, in operative paragraph 4, should new violations occur, the Council would manifest its firm determination to ensure compliance with the ban on all flights in the airspace of Bosnia and Herzegovina, with the exception of those authorized by UNPROFOR.¹⁵⁴

The representative of Morocco stated that the Council’s decision “to take the necessary action and use force to implement its resolutions” was necessary, particularly since the atrocities committed had reached an intolerable level.¹⁵⁵

On the other hand, the representative of China, who had abstained from voting, explained the grounds for his Government’s reservations about the resolution. He stated it did not oppose the establishment of a flight exclusion zone in Bosnia and Herzegovina with the consent of the parties concerned. However, his Government’s principled position on resolution 781 (1992) remained unchanged, namely, that it had reservations on the invocation of Chapter VII to authorize countries to use force in implementing that zone.¹⁵⁶

By resolution 836 (1993), the Council expanded the mandate of UNPROFOR to, inter alia, enable it, “in the safe areas referred to in resolution 824 (1993), to deter attacks in the safe areas, to monitor the ceasefire, to promote the withdrawal of military or paramilitary units other than those of the Government of the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina, and to occupy some key points on the ground, in addition to participating in the delivery of humanitarian relief to the population as provided for in resolution 776 (1992)”. The Council further authorized UNPROFOR, in carrying out its mandate, “acting in self-defence, to take the necessary measures, including the use of force, in reply to bombardments against the safe areas by any of the parties or to armed incursion into them or in the event of any deliberate obstruction in or around those areas to the freedom of movement of UNPROFOR or of protected humanitarian convoys”. It also decided that, notwithstanding paragraph 1 of resolution 816 (1993), Member States, acting nationally or through regional organizations or arrangements, might take, under the authority of the Security Council and subject to close coordination with the Secretary-General and UNPROFOR, “all necessary measures, through the use of air power”, in and around the safe areas in Bosnia and Herzegovina, to support UNPROFOR in the performance of its mandate.

During the debate held in connection with the adoption of resolution 836 (1993), many Council members supported the provisions of the resolution, believing that it aimed at ensuring the protection of the safe areas by deterring attacks against them. They agreed on the possibility of using force to respond to bombardments against the safe areas.

The representative of New Zealand stressed that the letter and the spirit of the draft resolution clearly provided that, if the Council were to adopt it, the Serbs had to cease, immediately and conclusively, their aggression and outrages in respect of the areas designated in the text. Unless they did so, a response in the form of air strikes could ensue. He further stated that the draft resolution did not require any further study by the Council, or an additional report from the Secretary-General or strictly even a further meeting of the Council, or that UNPROFOR be strengthened. If the Serbs refused to abandon their aggression, action

¹⁵⁵ Ibid., p. 31.

could be taken forthwith under the terms of the draft resolution.¹⁵⁷

The representative of France noted that, to carry out the new mandate, the draft resolution explicitly provided for the possibility of using force to respond to bombardments against the safe areas, and to armed incursions into them or to any deliberate obstacles to the freedom of movement of UNPROFOR or of protected humanitarian convoys. It also provided for “the use of air power within and around the safe areas in order to support UNPROFOR in the fulfilment of its mandate, if necessary”.¹⁵⁸

The representative of China stated that he had voted in favour of the resolution on the basis of humanitarian considerations. He emphasized that the use of force could only be a temporary measure, not a solution to the conflict. China had always actively advocated the peaceful solution of disputes in international relations through dialogue and negotiation and opposed the threat or use of force. He pointed out that invoking Chapter VII of the Charter to authorize the use of force, as well as the implication in the resolution that further military action would be taken in Bosnia and Herzegovina might, instead of helping the effort to seek an enduring peace in Bosnia and Herzegovina, further complicate the issue there, and adversely affect the peace process.¹⁵⁹

The representative of the United Kingdom stated that his Government, together with France and the United States, probably acting in a NATO framework, was prepared, once authorized by that resolution, “to make available air power in response to calls for assistance from United Nations forces in and around the safe areas”. To implement the concept of “safe areas” effectively, the United Nations would need some further troops, and those delegations would support the Secretary-General in his efforts to attract new contributions, including from some Islamic States.¹⁶⁰

The representative of Hungary stated that his country had voted in favour of the resolution because it understood it as authorizing UNPROFOR “to resort to force in response to bombardments of safe areas or armed incursions or if there [were] deliberate impediments in or round those areas to the freedom of movement of UNPROFOR or protected humanitarian convoys”. He also stated that his Government understood the resolution “as authorizing Member States to take all necessary measures, including air power, to support UNPROFOR in its activities”.¹⁶¹

The representative of Spain stated that resolution 836 (1993) was a “logical consequence” of two prior resolutions, and that the measures adopted involved a considerable increase in the tasks entrusted to UNPROFOR, and presupposed “an important qualitative change, with the explicit authorization of the use of force by UNPROFOR under given circumstances, as well as the use of air power to support UNPROFOR in the fulfilment of an expanded mandate”.¹⁶²

The representative of Pakistan stated, however, that his delegation had advocated decisive, expeditious and comprehensive action by the Security Council under Chapter VII of the Charter to enforce its decisions and to authorize the use of all necessary measures, including the use of air strikes against key strategic targets to halt the Serbian aggression and reverse it through withdrawals from any territories occupied by the use of force and “ethnic cleansing”.¹⁶³ In his delegation’s view, however, the draft resolution did not address certain core issues in the conflict in Bosnia and Herzegovina. In a similar vein, the representative of Venezuela would have preferred to await the opinion of the Secretary-General on how he would implement the resolution on safe areas, before the sponsors of the resolution brought it forward to a vote.¹⁶⁴

Debate on NATO air strikes in Bosnia

In a letter dated 6 February 1994 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹⁶⁵ the Secretary-General referred to two incidents of mortar attacks against civilian targets that had occurred in Sarajevo during the previous week. He stated, inter alia, that the two incidents made it necessary, in accordance with paragraphs 9 and 10 of resolution 836 (1993), “to prepare urgently for the use of air strikes to deter further such attacks”. He indicated that he had written to the Secretary-General of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) to seek that Organization's support in this matter.

In his letter to the Secretary-General of NATO,¹⁶⁶ the Secretary-General recalled the declaration of the Heads of State and Government of NATO in which they had affirmed their "readiness under the authority of the United Nations Security Council and in accordance with the Alliance decisions of 2 and 9 August 1993 to carry out air strikes in order to prevent the strangulation of Sarajevo, the safe areas and other threatened areas in Bosnia and Herzegovina". He further stated that the mortar attacks against civilian targets in Sarajevo made it necessary "to prepare urgently for air strikes to deter further such attacks". He requested the NATO Secretary-General "to take action to obtain, at the earliest possible date, a decision by the North Atlantic Council to authorize the Commander-in-Chief of NATO's Southern Command to launch air strikes, at the request of the United Nations, against artillery or mortar positions in or around Sarajevo which [were] determined by UNPROFOR to be responsible for attacks against civilian targets in that city".

On 9 February 1994, in response to the Secretary-General's request, NATO carried out air strikes to prevent further shelling of Sarajevo following the attacks against civilians in the central market on 5 February 1994.

At its 3336th meeting, the Council considered the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina, in particular the attack against civilians in the central market.¹⁶⁷ During the debate, Member States described the situation as a threat to peace and security. Several welcomed the decision by NATO and the steps taken by the Secretary-General to prepare for the use of force, adding that those actions had been fully authorized by existing Council resolutions. They emphasized that the use of force was designed to underpin efforts by the United Nations and the European Union to achieve a negotiated settlement of the conflict, and that air strikes had to be carried out with caution and precision.

9 February by the North Atlantic Council to authorize air strikes to prevent further shelling of Sarajevo following the intolerable massacres of 4 and 5 February. In the view of his Government, the decisions of the North Atlantic Council were squarely within the framework of Security Council resolutions 824 (1993) and 836 (1993) with respect to safe areas. The lifting of the siege from those areas, Sarajevo in particular, was the purpose of those resolutions, by which, inter alia, UNPROFOR was authorized to use force, including air power, in fulfilling its mandate. Hence, there was no need for those decisions of the North Atlantic Council to be submitted to the Security Council for any further decision.¹⁶⁸

The representative of the United States noted that "for the first time" a regional organization had acted to implement a decision of the Council to use force under Chapter VII of the Charter. She added that the decision of the North Atlantic Council would bring closer to reality the sentiments often expressed in the Council concerning Bosnia, which was to seek an end to aggression, to safeguard innocent lives, and to encourage the peaceful resolution of disputes.¹⁶⁹

The representative of Pakistan stated that, despite the fact that most of the Security Council resolutions on Bosnia and Herzegovina were adopted under Chapter VII, they remained by and large unimplemented. To his delegation it was clear that only decisive use of force, particularly the use of surgical, punitive air strikes, would make the Serbs conform to Security Council resolutions.¹⁷⁰

In a similar vein, several members of the Organization of the Islamic Conference condemned the attack on civilians and urged the Council to act immediately and adopt necessary measures to bring the attacks to an end.¹⁷¹ They welcomed the decision of NATO to use air strikes against the Serb positions in Bosnia and Herzegovina, and urged that that decision be carried out rapidly. The representative of Indonesia stated that one of the immediate concerns which had to be addressed was the need to ensure the safe passage of relief convoys to prevent the imminent threat of a humanitarian disaster by taking all necessary measures, including the use of force.¹⁷² The representative of Saudi Arabia called on the international community to take all the action provided for by the Charter to implement the Security Council resolutions adopted under Chapter VII, which allowed for the use of force to compel the Serbian party to observe the rules of international legitimacy.¹⁷³

A number of speakers, however, while condemning the attack, believed that the situation in Bosnia could be resolved through dialogue and negotiation.¹⁷⁴ The representative of Jordan, while objecting to the use of military force, believed that the establishment of peace in any conflict could be implemented by negotiated political settlements that guaranteed the legitimate rights of all sides.¹⁷⁵ Ambassador Djovic argued that the decisions of NATO did not fall within the purview of the relevant resolutions of the Council authorizing air strikes. Therefore any attempt to carry out air strikes on the basis of that decision would represent a direct involvement in the civil war on one side. He emphasized that if a true objective was peace for Bosnia and Herzegovina, then the use of force could not be an instrument to that end.¹⁷⁶

Transition to Implementation Force

Following the conclusion of the General Framework Agreement for Peace in Bosnia and Herzegovina, the Dayton Agreement and the decision of the Peace Implementation Conference to establish a Peace Implementation Council, the Security Council, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, adopted resolution 1031 (1995), by which it decided that the mandate of UNPROFOR should terminate on the date on which the Secretary-General reported to the Council that the transfer of authority from UNPROFOR to a multinational implementation force (IFOR) had taken place, and approved the arrangements set out in the report of the Secretary-General on the withdrawal of UNPROFOR and headquarters elements from the United Nations Peace Forces.

By resolution 1031 (1995), the Council recognized that the parties had, in particular, authorized the multinational force referred to in paragraph 14¹⁷⁷ “to take such actions as required, including the use of necessary force, to ensure compliance with annex 1-A of the Peace Agreement”. It further authorized Member States acting under paragraph 14 to “take all necessary measures to effect the implementation of and ensure compliance with annex 1-A” and stressed that the parties were to be “equally subject to such enforcement action by IFOR as may be necessary to ensure implementation of that annex and the protection of IFOR”. The Council further authorized Member States to “take all necessary measures “ at the request of IFOR, either in defence of IFOR or to assist it in carrying out its mission, and recognized the right of the force to “take all necessary measures to defend itself from attack or threat of attack”.

During the debate held in connection with the adoption of resolution 1031 (1995), Member States welcomed the transition to IFOR and expressed their hope for a lasting peace process. The representative of Spain, speaking on behalf of the European Union, stated that the States members of the European Union had, in the past, been the major contributors of United Nations peacekeeping troops on the ground and would continue to play a major part not only in the multinational force, where thousands of European Union troops stood ready for deployment, but also in the civil and humanitarian tasks involved in implementing the Peace Agreement.¹⁷⁸ The representative of the United Kingdom noted that the role of the implementation force, which had been accepted by all the parties, would be even-handed in scope and duration. He further stated that the force was not imposing the peaceful settlement but that it would take the necessary action to ensure compliance.¹⁷⁹ The representative of Germany noted that the draft resolution authorized the deployment of a multinational force to implement the Dayton Agreement, which would go to Bosnia for about one year. By then, a durable peace had to be achieved. He further stated that, in that context, it was important to note that all parties had consented to the deployment of IFOR, including the use of force should that be necessary.¹⁸⁰

The representative of the United States said that the resolution noted that the deployment of IFOR was requested by the signatories, that it called upon all Member States, including those in the region, to cooperate with the force, and that it further recognized “the right of IFOR to take all necessary measures to defend itself from attack or threat of attack”. She also noted that the resolution further recognized that IFOR had “the authority to take actions, including the use of necessary force, to ensure compliance with annex 1-A of the Peace Agreement”. She described this as a “welcome supplement” to the duties and authorities stemming from resolution 827 (1993).¹⁸¹ The representative of France stated that the authority of the Security Council must be affirmed. It was the Council, and the Council alone, which, under the Charter, could give legitimacy to the military means that would be used.¹⁸²

Regarding the use of force by IFOR, the representative of Ukraine hoped that IFOR commanders would interpret the resolution in a restrictive manner. He stated that “the right given to IFOR to take all necessary measures to defend itself from threat of attack should not be abused”.¹⁸³

The representative of China stated that he would vote in favour of the draft resolution on the basis of his country’s principled position in support of the peace process and its hope for an early revitalization of lasting peace in Bosnia and Herzegovina, as well as in view of the urgent wishes of the parties concerned and the fact that the draft resolution called for “extraordinary measures in extraordinary circumstances”. He explained, however, that China’s support did not mean that its position had changed, but that China had all along disapproved of operations authorized by the Security Council “when at every turn it invoke[d] Chapter VII of the Charter and adopted mandatory measures”. He stated his Government’s belief that, in carrying out its mandate,

IFOR had to remain neutral and impartial and avoid wanton use of force so as to avoid damaging the image of the United Nations.¹⁸⁴

The situation prevailing in and around the safe area of Bihac

By resolution 958 (1994), the Council, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, extended the provisions of resolution 836 (1993) by providing for the use of air power, in support of the UNPROFOR mandate in respect of the safe areas within Bosnia and Herzegovina.

During the debate held in connection with the adoption of resolution 958 (1994), Council members were unanimous in condemning the attacks launched by the Krajina Serbs in and around the Bihac area. They shared concern at the aggravation of the conflict in Bosnia and Herzegovina, especially the bombing of the Bihac area, and viewed that act as a violation of international borders. In order to prevent a further escalation of the conflict, they urged parties concerned to immediately cease fire and hostilities in and around the Bihac area.

The representative of France welcomed the extension to Croatian territory of the possibility of using air power to enable UNPROFOR to carry out the mandate entrusted to it in the Council resolutions relating to the safe areas in Bosnia and Herzegovina. He stated that, just as he wished to see an end to the offensive military actions, the acts of provocation and the resulting escalations, and the attacks on the safe areas, must not be allowed to go unanswered. He emphasized that the credibility of the Security Council’s decisions and of UNPROFOR activities was at stake.¹⁸⁵

The representative of the Russian Federation explained that his delegation had voted in favour of the resolution, because it held the position that the order which had been established for the use of air power in Bosnia and Herzegovina and surrounding areas, and which had now been extended to the territory of Croatia with a view to ensuring the protection of the Bihac safe area, fully corresponded to the rules for the use of air power in the other safe areas. He stressed that the use of air power by United Nations forces, in appropriate cases, should be an impartial one, regardless of who might be the violator. He expressed hope that the resolution would be a signal to all the parties and to all those involved in the Bihac area to put an end to the escalation of military confrontation in order to ensure that the ceasefire was attained immediately.¹⁸⁶

The representative of New Zealand stressed that resolution 958 (1994) was adopted in the light of lessons learned from previous practice under resolution 836 (1993). He recalled the attack on the safe area of Gorazde in April 1994. At that time, it was not until the tanks were actually in the streets of the city that the United Nations and NATO were galvanized into deterrent action by the use of air power, which had been promised in resolution 836 (1993). He believed that that situation must not be repeated, and his delegation was therefore very pleased that resolution 958 (1994) had been adopted by consensus.¹⁸⁷

On the other hand, the representative of China explained he had voted in favour of the resolution because it aimed at protecting the safe area of Bihac and the safety of the civilians therein as well as ensuring the successful implementation by UNPROFOR of its mandate. However, he reiterated his Government's reservations concerning the mandatory actions authorized by invoking Chapter VII of the Charter. It was his view that the Council should be extremely prudent and cautious regarding the use of air power in Croatia. Air power should be used only for the purpose of self-defence — to protect the safety and security of UNPROFOR personnel and the civilians in the safe areas — and should not be abused for any punitive and pre-emptive purposes.¹⁸⁸

B. Enforcement action to restore democracy

The question concerning Haiti

By resolution 940 (1994), the Council authorized Member States to form a multinational force under unified command and control and, in this framework, to use all necessary means to facilitate the departure from Haiti of the military leadership. By the same resolution, the Council called for the prompt return of the legitimately elected President and the restoration of the legitimate authorities of the Government of Haiti.

The provisions of resolution 940 (1994) that may have some bearing on the provisions of Article 42 proved to be controversial among Member States. The representative of China stated that he could not support the provision in the draft resolution concerning the authorization for Member States to adopt mandatory means under Chapter VII of the Charter to resolve the problem of Haiti. He emphasized that China advocated a peaceful solution to any international disputes or conflicts through patient negotiations. He stated that he did not agree with the adoption of any means of solution based on the resort to pressure at will or even the use of force." The Chinese delegation was of the view that resolving problems such as that of Haiti through military means did not conform to the principles enshrined in the Charter and lacked sufficient and convincing grounds. He noted that many Member States, particularly those in the Latin American region, had identical or similar views.¹⁸⁹

The representative of Brazil stated that it was essential to respect not only the democratic solidarity which had been built in the region, but also the personality, sovereignty and independence of the States within it. He noted that for the first time in history, the Security Council was holding a discussion on the use of force under Chapter VII in connection with a country of the Western Hemisphere. The representative of Brazil also raised concerns about the draft resolution. Paragraph 4 contained language similar to that in resolution 678 (1990) regarding the Gulf War. That was a situation of a totally distinct political and legal nature, in a different political and regional context, resulting from the invasion of one country by another, an act which gave rise at the time to the strongest reaction by the international community.¹⁹⁰

In this context, several Latin American States argued that the situation in Haiti did not pose a threat to international peace and security, therefore, did not support military intervention. The representative of Mexico noted that the actions proposed in the draft resolution were not, strictly speaking, provided for in the Charter. In his opinion, the situation was not a threat to the peace, a breach of the peace or an act of aggression such as would warrant the use of force in accordance with Article 42 of the Charter. He stated that the foundation for the actions proposed, as could be seen from the report of the Secretary-General, appeared to be “previous practice, that is, precedent”. Every situation, however, was different. He stated that, in this case, the international community and the resolution itself had emphasized the exceptional nature of the Haitian case. Therefore, it seemed at the least contradictory to insist, on the one hand, on this unique character and, on the other, to cite precedents and concepts applied in other circumstances and in other geographical areas. The relevance of those precedents in the case of Haiti therefore appeared to be highly questionable, since this case was different and quite singular.¹⁹¹

The representative of Cuba reiterated his country’s resolute opposition to military intervention as a means of solving internal conflicts. He stated that history had shown that military operations could not resolve internal conflicts for the simple reason that they could not resolve the causes of those conflicts. Decisions of that nature went beyond the mandate of the Security Council under Chapter VII of the Charter, which only authorized such powers in cases of an express threat to international peace and security.¹⁹²

The representative of Uruguay expressed doubts whether the situation in Haiti posed a threat to international peace and security and thus allowed for the application of Article 42 of the Charter. He said that although — with a view to the restoration of law, order and democracy in a fraternal nation — Uruguay had unswervingly supported the imposition of economic sanctions in accordance with Article 41 of the Charter, it did not support the application of military action provided for in Article 42. His delegation did not believe that the internal political situation in Haiti projected externally in such a way as to represent a threat to international peace and security. Moreover, he believed that the search for a peaceful solution had not been exhausted. This was precisely the objective of the application of sanctions against the dictatorship which was so unjustly afflicting the Haitian people.¹⁹³

The representative of Venezuela reiterated his Government’s strict adherence to the non-intervention norm and therefore rejected any kind of military intervention, whether unilateral or multilateral, in the American hemisphere.¹⁹⁴

Although Nigeria supported the resolution, its representative pointed out that the draft resolution took the Council to another, entirely new level of external action to deal with the situation in Haiti and also to an entirely new territory in the Charter of the United Nations, in particular the use of Chapter VII.¹⁹⁵

The representative of the United States stated that the resolution built on the precedents of Kuwait and Rwanda as far as the first phase of the operation was concerned. The second phase, on the other hand, established a United Nations mission of modest size, with a clear and achievable mandate, operating in a relatively secure environment, with the consent of the Government, for a finite period of time. She stated that the purpose of the resolution was in favour of democracy being restored, not to impinge upon the sovereignty of Haiti.¹⁹⁶

The representative of Djibouti, while welcoming the resolution on the whole, raised a number of important issues. He called upon the members of the Council to reflect upon the growing pattern of reliance upon ad hoc multinational intervention forces to mitigate or resolve conflicts or conflict-induced humanitarian crises. Should the United Nations continue to encounter difficulties in assembling the manpower and resources necessary to address such situations, as they had seen in Haiti and other places, they could face the prospect of diminishing credibility. He called on the United Nations to retain its determination, its creativity, its capability and its means, or the future could become increasingly unpredictable — which meant unsafe.¹⁹⁷

C. Enforcement action for humanitarian purposes

The Security Council has, on a number of occasions, adopted decisions by which it authorized the provision of humanitarian assistance, not only out of an urgent humanitarian concern but also as an important element of the effort to restore peace and security. Such measures aimed at delivering humanitarian assistance may, therefore, be of relevance to the Council's interpretation and application of Article 42, insofar as they are adopted in the context of existing threats to the peace closely connected to broader efforts to restore peace and security in the affected regions.¹⁹⁸

The situation in Somalia

By resolution 794 (1992), the Council determined that the magnitude of the human tragedy caused by the conflict in Somalia, further exacerbated by the obstacles being created to the distribution of humanitarian assistance, constituted a threat to international peace and security. Acting under Chapter VII, the Council authorized a multinational coalition led by the United States, the Unified Task Force (UNITAF), "to use all necessary means to establish as soon as possible a secure environment for humanitarian relief operations in Somalia".

By resolution 814 (1993), the Security Council established UNOSOM II, which was authorized to take appropriate action, including enforcement action, to establish throughout Somalia a secure environment for humanitarian assistance. UNOSOM II was to complete the task begun by UNITAF for the restoration of peace, stability, law and order. The mandate also empowered UNOSOM II to provide assistance to the Somali people in rebuilding their economy, re-establishing the country's institutional structure, achieving national political reconciliation, recreating a Somali State based on democratic governance and rehabilitating the country's economy and infrastructure.¹⁹⁹ In his report, the Secretary-General had stated, in the light of the "disheartening reverses", that the threat to international peace and security ascertained in resolution 794 (1992)

continued to exist. Consequently, UNOSOM II would not be able to implement the mandate recommended unless it was "endowed with enforcement powers under Chapter VII of the Charter".²⁰⁰ The Council also requested the Secretary-General, through his Special Representative, to direct the Force Commander of UNOSOM II to assume responsibility for the consolidation, expansion and maintenance of a secure environment throughout Somalia, taking account of the particular circumstances in each locality, on an expedited basis in accordance with the recommendations contained in his report, and in this regard to organize a prompt, smooth and phased transition from UNITAF to UNOSOM II.²⁰¹

In the deliberations held in connection with the adoption of resolution 814 (1993), some speakers agreed that the task entrusted to the expanded UNOSOM II would make possible the restoration of peace and security in Somalia, and put an end to the humanitarian disaster. The representative of China stated that his Government had always held that a political solution to the Somali question should be sought through peaceful means within the framework of the Conference on National Reconciliation under the auspices of the United Nations. At the same time, China took note of the opinion of the Secretary-General to the effect that, while the unique situation of the absence of any effective, functioning government in Somalia had increased the difficulty and complexity of the task of settling the Somali question, delaying such a settlement would undoubtedly affect the peace and stability of the entire region. China had therefore supported the United Nations taking strong, exceptional measures in Somalia, so as to establish a secure environment for humanitarian assistance and to create conditions for the final settlement of the Somali question. The representative of China further stated that "authorizing UNOSOM II to take enforcement action under Chapter VII in order to implement its mandate had made it the first operation of its kind in the history of United Nations peacekeeping".²⁰²

The representative of the United Kingdom noted that the great merit of the resolution was its mixture of firmness and sensitivity, firmness in the sense that UNOSOM II would be endowed with a robust Chapter VII mandate to disarm the Somali factions and to operate throughout the territory of Somalia, and sensitivity in the sense that it recognized the Secretary-General's invaluable work in promoting the task of political reconciliation.²⁰³

The situation in Rwanda

On a number of occasions, the Council took decisions relating to the provision of humanitarian assistance in Rwanda. Its decisions either conferred such a mandate upon the United Nations Assistance Mission in Rwanda (UNAMIR) and were sometimes backed up by the authorization of the use of force, or, in cases where the relevant decisions of the Council were not taken under Chapter VII, they continued to focus on the humanitarian situation and action that could be taken towards alleviating it.

By resolution 912 (1994), the Council decided to adjust the mandate of UNAMIR to, inter alia, assist in the resumption of humanitarian relief operations to the extent feasible, called upon the parties concerned to cooperate fully in ensuring the unimpeded delivery of humanitarian assistance to those in need throughout Rwanda and appealed to the international community to provide increased humanitarian assistance commensurate with the scale of the human tragedy. By resolution 918 (1994), the Council decided to expand the mandate of UNAMIR under resolution 912 (1994) to include responsibility for contributing to the security and protection of displaced persons, refugees and civilians at risk in Rwanda, "including through the establishment and maintenance, where feasible, of secure humanitarian areas". It also recognized that UNAMIR might "be required to take action in self-defence against persons or groups who threaten[ed] protected sites and populations, United Nations and other humanitarian personnel or the means of delivery and distribution of humanitarian relief".

In the light of the deteriorating situation in Rwanda, pressure mounted for the Council to consider what further action could be taken in order to end the violence.

By resolution 925 (1994), the Council noted with the gravest concern the reports indicating that acts of genocide had occurred in Rwanda and noted further that the expanded military component of UNAMIR would continue only as long as and to the extent that it was needed "to contribute to the security and protection of displaced persons, refugees and civilians at risk in Rwanda and to provide security, as required, to humanitarian relief operations". The Council further recognized that UNAMIR might be required "to take action in self-defence against persons or groups who threatened protected sites and populations, United Nations and other humanitarian personnel or the means of delivery and distribution of humanitarian relief". It further emphasized the necessity that, inter alia, "all appropriate steps be taken to ensure the security and safety of the operation and personnel engaged in the operation".

In the debate held in connection with the adoption of resolution 925 (1994), the representative of the United States noted that ceasefire negotiations had begun but, in the meantime, there was no comprehensive ceasefire in effect and no comprehensive agreement among the parties involved in the Rwandan conflict or with the United Nations. In those circumstances, the activities described in the Secretary-General's report²⁰⁴ might be considered to involve enforcement actions. He further stated that UNAMIR military units had to be provided with the equipment and rules of engagement to execute successfully the assigned mission to defend themselves and to provide basic protection for threatened persons and security for the delivery of humanitarian relief. The Council had, to that end, included in the resolution "a reaffirmation that UNAMIR might be required to take action in self-defence".²⁰⁵

In view of the further deterioration of the situation in Rwanda, the Secretary-General addressed a letter dated 19 June 1994 to the President of the Security Council²⁰⁶ in which he suggested that the Council might wish to consider the offer of the Government of France to undertake, subject to Security Council authorization, a French-commanded multinational operation in conjunction with other Member States, under Chapter VII of the Charter, to ensure the security and protection of displaced persons and civilians at risk in Rwanda. The Secretary-General stated that, if the Council decided to authorize an operation along those lines, it would be necessary for it to request the Governments concerned to commit themselves to maintaining their troops in Rwanda until UNAMIR was brought up to the necessary strength to take over from the multinational force and the latter had created conditions in which a peacekeeping force would have the capacity to carry out its mandate.²⁰⁷

Following the recommendations of the Secretary-General, by resolution 929 (1994),²⁰⁸ the Council, stressing the strictly humanitarian character of the operation, which would be conducted in an impartial and neutral fashion, and which was not to constitute an interposition force between the parties, and acting under Chapter VII, authorized Member States “cooperating with the Secretary-General to conduct a temporary operation ... using all necessary means to achieve the humanitarian objectives set out in subparagraphs 4 (a) and (b) of resolution 925 (1994)”.²⁰⁹

During the debate, a number of Council members supported the establishment of a multinational force in Rwanda for humanitarian purposes aimed at ensuring the security and protection of civilians. The representative of France underlined the humanitarian objectives of the mission. He stated that the goal of the French initiative was exclusively humanitarian: the initiative was motivated by the plight of the people, in the face of which the international community could not and ought not to remain passive. It would not be the mission of the soldiers in Rwanda to interpose themselves between the warring parties, still less to influence in any way the military and political situation. Their objective was simple: to rescue endangered civilians and put an end to the massacres, and to do so in an impartial manner.²¹⁰

The representative of the Russian Federation stated that the enormous scale of the human tragedy and the continuing massacres of the innocent civilian population dictated the need for the adoption of “urgent measures that [could] stop the further bloodshed in Rwanda”. His delegation believed that it was important that the draft resolution clearly stated that this action had “the purely humanitarian goal of contributing to the security and protection of the civilian population”. He stated that it was also important that the operation be carried out impartially and neutrally, in close cooperation with UNAMIR.²¹¹

The representative of the United States stated that the “grave humanitarian crisis in that country demand[ed] a swift response from the international community” and commended the French for acting to address that need. She stressed that the mandate of the force was limited to addressing humanitarian needs, as called for in resolution 925 (1994).²¹²

The temporary French-led operation conducted parallel to UNAMIR was not supported by some members of the Council. New Zealand, which had abstained from voting, stressed that in terms of the objectives and motives it agreed with the terms of the resolution. It disagreed, however, on the means chosen by the Security Council. The representative of New Zealand cautioned that, if the right means were not employed, tragedy could be the result, as had been the case for Somalia, in which the Council had the best of humanitarian intentions. He stated that “trying to run two separate operations in parallel with different command arrangements does not work and, in the long run, those whom we set out to save can be those who suffer. The Security Council must learn from history”.²¹³

In a similar vein, the representative of China noted that the Rwandan parties to the conflict should negotiate within the framework of the Arusha Peace Agreement, because that was the correct and only way of solving the crisis in Rwanda. He further stated that resort to armed force or mandatory measures would only worsen the situation there.²¹⁴ The representative of Brazil stated that his Government had repeatedly maintained that the Council should do its utmost to avoid invoking the extraordinary powers conferred upon it by Chapter VII of the Charter.²¹⁵

²⁰⁸ Adopted at the 3392nd meeting, on 22 June 1994, with 5 abstentions (Brazil, China, New Zealand, Nigeria, Pakistan), suggesting deep divisions within the Council about authorizing a French intervention.

Note

Part V contains six case studies which examine the deliberations of the Security Council in connection with its adoption of decisions authorizing the use of force pursuant to Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations.²¹⁶ In its decisions adopted during the period under review, with respect to the situations in Somalia and Bosnia and Herzegovina, the question concerning Haiti and the situation concerning Rwanda, the Council did not explicitly refer to Articles 43 to 47, but its discussions demonstrate the relevance of those provisions, particularly as they relate to the command and control of military forces acting pursuant to an authorization by the Council.

Section A contains summaries of the decisions dealt with in the case studies contained in section B and is organized by agenda item and the decisions are listed chronologically. Section B considers salient issues raised in the Council's deliberations relevant to Articles 43 to 47, and the case studies are accordingly organized by subject.

A. Decisions of the Security Council relating to Articles 43 to 47

The situation in Somalia

By resolution 814 (1993) of 26 March 1993, the Council, acting under Chapter VII, requested the Secretary-General, through his Special Representative, to direct the Force Commander of UNOSOM II to assume responsibility for the consolidation, expansion and maintenance of a secure environment throughout Somalia, with a view to the facilitation of humanitarian assistance.

The situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina

By resolution 816 (1993) of 31 March 1993, the Council, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, authorized Member States, seven days after the adoption of the resolution, acting nationally or through regional arrangements, to take, under the authority of the Security Council and subject to close coordination with the Secretary-General and UNPROFOR, all necessary measures in the airspace of the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina, in the event of further violations, to ensure compliance with the ban on flights imposed by resolution 781 (1992), and proportionate to the specific circumstances and the nature of the flights. The Council requested the Member States concerned, the Secretary-General and UNPROFOR to coordinate closely on implementation measures, including the rules of engagement, and on the starting date of the implementation, and to report that starting date to the Council through the Secretary-General. The Council further requested Member States to inform the Secretary-General immediately of any actions taken to implement the resolution and requested the Secretary-General to so inform the Council.

By resolution 1031 (1995) of 15 December 1995, the Council, acting under Chapter VII, authorized the Member States acting through or in cooperation with NATO to establish a multinational implementation force (IFOR) under unified command and control in order to fulfil the role specified in annexes 1-A and 2 of the General Framework Agreement for Peace in Bosnia and Herzegovina. The Council authorized Member States to take all necessary measures at the request of IFOR to assist the force in carrying out its mission and recognized the right of the force to take all necessary measures to defend itself from attack or threat of attack. The Council decided that it would, within 12 months of the resolution, review the authorization given to IFOR. The Council requested the Member States acting through or in cooperation with NATO to report to the Council, through the appropriate channels on at least a monthly basis. The Council also requested the Secretary-General to submit to it reports from the High Representative.

By resolution 875 (1993) of 16 October 1993, the Council, acting under Chapters VII and VIII of the Charter, called upon Member States, acting nationally or through regional agencies or arrangements, cooperating with the legitimate Government of Haiti, to use such measures commensurate with the specific circumstances as might be necessary under the authority of the Security Council to ensure strict implementation of the provisions of previous resolutions relating to the supply of petroleum or petroleum products or arms and related materiel of all types, and in particular to halt inward maritime shipping as necessary in order to inspect and verify cargoes and destinations.

By resolution 940 (1994) of 31 July 1994, the Council, acting under Chapter VII, authorized Member States to form a multinational force under unified command and control and, in that framework, to use all necessary means to facilitate the removal from Haiti of the military leadership, the return and restoration of the legitimate authorities of the Government of Haiti and to establish and maintain a secure environment for the implementation of the Governors Island Agreement. The Council approved the creation of an advance team of the United Nations Mission in Haiti (UNMIH) to establish the appropriate means of coordination with the multinational force and to carry out the monitoring of its operations, and requested the Secretary-General to report on the activities of the team within 30 days of the date of deployment of the multinational force. The Council decided it would terminate the mission inter alia when a secure and stable environment had been established — that determination to be made by the Council, taking into account the assessment of the Commander of the multinational force and recommendations from the Secretary-General. The Council also requested those Member States forming part of the multinational force to report to the Council at regular intervals following an initial report not later than seven days following the force's deployment.

The situation concerning Rwanda

By resolution 929 (1994) of 22 June 1994, the Council agreed that a multinational operation might be set up for humanitarian purposes in Rwanda until the United Nations Assistance Mission for Rwanda (UNAMIR) was brought up to the necessary strength and, acting under Chapter VII, authorized the Member States cooperating with the Secretary-General to conduct the operation using all necessary means to achieve the humanitarian objectives set out in paragraphs 4 (a) and (b) of resolution 925 (1994). The Council decided that the mission of Member States cooperating with the Secretary-General would be limited to a period of two months, unless the Secretary-General determined at an earlier date that the expanded UNAMIR was able to carry out its mandate, and requested the Member States concerned and the Secretary-General to report to the Council on a regular basis. The Council also requested Member States to cooperate with the Secretary-General to coordinate closely with UNAMIR, and requested the Secretary-General to set up appropriate mechanisms to that end.

The situation in Somalia

In the deliberations held in connection with the adoption of resolution 814 (1993), the significance of the envisaged transfer of command responsibility from Member States to the Secretary-General for operations in Somalia authorized by the Security Council under Chapter VII was underlined by most speakers as they discussed the transition from the Unified Task Force (UNITAF) to UNOSOM II.²¹⁷ The representative of Cape Verde described the decision to authorize the Secretary-General and certain Member States to establish the necessary secure environment for humanitarian relief operations as a turning-point and a new point of departure with regard to the involvement of the international community in Somalia.²¹⁸ Similarly, the representative of Morocco noted that the operation, the first of its kind ever undertaken by the United Nations, clearly illustrated the important role which the Organization was able to play in crises of the kind under discussion.²¹⁹ The representative of the United States believed the adoption of the resolution would signify that it was time for the United Nations to resume its rightful leadership role in restoring peace to Somalia.²²⁰ The representative of Spain noted that by adopting the resolution the Council had established the first operation of its nature.²²¹ The representative of New Zealand believed the resolution marked “a further step by the United Nations towards defining a new era in international peacekeeping operations”.²²²

The representative of China noted that authorizing UNOSOM II “to take enforcement action under Chapter VII of the Charter in order to implement its mandate ha[d] made it the first operation of its kind in the history of United Nations peacekeeping".²²³ He believed, however, that UNOSOM II should act prudently in carrying out such enforcement tasks and that, once the situation in Somalia had improved, UNOSOM II should resume its normal peacekeeping operations. The representative of the Russian Federation noted the need, given the unprecedented nature of the operation, for the Secretary-General to report regularly to the members of the Council on measures relating to the period of transition from UNITAF to UNOSOM II and the deployment of the Operation itself.²²⁴

Authorizing Member States to ensure the effective enforcement of measures not involving the use of force pursuant to Chapter VII

In the deliberations held in connection with the adoption of resolution 875 (1993), two speakers stressed that the sole purpose of the Council's decision was to ensure the effective enforcement of the embargo measures adopted under its resolutions 841 (1993) and 873 (1993).²²⁵ The representative of Brazil noted that the authorization provided in the resolution was "restricted in scope, space and time" and "intended to have effect only until those sanctions measures were suspended or terminated".²²⁶

The representative of France noted that the Council's decision was not the first use by the Council of maritime monitoring of the implementation of sanctions, and believed that the rules of engagement to be employed should follow those previously established.²²⁷ The representative of China stated that, in carrying out the measures authorized by the resolutions, countries should only take actions commensurate with the specific situations prevailing at the time. Furthermore, they should strengthen coordination with the efforts of the Secretary-General and his Special Representative and keep the Council informed on a regular basis.²²⁸

Authorization by the Security Council of a multinational force

The situation concerning Rwanda

In the deliberations held in connection with the adoption of resolution 929 (1994), several Council members stressed the strictly humanitarian character of the mandate given to the multinational force. It was specifically noted that the mandate of the force was limited to addressing humanitarian needs, as called for in paragraph 4 (a) and (b) of resolution 925 (1994), and that the operation was to be carried out with impartiality and neutrality, in close coordination with the activities of UNAMIR.²²⁹ Emphasis was also placed on the temporary nature of the force, as an interim measure until the full deployment of an expanded UNAMIR.²³⁰ One Council member also recalled that the Secretary-General was expected to regularly inform the Council on the implementation of the operation.²³¹

The representative of Nigeria believed that, in a situation which constituted a threat to international peace and security, the United Nations, through the Security Council, retained primary responsibility. Any effort, whether unilateral, bilateral or multilateral, was best subsumed within it. He also believed that a parallel command structure in Rwanda, of UNAMIR on the one hand, and the French-led intervention force on the other, was most unlikely to produce a climate conducive to peace in Rwanda.²³²

²³⁰ The representative of France stated "It is not the objective of the French initiative to replace UNAMIR ... It will end as soon as the troops of General Dallaire ... have obtained their long-awaited reinforcements, at the latest within two months, as the resolution we have just adopted states" (S/PV.3392, p. 6). The representative of Spain stated "the multinational operation is aimed at bridging the gap until the full deployment of an expanded UNAMIR and for a two-month period" (ibid., p. 8). The representative of Argentina stated "[The] operation has been approved on the understanding that its objective is ... strictly in connection with the effective deployment of an expanded ... UNAMIR" (ibid., p. 10).

In the deliberations held in connection with the adoption of resolution 940 (1994), one speaker expressed deep concern over the absence of any reference to a specific time frame for the proposed action. In his opinion, “a kind of carte blanche ha[d] been awarded to an undefined multinational force to act when it deem[ed] it to be appropriate”.²³³ By contrast, the representative of New Zealand believed that the resolution did in fact contain elements which “clearly indicate[d] that the operation would be of a temporary nature and would be focused on a specific point in history”.²³⁴

The representative of Spain, noting the Council’s caution in the drafting of the multinational force’s mandate, stressed the need for it to be just as scrupulous in its implementation. To that end, he recalled the Council’s follow-up mechanisms contained in the resolution, including the monitoring of the multinational force by military observers within an advance group of UNMIH and the reporting requirements of the Secretary-General and Member States involved in the multinational force.²³⁵ The representative of the United States recalled that the timing of the transition from the multinational force to the United Nations mission (phase one to phase two) would be determined by the Council itself.²³⁶

Regarding the command of the operation, the representative of New Zealand recorded his Government’s continued preference for collective security to be undertaken by the United Nations itself.²³⁷ The representative of China described the practice of the Council authorizing certain Member States to use force as “disconcerting” because it would create a dangerous precedent.²³⁸

The situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina

In the deliberations held in connection with the adoption of resolution 816 (1993), the representative of France noted the balance the resolution had struck between the technical necessity of setting up effective military structures and the political need to place them under the authority of the Security Council, in close coordination with the Secretary-General.²³⁹ The representative of Brazil also attached particular importance to the fact that the implementation of the authorization contained in the resolution would be conducted under the authority of the Security Council and would be subject to close coordination with the Secretary-General and UNPROFOR. He understood that measures taken would be of a limited nature and that the Council would proceed to review those measures as soon as the situation warranted it.²⁴⁰ The representative of Spain noted that the measures were “limited to the airspace of [Bosnia and Herzegovina] and to the legitimate exercise of self-defence. Anything outside [that] scope [would] require the new authorization of the Council”.²⁴¹

Authorization by the Security Council of a force under the command of a regional organization

The situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina

In the deliberations held in connection with the adoption of resolution 1031 (1995), the political control exercised by the Council over the NATO-led operation was a central issue for several Council members. The representative of Nigeria noted that he would have preferred “a United Nations operation under the policy control of the Security Council and the managerial supervision of the Secretary-General”. He believed that the Council “should not continue to contract out what would normally be a United Nations responsibility to a group of powerful States. It was his delegation’s belief that “multinational forces for peace enforcement should be placed at the disposal of the United Nations and operated under the command of the Secretary-General. He stated “[a]s Member States of the United Nations, we should not support decisions that have the effect of subordinating our Organization or our Secretary-General to another organization, no matter how powerful its members”.²⁴²

The representative of China called for IFOR to provide the Council with timely and full reports on its implementation task so that it could accept the necessary control of and guidance from the Security Council.²⁴³ The representative of Nigeria also raised the matter of the timetable for the authorization.²⁴⁴

The representative of France stated that the authority of the Security Council had to be affirmed. Under the Charter, it was the Security Council, and the Council alone, that gave legitimacy to the military means to be used by IFOR. Only the Council could ensure the overall coherence of the operations by regularly assessing both the civilian and military aspects of the operation.²⁴⁵

The representative of the Russian Federation stressed that, under the terms of the resolution, reliable political control by the Security Council was ensured, namely through the provision of regular reports to it on the conduct of the entire operation and by virtue of its power to decide whether to extend the military component of the operation. Furthermore, the operation under way in Bosnia in no way meant a replacement of the United Nations by individual or regional organizations.²⁴⁶

Obligations of Member States under Article 48 of the Charter

Article 48

1. The action required to carry out the decisions of the Security Council for the maintenance of international peace and security shall be taken by all the Members of the United Nations or by some of them, as the Security Council may determine.

2. Such decisions shall be carried out by the Members of the United Nations directly and through their action in the appropriate international agencies of which they are members.

During the period under review, no decisions were adopted by the Council referring expressly to Article 48. When the Council did adopt decisions under Chapter VII, it underlined the mandatory nature of those measures imposed without specifically referring to Article 48. When imposing measures against Haiti, Rwanda, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya and the National Union for the Total Independence of Angola (UNITA), the Security Council in each case expressly stated in its decisions that States were to act strictly in accordance with the provisions of the resolution, “notwithstanding the existence of any rights or obligations conferred or imposed by any international agreement or any contract entered into or any licence or permit granted before the date of the respective resolution”.²⁴⁷ By those decisions, the Council required States to report

In accordance with Article 48, action required to carry out the Council’s decisions “shall be taken by all the Members of the United Nations or by some of them, as the Security Council may determine”, both “directly and through their action in the appropriate international agencies”.

In its decisions imposing measures not involving the use of armed force, in accordance with the provisions of Article 41 of the Charter, the Security Council consistently called upon “all States” to comply with relevant prohibitions.²⁵¹ In some instances, the Council addressed its calls to comply with relevant prohibitions to “States” in general.²⁵² In connection with the measures imposed on Rwanda, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya and Haiti, the Council expressly to take necessary measures to ensure that shipping on the Danube was in accordance with Council resolutions, including such enforcement measures commensurate with the specific circumstances as might be necessary to halt such shipping.

included “States not Members of the United Nations” among those to whom its decisions were addressed,²⁵³ and also required international organizations to act strictly in accordance with their provisions.²⁵⁴ In connection with the measures imposed on Somalia, Rwanda and the former Yugoslavia, the Council expressly included “neighbouring States” among those to whom its decisions were addressed.²⁵⁵ Concerning the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina, the Council reaffirmed the responsibility of “riparian States” to ensure strict implementation of the relevant resolutions regarding shipping on the Danube.²⁵⁶ The Council also imposed particular obligations on “each State neighbouring the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia”.²⁵⁷

In its resolutions establishing the International Tribunals for the Former Yugoslavia and Rwanda, the Council decided that “all States” should cooperate fully with the Tribunal and its organs in accordance with the relevant resolution and the statute of the Tribunal, and that consequently “all States” should take any measures necessary under their domestic law to implement the provisions of the resolution and of the statute.²⁵⁸

While the above-mentioned decisions were formulated to ensure universal compliance and to create binding obligations for all States, decisions providing for the use of “all measures necessary”²⁵⁹ to enforce previous resolutions of the Council instead took the form of authorizations or calls on States willing and in a position to take such action. While such authorizations or calls were often addressed to “Member States” in general,²⁶⁰ in some instances they were more specifically addressed to “Member States concerned”²⁶¹ or “Member States cooperating”.²⁶² In one decision, however, adopted in connection with the implementation of sanctions imposed on the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, the Council reiterated its request, in resolution 787 (1992), to “all States, including non-riparian States” to provide assistance to the riparian States regarding shipping on the Danube.²⁶³ Some of the decisions authorizing the use of all necessary measures expressly envisaged possible

²⁵⁷ See resolution 820 (1993), para. 23, by which the Council decided that each State neighbouring the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia should prevent the passage of all freight vehicles and rolling stock into or out of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, except limited exceptions, and report to the relevant sanctions Committee.

²⁵⁸ See resolutions 827 (1993), para. 4, and 955 (1994), para. 2, respectively.

²⁵⁹ “All necessary measures” was the phrase used in connection with items relating to the former Yugoslavia, in resolutions 816 (1993), para. 4, 836 (1993), para. 10, 908 (1994), para. 8, 958 (1994), para. 1, and 1031 (1995), para. 15. In resolution 940 (1994), para. 4, in connection with the question concerning Haiti, and resolution 929 (1994), para. 3, in connection with the situation concerning Rwanda, reference was to “all necessary means”.

By resolution 836 (1993), para. 10, the Council decided that Member States, acting nationally or through regional organizations or arrangements, could take all necessary measures to support UNPROFOR in the performance of its mandate. By resolution 958 (1994), the Council decided that the authorization given in resolution 836 (1993) to Member States, acting nationally or through regional organizations or arrangements, to take all necessary measures in the safe areas of Bosnia and Herzegovina should apply also to measures taken in Croatia.

Part VII

Obligations of Member States under Article 49 of the Charter

Article 49

The Members of the United Nations shall join in affording mutual assistance in carrying out the measures decided upon by the Security Council.

During the period under review, the obligation of States to join in affording mutual assistance assumed specific relevance in connection with decisions under Chapter VII of the Charter by which the Security Council authorized or called on Member States to take all measures necessary to enforce the Council's resolutions, even though those decisions contained no explicit references to Article 49. While such authorizations or calls were addressed primarily to States willing and in a position to take relevant enforcement action, the Council regularly requested all States to provide appropriate support and assistance to those States. Such requests were made by the following decisions:

By resolution 820 (1993) concerning the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina, by which the Council reaffirmed the responsibility of riparian States to take necessary measures to ensure that shipping on the Danube was done in accordance with previous relevant resolutions, the Council reiterated its request to all States, including non-riparian States, to provide, acting nationally or through regional organizations or arrangements, such assistance as might be required by the riparian States.

By resolution 1031 (1995) concerning the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina, by which the Council authorized the Member States acting through or in cooperation with NATO²⁶⁶ to establish a multinational implementation force, the Council invited all States, in particular those of the region, to provide appropriate support and facilities, for the Member States acting through or in cooperation with NATO.

By resolution 940 (1994), concerning the situation in Haiti, by which the Council authorized Member States to form a multinational force, it invited all States, in particular those of the region, to provide appropriate support for the actions undertaken by the United Nations and by Member States pursuant to the resolution.

Part VIII

Special economic problems of the nature described in Article 50 of the Charter

Article 50

If preventive or enforcement measures against any state are taken by the Security Council, any other state, whether a Member of the United Nations or not, which finds itself confronted with special economic problems arising from the carrying out of those measures shall have the right to consult the Security Council with regard to a solution of those problems.

Note

During the period under review, the Security Council expressly recalled the rights of States under Article 50 of the Charter in three of its decisions, adopted in connection with the imposition of sanctions on the former Yugoslavia, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya and Haiti.²⁶⁷

In connection with the implementation of measures imposed on the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro),²⁶⁸ the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya²⁶⁹ and Haiti,²⁷⁰ a number of Member States were confronted with special economic problems, and requested consultations and assistance in accordance with Article 50.²⁷¹ Questions relating to the application and interpretation of that Article were discussed during the Council's debates held in connection with the adoption and implementation of the above-mentioned measures.

Article 50 was also considered by the Secretary-General in his report dated 15 June 1993 on the implementation of the recommendations contained in "An Agenda for Peace". He observed that there was no mechanism in the United Nations to address the spirit of Article 50 of the Charter effectively and systematically and suggested there was also a need to set up a permanent mechanism for consultations between the Security Council, the Secretary-General and international financial institutions and other components of the United Nations system, as well as Member States, when sanctions were considered or imposed.²⁷² In a subsequent position paper, prepared on the occasion of the fiftieth anniversary of the United Nations, the Secretary-General outlined the establishment of a mechanism tasked with, inter alia, assessing, at the request of the Council, the potential impact of sanctions on the target country and on third countries and also exploring ways to assist Member States suffering from collateral damage and to evaluate claims submitted by such States under Article 50.²⁷³ The deliberations of Member States in connection with that position paper are dealt with in case 29 below.

Decisions of the Security Council relating to Article 50

Implementation of measures imposed against the former Yugoslavia by resolution 820 (1993)

Immediately after the adoption of resolution 820 (1993), the Council held three consecutive meetings to consider the impact on Member States of the measures imposed against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro).²⁷⁴ The representatives of Romania,²⁷⁵ Bulgaria²⁷⁶ and Ukraine,²⁷⁷ while reaffirming support for, and their strict compliance with, the sanctions imposed, noted the negative effects the implementation of those sanctions was having on their respective economies. Recalling Article 50 of the Charter, they requested the support of the international community to identify forms of compensation to remedy the losses incurred by their compliance with the sanctions regime and/or to adopt measures to mitigate the negative consequences arising from the enforcement of sanctions. The representative of Bulgaria welcomed the establishment of a committee to devise mechanisms for assisting the States most affected by the implementation of sanctions.²⁷⁸ The representative of Argentina also brought to the attention of other members the economic difficulties that the countries neighbouring the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia were suffering as a consequence of implementing the sanctions, and asked the international community to address this issue in the spirit of Article 50.²⁷⁹

At the 3336th meeting, the representative of Ukraine reiterated his country's view that the Council should seriously address the effectiveness of economic sanctions against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia with the aim of mitigating the adverse consequences of the sanctions regime on the economies of third countries, in accordance with Article 50 of the Charter (S/PV.3336 (Resumption 2), p. 203).

By letters addressed to the President of the Security Council or the Secretary-General, representatives of various affected countries, including Bulgaria,²⁸⁰ Hungary,²⁸¹ Slovakia²⁸² and Ukraine,²⁸³ requested assistance to mitigate the adverse economic impact of the sanctions regime in accordance with Article 50 of the Charter. Requests for assistance were similarly made by Albania,²⁸⁴ the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia²⁸⁵ and Uganda²⁸⁶ in letters addressed to the Chairman of the Security Council Committee established pursuant to resolution 724 (1991).

By its resolution 843 (1993), the Council, inter alia, noted that the Committee established pursuant to resolution 724 (1991) had set up a working group to examine an increasing number of requests for assistance submitted pursuant to Article 50 of the Charter. The Council confirmed that the Committee was entrusted with the task of examining requests for assistance under the provisions of Article 50 and invited the Committee to make recommendations to the President of the Council for appropriate action.

The President of the Security Council received recommendations from the Committee established pursuant to resolution 724 (1991) with regard to Bulgaria, Hungary, Romania, Uganda and Ukraine based on the requests for assistance those countries had presented in relation to the economic difficulties faced in the course of compliance with sanctions imposed against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia.²⁸⁷ Subsequently, the President received from the Chairman of the Committee recommendations for assistance under Article 50 for Albania,²⁸⁸ Slovakia²⁸⁹ and the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia.²⁹⁰ Following the receipt of the recommendations of the Committee, the Security Council adopted no resolutions providing specific compensatory measures to the affected countries.

The issue of the application of Article 50 of the Charter was again raised at the 3454th and 3483rd meetings of the Council. The representative of Romania noted that the Council's decisions in connection with the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina had led to important actions with regard to questions of more general scope, including the particularly important issue of the application of provisions of Article 50 with a view to resolving the economic difficulties of States resulting from the implementation of sanctions measures adopted by the Council.²⁹¹ The representative of Indonesia, speaking on behalf of the non-aligned countries, stressed the need to make Article 50 operational by institutionalizing the consultations envisaged in the Charter and to adopt other effective measures providing solutions for the problems encountered by the affected Member States in the implementation of sanctions.²⁹²

Implementation of measures imposed against the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya by resolution 883 (1993)

By its resolution 883 (1993), the Security Council, inter alia, reaffirmed its resolutions 731 (1992) and 748 (1992) and imposed a strengthened financial, economic and air transportation sanctions regime against the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya. In connection with the application of Article 50, the Council entrusted the Committee established by resolution 748 (1992) with the task of examining possible requests for assistance under the provisions of Article 50 and making recommendations to the President of the Security Council for appropriate action.

During the deliberations, a number of speakers touched upon the Council's responsibility to address the potential consequences for third States of its decision to apply sanctions against the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya. The representative of Egypt called upon the Council to consider measures with a view to alleviating the economic suffering of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya and its neighbours that would arise from the adoption of the draft resolution under consideration.²⁹³ The representative of the Sudan called to the attention of the members of the Council that the impact of the sanctions measures had gone beyond the people of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya to affect neighbouring countries with social and cultural links to that people.²⁹⁴ He further stated that Article 50 of the Charter could be only of minimal help to those who were suffering as a result of the implementation of those resolutions. The representative of Brazil stated that his delegation was aware of the need to address the consequences which sanctions could have on third countries and for that reason attached great importance to the provision of the resolution which entrusted the Committee established by resolution 748 (1992) with the task of examining possible requests for assistance under Article 50.²⁹⁵

During the period under review, although no requests for special assistance under Article 50 were received in connection with the sanctions against the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, two communications of relevance to Article 50 were transmitted. By a note verbale dated 14 January 1994 addressed to the Secretary-General,²⁹⁶ the representative of Poland urged the Security Council to consider measures to alleviate the economic losses resulting from the implementation of resolution 883 (1993) in accordance with Article 50 of the Charter. Similarly, the representative of Bulgaria, by a note verbale dated 20 January 1994 addressed to the Secretary-General,²⁹⁷ described some of the legislative measures taken by the Government of Bulgaria to comply with the latest resolution against the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya. In the note, the representative of Bulgaria also drew attention to the new economic and financial losses arising for Bulgaria from compliance with resolution 883 (1993), and informed the Secretary-General that Bulgaria would shortly submit a memorandum to request assistance pursuant to Article 50. During the period under review, the Security Council adopted no decisions providing specific compensatory measures to the countries affected by compliance with the sanctions regime against the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya.

Implementation of measures imposed against Haiti by resolutions 873 (1993) and 917 (1994)

By its resolution 917 (1994) the Council imposed travel bans against the military officers involved in the coup d'état in Haiti and strengthened sanctions on the import and export of commodities, and the supply of petroleum, its derivatives and other products. The Council also decided that the Committee established pursuant to resolution 841 (1993) would be responsible for examining requests for assistance under the provisions of Article 50 and would make recommendations to the President of the Council for appropriate action.

During the Council's deliberations in connection with the adoption of resolution 917 (1994), the representative of Spain pointed out that neighbouring countries had to make special efforts to ensure the effectiveness of sanctions and, as a result, suffered considerable economic damage. He urged the Council to address the issue of requests for assistance in the context of the resolution adopted.²⁹⁸

By a note verbale dated 4 October 1994 addressed to the Secretary-General,²⁹⁹ the Dominican Republic submitted a memorandum concerning its economic losses associated with the application of the embargo against Haiti. By a letter to the President of the Security Council,³⁰⁰ the Secretary-General forwarded the application made by the Dominican Republic pursuant to Article 50 for the attention of the Council. The Council took no further action on the request for consultation of the Dominican Republic.

Case 29

Supplement to an Agenda for Peace

During the Council's deliberations in connection with the Supplement to an Agenda for Peace, the majority of speakers addressed the recommendations made by the Secretary-General in relation to the application of Article 50, specifically the proposed mechanism which would, inter alia, explore ways of assisting Member States that were suffering collateral damage and evaluate claims submitted by such States under Article 50.³⁰¹ The representatives of Botswana,³⁰² China,³⁰³ the Czech Republic,³⁰⁴ Egypt,³⁰⁵ Honduras,³⁰⁶ Ireland,³⁰⁷ Romania³⁰⁸ and Turkey³⁰⁹ endorsed the recommendation of the Secretary-General to create a mechanism to alleviate special economic problems.

The representative of Indonesia, speaking on behalf of the non-aligned countries, stated that, while Article 50 of the Charter had called for consultations in seeking a solution to the problems caused to neighbouring States and trading partners due to sanctions, a more extensive use of that provision as a means to limit the impact of sanctions was essential.

His delegation believed that the establishment of a sanctions mechanism should be further explored.³¹⁰ The representative of Poland believed that there should be arrangements alleviating the burdens incurred by countries which participated in economic measures against the offender States, and stated that Article 50 did not constitute a sufficient remedy.³¹¹ The representative of Colombia viewed the mechanism proposed by the Secretary-General as a means which would enable the United Nations to fully develop and implement the provisions of Article 50.³¹² The representative of Sierra Leone reiterated the position of his delegation that the provisions of Article 50 carried with them an expectation that went beyond mere consultation with the Council,³¹³ and included the provision of some form of remedy for those affected.

The representative of India took note of the proposal concerning the establishment of a mechanism to implement Article 50 of the Charter. In the view of his delegation the mechanism should be established by the Security Council and it needed to contain the element of automaticity of application. He also suggested that the Council consider establishing a fund from assessed contributions for the purpose of alleviating special economic problems when sanctions were initially imposed.³¹⁴ In that connection, the representative of Indonesia believed that consultations with Bretton Woods institutions were not necessarily the most effective way of alleviating the damages suffered by third parties.³¹⁵ He noted that the Security Council, which imposed sanctions, had the responsibility to provide relief.

The representative of Pakistan welcomed the suggestion of establishing a mechanism to, inter alia, explore ways of assisting Member States that were suffering collateral damage due to Security Council sanctions and to evaluate claims of such States under Article 50. He believed that establishing such a mechanism could prove to be an important step towards institutionalizing a system whereby the burdens placed on third countries as a result of Security Council-imposed sanctions were equitably shared by all Member States.³¹⁶ Similarly, the representative of Bulgaria held that an institutionalized mechanism should be set up to provide a realistic possibility of offsetting the unfavourable effects of sanctions on third States and compensating them for their losses.³¹⁷

The representative of Sri Lanka noted that the Secretariat deserved to be strengthened with additional staff and resources required to more effectively and expeditiously fulfil its functions in respect of Article 50 of the Charter.³¹⁸ The representative of New Zealand acknowledged there was a strong argument for Members of the United Nations affected by sanctions to support the concept of a mechanism to investigate the economic implications,³¹⁹ but believed that the issue should not be studied in isolation from other issues related to sanctions, including enforcement. The representative of Ukraine believed it appropriate to return to the question of creating a special compensatory mechanism that would include a compensation fund.³²⁰ He believed a standing committee of the Security Council on sanctions should be charged with the responsibility for, inter alia, assessing the impact of economic losses sustained by States.

While the representative of the United States shared the concern about the desirability of avoiding or reducing unintended and harmful collateral effects of sanctions, she stressed that procedures designed to mitigate the unintended effects of sanctions should not be allowed to obstruct or so mitigate their effects as to render them useless as a means for influencing the behaviour of a Government that was defying the international community and law.³²¹

The representative of France noted that the use of measures outlined in Article 41 of the Charter was not subject to any restriction and that Article 50 referred only to the ability of third States to consult the Council on specific economic difficulties they might encounter. Unable to endorse the Secretary-General's suggestion for the establishment of a mechanism to evaluate the potential impact of the planned sanctions on the country in question and on third countries, he noted that the proposed mechanism would, unfortunately, lead to all sorts of pressure being exerted on the Council and limit the Council's autonomy in decision-making.³²²

Part IX

The right of self-defence in accordance with Article 51 of the Charter

Article 51

Nothing in the present Charter shall impair the inherent right of individual or collective self-defence if an armed attack occurs against a Member of the United Nations, until the Security Council has taken measures necessary to maintain international peace and security. Measures taken by Members in the exercise of this right of self-defence shall be immediately reported to the Security Council and shall not in any way affect the authority and responsibility of the Security Council under the present Charter to take at any time such action as it deems necessary in order to maintain or restore international peace and security.

Note

During the period under review, the Security Council adopted one resolution in connection with the proposal by China, France, the Russian Federation, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the United States of America on security assurances containing an explicit reference to and reaffirming the principle set out in Article 51.³²³

The Council also debated the application and interpretation of Article 51 in connection with the use of armed force by the United States against Iraq in connection with an assassination attempt against a former United States Head of State. In that case, ³²³ See resolution 984 (1995), para. 9. By that resolution, the Council, inter alia, recognized the legitimate interest of non-nuclear-weapon States parties to the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons to receive assurances that the Council would act immediately in accordance with the relevant provisions of the Charter.

Council discussion centred on whether the United States was justified in relying on its right of self-defence under Article 51.

In connection with the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina, the Council considered a draft resolution which sought to exempt Bosnia and Herzegovina from the arms embargo imposed on the former Yugoslavia by resolution 713 (1991). A majority of speakers, speaking in support of the resolution, argued for its adoption so as to allow Bosnia and Herzegovina to exercise its inherent right to self-defence.

The arguments advanced during the Council's deliberations in connection with the above-mentioned incidents and situations are set out in the case studies in section A below. The case studies will be followed by a brief overview in section B of instances in which the right of self-defence was invoked in official correspondence, but which did not give rise to any constitutional discussion relevant to Article 51.

A. Constitutional discussion in connection with the right of self-defence under Article 51 of the Charter

In the instances that follow, the invocation of the right of self-defence by a Member State gave rise to a discussion relevant to the application and interpretation of Article 51.

Decisions of the Security Council relating to Article 51

Case 30

United States notification of 26 June 1993 measures against Iraq

By a letter dated 26 June 1993 addressed to the President of the Council,³²⁴ the representative of the United States reported that, in accordance with Article 51 of the Charter, the United States Government had exercised its right of self-defence by responding to the unlawful attempt by the Government of Iraq to murder the former President of the United States and to its continuing threat to United States nationals. It had decided to respond, as a last resort, to the attempted attack and the threat of further attacks, by striking at an Iraqi military and intelligence target so as to minimize the risk of collateral damage to civilians.

By a letter dated 27 June 1993 addressed to the Secretary-General,³²⁵ the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Iraq described the cruise missile attack, launched from American warships in the Red Sea and Arabian Gulf, as an unjustified act of aggression.

The Security Council met to consider the matter at its 3245th meeting. The representative of the United States held that the attempt against the former President of the United States during his visit to Kuwait in April 1993 was an attack on the United States and, while not asking the Council for any action, contended that every Member State would regard an assassination attempt against its former Head of State as an attack against itself, and would react. She indicated that the United States had responded directly, as it was entitled to do under Article 51 of the Charter. The response had been proportionate and aimed at a target directly linked to the operation against the former President of the United States. The specific incident had been between Iraq and the United States directly, which was why the United States had acted alone. She noted further that, although the United States had taken action under Article 51 of the Charter, there was a broader context of Iraq's repeated and consistent refusal to comply with the resolutions of the Council since its invasion of Kuwait in 1990.³²⁶

³²⁶ S/PV.3245, pp. 3-9.

The representative of Iraq, denying any role by his Government with respect to the alleged assassination attempt, referred to the attack as an act of aggression against Iraq. He also argued that the United States had acted without providing either evidence against Iraq or inviting it to clarify its position. He further stated that the rules of international law gave the United States no right to overlook the principle of due process of law or the provisions of the Charter. He called on the Council to condemn the act of aggression and take the action necessary to prevent a repetition in the future.³²⁷

The representative of the Russian Federation called the actions of the United States justified since they arose from the right of States to individual and collective self-defence, in accordance with Article 51 of the Charter.³²⁸ Other speakers expressed their understanding for the reaction of the United States and the reasons for its unilateral action.³²⁹ The representative of Brazil took note of the statement by the United States Government that it considered such action necessary, as a last resort, with a view to preventing the further occurrence of such acts.³³⁰

Appreciation was expressed generally for the presentation of evidence supporting the conclusion of the United States Government concerning the direct involvement of the Government of Iraq in the assassination attempt.³³¹ Some speakers welcomed the explanation of the proportionate nature of the United States response.³³²

The representative of China expressed deep concern about the events which had occurred and stated his Government's opposition to any action that could contravene the Charter and norms of international relations. His delegation did not endorse any action that could intensify the tension in the region, including the use of force.³³³ Similarly, the representative of Cape Verde, speaking on behalf of the non-aligned members of the Council, urged the exercise of restraint by all States, consistent with the principles of the Charter and in particular for the maintenance of international peace and security and the avoidance of the use of force inconsistent with the purposes of the United Nations.³³⁴

The situation in the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina

At its 3247th meeting, on 29 June 1993, the Council considered a draft resolution³³⁵ by which it would have, inter alia, reaffirmed that the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina, as a State Member of the United Nations, enjoyed the rights provided for in the Charter of the United Nations; affirmed that the international community had the responsibility to secure fully the independence, territorial integrity and unity of Bosnia and Herzegovina; and, in its operative part, decided to exempt the Government of Bosnia and Herzegovina from the arms embargo imposed on the former Yugoslavia by its resolution 713 (1991) for the sole purpose of enabling Bosnia and Herzegovina to exercise its inherent right of self-defence. The draft resolution was not adopted.

During the Council's deliberations, the majority of speakers strongly argued that Bosnia and Herzegovina had to be allowed to exercise its inherent right of self-defence, as embodied in Article 51 of the Charter, and was being prevented from doing so by virtue of the arms embargo imposed pursuant to resolution 713 (1991).³³⁶

The representative of Bosnia and Herzegovina called upon the Council to free it of the "shackles" that were diminishing its self-defence, and further, queried whether the arms embargo should be declared de jure invalid in accordance with the Charter's guarantee of the right of self-defence.³³⁷ Other speakers arguing in favour of lifting the arms embargo against Bosnia and Herzegovina questioned the logic of maintaining the arms embargo in place,³³⁸ stressed the need to "untie the hands" of the Bosnians and enable them to exercise their inherent right to self-defence,³³⁹ stated that it was ineffective,³⁴⁰ and that resolution 713 (1991) applied to the former Yugoslavia, which no longer existed.³⁴¹

While not addressing the constitutional question concerning Article 51, those speakers opposed to the draft resolution argued that a selective lifting of the arms embargo would only contribute to further escalating the violence and hostilities.³⁴² It was also argued that lifting the embargo ran counter to finding a peaceful negotiated settlement to the conflict and that it was imperative to reach such a settlement.³⁴³ The representative of the United Kingdom further contended that the adoption of the draft resolution would be seen as a signal that the United Nations was turning its back on Bosnia and leaving its inhabitants to "fight it out, come what may".³⁴⁴

B. Invocation of the right of self-defence in other instances

In the instances that follow, Member States invoked the right of self-defence in correspondence which did not give rise to any significant constitutional discussion with direct relevance to Article 51.

The situation between Iran and Iraq

By a letter dated 25 May 1993 addressed to the Secretary-General,³⁴⁵ the representative of the Islamic Republic of Iran reported that, in accordance with Article 51, the Islamic Republic Air Force had carried out an operation against the military bases located in Iraq of a terrorist group, where armed attacks against and incursions into Iranian territory had originated. In response, the representative of Iraq, by a letter dated 8 June 1993,³⁴⁶ claimed that the Iranian justification for its attack, on the basis of Article 51, had no firm basis in fact and actually constituted aggression.

In response, the Deputy Minister for International Policy and Secretary-General for External Relations of Peru, by a letter dated 28 January 1995, stated that his country had been the victim of armed aggression by Ecuador.³⁴⁸

Chapter XII covers the consideration by the Security Council of Articles of the Charter not dealt with in the preceding chapters.

Part I

Consideration of the purposes and principles of the United Nations (Articles 1 and 2 of the Charter)

A. Article 1, paragraph 2

Article 1, paragraph 2

[The Purposes of the United Nations are:]

To develop friendly relations among nations based on respect for the principle of equal rights and self-determination of peoples, and to take other appropriate measures to strengthen universal peace.

Note

During the period under review, Article 1 (2) was not explicitly referred to in any of the Council's decisions or deliberations. There were nevertheless a number of explicit and implicit references to the principle of self-determination in the Council's deliberations and decisions in connection with Palau, Western Sahara and Haiti. In addition, the Council touched upon the principle of self-determination in connection with the situation in Cambodia, for which the Council recalled that the Cambodian people had the right to determine their own political future through the free and fair election of a constituent assembly.¹

Cases 1 to 3 below reflect the practice of the Council touching upon the provisions of Article 1(2), as illustrated by its decisions and deliberations in connection with Palau, the situation concerning Western Sahara and the question concerning Haiti.

Case 1

Letter dated 2 November 1994 from the representative of the Trusteeship Council addressed to the President of the Security Council

At its 3455th meeting, on 10 November 1994, the Council included in its agenda a letter dated 2 November 1994 from the President of the Trusteeship Council addressed to the President of the Security Council.² The letter contained the text of a draft resolution recommended by the Trusteeship Council for adoption by the Security Council on the termination of the Trusteeship Agreement for the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands (Palau).

At the same meeting, the Council adopted resolution 956 (1994), by which it expressed its satisfaction that the people of Palau had freely exercised their right to self-determination in approving the new status agreement in a plebiscite observed by the visiting mission of the Trusteeship Council and that, in addition to the plebiscite, the duly constituted legislature of Palau had adopted a resolution approving the new status agreement, thereby freely expressing their wish to terminate the status of Palau as a Trust Territory. The Council also determined, in the light of the entry into force on 1 October 1994 of the new status agreement for Palau, that the objectives of the Trusteeship Agreement had been fully attained, and that the applicability of the Trusteeship Agreement had terminated with respect to Palau.

Speaking after the adoption of the resolution, some speakers commented on the historic place of the resolution adopted by noting that the termination of the Trusteeship Agreement for the last Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands, Palau, represented the successful end of an important chapter in the work of the Trusteeship Council and marked the conclusion of its immediate responsibilities.³ The representative of China said that the Government and people of China, over the years, had consistently supported the efforts of the peoples of the Trust Territories, including Palau, to attain self-determination and independence. They were now willing further to promote friendly relations and cooperation between the two countries on the basis of the five principles of peaceful coexistence.⁴ The President, speaking in her capacity as the representative of the United States, said that her country had also always recognized and supported the fundamental premise of the Trusteeship: that the people of Palau must be free to follow the path of their own choosing.⁵

The situation concerning Western Sahara

On 26 January 1993, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a progress report on the situation concerning Western Sahara,⁶ in which he recalled the basic positions of Morocco and the Frente Polisario regarding the provisions of the settlement plan⁷ which related to the establishment of the electorate. The two parties, the Secretary-General reported, had radically opposing points of view on this issue, one attaching primary importance to the list of persons counted in 1974, and the other considering that its importance was relative.

At its 3179th meeting, held on 2 March 1993, the Council adopted resolution 809 (1993), by which it determined that the settlement plan should be implemented without further delay in order to achieve a just and lasting solution, invited the Secretary-General and his Special Representative to intensify their efforts, with the parties, in order to resolve the issues identified in the report, in particular those relating to the interpretation and application of the criteria for voter eligibility, and invited the Secretary-General to make the necessary preparations for the organization of the referendum of self-determination of the people of Western Sahara and to consult accordingly with the parties for the purpose of commencing voter registration on a prompt basis, starting with the updated lists of the 1974 census.

Speaking after the adoption, the representative of the Russian Federation stressed the need to take measures that would lead to mutually acceptable solutions and move forward the settlement process on the basis of appropriate decisions of the Security Council. In his view, the resolution constituted a reaffirmation of the support for the Secretary-General's efforts to organize a referendum on self-determination for the people of Western Sahara, in cooperation with the Organization of African Unity (OAU).⁸

Similarly, the representative of Venezuela said that his country attached great importance to the self-determination process in Western Sahara and shared the international community's concerns over the delays and difficulties in completing the process. He emphasized that any agreement should be based on ongoing consultations with the parties and therefore on their agreement and supported the appeal calling for their cooperation with the Secretary-General in the implementation of the settlement plan, on the understanding that that was the only available and agreed basis that could serve as a framework for this exercise.⁹

By resolution 907 (1994), adopted at the Council's 3555th meeting, on 29 March 1994, the Council welcomed the compromise proposal of the Secretary-General concerning the interpretation and application of criteria for voter eligibility¹⁰ as a sound framework for determining participation in the referendum for self-determination of the people of Western Sahara.

On 15 November 1994, Council members welcomed, through a presidential statement,¹¹ the decision of the Secretary-General to visit the region later that month, and expressed their hope for significant progress towards implementing the settlement plan and holding the long-overdue referendum. The Council further stated that it strongly believed that there should be no further undue delay in the holding of a free, fair and impartial referendum for self-determination of the people of Western Sahara in accordance with the settlement plan.

By subsequent resolutions,¹² the Council reiterated its commitment to holding, without further delay, a free, fair and impartial referendum for self-determination of the people of Western Sahara in accordance with the settlement plan,¹³ which had been accepted by the two parties.

In reports¹⁴ and a letter¹⁵ submitted to the Council from 21 May 1993 to 24 November 1995, the Secretary-General reported on obstacles that had prevented the timely implementation of the settlement plan, in particular provisions relating to the establishment of the electorate. In letters responding to the Secretary-General from 4 August 1993 to 6 November 1995,¹⁶ the President of the Council noted that the members of the Council had reiterated their support for the implementation of the settlement plan, had expressed the hope that both parties would cooperate fully with the Secretary-General and his Special Representative, and had emphasized the urgency of settling the pending questions.

At its 3413th meeting, on 31 July 1994, the Council included two reports of the Secretary-General in its agenda.¹⁷ The President drew the attention of the members of the Council to a letter dated 29 July 1994 addressed to the Secretary-General from the representative of Haiti,¹⁸ transmitting a letter from the President of Haiti, Jean-Bertrand Aristide, in which he called on the international community to take prompt and decisive action, under the authority of the United Nations, to allow for the full implementation of the Governors Island Agreement. The President further drew their attention to a draft resolution submitted by Argentina, Canada, France and the United States,¹⁹ as well as to a letter dated 30 July 1994 addressed to the President of the Council from the representative of Haiti,²⁰ informing him of the agreement of the Government of President Aristide with that draft resolution, which it considered as an appropriate framework for the implementation of the Governors Island Agreement.

The representative of Haiti argued that, by stating the consent of the Government of President Aristide to the draft resolution, his delegation was calling on the international community to join it in defending its national sovereignty.²¹ The representative of Canada contended that, from the outset of the Haitian crisis, the United Nations had sought to restore democracy in that country through mediation and other diplomatic means as well as through a gradually more severe set of sanctions, and that the restoration of the democratically elected President of Haiti, Jean-Bertrand Aristide, was a key element of the restoration of democracy in that country. Furthermore, because living conditions in Haiti continued to decline seriously and brutal repression continued, the status quo could not be allowed to persist. It was for that reason that his Government had joined in sponsoring the draft resolution before the Council.²²

The representative of Mexico contended that the Council had, since the beginning of the matter, been acting at the request of the lawful Government and that President Aristide was not opposed to the use of force to re-establish his rights and those of the Haitian people. However, while Mexico was aware of the difficulties and of the need to restore constitutional order and democracy to Haiti, it also believed that there were not sufficient elements to justify the use of force and, still less, to justify across-the-board authorization for the action of ill-defined multinational forces. In his opinion, the continuation of political and diplomatic efforts to achieve solutions consistent with the Charter continued to be the best alternative to bring about the return of constitutional law and the exercise of self-determination for the Haitian people.²³

At the same meeting, the Council adopted resolution 940 (1994), by which it reiterated its commitment for the international community to assist and support the economic, social and institutional development of Haiti and requested that the United

B. Article 2, paragraph 4

Article 2, paragraph 4

All Members shall refrain in their international relations from the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any state, or in any other manner inconsistent with the Purposes of the United Nations.

Note

During the period under review, the Security Council adopted no decision containing an explicit reference to Article 2(4). The Council did adopt six presidential statements invoking the provisions of that Article. In those statements,²⁵ all of which related to the situation in the Middle East, the members of the Council reaffirmed their commitment to the full sovereignty, independence, territorial integrity and national unity of Lebanon within its internationally recognized boundaries, and in that context, asserted that “any State shall refrain from the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any State, or in any manner inconsistent with the purposes of the United Nations”.

The Council also adopted numerous resolutions and presidential statements touching upon the principle of the non-use of force embodied in Article 2(4). The Council thus condemned hostile actions across the border of a Member State²⁶ and condemned intrusions into the territory of a Member State. It reaffirmed the principles of territorial integrity, sovereignty and political independence of States and asked that they be fully respected;²⁷ the inviolability of international

In a number of cases, the Council appealed for an end to interference from outside States,³⁴ and called for States to refrain from, prevent or discourage action which would undermine peace processes,³⁵ or exacerbate conflicts or increase tension.³⁶

Some Council decisions also touched upon the relationship between international terrorism and the non-use of force, whereby the Council expressed its conviction that the suppression of acts of international terrorism, including those in which States were directly or indirectly involved, was essential for the maintenance of international peace and security,³⁷ and demanded an immediate end to terrorist attacks.³⁸ In another decision, the Council, considering that, in accordance with the relevant provisions of the Charter of the United Nations, any aggression with the use of nuclear weapons would endanger international peace and security, took note with appreciation of the statements by nuclear-weapon States giving security assurances against the use of nuclear weapons to non-nuclear-weapon States that were parties to the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons.³⁹

In a number of cases, the Council called on parties to respect and maintain ceasefire agreements and condemned violations of such agreements. It also called for the cessation of hostilities and/or acts of violence, including violations of international humanitarian law, and the exercise of restraint or the cessation of provocative actions.⁴⁰ In one instance, the Council demanded the withdrawal of foreign troops from the territory of a Member State.⁴¹ In another instance, it emphasized the importance of the immediate removal of all foreign forces, advisers and military personnel.⁴²

The situation in the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina

In its decisions concerning the situation in the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina, the Security Council reaffirmed the prohibition of the threat or use of force in international relations in two main contexts. First, the Council demanded the cessation of forms of external interference in Bosnia and Herzegovina. Second, it demanded the cessation of hostile actions across the borders of Bosnia and Herzegovina and Croatia. In a third context, the Council called for action consistent with the principles enshrined in Article 2(4), albeit with respect to relations not exclusively international in character, by reaffirming the unacceptability of the acquisition of territory by force.

(a) The situation in the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina and the prohibition upon acts of interference by external actors

At its 3199th meeting, on 16 April 1993, the Council adopted resolution 819 (1993), by which it demanded that the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) immediately cease the supply of military arms, equipment and services to the Bosnian Serb paramilitary units in the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina.

At its 3210th meeting, on 10 May 1993, the Council by a presidential statement called upon the Republic of Croatia to exert all its influence on the Bosnian Croat leadership and paramilitary units with a view to ceasing immediately their attacks particularly in the areas of Mostar, Jablanica and Dreznica.⁴⁵ It further called on Croatia to adhere strictly to its obligations under Council resolution 752 (1992) of 15 May 1992, including putting an end to all forms of interference and respecting the territorial integrity of Bosnia and Herzegovina.

At its 3234th meeting, on 10 June 1993, the Council adopted resolution 838 (1993), by which it reiterated that all forms of interference from outside Bosnia and Herzegovina cease immediately and that its neighbours take swift action to end all interference and respect its territorial integrity.

At its 3333rd meeting, on 3 February 1994, the Council strongly condemned the Republic of Croatia for a serious hostile act against a State Member of the United Nations,⁴⁶ which constituted a violation of international law, the Charter of the United Nations and relevant Council resolutions, in particular resolution 752 (1992), in which the Council had demanded an immediate end to all forms of interference and full respect for the territorial integrity of the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina.

(b) The situation in the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina and the prohibition upon hostile acts across its international border with the Republic of Croatia

At its 3456th meeting, on 13 November 1994, the Council adopted a presidential statement, by which it condemned any violation of the international border between the Republic of Croatia and the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina; it also demanded that all parties and others concerned, in particular the so called Krajina Serb forces, fully respect that border and refrain from hostile acts across it; and called upon all parties and others concerned to abstain from any action that could cause a further escalation in the fighting.⁴⁷

At its 3460th meeting, on 18 November 1994, the Council issued a statement by which it condemned in the strongest possible terms the attack on the safe area of Bihac by aircraft belonging to the so-called Krajina Serb forces, as well as the shelling by the so-called Krajina Serb forces from the United Nations Protected Areas, as a flagrant violation of the territorial integrity of the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina and relevant Council resolutions.⁴⁸ The Council demanded that all parties and others concerned, in particular the so-called Krajina Serb forces, cease immediately all hostile actions across the international border between the Republic of Croatia and the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina. The Council reiterated this position in resolution 959 (1994) of 19 November 1994 and in a statement by the President of the Council on 26 November 1994.⁴⁹

At its 3501st meeting, on 17 February 1995, the Council demanded that all forces in the Bihac area cease fighting immediately and cooperate fully with the United Nations Protection Force in achieving an effective ceasefire.⁵⁰ The Council also reiterated its condemnation of the continued violations of the international border between Croatia and Bosnia and Herzegovina.

At its 3581st meeting, on 21 September 1995, the Council adopted resolution 1016 (1995), by which it noted the assurances given by the Governments of Bosnia and Herzegovina and Croatia regarding offensive actions in western Bosnia and affirmed, while taking note of the reports that offensive actions had slowed down, the need for full compliance with the demands set out in the statement by its President of 18 September 1995.

(c) Reaffirmation of the unacceptability of the acquisition of territory by force

On 16 April 1993, at its 3199th meeting, the Council adopted, resolution 819 (1993), by which it reaffirmed that any taking or acquisition of territory by the threat or use of force, including through the practice of “ethnic cleansing”, was unlawful and unacceptable; and condemned and rejected the deliberate actions of the Bosnian Serb party to force the evacuation of the civilian population from Srebrenica and its surrounding areas as well as from other parts of Bosnia and Herzegovina as part of its overall abhorrent campaign of “ethnic cleansing”. The Council reaffirmed that position in resolution 820 (1993) of 17 April 1993.

By resolution 824 (1993), adopted at the 3208th meeting on 6 May 1993, the Council declared that the capital city of Bosnia and Herzegovina, Sarajevo, and other such threatened areas, in particular the towns of Tuzla, Zepa, Gorazde and Bihac, as well as Srebrenica, and their surroundings should be treated as safe areas by all the parties concerned and should be free from armed attacks and from any other hostile act.

By its subsequent decisions,⁵¹ the Council reaffirmed the sovereignty, territorial integrity and independence of the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina and condemned the practice of “ethnic cleansing” and acquisition of territory by force.

At its 3554th meeting, on 14 July 1995, the Council demanded that the Bosnian Serb party respect fully the rights of those civilians who wished to remain in the [Srebrenica] safe area and cooperate with efforts to ensure that civilians who wished to depart were allowed to do so with their families in an orderly, safe way in conformity with international law.⁵²

The situation relating to Nagorny Karabakh

In its decisions and deliberations concerning the situation relating to Nagorny Karabakh, the Security Council reaffirmed the prohibition of the threat or use of force in international relations by calling for the cessation of all forms of external interference in Azerbaijan. It also called for action consistent with the principles enshrined in Article 2(4), albeit with respect to relations not exclusively international in character, by reaffirming the unacceptability of the acquisition of territory by force.

At its 3205th meeting, on 30 April 1993, the Council adopted resolution 822 (1993), by which it expressed its serious concern at the deterioration of the relations between Armenia and Azerbaijan, noted with alarm the escalation in armed hostilities, and reaffirmed the respect for sovereignty and territorial integrity of all States in the region as well as the inviolability of international borders and the inadmissibility of the use of force for the acquisition of territory. By that resolution, the Council further demanded the immediate cessation of all hostilities and hostile acts with a view to establishing a durable ceasefire, as well as immediate withdrawal of all occupying forces from the Kelbadjar district and other recently occupied areas of Azerbaijan; and urged the parties concerned immediately to resume negotiations for the resolution of the conflict within the framework of the peace process of the Minsk Group of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe (CSCE).

The representative of Djibouti stated that it was disturbing that his delegation had to accept that the conflict was local and was being perpetrated and carried out solely by local Armenian forces. The truth was that it was a conflict between Armenia and Azerbaijan.⁵³ Conversely, the representative of France expressed the view that the preambular part of the resolution seemed to strike a reasonable balance between acknowledging that tensions existed between Armenia and Azerbaijan and recognizing the localized nature of the fighting.⁵⁴ The representative of Venezuela stated that, as a result of having become Members of the United Nations, Armenia and Azerbaijan had both won rights and assumed obligations. They were entitled to find within the United Nations, and in particular within the Security Council, a neutral and objective body in which to air their differences. But it was a fundamental corollary that they were also obliged to respect, and to ensure that their national communities and anyone else claiming a special relationship with them, respected all of the norms and principles of international conduct, which they had assumed when they had signed the Charter of the United Nations. In particular, they needed to “show absolute respect for one another’s independence and territorial integrity and to renounce the use of force as a way of solving disputes”. Two aspects of the conflict were of particular concern to his delegation: on the one hand his delegation saw alarming similarity with the situation in the former Yugoslavia; on the other hand, it saw a distorted concept of what the right to self-determination should be.⁵⁵

At its 3259th meeting, on 29 July 1993, the Council adopted resolution 853 (1993), by which it reaffirmed the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Azerbaijan and of all other States in the region as well as the inviolability of international borders and the inadmissibility of the use of force for the acquisition of territory. By that resolution, the Council demanded the immediate cessation of all hostilities and the immediate, complete and unconditional withdrawal of the occupying forces involved from the district of Agdam and all other recently occupied areas of Azerbaijan; called on the parties concerned to reach and maintain durable ceasefire arrangements; and urged the parties concerned to refrain from any action that would obstruct a peaceful solution to the conflict, and to pursue negotiations within the Minsk Group, as well as through direct contacts between them, towards a final settlement.

The representative of Pakistan condemned the continuing “Armenian aggression” against Azerbaijan and demanded the immediate withdrawal of “Armenian forces” from all occupied Azerbaijani territories. Pakistan urged Armenia to respect the sovereignty, territorial integrity and political independence of Azerbaijan, and it called for a just and peaceful settlement of the problem on the basis of respect for the principles of the territorial integrity of States and the inviolability of internationally recognized frontiers.⁵⁶ Other members, in calling for a cessation of hostilities, referred to the “attacks by local Armenian forces” and the “offensive actions taken by armed units of Nagorny-Karabakh Armenians”.⁵⁷

On 18 August 1993, by a presidential statement,⁵⁸ the Council expressed its concern at the deterioration of relations between Armenia and Azerbaijan and at the tensions between them. The Council further demanded a stop to all attacks and an immediate cessation of the hostilities and bombardments, which endangered peace and security in the region, and an immediate, complete and unconditional withdrawal of occupying forces from the area of Fizuli and from the districts of Kelbadjar and Agdam and other recently occupied areas of Azerbaijan. The Council also reaffirmed the sovereignty and territorial integrity of the Azerbaijani Republic and of all other States in the region and the inviolability of their borders. It reiterated this position in its resolutions 874 (1993) of 14 October 1993 and 884 (1993) of 12 November 1993.

Case 6

United States notification of 26 June 1993 measures against Iraq

The Security Council's deliberations concerning the United States notification of 26 June 1993 measures against Iraq touched upon the relationship between the use of force and the exercise of the right of self-defence.

By a letter dated 26 June 1993 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁵⁹ the representative of the United States reported, in accordance with Article 51 of the Charter, that her country had exercised its right of self-defence by responding to the Government of Iraq's unlawful attempt to murder the former President of the United States and to its continuing threat to United States nationals. The United States had decided to respond, as a last resort, by striking at an Iraqi military and intelligence target, so as to minimize risks of collateral damage to civilians. In the light of the above, the United States Government requested an urgent meeting of the Council. By a letter dated 27 June 1993 addressed to the President,⁶⁰ the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Iraq reported that the United States had committed, on that day, an "act of military aggression against Iraq", which had left a large number of dead and wounded among the Iraqi civilian population.

The Council considered the item at its 3245th meeting, on 27 June 1993. The representative of the United States contended that the attempt against the former President of the United States, during his visit to Kuwait in April 1993, was "an attack on the United States of America". She described in detail the investigation and the "physical evidence" that led her Government to conclude that Iraq had planned, equipped and launched the "terrorist operation". The United States had responded directly, as it was entitled to do under Article 51 of the Charter, which provided for the exercise of the right of self-defence in such cases. The response had been proportionate and aimed at a target directly linked to the operation against the former President of the United States. It was designed to "damage the terrorist infrastructure of the Iraqi regime, reduce its ability to promote terrorism and deter further acts of aggression against the United States". She stressed that the action of the United States was not directed against the Iraqi people and expressed regret for the loss of civilian life. However, she said, one should keep in mind that had the Iraqi attempt in Kuwait succeeded hundreds of civilians could have died.⁶¹

In contrast, the representative of Iraq argued that, on 27 June 1993, the United States had committed another "act of aggression" against Iraq and had tried to justify it by linking it to the story of the alleged attempt to assassinate its former President, a story which had been completely fabricated by the Kuwaiti regime. Pointing out that the United States Government had carried out its "sentence" against Iraq without providing evidence against it or inviting it to clarify its position, he stated that the rules of international law gave the United States no right to overlook the principle of due process of law or the provisions of the Charter. With that "act of aggression", the United States had breached its responsibility as a permanent member of the Council and had violated the norms of international law and of the Charter. The speaker called upon the Council to condemn the "act of aggression" and to take the action necessary to prevent a repetition in the future.⁶²

In the course of the discussion, Council members expressed their condemnation of all forms of terrorism, including State-sponsored terrorism. Several members voiced their support for, or expressed their understanding of, the action taken by the United States, given the circumstances, while regretting the civilian casualties.⁶³ Speaking on behalf of the non-aligned countries that were Council members, the representative of Cape Verde urged "the exercise of restraint by all States, consistent with the principles of the Charter and in particular for the maintenance of international peace and security" and "the avoidance of the use of force inconsistent with the purposes of the United Nations".⁶⁴ The representative of China stated that disputes between or among countries should be settled through peaceful means of dialogue and consultation. China did not endorse "any action that might intensify the tension in the region, including the

Complaint by Ukraine regarding the Decree of the Supreme Soviet of the Russian Federation concerning Sevastopol

The Security Council’s decision concerning the complaint by Ukraine reaffirmed the prohibition of the threat or use of force in international relations by calling on the States concerned to take steps to ensure the avoidance of tension. In both its decision and its deliberations, the Council also reaffirmed the principle of territorial integrity.

By a letter dated 16 July 1993 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁶⁶ the representative of Ukraine transmitted a letter dated 14 July from the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Ukraine, in which the latter requested an urgent meeting of the Council to consider the situation resulting from the adoption, on 9 July 1993, of a decree by the Supreme Soviet of the Russian Federation which proclaimed “Russian federal status” for the city of Sevastopol. Previously, by a letter dated 13 July 1993 addressed to the President of the Council,⁶⁷ the representative of Ukraine had transmitted a statement made by the President of Ukraine, in which the latter, pointing out that the decree described Sevastopol as “the main base of the single Black Sea fleet”, had asserted that the Supreme Soviet was trying to “insert tension and strife into relations between Ukraine and Russia” and stressed that “there should be no place for the ‘law of the jungle’ in today’s international relations”.

The Council considered the item at its 3256th meeting, on 20 July 1993. The representative of Ukraine contended that the “irresponsible” decision taken by the Russian Parliament could only be described as “flagrant flouting” of the fundamental principles and norms of international law, in particular Article 2 (4) of the Charter of the United Nations. It constituted, he said, a clear encroachment on Ukraine’s territorial inviolability, a revision of existing boundaries, interference in its internal affairs, and was, in both spirit and letter, incompatible with the purposes and principles of the United Nations. The decision was also a flagrant violation of the international commitments flowing from the Russian Federation’s membership in the United Nations, its participation in CSCE, and the Kiev Treaty. The decree was, in essence, a “time bomb”; if the Russian authorities attempted to “implement” it, Ukraine might be forced to take “appropriate actions” to defend its sovereignty, territorial integrity and inviolability. It was quite clear that the decision by the Supreme Soviet of the Russian Federation was in essence an overt territorial claim by one State against another.⁶⁸

The representative of the Russian Federation emphasized that the decree of the Supreme Soviet diverged from the policy of his President and his Government. He maintained that his country remained dedicated to the principle of the inviolability of the borders within the Commonwealth of Independent States and would strictly abide by its obligations under international law, the Charter and the principles of CSCE. Regarding its relations with Ukraine, the Russian Federation would continue to be guided by its bilateral treaties and agreements, in particular those concerning respect for each other’s sovereignty and territorial integrity.⁶⁹

At the same meeting, the Council adopted a presidential statement, by which it reaffirmed its commitment to the territorial integrity of Ukraine, in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations.⁷⁰ The Council further stated that the decree of the Supreme Soviet of the Russian Federation was incompatible with the Treaty between the Russian Federation and Ukraine, signed at Kiev on 19 November 1990, as well as with the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations, and without effect.

By a letter dated 14 October 1994 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁷¹ the representatives of Iraq and the Russian Federation transmitted the text of a joint communiqué on the outcome of a meeting, held on 13 October 1994, between the President of Iraq and the Minister for Foreign Affairs of the Russian Federation. The joint communiqué stated, inter alia, that Iraq had announced officially that, on 12 October 1994, it had completed the withdrawal of its troops in southern Iraq to rearward positions and had affirmed its readiness to resolve in a positive manner the issue of recognizing Kuwait's sovereignty and borders, as laid down in Council resolution 833 (1993). By a letter dated 14 October 1994 addressed to the President,⁷² the representative of Kuwait transmitted the text of a statement issued on the same day by the Kuwaiti Council of Ministers concerning "the most recent Iraqi military threat to the State of Kuwait and the States of the region", as well as media reports concerning the aforementioned joint communiqué. According to the statement of the Council of Ministers, Kuwait considered that the persistent mobilization of Iraqi military forces in their current positions continued to pose a serious threat to its security and sovereignty. Kuwait requested the Council to shoulder its responsibility to put an end to "the violations and threats" by taking effective steps under Chapter VII of the Charter to guarantee the security of Kuwait, respect for its sovereignty and independence and the integrity of its international frontiers, and the security of the States of the region.

At its 3438th meeting, on 15 October 1994, the Council adopted resolution 949 (1994), by which it noted past Iraqi threats and instances of actual use of force against its neighbours, recognized that any hostile or provocative action directed against its neighbours by the Government of Iraq constituted a threat to peace and security in the region, and reaffirmed the commitment of all Member States to the sovereignty, territorial integrity and political independence of Kuwait and Iraq. The Council condemned recent military deployments by Iraq in the direction of the border with Kuwait; demanded that Iraq immediately complete the withdrawal of all military units recently deployed to southern Iraq to their original positions; and demanded that Iraq not again utilize its military or any other forces in a hostile or provocative manner to threaten either its neighbours or United Nations operations in Iraq.

The representative of the United Kingdom noted that Iraq had tried to justify its behaviour by speaking of its sovereign right to deploy its troops wherever it liked within its own territory; however, Article 2 (4) of the Charter required all Member States to refrain from the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any State. Four years prior to that, similar Iraqi troop movements had led to the invasion of Kuwait. Thus, he asserted, the recent deployment of Iraqi artillery and tanks in positions pointing towards and within range of Kuwait, with ammunition at the ready, was "a threat to Kuwait and represented a breach of the provisions of the Charter".⁷³ Along similar lines, other Council members characterized Iraq's actions as "threats of unprovoked aggression", "an aggressive threat" and "a threat or a provocation directed at Kuwait and, hence, at the international community as a whole".⁷⁴ They drew attention to Iraq's invasion of Kuwait in 1990 and to the fact that Iraq had not yet formally recognized Kuwait's sovereignty, territorial integrity and borders, as required by resolution 833 (1993).⁷⁵ In addition, the representative of the United States warned that, pursuant to the Council's resolutions and Article 51 of the Charter, her Government would take all appropriate action if Iraq failed to comply with the demands in resolutions 949 (1994).⁷⁶

The representative of Spain, while affirming that there should be no troop movements or redeployments whatsoever that could threaten neighbouring countries, expressed the view that Iraq should not be prohibited from keeping defensive units of a reasonable size in a large part of its territory, particularly in Basra.⁷⁷ The representative of Nigeria recognized the sovereign right of every State to determine the direction and content of its domestic policies, including measures deemed necessary for the defence of its sovereignty and territorial integrity, provided those policies and activities did not constitute a threat to its neighbours or

The situation in Croatia

The Security Council's deliberations concerning the situation in Croatia touched upon the relationship between the use of force and the exercise of the right of self-defence.

By a letter dated 4 August 1995 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁸⁰ the representative of Croatia transmitted a letter of the same date from the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister for Foreign Affairs of Croatia, in which the latter reported that, on the morning of 4 August, Croatian military and police forces had commenced "decisive action" in the occupied territories of Croatia. He contended that the action was aimed at restoring the rule of law, constitutional order and public safety, as well as at helping to sustain the defence of the United Nations safe area of Bihac. He also recalled that his Government had warned in a letter dated 20 July 1995 addressed to the President that, should the Bihac area be gravely threatened, Croatia's vital strategic interests would be threatened and it would be compelled to take decisive action, in accordance with its international obligations towards Bosnia and Herzegovina and with Article 51 of the Charter.

At its 3563rd meeting, on 10 August 1995, the Council resumed its consideration of the item entitled "The situation in Croatia". The representative of Croatia stated that, after years of "patience", Croatia had concluded that the least costly solution for both it and the international community to end humanitarian concerns in Bosnia and Herzegovina would require a "limited but credible" use of force to end the siege of Bihac and restore order in adjacent occupied territories of Croatia. That action had been successfully completed within 84 hours. The speaker contended that Croatia's actions had been carried out mostly on its internationally recognized territory and in part of the territory of Bosnia and Herzegovina, at the express request of that Government, arguing that establishing sovereignty and security on its own territory and coming to the aid of a friendly Government were fully consistent with the Charter of the United Nations. He then stated that the siege of Bihac, which had been a serious concern for the international community, had been resolved at minimal cost to the international community and to the civilian population in the area.⁸¹ Similarly, the representative of Bosnia and Herzegovina argued that Croatia's action had been in defence of its territories and rights and in promotion of peace and stability within its borders. He also contended that Croatia had preserved the Bihac safe area.⁸² Another speaker, however, alleged that one of Croatia's main goals had been to inflict heavy losses on the civilian population and incite a mass exodus of Serbs, thus creating an "ethnically pure" Croat State.⁸³

At the same meeting, the Council adopted resolution 1009 (1995), by which it strongly deplored the broad military offensive launched on 4 August 1995 by the Government of Croatia, thereby unacceptably escalating the conflict, and demanded that the Government of Croatia cease immediately all military actions and that there be full compliance with all Council resolutions, including resolution 994 (1995).

Speaking after the adoption of the resolution, the representative of France stated that, while the areas in which Croatian offensives had taken place were parts of the territory of Croatia, the Serb population in those regions nevertheless possessed rights recognized by the international community, which prohibited recognizing such military operations as legitimate.⁸⁴ The representative of the Czech Republic expressed the view that, while Croatia could not be faulted for pursuing its sovereign right to reintegrate parts of its sovereign territory, his Government deplored the fact that Croatian authorities had chosen to pursue their goal by military means, particularly at a time when diplomatic avenues had not been exhausted.⁸⁵ The representative of the United States, while regretting the means used, stated that it was also necessary to

C. Article 2, paragraph 5

Article 2, paragraph 5

All Members shall give the United Nations every assistance in any action it takes in accordance with the present Charter, and shall refrain from giving assistance to any state against which the United Nations is taking preventive or enforcement action.

During the period under review, there were no explicit references to Article 2 (5) during the Council's deliberations. The Council, however, adopted, in connection with the situations in Liberia, Angola, Somalia and Rwanda, a number of resolutions which contained provisions that might be construed as implicit references to the principle enshrined in Article 2 (5).

At its 3489th meeting, on 13 January 1995, at which it adopted resolution 972 (1995), the Council discussed the extension of the mandate of the United Nations Observer Mission in Liberia. In the seventh preambular paragraph of that resolution, the Council noted with concern that there had been a continuing inflow of arms into Liberia in violation of the existing arms embargo, which had further destabilized the situation in Liberia.

There was another implicit reference to Article 2 (5) in resolution 985 (1995), adopted on 13 April 1995, by which the Council urged all States, and in particular all neighbouring States, to comply fully with the embargo on all deliveries of weapons and military equipment to Liberia imposed by resolution 788 (1992).

Similar language was adopted in resolution 1020 (1995) of 10 November 1995, by which the Council reminded all States of their obligations to comply with the embargo on all deliveries of weapons and military equipment to Liberia imposed by resolution 788 (1992) and to bring all instances of violations of the arms embargo before the Committee established pursuant to resolution 985 (1995).

With regard to the situation in Angola, the Council at its 3254th meeting, on 15 July 1993, adopted resolution 851 (1993), by which it urged all States to refrain from any action which directly or indirectly could jeopardize the implementation of the Peace Accords, especially from providing any form of direct or indirect military assistance to UNITA, or any other support to UNITA inconsistent with the peace process. The Council expressed its readiness to consider the imposition of measures under the Charter of the United Nations, including a mandatory embargo on the sale or supply to UNITA of arms and related materiel and other military assistance.

Another implicit reference to Article 2 (5) was contained in resolution 886 (1993), in connection with the situation in Somalia, whereby the Council reaffirmed the obligations of States to implement fully the embargo on all deliveries of weapons and military equipment to Somalia imposed by paragraph 5 of resolution 733 (1992). Similar language was employed in several other resolutions pertaining to the situation in Somalia.⁸⁷

On another occasion, in connection with the situation in Rwanda, the Council made implicit reference to Article 2 (5) of the Charter. At its 3526th meeting, on 27 April 1995, the Council noted with concern the increased incursions into Rwanda from neighbouring countries, and allegations of arms shipments into the Goma airport.⁸⁸

In resolution 928 (1994), adopted on 20 June 1994, the Council stressed "the need for the observance and strict monitoring of the general and complete embargo of all deliveries of weapons and military equipment to Rwanda, as described in paragraph 13 of its resolution 918 (1994)".

By resolution 1013 (1995) of 7 September 1995, the Council expressed its grave concern at allegations of the sale and supply of arms and related materiel to former Rwandan government forces in violation of the embargo imposed under its resolutions 918 (1994), 997 (1995) and 1011 (1995), and underlined the need for Governments to take action to ensure the effective implementation of the embargo.

On several occasions, statements were made in the course of the Council's deliberations that may also have a bearing on the principle of Article 2 (5). During the period under review, some States not members of the Council called for a partial lifting of the arms embargo imposed on Yugoslavia in order to facilitate Bosnia and Herzegovina's right of self-defence, as granted by Article 51. At the 3201st meeting of the Council, held on 19 April 1993, the representative of Senegal noted that lifting the embargo against Bosnia and Herzegovina would enable the "victim of aggression to secure the means to exercise its right of self-defence under Article 51 of the Charter".⁸⁹ At the 3367th meeting, on 21 April 1994, the representative of Turkey called for lifting the arms embargo imposed in accordance with resolution 713 (1991), noting that it was in clear contradiction of Article 51 of the Charter.⁹⁰

During the period under review, no constitutional discussion arose in connection with Article 2 (5) of the Charter.

D. Article 2, paragraph 6

Article 2, paragraph 6

The Organization shall ensure that states which are not Members of the United Nations act in accordance with these Principles so far as may be necessary for the maintenance of international peace and security.

During the period under review, there were no explicit references to Article 2 (6). Neither did any constitutional discussion arise in connection with that Article. The Council adopted, however, a number of resolutions imposing measures under Chapter VII in connection with the situations in the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Haiti and Rwanda, which contained provisions that might be construed as implicit references to the principle enshrined in Article 2 (6). Each of those resolutions related to the cooperation of States not members of the United Nations in the imposition of sanctions.

At its 3312th meeting, on 11 November 1993, the Council adopted resolution 883 (1993), by which it imposed sanctions against the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya for its failure to comply with resolutions 731 (1992) and 748 (1992). In that resolution, the Council called upon "all States, including States not Members of the United Nations, and all international organizations, to act strictly in accordance with the provisions of the present resolution, notwithstanding the existence of any rights or obligations conferred or imposed by any international agreement or any contract entered into or any licence or permit granted prior to the effective time of the present resolution".

A similar formulation was adopted in resolution 917 (1994) of 6 May 1994, by which the Council decided to expand the sanctions imposed against Haiti until the return of the legitimately elected president. The Council called upon "all States, including States not Members of the United Nations, and all international organizations to act strictly in accordance with the provisions of the present resolution and the earlier relevant resolutions, notwithstanding the existence of any rights or obligations conferred or imposed by any international agreement or any contract entered into or any licence or permit granted prior to the effective date of the measures in the present resolution or earlier relevant resolutions".

In connection with the situation in Rwanda, the Council, by resolution 918 (1994) of 17 May 1994, called upon "all States, including States not Members of the United Nations, and international organizations to act strictly in accordance with the provisions of the present resolution, notwithstanding the existence of any rights or obligations conferred or imposed by any international agreement or any contract entered into or any licence or permit granted prior to the date of the adoption of the present resolution".

In several other cases, the Council made implicit references to Article 2 (6) by calling for action from "all States". The majority of those provisions related to the application of sanctions and embargoes which required that "all States" should take steps to impose measures in accordance with the relevant resolutions.

At its 3238th meeting, on 16 June 1993, the Council adopted resolution 841 (1993) in connection with the sanctions against Haiti, in which it called upon "all States and all international organizations to act strictly in accordance with the provisions of the present resolution, notwithstanding the existence of any rights or obligations conferred or imposed by any international agreement or any contract entered into or any licence or permit granted prior to 23 June 1993".

A similar provision was contained in resolution 864 (1993), adopted on 15 September 1993, imposing measures under Chapter VII in respect of UNITA.⁹¹ The Council called upon “all States, and all international organizations, to act strictly in accordance with the provisions of the present resolution, notwithstanding the existence of any rights or obligations conferred or imposed by any international agreement or any contract entered into or any licence or permit granted prior to the date of adoption of the present resolution”.

In connection with the embargo imposed against Rwanda, the Council decided by resolution 1011 (1995) that “all States shall continue to prevent the sale or supply, by their nationals or from their territories or using their flag vessels or aircraft, of arms and related materiel of all types, including weapons and ammunition, military vehicles and equipment, paramilitary police equipment and spare parts, to Rwanda, or to persons in the States neighbouring Rwanda”.

By other provisions not directly related to the imposition, implementation or administration of sanctions, the Council requested “all States” or “all parties and others concerned” to undertake a variety of actions including supporting peace initiatives, cooperating with the United Nations and its programmes and agencies, and others.⁹²

On two occasions, the Council reminded “all parties and others concerned” of their obligation to comply with specific resolutions. By resolution 947 (1994) adopted on 30 September 1994, the Council called on all parties and others concerned fully to comply with all Security Council resolutions regarding the situation in the former Yugoslavia. A similar provision was contained in resolution 982 (1995) of

31 March 1995. A number of provisions in resolutions were also addressed to “States”.⁹³

E. Article 2, paragraph 7

Article 2, paragraph 7

Nothing contained in the present Charter shall authorize the United Nations to intervene in matters which are essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of any state or shall require the Members to submit such matters to settlement under the present Charter; but this principle shall not prejudice the application of enforcement measures under Chapter VII.

Note

During the period under review, the Security Council adopted no resolution that explicitly referred to Article 2 (7). Council members referred explicitly to that Article during the Council’s consideration of the “Supplement to an Agenda for Peace: position paper of the Secretary-General on the occasion of the fiftieth anniversary of the United Nations”.⁹⁴ Article 2 (7) was also explicitly referred to in a letter dated 31 May 1994 from the representative of Yemen addressed to the President of the Security Council.⁹⁵ Article 2 (7) was explicitly referred to in a number of the Council’s decisions and deliberations.

Cases 10 to 17 below reflect the practice of the Council touching upon the provisions of Article 2 (7), as illustrated by its decisions and deliberations in connection with the following matters: letter dated 12 March 1993 from the representative of the Democratic People’s Republic of Korea; the situation between Iraq and Kuwait; CSCE missions in Kosovo, Sandjak and Vojvodina; the situation in the Republic of Yemen; the question concerning Haiti; supplement to

*Letter dated 12 March 1993 from the Permanent Representative of the Democratic People's Republic of Korea to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council*⁹⁶

By a letter dated 12 March 1993 addressed to the President of the Council,⁹⁷ the Minister for Foreign Affairs of the Democratic People's Republic of Korea informed the Council that the Government of the Democratic People's Republic of Korea had decided, on 12 March 1993, to withdraw from the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons, in accordance with paragraph 1 of article X of the Treaty, in connection with the extraordinary situation prevailing in the Democratic People's Republic of Korea, which jeopardized its supreme interests. He stated that the United States together with the Republic of Korea, had resumed the "Team Spirit" joint military exercises, a nuclear war rehearsal, threatening the Democratic People's Republic of Korea, and had instigated some officials of the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) secretariat and certain Member States to adopt an unjust resolution, at the meeting of the IAEA Board of Governors on 25 February 1993, demanding that the Democratic People's Republic of Korea open its military sites, which had no relevance at all to its nuclear activities, in violation of the IAEA statute, the Safeguards Agreement and the agreement IAEA had reached with the Democratic People's Republic of Korea. He affirmed that to tolerate such an act would only set a precedent for helping to legitimize the nuclear threats against the non-nuclear-weapon States parties and interference in their internal affairs.

At its 3212th meeting, on 11 May 1993, the Council considered the letter dated 12 March 1993 from the representative of the Democratic People's Republic of Korea, as well as a letter from the Secretary-General dated 19 March 1993⁹⁸ and a note by the Secretary-General dated 12 April 1993 on the issue.⁹⁹ Laying out the reasons that had forced his country to withdraw from the Non-Proliferation Treaty, the representative of the Democratic People's Republic of Korea stated that his country's refusal to allow the IAEA's "unlawful inspection" of the "suspicious locations" was nothing but a sovereign State's full exercise of a fair right, which could never be considered non-compliance with the Safeguards Agreement. He further stated that signing, accession to, termination of and withdrawal from the Treaty were legal actions within the sovereign rights of an independent State and no one was entitled to interfere in those. Moreover, the Democratic People's Republic of Korea's withdrawal from the Treaty was a self-defence measure based on a State's right to withdraw from the Treaty in the exercise of its national sovereignty, if a State party to the Treaty decides that its supreme interests are threatened. With regard to the draft resolution, the representative stated that it was aimed at infringing upon the sovereignty of the Democratic People's Republic of Korea, ignoring the requirements of Chapter VI (Article 33) of the Charter of the United Nations, the statute of IAEA and the norms of international law, that disputes should be resolved through dialogue and negotiations. The draft resolution would be rejected, since it was unreasonable and in contravention of Article 2 (4) of the Charter and of article 3 (d) of the IAEA statute, which called for respect of the sovereignty of the member States. Its adoption would compel the Democratic People's Republic of Korea to take corresponding measures in self-defence.¹⁰⁰

⁹⁶ The full title of the agenda item is "Letter dated 12 March 1993 from the Permanent Representative of the Democratic People's Republic of Korea to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council; letter dated 19 March 1993 from the Secretary-General addressed to the President of the Security Council; note by the Secretary-General".

⁹⁸ S/25445. By that letter, the Secretary-General transmitted to the Council a communication conveyed to him by the Director General of the International Atomic Energy Agency concerning the implementation of the Safeguards Agreement between the Democratic People's Republic of Korea and the Agency.

⁹⁹ S/25556. By that note, the Secretary-General transmitted to the members of the Security Council a letter dated 6 April 1993 from the Director General of IAEA transmitting his report on behalf of the Board of Governors to the Security Council and the General Assembly concerning non-compliance of the Democratic People's Republic of Korea with the Safeguards Agreement and on the Agency's inability to verify the non-diversion of material required to be safeguarded.

The representative of the Republic of Korea stated that IAEA had referred the matter to the Security Council after having exhausted all means available to it under its statute to resolve the issue. Referring to the reasons invoked by the Democratic People's Republic of Korea for rejecting the IAEA inspection and to its decision to withdraw from the Non-Proliferation Treaty, the representative stated that the Democratic People's Republic of Korea's characterization of the two sites as military sites in no way immunized them from inspection. It was the right of IAEA under the agreement with the Democratic People's Republic of Korea to inspect locations which it had bona fide reason to believe were nuclear-related, whether they were military or not. Recalling the presidential statement adopted by the Security Council at its summit meeting of 31 January 1992,¹⁰¹ the representative of the Republic of Korea stated that the primary obligation to stop nuclear weapons development by the Democratic People's Republic of Korea rested with the international community as a whole and particularly with the Security Council, which was entrusted with the maintenance of international peace and security under the Charter.¹⁰²

The representative of the United States stated that the failure of the Democratic People's Republic of Korea to adhere to its obligations under a safeguards agreement with IAEA and its subsequent announcement that it intended to withdraw from the Non-Proliferation Treaty concerned international agencies and the international community, not just any single country.¹⁰³ In contrast, the representative of China expressed the view that the issue concerning the Democratic People's Republic of Korea was mainly a matter between the Democratic People's Republic of Korea and IAEA, between the Democratic People's Republic of Korea and the United States, and between the Democratic People's Republic of Korea and the Republic of Korea. It should therefore be settled properly through direct dialogue and consultation between the Democratic People's Republic of Korea and the three other parties concerned, respectively. China was not in favour of having that issue handled by the Security Council, let alone having a resolution adopted on the issue by the Council. As that would only complicate the situation rather than contribute to its appropriate settlement, China would abstain on the draft resolution.¹⁰⁴

The representative of the United Kingdom stated that his delegation did not question the right of States to withdraw from treaties if such withdrawal was in accordance with the provisions of the treaty concerned. He recalled, in this connection, the joint statement issued on 1 April 1993 by the three co-depositaries of the Non-Proliferation Treaty — the Russian Federation, the United States and the United Kingdom¹⁰⁵ — in which they questioned whether the Democratic People's Republic of Korea's stated reasons for withdrawal in fact constituted extraordinary events related to the subject matter of the Treaty. He noted that the Democratic People's Republic of Korea remained bound by its obligation under its safeguards agreement. While accepting that there was an important role for bilateral contacts, he maintained that the issue under consideration was about multilateral disciplines maintained by multilateral organizations such as IAEA. It was therefore absolutely right and proper that the Security Council should remain seized of the matter since further action could be considered.¹⁰⁶

At that meeting the Council adopted resolution 825 (1993), by which it called upon the Democratic People's Republic of Korea to honour its non-proliferation obligations under the Treaty and comply with its safeguards agreement with the Agency, and decided to remain seized of the matter and to consider further action if necessary.

The situation between Iraq and Kuwait

By a letter dated 21 May 1993 addressed to the President of the Council,¹⁰⁷ the Secretary-General transmitted the final report on the demarcation of the international boundary between the Republic of Iraq and the State of Kuwait by the United Nations Iraq-Kuwait Boundary Demarcation Commission, dated 20 May 1993, conveying the final results of the work of the Commission. The Secretary-General recalled that, in accordance with its mandate and terms of reference, the Commission was called to perform a technical and not a political task and had made every effort to confine itself strictly to that objective. Through the technical process of demarcation, the Commission was not reallocating territory between Iraq and Kuwait, but had performed the technical task necessary to demarcate the international boundary between the two countries set out in the "Agreed Minutes between the State of Kuwait and the Republic of Iraq regarding the restoration of friendly relations, recognition and related matters" signed at Baghdad on 4 October 1963.

During the Council's consideration of the item at the 3224th meeting, on 27 May 1993, some members of the Council reflected on the implications of Council action pertaining to the demarcation of boundaries for the sovereignty of nations in this case and in general. The representative of Brazil pointed out that his country had consistently supported action taken by the United Nations with a view to ensuring full respect for the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Kuwait. Any attempt to challenge that sovereignty and integrity was unacceptable. It was the understanding of his Government that the decisions taken by the Council concerning the international boundary between Iraq and Kuwait could be justified only in the light of the exceptional and unique circumstances in which those decisions had been taken and did not establish a precedent for future action by the Council in other matters pertaining to the definition or demarcation of boundaries between Member States. Brazil's support for the resolution under consideration and other decisions in that matter was without prejudice to its reservations regarding the competence of the Council in questions related to the definition or demarcation of boundaries between Member States, which should be settled directly by the States concerned.¹⁰⁸

Similarly, the representative of China stated that, with respect to the question of boundaries, the countries concerned should, in accordance with international law and the Charter, seek a peaceful solution in agreements or treaties arrived at through negotiation and consultation. The existing demarcation of the boundary between Iraq and Kuwait was a special case arising from the specific historical circumstances involved and, as such, was not generally applicable. For that reason, the Council's invocation of Chapter VII of the Charter with respect to the demarcation of the disputed boundary between the two countries must not be viewed as setting a precedent.¹⁰⁹

The representative of France observed on the other hand that, on the basis of an agreement between Iraq and Kuwait, which had been submitted to the United Nations and was still in effect to that day, the Commission had carried out the technical task of demarcating a boundary whose limits had been set by the States themselves a long time ago. The report showed quite unambiguously that the Commission had not attributed any territory to one side or the other and had not encroached on the sovereignty of either State in any way.¹¹⁰

By resolution 833 (1993), adopted at that meeting, the Council reaffirmed that the decisions of the Commission regarding the demarcation of the boundary were final; demanded that Iraq and Kuwait, in accordance with international law and relevant Security Council resolutions, respect the inviolability of the international boundary, as demarcated by the Commission, and underlined and reaffirmed its decision to guarantee the inviolability of the above-mentioned international boundary which had now been finally demarcated by the Commission and to take as appropriate all necessary measures to that end in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations, as provided for in paragraph 4 of resolution 687 (1991) and paragraph 4 of resolution 773 (1992).

By a letter dated 20 July 1993,¹¹¹ the Chairman-in-Office of the Council of Ministers of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe informed the President of the Security Council that it was the considered opinion of the CSCE participating States that the decision by the Belgrade authorities not to allow the continued functioning of the CSCE missions in Kosovo, Sandzak and Vojvodina aggravated the existing threats to peace and security in the region.

On 9 August 1993, at the Council's 3262nd meeting, the representative of China stated that the issue of Kosovo was an internal affair of Yugoslavia. The sovereignty, political independence and territorial integrity of Yugoslavia should be respected in line with the basic principles of the Charter and international law. His delegation believed that the Council should exercise extreme prudence and should act in strict conformity with the purposes and the principles of the Charter, especially the principle of non-interference in the internal affairs of sovereign States. The representative pointed out that practice over the years had shown that the consent and cooperation of the parties concerned were essential factors in ensuring the success of the endeavours of the United Nations and regional organizations. He observed that, when differences arose between a regional organization and a sovereign State, it was important to consider the question whether the Security Council should involve itself and, if so, which principle should guide its actions.¹¹²

In contrast, other speakers expressed their support for the continued presence of the CSCE missions in Kosovo, Sandzak and Vojvodina.¹¹³ The representative of Hungary stated that Hungary, like the CSCE community as a whole, was of the view that the expulsion of the CSCE mission was an act that further aggravated the threat to peace and security in the Balkan region. Therefore, his country considered that the call of the Council to the Belgrade Government to re-examine its position was a perfectly legitimate and sound action, supporting the efforts of CSCE in a matter of grave concern.¹¹⁴ The representative of France held that, as the resolution emphasized, the activities of the mission were in no way aimed at affecting the sovereignty of a State but were designed to ensure respect for the fundamental principles to which all the States members of CSCE, including the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia had committed themselves.¹¹⁵ At that meeting, the Council adopted resolution 855 (1993), by which it endorsed the efforts of CSCE and called upon the authorities in the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia to reconsider their refusal to allow the continuation of the activities of the CSCE missions in Kosovo, Sandjak and Vojvodina, to cooperate with CSCE and to agree to an increase in the number of monitors as decided by CSCE.

The situation in the Republic of Yemen

By a letter dated 31 May 1994 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹¹⁶ the representative of Yemen stated that his Government considered the request to convene a meeting of the Security Council to discuss the situation in Yemen¹¹⁷ to be interference in its internal affairs, contrary to Article 2 (7) of the Charter of the United Nations.

At the 3386th meeting, on 1 June 1994, the representative of China emphasized that, in its consideration of any issue of concern, the Security Council should respect the relevant views of the countries or parties concerned. It was the view of his delegation that the consideration of the situation of the Republic of Yemen by the Council under the then existing special circumstances should not constitute a precedent for the handling of other similar issues.¹¹⁸

At the 3394th meeting, on 29 June 1994, the representative of the Russian Federation expressed his support for the draft resolution under consideration¹¹⁹ and stated that his country strongly supported the efforts undertaken by the world community, primarily in the Security Council, with a view to normalizing the situation in Yemen, restoring a peaceful dialogue and establishing an appropriate mechanism for monitoring the ceasefire.¹²⁰ The representative of the United Kingdom also believed that the United Nations should take urgent steps to address the deteriorating humanitarian situation in Yemen, in particular in Aden. He hoped that the adoption of the resolution by the Council would demonstrate to the parties the seriousness with which the international community viewed the situation and that they would draw the appropriate conclusions.¹²¹ Along similar lines, the representative of France stated that, in adopting a new resolution, the Security Council had affirmed its determination to contribute to the peaceful settlement of a dispute that was “unleashing a humanitarian disaster and shaking the foundations of regional security”.¹²²

The President, speaking in his capacity as the representative of Oman, recalled that his country had joined five other countries of the region in calling for the convening of a meeting of the Security Council to address the situation in Yemen. That meeting had culminated in the adoption of resolution 924 (1994), calling for an immediate ceasefire and requesting the parties to go back to the negotiating table, as the most appropriate means of resolving their differences. Oman believed that the resolution was very balanced in its demands and that, if it had been implemented fully by the parties, it could have helped the parties to settle their differences.¹²³

At its 3394th meeting, the Council adopted resolution 931 (1994), by which it strongly deplored the infliction of civilian casualties and the destruction resulting from the continuing military assault on Aden, reiterated its call for an immediate ceasefire, and requested the Secretary-General and his Special Envoy to continue talks under their auspices with all concerned, with a view to implementing a durable ceasefire.

By a letter dated 29 July 1994 addressed to the Secretary-General,¹²⁴ the President of Haiti stated that the High Command of the Armed Forces of Haiti had no intention of respecting the Governors Island Agreement signed on 3 July 1993 under the auspices of the United Nations and the Organization of American States. The President declared that, in the light of an alarming deterioration of the human rights situation in Haiti and a dramatic increase in the suffering of the Haitian people, the time had come for the international community, as a party in the process which had led to that Agreement, to take prompt and decisive action, under the authority of the United Nations, to allow for its full implementation.

At the 3413th meeting, on 31 July 1994, Council members considered a draft resolution authorizing Member States to form a multinational force to use all necessary means to facilitate the departure from Haiti of the military leadership.¹²⁵ During the debate, several Council members reflected on that decision in the context of Article 2 (7) of the Charter.

The representative of Haiti stated that, by requesting the help of the international community to solve the Haitian crisis, his country was sharing with it the dream that all compatriots of his country should be united in the exercise of the prerogatives of their sovereignty to decide the future of their country. By stating the consent of the Government of President Aristide to the draft resolution before the Council, his delegation was calling on the international community, through the President of the Council, to join with the country in defending its national sovereignty.¹²⁶

The representative of Nigeria observed that the draft resolution before the Council took it to another, entirely new level of external action to deal with the situation in Haiti and also to an entirely new territory in the Charter of the United Nations, in particular the use of Chapter VII. That was why his delegation had reacted to it with the greatest caution but was delighted that its concerns had been addressed. One of those concerns was his delegation's belief that, whatever was done in the Security Council, the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Haiti should not be compromised. Respect for the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Member States was the minimum basis of association by Members of the United Nations Organization. It should be observed in the case of all nations. Furthermore, his delegation's understanding was that any collective action authorized in the draft resolution was country-specific. His country reaffirmed the special character of the situation in Haiti. The adoption of the draft resolution should therefore not be seen as a global licence for external interventions through the use of force or any other means in the internal affairs of Member States.¹²⁷

In the same vein, the representative of Spain stated that his country, which attached great importance to the principle of non-intervention, especially on the American continent, supported the resolution because of the singular and exceptional circumstances of that case, because of the clear position taken by the legitimate authorities of Haiti and because the action to be initiated would not be carried out unilaterally but, rather, within a multilateral and institutional framework, under the authority and control of the United Nations. Had it been otherwise, his delegation should not have been able to support such an action.¹²⁸ The representative of the United States asserted that the purpose was not to impinge upon the sovereignty of Haiti, but to restore the power to exercise that sovereignty to those who rightfully possessed it. The purpose was to enable Haiti, in the words of the Charter, to pursue “social progress and better standards of life in larger freedom”. The choice was to allow Haiti to build a future more free, more secure and more prosperous than its past.¹²⁹

At that meeting, the Council adopted the draft resolution before it as resolution 940 (1994), by which it authorized the above-mentioned action by a multinational force while recognizing the unique character of the situation in Haiti and its deteriorating, complex and extraordinary nature, requiring an exceptional response.

Supplement to an Agenda for Peace

At the Council’s first consideration of the document entitled “Supplement to an Agenda for Peace”¹³⁰ at the 3492nd meeting on 18 January 1995, several speakers touched upon the application of the principles contained in Article 2 (7) of the Charter. The representative of Indonesia, speaking on behalf of the Non-Aligned Movement, noted that it was important that respect for State sovereignty be recognized as one of the basic principles in the conduct of international relations. In connection with the Secretary-General’s proposal to establish a rapid reaction force, the representative observed, with regard to the circumstances under which it would be deployed, that it was not clear which types of emergency the Secretary-General’s report referred to and who would determine the existence of such crises. Those ambiguities could lend themselves to interpretations that would challenge the sovereignty and independence of States.¹³¹

The representative of China stated that the principle of respect for State sovereignty and non-interference in a country’s internal affairs always had to be observed. The involvement of the United Nations, in recent years, in the settlement of internal conflicts in some countries at the request of the Governments or factions of those countries was a new and highly sensitive issue, which, if handled improperly, would make the United Nations a party to the conflict or even make it become an instrument of a few countries in interfering in other countries’ internal affairs, thus throwing United Nations operations into difficulties and failure. Therefore, involvement of the United Nations should follow the principle, among others, that United Nations operations had to be at the request, and obtain the consent, of the parties concerned. The representative further emphasized that the United Nations was an intergovernmental organization composed of sovereign States rather than a world government. Matters concerning a country should, in the final analysis, be settled by its own people, and those concerning a region by the countries in the region through consultations, in which the international community, including the United Nations, could play only a supplementary and promotive role. With regard to United Nations activities in preventive diplomacy and post-conflict peacebuilding, he stated that the United Nations had to respect the will of the Governments and peoples of the countries concerned instead of imposing its views on them. It should especially be prudent on questions, such as early warning, that involved a country’s sovereignty. It should obtain prior consent of the countries concerned before sending fact-finding or other missions, and time limits should be clearly defined.¹³²

Similarly, the representative of Sri Lanka stated that the United Nations should scrupulously respect the principles of the sovereignty, territorial integrity and political independence of States and should not intrude into areas which lay within their domestic jurisdiction.¹³³ In connection with the increase and complexity of internal conflicts that were diagnosed in the Secretary-General's report, the representative of Colombia stated that the framework for the Organization's actions had to be based on the provisions of the Charter, especially Article 2 (7). That was why his delegation agreed with the assertion made in the document that the United Nations, for eminently valid reasons, was reluctant to shoulder responsibility for maintaining law and public order and to impose new political structures or State institutions.¹³⁴ In contrast, the representative of Ukraine pointed out that the defence of human rights in contemporary circumstances could no longer be considered as the exclusively domestic affair of a given State. In this regard, promoting the observance of human rights and cooperating with the United Nations in this sphere — including the dispatch of fact-finding verification missions — should be a moral injunction, incumbent upon all. An analysis of recent successes and failures in peacekeeping operations showed that an imperative in producing the mandate for operations and in laying down their fundamental principles was clear-cut observance of universally accepted norms of international law, in particular respect for sovereignty, territorial integrity and inviolability of frontiers.¹³⁵

The situation in Angola

At the 3499th meeting of the Council, on 8 February 1995, during the consideration of a draft resolution,¹³⁶ a number of speakers touched upon the application of the principles contained in Article 2 (7) of the Charter and its implications for the situation in Angola.

The representative of Angola declared that the military situation on the ground was calm and the ceasefire was being observed without any major incidents. He expressed the hope that the adoption of the draft resolution under consideration establishing UNAVEM III would be a step towards the definitive establishment of lasting peace. He expressed concern with regard to some paragraphs in that draft resolution, specifically, paragraphs 6, 8 and 12, and added that his delegation would present specific proposals to improve the text, at the appropriate time.¹³⁷ The representative of Mozambique stressed the importance of upholding the principles of sovereignty, non-intervention and non-interference in the internal affairs of Angola, in line with the Peace Accords and the Lusaka Protocol, and in accordance with the Charter. It was the view of his delegation that the international community could assist States Members of the United Nations while fully respecting those principles. In that context, his Government could not agree that the deployment of any peacekeeping operation should have any "strings attached", and therefore supported the views expressed by the Angolan delegation that some paragraphs of the draft resolution should be revised in order to enjoy the full agreement of the Government of Angola.¹³⁸

In contrast, the representative of Nigeria, expressing his delegation's support for the draft resolution, contended that none of its paragraphs contained any provisions that derogated from the sovereign rights of the Government of Angola in the maintenance of law and order and the preservation of territorial integrity — either before, during, or after UNAVEM III.¹³⁹ The representative of Malawi, speaking on behalf of a delegation of the OAU Council of Ministers,¹⁴⁰ contended that, notwithstanding the concerns of those who urged caution against any increased international involvement until peace had been firmly established, the Angolan people were tired of war and the situation had changed. The OAU delegation therefore urged the Council to authorize the establishment and immediate deployment of UNAVEM III.¹⁴¹ Other speakers contended that, while the Council's decision to increase the United Nations operation in Angola underlined its commitment to support the people of that country in their long search for peace and national reconciliation, the Council had made it clear that it was not prepared to countenance further substantial delays or lack of cooperation from the parties in fulfilling certain obligations, and that it would, in those circumstances, review the United Nations role in Angola. The resolution was also a reaffirmation by the international community of its commitment to United Nations mechanisms for resolving conflicts that went beyond the means or ability of individual nations to solve. However, as Council resolutions had said repeatedly, the people of Angola were ultimately responsible for the future of their country.¹⁴² At that meeting, the Council adopted resolution 976 (1995), by which it reaffirmed its commitment to preserve the unity and territorial integrity of Angola and established UNAVEM III.

The situation in Burundi

By a letter dated 28 July 1995 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹⁴³ the Secretary-General recommended, with regard to the situation in Burundi, the establishment of a commission of inquiry to establish the facts relating to the assassination of the President of Burundi and to recommend modalities for the trial and punishment of persons it identified. He noted that the full cooperation of the Government of Burundi would be needed and described the modalities for such cooperation.

At its 3571st meeting, on 28 August 1995, the Council considered the recommendations of the Secretary-General. Several speakers pointed out the importance of close cooperation of the commission with the Government of Burundi and the need to respect the sovereignty of that country. The representative of Burundi stated that the initiative for the establishment of the commission of inquiry came from his Government in search of an impartial international arbiter. He stressed that the success of the work of the commission would depend on close cooperation with the Government of Burundi, its security forces, and the national judicial system. The commission would have to resist any temptation to exceed its mandate, as delineated in the terms of reference proposed by the Government, and set out in the draft resolution before the Council. Moreover, it should avoid any compromise of national sovereignty and any interference in the internal affairs of his country.¹⁴⁴

The representative of China stated that his delegation endorsed the proposed establishment of an international commission of inquiry in principle. The international community should, however, fully respect the independence and sovereignty of Burundi and should not interfere in its internal affairs. It also had to heed and respect the views of the Government of Burundi in connection with the establishment of the commission. He expressed his delegation's reservations in relation to some elements of the commission's mandate, which was rather extensive and, in certain aspects, touched upon Burundi's sovereignty and internal affairs.¹⁴⁵ The President, speaking in his capacity as the representative of Indonesia, also stated that Burundi's sovereignty and territorial integrity were of great importance and that the recommendations of the commission should not impinge upon those sacrosanct principles. Given the complexities of the situation, observance of those principles would make a distinct contribution to resolving the situation and to furthering the national unity and reconciliation that Burundi required.¹⁴⁶

At that meeting, the Council adopted resolution 1012 (1995), by which it took into account the initiative of the Government of Burundi in calling for the establishment of an international judicial commission of inquiry as referred to in the Convention on Governance, requested the Secretary-General to establish, as a matter of urgency, an International Commission of Inquiry, and called upon the Burundian authorities and institutions, including all Burundian political parties, to cooperate fully with the Commission of Inquiry in the accomplishment of its mandate.

Part II

Consideration of the functions and powers of the Security Council (Articles 24 and 25 of the Charter)

A. The primary responsibility of the Security Council for the maintenance of international peace and security (Article 24)

Article 24

1. In order to ensure prompt and effective action by the United Nations, its Members confer on the Security Council primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security, and agree that in carrying out its duties under this responsibility the Security Council acts on their behalf.
2. In discharging these duties the Security Council shall act in accordance with the purpose and principles of the United Nations. The specific powers granted to the Security Council for the discharge of these duties are laid down in Chapters VI, VII, VIII and XII.
3. The Security Council shall submit annual and, when necessary, special reports to the General Assembly for its consideration.

Note

During the period under review, none of the resolutions adopted by the Council contained an explicit reference to Article 24 of the Charter. The Charter provision by which primary responsibility for the maintenance of peace and security was conferred on the Security Council was implicitly referred to in a number of resolutions adopted by the Council. A number of explicit references to Article 24 were made on several occasions in the proceedings of the Council. Cases 18 to 20 below reflect the practice of the Council touching upon the provisions of Article 24 as illustrated by its decisions and deliberations concerning: an Agenda for Peace; the situation in the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina; and the question concerning Haiti.

In addition to the cases set out below, Article 24 was explicitly mentioned during the deliberations of the Council on two other occasions. In connection with the establishment of an international tribunal for the former Yugoslavia, the representative of Brazil recalled, at the 3175th meeting, on 22 February 1993, that the Security Council, in the exercise of its responsibilities, acted on behalf of the States Members of the United Nations, in accordance with Article 24 (1) of the Charter. Just as the authority of the Council did not spring from the Council itself but derived from the fact that certain responsibilities had been conferred upon it by all the Members of the United Nations, the powers of the Council could not be created, recreated or reinterpreted creatively by decisions of the Council itself, but had to be based invariably on specific Charter provisions.¹⁴⁷

At the Council's 3483rd meeting, held on 16 December 1994 in connection with the item "Security Council working methods and procedure", the representative of Spain stressed the need for greater transparency and flexibility in the Council. He believed that that would lead to increased legitimacy and credibility of the Security Council in the eyes of Member States, on whose behalf, in accordance with Article 24 of the Charter, the Council acted. That, he noted, would ultimately lead to the greater effectiveness of the Council's decisions.¹⁴⁸ The President of the Council stated that Article 24 implied a two-way flow of information, which required more information flowing out of the Council to the wider membership on all aspects of its work.¹⁴⁹

Article 24 was also explicitly referred to in a number of communications.¹⁵⁰

An Agenda for Peace: peacekeeping

Article 24 (1), was explicitly referred to during the deliberations of the Council held in connection with the item entitled “An Agenda for Peace: peacekeeping”. At the 3449th meeting of the Council, on 4 November 1994, Turkey stressed that there was a need for improvement of procedures of communication and consultation between Council members and troop-contributing countries. The authority of Council decisions emanated from the fact that the Council, in accordance with Article 24 of the Charter, acted on behalf of all Members of the United Nations. Therefore, the lack of a sufficient consultation mechanism undermined the legitimacy of Council decisions on peacekeeping operations.¹⁵¹

At the 3611th meeting, on 20 December 1995, a number of speakers explicitly referred to the provisions of Article 24. The representative of France stated that it was the duty of the Council to listen and reflect on ways in which it could follow up on ideas expressed by those on whose behalf the Council acted in accordance with Article 24 of the Charter.¹⁵² The representative of Botswana noted that, since the Security Council derived its authority and legitimacy from the general membership of the United Nations that were not members of the Security Council, it was only fair that they should make a contribution to the work of the Council if it was to act effectively on their behalf in accordance with Article 24 (1) of the Charter.¹⁵³ Also referring to Article 24, the representative of Algeria noted that acts of the Council acquired additional legitimacy when they flowed from expanded consultations carried out in a spirit of partnership and aimed at optimal efficiency. From that point of view, the informal practice of “groups of friends” would stand to gain in terms of both usefulness and credibility if the objective of such groups was rigorous and in-depth follow-up of situations concerning which the Security Council was shouldering responsibilities.¹⁵⁴

The situation in the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina

During the Council’s consideration of the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina and its implications for international peace and security, three resolutions were adopted which called for the full and immediate implementation of all relevant Council resolutions.¹⁵⁵ By resolutions 836 (1993) of 4 June 1993, 838 (1993) of 10 June 1993 and 859 (1993) of 24 August 1993, the Council reaffirmed the sovereignty, territorial integrity and political independence of Bosnia and Herzegovina and the responsibility of the Security Council in this regard. By resolution 859 (1993), the Council stated explicitly that it was mindful of its primary responsibility under the Charter for the maintenance of international peace and security.

There were a number of explicit references to Article 24 of the Charter in the course of the Council’s debates as Member States stressed the need for the Council to bear its responsibilities under Article 24 by taking all necessary steps to protect and fully restore the sovereignty and political independence of the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina.¹⁵⁶ At the 3247th meeting, on 29 June 1993, Member States highlighted the challenges the Council faced in fulfilling its obligations under Article 24 concerning the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina, namely to take prompt and effective measures to restore peace. The representative of Malaysia stated that a Member of the United Nations (Bosnia and Herzegovina) was being dismembered and the Council should take more determined and concrete action in accordance with its primary responsibility under Article 24 of the Charter, using all the powers available under Chapter VII.¹⁵⁷

In connection with the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina, Article 24 was also explicitly invoked in several communications addressed to the Council. In a letter dated 7 June 1993,¹⁵⁸ the representative of Malaysia expressed concern in connection with the Council's response to the suppression of the civilian population, especially the Bosnian Muslims. In his view, the Council needed to strengthen its obligations as stipulated in Article 24, which was to take prompt and effective measures to restore peace. In a note dated 4 November 1994 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹⁵⁹ the Secretary-General urged the Security Council to fulfil its responsibility under Article 24 (1) of the Charter, and take all appropriate steps to uphold and restore fully the sovereignty and political independence of the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina.

By resolutions 862 (1993) of 31 August 1993, and 867 (1993) of 23 September 1993, the Council recalled the situation in Haiti and the continuing responsibility of the Council, under the Charter of the United Nations, for the maintenance of international peace and security.

In a letter dated 14 June 1993 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹⁶⁰ the representative of Cuba stated that Cuba advocated a return of constitutional order in Haiti, and of its sole legitimate representative, President Aristide. That did not, however, prevent a categorical repudiation by Cuba of the adoption of measures concerning the internal situation of Haiti by the Security Council, whose primary responsibility, as set forth in Article 24 of the Charter, was the maintenance of international peace and security, a context which did not embrace the situation prevailing in Haiti, however many pretexts were advanced in an effort to demonstrate the contrary.

Note

During the period under review, none of the resolutions adopted by the Council explicitly invoked Article 25 of the Charter. On five occasions, explicit references were made in the Council debates to the obligations of Member States to accept and carry out the decisions of the Council.¹⁶¹ In these instances, the Council did not engage, however, in constitutional discussions concerning Article 25 that went beyond a reaffirmation of views about its interpretation and application.

On other occasions, statements by members of the Council had an implicit bearing on Article 25.¹⁶² In one case, the deliberations and decisions of the Council concerning the establishment of an international tribunal for the former Yugoslavia touched upon two aspects of the application of Article 25, namely that all parties comply with the decision of the Council, and the cooperation and assistance on the part of Member States to guarantee the smooth functioning of the tribunal. In relation to the latter, there were some debates in which the President of the Security Council demanded that the parties to a ceasefire agreement comply with their commitments and all relevant resolutions of the Security Council.

Article 25 was explicitly invoked in letters from the Chairman of the Committee established by resolution 724 (1991) addressed to the President of the Security Council, concerning applications made under Article 50 of the Charter as a consequence of the implementation of measures imposed against the

In addition, Article 25 was explicitly invoked in three notes verbales from a Member State to the Secretary-General,¹⁶⁵ in which the Member State informed the Secretary-General that it had instituted in time all necessary measures for meeting the obligations set out in resolutions 841 (1993) and 917 (1994) respectively.

Of the draft resolutions submitted to the Security Council which were either not put to the vote or voted upon and not adopted, none contained explicit references to Article 25; and several texts contained paragraphs which might be deemed to have an implicit bearing on the Article.¹⁶⁶

Member States in particular, at States in general, or at multiple parties, not all of which were Member States, often calling upon them to abide by their obligations to accept and carry out decisions of the Security Council.

Cases 21 to 23 below reflect the practice of the Council touching upon the provisions of Article 25 as illustrated by its decisions and deliberations: establishment of an international tribunal for the former Yugoslavia; the situation concerning Rwanda; and the situation between Iraq and Kuwait.

Establishment of an International Tribunal for the prosecution of persons responsible for serious violations of international humanitarian law committed in the territory of the former Yugoslavia

At its 3175th meeting, on 22 February 1993, the Council adopted resolution 808 (1993), by which it decided to establish of an international tribunal for the prosecution of persons responsible for serious violations of international humanitarian law committed in the former Yugoslavia since 1991.

By resolution 827 (1993), adopted at the 3217th meeting, on 25 May 1993, the Council decided that all States should cooperate fully with the Tribunal and its organs in accordance with that resolution and the statute of the Tribunal, and that consequently all States should take any measures necessary under their domestic laws to implement the provisions of resolution 827 (1993) and the statute, including the obligation of States to comply with requests for assistance or orders issued by a trial chamber under article 29 of the statute. The Council also urged all States and intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations to contribute funds, equipment and services to the Tribunal, including the offer of expert personnel.

The representative of France noted that the resolution, which was a decision within the meaning of Article 25 of the Charter, thus now applied to all States. That meant, specifically, that all States were required to cooperate fully with the Tribunal, even if this obliged them to amend certain provisions of their domestic law.¹⁶⁸

At its 3591st meeting, on 9 November 1995, the Council acknowledged a letter dated 31 October 1993 from the President of the International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia,¹⁶⁹ in which he noted that, following the failure of the Bosnian Serb administration to respond to the indictment and warrant of arrest on Dragan Nikolić, a decision by a trial chamber of the Tribunal had provided for the issuance of an international arrest warrant for him and had requested the President of the Tribunal to so inform the Security Council. At the same meeting, the Council unanimously adopted resolution 1019 (1995), by which it demanded that all States, in particular those in the region of the former Yugoslavia, and all parties to the conflict in the former Yugoslavia, comply fully and in good faith with the obligations contained in paragraph 4 of resolution 827 (1993). The Council reiterated that request in resolution 1034 (1995).

The situation concerning Rwanda

At its 3453rd meeting, on 8 November 1994, the Council adopted resolution 955 (1994), by which it decided to establish an international tribunal for the sole purpose of prosecuting persons responsible for genocide and other serious violations of international humanitarian law committed in the territory of Rwanda and Rwandan citizens responsible for genocide and other such violations committed in the territory of neighbouring States, between 1 January 1994 and 31 December 1994. By that resolution, the Council also decided that all States should cooperate fully with the Tribunal and its organs in accordance with the resolution and the statute of the Tribunal and that consequently all States should take any measures necessary under their domestic law to implement the provisions of the resolution and the statute, including the obligation of States to comply with requests for assistance or orders issued by a Trial Chamber under article 28 of the statute, and requests to States to keep the Secretary-General informed of such measures.

At its 3504th meeting, on 27 February 1995, the Council adopted resolution 978 (1995), by which it stressed the need for States to take measures necessary under their domestic law to implement the provisions of resolution 978 (1994) and the statute of the International Tribunal for Rwanda. The Council also urged all States to arrest and detain, in accordance with their national law and relevant standards of international law, pending prosecution by the Tribunal or by the appropriate national authorities, persons found within their territory against whom there was sufficient evidence that they were responsible for acts within the jurisdiction of the Tribunal.

Case 23

The situation between Iraq and Kuwait

By resolution 833 (1993), adopted at the 3224th meeting, on 27 May 1993, the Council, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, demanded that Iraq and Kuwait, in accordance with international law and relevant Security Council resolutions, respect the inviolability of the international boundary, as demarcated by the United Nations Iraq-Kuwait Boundary Demarcation Commission, and the right to navigational access.

At the 3246th meeting, on 28 June 1993, the President of the Council drew attention to letters from the representatives of Iraq¹⁷⁰ and Kuwait¹⁷¹ which reflected the two Governments' initial viewpoint on resolution 833 (1993). In a statement by the President,¹⁷² Council members reminded Iraq that the Commission had acted on the basis of resolution 687 (1991) and the Secretary-General's report on implementing paragraph 3 of that resolution, both of which were formally accepted by Iraq.

At the 3319th meeting, on 23 November 1993, in a statement by the President,¹⁷³ members of the Council demanded that Iraq, in accordance with international law and relevant Council resolutions, respect the inviolability of the international boundary and take all necessary measures to prevent any violations of that boundary.

By resolution 949 (1994) of 15 October 1994, the Council reaffirmed the commitment of all Member States to the sovereignty, territorial integrity and political independence of Kuwait and Iraq, and demanded that Iraq withdraw all military units deployed to southern Iraq to their original positions. The Council also demanded that Iraq should not utilize its military or any other forces in a hostile or provocative manner to threaten either its neighbours or United Nations operations in Iraq, and that Iraq cooperate fully with the United Nations Special Commission.

At the 3459th meeting, on 16 November 1994, the President drew the attention of the members of the Council to a letter dated 12 November 1994 addressed to the President of the Security Council from the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Iraq,¹⁷⁴ which confirmed Iraq's irrevocable and unqualified recognition of the sovereignty, territorial integrity and political independence of the State of Kuwait, and of the international boundary between the Republic of Iraq and the State of Kuwait as demarcated by the United Nations Iraq-Kuwait Boundary Demarcation Commission. The members of the Council, through a statement by the President, welcomed that development, noted that Iraq had taken this action in compliance with resolution 833 (1993) and had unequivocally committed itself by full and formal constitutional procedures to respect Kuwait's sovereignty, territorial integrity and borders, as required by resolutions 687 (1991), 833 (1993) and 949 (1994).

Part III

Consideration of the provisions of Chapter VIII of the Charter

Article 52

1. Nothing in the present Charter precludes the existence of regional arrangements or agencies for dealing with such matters relating to the maintenance of international peace and security as are appropriate for regional action, provided that such arrangements or agencies and their activities are consistent with the purposes and principles of the United Nations.

2. The Members of the United Nations entering into such arrangements or constituting such agencies shall make every effort to achieve pacific settlement of local disputes through such regional arrangements or by such regional agencies before referring them to the Security Council.

3. The Security Council shall encourage the development of pacific settlement of local disputes through such regional arrangements or by such regional agencies either on the initiative of the states concerned or by reference from the Security Council.

4. This Article in no way impairs the application of Articles 34 and 35.

Article 53

1. The Security Council shall, where appropriate, utilize such regional arrangements or agencies for enforcement action under its authority. But no enforcement action shall be taken under regional arrangements or by regional agencies without the authorization of the Security Council, with the exception of measures against any enemy state, as defined in paragraph 2 of this Article, provided for pursuant to Article 107 or in regional arrangements directed against renewal of aggressive policy on the part of any such state, until such time as the Organization may, on request of the Governments concerned, be charged with the responsibility for preventing further aggression by such a state.

2. The term enemy state as used in paragraph 1 of this Article applies to any state which during the Second World War has been an enemy of any signatory of the present Charter.

Article 54

The Security Council shall at all times be kept fully informed of activities undertaken or in contemplation under regional arrangements or by regional agencies for the maintenance of international peace and security.

Note

During the period under review, the Security Council decided, in regard to a number of situations under its consideration to engage in cooperation with regional arrangements or agencies in the maintenance of peace and security, as provided for in Chapter VIII of the Charter. Following the trend indicated in the previous Supplement of the Repertoire, the number of instances of cooperation further increased. While all of these instances are to be considered within the framework of Chapter VIII of the Charter, the Council has not always evoked this Chapter in its decisions. The record of the deliberations of the Council during the period under review displays, however, a practice of constant reference by its members to Chapter VIII and its provisions in the meetings of the Council.

The more active involvement of regional organizations¹⁷⁵ in the maintenance of peace and security during the period under review has provided for a wider range of options for the Council as to the nature and modalities of cooperation with those regional arrangements, which differ in mandate, structure, capacity and experience in peace-related activities. Most of the activities by regional organizations appreciated or endorsed by the Council, and in some cases actively supported through the Secretary-General, concerned attempts at the peaceful settlement of disputes. The period under review marks a departure from Council practice insofar as the Council, for the first time, deployed a peacekeeping mission to a region where a peacekeeping operation of a regional organization was already operating. In addition, the Council authorized regional organizations to use force in order to implement trade and arms embargoes and, for the first time, authorized enforcement actions for the imposition of a flight ban and to support a mission in the performance of its mandate.

The Council's practice under Chapter VIII of the Charter is described in four sections. Section A captures the Council's discussion of the provisions of Chapter VIII in the context of the consideration of the Secretary-General's report entitled "An Agenda for Peace" and the supplement thereto. Section B sets out the various ways in which the Security Council encouraged and/or supported efforts by regional organizations in the pacific settlement of disputes. Section C deals with a case in which a Council member challenged the Council's competence to consider a dispute on the basis of Article 52. The final section describes two cases in which the Council authorized various enforcement actions by regional agencies.

¹⁷⁵ Chapter VIII of the Charter refers to "regional arrangements and agencies". The Repertoire follows the Council's practice in its use of these terms as synonymous with "regional organizations".

A. General consideration of the provisions of Chapter VIII

On several occasions during the period under review, in the context of the Council's consideration of the Secretary-General's report "An Agenda for Peace: preventive diplomacy, peacemaking and peacekeeping",¹⁷⁶ Council members expressed their support for closer cooperation between the United Nations and regional arrangements and organizations within the framework of Chapter VIII of the Charter; invited those organizations to study ways and means to strengthen their functions to maintain international peace and security within their areas of competence, paying due regard to the characteristics of their respective regions; and expressed its readiness to support and facilitate peacekeeping efforts undertaken in the framework of regional organizations and arrangements in accordance with Chapter VIII of the Charter.¹⁷⁷

At the Council's first consideration of the "Supplement to an Agenda for Peace"¹⁷⁸ at the 3492nd meeting, on 18 January 1995, Council members as well as a number of Member States reflected in their contributions to the debate on the cooperation between the United Nations and regional organizations. The broad majority of speakers emphasized the importance of cooperation of the United Nations with regional arrangements and agencies and expressed their support for the proposals of the Secretary-General in this regard.¹⁷⁹ The representative of the Russian Federation noted, in addition, that, in all instances of regional peacekeeping carried out on the basis of voluntary regional agreements and arrangements in accordance with Article 52 of the Charter, United Nations involvement should be on the basis of voluntary, equitable cooperation without any monitoring or attempt to interfere in the settlement process, and without having responsibility — political and financial — for the outcome of that process.¹⁸⁰ The representative of the United States pointed out that the Council may continue, at times, to look to regional organizations or to individual Member States or ad hoc coalitions when peace enforcement was required. In those cases, it was essential that the Council retain the capacity to monitor such operations to ensure that they were conducted in accordance with accepted international principles.¹⁸¹

By a presidential statement adopted on 22 February 1995,¹⁸² in reference to the "Supplement to an Agenda for Peace", Council members welcomed the Secretary-General's willingness to assist regional organizations and arrangements as appropriate in developing a capacity for preventive action, peacemaking and, where appropriate, peacekeeping. It drew particular attention in this regard to the needs of Africa.

B. Encouragement by the Security Council of efforts undertaken by regional organizations in the pacific settlement of disputes

During the period under review, the Security Council encouraged a number of peace efforts undertaken by regional arrangements or agencies. In some cases, the Council supported those efforts by mandating the Secretary-General to cooperate with the regional organizations. For the first time, the Council sent a peacekeeping mission to a region where a mission of a regional agency was already operating. The Council's varied practice in support of regional efforts is set out below.

Africa

In order to achieve a pacific settlement of the situation in Somalia, the Security Council cooperated, during the period under review, with the Organization of African Unity (OAU), the League of Arab States

(LAS) and the Organization of the Islamic Conference (OIC). On 3, 11 and 22 March 1993, pursuant to resolution 794 (1992) of 3 December 1992, the Secretary-General submitted a report on Somalia,¹⁸³ in which he stated that he had continued to promote efforts towards political reconciliation in cooperation with regional organizations. At its 3188th meeting, on 26 March 1993, the Council adopted resolution 814 (1993), by which it expressed its appreciation to OAU, LAS, OIC and the Movement of Non-Aligned Countries for their cooperation with, and support of the efforts of the United Nations in Somalia. In pursuance of resolution 814 (1993), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a further report in which he observed that there was strong support for the United Nations role in Somalia from OAU, LAS and OIC, in particular for the need to take appropriate measures to ensure the implementation of the disarmament provisions of the Addis Ababa Agreement.¹⁸⁴

At the 3280th meeting, on 22 September 1993, several Council members expressed their appreciation of the efforts of OAU and LAS in rendering assistance to the Secretary-General.¹⁸⁵ By resolution 865 (1993), adopted at the same meeting, the Council welcomed the efforts of African countries, OAU, in particular its Horn of Africa Standing Committee, LAS and OIC, in cooperation with and in support of the United Nations, to promote national reconciliation in Somalia. By that resolution, the Council also called on all Member States to assist, in all ways possible, the Secretary-General, in conjunction with regional organizations, in his efforts to reconcile the parties and rebuild Somali political institutions; and invited the Secretary-General to consult the countries of the region and regional organizations concerned on means of further reinvigorating the reconciliation process.

At the 3315th meeting, on 16 November 1993, the President drew the attention of the Council members to a letter dated 25 October 1993 from the Permanent Representative of Ethiopia addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹⁸⁶ by which the President of Ethiopia informed the President of the Council that he was writing pursuant to the mandate given to him by the Heads of State and Government of OAU and the leaders of countries members of the Intergovernmental Authority for Drought and Development, to follow developments in Somalia. In his letter, the President of Ethiopia stated that it had now been fully recognized that an African solution had to be found to the problems of Somalia. It was his conviction that it was time for that concept to be incorporated in a Security Council resolution or be endorsed by the Council. In that context, he further stated that it would be extremely helpful if UNOSOM were to be explicitly directed to carry out its mandate in partnership with OAU and the countries of the subregion, especially with regard to seeking and implementing a political solution to Somalia's problems. At that meeting, the Council adopted resolution 885 (1993), by which it noted further proposals made by Member States, in particular members of OAU, including those contained in the above-mentioned letter from the representative of Ethiopia, in which the establishment of a commission of inquiry to investigate armed attacks on UNOSOM II was recommended.

At the 3317th meeting, on 18 November 1993, the representative of Ethiopia stated that a genuine partnership between OAU, the countries of the subregion and the United Nations was important to the political process in Somalia.¹⁸⁷ The representative of China stated that he hoped that the positive role of OAU and countries in the region would be brought more fully into play and that, with the gradual realization of national reconciliation, UNOSOM II would become a peacekeeping operation in the traditional sense.¹⁸⁸ At that meeting, the Council unanimously adopted resolution 886 (1993), by which it welcomed and supported the ongoing diplomatic efforts being made by Member States and international organizations, in particular those in the region, to assist United Nations efforts to bring all parties in Somalia, including movements and factions, to the negotiating table.

At subsequent meetings, Council members continued to commend and to stress the importance of the role played by regional organizations, in particular OAU, LAS and OIC, in promoting the necessary reconciliation in Somalia and restoring civil society, and expressed their support for those organizations.¹⁸⁹ The Council expressed these views in its resolutions 897 (1994) of 4 February 1994 and 954 (1994) of 4 November 1994 as well as in a presidential statement adopted on 6 April 1995.¹⁹⁰

In connection with the situation in Liberia, the Council, during the period under review, for the first time sent a United Nations force, the United Nations Observer Mission in Liberia (UNOMIL), into a conflict where a regional organization, the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS), was already operating. ECOWAS had been involved in Liberia diplomatically and, through its Ceasefire Monitoring Group (ECOMOG), militarily since the beginning of the conflict, while the Security Council had thus far commended its initiatives and endeavours. Pursuant to resolution 788 (1992), the Secretary-General, in his report of 12 March 1993,¹⁹¹ stated that Liberia represented a good example of systematic cooperation between the United Nations and a regional organization, as envisaged in Chapter VIII of the Charter. He also suggested that it might be the wish of the Council to continue to expand, as appropriate, the cooperative relationship between the United Nations and the concerned regional body.

In the Council's subsequent deliberations on the situation in Liberia, Council members expressed their support for enhanced cooperation between the United Nations and ECOWAS.¹⁹² By resolution 813 (1993), adopted at the 3187th meeting on 26 March 1993, the Council, recalling the provisions of Chapter VIII, commended ECOWAS and OAU for their efforts towards a peaceful resolution of the Liberian conflict and expressed its readiness to take measures in support of ECOWAS. Pursuant to that resolution, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a further report on Liberia,¹⁹³ in which he outlined the proposed role of the United Nations in the implementation of the Cotonou Agreement. That Agreement, signed on 25 July 1993, provided that ECOMOG would supervise and carry out the implementation of the provisions of the Agreement, while the United Nations would undertake monitoring and verification. In addition, the Secretary-General reported that ECOWAS had requested that the United Nations establish a trust fund to enable African countries to send reinforcements to ECOMOG and to provide assistance to countries already participating in ECOMOG.

At the 3263rd meeting, on 10 August 1993, the representative of Benin, on behalf of the Presidency of ECOWAS, assured the Council that ECOWAS would cooperate fully with the United Nations in the fulfilment of its mission in Liberia.¹⁹⁴ Several Council members described the conclusion of the Cotonou Agreement as a good example of cooperation between the United Nations and regional organizations, as advocated in Chapter VIII of the Charter, and encouraged the Secretary-General to also set up the proposed Trust Fund to assist ECOMOG contributing countries. The representative of France welcomed the fact that it was one of the first times that the United Nations, in the spirit of Chapter VIII of the Charter, had undertaken a peacekeeping operation in cooperation with a regional organization. He added that, for that first experiment, it was important that the competences and prerogatives of the two organizations be strictly respected, it being understood that the United Nations had to maintain its precedence. He further commented that the United Nations activities should be funded through mandatory contributions, whereas ECOMOG activities should be financed through the special trust fund, contributions to which would be voluntary.¹⁹⁵ At that meeting, the Council adopted resolution 856 (1993), by which it stated that it looked forward to the report of the Secretary-General on the proposed establishment of UNOMIL including, among other aspects, how to ensure coordination between UNOMIL and the peacekeeping forces of ECOWAS and their respective roles and responsibilities.

At the 3281st meeting, on 22 September 1993, all speakers stated that the cooperation between the United Nations and ECOMOG could serve as a precedent for future undertakings between the United Nations and regional organizations in other conflicts. The representative of Brazil noted that it was a case in which new modalities were being designed for close cooperation in the field between the United Nations and the regional organization. Brazil was convinced that such cooperation, with clearly defined roles for each organization, each in accordance with its own rules and procedures, was a very encouraging development.¹⁹⁶ At that meeting, the Council adopted resolution 866 (1993), by which it established UNOMIL and welcomed the intention of the Secretary-General to conclude with the Chairman of ECOWAS an agreement defining, before the deployment of UNOMIL, the roles and responsibilities of UNOMIL and ECOWAS in the implementation of the Peace Agreement. By that resolution, the Council also welcomed the establishment by the Secretary-General of a Trust Fund to facilitate the sending of reinforcements by African States to ECOMOG.

By subsequent presidential statements and by resolution 911 (1994) of 21 April 1994, the Council, inter alia, commended UNOMIL and ECOMOG for their continued efforts to restore peace, security and stability in Liberia and welcomed the close cooperation between the two missions.¹⁹⁷ By resolution 911 (1994), the Council, inter alia, welcomed the commitment of ECOMOG to ensure the safety of UNOMIL observers and civilian staff.

In the light of continued attacks against and abduction and harassment of United Nations and ECOMOG personnel, the Council, in a statement by the President on 13 September 1994,¹⁹⁸ requested ECOWAS to ensure that ECOMOG continued to extend protection to the extent possible to UNOMIL personnel, in accordance with the exchange of letters of 7 October 1993 between the Secretary-General and the Chairman of ECOWAS defining the respective roles and responsibilities of the two missions in Liberia.

On 10 June 1995, pursuant to resolution 985 (1995), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a progress report, in which he recommended that the role of UNOMIL in Liberia and its relationship with ECOMOG be adjusted to enable the two operations to function more effectively.

At the 3549th meeting, on 30 June 1995, the representative of Nigeria stated that the creation of ECOMOG had given practical expression to the cooperation envisaged in Chapter VIII of the Charter between regional organizations and the United Nations in the maintenance of international peace and security. He further commented that there was a need to assist ECOMOG with logistics and financial resources so that it could deliver on its commitments. Without a viable ECOMOG, the role and effectiveness of UNOMIL in Liberia would be seriously constrained.¹⁹⁹ In contrast, the representative of the Czech Republic warned that the shortcomings in cooperation between UNOMIL and ECOMOG were a troubling aspect of the Liberian situation. He stated that the parallel and concerted functioning of the two forces had been viewed as a model for Chapter VIII-style cooperation between a United Nations observer mission and a regional force in other parts of the world. It was therefore disturbing that, at the working level, cooperation “had not always been satisfactory,” as had been outlined in the Secretary-General’s report.²⁰⁰ The Czech Republic saluted the ECOWAS countries that had been shouldering the burden of ECOMOG, but it was particularly concerned that ECOMOG provide the necessary security for UNOMIL personnel, in line with the Cotonou Agreement, as specified by paragraph 12 of resolution 1001 (1995).²⁰¹

By resolution 1001 (1995), adopted at that meeting, as well as by subsequent resolutions,²⁰² the Council commended the positive role of ECOWAS in its continuing efforts to restore peace, security and stability in Liberia and called on ECOWAS, in accordance with the agreement regarding the respective roles and responsibilities of UNOMIL and ECOMOG in the implementation of the Cotonou Agreement, to take necessary action to provide security for UNOMIL observers and civilian staff.

At the 3577th meeting, on 15 September 1995, the representative of Liberia stated that, for five years, ECOWAS had borne a substantial burden to maintain its presence in Liberia. In keeping with Article 52 of the Charter, the Security Council had, through the creation and dispatch of UNOMIL, complemented the efforts of ECOWAS. UNOMIL involvement in the peace process had inspired confidence among Liberians that the international community was supportive of their desire to restore peace and normality in Liberia. It was the hope of the Government and people of Liberia that the United Nations would provide even more financial support to ECOMOG. He concluded by stating that, when a democratically elected government was inaugurated in Liberia, the cooperation between ECOWAS and the United Nations would indeed be recorded in the annals of the Organization as a unique success story, the lessons of which could be applied to conflicts in other parts of the world.²⁰³ Other speakers pointed out that improved and effective cooperation between UNOMIL and ECOMOG would be the key to the success of both missions and that they were looking forward to the Secretary-General's recommendations in that regard. The representative of Rwanda stated that his delegation was convinced that the United Nations, and the Security Council in particular, were not able to put an end to conflict in the region without the participation of regional and subregional African organizations. That was the reason why cooperation between the Security Council and the Secretariat and African regional organizations had to be recommended.²⁰⁴

On 10 November 1995, at the 3592nd meeting, several Council members expressed their support for the adjustment of the UNOMIL mandate as it clarified the division of tasks between UNOMIL and ECOMOG on the ground. In contrast to those statements, the representative of Rwanda pointed out that the funds necessary for ECOMOG operations for one year were less than those used in one week by the peacekeeping forces in the former Yugoslavia. For that reason, his country wished to reiterate its appeal to the Security Council and the Secretariat to resolve African problems only through Africa's own institutions, for the effect would be greater and the costs less. In the light of the African continent's economic situation, regional and subregional organizations needed only material and moral support to better carry out the tasks that States had assigned them.²⁰⁵ At that meeting, the Council adopted resolution 1020 (1995), by which it adjusted the mandate of UNOMIL and stressed the need for close contacts and enhanced coordination between UNOMIL and ECOMOG in their operational activities at all levels.

In connection with Angola, the Council cooperated with OAU in order to achieve a peaceful settlement of the situation in that country. At the 3254th meeting, held on 15 July 1993, the representative of Egypt stated that, as Chairman of OAU, Egypt was pleased to participate in the current stage of the Security Council's deliberations on the question of peace in Angola. She then briefed Council members on the efforts made within the framework of discussions on Angola at the meeting of Heads of State and Government of OAU, which Egypt had hosted from 28 to 30 June 1993. On behalf of OAU, she emphasized the importance of continuing coordination and consultation between the United Nations and OAU in regard to the Angolan problem.²⁰⁶ At that meeting, the Council adopted resolution 851 (1993), by which it welcomed the Declaration on the Situation in Angola adopted by the Assembly of Heads of State and Government of OAU and the resolution on the situation in Angola adopted by the Council of Ministers of OAU at its fifty-eighth ordinary session, held at Cairo from 21 to 26 June 1993.

On 13 September 1993, pursuant to resolution 851 (1993), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a further report on the United Nations Angola Verification Mission II.²⁰⁷ In his report, the Secretary-General welcomed the international community's growing efforts, especially those made by the OAU Ad Hoc Committee on Southern Africa, the Heads of State of neighbouring countries and the three observer States, in support of the search for a peaceful resolution to the Angolan conflict, and urged them to continue in those efforts.

By its subsequent resolutions,²⁰⁸ the Council welcomed the efforts of the OAU Ad Hoc Committee on Southern Africa and of Heads of State of neighbouring countries to facilitate the resumption of the peace process in Angola and commended the efforts of the Secretary-General, his Special Representative and those of the three observer States to the Angolan peace process and of OAU and some neighbouring States, in particular Zambia, and encouraged them to continue their efforts aimed at the earliest resolution of the Angolan crisis through negotiations within the framework of the Peace Accords and relevant Security Council resolutions.

At its 3499th meeting, on 8 February 1995, the Council invited a delegation of the OAU Council of Ministers²⁰⁹ to participate in the discussion on the situation in Angola. The representative of Tunisia emphasized the great interest that President Zine El Abidine Ben Ali, Chairman of OAU, took in a final settlement of the conflict in Angola, and the determination of OAU to spare no effort, in collaboration with the Security Council, to maintain and consolidate peace in Angola and in Africa as a whole. The representative further pointed out that the presence of the ministerial delegation provided an opportunity to reaffirm the desire of OAU to continue and to strengthen its cooperation with the United Nations, particularly in the area of preventive diplomacy, through the OAU central mechanism for the prevention, management and settlement of conflicts in Africa. That cooperation had proved very useful in a number of situations, and the case of Angola once again provided an opportunity to observe a successful peacekeeping operation conducted by the United Nations with the participation of the African countries.²¹⁰ Several speakers welcomed the presence of the OAU ministerial delegation and its participation in the debate as a sign of the readiness of OAU and other regional organizations to contribute to the settlement of conflicts, and stressed that the involvement of regional organizations in solving crises was vital to the success of the United Nations.²¹¹ These views were reflected in resolution 976 (1995), adopted at that meeting.

With regard to South Africa, the Council, in a presidential statement adopted on 23 November 1993,²¹² invited the Secretary-General, as requested by the General Assembly,²¹³ to accelerate contingency planning for a possible United Nations role in the election process of that country, including coordination with the observer missions of OAU, the European Community and the Commonwealth.

At the 3329th meeting, on 14 January 1994, Council members welcomed the cooperation between the intergovernmental institutions involved in the monitoring of the South African elections and emphasized the importance of the coordinating role of the United Nations. By resolution 894 (1994), adopted at that meeting, the Council commended the positive contribution already made by the United Nations Observer Mission in South Africa (UNOMSA) to the transitional process in South Africa and the positive contribution of OAU, the Commonwealth and the European Union in that regard. By that resolution, the Council agreed with the proposals of the Secretary-General concerning the coordination of the activities of the international observers provided by OAU, the Commonwealth and the European Union.

In his last report to the Council on the question of South Africa, on 16 June 1994,²¹⁴ the Secretary-General noted that, as an exercise in preventive diplomacy, drawing on the strengths of several international organizations to support indigenous efforts towards peace and national reconciliation, the international community's efforts in South Africa since 1992 offered a unique and positive demonstration of the benefits of such cooperation. It had been probably the closest form of cooperation achieved by those organizations so far. He intended to invite OAU, the Commonwealth and the European Union, and other concerned regional organizations, to work out guidelines for future cooperation based on the success, as well as the mistakes, of their common experience in South Africa. By resolution 930 (1994), adopted at the 3393rd meeting on 27 June 1994, the Council commended the vital role played by the Special Representative of the Secretary-General and the Mission, together with OAU, the Commonwealth and

Asia

In Tajikistan, the Security Council established, during the period under review, the United Nations Mission of Observers in Tajikistan (UNMOT) in order to achieve, in cooperation with a collective peacekeeping force of the Commonwealth of Independent States (CIS) as well as in cooperation with CSCE through the good offices of the Secretary-General, a ceasefire and a peaceful settlement of the conflict.

Initially, the Council, through a decision and a communication,²¹⁵ welcomed the efforts by regional parties and CSCE aimed at stabilizing the situation. At its 3482nd meeting, on 16 December 1994, the Council decided, by resolution 968 (1994), to establish UNMOT with the mandate to assist in maintaining the ceasefire, and to maintain, to this end, close contacts with the parties to the conflict, as well as close liaison with the CSCE mission in Tajikistan and with the collective peacekeeping forces of CIS in Tajikistan and with the border forces.

The representative of Tajikistan stated that his delegation considered the collective peacekeeping forces of CIS to be a regional arrangement concluded in conformity with Chapter VIII of the Charter and with the purposes and principles of the Organization. The neutrality and impartiality of those forces were clearly reflected in their mandate, as reported by the Secretary-General.²¹⁶ The representative of the Russian Federation stated that the collective peacekeeping forces of CIS and the United Nations observer mission had separate mandates, but a single goal: to promote the stabilization of the situation and the process of national reconciliation in Tajikistan, a process which required their interaction.²¹⁷ The representative of the Czech Republic stressed the principle of neutrality and impartiality for the activities of "other forces" in Tajikistan and stated that his Government believed that monitoring their neutrality and impartiality should be a part of the job of UNMOT.²¹⁸

By its subsequent decisions,²¹⁹ the Council commended the efforts of the Secretary-General and his Special Envoy as well as of the countries and regional organizations acting as observers at the inter-Tajik talks, expressed its satisfaction at the close contacts of UNMOT with the parties to the conflict, as well as at its close liaison with the collective peacekeeping forces, the border forces and the mission in Tajikistan of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe (OSCE),²²⁰ and extended the mandate of UNMOT twice during the remainder of the period under review.²²¹

Europe

The Security Council and the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe joined efforts to achieve a peaceful settlement regarding the situation in Nagorny Karabakh. Besides expressing its full support for the efforts taken within the CSCE framework, and specifically for the Minsk Conference,²²² the Council requested the Secretary-General, in consultation with CSCE, to ascertain facts and submit urgently a report to the Council containing an assessment of the situation on the ground.²²³ In his report of 14 April 1993,²²⁴ the Secretary-General confirmed his continued full and active support for the CSCE effort to convene the Minsk Conference as soon as possible and to lend technical assistance in the deployment of the CSCE monitoring mission. By its subsequent decisions regarding the situation in Nagorny Karabakh,²²⁵ the Council continued to support, also by requesting the good offices of the Secretary-General, the efforts of the so-called Minsk group of CSCE, including a monitoring mission sent by that organization.

The Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe stressed the importance of the Security Council's guidance for the peace process. The Chairman of CSCE noted in his report of 1 October 1993,²²⁶ considered at the Council's 3292nd meeting, on 14 October 1993, that the adoption of a Security Council resolution or a presidential statement on the Nagorny Karabakh conflict would represent a source of guidance and encouragement, both for the parties to the conflict and for the Minsk Group, and suggested some points to be included in such a decision, such as an expression of readiness on the part of the United Nations to send its representatives to observe the Minsk Conference, if invited, to provide all possible assistance for the substantive negotiations that would follow the opening of the Conference, and an expression of support for the monitoring mission developed by CSCE and of the willingness of the United Nations to be associated with it in any possible way. Resolution 874 (1993), adopted at that meeting, incorporated these as well as other points proposed by the Chairman of CSCE.

In a letter dated 20 April 1995 addressed to the President of the Security Council,²²⁷ the Co-Chairmen of the Minsk Conference observed that the continuing political support from the Security Council for the possible deployment of an OSCE peacekeeping force, as well as continued United Nations technical advice and expertise were required. The Chairman further expressed his gratitude for the assistance the United Nations Secretariat had afforded the High-level Planning Group in its work. By a presidential statement, adopted on 26 April 1995,²²⁸ the Council stressed the urgency of concluding a political agreement on the cessation of the armed conflict on the basis of the relevant principles of the Charter of the United Nations and of OSCE. It emphasized that the achievement of such an agreement was a prerequisite for the deployment of a multinational OSCE peacekeeping force. By that statement, the Council also confirmed its readiness to provide continuing political support, inter alia, through an appropriate resolution regarding the possible deployment of a multinational peacekeeping force of OSCE following agreement among the parties for cessation of the armed conflict. The United Nations also stood ready to provide technical advice and expertise.

During the period under review, the Security Council decided to send an observer mission to Georgia to monitor a ceasefire in cooperation with a peacekeeping force provided by the Commonwealth of Independent States. In addition, the Council supported in its decisions²²⁹ the Secretary-General's ongoing cooperation with the Chairman-in-Office of CSCE in their efforts to bring peace to the region as well as the decisions taken by CSCE to that end. The cooperation between the missions of the United Nations and of CIS in the region was subject to extensive debates in the Council and will therefore be laid out in more detail.

At the 3268th meeting, on 24 August 1993, the representative of France stated that, "after Liberia, just recently", the Security Council was "once again faced with a situation that was new to it", which consisted in the United Nations intervening on the ground alongside other, regional players. That type of action posed a number of problems, in particular the problem of delimiting precisely who had what responsibilities.²³⁰ At that meeting, the Council adopted resolution 858 (1993), by which it established the United Nations Observer Mission in Georgia (UNOMIG), welcomed the deployment of mixed interim monitoring groups of Georgian/Abkhaz/Russian units designed to consolidate the ceasefire, and requested the Secretary-General to facilitate cooperation between the United Nations observers and those units within their respective mandates.

By a letter dated 21 June 1994,²³¹ the Minister for Foreign Affairs of the Russian Federation informed the Secretary-General that, acting on the basis of the provisions of Chapter VIII of the Charter, CIS had decided to introduce a collective force into the conflict zone for a period of six months. The Security Council would always be kept fully informed of the size of such forces and of their activities, in accordance with Article 54 of the Charter. The Minister stated further that CIS was anxious not to supplant the United Nations, but to help create the most favourable conditions for the efforts of the United Nations. It was therefore essential to establish from the very outset close cooperation between the peacekeeping force and UNOMIG. The Russian Federation hoped that the Security Council would decide to enlarge the staff of the Mission and expand and refine its mandate.

At its 3398th meeting, 30 June 1994, the Council adopted resolution 934 (1994), by which it noted with satisfaction the beginning of CIS assistance in the zone of conflict, in continued coordination with UNOMIG, and on the basis of further coordinating arrangements with UNOMIG to be agreed by the time of the Council's consideration of the Secretary-General's recommendations on the expansion of UNOMIG; and requested the Secretary-General to report to the Council on the outcome of discussions between UNOMIG, the parties and the CIS peacekeeping force designed to reach an agreement on the arrangements which would exist on the ground for coordination between an expanded UNOMIG and the CIS peacekeeping force.

The representative of France stated that it was necessary that, together with the deployment of CIS, a new mandate be rapidly entrusted to UNOMIG to verify all aspects of the implementation of the agreement of 14 May 1994. The Council would not be able to adopt a resolution to that effect until the Mission and the CIS force had concluded the necessary arrangements concerning the coordination of their activities and until the parties had given the assurances that would guarantee full freedom of movement.²³² The representative of the Czech Republic stated that his delegation believed that the new element in the resolution, introduced originally by the Russian Federation, ran counter to the general understanding in the Security Council that the Council would be in a position to consider and pass judgement on the peacekeeping operation of CIS in Abkhazia, Georgia, only after it had received and deliberated upon the Secretary-General's substantive report on UNOMIG. That report should be available shortly and should address a number of important, and so far unclear, aspects of the peacekeeping operation in Abkhazia, Georgia, including the vital issue of coordination and cooperation between UNOMIG and the CIS peacekeeping forces. He reiterated his delegation's concern that many aspects of the CIS peacekeeping operation, including coordination and interaction with UNOMIG, remained unclear and hazy.²³³

At the 3407th meeting, on 21 July 1994, Council members discussed the modalities of the cooperation between UNOMIG and the CIS peacekeeping force and reflected on the implications of cooperation between missions of the United Nations and a regional organization or a Member State in general. With regard to the situation in Georgia, the representative of France stated that there was a need to find a balance between the action of the peacekeeping force of the CIS member States — autonomous action — and that of a United Nations mission with a mandate from the Council. It was also important to give UNOMIG the mandate to observe the action of the peacekeeping force of the CIS member States within the framework of the implementation of the Agreement of 14 May — a requirement that became legitimate once the United Nations was requested to participate in the implementation of that Agreement. His delegation welcomed the fact that the Russian Federation had sought the support of the Council for a regional stabilization operation in CIS and that that operation thus became a part of the process of a political settlement that was under the auspices of the United Nations. That positive development emphasized the regulatory functions that the Security Council had now shouldered for peacekeeping activities carried out by Powers or by regional forums.²³⁴ The representative of the Russian Federation stated that his country and the other States of CIS believed that the closest interaction between the CIS peacekeeping forces and UNOMIG was the most important condition for the successful attainment of their parallel objectives.²³⁵ The representative of New Zealand stated that the presence of two peacekeeping operations in one country made it imperative that the relationship between those two forces be clearly set out and well understood by all involved at all levels. There were a number of elements²³⁶ which — as past experience with United Nations peacekeeping operations suggested — needed to be addressed in such a situation, which resolution 937 (1994) did.

The representative of the Czech Republic noted that the issue of UNOMIG observing the CIS mission had been of great concern and importance to his delegation throughout the Council's deliberations on Abkhazia, Georgia. UNOMIG reports on that issue should therefore be followed with particular interest. He stressed that by adopting resolution 937 (1994), the Security Council had entered uncharted waters. For the first time, Council members had been faced with a situation in which a State with openly declared national interests in the region was undertaking a peacekeeping operation in a neighbouring country. After that first case might come other cases. No two peacekeeping operations were identical; each had its unique settings and features. Therefore, his delegation did not regard the resolution as one that would set a precedent.²³⁷ The representative of the United Kingdom acknowledged that in many ways the resolution and the arrangements set out in it broke new ground. That approach came against the background of increasing demands on United Nations peacekeeping capabilities, demands that threatened to outstrip supply. It represented a response to a situation of grave concern to all, but in which the conditions allowing for the deployment of a United Nations peacekeeping operation did not, at that point, exist.²³⁸

The representative of Nigeria observed that his delegation did not see the resolution as "ground-breaking". With the demands for United Nations collective peacekeeping outstripping its ability and resources, it had already become clear and imperative that regional organizations and/or arrangements had to step in. The representative pointed out that "in all modesty, we in the West African subregion can claim to have already blazed that trail" with the arrangement in Liberia of ECOWAS, which was later complemented by UNOMIL.²³⁹ The President, speaking in his capacity as the representative of Pakistan, expressed concern over an emerging tendency to attribute peacekeeping roles to the countries of the region, especially when such countries had direct political interests in the area of the conflict. The States Members of the United Nations should in no way abrogate their Charter responsibilities in such a manner. His delegation was aware of the financial difficulties faced by the United Nations, particularly in relation to its peacekeeping operations. These constraints, however, should not be allowed to impinge upon the obligations of the United Nations to uphold peace and security around the world. It was the common responsibility not to allow any erosion of the system of collective security as envisaged in the Charter. His delegation did not favour the practice of post facto endorsement by the Security Council of a regional peacekeeping operation which was outside the purview of the United Nations.²⁴⁰

By resolution 937 (1994), adopted at that meeting, the Council, noting the assurances given by the parties and the representatives of the CIS peacekeeping force concerning the full freedom of movement of UNOMIG in the performance of its mandate, decided that the mandate of an expanded UNOMIG should include observing the operation of the CIS peacekeeping force. The Council also noted the Secretary-General's intention to write to the Chairman of the Council of Heads of State of CIS on the respective roles and responsibilities of UNOMIG and the CIS peacekeeping force, and requested the Secretary-General to establish an appropriate arrangement to that effect.

In its subsequent decisions on the situation in Georgia, the Council commended the cooperation between the United Nations and the CIS forces and decided twice, during the remainder of the period under review, to extend the mandate of UNOMIG.²⁴¹

During the period under review, the Council supported the efforts of CSCE to achieve a peaceful settlement of the situation in the former Yugoslavia, specifically its continued presence in the region to that end. By a letter dated 20 July 1993,²⁴² the Chairman-in-Office of the Council of Ministers of CSCE informed the President of the Security Council, in conformity with Article 54 of the Charter, that it was the considered opinion of the CSCE participating States that the decision by the Belgrade authorities not to allow the continued functioning of the CSCE missions in Kosovo, Sandzak and Vojvodina aggravated the existing threats to peace and security in the region.

At the 3262nd meeting, on 9 August 1993, the representative of China, referring to the principle of non-interference in the internal affairs of sovereign States, observed that practice over the years had shown that the consent and cooperation of the parties concerned were essential factors in ensuring the success of the endeavours of the United Nations and regional organizations. The speaker noted that, when differences arose between a regional organization and a sovereign State, it was important to consider the question whether the Security Council should involve itself and, if so, which principle should guide its actions.²⁴³ The representative of Hungary stated that the CSCE missions had proved extremely valuable in promoting stability and counteracting the risk of ethnically motivated violence in Kosovo, Sandjak and Vojvodina. Hungary, like the CSCE community as a whole, was of the view that the expulsion of the CSCE mission was an act that further aggravated the threat to peace and security in the Balkan region. Therefore, his country considered that the call of the Council to the Belgrade Government to re-examine its position was a perfectly legitimate and sound action, supporting the efforts of CSCE in a matter of grave concern.²⁴⁴ That position was echoed by the representatives of Pakistan,²⁴⁵ France,²⁴⁶ Spain²⁴⁷ and the United States.²⁴⁸ By resolution 855 (1993), adopted at that meeting, the Council endorsed the efforts of CSCE and called upon the authorities in the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) to reconsider their refusal to allow the continuation of the activities of the CSCE missions in Kosovo, Sandjak and Vojvodina; to cooperate with CSCE by taking the practical steps needed for the resumption of the activities of those missions; and to agree to an increase in the number of monitors as decided by CSCE.

Americas

During the period under review, the Security Council cooperated with the Organization of American States (OAS) in order to achieve a pacific settlement of the situation in Haiti. The cooperation between the United Nations and OAS took place at various levels and included a number of measures by the Council.²⁴⁹ The most important elements of its decisions in support of the cooperation between the Secretary-General of the United Nations and the Secretary-General of OAS are described in the following.

At its 3238th meeting, on 16 June 1993, the Council adopted resolution 841 (1993), by which it commended the efforts undertaken by the Secretary-General's Special Representative for Haiti and the Secretary-General of OAS to establish a political dialogue with the Haitian parties; recalled in this respect, the provisions of Chapter VIII of the Charter; and stressed the need for effective cooperation between regional organizations and the United Nations. The Council also welcomed the request by the General Assembly that the Secretary-General take the necessary measures to assist, in cooperation with OAS, in the solution of the crisis in Haiti, and requested the Secretary-General to report to the Security Council on progress achieved in the efforts jointly undertaken by him and the Secretary-General of OAS with a view to reaching a political solution to the crisis in Haiti.

On 12 July 1993, pursuant to resolution 841 (1993), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report, in which he informed the Council that he had met with the President of Haiti and the Commander-in-Chief of the Armed Forces of Haiti at Governors Island, New York, from 27 June to 3 July 1993. The meeting had resulted in the signing of a 10-point

Agreement containing, inter alia, the following arrangements: organization under the auspices of the United Nations and OAS of a political dialogue between representatives of the political parties represented in the Parliament, with the participation of representatives of the Presidential Commission; suspension, on the initiative of the Secretary-General of the United Nations, of the sanctions adopted under resolution 841 (1993), and the suspension, on the initiative of the Secretary-General of OAS, of the OAS sanctions, immediately after the Prime Minister was confirmed and had assumed office in Haiti; and verification by the United Nations and OAS of fulfilment of all the commitments contained in the Governors Island Agreement.²⁵⁰

At its 3282nd meeting, on 23 September 1993, the Council unanimously adopted resolution 867 (1993), by which it established the United Nations Mission in Haiti (UNMIH) for a period of six months; and by which it, inter alia, welcomed the intention of the Secretary-General to place the peacekeeping Mission under the oversight of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General of the United Nations and the Secretary-General of OAS,²⁵¹ who also oversaw the activities of the International Civilian Mission in Haiti,²⁵² so that the peacekeeping Mission could benefit from the experience and information already obtained by the Civilian Mission. The Council also expressed its appreciation for the constructive role of OAS in cooperation with the United Nations in promoting the solution of the political crisis and the restoration of democracy in Haiti, and stressed in this context the importance of ensuring close coordination between the United Nations and OAS in their work in Haiti.

By its subsequent decisions concerning the situation in Haiti,²⁵³ the Council expressed its support for the joint efforts of the Secretaries-General of the United Nations and OAS to achieve a political settlement through the implementation of the Governors Island Agreement, and for their efforts to facilitate the immediate return to Haiti of MICIVIH, and called upon them to continue to render all appropriate assistance to the Haitian electoral process.

C. Challenges to the appropriateness of Security Council action in the light of Article 52

The enumeration of the peaceful means by which the parties to a dispute, in accordance with Article 33 (1) of the Charter, shall first of all seek to settle their dispute, includes “resort to regional agencies or arrangements”. This is further emphasized in Article 52, which provides that Member States “shall make every effort to achieve pacific settlement of local disputes through such regional arrangements or by such regional agencies before referring them to the Security Council”; and that the Security Council “shall encourage the development of pacific settlement of local disputes through such regional arrangements or by such regional agencies”. During the period under review, Member States challenged the competence of the Security Council to consider a dispute on the basis of these provisions in one instance (case 24).

Letters dated 20 and 23 December 1991 from France, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the United States of America

In connection with letters dated 20 and 23 December 1991 from France, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the United States of America, the representative of the Sudan, speaking on behalf of the League of Arab States, stated at the Council’s 3312th meeting on 11 November 1993 that the matter before the Council concerned a State member of LAS and pointed out that LAS had expressed willingness to provide its good offices and to cooperate with the Secretary-General and the Security Council in resolving the deteriorating conflict. The representative noted that, in dealing with the crisis, LAS had based itself on the Charter, which stipulated that all international disputes should be settled by peaceful means and without endangering international peace and security, and especially on Article 52 of the Charter.²⁵⁴

In explanation of his vote of abstention, the representative of China pointed out that organizations such as the Organization of African Unity, the League of Arab States and the Movement of Non-Aligned Countries had expressed their willingness to contribute to the settlement of the crisis, and had already made unremitting efforts and achieved certain results. More time should be given for these continuing efforts by the organizations that were in a better position to promote the settlement of the dispute.²⁵⁵

D. Authorization by the Security Council of enforcement action by regional organizations

During the period under review, with regard to the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina, the Security Council, recalling Chapter VIII of the Charter in several of its decisions, authorized, for the first time, “States acting nationally or through regional organizations” to use force for the purposes of implementation of a flight ban and support of a United Nations mission in the performance of its mandate. It further continued to authorize, under the same formula, Member States to enforce an arms and trade embargo.

At the 3191st meeting, on 31 March 1993, the representative of France stated that the Security Council was adopting a resolution that would mark the involvement of new actors — States or regional organizations — which would intervene in new circumstances, as peacemakers and not simply as peacekeepers. The representative welcomed the fact that a balance had been struck between the technical necessity of setting up effective military structures and the political need to place them under the authority of the Security Council, in close coordination with the Secretary-General. Those principles should serve as a model for future peacekeeping or peacemaking operations, to be carried out with Member States acting in their national capacity or in the framework of regional organizations or arrangements.²⁵⁶ The representative of Brazil stated that his delegation attached particular importance to the fact that, in accordance with the resolution, the Security Council would be kept thoroughly informed of the relevant actions and that regional organizations or arrangements involved in the action would be doing so under the provisions of Chapter VIII of the Charter.²⁵⁷ At that meeting, the Council adopted resolution 816 (1993), by which, recalling the provisions of Chapter VIII of the Charter, it authorized Member States, acting nationally or through regional organizations or arrangements, to take, under the authority of the Security Council, all necessary measures to enforce a flight ban in the airspace of Bosnia and Herzegovina. Pursuant to that resolution, the Secretary-General informed the President of the Security Council by a letter dated 9 April 1993²⁵⁸ that Member States concerned, acting nationally as well as through the regional arrangement of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO), had been closely coordinating with him and the United Nations Protection Force (UNPROFOR) on the measures they were taking to ensure compliance with the ban on all flights in the airspace of Bosnia and Herzegovina.

On 17 April 1993, at its 3200th meeting, the Council adopted, resolution 820 (1993), by which, recalling the provisions of Chapter VIII of the Charter, it reaffirmed the responsibility of riparian States to take necessary measures to monitor and, if necessary, halt and control, under the authority of the Security Council, shipping on the Danube in accordance with resolutions 713 (1991), 757 (1992) and 787 (1992). The Council reiterated in this connection its request in resolution 787 (1992) to all States, including non-riparian States, to provide, acting nationally or through regional organizations or arrangements, such assistance as may be required by the riparian States.

At its 3228th meeting, on 4 June 1993, the Council adopted resolution 836 (1993), by which it decided that Member States, acting nationally or through regional organizations or arrangements, could take, under the authority of the Security Council and subject to close coordination with the Secretary-General and UNPROFOR, all necessary measures, through the use of air power, in and around the safe areas in Bosnia and Herzegovina, to support UNPROFOR in the performance of its mandate.²⁵⁹ The representative of the United Kingdom stated that the resolution on “safe areas” which had just been adopted was another essential step in the immediate agenda. A new element was that the United Kingdom, with France and the United States, probably acting in a NATO framework, were prepared, once authorized by this resolution, to make available air power in response to calls for assistance from United Nations forces in and around the “safe areas”.²⁶⁰

Throughout the period under review, with regard to the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina, cooperation between the United Nations and regional actors, including NATO, remained subject to extensive discussions in the Council. At the 3336th meeting, on 14 and 15 February 1994, the representative of the United States noted that, for the first time, a regional security organization, NATO, had acted to implement a decision of the Council to use force under Chapter VII of the Charter. Cooperation between NATO and the United Nations would be essential, not only for the citizens of Sarajevo and the other safe areas in Bosnia, but also for the precedent it would set for the future of collective security. The firm and fair implementation of the NATO decision would contribute much to the credibility of the Security Council and the United Nations.²⁶¹ In contrast, the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Malaysia observed, at the 3370th meeting on 27 April 1994, that the events in Gorazde had placed the Security Council, the major Powers and the machinery of the United Nations, reposed in the Secretary-General, in an untenable position. They had, among other things, exposed the breakdown in the chain of command and between principled stand, responsibility and the need for action. One could only conclude that, between the United Nations machinery, as reposed in the Secretary-General, the Security Council and NATO, there had been a clear deflection of responsibility. It had raised in many quarters the question who was actually in charge.²⁶² At the 3578th meeting, on 15 September 1995, the representative of Botswana stressed that it was critical that the Council guard against losing control altogether in transferring the authority of the United Nations to regional arrangements. In such situations, the United Nations should never assume the position of a bystander in an operation that was supposed to be under the command and control of the Security Council.²⁶³

In the light of the transfer of authority from UNPROFOR in Bosnia and Herzegovina to an implementation force, the representative of Brazil observed at the 3607th meeting, on 15 December 1995, that, as the implementation force took up its position in a terrain still fraught with uncertainties, it was essential that the organ responsible for safeguarding international peace and security be given the necessary tools to enable it to exercise the role ascribed to it in the Charter. The representative noted that the creation of multinational forces at the behest of the Security Council had ceased to be an unusual feature. If those forces were to be perceived by the international community as legitimate and credible, however, the necessary accountability towards the Security Council had to be strictly observed. As an organ acting on behalf of the entire United Nations membership, the Security Council was given wide powers in responding promptly to evolving situations. That it should envisage the creation of multinational forces for dealing with certain situations and not with others was a matter that deserved to be clarified for all United Nations Members in the most satisfactory manner if support for such decisions were to have the desired firmness and unanimity.²⁶⁴ At that meeting, the Council adopted resolution 1031 (1995), by which the Council authorized the Member States acting through or in cooperation with the organization referred to in the Peace Agreement to establish a multinational implementation force under unified command and control in order to fulfil the role specified in that Agreement.

With regard to the situation in Haiti, during the period under review the Security Council, recalling Chapter VIII in several of its decisions, gave its authorization for a trade and arms embargo previously imposed by OAS against Haiti and imposed additional measures under Chapters VII and VIII of the Charter.

By a letter dated 7 June 1993 addressed to the President of the Security Council,²⁶⁵ the representative of Haiti requested that the Council make universal and mandatory the sanctions that were being applied against the de facto authorities in Haiti by OAS. He recommended that the Council give priority to the embargo on petroleum products and the supply of arms and munitions.

At the 3238th meeting, on 16 June 1993, the representative of Canada noted that the OAS embargo on trade with Haiti was not binding on countries which were not members of that organization, thus reducing its impact and thereby allowing the illegal regime in Port-au-Prince to cling to power. Acknowledging that reality, OAS had found it necessary to seek the support of the United Nations. Canada strongly supported the efforts of the past six months of the Special Envoy of OAS and the United Nations to reach a negotiated settlement. The Council should respond positively to the call by President Aristide and impose an embargo on the delivery of oil supplies in order to bring about a speedy conclusion to the situation.²⁶⁶ By resolution 841 (1993), adopted at that meeting, the Council, considering that the request of the Permanent Representative of Haiti defined a unique and exceptional situation warranting extraordinary measures by the Security Council in support of the efforts undertaken within the framework of OAS; and decided to implement the provisions set forth in paragraphs 5 to 14 of that resolution, which were consistent with the trade embargo recommended by OAS.

²⁶⁶ S/PV.3238, p. 7.

In subsequent resolutions regarding the situation in Haiti,²⁶⁷ the Council, continuously acting under Chapters VII and VIII of the Charter and calling upon Member States, acting nationally or through regional agencies or arrangements, decided on the suspension, reinstatement, expansion²⁶⁸ and termination of enforcement actions in accordance with the recommendations laid out in the reports of the Secretary-General,²⁶⁹ having regard for the views of the Secretary-General of OAS.

At its 3437th meeting, on 15 October 1994, the Council adopted resolution 948 (1994), by which it welcomed the fact that, now that President Aristide had returned to Haiti, sanctions would be lifted in accordance with resolution 944 (1994). At that meeting, the representative of Nigeria, like other members of the Council, welcomed the peaceful return, on that day, of President Aristide to Haiti, which was due to the tremendous efforts of the United Nations, its Secretary-General, the regional organization and other Member States.

²⁶⁸ By resolution 917 (1994) of 6 May 1994, the Council also imposed a flight and trade embargo against Haiti; a travel embargo for officers of the Haitian military, their families or those employed by them; and an asset freeze for persons defined by that resolution.

Part IV Consideration of the miscellaneous provisions of the Charter (Articles 102 and 103)

Article 102

1. Every treaty and every international agreement entered into by any Member of the United Nations after the present Charter comes into force shall as soon as possible be registered with the Secretariat and published by it.

2. No party to any such treaty or international agreement which has not been registered in accordance with the provisions of paragraph 1 of this Article may invoke that treaty or agreement before any organ of the United Nations.

Article 103

In the event of a conflict between the obligations of the Members of the United Nations under the present Charter and their obligations under any other international agreement, their obligations under the present Charter shall prevail.

During the period under review, Article 102 was not explicitly invoked in any resolution. The principle of Article 102 was referred to during the deliberations of the Council at the 3256th meeting, on 20 July 1993, in connection with the status of the city of Sevastopol. In response to a decree establishing the Russian federal status of the city of Sevastopol adopted by the Supreme Soviet of the Russian Federation, the representative of Ukraine noted that the decree “is a flagrant violation of the international commitments flowing from Russia’s membership in the United Nations, its participation in the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe and the Treaty between Ukraine and Russia ratified by that very same Russian Parliament on 19 November 1990, which has been registered with the United Nations Secretariat in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations”.²⁷⁰

Other than the instance mentioned above, Article 102 was explicitly referred to in a letter dated 18 April 1995 from the representatives of Belize, Costa Rica, El Salvador, Guatemala, Honduras, Nicaragua and Panama addressed to the Secretary-General. Annex VII to the letter contained the text of the Treaty on Central American Social Integration, section V of which envisioned its formal registration with the United Nations in accordance with Article 102.²⁷¹

Implicit references to Article 102 emerged on several occasions in letters and notes by the President of the Council. The principle of Article 102 was invoked in a note by the President of the Security Council and in three letters from the Permanent Representative of Ukraine to the President of the Security Council, in reference to the status of the city of Sevastopol.²⁷²

Regarding the situation between Iraq and Kuwait, Article 102 was implicitly referred to twice: in a note by the President of the Security Council containing a statement of the President made on behalf of the Council and in a letter from the Permanent

Representative of Kuwait addressed to the Secretary-General.²⁷³

Article 102 was also implicitly invoked in a letter from the Secretary-General addressed to the President of the Security Council in connection with the request for admission to membership in the United Nations of the State admitted as the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia.²⁷⁴

During the period under review, Article 103 was not explicitly invoked in any resolution. During the Council proceedings in connection with the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina, Article 103 was expressly referred to on two occasions.

At the 3370th meeting, on 27 April 1994, the representative of Egypt, referring to the inalienable right of all States of individual or collective self-defence (Article 51), stressed that the military embargo against Bosnia and Herzegovina contradicted the provisions of the Charter and the most fundamental principles of justice. Explicitly referring to Article 103, the representative stressed the supremacy of the Charter over decisions of the Council and noted that “the continued imposition of the military embargo on the Bosnian Government ... is contrary to the inherent right provided for in the Charter”.²⁷⁵

On the second occasion, at the 3454th meeting of the Council, on 9 November 1994, the representative of Egypt stated: “should the Council fail to break the deadlock by choosing not to adopt the anticipated resolution, the States concerned will have the right to invoke Article 51 of the Charter, and under Article 103, individually or collectively provide Bosnia and Herzegovina with the means of self-defence”.²⁷⁶

²⁷² S/26118. In the letters from its representative (S/26100, S/26109, S/26075 and S/26118), Ukraine rejected the decree of the Supreme Soviet of the Russian Federation concerning Sevastopol.

²⁷³ S/26006, dated 28 June 1993. The note made reference to “The Agreed Minutes between the State of Kuwait and the Republic of Iraq regarding the Restoration of Friendly Relations, Recognition and Related Matters” signed by both parties on 4 October 1963 and registered with the United Nations. See also S/26132, dated 21 July 1993.

At the end of the text is a reference to the registration of the agreement with the Secretariat of the United Nations.

²⁷⁶ S/PV.3454 (Resumption 1), p. 49.

Besides those mentioned above, the Security Council adopted a number of resolutions imposing measures under Chapter VII of the Charter, in which it invoked the principle of Article 103 by emphasizing the primacy of the Charter obligations over obligations contracted by Member States under any other international agreement. Most of the resolutions by which the Council imposed measures under Chapter VII in respect of Haiti, Angola, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya and Rwanda included such provisions, as set out below.

At its 3238th meeting, on 16 June 1993, the Council adopted resolution 841 (1993) in connection with the sanctions against Haiti, and called upon “all States and all international organizations to act strictly in accordance with the provisions of the present resolution, notwithstanding the existence of any rights or obligations conferred or imposed by any international agreement or any contract entered into or any licence or permit granted prior to 23 June 1993”.

The Council adopted resolutions that included similar language in a number of other cases. These included resolution 864 (1993) of 15 September 1993 imposing measures under Chapter VII in respect of UNITA;²⁷⁷ resolution 883 (1993) of 11 November 1993, imposing sanctions against the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya for its failure to comply with resolutions 731 (1992) and 748 (1992); resolution 917 (1994) of 6 May 1994, by which it expanded the sanctions imposed against Haiti until the return of the legitimately elected president; and resolution 918 (1994) of 17 May 1994, by which it imposed an arms embargo on Rwanda.

During the period of review, Article 103 was not a subject of debate in the Security Council. Article 103 was however explicitly evoked in a note by the President to the Council, transmitting a statement made by the President to the media in reference to the situation concerning the navigation on the Danube River in the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia.²⁷⁸

THE REPERTOIRE OF THE PRACTICE OF THE SECURITY COUNCIL and its Supplements are published by the United Nations Secretariat as a guide to the proceedings of the Security Council from its first meeting in 1946 onwards. The Repertoire is designed to assist government officials, practitioners of international law, academics and all those interested in the work of the United Nations to follow the evolving practice of the Council and gain a better understanding of the framework within which it operates. The publication presents, as comprehensively as possible, new trends in the Council's application of the Charter of the United Nations and its own provisional rules of procedure. The Repertoire is the only such official record and is based solely on the deliberations of the Council, its decisions and other official documentation before the Council.

The current Supplement, twelfth in the series of Supplements to the Repertoire, covers the years 1993 to 1995. It deals with a period that saw a number of new trends in international relations and corresponding developments in the Council's practice, including the expansion of peacekeeping missions and new approaches to peacebuilding and conflict prevention. The period also saw a reinvigorated discussion of the Charter of the United Nations and its continuing relevance to the new challenges of the era.
