Introduction

The present volume constitutes the twelfth supplement to the Repertoire of the Practice of the Security Council, 1946-1951, which was issued in 1954. It covers the proceedings of the Security Council from the 3155th meeting, on 7 January 1993, to the 3615th meeting, on 22 December 1995.

The Repertoire was mandated by the General Assembly in its resolution 686 (VII) of 5 December 1952, entitled “Ways and means for making the evidence of customary international law more readily available”. It is a guide to the proceedings of the Council and sets forth in a readily accessible form the practices and procedures to which the Council has had recourse. The Repertoire is not intended as a substitute for the records of the Council, which constitute the only comprehensive and authoritative account of its deliberations.

The categories employed to arrange the material are not intended to suggest the existence of procedures or practices that have not been clearly or demonstrably established by the Council itself. The Council is at all times, within the framework of the Charter of the United Nations, its own provisional rules of procedure, and practice established through notes by the President of the Security Council, master of its own procedure.

In recording the Council’s practice, the headings under which the practices and procedures of the Council were presented in the original volume have been largely retained. Where necessary, however, adjustments have been made to better reflect the Council’s practice. As in the eleventh supplement, the use of double asterisks () to denote topics not considered anew by the Council has been discontinued. For ease of reference, the studies contained in chapter VIII are organized according to region or thematic issues. This introduction contains a table indicating the membership of the Security Council during the period under review.

The agenda items considered by the Council during 1993-1995, and the meetings at which they were considered, are presented in a table hereunder in the order in which the items were initially taken up during the period.

Symbols of United Nations documents are composed of capital letters combined with figures. Prior to 1994, Security Council documents bore a symbol such as S/25492. Beginning in 1994, the year of issuance was incorporated into the document symbol, for example, S/1994/380. References to the verbatim records of meetings of the Council are given in the form S/PV.3181, p. 2, meetings being numbered consequently, starting with the first meeting in 1946. As in previous recent volumes, reference is made in this Supplement only to the provisional verbatim records of Security Council meetings, as the practice of publishing the meeting records in the Official Records has been discontinued.

The resolutions adopted by the Security Council and most of the statements by the President are published in the yearly volumes of Resolutions and Decisions of the Security Council. Resolutions are identified by a number followed by the year of adoption in parentheses, for example, resolution 927 (1994). Statements by the President not included in the yearly volumes are recorded in the relevant verbatim records.

Readers who wish to consult the full record of a meeting or the text of a Security Council document referred to in the Repertoire may do so on the official United Nations Documentation Centre website, www.un.org/en/documents/. Security Council documents can be accessed on the website by selecting “Official Document System (ODS)” or one of the direct links to specific categories of documents. The volumes of resolutions and decisions may be accessed by symbol (S/INF/49, for 1993; S/INF/50, for 1994; and S/INF/51, for 1995). Other volumes of the Repertoire may be consulted at www.un.org/en/sc/repertoire/.

Introductory note

The present chapter contains material bearing upon the practice of the Security Council in relation to the provisional rules of procedure of the Security Council arranged as follows: part I, Meetings (rules 1-5); part II, Representation and credentials (rules 13-17); part III, Presidency (rules 18-20); part IV, Secretariat (rules 21-26); part V, Conduct of business (rules 27-36); part VI, Languages (rules 41-47); part VII, Publicity of meetings, records (rules 48-57).

The practice of the Council in relation to some of the provisional rules of procedure are more appropriately dealt with in other chapters of this Supplement and are arranged as follows: rules 6-12, in chapter II (Agenda); rule 28, in chapter V (Subsidiary organs of the Security Council); rules 37-39, in chapter III (Participation in the proceedings of the Security Council); rule 40, in chapter IV (Voting); rules 58-60, in chapter VII (Practice relative to recommendations to the General Assembly regarding membership in the United Nations); and rule 61, in chapter VI (Relations with other United Nations organs).

As in previous Supplements, the major subheadings contained in this chapter follow the order of the relevant chapters of the provisional rules of procedure of the Security Council, with the exceptions noted above.

The material in this chapter relates to questions that arose regarding the application of a certain rule, especially when there was a discussion regarding variations from the Council's usual practice. The case histories presented here do not constitute cumulative evidence of the practice of the Council, but are indicative of the special problems or issues that have arisen in the proceedings of the Council under its provisional rules of procedure.

During the period under review, the Council did not consider the amendment or adoption of its provisional rules of procedure. Some members of the Council did, however, in their interventions, note the need for the review or updating of the provisional rules of procedure.¹ The Council took a number of steps to improve its working methods and procedure,² which included the publication of the provisional agenda for formal meetings of the Security Council in the United Nations Journal;³ the circulation of the tentative monthly forecast of the Council's programme of work to all Member States;⁴ the decision to make available, as from 1 March 1994, draft resolutions in provisional form to non-members of the Council at the time of the consultations of the whole.⁵ New arrangements were also introduced for consultation and exchange of information with troop-contributing countries.⁶

⁵ S/1994/230 of 28 February 1994.

⁶ S/PRST/1994/62 of 4 November 1994.

Part I Meetings (rules 1-5)

Note

The material assembled in this section reflects the provisions of Article 28 of the Charter, and indicates special instances of the interpretation or application of rules 1 to 5 on the convening and place of Security Council meetings.

During the period under review, there was one case falling under rule 2 (case 1). There were no special instances of the application of rules 1 and 3 to 5.

The practice of the Arria-formula meetings, which was initiated in March 1992 by the then President of the Security Council, Ambassador Diego Arria (Venezuela), continued through the period under consideration. Arria-formula meetings are not formal meetings of the Security Council. They are convened at the initiative of a member or members of the Security Council in order to hear the views of individuals, organizations or institutions on matters within the competence of the Security Council.

The members of the Council continued to meet frequently in the format of informal consultations of the whole.

Special cases concerning the application of rules 1-5

Rule 2

The President shall call a meeting of the Security Council at the request of any member of the Security Council.

By a letter dated 15 April 1993, addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁷ the representative of Turkey, on behalf of the Contact Group on Bosnia and Herzegovina of the Organization of the Islamic Conference,⁸ noted that delaying the adoption of a draft resolution on Bosnia and Herzegovina designed to strengthen sanctions on the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia was inconsistent with the expectations of the international community to pressure the Serbs to sign the peace plan in all its parts. He requested an urgent formal meeting of the Council, with an open debate, so that all non-members might voice their concern over the issue.

At the 3201st meeting, held on 19 April 1993 on the situation in the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina, the representative of Malaysia expressed "serious concern over the actions of certain Council members in obstructing repeated desperate requests for emergency meetings of the Council to address the growing deterioration of the situation in Bosnia". He added that those actions were "tantamount to applying a surreptitious veto".⁹

Part II Representation and credentials (rules 13-17)

Note

Rule 13 of the provisional rules of procedure of the Security Council requires each member of the Council to communicate the credentials of its accredited representative to the Secretary-General not less than twenty-four hours before that representative takes his seat on the Council. In addition, any Member of the United Nations not a member of the Council and any State not a Member of the United Nations, if invited to participate in a meeting or meetings of the Council, must also communicate the credentials of its representative in a like manner to the Secretary-General, in accordance with rule 14. The Secretary-General is required by rule 15 to examine the credentials of the above categories of representatives and to submit a report thereon, certifying that the credentials are in order, to the Security Council for approval. The practice of the Council regarding those rules has been that the credentials of representatives have been communicated to the Secretary-General who submits his report to the Council pursuant to rule 15 when changes in the representation of members of the Council have been made and when, at the beginning of each year, the representatives of the newly elected non-permanent members of the Council are designated. This practice was followed during the period under review.

Special cases concerning the application of rules 13-17

During the period under review, there were no special cases concerning the application of rules 13 to 17. It should be noted, however, that Rwanda, a non-permanent member of the Security Council from 1 January 1994 to 31 December 1995, had no representation in the Council from 14 July to 2 September 1994.

Part III Presidency (rules 18-20)

Note

Part III of the present chapter deals with the proceedings of the Security Council directly related to the Office of the President of the Council. Material relevant to the exercise by the President of his functions in connection with the agenda is dealt with in chapter II. Material pertaining to the exercise by the President of his functions in the conduct of meetings is included in part V of this chapter.

During the period under review, the President of the Security Council, on two separate occasions, made statements which conveyed the decision of the members of the Council to suspend the application of rule 18 of its provisional rules of procedure, which provides for the monthly rotation of the presidency in the English alphabetical order of the names of the members of the Council (case 2).

There were no special instances concerning rule 19, which deals with the conduct of the presidency.

There were two instances of the application of rule 20, which deals with the temporary vacating of the chair by the President (cases 3 and 4).

During the period under review, the members of the Council continued to use informal consultations as a procedure for reaching decisions. On many occasions, the President presented the results of such consultations to the Council in the form of a presidential statement made on behalf of its members, or as a draft resolution, which the Council then adopted in a formal meeting without further debate. On other occasions, the President announced the agreement or consensus in a statement, note or letter circulated as a Council document.

Special cases concerning the application of rules 18-20

The presidency of the Security Council shall be held in turn by the members of the Security Council in the English alphabetical order of their names. Each president shall hold office for one calendar month.

Case 2

At the 3420th meeting, held on 25 August 1994 in connection with the item entitled "Presidency of the Security Council", the President (Russian Federation) read out a statement which conveyed the decision of the Council to suspend rule 18 of the provisional rules of procedure, so as to allow the presidency of the Security Council to be held by Spain in September 1994.¹⁰ It also decided that the timing of Rwanda's presidency would be addressed later.¹¹

¹⁰ S/PRST/1994/48.

¹¹ If the alphabetical order had been strictly adhered to, as required by rule 18, it would have been Rwanda's turn to preside. Rwanda was not represented in the Security Council at the 3406th to 3420th meetings, from 19 July to 25 August 1994. It resumed its participation on 2 September 1994.

At the 3426th meeting, held on 16 September 1994 in connection with the same item, the President (Spain) read out a statement¹² by which the Council had decided to suspend rule 18 so as to allow the presidency to be held in December 1994 by Rwanda, following the holding of the presidency in October 1994 by the United Kingdom and in November 1994 by the United States. It also decided that from January 1995, the presidency would again be held as specified in rule 18, beginning with the member of the Council whose name in the English alphabetical order followed that of the United States.

Whenever the President of the Security Council deems that for the proper fulfilment of the responsibilities of the presidency he should not preside over the Council during the consideration of a particular question with which the member he represents is directly connected, he shall indicate his decision to the Council. The presidential chair shall then devolve, for the purpose of the consideration of that question, on the representative of the member next in English alphabetical order, it being understood that the provisions of this rule shall apply to the representatives on the Security Council called upon successively to preside. This rule shall not affect the representative capacity of the President as stated in rule 19, or his duties under rule 7.

Case 3

At the 3309th meeting, held on 10 November 1993 in connection with the election of five members of the International Court of Justice, the President of the Security Council (Cape Verde) stated that, for reasons known to all members of the Security Council,¹³ he had considered the possibility of applying rule 20 of the provisional rules of procedure. He quoted rule 20 and noted that the decision whether or not to vacate the chair was entirely within the discretion of the President. After fully considering the exceptional circumstances of the case, he decided to step aside and not to preside over the Council during its proceedings in connection with the above-mentioned item. Consequently, in accordance with rule 20, he invited the President for the next month, China, to preside over the meeting.¹⁴

Case 4

At the 3481st meeting, held on 15 December 1994 in connection with the situation concerning Rwanda, the President of the Security Council (Rwanda) after quoting rule 20 of the provisional rules of procedure, noted that that provision placed the matter entirely within the discretion of the President. Having considered the matter, he decided to exercise the discretion given to him under rule 20 and to vacate the chair. Consequently, in accordance with rule 20 and bearing in mind the Council's decision of 16 September 1994 (S/PRST/1994/55),¹⁵ he invited the representative of Argentina to occupy the chair for the purpose of the consideration of the item.¹⁶

Part IV Secretariat (rules 21-26)

Note

Part IV relates to rules 21 to 26 of the provisional rules of procedure, which set out the specific functions and powers of the Secretary-General in connection with the meetings of the Security Council.¹⁷ These rules reflect the provisions of Article 98 of the Charter insofar as they concern the requirements of the Security Council.

¹⁷ Under rule 24 the Secretary-General provides not only the staff required to service meetings of the Council, but also makes available staff for subsidiary organs of the Council both at Headquarters and in the field.

There were no special instances of the application of rules 21 to 26 during the period under review.

Instances where the Secretary-General was requested or authorized to carry out other functions are dealt with in chapter VI (Relations with other United Nations organs).

Part V Conduct of business (rules 27-36)

Note

Part V sets out the cases bearing on rules 27 and 29 to 36. Material relating to rule 28 can be found in chapter V (Subsidiary organs of the Security Council). Material relating to rules 37 to 39 is more appropriately included in chapter III (Participation in the proceedings of the Security Council).

As in previous volumes of the Repertoire, the cases assembled here are indicative of the special problems or issues that arose in the application of the rules on the conduct of business, rather than the routine practice of the Council. They relate to such matters as:

(a) Rule 27, on the order of intervention in the debate (case 5);

(b) Rule 32, on the order of precedence of principal motions and draft resolutions, including requests for separate voting on parts of a motion or a draft resolution (cases 6 and 7);

(c) Rule 33, on the suspension and adjournment of meetings (case 8).

During the period under review there were no special instances of the application of rules 27, 29, 30, 31, 34, 35 and 36.

The provisional rules of procedure of the Security Council do not contain a rule permitting the President to call speakers to order if their remarks are not relevant to the item under discussion, nor do they contain a provision for the “right of reply”.¹⁸ However, in three instances, during the period under review, representatives made references to their “right of reply”.¹⁹ In two of those instances, the President explicitly extended an invitation to a representative of a State or of an Observer to exercise his “right of reply”.²⁰

Special cases concerning the application of rules 27-36

Rule 27

The President shall call upon representatives in the order in which they signify their desire to speak.

Case 5

At the 3607th meeting, held on 15 December 1995 in connection with the situation in the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina, the President of the Council (Russian Federation) stated that in view of the exceptional importance of the entry into force as soon as possible of the draft resolution under consideration at that meeting, members of the Council had agreed, in the course of its prior consultations, that the representatives of the three countries whose Presidents had signed in Paris the Peace Agreements on Bosnia and Herzegovina²¹ would speak first, followed by a vote on the draft resolution. The representatives of other countries that had expressed the desire to speak in the course of the discussion of the agenda item would then be called upon to speak. He expressed, on behalf of the Council members, the hope that Member States concerned would show understanding of the proposed procedure.²² Following the statements by the representatives of Bosnia and Herzegovina, Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro), the President gave the floor to Council members who wished to speak before the vote. Following the vote, he gave the floor to those members who wished to make statements following the vote. He then gave the floor to non-members.

Rule 32

Principal motions and draft resolutions shall have precedence in the order of their submissions.

Parts of a motion or of a draft resolution shall be voted on separately at the request of any representative, unless the original mover objects.

Case 6

At the 3351st meeting, held on 18 March 1994 in connection with the situation in the occupied Arab territories, the President of the Council (France) stated that a paragraph-by-paragraph vote on the draft resolution had been requested.²³ There was no objection. Following a separate vote on each paragraph, all paragraphs were adopted unanimously, except for preambular paragraphs 2 and 6, which were both adopted by 14 votes in favour and 1 abstention. In the absence of any objection, the draft resolution as a whole was adopted without a vote, as resolution 904 (1994). The representative of the United States of America stated that her delegation supported the operative paragraphs of the resolution just adopted. However, it had sought a paragraph-by-paragraph vote in order to record its objections to language introduced there. She stated that, had that language appeared in the operative paragraphs, her delegation would have exercised its veto. Instead, her Government had chosen to disavow the language and express its opposition by abstaining on the second and sixth preambular paragraphs.²⁴

Case 7

At the 3377th meeting, held on 16 May 1994 in connection with the situation concerning Rwanda, the President of the Council (Nigeria) stated that a separate vote on section B of the draft resolution had been requested.²⁵ There was no objection. Following a separate vote on section B of the draft resolution, that section was adopted by 14 votes in favour and 1 against.²⁶ The rest of the draft was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously. The President declared that since all of the sections of the draft resolution as orally revised in its provisional form had been adopted, the draft resolution as a whole had been adopted as resolution 918 (1994).

The following motions shall have precedence in the order named over all principal motions and draft resolutions relative to the subject before the meeting:

- 1. To suspend the meeting;*
- 2. To adjourn the meeting;*
- 3. To adjourn the meeting to a certain day or hour;*
- 4. To refer any matter to a committee, to the Secretary-General or to a rapporteur;*
- 5. To postpone discussion of the question to a certain day or indefinitely; or*
- 6. To introduce an amendment.*

Any motion for the suspension or for the simple adjournment of the meeting shall be decided without debate.

Case 8

While there was no instance of a motion to suspend the meeting pursuant to rule 33 of the provisional rules of procedure, in one case the Security Council members, after consultations among themselves, decided to suspend the meeting in the absence of a delegation. At the 3594th meeting, held on 16 November 1995 in connection with the question concerning Haiti, the President of the Council (Oman), announced on behalf of the Council its decision to suspend the meeting in the absence of a delegation. However, this suspension lasted for four minutes and the meeting was promptly resumed.

²⁶ Rwanda voted against.

Part VI Languages (rules 41-47)

During the period under review, there were no special cases concerning the application of rules 41 to 47.

Part VII Publicity of meetings, records (rules 48-57)

Note

Rule 48 provides that, unless it decides otherwise, the Security Council shall meet in public.

In accordance with rule 49, the verbatim records of each meeting are made available in the working languages to the representatives on the Security Council, as well as to the representatives of any other States that participated in the meeting. A note is incorporated in copies of the record showing the time and date of distribution. Corrections are requested in writing, in quadruplicate, within three working days, to be submitted in the same language as the text to which they refer. These corrections are included, in the absence of any objection, in the Official Record of the meeting, which is printed and distributed as soon as possible after the time limit for correction.

During the period under review, the Security Council engaged in a discussion on rule 48 following a proposal made by France on the working methods of the Council (case 9).²⁷ In addition, through a note by the President of 30 June 1993 concerning the annual report of the Security Council to the General Assembly, the Council decided that henceforth, the draft report should be adopted at a public meeting of the Security Council.²⁸ Prior to the issuance of that note, the draft report had been adopted at a private meeting.

During the period under review, there were no special instances of the application of rules 49 to 54, 56 and 57.

The members of the Council continued to meet frequently in the format of informal consultations of the whole.

²⁸ S/26015, para. 5. For further discussion of the annual report of the Security Council, see chapter 6, part I, section E.

Rule 48

Unless it decides otherwise, the Security Council shall meet in public. Any recommendation to the General Assembly regarding the appointment of the Secretary-General shall be discussed and decided at a private meeting.

Case 9

By letter dated 9 November 1994 addressed to the Secretary-General,²⁹ the representative of France transmitted an aide-mémoire concerning the working methods of the Security Council. In his letter, he referred to the statement of the French Foreign Minister to the General Assembly in which he had expressed the wish for the Security Council to increase its reliance on public debate in reaching its decisions. The aide-mémoire set out the grounds for the French initiative and indicated the modalities through which it might be implemented. The proposal, aimed at ensuring greater transparency in the work of the Council, stipulated the addition of “two new cases in which the Council should meet in public”,³⁰ apart from the only case then applicable. To that end, France proposed that the Council should meet more often in public to hold:

(a) Orientation debates open to all Members of the Organization at a time when the Council was preparing to begin consideration of an important question;

(b) Public exchanges of views between members of the Council (where non-members of the Council could attend but not speak).

France identified rule 48 as being key to the problem and in that context believed that there should be “a dividing line between information, consultation and general exchanges of views, which should, in principle, remain public, and negotiation, the detailed preparation of a decision to be adopted, which is normally governed by other procedures”.³¹

At the 3483rd meeting, held on 16 December 1994³² on Security Council working methods and procedure, the representative of France, introduced the above-mentioned aide-mémoire. He observed that there was “a certain uneasiness in relations between the Security Council and Members of the United Nations”³³ due largely to the fact that informal consultations had become the Council’s characteristic working method, while public meetings, originally the norm, were increasingly rare and devoid of content. He stated that all of the Council’s work took place behind closed doors, without observers and without a written record, and viewed that practice as a dangerous departure which ran counter to rule 48. He stressed that public meetings were the rule and non-public meetings the exception. He noted that informal meetings were not real Council meetings, had no official existence, and were assigned no number. Yet, it was in those meetings that the Council’s work was carried out. He recommended that a balance should be restored between official meetings and informal consultations. He further stated that his delegation’s sole objective in having made the proposal before the Council was “to reinstate the conditions for that indispensable trust” between the Security Council and the Members of the United Nations.³⁴

The representative of the United Kingdom, while welcoming the opportunity to discuss the proposal on Security Council working methods, noted that the desire to enhance the flow of information and the exchange of views between the Security Council and the General Assembly lay behind the Council’s decision of June 1993 to establish an informal working group on documentation and other procedural matters. He stressed that that working group had met regularly and a number of important steps had been taken following recommendations made by it.³⁵

The measures proposed by France were viewed by many representatives as being a step additional to those measures already taken by the Council towards reforming its working methods and achieving greater transparency.³⁶ The representative of Spain stated that the series of decisions taken by the Council were ultimately aimed at creating, in a pragmatic and flexible manner, greater transparency and flexibility in the work of the Council. All that led to an increase in the legitimacy and credibility of the Security Council in the eyes of Member States on whose behalf the Council acted, in accordance with Article 24 of the Charter and, ultimately, to greater effectiveness of its decisions.³⁷

Speakers at the meeting viewed positively the initiative of the Council to hold an open debate on the question of the working methods and procedure of the Security Council in order to consider the French proposal for more frequent open meetings of the Council, and many were supportive of the thrust of the French proposal,³⁸ although some delegations expressed some degree of caution.³⁹

There was broad agreement with France’s assessment of the need for more frequent open meetings of the Council, which would contribute to enhancing the transparency and efficiency of its work.⁴⁰ Concern was expressed by a number of representatives regarding the existing mechanisms for decision-making resorted to by the Council, which had resulted in such decisions being taken in informal consultations, in secrecy, without the Council having had the benefit of the views of the Members of the Organization, in particular, those States directly concerned with the situation before the Council. It was felt that open meetings would enable those States, in particular, to contribute effectively to the final outcome of the Council's deliberations on the issue, as well as provide an opportunity for an exchange of views between Council members and non-members.

In that regard, some representatives referred to Articles 31 and 32 of the Charter of the United Nations which provide for a State whose interests are affected or who is a party to a dispute before the Council to participate without vote in its discussions. They saw these Articles as mandating the participation in the Council's discussions by States affected by the issue before the Council. The representative of New Zealand stated, regarding Article 32, that there was no question of discretion, and that it was not a matter that the Security Council could refuse. The term "discussion" in that context implied participation in the formulation of the conclusions, and at "stages prior to finalization".⁴¹ The representative of Argentina stated that the existing practice of formal debates held after the adoption of decisions taken in informal consultations could harm the parties to the conflict, as they "must then delegate to another State — a member of the Council — the task of defending their position". He noted that the situation became worse when one party was a member of the Council and the other was not, and suggested that the situation could be remedied by inviting the parties to participate in the formal meetings and also, to a certain extent and with corresponding limitations, in the informal consultations.⁴² The representative of Australia stated that, in addition to the public meetings identified in the French proposal, there might be the need "to explore other, more flexible means for securing discussion and a level of participation of Member States especially affected by a situation under consideration by the Council, as envisaged under Article 31 of the Charter".⁴³

In referring to the need for consultations between the Council and non-members, the representative of Indonesia further cited Article 50 of the Charter which confers upon a State confronted by special economic problems arising from the carrying out of preventive or enforcement measures taken against any State by the Council the right to consult with the Security Council with regard to a solution of those problems. He stated that the non-aligned countries wished to underscore the need to make Article 50 operational and, in that regard, it was necessary to institutionalize the consultations envisaged in that Article as well as to adopt other effective measures to enable non-members that had the right to do so to consult with the Council with regard to those problems.⁴⁴

There was also some dissatisfaction expressed regarding the procedure whereby Member States were afforded the opportunity to speak to the Council only after decisions had been taken in closed-door informal consultations. In that regard, a number of delegations stated that the public meetings should provide an opportunity for real dialogue. The open orientation debates at the early stage of consideration of a matter by the Council would provide an opportunity for Council members to hear the views of the general membership, in particular, those States most concerned.⁴⁵ Some speakers also saw open meetings in the context of ensuring accountability by the Council to Member States.⁴⁶

In supporting the need for more open meetings of the Council, a number of delegations cited Article 24 of the Charter which provides, inter alia, that the Security Council acts on behalf of the States Members of the United Nations. They saw this Article as requiring closer interaction between the Council and the general membership of the United Nations. The representative of Australia noted the necessity for the Council to be responsive to the views of Member States and saw Article 24 as envisaging "a two-way flow of information", not only from the Council to the wider membership but also into the Council from the whole community it served.⁴⁷ The representative of Indonesia stressed that reliance on public meetings in reaching decisions in the Council was of particular importance since, pursuant to Article 24, paragraph 1, of the Charter, the Council acted on behalf of the entire membership and was therefore accountable to it. He further noted the need for effective consultations with the general membership before decisions were taken that would be binding on them.⁴⁸

In addition to citing Article 24, the representative of Turkey also referred to Article 25, by which the Members of the United Nations had agreed to accept and carry out the decisions of the Security Council. He stated that the authority of the Security Council emanated from the fact that it acted on behalf of all the Members of the United Nations and, for that reason, it was essential that its decisions be in accord with the views of the general membership. He referred, further, to the provisions of paragraph 4 of Article 1 of the Charter which listed “harmonizing the actions of nations” as being among the purposes of the United Nations. He stated that a credible and workable mechanism for dialogue between the Council and the general membership should be devised.⁴⁹

Regarding the relationship between the Council and the General Assembly, the representative of Indonesia referred to Article 12 of the Charter, which governs that relationship in the context of the exercise by the Security Council of the functions assigned to it in the Charter. He stated that the provisions contained in Article 12 should be made more liberal and that, in that connection, the authority and credibility of the Council would profit from ascertaining that there was a broad consensus of the general membership of the United Nations, as represented in the General Assembly, on a particular course of action proposed by the Council.

A note of caution was sounded, however, that unless the proposed procedure for the more frequent convening of open meetings was carefully managed, there was the possibility that the idea of an open meeting prior to informal consultations could become counterproductive if it became an occasion for aggrieved parties to play out their differences and thereby detract from the effective conduct of the business of the Council, whose primary objective was to advance the peaceful resolution of conflicts.⁵⁰

Several speakers underlined the importance of the format of informal consultations, in which a great part of the work of the Council was conducted, given the need for confidentiality in decision-making and in the achievement of consensus. They called for the retention of this format of meetings, and also highlighted the need to strike the right balance between official meetings and informal consultations,⁵¹ as well as between publicity and transparency on the one hand and effectiveness and efficiency on the other.⁵² There was some disagreement with the analysis contained in the French aide-mémoire that informal consultations had no official existence. The representative of New Zealand noted that to say that they have no legal existence did not, of itself, make that correct, and observed that informal consultations were listed under the Journal heading “scheduled meetings” and, further, that mandated legal action actually took place in those meetings.⁵³ The representative of Argentina stated that, strictly speaking, informal meetings were not actual meetings, although that view may be sustained from a purely formal and legalistic point of view. He also stated that the provisional rules of procedure of the Security Council, which were the norm, the standard, should always be interpreted in a reasonably broad way, particularly in the light of Article 30 of the Charter.⁵⁴

Regarding the determination of whether an open meeting should be convened, some delegations agreed with France that such a decision was to be made on a case-by-case basis,⁵⁵ with there being no automaticity in the convening of such meetings. While viewing the idea contained in France’s proposal as a further important step in the Security Council’s efforts to reform its working methods and procedures in order to make them more transparent, the representative of the United States recalled that it was important for the Council to proceed cautiously when it decided how to structure its consideration of each matter before it. The form of Council deliberations should not compromise its functions, which remained to achieve agreement in an expeditious manner on matters before it. With that proviso, that delegation looked forward to pursuing opportunities, on a case-by-case basis, to employ public meetings in the Council's consideration of its work.⁵⁶ An alternative view was expressed that automatically holding open meetings at the beginning of the consideration of a new issue, without discrimination, should become a matter of course in the Council.⁵⁷

In a presidential statement issued at the conclusion of the meeting, the Security Council stated its intention, as part of its efforts to improve the flow of information and the exchange of ideas between members of the Council and other Member States, that there should be an increased recourse to open meetings, in particular at an early stage in its consideration of a subject.⁵⁸ The Council agreed that it would decide on a case-by-case basis when to schedule public meetings of that sort.

The present chapter concerns the interpretation and application of rules 6 to 12 of the provisional rules of procedure of the Security Council, relating to the agenda. The chapter is divided into three parts: part I, The provisional agenda (rules 6-8 and rule 12); part II, Adoption of the agenda (rule 9); and part III, The agenda and matters of which the Security Council is seized (rules 10 and 11).

Part I provides information concerning the circulation, preparation and communication of the provisional agenda (rules 6-8 and rule 12). No material was found requiring treatment under rules 6, 8 and 12. One case study is included concerning the preparation of the agenda under rule 7 (case 1).

Part II relates to material on the procedure and practice of the Security Council in connection with the adoption of the agenda.

Part III relates to the list of matters of which the Council is seized. Action was, however, taken by the Council during the period under review relating to rule 11. Section B contains two case studies on the deletion of items from the agenda of the Security Council (cases 2 and 3). The tables in section B supplement the tables contained in previous volumes of the Repertoire and indicate the changes that have since occurred in the list of matters of which the Security Council is seized.

Part I

The provisional agenda (rules 6-8 and 12)

Note

The provisional agenda, prepared by the Secretary-General and approved by the President of the Security Council in accordance with rule 7, includes those items that have been brought to the attention of the Council under rule 6. Under rule 6, “the Secretary-General shall immediately bring to the attention of all representatives on the Security Council all communications from States, organs of the United Nations, or the Secretary-General concerning any matter for the consideration of the Security Council in accordance with the provisions of the Charter”. Effect is normally given to this rule by the distribution of communications as documents in the S/ series. During the period under review, there were no instances in which the question of circulation of communications arose. Communications from regional arrangements or agencies received pursuant to Article 54 of the Charter are also circulated in the S/ series of documents.

Rule 7 entrusts the drawing up of the provisional agenda for each meeting to the Secretary-General, subject to the approval of the President of the Security Council. The Secretary-General’s discretion with respect to the inclusion of new items is restricted to those items that have been brought to the attention of the Council under rule 6. In addition to the express provisions of rule 7, the Secretary-General also has to take into account whether a specific request to include the item has been made. During the period under review, there was one instance in which a Member State that had requested the consideration by the Council of an issue as a formal agenda item commented on its request in a subsequent meeting of the Security Council (case 1).

Rule 8 concerns communication of the provisional agenda and rule 12, paragraph 1, concerns such communication for periodic meetings.

A. Preparation of the provisional agenda (rule 7)

Rule 7

The provisional agenda for each meeting of the Security Council shall be drawn up by the Secretary-

General and approved by the President of the Security Council.

Only items which have been brought to the attention of the representatives on the Security Council in accordance with rule 6, items covered by rule 10, or matters which the Security Council had previously decided to defer, may be included in the provisional agenda.

At the 3212th meeting, on 11 May 1993, the Council considered, inter alia, the question of non-compliance by the Democratic People’s Republic of Korea with the Agreement between itself and the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) concerning the Application of Safeguards in Connection with the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons.¹

At the outset of the meeting, the representative of the Democratic People’s Republic of Korea reminded the members of the Council that he had officially requested the Council, through its President, to consider the issue of the abuse of the Safeguards Agreement by IAEA at a meeting of the Security Council “if it is convened to consider the issues of implementation of the Safeguards Agreement between the Democratic People’s Republic of Korea and IAEA”.² He expressed the hope that his request would be “considered as a formal agenda item, in accordance with the relevant provisions of the United Nations Charter and the provisional rules of procedure of the Security Council”.³

³ See S/PV.3212, p. 7.

During the period under review, the issue raised by the Democratic People's Republic of Korea was not considered as a formal agenda item by the Security Council.

B. Communication of the provisional agenda (rule 8)

The provisional agenda for a meeting shall be communicated by the Secretary-General to the representatives on the Security Council at least three days before the meeting, but in urgent circumstances it may be communicated simultaneously with the notice of the meeting.

The provisional agenda for each ordinary meeting of the Security Council is drawn up by the Secretary-General and, after approval by the President, it is communicated to members at least three days before the meeting. In practice, however, in urgent circumstances, which are often the case, the provisional agenda may be communicated simultaneously with the notice of the meeting. In addition, the provisional agenda is usually approved in advance in informal consultations and formally adopted at the meeting of the Council.

During the period under review, the practice of the Council with respect to its agenda evolved. In a note by the President of the Security Council dated 30 June 1993, the President noted that the members of the Security Council had agreed on a proposal to include the provisional agenda for formal meetings in the Journal, provided that it had been approved in informal consultations.⁴ In addition, by a presidential statement dated 4 November 1994, the President referred to the decision of the Council that "the time and venue of each meeting with members of the Council and troop-contributors to a peacekeeping operation should, where possible, appear in advance in the Journal of the United Nations".⁵ During the period under review, the Council also began the practice of posting the agenda of informal consultations in the Journal.

Part II Adoption of the agenda (rule 9)

Rule 9

The first item of the provisional agenda for each meeting of the Security Council shall be the adoption of the agenda.

Note

During the period under review, there was no instance involving discussion by the Council regarding the adoption of the agenda. However, on a number of occasions the President of the Council made preliminary remarks before the adoption of the agenda. This was in accordance with past practice and included expressions of thanks, congratulations, tributes and expressions of sympathy.⁶

During the period under review, the Council considered ways of improving the list of matters of which it was seized (see part III of the present chapter). A note by the President of the Council dated 29 November 1993 addressed the issue of the phrasing of items on the agenda.⁷ It stated that the members of the Council had recalled "the desirability, whenever possible, of using descriptive formulations of agenda items at the time of their initial adoption to avoid having a number of separate agenda items on the same subject. When such a descriptive formulation existed, consideration might be given to subsuming earlier agenda items on the same subject under the descriptive formulation”.⁸

⁸ See also S/PV. 3611. At its meeting held on 20 December 1995 to consider the item entitled “An agenda for peace: peacekeeping”, the Council considered a letter dated 8 December 1995 (S/1995/1025) from 34 Member States, including 9 members of the Security Council, in which they requested that a meeting be convened to examine specifically the issue of consultations between the Security Council and the troop-contributing countries in order to consider further measures to enhance arrangements for such consultations. The representative of Spain, commenting on the phrasing of the item, noted that the subject being discussed, curiously enough, did not explicitly appear in the agenda for that meeting.

Part III

The agenda and matters of which the Security Council is seized (rules 10 and 11)

A. Continuation of discussion of agenda items (rule 10)

Any item of the agenda of a meeting of the Security Council, consideration of which has not been completed at that meeting, shall, unless the Security Council otherwise decides, automatically be included in the agenda of the next meeting.

Rule 10 of the provisional rules of procedure was designed to enable the Security Council to continue, at its next meeting, the consideration of an item of unfinished business without subjecting that item to renewed debate in connection with the adoption of the agenda. On a number of occasions, separate consecutive meetings were held on the same agenda item. In other instances, the meeting was suspended and resumed until the Council had completed that stage of its consideration of the item.⁹

⁹ See, for example, the 3168th meeting, on the situation in Angola, held on 29 January 1993, suspended and resumed on the same day; the 3282nd meeting on the question concerning Haiti, held on 23 September 1993, suspended and resumed on the same day; the 3454th meeting on the situation in the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina, held on 8 November 1994, suspended and resumed the following day; the 3492nd meeting on an agenda for peace, held on 18 January 1995, suspended and renewed the same day, then suspended again and resumed the following day; and the 3611th meeting on an agenda for peace: peacekeeping, held on 20 December 1995, suspended and resumed on the same day.

B. Retention and deletion of items from the list of matters of which the Security Council is seized (rule 11)

The Secretary-General shall communicate each week to the representatives on the Security Council a summary statement of matters of which the Security Council is seized and of the stage reached in their consideration.

In previous volumes of the Repertoire, it was noted that items on the agenda of the Council had remained on the Secretary-General’s “summary statement of matters of which the Security Council is seized” (rule 11) when the tenor of the Council’s discussion or its specific decisions revealed a continuing concern with the matter. Additional evidence supporting such retention was provided when the President of the Council announced, upon conclusion of the debate, that the Council remained seized of a question.

During the period under review, as part of the efforts to improve the documentation of the Security Council, the members of the Council reviewed the list of matters of which the Council was seized and decided to remove 105 items from that list after extensive consideration and appropriate consultation by the informal working group concerning the Council’s documentation and other procedural questions. This decision was conveyed in two notes by the President of the Council dated, respectively, 29 November 1993 and 28 July 1994.¹⁰ The note dated 29 November 1993 also stated, inter alia, that neither the removal of a matter from the list nor its retention carried any implication for the substance of the matter, and that the Council might at any time decide to include any matter in the agenda of a meeting of the Council, whether or not it was included in the list.

1. Proceedings of the Security Council regarding the retention and deletion of items from the list of matters of which it is seized

In practice, deletion of an item takes place following a request addressed to the Secretary-General by the Member States parties to the issue in question. Such a request is brought to the attention of the members of the Council in an informal communication seeking their consent to the deletion of the item. In the absence of any objection on the part of the members of the Council, the Secretary-General deletes the item in question from the annual list of matters of which the Council is seized. Items may also be deleted with the consent of the Council, on the initiative of the President or individual members of the Council or by a decision at the close of a debate.

The tables set out in subsection 2 of this part show that, during the period under review, the Council included 61 new items in the list of matters of which it was seized and deleted 108 items, including 105 items mentioned in the two notes by the President of the Security Council dated respectively 29 November 1993 and 28 July 1994. Of the deleted items, one was deleted by the Secretary-General, with the consent of the Council, pursuant to a request by a Member State.¹¹

At its 3312th meeting, on 11 November 1993, the Security Council included in its agenda an item entitled "Letters dated 20 and 23 December 1991, from France, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the United States of America (S/23306,

S/23307, S/23308, S/23309 and S/23317)".¹² The President stated that, as agreed in the Council's prior consultations, the formulation of the item on the agenda which had just been adopted would overtake the two earlier formulations under which the same item had been discussed.¹³ Since those two items had been subsumed under the item just adopted, they would accordingly be deleted from the list of matters of which the Security Council was seized.

At its 3393rd meeting, on 27 June 1994, the Council concluded its consideration of the agenda item entitled "The question of South Africa" and, in accordance with paragraph 4 of resolution 930 (1994), adopted at the same meeting, decided to remove that item from the list of matters of which the Council was seized.¹⁴

2. Retention and deletion of items from the list of matters of which the Security Council is seized

The tables contained in this section supplement those contained in the previous volumes of the Repertoire and indicate the changes that have occurred in the list of matters of which the Council is seized. Table A indicates items added to the list of matters of which the Council was seized during the period 1993-1995; table B indicates items appearing on previous lists for which new action by the Security Council was reported in the summary statements during that period; and table C indicates items deleted from the list during the same period.

The two earlier formulations were: "Letters dated 20 and 23 December 1991" and "(a) Letters dated 20 and 23 December 1991; (b) Report by the Secretary-General pursuant to paragraph 4 of Security Council resolution 731 (1992); (c) Further report by the Secretary-General pursuant to paragraph 4 of Security Council resolution 731 (1992)".

¹¹ Pursuant to the request contained in a letter dated 15 September 1993 from the Permanent Representative of Venezuela to the United Nations, the Secretary-General, with the consent of the Security Council, removed the item entitled "Letter dated 2 April 1992 from the Permanent Representative of Venezuela to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council" (see S/1994/20, para. 5).

This chapter deals with the Security Council's practice in extending invitations to participate in its proceedings. Part I concerns the basis on which invitations were extended. Part II concerns procedures relating to the participation of invited States and individuals after an invitation has been extended.

Articles 31 and 32 of the Charter and rules 37 and 39 of the provisional rules of procedure of the Security Council provide for invitations to be extended to non-members of the Security Council in the following circumstances: (a) when a Member of the United Nations brings a dispute or situation to the attention of the Council in accordance with Article 35 (1) of the Charter (rule 37); (b) when a Member of the United Nations or a State that is not a member of the United Nations is "a party to a dispute" (Article 32); (c) when the interests of a Member of the United Nations are "specially affected" (Article 31 and rule 37); and (d) when "members of the Secretariat or other persons" are invited to supply information or give other assistance (rule 39). Only in the second instance ((b) above) does the Security Council have an obligation to extend an invitation.

In practice, in extending invitations, the Council has continued to refrain from referring explicitly to the relevant Charter articles. It has continued to make no distinction between a complaint involving a "dispute" within the meaning of Article 32, a "situation", or a matter of another nature. Invitations during the period 1993-1995 were usually extended "under the relevant provisions of the Charter" and either rule 37 or rule 39 of the Council's provisional rules of procedure. The classification of invitations in part I reflects this practice. It is based on the relevant rules of procedure where this was indicated. Those instances in which the Council decided to extend invitations to participate in its proceedings without pronouncing itself on the basis for such invitations are treated separately. Part II, on procedures relating to participation, includes two cases related, respectively, to the duration of participation and to limitations on a matter to be discussed by invited representatives.

Part I

Basis of invitations to participate

Note

The Council's practice in connection with the extension of invitations is dealt with in this part in four sections. Section A deals with invitations extended under rule 37 of the Council's provisional rules of procedure, which was the basis on which Member States not members of the Council were invited to participate in the Council's proceedings. The section describes the Council's general practice in this regard. Section B considers the Council's practice in extending invitations under rule 39. This was the basis on which "members of the Secretariat or other persons" were invited to provide the Council with information or other assistance. The category "members of the Secretariat" is self-explanatory. The section focuses, therefore, on identifying the "other persons" invited to participate under rule 39. They included the following: (1) representatives of United Nations organs, subsidiary bodies, and agencies;¹ (2) representatives of regional and other international organizations; and (3) other individuals.

Section C concerns those invitations that were not expressly extended under either rule 37 or rule 39. Such invitations were issued to two individuals. This practice is described in two case studies. Section D relates to requests for invitations denied or not acted upon and includes three case studies.

Any Member of the United Nations which is not a member of the Security Council may be invited, as the result of a decision of the Security Council, to participate, without vote, in the discussion of any question brought before the Security Council when the Security Council considers that the interests of that Member are specially affected, or when a Member brings a matter to the attention of the Security Council in accordance with Article 35 (1) of the Charter.

During the period under consideration, States Members of the United Nations not members of the Security Council that were invited to participate in the Council's proceedings were usually invited "under the relevant provisions of the Charter and rule 37 of the Council's provisional rules of procedure", without explicit reference being made to the relevant Charter articles.

In practice, such invitations are usually extended as a matter of course and without discussion. They are requested in letters from the State concerned addressed to the President of the Council. The President informs the Council at the beginning or during the course of its meetings of the receipt of such letters and proposes that, with the consent of the Council, the invitations be extended. Usually, there being no objection, it is so decided. A table showing invitations extended under rule 37 is contained in annex I to the present chapter.

B. Invitations extended under rule 39 (members of the Secretariat or other persons)

The Security Council may invite members of the Secretariat or other persons, whom it considers competent for the purpose, to supply it with information or to give other assistance in examining matters within its competence.

During the period under review, the Security Council continued its practice of extending invitations under rule 39 to a wide range of individuals to participate in its proceedings, to brief it on issues under consideration. During this period, members of the Secretariat were invited on three occasions to participate and to give explanatory statements in connection with the item entitled "Consideration of the draft report of the Security Council to the General Assembly".²

The "other persons" invited to participate under rule 39 included the following:

- (a) Representatives of United Nations organs, subsidiary bodies or agencies;¹
- (b) Representatives of regional or other international organizations;
- (c) Other individuals.

These invitations are recorded in annex II.

Some general aspects of the Council's practice under rule 39 may be noted. Invitations to representatives of subsidiary bodies were extended as a matter of course and without any formal discussion. Letters of request from the body concerned were read into the record of the meeting by the President of the Council and were not issued as official documents of the Security Council. In the case of invitations to representatives of regional or other international organizations, the requests were made by a Member State on behalf of the proposed participant, and invariably granted without any formal discussion. Other individuals, too, were invited at the request of a Member State with the exception of Mr. Cyrus Vance, Co-Chairman of the Steering Committee of the International Conference on the Former Yugoslavia, who was invited directly by the President (Pakistan) with the consent of the Council.

C. Invitations not expressly extended under rule 37 or rule 39

During the period under review, there were several instances of the Council extending an invitation to participate in its proceedings without referring to either rule 37 or 39: it did so in inviting the Permanent Observer of Palestine (case 1); and Ambassador Djokic and Mr. Jovanovic, both representatives of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro), at a time when that State was not a Member of the United

Nations (case 2).³ Invitations not expressly extended under rule 37 or rule 39 are recorded in annex III.

At the 3340th meeting, held on 28 February 1994 to consider the situation in the occupied Arab territories, the President informed the Council that he had received a letter dated 26 February 1994 from the Permanent Observer of Palestine to the United Nations requesting that, in accordance with its previous practice, the Security Council invite the Permanent Observer of Palestine to participate in the debate.⁴ The President stated that he proposed, with the consent of the Council, to invite the Permanent Observer of Palestine to participate in the debate "in accordance with the rules of procedure and previous practice" in that regard. There being no objection, it was so decided. Previously, such requests had been explicitly granted "not under rule 37 or rule 39, but with the same rights of participation as under rule 37", a formula which had led to a procedural vote in each instance. Invitations were thereafter extended, throughout the period under review, to the Permanent Observer of Palestine, on his direct request and "in accordance with the rules of procedure and previous practice" in that regard.

At the 3174th meeting, held on 19 February 1993 in connection with the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina, the President (Morocco) stated that he had received a request dated 19 February 1993 from ³ By its resolution 777 (1992) of 19 September 1992, the Security Council stated that it considered that the State formerly known as the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia had ceased to exist; and that the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) could not continue automatically the membership of the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia in the United Nations. The Council therefore recommended to the General Assembly that it decide that the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) should apply for membership in the United Nations and that it should not participate in the work of the General Assembly. On 22 September 1992, the General Assembly adopted resolution 47/1 by which it decided that the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) should apply for membership and that it should not participate in the work of the General Assembly.

Ambassador Dragomir Djokic to address the Council. He continued: "With the consent of the Council, I would propose to invite him to address the Council in the course of the discussion of the item before it".⁵ The representative of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) sat behind the nameplate "Yugoslavia".⁶ During the period under consideration, subsequent invitations to the representatives of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro), Mr. Dragomir Djokovic and Mr. Vladislav Jovanovic, to participate in the Council's discussion were extended on the basis of the same formula. On a number of occasions, the representatives of Bosnia and Herzegovina and Croatia, respectively, expressed doubts and discontent about the right granted to the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia to participate in the Council's discussions.⁷

D. Requests for invitations denied or not acted upon

No request from a Member State for an invitation to participate in the proceedings of the Security Council was formally denied during the period under consideration. However, such requests were not acted upon in circumstances where the Security Council had discussed the agenda item in the course of prior consultations (case 3) or did not hold a formal meeting pursuant to a request of a Member State (case 4) or had agreed that no statements would be delivered during the discussion of an item (case 6). In another instance, Member States did not press their respective requests for invitations, following an appeal by the President of the Security Council (case 5).

⁶ The Legal Counsel stated in his explanatory letter (A/47/485, annex) that General Assembly resolution 47/1 "neither terminates nor suspends Yugoslavia's membership in the Organization. Consequently, the seat and nameplate remain as before, but in Assembly bodies representatives of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) cannot sit behind the sign Yugoslavia ... The resolution does not take away the right of Yugoslavia to participate in the work of organs other than Assembly bodies".

By a letter dated 27 May 1994 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁸ the representative of Uganda requested that an urgent meeting of the Security Council be convened and that he be permitted to make a statement in connection with the situation in Rwanda. The Council convened its 3388th meeting on 8 June 1994, on the item entitled "The situation concerning Rwanda" for the purpose of voting on a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations. At that meeting, the Council proceeded directly to the vote, without debate, and consequently only Council members spoke, in explanation of vote. The draft resolution was adopted as resolution 925 (1994), by which the Council, inter alia, extended the mandate of the United Nations Assistance Mission in Rwanda (UNAMIR) and agreed to the deployment of the expanded UNAMIR. The request by the representative of Uganda to make a statement was not acted upon as he was not invited to participate in the formal meeting of the Council.

By a letter dated 1 December 1995 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁹ the representative of Afghanistan brought to the attention of the Security Council information concerning the latest situation in Kabul City pursuant to Article 35 of the Charter and requested the President to urgently convene a meeting of the Security Council to address that critical situation. Furthermore, in accordance with rule 38 of the provisional rules of procedure of the Security Council, he requested "that the delegation of the Islamic State of Afghanistan be given an opportunity to address the Council". During the period under review, the Security Council did not formally convene to discuss the issue. The letter was recorded in the report of the Security Council to the General Assembly covering the period from 16 June 1995 to 15 June 1996.¹⁰

Case 5

At the 3235th meeting, held on 11 June 1993 to consider the situation in Cyprus, the President (Spain) stated that he had received requests to participate in the meeting. However, those making the requests had responded to his appeal on behalf of the members of the Council and had agreed not to press their requests on that occasion, without prejudice to their right to request to participate in future meetings. No statements were made during that meeting, which concluded with the adoption of a draft resolution on the extension of the mandate of the United Nations Peacekeeping Force in Cyprus.¹¹

By a letter dated 31 May 1994 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹² the representative of Qatar requested a “meeting of the Security Council to discuss the situation in Yemen and the resulting tragic loss in civilian lives”. In a subsequent letter dated 1 June 1994,¹³ the representative of Qatar referred to his letter of 1 June 1994 addressed to the President of the Security Council in which he had requested to be allowed to participate, under article 37 of the provisional rules of procedure of the Security Council, in the discussion of the item entitled “The situation in Yemen”. In that letter, he transmitted the text of a statement which he had intended to deliver at the 3386th meeting “since the members of the Council agreed that no statements would be delivered during the discussion.”¹³

Part II Procedures relating to participation

Note

Part II is concerned with procedures relating to the participation of invited States or individuals after an invitation has been extended. During the period under review, there was no discussion by the Council concerning the stage at which those invited to participate are heard. The Council has generally followed the practice whereby the parties to the conflict situation under consideration speak first, immediately after the adoption of the agenda. With respect to the question of limitations on participation, there are two express limitations to the participation of non-members of the Security Council. Articles 31 and 32 of the Charter of the United Nations and rule 37 of the Council’s provisional rules of procedure provide that the participation of non-members is without vote. Rule 38 stipulates that United Nations Members may submit proposals and draft resolutions but they will be put to the vote only at the request of a member of the Council.

Limitations on participation

During the period under review, no discussion arose regarding the question of duration of participation of those invited to participate. The practice was generally maintained whereby the President, when consideration of a question extended over several meetings, renewed the invitation at each consecutive meeting immediately after the adoption of the agenda.

Introductory note

The present chapter contains material relating to the practice of the Security Council on voting under Article 27 of the Charter.¹ The arrangement of the material basically follows that of the corresponding chapter in earlier volumes of the Repertoire.

Part I relates to the distinction between procedural and non-procedural matters. There were no instances of voting on a procedural matter during the period under review. Part I lists those instances in which the vote indicated the non-procedural nature of the decision. Part II contains no entries, as during the period under review there was no material relating to the practice of the Council in voting upon the question whether a matter was procedural within the meaning of Article 27 (2). Part III is concerned with the abstention, non-participation or absence of a Council member in relation to the requirements of Article 27 (3). Part IV addresses decisions adopted by consensus or without a vote.

The material dealt with under parts I, III and IV is set out in the tables included in each section. It is also contained in the yearly volumes of *Resolutions and Decisions of the Security Council*² as well as in the annual reports of the Security Council to the General Assembly covering the period under review.³

1. Each member of the Security Council shall have one vote.
2. Decisions of the Security Council on procedural matters shall be made by an affirmative vote of nine members.
3. Decisions of the Security Council on all other matters shall be made by an affirmative vote of nine members including the concurring votes of the permanent members; provided that, in decisions under Chapter VI, and under paragraph 3 of Article 52, a party to a dispute shall abstain from voting.

¹ Material relating to voting in connection with the election of judges under Article 10 of the Statute of the International Court of Justice is included in chapter VI, part 1V. Material on the voting procedure employed by the Council in connection with applications for admission to membership is contained in chapter VII.

³ See A/48/2, A/49/2, A/50/2 and A/51/2.

Part I

Procedural and non-procedural matters

Note

Most votes in the Council do not, of themselves, indicate whether the Council considers the matter voted upon as being of a procedural or non-procedural character: this is the case, for instance, when a proposal is adopted by a unanimous vote; when all permanent members vote in favour of a proposal; or when a proposal fails to obtain the necessary nine votes in its favour. This Part comprises instances in which the vote by the Council indicated the non-procedural character of the matter under consideration. There was no discussion of whether the question under consideration was of a procedural or non-procedural nature.

Whether a matter is deemed procedural or non-procedural is clearly established in those instances in which a proposal obtained nine or more votes, with one or more permanent members casting a negative vote. Adoption by the Council in such circumstances indicates the procedural character of the matter, while rejection by the Council in such circumstances indicates the non-procedural character of the matter. During the period under review, the Security Council did not vote on matters that were procedural in nature.

Part II

Proceedings of the Security Council regarding voting upon the question whether the matter was procedural within the meaning of Article 27, paragraph 2, of the Charter

Note

On certain occasions, the Security Council has found it necessary to decide, by vote, the question whether or not the matter under consideration was procedural within the meaning of Article 27 (2). This question has come to be termed, after the language used in the San Francisco Statement on Voting Procedure, “the preliminary question”.

There were no instances of voting on the preliminary question during the period under review.

Part III

Abstention, non-participation or absence in relation to Article 27, paragraph 3, of the Charter

Note

According to Article 27 (3) of the Charter, the affirmative vote of nine members for decisions on non-procedural (substantive) matters must include “the concurring votes of the permanent members”. Part III concerns the application of this requirement: (a) in the light of the proviso to Article 27 (3) (obligatory abstention); and (b) in circumstances when a permanent member voluntarily abstains, does not participate in the vote, or is absent at the time of the vote.

A. Obligatory abstention

The proviso to Article 27 (3) states:

... provided that, in decisions under Chapter VI, and under paragraph 3 of Article 52, a party to a dispute shall abstain from voting.

During the period under review, there was no instance in which a member abstained in accordance with the proviso to Article 27 (3), nor was there any discussion of the issue of obligatory abstention.

B. Voluntary abstention, non-participation or absence in relation to Article 27, paragraph 3

This section lists those instances in which permanent members voluntarily abstained from voting. In each case, in conformity with its consistent practice, the Security Council considered the resolution in question to have been adopted notwithstanding the abstention.

During the period under review, there were no instances of non-participation by permanent members or of votes taken in their absence. During the period, however, one elected member, Rwanda, was not represented on the Council from 14 July to 2 September 1994. The Council adopted four resolutions with only 14 members.⁴ The instances of abstention by a permanent member are recorded in the table below.

Cases in which permanent members abstained or did not participate otherwise than in accordance with the proviso to Article 27, paragraph 3

^a Resolution 904 (1994) was adopted as a whole without a vote following a paragraph-by-paragraph vote: the United States abstained in the voting on the second and sixth preambular paragraphs.

^b This reflects the result of the voting during the period when Rwanda was not represented on the Council.

Part IV

Adoption of resolutions and decisions by consensus or without a vote

Note

Most procedural motions during this period were approved without a vote. Certain decisions were taken without a vote, as shown in the case of the resolutions, in the table in section A below. In those instances, the President of the Council, in accordance with the understanding reached in prior consultations, proposed “that the Council adopt without a vote” the draft resolution.

Votes were also not taken on decisions that took the form of statements by the President on behalf of the Council or on behalf of the members of the Council. These “presidential statements” were issued after having been agreed upon by members of the Council during consultations. In some cases, they were announced at a formal meeting of the Council (section B.1); in others, they were simply issued in written form (section B.2).

In yet other cases, Security Council decisions were recorded in letters or notes from the President of the Council, with no reference to a vote having been taken (section C). While such letters and notes are usually simply issued in written form, during the period under consideration there were two instances in which the Council took a decision at a meeting which was subsequently reflected in a note by the President of the Council.⁵

During the period under review, following agreement by the members, the Council began the practice of having presidential statements published, effective 1 January 1994, in an annual series using the prefix “S/PRST/_” followed by the year and the number of the statement.⁶ The Council first issued a presidential statement following its 3327th meeting on 7 January 1994,⁷ which was held to consider the item entitled “The situation in the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina”. Previously, the statements were issued as documents in the S/ series.

⁵ The 3440th and 3593rd meetings, both dealing with the consideration of the draft report of the Security Council to the General Assembly. In both cases, after the adoption by the Council of its draft report, the President stated that that decision would be reflected in a note by the President of the Council (S/1994/1176 and S/1995/948, respectively).

⁶ Note by the President of the Security Council dated 30 June 1993 (S/26015, para. 2).

Introductory note

This chapter covers procedures of the Security Council relating to the establishment and control of subsidiary organs deemed necessary for the performance of its functions under the Charter of the United Nations. The Council's power to establish subsidiary organs is set out in Article 29 of the Charter and reflected in rule 28 of the provisional rules of procedure as follows:

Article 29

The Security Council may establish such subsidiary organs as it deems necessary for the performance of its functions.

Rule 28

The Security Council may appoint a commission or committee or a rapporteur for a specified question.

The period 1993 to 1995 saw a further expansion in the number of subsidiary organs established by the Council, as compared with the previous reporting period. The Council mandated the establishment of 12 new peacekeeping operations and established four new committees to oversee the implementation of measures adopted pursuant to Chapter VII. The Council also authorized the establishment of a commission of experts to examine reported violations of international humanitarian law in Rwanda, a Commission of Inquiry to investigate armed attacks on personnel of the United Nations Operation in Somalia, an International Commission of Inquiry in connection with the assassination of the President of Burundi and an International Commission of Inquiry to, inter alia, investigate reports relating to the sale or supply of arms to former Rwandese Government Forces. Further, the Council established two international tribunals.

Part I of this chapter considers all new organs, together with those established prior to 1993 and continuing during part or all of the period under review. The organs are divided into six main categories, reflecting their main character or functions: standing and ad hoc committees; investigative bodies; peacekeeping missions; committees to oversee the implementation of measures adopted pursuant to Article 41; ad hoc commissions; and international tribunals. Ten peacekeeping operations were terminated during the period under review, as were three investigative bodies, two Security Council Committees and one ad hoc Commission. This is reflected in part II. Part III concerning subsidiary organs that were formally proposed but not established, indicates that there was no such proposed organ during the period under review.

Part I
Subsidiary organs of the Security Council established or continuing during the period 1993 to 1995

A. Standing committees/ad hoc committees

During the period 1993-1995, the Committee of Experts on Rules of Procedure and the Committee on Council Meetings away from Headquarters continued to exist but did not meet.

The Committee on the Admission of New Members was asked to consider the applications for admission to membership in the United Nations of seven States, referred to it by the Council under rule 59 of the provisional rules of procedure.¹ Another body concerned with membership, the Committee of Experts established by the Council at the 1506th meeting, concerning the question of associate membership, continued to exist but did not meet.

Other ad hoc subsidiary organs established prior to 1993 which continued to exist during the period under review included the Committee established by Security Council resolution 446 (1979), concerning the situation in the occupied Arab territories; and the Ad Hoc Committee established under Security Council resolution 507 (1982), concerning the Seychelles. There was no activity during the period under review on the part of either body.

B. Investigative bodies

During the period under review, pursuant to the Council's requests to the Secretary-General in its resolutions, four new investigative bodies were established: commissions of inquiry concerning Somalia and Burundi, and the Commission of Experts and the International Commission of Inquiry concerning Rwanda. The Council also oversaw the activities of the Commission of Experts concerning the former Yugoslavia that had been established during the previous reporting period.

1. Commission of Experts established pursuant to resolution 780 (1992) concerning the former Yugoslavia

The Security Council had requested the Secretary-General, by its resolution 780 (1992) of 6 October 1992, to establish a Commission of Experts to examine and analyse information gathered with a view to providing the Secretary-General with its conclusions on the evidence of grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions and other violations of international humanitarian law committed in the territory of the former Yugoslavia.²

During the period under review, the five-member Commission submitted, through the Secretary-General, two interim reports, on 9 February and 3 October 1993,³ respectively, and a final report, on 24 May 1994,⁴ in which they concluded that grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions and other violations of international humanitarian law had been committed in the territory of the former Yugoslavia on a large scale, and were particularly brutal and ferocious in their execution. In his letter accompanying the final report,⁵ the Secretary-General stated that he had examined the report carefully and fully concurred with the Commission's conclusions. He therefore considered that the Commission had discharged its mandate. He also expressed his confidence that the material collected and analysed by the Commission, which had been forwarded to the Prosecutor of the International Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia, would greatly facilitate in carrying out the Tribunal's mandate.

2. Commission of Inquiry established pursuant to resolution 885 (1993) concerning Somalia

By its resolution 814 (1993) of 26 March 1993, the Security Council, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, authorized the expansion of the size and mandate of the United Nations Operation in Somalia

(UNOSOM II). By its resolution 837 (1993) of 6 June 1993, the Council, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, condemned the unprovoked armed attacks that had occurred against UNOSOM II personnel on 5 June, and reaffirmed that the Secretary-General was authorized under resolution 814 (1993) to take “all necessary measures” against all those responsible for those attacks, including to secure the investigation of their actions and their arrest and detention for prosecution, trial and punishment.

On 16 November 1993, the Security Council, by resolution 885 (1993), authorized the establishment of a Commission of Inquiry, in further implementation of its resolutions 814 (1993) and 837 (1993), to investigate the armed attacks on UNOSOM II personnel which had led to casualties among them. The Council requested the Secretary-General to appoint the Commission at the earliest possible time, and to report to the Council on the establishment of the Commission. It directed the Commission to determine procedures for carrying out its investigation, and requested the Commission to report its findings through the Secretary-General as soon as possible, taking into consideration the need for a thorough inquiry. The Council further requested that the Secretary-General, under his authority in resolutions 814 (1993) and 837 (1993), pending completion of the report of the Commission, suspend arrest actions against those individuals who might be implicated but were not detained pursuant to resolution 837 (1993), and make appropriate provision to deal with the situation of those already detained under the provisions of the resolution.

Through an exchange of letters between the Secretary-General and the President of the Security Council, dated 23 and 30 November 1993 respectively,⁶ the members of the Council took note of the composition of the three-member Commission and welcomed the Secretary-General’s decision to establish a separate secretariat to assist the Commission in carrying out its tasks.

Subsequently, in a letter dated 1 June 1994 addressed to the Secretary-General,⁷ the President of the Council conveyed the Council’s decision that the report of the Commission established pursuant to resolution 885 (1993), which had been received earlier by the members of the Council, should be circulated as a document of the Security Council in the normal manner. The President also stated that, in connection with the report, it was noted that many of the suggestions contained therein had already been acted upon by UNOSOM II and by the Security Council. The members of the Council believed that the report demonstrated the complexity and difficulty of the operation in Somalia. Many lessons had been learned and the Security Council would be able to build upon that experience in future peacekeeping operations. The President asked that his letter be circulated as a document of the Security Council at the same time as the report was circulated. The report⁸ was issued concurrently with the letter.

3. Commission of Experts established pursuant to resolution 935 (1994) concerning Rwanda

On 31 May 1994, pursuant to a request by the Security Council,⁹ the Secretary-General submitted his report on the investigation of serious violations of international humanitarian law committed in Rwanda during the conflict.¹⁰ He noted that massacres and killings had continued in a systematic manner throughout Rwanda and also that “only a proper investigation [could] establish the facts and definite culpability”. On 1 July 1994, the Security Council adopted resolution 935 (1994). By that resolution, the Council requested the Secretary-General to establish, as a matter of urgency, “an impartial Commission of Experts to examine and analyse information submitted pursuant to the present resolution, together with such further information as the Commission may obtain through its own investigations or the efforts of other persons or bodies, including the information made available by the Special Rapporteur for Rwanda, with a view to providing the Secretary-General with its conclusions on the evidence of grave violations of international humanitarian law committed in the territory of Rwanda, including the evidence of possible acts of genocide”.

In the same resolution, the Council called upon States and, as appropriate, international humanitarian organizations, to collate substantiated information in their possession or submitted to them relating to grave violations of international humanitarian law, including breaches of the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide, committed in Rwanda during the conflict. The Council requested States, relevant United Nations bodies and relevant organizations to make that information available within 30 days of the adoption of the resolution and as appropriate thereafter and to provide appropriate assistance to the Commission.

The Council also requested the Secretary-General to report to it on the establishment of the Commission and, within four months from its establishment, on the conclusions of the Commission, and to take account of those conclusions in any recommendations for further appropriate steps.

Finally, the Council requested the Secretary-General and, as appropriate, the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, through the Secretary-General, to make the information submitted to the Special Rapporteur for Rwanda available to the Commission and to facilitate adequate coordination and cooperation between the work of the Commission and the Special Rapporteur in the performance of their respective tasks.

On 26 July 1994, the Secretary-General submitted his report on the establishment of the Commission¹¹ and on 29 July, in a letter addressed to the President of the Council,¹² he notified the Council of his appointment of three members of the Commission, reserving the right to expand the membership as necessary. The Security Council welcomed those developments.¹³

The Commission submitted, via the Secretary-General, a preliminary report on 1 October 1994.¹⁴ It submitted a final report on 9 December 1994, confirming that genocide and other systematic, widespread and flagrant violations of international humanitarian law had been committed in Rwanda.¹⁵ In his letter accompanying the Commission's final report,¹⁶ the Secretary-General noted that, by resolution 955 (1994) of 8 November 1994, the Security Council had decided to establish an international tribunal for Rwanda, in view of that resolution, the Commission's recommendation that an international tribunal should be established and that the investigation into allegations of violations of international humanitarian law should continue, had already been acted upon. The Secretary-General also expressed his confidence that the material collected by the Commission, which would be transmitted to the Prosecutor of the International Tribunal for Rwanda, would greatly facilitate the latter's task. He therefore considered that the Commission had discharged its mandate.

4. International Commission of Inquiry established under resolution 1012 (1995) concerning Burundi

On 28 August 1995, the Security Council adopted resolution 1012 (1995). In the preambular paragraphs of that resolution, the Council recalled the statement by the President of the Council of 29 March 1995,¹⁷ in which the Council, inter alia, underlined the role that could be played in Burundi by an international commission of inquiry into the 1993 coup attempt and into the massacres that had followed; welcomed the letter of the Secretary-General to the President of the Security Council dated 28 July 1995¹⁸ recommending that such a commission of inquiry should be created by resolution of the Council; took into account the initiative of the Government of Burundi in calling for the establishment of an international judicial commission of inquiry as referred to in the Convention of Government;¹⁹ and recalled also the letter of the Permanent Representative of Burundi to the President of the Council dated 8 August 1995²⁰ noting with interest the letter of the Secretary-General of 28 July 1995.²¹

By that resolution, the Council requested the Secretary-General to establish, as a matter of urgency, an international commission of inquiry with the following mandate: (a) to establish the facts relating to the assassination of the President of Burundi on 21 October 1993, the massacres and other related serious acts of violence which had followed; (b) to recommend measures of a legal, political or administrative nature, as appropriate, after consultation with the Government of Burundi, and measures with regard to the bringing to justice of persons responsible for those acts, to prevent any repetition of deeds similar to those investigated by the commission and, in general, to eradicate impunity and promote national reconciliation in Burundi.

The Council recommended that the International Commission of Inquiry be composed of five impartial and internationally respected, experienced jurists who would be selected by the Secretary-General and would be furnished with adequate expert staff, and that the Government of Burundi be duly informed. It called upon States, relevant United Nations bodies and, as appropriate, international humanitarian organizations to collate substantiated information in their possession relating to the above-mentioned acts, to make such information available as soon as possible and to provide appropriate assistance to the Commission. It requested the Secretary-General to report to the Council on the establishment of the Commission, and further requested him, within three months from the establishment of the Commission, to submit an interim report to the Council on the work of the Commission and to submit a final report when the Commission had completed its work.

The Council also called upon the Burundi authorities and institutions, including all Burundi political parties, to fully cooperate with the Commission in the accomplishment of its mandate, including responding positively to requests from the Commission for security, assistance and access in pursuing investigations, including (a) adoption by the Government of Burundi of any measures needed for the Commission and its personnel to carry out their functions throughout the national territory with full freedom, independence and security; (b) provision by the Government of Burundi of all information in its possession which the Commission requested or was otherwise needed to carry out its mandate and free access for the Commission and its staff to any official archives related to its mandate; (c) freedom for the Commission to obtain any information the Commission considered relevant and to use all sources of information which the Commission considered useful and reliable; (d) freedom for the Commission to interview, in private, any persons the Commission judged necessary; (e) freedom for the Commission to visit any establishment or place at any time; and (f) guarantee by the Government of Burundi of full respect for the integrity, security and freedom of witnesses, experts and any other persons who helped the Commission in its work.

The Council further called upon all States to cooperate with the Commission in facilitating its investigations. It requested the Secretary-General to provide adequate security for the Commission in cooperation with the Government of Burundi, and also requested him to establish, as a supplement to financing as an expense of the Organization, a trust fund to receive voluntary contributions to finance the Commission. It urged States and intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations to contribute funds, equipment and services to the Commission including the offer of expert personnel in support of the implementation of the resolution.

In a letter dated 22 September 1995,²² the Secretary-General informed the President of the Security Council that, in accordance with resolution 1012 (1995), he had appointed five internationally respected jurists as members of the Commission. As soon as the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions had approved the Commission's budget and once the support team which would accompany the Commission to Bujumbura had been formally recruited, he would ask the members of the Commission to assemble in New York before they started their mission. The Council would be kept informed of the progress achieved in this regard. In a reply dated 27 September,²³ the President of the Council stated that the members of the Council took note of the decision contained in the Secretary-General's letter.

5. International Commission of Inquiry established under resolution 1013 (1995) concerning Rwanda

On 7 September 1995, by resolution 1013 (1995), the Council requested the Secretary-General to establish, as a matter of urgency, an International Commission of Inquiry with the following mandate: (a) to collect information and investigate reports relating to the sale or supply of arms and related materiel to former Rwandese Government Forces in the Great Lakes region in violation of Council resolutions 918 (1994), 997 (1995) and 1011 (1995);²⁴ (b) to investigate allegations that such forces were receiving military training in order to destabilize Rwanda; (c) to identify parties aiding and abetting the illegal acquisition of arms by former Rwandese Government Forces, contrary to the Council resolutions referred to above; (d) to recommend measures to end the illegal flow of arms in the region in violation of the Council resolutions referred to above. The Council recommended that this Commission be composed of 5 to 10 impartial and internationally respected persons, including legal, military and police experts, under the chairmanship of an eminent person, and assisted by the appropriate support staff. It requested the Secretary-General to report to it on the establishment of the Commission and to submit, within three months of its establishment, an interim report on the conclusions of the Commission and, as soon as possible thereafter, to submit a final report containing the Commission's recommendations.

By a letter dated 20 October 1995, addressed to the President of the Security Council,²⁵ the Secretary-General informed the Council that arrangements for the establishment of the Commission had been completed. He had appointed six individuals to the Commission; they would be accompanied by a small support staff, including a legal expert and a security officer. In a reply of the same date,²⁶ the President of the Council stated that the members of the Council welcomed the Secretary-General's decision and took note of the information contained in his letter.

C. Peacekeeping operations

As noted in the report of the Secretary-General on the work of the Organization of 22 August 1995, peacekeeping operations, during the period under review, became more complex, being involved in a wider spectrum of operations ranging from the monitoring of traditional ceasefires to the task of armed protection of humanitarian convoys, and from the control of buffer zones to assistance in the implementation of peace settlements.²⁷ During the period under review, the Security Council adopted several decisions which dealt with various aspects of peacekeeping operations, including the security of peacekeeping operations, communication with troop-contributing countries and stand-by arrangements for rapid deployment.²⁸

From 1993 to 1995, the Council mandated the establishment of 12 new peacekeeping operations — in Angola,²⁹ Somalia,³⁰ Uganda and Rwanda,³¹ Rwanda,³² Liberia,³³ Chad and the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya,³⁴ Haiti,³⁵ Tajikistan,³⁶ Croatia,³⁷ the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia,³⁸ Bosnia and Herzegovina³⁹ and Georgia,⁴⁰ while authorizing the termination or transition to new peacekeeping missions of 10 operations.⁴¹ In some cases, the Council authorized significant changes and expansions in the mandates of peacekeeping operations including a number of those established during an earlier period.

Twenty-six peacekeeping operations in total are considered below, by geographic region. Studies of peacekeeping operations in each region are generally in the order of their establishment, while interlinked operations are dealt with jointly. As a full account of Council proceedings, including details of deliberations by the Council on the question and the content of the reports of the Secretary-General on the situations on the ground are set out in chapter VIII of this volume, this section focuses on procedures of the Council concerning the establishment, mandate, composition, implementation of mandate, and termination or transition of peacekeeping operations during the period under review. It is noted that, in accordance with the general principles set out in General Assembly resolutions 874 (S-IV) of 27 June 1963 and 3101 (XXVIII) of 11 December 1973, peacekeeping operations during the period under review were financed through assessed contributions by Member States.⁴²

⁴² Previously, the only United Nations peacekeeping operation not financed from assessed contributions by Member States was the United Nations Peacekeeping Force in Cyprus (UNFICYP). In accordance with resolution 186 (1964), the costs of the Force were met by the Governments providing the military contingents, by the Government of Cyprus, and by voluntary contributions. As a result of decisions taken by troop-contributing countries to reduce their contingents, the Secretary-General, in his report dated 30 March 1993 (S/25492), outlined two alternative proposals, one of which he recommended, for restructuring UNFICYP, stressing that both proposals would be practical only if the Council changed the financing from voluntary to assessed contributions. On 27 May 1993, by resolution 831 (1993), the Council decided that, with effect from the next extension of the Force's mandate on or before 15 June 1993, those costs of the Force which were not covered by voluntary contributions should be treated as expenses of the Organization under Article 17 (2) of the Charter. A majority of peacekeeping operations during the period under review were financed through the peacekeeping budget of the United Nations, while two peacekeeping operations, the United Nations Truce Supervision Organization and the United Nations Military Observer Group in India and Pakistan, are funded from the regular budget of the United Nations.

Africa

1. United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara established pursuant to resolution 690 (1991)

During the period under review, the United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara (MINURSO) continued to perform its task of monitoring the ceasefire between Morocco and the Frente Popular de Liberación de Sagúía el Hamra y Río de Oro (Polisario Front) and facilitating the organization of a referendum over the future control of the territory in accordance with the Settlement Plan.⁴³

Mandate implementation

From 1993 to 1995, following the consideration of the reports of the Secretary-General on the situation concerning Western Sahara,⁴⁴ the Security Council, by adopting a series of resolutions,⁴⁵ extended the mandate of MINURSO on four occasions, for periods of three to four months; the last extension was until 31 January 1996.⁴⁶

By resolution 973 (1995) of 13 January 1995, the Council approved the expansion of the Mission, as proposed by the Secretary-General,⁴⁷ to reinforce personnel, including civilian police, for the completion of registration and identification in a reasonable time.

⁴³ S/21360 and S/22464 and Corr.1. The Settlement Plan was approved by the Security Council by resolution 658 (1990).

⁴⁶ In most cases, the duration of the mandate was for three months, as recommended by the Secretary-General. In one case, however, while the Secretary-General, in his report of 19 May 1995 (S/1995/404), recommended that the mandate of MINURSO be extended for a four-month period, by resolution 995 (1995) of 26 May 1995, the Council extended it for one month, and decided to send a mission of the Council to the region, with a view to accelerating the implementation of the Settlement Plan.

⁴⁷ In his report dated 14 December 1994 (S/1994/1420, paras. 17-19).

2. United Nations Angola Verification Mission II established pursuant to resolution 696 (1991)

During the period under review, the United Nations Angola Verification Mission II (UNAVEM II) continued to carry out its mandate of overseeing and maintaining the ceasefire, and as authorized by resolution 747 (1992), monitoring the process of elections.

By resolution 804 (1993) of 29 January 1993, as recommended by the Secretary-General,⁴⁸ the Council authorized, as a provisional measure based on security considerations, the Secretary-General to concentrate Mission deployment in Luanda and, at his discretion, in other provincial locations, with the levels of equipment and personnel he deemed appropriate to allow for the subsequent expeditious redeployment of UNAVEM II, as soon as that became feasible. The mandate of UNAVEM II was extended for three months, until 30 April 1993, by resolution 804 (1993), and then for a further month, until 31 May 1993, by resolution 823 (1993) of 30 April 1993.

Following the breakdown of meetings held at Abidjan between the Government of Angola and UNITA to achieve an agreement on a ceasefire, by resolution 834 (1993) of 1 June 1993, the Council agreed to extend the existing mandate of the Mission for 45 days, in accordance with the Secretary-General's recommendations in which, stressing the importance of deciding again the United Nations role in Angola, he recommended a further two-month interim extension of the Mission's mandate, on a reduced basis.⁴⁹ UNAVEM II would provide good offices and mediation, with the goal of restoring the ceasefire and reinstating the peace process. UNAVEM would consist of a smaller number of military, police and political personnel of which some might also be deployed in several locations outside Luanda.

On the basis of reports of the Secretary-General,⁵⁰ the mandate of the Mission was subsequently extended on six occasions, by a series of resolutions, for further periods of between half a month and three months.⁵¹

By resolution 952 (1994) of 27 October 1994, encouraged by the substantial progress made in the Lusaka peace talks, the Council authorized, with the aim of consolidating the implementation of the peace agreement in its initial and most critical stages, the restoration of the strength of UNAVEM II to its previous level of 350 military observers and 126 police observers, upon receipt of a report from the Secretary-General to the Council that the parties had initialled a peace agreement and that an effective ceasefire was in place.

By resolution 966 (1994) of 8 December 1994, the Council extended the mandate of UNAVEM II until 8 February 1995 in order to monitor the ceasefire established by the Lusaka Protocol which was signed on 20 November 1994.

Through exchanges of letters between the Secretary-General and the President of the Council,⁵² the Chief Military Observer of UNAVEM II and the countries contributing military personnel to the Mission during the period under review were confirmed.

Termination/transition to a new mission

By resolution 976 (1995) of 8 February 1995, the Council, on the basis of the Secretary-General's recommendations,⁵³ established an enlarged United Nations operation in Angola, UNAVEM III, which replaced UNAVEM II.

Mandate

The mandate of UNAVEM III, as set out in resolution 976 (1995), was to assist the parties in restoring peace and achieving national reconciliation in Angola, on the basis of the “Acordos de Paz”,⁵⁵ the Lusaka Protocol⁵⁶ and relevant Security Council resolutions.⁵⁷

Composition

UNAVEM III was authorized with a maximum deployment of 7,000 military personnel, in addition to the 350 military observers and 260 police observers mentioned in the report of the Secretary-General, with an appropriate number of international and local staff.⁵⁸ By exchanges of letters between the Secretary-General and the President of the Council, the Force Commander of UNAVEM III⁵⁹ and the countries contributing military personnel to the Mission⁶⁰ were confirmed.

Mandate implementation

By resolution 1008 (1995) of 7 August 1995, the Council extended the mandate of UNAVEM III until 8 February 1996.

Termination

The Council, by resolution 976 (1995) of 8 February 1995, declared its intention to conclude the Mission when the objectives of the Lusaka Protocol had been achieved in accordance with the schedule attached to the Lusaka Protocol and with the expectation of its completion by February 1997.

4. United Nations Operation in Somalia established pursuant to resolution 751 (1992)

Termination/transition to a new mission

By resolution 814 (1993) of 26 March 1993, the Security Council, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, decided to expand both the size of the force of the United Nations Operation in Somalia and its mandate in accordance with the Secretary-General's recommendations.⁶¹ By this expansion, UNOSOM made a transition to UNOSOM II.

5. United Nations Operation in Somalia II established pursuant to resolution 814 (1993)

Establishment

By resolution 814 (1993), the Security Council, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, decided to establish UNOSOM II for an initial period until 31 October 1993 and requested the Secretary-General to direct the Force Commander of UNOSOM II to assume responsibility for the consolidation, expansion and maintenance of a secure environment throughout Somalia, taking account of the particular circumstances in each locality, on an expedited basis in accordance with the recommendations contained in his report of 3 March 1993 and in that regard, to organize a prompt, smooth and phased transition from the Unified Task Force to UNOSOM II.⁶²

Mandate

As recommended by the Secretary-General,⁶³ the mandate of UNOSOM II was the following: (a) to monitor that all factions continue to respect the cessation of hostilities and other agreements to which they had agreed, particularly the Addis Ababa agreements of January 1993; (b) to prevent any resumption of violence and, if necessary, take appropriate action against any faction that violated or threatened to violate the cessation of hostilities; (c) to maintain control of the heavy weapons of the organized factions which would have been brought under international control pending their eventual destruction or transfer to a newly constituted national army; (d) to seize the small arms of all unauthorized armed elements and to assist in the registration and security of such arms; (e) to secure or maintain security at all ports, airports and lines of communications required for the delivery of humanitarian assistance; (f) to protect, as required, the personnel, installations and equipments of the United Nations and its agencies, the International Committee of the Red Cross as well as non-governmental organizations, and to take such forceful action as might be required to neutralize armed elements that attacked or threatened to attack such facilities and personnel, pending the establishment of a new Somali police force which could assume that responsibility; (g) to continue the programme for mine-clearing in the most afflicted areas; (h) to assist in the repatriation of refugees and displaced persons within Somalia; and (i) to carry out such other functions as might be authorized by the Security Council.

Composition

UNOSOM II was to be composed of 20,000 troops made up of five brigades, as well as 8,000 personnel to provide logistical support. By exchanges of letters between the Secretary-General and the President of the Council, the Force Commander of UNISOM II⁶⁴ and the troop-contributing countries to the Mission⁶⁵ were confirmed.

Mandate implementation

During the reporting period, the Council, by adopting a number of resolutions, extended the mandate of UNOSOM II in six instances until its termination on 31 March 1995.⁶⁶ Among them, the extension of the mandate by resolution 923 (1994) was subject to a review by the Council based on a report by the Secretary-General on the humanitarian mission carried out by UNOSOM II and on the political and security situation in Somalia and progress made in achieving national reconciliation.

Following the unprovoked armed attacks against the personnel of UNOSOM II on 5 June 1993, the Council, by resolution 837 (1993) of 6 June 1993, reaffirmed that the Secretary-General was authorized, under resolution 814 (1993), to take "all necessary measures" against all those responsible for such attacks, including against those responsible for publicly inciting such attacks, to establish the effective authority of UNOSOM II throughout Somalia.

By resolution 897 (1994) of 4 February 1994, the Council approved the Secretary-General's recommendation for the continuation of UNOSOM II,⁶⁷ with a revised mandate for the following: (a) encouraging and assisting the Somali parties in implementing the Addis Ababa Agreements, in particular in their cooperative efforts to achieve disarmament and to respect the ceasefire; (b) protecting major ports and airports and essential infrastructure and safeguarding the lines of communications vital to the provision of humanitarian relief and reconstruction assistance; (c) continuing its efforts to provide humanitarian relief to all in need throughout the country; (d) assisting in the reorganization of the Somali police and judicial system; (e) helping with the repatriation and resettlement of refugees and displaced persons; (f) assisting also in the ongoing political process in Somalia, which should culminate in the installation of a democratically elected government; and (g) providing protection for the personnel, installations and equipment of the United Nations and its agencies, as well as of non-governmental organizations providing humanitarian relief and reconstruction assistance.

Following the report of the Secretary-General dated 17 August 1994 in which he recommended immediate steps to reduce the force level of UNOSOM II by 1,500 and thereafter to bring it down to 15,000 all ranks as soon as possible,⁶⁸ in a presidential statement dated 25 August 1994,⁶⁹ the Council believed that the Secretary-General's proposed initial reduction of the UNOSOM II troops was appropriate in the circumstances prevailing in Somalia.

Termination

In the preamble to resolution 897 (1994) of 4 February 1994, the Council reaffirmed the objective that UNOSOM II complete its mission by March 1995, which was reiterated in resolution 923 (1994) of 31 May 1994.

In a presidential statement dated 6 April 1995,⁷⁰ the Council noted the successful conclusion of the withdrawal of UNOSOM II forces from Somalia. It also stated that the continuing lack of progress in the peace process and in national reconciliation, in particular the lack of sufficient cooperation from the Somali parties over security issues, had prevented the continuation of the mandate of UNOSOM II beyond 31 March 1995.⁷¹

6. United Nations Observer Mission in South Africa established pursuant to resolution 772 (1992)

During the period under review, the United Nations Observer Mission in South Africa (UNOMSA) continued its mandate, in coordination with the structures set up under the National Peace Accord signed on 14 September 1991, to bring an effective end to the violence and thus to create the conditions for the resumption of negotiations envisaged in resolution 765 (1992).

Mandate implementation

The Council, by a letter dated 19 February 1993 from the President of the Council addressed to the Secretary-General,⁷² welcomed the latter's decision to reinforce UNOMSA with an increment of 10 additional observers, for a total strength of 60 observers.⁷³

By an exchange of letters between the Secretary-General and the President of the Council dated 29 September and 9 October 1993,⁷⁴ the Council members agreed with the Secretary-General's request to increase the number of observers by 40 for a total complement of 100 observers to reinforce security and stability in the country during the transitional period.

By resolution 894 (1994) of 14 January 1994, the Council agreed with the Secretary-General's proposals concerning the mandate and size of UNOMSA,⁷⁵ that is, to include the observation of the elections scheduled for 27 April 1994, and to increase the Mission's strength by an additional number of 1,278 United Nations observers.⁷⁶

Subsequent to the establishment of a united, non-racial and democratic Government of South Africa, by resolution 930 (1994) of 27 June 1994, the Council decided that, with the successful completion of its mandate, UNOMSA was terminated forthwith.

7. United Nations Operation in Mozambique established pursuant to resolution 797 (1992)

During the period under review, the United Nations Operation in Mozambique (ONUMOZ) continued to fulfil its mandate to help implement the General Peace Agreement signed on 4 October 1992, ⁷³ In his report dated 22 December 1992, the Secretary-General expressed his intention to reinforce the Mission's strength with an increment of 10 additional observers, due to the delicate situation prevailing in South Africa (S/25004).

In response, the Secretary-General, in his report dated 10 January 1994 (S/1994/16 and Add.1), proposed to expand the mandate and the size of UNOMSA, in order to include the observation of the elections scheduled for 27 April 1994.

by performing its principal tasks of monitoring the ceasefire, promoting security and providing technical assistance for the electoral process.

Mandate implementation

Through exchanges of letters between the Secretary-General and the President of the Security Council, the Force Commander of ONUMOZ⁷⁷ and the countries contributing to military elements of the Operation⁷⁸ during the period under review were confirmed.

By resolution 879 (1993) of 29 October 1993, the Council extended the mandate of ONUMOZ until 5 November 1993.

Subsequent to the consideration of the report of the Secretary-General,⁷⁹ by resolution 882 (1993) of 5 November 1993, the Council authorized the Secretary-General to proceed with the selection and deployment of 128 police observers approved by resolution 797 (1992) and renewed the mandate of the mission for a further six months, subject to the proviso that the Council would review the status of the mandate within 90 days on the basis of a report by the Secretary-General to be submitted every three months.

Establishment of police component. By resolution 898 (1994) of 23 February 1994, the Council authorized the establishment of the United Nations police component of up to 1,144 personnel as an integral part of ONUMOZ, with the mandate and deployment described in the report of the Secretary-General dated 28 January 1994.⁸⁰

⁸⁰ The Secretary-General recommended that, given that the political situation in Mozambique had developed in such a way as to allow the shift in focus of ONUMOZ away from the monitoring of the ceasefire towards the verification of police activities in the region and the respect for civil rights, the Council authorized the deployment of a United Nations police component as an integral part of ONUMOZ. The Secretary-General also noted that, given political developments in the country and the costs of the proposed police component, he would instigate a gradual reduction in the military elements of ONUMOZ in May 1994 (S/1994/89/Add.1, paras. 9-18).

By resolution 916 (1994) of 5 May 1994, the Council renewed the mandate of the Operation for a final period until 15 November 1994, at the strength described in the Secretary-General's report dated 28 April 1994,⁸¹ subject to the proviso that the Council would review the status of the mandate of the Operation by 15 July 1994 and also by 5 September 1994, based on further reports by the Secretary-General. By resolution 957 (1994) of 15 November 1994, the Council extended the mandate of ONUMOZ until the new Government of Mozambique took office, as recommended by the Secretary-General,⁸² but no later than 15 December 1994.

Termination

By resolution 957 (1994) of 15 November 1994, the Council authorized ONUMOZ to complete its residual operations prior to its withdrawal on or before 31 January 1995. The Council also approved the withdrawal schedule, for the safe and orderly withdrawal of all military and civilian personnel of the Operation before 31 January 1995.⁸³

Following the installation of the President of the Republic of Mozambique and the inauguration of the new Assembly of the Republic of Mozambique on 8 and 9 December 1994, the Council, by a presidential

He recommended that, in the meantime, the Operation continue its good offices functions as well as its verification and monitoring activities.

⁸³ As described by the Secretary-General in his report of 26 August 1994 (S/1994/1002, paras. 34-38) and in his letter dated 9 November 1994 (S/1994/1282). Prior to the submission of the Secretary-General's recommendations, by resolution 898 (1994) of 23 February 1994, the Council requested the Secretary-General to begin preparing proposals for the drawdown of an appropriate number of military personnel, to prepare a timetable for the completion of the mandate of ONUMOZ, by the target date of the end of November 1994, and to ensure maximum economy in the operation of ONUMOZ, while remaining mindful of the importance of the effective discharge of its mandate.

statement dated 14 December 1994,⁸⁴ noted that the mandate of ONUMOZ had come to an end and the Operation would be finally withdrawn from Mozambique by 31 January 1995, in accordance with resolution 957 (1994).

8. United Nations Observer Mission Uganda-Rwanda established pursuant to resolution 846 (1993)

Establishment

Following the report of the Secretary-General dated 20 May 1993,⁸⁵ submitted pursuant to resolution 812 (1993),⁸⁶ the Council, by resolution 846 (1993) of 22 June 1993, established the United Nations Observer Mission Uganda-Rwanda (UNOMUR) on the Ugandan side of the border, for an initial period of six months, as recommended by the Secretary-General,⁸⁷ and subject to review every six months.

Mandate

The mandate of UNOMUR, as set out in resolution 846 (1993), was to monitor the Uganda-Rwanda border in order to verify that no military assistance reached Rwanda, focus being put primarily in that regard on the transit or transport, by roads or tracks which could accommodate vehicles, of lethal weapons and ammunition across the border, as well as any other material which could be of military use.

Composition

UNOMUR was authorized to be composed of 81 military observers and 17 international and 7 local civilian support staff. Through a subsequent exchange of letters between the Secretary-General and the President of the Council,⁸⁸ the Chief Military Observer of UNOMUR and the countries contributing military observers to the Mission were confirmed.

⁸⁶ By resolution 812 (1993) of 12 March 1993, the Security Council invited the Secretary-General to examine the requests of the Governments of Rwanda and Uganda (S/25355 and S/25356, respectively) for the deployment of observers at the border between those two countries.

Mandate implementation

Integration within the United Nations Assistance Mission for Rwanda. Following the signing of a peace agreement, on 4 August 1993, between the Government of Rwanda and the Rwandan Patriotic Front in Arusha, United Republic of Tanzania, and on the basis of the Secretary-General's recommendation,⁸⁹ the Council, by resolution 872 (1993) of 4 October 1993, approved the Secretary-General's proposal concerning the integration of UNOMUR within the United Nations Assistance Mission for Rwanda which was established by that resolution. By resolution 891 (1993) of 20 December 1993, the Council noted that this integration was "purely administrative in nature" and would in no way affect the mandate of UNOMUR as set out in resolution 846 (1993) of 22 June 1993.

By resolution 891 (1993), the Council extended the mandate of UNOMUR for six months, after consideration of the report of the Secretary-General.⁹⁰

Termination

In his report dated 16 June 1994,⁹¹ the Secretary-General reported the extension, as from 14 May 1994, of the UNOMUR observation and monitoring activities to the entire Uganda/Rwanda border, following the drastic change in the overall situation in Rwanda, after the deaths of the Presidents of Rwanda and Burundi in a plane crash in Kigali on 6 April 1994. By resolution 928 (1994) of 20 June 1994, on the basis of the above-mentioned report, the Council decided to extend the mandate of UNOMUR for a final period of three months until 21 September 1994 and agreed with the reduction of military observers by phases.⁹²

⁹² In his final report dated 19 September 1994 (S/1994/1073), submitted pursuant to resolution 928 (1994) of 20 June 1994, the Secretary-General noted that UNOMUR had played a useful role as a confidence-building mechanism in the months following the conclusion of the Arusha Peace Agreement and during the initial efforts of UNAMIR to defuse tensions between the Rwandan parties and to facilitate the implementation of that Agreement. Following the resumption of the civil war in Rwanda, UNOMUR had also played an important role in support of the deployment of the expanded UNAMIR and of the coordination of humanitarian relief activities in the country.

9. United Nations Assistance Mission for Rwanda established pursuant to resolution 872 (1993)

Establishment

Following the signing of the Arusha Peace Agreement on 4 August 1993 and on the basis of the report of the Secretary-General dated 24 September 1993,⁹³ by resolution 872 (1993) of 5 October 1993, the Council established the United Nations Assistance Mission for Rwanda (UNAMIR) for a period of six months, subject to the proviso that the Mission would be extended beyond the initial 90-day period only upon a review by the Council on the basis of a report by the Secretary-General as to whether substantive progress had been made by the parties towards the implementation of the Arusha Peace Agreement.⁹⁴

Mandate

The mandate of UNAMIR, as set out in resolution 872 (1993), was as follows: (a) to contribute to the security of the city of Kigali, inter alia, within a weapons-secure area established by the parties in and around the city; (b) to monitor observance of the ceasefire agreement, which called for the establishment of cantonment and assembly zones and the demarcation of the new demilitarized zone and other demilitarization procedures; (c) to monitor the security situation during the final period of the transitional Government's mandate, leading up to the elections; (d) to assist with mine clearance, primarily through training programmes; (e) to investigate at the request of the parties, or on its own initiative, instances of alleged non-compliance with the provisions of the Protocol of Agreement on the Integration of the Armed Forces of the Two Parties, and to pursue any such instances with the parties responsible and report thereon as appropriate to the Secretary-General; (f) to monitor the process of repatriation of Rwandese refugees and resettlement of displaced persons to verify that it was carried out in a safe and orderly manner; (g) to assist in the coordination of humanitarian assistance activities in conjunction with relief operations; and (h) to investigate and report on incidents regarding the activities of the gendarmerie and the police.

Composition

UNAMIR was authorized with the maximum strength of 2,548 military personnel, of whom 2,217 would be staff officers and formed troops and 311 would be military observers, to be deployed in four phases in accordance with the Secretary-General's peace plan, as set out in his report.⁹⁵ Through exchanges of letters between the Secretary-General and the President of the Council, the Force Commander of UNAMIR⁹⁶ and the countries contributing military personnel to the Mission⁹⁷ were confirmed.

While the Secretary-General, in his report,⁹⁸ recommended an extension of the mandate of UNAMIR for six months, the Council, by resolution 909 (1994) of 5 April 1994, extended the mandate of UNAMIR until 29 July 1994, with a six-week review provision on the understanding that progress would be made in establishing the transitional institutions provided for under the Arusha Peace Agreement. By resolution 925 (1994) of 8 June 1994, the Council extended the mandate of UNAMIR until 9 December 1994. Subsequently, by a series of resolutions,⁹⁹ the Council extended the mandate of UNAMIR in four instances for additional periods of between three and six months, except on one occasion.¹⁰⁰ violence in Rwanda, and proposed options for adjustment of mandate of UNAMIR, by resolution 912 (1994) of 5 April 1994, the Council adjusted the mandate of UNAMIR to encompass the following tasks: (a) to act as an intermediary between the parties in an attempt to secure their agreement to a ceasefire; (b) to assist in the resumption of humanitarian relief operations to the extent feasible; (c) to monitor and report on developments in Rwanda, including the safety and security of the civilians who sought refuge with UNAMIR.

By resolution 918 (1994) of 17 May 1994, the Council revised the mandate of UNAMIR to include the following additional responsibilities: (a) to contribute to the security and protection of displaced persons, refugees and civilians at risk in Rwanda, including through the establishment and maintenance, where feasible, of secure humanitarian areas; and (b) to provide security and support for the distribution of relief supplies and humanitarian relief operations. By the same resolution, the Council recognized that the Mission might be required to take action in self-defence against persons or groups who threatened protected sites and populations, United Nations and other humanitarian personnel or the means of delivery and distribution of humanitarian relief.¹⁰²

By resolution 925 (1994) of 8 June 1994, the Council endorsed the Secretary-General's proposals contained in his report¹⁰³ for the deployment of the expanded UNAMIR,¹⁰⁴ and reaffirmed that UNAMIR, in addition to continuing to act as an intermediary between the parties in an attempt to secure their agreement to a ceasefire, would: (a) contribute to the security and protection of displaced persons, refugees and civilians at risk in Rwanda, including through the establishment and maintenance, where feasible, of secure humanitarian areas; and (b) provide security and support for the distribution of relief supplies and humanitarian relief operations. At the same time, the Council recognized that UNAMIR might be required to take action in self-defence against persons or groups who threatened protected sites and populations, United Nations and other humanitarian personnel or the means of delivery and distribution of humanitarian relief.

¹⁰² Earlier, in his letter dated 29 April 1994 (S/1994/518), the Secretary-General reported that, in the circumstances in which massacres continued to occur, serious questions about the viability of the mandate of UNAMIR, revised by resolution 912 (1994), were raised. In particular, the mandate did not give UNAMIR the power to take effective action to halt the continuing massacres and at best the Mission could provide "limited protection" to small groups of threatened persons in Kigali. He urged the Council to re-examine the decision taken in resolution 912 (1994) and to consider what action, including forceful action, UNAMIR could take, or could authorize Member States to take, in order to restore law and order and end the massacres. In a letter addressed to the Secretary-General (S/1994/546), the President of the Council indicated that the Council had considered the Secretary-General's letter and had agreed that urgent and effective means of action needed to be considered.

By resolution 965 (1994) of 30 November 1994, the mandate of UNAMIR was expanded to encompass the following tasks: (a) to contribute to the security and protection of displaced persons, refugees and civilians at risk in Rwanda, including through the establishment and maintenance, where feasible, of secure humanitarian areas; (b) to provide security and support for the distribution of relief supplies and humanitarian relief operations; (c) to exercise good offices to help achieve national reconciliation within the frame of reference of the Arusha Peace Agreement; (d) to contribute to the security in Rwanda of personnel of the International Tribunal for Rwanda and human rights officers, including full-time protection for the Prosecutor's Office, as well as security details for missions outside Kigali; and (e) to assist in the establishment and training of a new, integrated, national police force.

By resolution 997 (1995) of 9 June 1995, in the light of the situation in Rwanda, the mandate of UNAMIR, its tasks were: (a) to exercise its good offices to help achieve national reconciliation within the frame of reference of the Arusha Peace Agreement; (b) to assist the Government of Rwanda in facilitating the voluntary and safe return of refugees and their reintegration in their home communities, and, to that end, to support the Government of Rwanda in its ongoing efforts to promote a climate of confidence and trust through the performance of monitoring tasks throughout the country with military and police observers; (c) to support the provision of humanitarian aid, and of assistance and expertise in engineering, logistics, medical care and demining; (d) to assist in the training of a national police force; and (e) to contribute to the security in Rwanda of personnel and premises of United Nations agencies, of the International Tribunal for Rwanda, including full-time protection for the Prosecutor's Office, as well as those of human rights officers, and to contribute also to the security of humanitarian agencies in case of need.

By resolution 1029 (1995) of 12 December 1995, in the light of efforts to restore peace and stability through the voluntary and safe repatriation of Rwandan refugees, the Council adjusted the mandate of UNAMIR; it would: (a) exercise its good offices to assist in achieving the voluntary and safe repatriation of Rwandan refugees within the frame of reference of the recommendations of the Bujumbura Conference and the Cairo Summit of the Heads of State of the Great Lakes Region, and in promoting genuine national reconciliation; (b) assist the Government of Rwanda in facilitating the voluntary and safe return of refugees and, to this end, to support the Government of Rwanda in its ongoing efforts to promote a climate of confidence and trust through the performance of monitoring tasks; (c) assist the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees and other international agencies in the provision of logistical support for the repatriation of refugees; and (d) contribute, with the agreement of the Government of Rwanda, to the protection of the International Tribunal for Rwanda as an interim measure until alternative arrangements agreed with the Government of Rwanda could be put in place.

Change in strength

By resolution 912 (1994) of 21 April 1994, by which the mandate of UNAMIR was adjusted, the force level was authorized at 270 total, as set out as one of the options in the Secretary-General's special report dated 20 April 1994.¹⁰⁵

By resolution 918 (1994) of 17 May 1994, the Council authorized the expansion of the Mission's forces to a level up to 5,500, as recommended by the Secretary-General in his report dated 13 May 1994.¹⁰⁶

Subsequent to the Secretary-General's recommendation that civilian police be increased in order to fulfil its expanded functions,¹⁰⁷ by a letter dated 10 February 1995 from the President of the Council addressed to the Secretary-General,¹⁰⁸ Council members agreed that the strength of civilian police should be increased from 90 to 120 observers.

By resolution 997 (1995) of 9 June 1995, the Council authorized a reduction of the force level to 2,330 troops within three months of the adoption of the resolution and to 1,800 troops within four months, while maintaining the current level of military observers and civilian police personnel. By resolution 1029 (1995) of 12 December 1995, the Council requested the Secretary-General to reduce the force level to 1,200 troops and the number of military observers, headquarters and other military support staff to 200, and to withdraw the civilian police component.

Termination

By resolution 872 (1993) of 5 October 1993, the Council noted that the mandate of UNAMIR, if extended, was expected to terminate following national elections and the installation of a new Government of Rwanda, events which were scheduled to occur by October 1995, but no later than December 1995.

By resolution 1029 (1995) of 12 December 1995, the Council requested the Secretary-General to initiate planning for the complete withdrawal of UNAMIR after the expiry of the mandate on 8 March 1996, that withdrawal to take place within a period of six weeks after the expiry of the mandate.

10. United Nations Observer Mission in Liberia established pursuant to resolution 866 (1993)

Establishment

Following the signing of the Peace Agreement¹⁰⁹ on 25 July 1993 by the three Liberian parties at Cotonou, which called on the United Nations and the Military Observer Group of the Economic Community of West African States (ECOMOG) to assist in the implementation of the Agreement, by resolution 866 (1993) of 22 September 1993, the Security Council established the United Nations Observer Mission in Liberia (UNOMIL). UNOMIL was established, for an initial period of seven months, subject to the proviso that it would continue beyond 16 December 1993 only upon a Council review, based on a report from the Secretary-General, on whether or not substantive progress had been made towards the implementation of the Peace Agreement.

Mandate

As set out in resolution 866 (1993), the mandate of UNOMIL was as follows: (a) to receive and investigate all reports on alleged incidents of violations of the ceasefire agreement and, if the violation could not be corrected, to report its findings to the Violation Committee established pursuant to the Peace Agreement, and to the Secretary-General; (b) to monitor compliance with other elements of the Peace Agreement, including at points on Liberia's borders with Sierra Leone and other neighbouring countries, and to verify its impartial application, and in particular to assist in the monitoring of compliance with the embargo on delivery of arms and military equipment to Liberia and the cantonment, disarmament and demobilization of combatants; (c) to observe and verify the election process, including the legislative and presidential elections to be held in accordance with the provisions of the Peace Agreement; (d) to assist, as appropriate, in the coordination of humanitarian assistance activities in the field in conjunction with the existing United Nations humanitarian relief operation; (e) to develop a plan and assess financial requirements for the demobilization of combatants; (f) to report on any major violations of international humanitarian law to the Secretary-General; (g) to train the Military Observer Group engineers in mine clearance and, in cooperation with the Group, coordinate the identification of mines and assist in the clearance of mines and unexploded bombs; and (h) without participation in enforcement operations, to coordinate with the Military Observer Group in the discharge of the Group's separate responsibilities both formally, through the Violation Committee, and informally.

Composition

In accordance with resolution 866 (1993), and on the basis of the estimate by the Secretary-General,¹¹⁰ UNOMIL was to comprise 303 military observers, a military medical unit of at least 20 staff, a military engineering unit of 45 staff, an electoral component of 13 Professionals, 40 United Nations Volunteers and necessary support staff. Through exchanges of letters between the Secretary-General and the President of the Council, the Chief Military Observer of UNOMIL¹¹¹ and the countries contributing to the military elements of the Mission during the period under review¹¹² were confirmed.

Mandate implementation

During the period under review, by a series of resolutions,¹¹³ the Council extended the mandate of UNOMIL on six occasions for additional periods of between three and six months, on the basis of the reports of the Secretary-General.¹¹⁴ In particular, by resolution 1001 (1995) of 30 June 1995, the Council extended the mandate of the Mission until 15 September 1995, while declaring its intention that the mandate of the Mission would not be renewed on 15 September 1995, unless the Liberian parties made serious and substantial progress towards implementation of the Akosombo and Accra Agreements¹¹⁵ and specifically to accomplish the steps set out in that resolution, by that date. ¹¹⁵ S/1994/1174 and S/1995/7.

1014 (1995) of 15 September 1995, the Council, noting the positive political developments that the Liberian parties had made, extended the mandate of UNOMIL until 31 January 1996.

Following the consideration of the report of the Secretary-General,¹¹⁶ by resolution 950 (1994) of 21 October 1994, the Council recognized that the circumstances on the ground had warranted the Secretary-General's decision to reduce the strength of UNOMIL, and considered that any decision to return it to the authorized level would depend on the consideration by the Council of a further report from the Secretary-General reflecting a real improvement in the situation on the ground, in particular the security situation.

By resolution 972 (1995) of 13 January 1995, the Council requested that the Secretary-General base any decision to return the Mission and its civilian staff to the level authorized under resolution 866 (1993) on the existence of any effective ceasefire and on the ability of the Mission to carry out its mandate.

By resolution 1001 (1995) of 30 June 1995, the Council decided that if sufficient progress in the peace process regarding those steps in the resolution was achieved by 15 September 1995, the Council would consider restoring the Mission to its full strength with appropriate adjustment of its mandate.

By resolution 1014 (1995) of 15 September 1995, on the basis of the report of the Secretary-General,¹¹⁷ the Council, noting the positive political developments that the Liberian parties had made, welcomed the intention of the Secretary-General to increase immediately the number of military observers by 42, to monitor the ceasefire and the disengagement of forces.

By resolution 1020 (1995) of 10 November 1995, the number of military observers was decided to be a maximum of 160.

Following the signing of the Abuja Agreement by the parties on 19 August 1995,¹¹⁸ by resolution 1020 (1995) of 10 November 1995, the Council adjusted the mandate of UNOMIL as follows: (a) to exercise its good offices to support the efforts of the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS) and the Liberian National Transitional Government to implement the peace agreements and to cooperate with them for this purpose; (b) to investigate all allegations of violations of the ceasefire reported to the Ceasefire Violations Committee, to recommend measures to prevent the recurrence of such violations and to report to the Secretary-General accordingly; (c) to monitor compliance with the other military provisions of the peace agreements including disengagement of forces, disarmament and observance of the arms embargo and to verify their impartial application; (d) to assist, as appropriate, in the maintenance of assembly sites agreed upon by ECOMOG, the Liberian National Transitional Government and the factions, and in the implementation of a programme for demobilization of combatants, in cooperation with the Transitional Government, donor agencies and non-governmental organizations; (e) to support, as appropriate, humanitarian assistance activities; (f) to investigate and report to the Secretary-General on violations of human rights and to assist local human rights groups, as appropriate, in raising voluntary contributions for training and logistic support; and (g) to observe and verify the election process, in consultation with the Organization of African Unity and ECOWAS, including the legislative and presidential elections to be held in accordance with provisions of the peace agreements.

11. United Nations Aouzou Strip Observer Group established pursuant to resolution 915 (1994)

Establishment

By resolution 915 (1994) of 4 May 1994, the Council established the United Nations Aouzou Strip Observer Group (UNASOG) for a single period of up to 40 days, following the signing of an agreement between Chad and the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya on the implementation of the Judgment of the International Court of Justice regarding the Aouzou Strip.

Mandate

The mandate of UNASOG was, as set out by resolution 915 (1994), to observe the implementation of the agreement signed on 4 April 1994 at Surt by the Governments of Chad and the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya concerning the practical modalities for the implementation of the Judgment delivered by the International Court of Justice on 3 February 1994.¹¹⁹

The agreement called for the withdrawal of the Libyan administration and forces from the Aouzou Strip and for the United Nations observers to establish that the withdrawal had actually been effected, in accordance with article 1 thereof.

Composition

By resolution 915 (1994), the deployment of nine United Nations observers and six support staff to UNASOG was authorized.¹²⁰

Termination

Following the report of the Secretary-General in which he stated that UNASOG had successfully completed the task assigned to it by the Council and departed from the area on 5 June 1994,¹²¹ the Council, by resolution 926 (1994) of 13 June 1994, decided to terminate the mandate of the Group with immediate effect.

12. United Nations Observer Mission in El Salvador established pursuant to resolution 693 (1991)

During the period under review, the United Nations Observer Mission in El Salvador (ONUSAL) continued to fulfil its mandate, as set out in resolutions 693 (1991) and 729 (1991), of verifying and monitoring all agreements between the Government of El Salvador and the Frente Farabundo Martí para la Liberación Nacional, including a ceasefire and related measures, reform and reduction of the armed forces, creation of a new police force, reform of the judicial and electoral systems, human rights, land tenure and other economic and social issues.

By resolution 832 (1993) of 27 May 1993, noting that the Government of El Salvador had requested the United Nations to verify the general elections to be held in March 1994 and on the basis of the report of the Secretary-General,¹²² the Council enlarged the mandate of ONUSAL to include the observation of the electoral process due to conclude with the general elections.

During the period under review, by a series of resolutions,¹²³ the Council, on the basis of the reports of the Secretary-General,¹²⁴ extended the mandate of ONUSAL on four occasions until its termination on 30 April 1995.

Termination

By resolution 991 (1995), recognizing with satisfaction that El Salvador had evolved from a country riven by conflict into a democratic and peaceful nation, the Council paid tribute to the accomplishments of ONUSAL and affirmed, in accordance with paragraph 8 of resolution 961 (1994), that the mandate of ONUSAL would terminate as of 30 April 1995.¹²⁵

13. United Nations Mission in Haiti established pursuant to resolution 867 (1993)

¹²⁵ By an exchange of letters between the Secretary-General and the President of the Council (S/1995/143 and S/1995/144), it was agreed that, following the termination of ONUSAL, verification responsibilities and the good offices function would be carried out by a small United Nations office (to be known as the United Nations Mission in El Salvador (MINUSAL)) under the Secretary-General's authority, as proposed by the Secretary-General in his above-mentioned letter.

immediate dispatch, on an urgent basis, of the United Nations Mission in Haiti (UNMIH).¹²⁷

Mandate

The mandate of UNMIH was, as recommended by the Secretary-General,¹²⁸ to help implement the Governors Island Agreement, by providing guidance and training to the Haitian police and modernization of the armed forces. The Mission was established for a period of six months, subject to the provision that it would be extended beyond 75 days only upon a review by the Council to be based on a report from the Secretary-General on whether or not substantive progress had been made towards the implementation of the Governors Island Agreement and the political accords contained in the New York Pact.¹²⁹

Composition

As recommended by the Secretary-General in his report,¹³⁰ the Mission was initially to be composed of up to 567 United Nations police monitors and a military construction unit with a strength of approximately 700, including 60 military trainers. Through exchanges of letters between the Secretary-

General and the President of the Council, the composition of the military and police components¹³¹ and the Commanders of the military and police units of UNMIH¹³² were confirmed.

Mandate implementation

In a statement by the President of the Council dated 11 October 1993,¹³³ and similarly in the preamble to resolution 875 (1993), the Council expressed its concerns with the continued obstruction to the dispatch of UNMIH and the failure of the armed forces of Haiti to carry out their responsibilities to allow the Mission to begin its work. In a statement of the President of the Council dated 15 November 1993,¹³⁴ the Council requested the Secretary-General to continue planning for additional measures, including for an appropriate United Nations mission in Haiti to be deployed, as conditions permitted, consistent with the Governors Island Agreement. In his letter dated 10 December 1993,¹³⁵ the President of the Council informed the Secretary-General that Council members welcomed his report of 26 November 1993, on the basis of which they had found no reason why the mandate of UNMIH should not be continued for the full six-month period authorized by resolution 867 (1993).

While the deployment of UNMIH was not realized owing to the continued obstruction to the dispatch of UNMIH, the Council, by resolutions 905 (1994) of 23 March 1994 and 933 (1994) of 30 June 1994, decided to extend the mandate of UNMIH until 30 June 1994 and 31 July 1994, respectively, as recommended by the Secretary-General.¹³⁶ By resolution 975 (1995) of 30 January 1995, the Council decided to extend the mandate of UNMIH for a period of six months, until 31 July 1995. By resolution 1007 (1995) of 31 July 1995, the Council decided, in order to achieve the objectives established in resolution 940 (1994), to extend the mandate of UNMIH for a period of seven months.

¹²⁷ The Governors Island Agreement, as contained in the report of the Secretary-General dated 12 July 1993 (S/26063), signed by the President of Haiti and the Commander-in-Chief of the Haitian Armed Forces on 3 July 1993, called for international assistance in modernizing the armed forces of Haiti and establishing a new police force "with the presence of United Nations personnel" in those fields. In a letter dated 24 July 1993 addressed to the Secretary-General (S/26180), the President of Haiti conveyed proposals of the Government of Haiti for United Nations assistance in creating a new police force and professionalizing the Haitian armed forces. In his report dated 25 August 1993 (S/26352), the Secretary-General recommended the establishment of a United Nations Mission in Haiti consisting of civilian police and military assistance components, for an initial period of six months, to be dispatched as soon as the conditions set up in the Governors Island Agreement were met. By resolution 862 (1993), the Council approved the dispatch, as soon as possible, of an advance team, with a mandate expiring within a month, of not more than 30 personnel to assess requirements and prepare for the possible dispatch of both civilian police and military assistance components of the proposed mission.

By resolution 940 (1994) of 31 July 1994, the Council, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, authorized Member States to form a multinational force under unified command and control and to use all necessary means to facilitate the departure from Haiti of the military leadership, and decided to revise and extend the mandate of UNMIH, for a period of six months, to assist the democratic Government of Haiti in fulfilling its responsibilities in connection with (a) sustaining the secure and stable environment established during the multinational phase and protecting international personnel and key installations; and (b) the professionalization of the Haitian armed forces and the creation of a separate police force. Also, the Council requested that UNMIH assist the legitimate constitutional authorities of Haiti in establishing an environment conducive to the organization of free and fair legislative elections.

Transfer of responsibilities from multinational force. By resolution 975 (1995) of 30 January 1995, determining that a secure and stable environment appropriate for the deployment of UNMIH existed in Haiti, the Council authorized the Secretary-General to recruit and deploy military contingents, civilian police and other civilian personnel sufficient to allow UNMIH to assume the full range of its functions as established by resolution 867 (1993) and as revised and extended by paragraphs 9 and 10 of resolution 940 (1994). The Council also authorized the Secretary-General to take the necessary steps in order for UNMIH to assume those responsibilities as soon as possible, with the full transfer of responsibilities from the multinational force to the Mission to be completed by 31 March 1995.

By resolution 940 (1994) of 31 July 1994, the Council approved the establishment of an advance team of UNMIH of not more than 60 personnel, including a group of observers, whose term would expire on the date of termination of the mission of the multinational force, to establish the appropriate means of coordination with the multinational force, to carry out the monitoring of the operations of the multinational force and other functions described in paragraph 13 of the report of the Secretary-General of 15 July 1994,¹³⁷ and to assess requirements and to prepare for the deployment of UNMIH upon completion of the mission of the multinational force.

Also by the same resolution, the Council decided to increase the troop level of UNMIH to 6,000.

By resolution 944 (1994) of 29 September 1994, welcoming the peaceful deployment of initial units of the multinational force in Haiti on 19 September 1994, the Council requested the Secretary-General to take steps to ensure the immediate completion of the deployment of the observers and other elements of the 60-person advance team of UNMIH established pursuant to resolution 940 (1994) of 31 July 1994.

In a presidential statement dated 24 April 1995,¹³⁸ the Council welcomed the transfer of responsibilities from the multinational force to UNMIH on 31 March 1995. The Council also welcomed the Secretary-General's decision to coordinate the Mission's peacekeeping mission with development activities carried out by others, in a manner consistent with the Mission's mandate, to help the Government of Haiti to strengthen its institutions, particularly the judicial system.

By resolution 975 (1995) of 30 January 1995, the Council authorized the Secretary-General to deploy in Haiti, in accordance with resolution 940 (1994), up to 6,000 troops and, as recommended by the Secretary-General in his report,¹³⁹ up to 900 civilian police officers.

Termination

By resolution 940 (1994) of 31 July 1994, the Council established the objective of completing the Mission, in cooperation with the constitutional Government of Haiti, not later than February 1996.

15. United Nations Transitional Authority in Cambodia established pursuant to resolution 745 (1992)

Mandate implementation

The United Nations Transitional Authority in Cambodia (UNTAC) continued to ensure implementation of the Paris Agreements,¹⁴² including human rights monitoring, organization of elections, maintenance of law and order, repatriation and resettlement of refugees and internally displaced persons, and rehabilitation of Cambodian infrastructure. The mandate of UNTAC, in accordance with resolution 745 (1992), extended for a period not to exceed 18 months until the end of the transitional period, that is, until the establishment of a new Cambodian Government. Through exchanges of letters between the Secretary-General and the President of the Security Council,¹⁴³ countries contributing military personnel to UNTAC were confirmed.

Termination

By resolution 860 (1993) of 27 August 1993, the Council approved the withdrawal plan for UNTAC outlined by the Secretary-General in his reports.¹⁴⁴ Furthermore, the Council decided that the functions of UNTAC under the Paris Agreement should end upon the creation of a new government in Cambodia in September 1993, and that the period of withdrawal of the military component of UNTAC should end on 15 November 1993. In resolution 880 (1993) of 4 November 1993, the Council, recognizing termination of the mandate of UNTAC following the establishment of the constitutional government on 24 September 1993, paid tribute to the work of UNTAC. At the same time, while reiterating that the safe and orderly withdrawal of the military component of UNTAC provided for in resolution 860 (1993) should end on 15 November 1993, the Council extended the period of withdrawal, for the Mine Clearance and Training Unit, until 30 November 1993, and for elements of the military police and medical components of UNTAC, beyond 15 November 1993 on the basis that all of those elements would be withdrawn by 31 December 1993.¹⁴⁵

Following the signing by the Tajik parties of the Agreement on a Temporary Ceasefire and the Cessation of Other Hostile Acts on the Tajik-Afghan Border and Within the Country for the Duration of the Talks, at Tehran on 17 September 1994,¹⁴⁶ and subsequent to the consideration of the report of the Secretary-General,¹⁴⁷ the Council, by resolution 968 (1994) of 16 December 1994, established a United Nations Mission of Observers in Tajikistan (UNMOT), for a period of up to six months.

Mandate

UNMOT was mandated to undertake the following tasks: (a) to assist the Joint Commission to monitor the implementation of the Tehran

Agreement;¹⁴⁸ (b) to investigate reports of ceasefire violations and to report on them to the United Nations and to the Joint Commission; (c) to provide its good offices as stipulated in the Agreement; (d) to maintain close contacts with the parties to the conflict, as well as close liaison with the mission in Tajikistan of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe and with the collective peacekeeping forces in Tajikistan of the Commonwealth of Independent States and with the border forces; (e) to provide support for the efforts of the Special Envoy of the Secretary-General; and (f) to provide political liaison and coordination services, which could facilitate expeditious humanitarian assistance by the international community.

Composition

UNMOT was to consist of 40 military officers, four civilian professionals, and three to four civil affairs officers. Through an exchange of letters between the Secretary-General and the President of the Council,¹⁴⁹ the composition of the military elements of UNMOT was confirmed.

Mandate implementation

During the period under review, on six occasions, following consideration of the Secretary-General's progress reports, the Council, by a series of decisions and resolutions, extended the mandate of UNMOT; the last extension was until 15 June 1996.¹⁵⁰

Following the Secretary-General's recommendation in his reports,¹⁵¹ by a presidential statement dated 6 November 1995,¹⁵² the Council agreed to the establishment of a liaison post of UNMOT in Taloqan (northern Afghanistan) and supported the increase in the Mission's strength, to include five military observers and three civil affairs officers.

17. United Nations Peacekeeping Force in Cyprus established pursuant to resolution 186 (1964)

During the period under review, pursuant to resolution 186 (1964), the United Nations Peacekeeping Force in Cyprus (UNFICYP) continued to perform its task of conflict control.

Mandate implementation

Following the consideration of the reports of the Secretary-General,¹⁵³ the Security Council continued to extend the mandate of UNFICYP for six-month periods,¹⁵⁴ the last of which was to expire on 30 June 1996.

By resolution 831 (1993) of 27 May 1993, the Council decided that UNFICYP should be restructured as a first step on the basis of the Secretary-General's proposal¹⁵⁵ — which would reduce the Force to the minimum number of infantry battalions required to maintain effective control of the buffer zone — and with the addition of a limited number of observers for reconnaissance, with a view to further restructuring in the light of a comprehensive reassessment to be conducted in December 1993. However, by resolution 889 (1993) of 15 December 1993, the Council noted the Secretary-General's conclusion that the prevailing circumstances did not allow for any modification in the strength and structure of UNFICYP,¹⁵⁶ and requested him to keep those matters under constant review with a view to possible restructuring. The Council reiterated

18. United Nations Protection Force in the former Yugoslavia established pursuant to resolution 743 (1992)

Until the termination of the mandate of the United Nations Protection Force (UNPROFOR) on 20 December 1995, the Council, by a series of resolutions,¹⁵⁸ extended the mandate of the Force for durations of two to eight months, with a few exceptions.¹⁵⁹

During the period under review, the Council authorized the increase in the strength of UNPROFOR on five occasions:¹⁶⁰ by resolution 824 (1993) of 6 May 1993, by an additional 50 military observers; by resolution 844 (1993) of 18 June 1993, by an increase of some 7,600 personnel;¹⁶¹ by resolution 908 (1994) of 31 March 1994, by up to 3,500 additional troops;¹⁶² by resolution 914 (1994) of 27 April 1994, by up to 6,550 additional troops, 150 military observers and 275 civilian police monitors;¹⁶³ and by resolution 998 (1995) of 16 June 1995, by up to 12,500 additional troops.¹⁶⁴ Through exchanges of letters between the Secretary-General and the President of the Council, the Force Commander of UNPROFOR,¹⁶⁵ and the countries contributing to the Force during the period under review¹⁶⁶ were confirmed.

By resolution 836 (1993) of 4 June 1993, the Council, acting under Chapter VII, decided to expand the mandate of UNPROFOR, in order to enable it in the safe areas referred to in resolution 824 (1993), (a) to deter attacks against the safe areas, (b) to monitor the ceasefire, (c) to promote the withdrawal of military or paramilitary units other than those of the Government of the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina and (d) to occupy some key points on the ground, in addition to participating in the delivery of humanitarian relief to the population, as provided for in resolution 776 (1992). By the same resolution, the Council requested the Secretary-General (a) to make the adjustments or reinforcement of the Force, and to consider assignment of elements of UNPROFOR in support of the elements entrusted with protection of safe areas, and (b) to direct the Force Commander to redeploy to the extent possible the forces under his command in Bosnia and Herzegovina.

Use of force. Also by that resolution, the Council authorized UNPROFOR, in carrying out its mandate, acting in self-defence, to take the necessary measures, including the “use of force”, in reply to bombardments against the safe areas by any of the parties or to armed incursion into them or in the event of any deliberate obstruction in or around those areas to the freedom of movement of UNPROFOR or of protected humanitarian convoys. By resolution 871 (1993) of 4 October 1993, the Council also authorized UNPROFOR, in carrying out its mandate in Croatia, acting in self-defence, to take the necessary measures,

¹⁵⁹ Prior to the extension of the mandate for six months, until 31 March 1994, by resolution 871 (1993), the Council extended the mandate for a short period of time: by resolution 869 (1993) of 30 September 1993 until 1 October 1993 and by resolution 970 (1993) of 1 October 1993 until 5 October 1993.

¹⁶⁰ In addition, by a statement by the President of the Council of 3 March 1993 (S/25361), the Council, concerned about the continuing military attacks in eastern Bosnia, requested the Secretary-General to take immediate steps to increase the presence of UNPROFOR in eastern Bosnia; following the rapid deterioration of the situation in Srebrenica and its surrounding areas, the Council, by resolution 819 (1993) of 16 April 1993, requested the Secretary-General, with a view to monitoring the humanitarian situation in the safe area, to take immediate steps to increase the presence of UNPROFOR in Srebrenica and its surroundings.

including the “use of force”, to ensure its security and its freedom of movement.

Establishment of three interlinked peacekeeping operations. By resolution 871 (1993) of 4 October 1993, the Council noted the Secretary-General’s intention¹⁶⁷ to establish three subordinate commands within UNPROFOR, namely, UNPROFOR (Croatia), UNPROFOR (Bosnia and Herzegovina) and UNPROFOR (the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia), while retaining the existing dispositions in all other respects for the direction and the conduct of the United Nations operation in the territory of the former Yugoslavia.

Expansion of mandate. By resolution 947 (1994) of 30 September 1994, the Council approved the Secretary-General’s proposals concerning UNPROFOR activities in relation to mine-clearance, public information and civilian police.¹⁶⁸

Reaffirmation of mandate of UNPROFOR (Bosnia and Herzegovina). By resolution 982 (1995) of 31 March 1995, the Council authorized the Secretary-General to redeploy before 30 June 1995, all UNPROFOR personnel and assets from Croatia, and decided that (a) UNPROFOR should continue to perform fully the functions envisaged in the implementation of the Ceasefire Agreement¹⁶⁹ of 29 March 1994 and the Economic Agreement¹⁷⁰ of 2 December 1994 between the Republic of Croatia and the local Serb authorities and all relevant Council resolutions, and to facilitate the delivery of international humanitarian assistance to Bosnia and Herzegovina through the territory of Croatia until the effective deployment of the United Nations Confidence Restoration Operation in Croatia or 30 June 1995, whichever was sooner; and (b) UNPROFOR should retain its existing support structures in Croatia including the operation of its headquarters.

By resolution 1031 (1995) of 15 December 1995, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, the Council decided that the mandate of UNPROFOR should terminate on the date on which the Secretary-General reported to the Council that the transfer of authority from UNPROFOR to a multinational implementation force had taken place, and approved the arrangements set out in the report of the Secretary-General on the withdrawal of UNPROFOR and headquarters elements from the United Nations Peace Force. On 20 December 1995, the transfer of authority from UNPROFOR to the multinational implementation force was effected.

19. United Nations Confidence Restoration Operation in Croatia established pursuant to resolution 981 (1995)

Establishment

By resolution 981 (1995) of 31 March 1995, noting the letter from the representative of Croatia dated 17 March 1995 regarding his Government’s views on the establishment of a United Nations peacekeeping operation in the Republic of Croatia,¹⁷¹ and acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, the Council decided to establish the United Nations Confidence Restoration Operation in Croatia (UNCRO), in accordance with the report of the Secretary-General,¹⁷² for a period terminating on 30 November 1995.

Mandate and composition

As set out in resolution 981 (1995), the mandate of UNCRO included (a) performing fully the functions envisaged in the Ceasefire Agreement of 29 March 1994 between the Republic of Croatia and the local Serb authorities;¹⁷³ (b) facilitating implementation of the Economic Agreement of 2 December 1994;¹⁷⁴ (c) facilitating implementation of all relevant Council resolutions; (d) assisting in controlling, by monitoring and reporting, the crossing of military personnel, equipment, supplies and weapons, over the international borders between Croatia and Bosnia and Herzegovina, and Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) at the border crossings for which UNCRO was responsible; (e) facilitating the delivery of international humanitarian assistance to Bosnia and Herzegovina, through the territory of Croatia; (f) monitoring the demilitarization of the Prevlaka peninsula in accordance with resolution 779 (1992). It was also decided that UNCRO should be an interim arrangement to create the conditions that would facilitate a negotiated settlement consistent with the territorial integrity of Croatia and which guaranteed the security and rights of all communities living in a particular area of Croatia, irrespective of whether they constituted in that area a majority or minority. To fulfil the above-mentioned functions, by resolution 990 (1995) of 28 April 1995, the Council approved the arrangements, as proposed by the Secretary-General,¹⁷⁵ for the implementation of the mandate of UNCRO. As recommended by the Secretary-General,¹⁷⁶ and as authorized by resolution 990 (1995) of 28 April 1995, UNCRO was authorized with an overall total of some 8,750 troops.

By resolution 1025 (1995) of 30 November 1995, the Council decided that the mandate of UNCRO should terminate on 15 January 1996 or when the Council had decided on the deployment, including on the necessary period for the transfer of authority, of the transitional peacekeeping force, whichever was sooner.

20. United Nations Preventive Deployment Force in the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia established pursuant to resolution 983 (1995)

Establishment

By resolution 983 (1995) of 31 March 1995, the Council decided that UNPROFOR within the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia should be known as the United Nations Preventive Deployment Force (UNPREDEP) whose mandate should continue for a period terminating on 30 November 1995.

Mandate and composition

As recommended by the Secretary-General,¹⁷⁷ UNPREDEP would have the same responsibilities and composition as UNPROFOR had in the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia.

Mandate implementation

21. United Nations Mission in Bosnia and Herzegovina established pursuant to resolution 1035 (1995)

Establishment

By resolution 1035 (1995) of 21 December 1995, the Council, endorsing the arrangements set out in the report of the Secretary-General,¹⁷⁸ established an International Police Task Force and a United Nations civilian office (both to be known as the “United Nations Mission in Bosnia and Herzegovina (UNMIBH)”), for a period of one year from the transfer of authority from UNPROFOR to the multinational implementation force.

Mandate

The International Police Task Force was entrusted with the tasks set out in annex 11 of the Peace Agreement, that is, to assist the parties in carrying out their law enforcement responsibilities. The United Nations civilian office was entrusted with the responsibilities set out in the report of the Secretary-General.¹⁷⁸

22. United Nations Observer Mission in Georgia established pursuant to resolution 858 (1993)

Establishment

By resolution 858 (1993) of 24 August 1993, the Council established a United Nations Observer Mission in Georgia (UNOMIG) in accordance with the report of the Secretary-General.¹⁷⁹ UNOMIG was established for a period of six months, subject to the proviso that it would be extended beyond the initial 90-day period only upon a review by the Council based on a report from the Secretary-General on whether or not substantive progress had been made towards implementing measures aimed at establishing a lasting peace.

¹⁷⁹ S/26250 and Add.1. Prior to the establishment of UNOMIG, by resolution 854 (1993), the Council approved the Secretary-General’s proposal, contained in his letter dated 4 August 1993 (S/26254), that an advance team of up to 10 United Nations military observers be deployed to the region, as soon as possible, to begin to help verify compliance with the ceasefire as envisaged in the Ceasefire Agreement of 27 July 1993, the mandate of the team to expire within three months.

Mandate

The mandate of UNOMIG, in accordance with resolution 858 (1993), was the following: (a) to verify compliance with the ceasefire agreement of 27 July 1993, with special attention to the situation in Sukhumi; (b) to investigate reports of ceasefire violations and to attempt to resolve such incidents with the parties involved; and (c) to report to the Secretary-General on the implementation of its mandate including, in particular, violations of the ceasefire agreement.

Composition

UNOMIG would comprise up to 88 military observers, plus minimal staff necessary to support the Mission. Through exchanges of letters between the Secretary-General and the President of the Council, the Chief Military Observer of UNOMIG¹⁸⁰ and the countries contributing military elements to the Mission¹⁸¹ were confirmed.

Mandate implementation

During the period under review, by a series of resolutions,¹⁸² and on the basis of the reports of the Secretary-General,¹⁸³ the Council successively extended the mandate of UNOMIG for additional interim periods, the last of which was until 12 January 1996. The Council also adopted the following provisions: by resolution 881 (1993) of 4 November 1993, the Council decided that UNOMIG would not be extended beyond 31 January 1994, unless the Secretary-General reported to it that substantive progress had been made towards implementing measures aimed at establishing a lasting peace or that the peace process would be served by the prolongation of its mandate. By resolution 993 (1995) of 12 May 1995, the Council decided to extend the mandate of UNOMIG, subject to review by the Council in the event of any changes that might be made in the mandate of the CIS peacekeeping force.

Noting with concern that the original mandate of UNOMIG had been overtaken by the military developments of 16 to 27 September 1993, the Council, by resolution 881 (1993) of 4 November 1993, on the basis of the report of the Secretary-General,¹⁸⁴ approved the continued presence of UNOMIG until 31 January 1994, comprising up to five military observers plus minimal support staff. The interim mandate set out by resolution 881 (1993) was: (a) to maintain contacts with both sides to the conflict and military contingents of the Russian Federation; and (b) to monitor the situation and report to Headquarters, with particular reference to any developments relevant to the efforts of the United Nations to promote a comprehensive political settlement.

Following the consideration of the Secretary-General's letter dated 16 December 1993,¹⁸⁵ by resolution 892 (1993) of 22 December 1993, the Council, noting that encouraging progress had been achieved in the negotiations between the parties, which justified the deployment of additional United Nations military observers, authorized the phased deployment of up to 50 additional military observers to UNOMIG. Those military observers were to perform the interim mandate described in resolution 881 (1993), and in a manner to contribute to the implementation by the parties of the provisions of the memorandum of understanding of 1 December 1993.¹⁸⁶

In a presidential statement of 8 April 1994,¹⁸⁷ the Council supported a further increase in the deployed strength of UNOMIG up to the limit specified in resolution 892 (1993) — 55 military observers — if the

Expanded UNOMIG

Following the signing of the Agreement on a Ceasefire and Separation of Forces,¹⁸⁹ in Moscow on 14 May 1994, by resolution 937 (1994) of 21 July 1994, the Council authorized the increase in the strength of UNOMIG, as required, up to 136 military observers with appropriate civilian support staff.

The expanded mandate of the Mission was as follows: (a) to monitor and verify the implementation by the parties of the Agreement; (b) to observe the operation of the CIS peacekeeping force within the framework of the implementation of the Agreement; (c) to verify, through observation and patrolling, that troops of the parties did not remain in or re-enter the security zone and that heavy military equipment did not remain or was not reintroduced in the security zone or the restricted weapons zone; (d) to monitor the storage areas for heavy military equipment withdrawn from the security zone and the restricted weapons zone in cooperation with the CIS peacekeeping force as appropriate; (e) to monitor the withdrawal of troops of the Republic of Georgia from the Kodori valley to places beyond the boundaries of Abkhazia, Georgia; (f) to patrol regularly the Kodori valley; (g) to investigate, at the request of either party or the CIS peacekeeping force or on its own initiative, reported or alleged violations of the Agreement, and to attempt to resolve or contribute to the resolution of such incidents; (h) to report regularly to the Secretary-General within its mandate, in particular on the implementation of the Agreement, any violations and their investigation by the Mission, as well as other relevant developments; and (i) to maintain close contacts with both parties to the conflict and to cooperate with the CIS peacekeeping force and, by its presence in the area, to contribute to conditions conducive to the safe and orderly return of refugees and displaced persons.

23. United Nations Truce Supervision Organization established pursuant to resolution 50 (1948)

From 1993 to 1995, the military observers of the United Nations Truce Supervision Organization (UNTSO) continued to assist and cooperate with the United Nations Disengagement Observer Force (UNDOF), in accordance with the ceasefire and disengagement agreements of 1973/1974, and with the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon (UNIFIL) established in 1978, in accordance with its terms of reference.

24. United Nations Disengagement Observer Force established pursuant to resolution 350 (1974)

During the period under review, the United Nations Disengagement Observer Force (UNDOF), stationed at the armistice line between Israel and the Syrian Arab Republic, continued to serve as an interposition force between the parties.

Mandate implementation

The Security Council extended the mandate of UNDOF on six occasions¹⁹⁰ following consideration of the reports of the Secretary-General.¹⁹¹ Through exchanges of letters between the Secretary-General and the President of the Council, the troop-contributing countries¹⁹² and the Force Commander of UNDOF during the period under review¹⁹³ were confirmed.

¹⁸⁸ By a letter dated 16 June 1994 from the President of the Council to the Secretary-General (S/1994/714), Council members, following the consideration of the latter's report (S/1994/529 and Add.1), noted the Secretary-General's intention, as a first step and in consultation with the parties, to increase the number of military observers of UNOMIG up to 55 as authorized by the Council in its resolution 892 (1993). Council members further noted the Secretary-General's ideas for a possible mandate for an expanded Mission (S/1994/529/Add.1, para. 7) and his provisional assessment of the strength of the Mission that might be required to perform that task.

25. United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon established pursuant to resolutions 425 (1978) and 426 (1978)

During the period under review, the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon (UNIFIL) continued to fulfil its mandate of confirming the withdrawal of Israeli forces, restoring international peace and security and assisting the Government of Lebanon in restoring its effective authority in the area.

Mandate implementation

During the period under review, following the consideration of the reports of the Secretary-General on UNIFIL,¹⁹⁴ the Council, by adopting six resolutions,¹⁹⁵ successively extended the Force's mandate; the last extension was until 31 January 1996. Through an exchange of letters between the Secretary-General and the President of the Council,¹⁹⁶ the change of the Force Commander of UNIFIL was confirmed.

By resolution 1006 (1995)¹⁹⁷ of 28 July 1995, the Council concurred with the streamlining of the Force, as proposed by the Secretary-General,¹⁹⁸ to reduce the strength of UNIFIL by 10 per cent, without affecting its operational capacity.

26. United Nations Iraq-Kuwait Observation Mission established pursuant to resolution 687 (1991)

The United Nations Iraq-Kuwait Observation Mission (UNIKOM) continued to monitor the Khawr 'Abd Allah and the demilitarized zone between Iraq and Kuwait, to deter violations of the boundary, and to observe any hostile or potentially hostile action mounted from the territory of one State against the other.

During the period under review, in accordance with resolution 689 (1991),¹⁹⁹ the Council held periodic reviews of the question of termination or continuation of UNIKOM and its modalities of operation, on the basis of the reports of the Secretary-General.²⁰⁰ By letters from the President of the Council addressed to the Secretary-General,²⁰¹ Council members continued to concur with the Secretary-General's recommendation that UNIKOM be maintained. In a letter dated 6 October 1995 from the President of the Council addressed to the Secretary-General, Council members decided to review the question once again by 6 April 1996. Through exchanges of letters between the Secretary-General and the President of the Council, the Force Commander of UNIKOM²⁰² and the troop-contributing countries to the Mission during the period under review²⁰³ were confirmed.

By resolution 806 (1993) of 5 February 1993, the Council, approving the report of the Secretary-General of 18 and 19 January 1993,²⁰⁴ decided to extend the terms of reference of UNIKOM to include the capacity to take action to prevent or redress (a) small-scale violations of the demilitarized zone; (b) violations of the boundary between Iraq and Kuwait, for example by civilians or police; and (c) problems that might arise from the presence of Iraqi installations and Iraqi citizens and their assets in the demilitarized zone on the Kuwaiti side of the newly demarcated boundary.

D. Security Council committees

During the period 1993 to 1995, the Council established four new Security Council committees to ¹⁹⁹ By which the Security Council decided that UNIKOM could be terminated only by a further decision of the Council and that the Council should review the question of termination or continuation of UNIKOM and its modalities of operation every six months.

supervise the implementation of measures adopted pursuant to Chapter VII against Haiti,²⁰⁵ the National Union for the Total Independence of Angola,²⁰⁶ Rwanda²⁰⁷ and Liberia.²⁰⁸ During the same period, the previously established Council committees concerning the question of South Africa, the situation between Iraq and Kuwait, the former Yugoslavia, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya and Somalia continued their work. Of nine Security Council committees in total, two were terminated during the reporting period.²⁰⁹

General issues

On 29 March 1995, in a note by the President,²¹⁰ Council members confirmed their agreement to the following proposals:

“The following improvements should be introduced to make the procedures of the Sanctions Committees more transparent:

“(a) The practice of issuing press releases after meetings of the Committee should be increased;

“(b) The status-of-communication lists under the ‘no objection’ procedure prepared by the Secretariat should be made available to any delegation which wishes to have a copy;

“(c) A list of all other decisions by each active Committee should be prepared by the Secretariat, on a regular basis, and be made available to any delegation which requests it;

“(d) The annual report of the Council to the General Assembly should contain, in the introduction, more information about each Committee than it does at present;²¹¹

“(e) An annual report to the Council should be prepared by each Committee, providing a concise indication of each Committee’s activities;

“(f) An effort should be made to expedite the preparations of the summary records of each Committee.

“For the implementation of these measures, the existing procedures of the Committees should be respected.

“Meetings of the sanctions Committees should remain closed, as they are now, and the summary records of those meetings should continue to be distributed according to the existing pattern.”

On 31 May 1995, in a second note by the President,²¹² Council members confirmed their agreement to the following proposal:

“The practice of hearing comments by States and organizations concerned during closed meetings of the sanctions Committees on issues arising from implementation of sanctions regimes imposed by the Security Council should be continued while respecting the existing procedures followed by such Committees.”

1. Security Council Committee established pursuant to resolution 421 (1977) concerning the question of South Africa

Termination

The Committee established pursuant to resolution 421 (1977) following the imposition of an arms embargo against South Africa,²¹³ was dissolved during the period under review. On 25 May 1994, welcoming the establishment of “a united, democratic and non-racial government of South Africa”, which was inaugurated on 10 May with Mr. Nelson Mandela as President, the Security Council adopted resolution 919 (1994). By this resolution the Council terminated the arms embargo against South Africa and decided to dissolve the Committee effective from the date of the adoption of the resolution.

2. Security Council Committee established pursuant to resolution 661 (1990) concerning the situation between Iraq and Kuwait

period under review.²¹⁵ The Committee submitted, in accordance with the guidelines approved under Council resolution 700 (1991), twelve reports on the implementation of the arms embargo and related sanctions.²¹⁶

On 14 April 1995, by resolution 986 (1995), the Council authorized the sale and transport of Iraqi petroleum and petroleum products sufficient to produce a sum not exceeding a total of US$ 1 billion every 90 days, to meet the humanitarian needs of the Iraqi population and for other purposes.²¹⁷ Each proposed purchase of Iraqi petroleum and petroleum products was made subject to approval by the Committee established pursuant to resolution 661 (1990). The Committee was also directed to monitor the sale of petroleum and petroleum products to be exported by Iraq via the Kirkuk-Yumurtalik pipeline and from the Mina al-Bakr oil terminal, with the assistance of independent inspection agents appointed by the Secretary-General.

In addition, by resolution 986 (1995), the Security Council authorized the export to Iraq of parts and equipment that were essential for the safe operation of the Kirkuk-Yumurtalik pipeline. Each export contract was made subject to approval by the Committee, as were the financing arrangements for such exports and related activities. The Committee was requested, in close coordination with the Secretary-General, to develop expedited procedures as necessary to implement the arrangements contained in specific paragraphs of the resolution.

Resolution 986 (1995) was, however, not implemented during the period covered by the present Supplement, owing to objections made by Iraq.²¹⁸

By a letter dated 7 December 1995 addressed to the President of the Security Council,²¹⁹ the Chairman of the Committee forwarded to the Council, in accordance with the Council's request,²²⁰ a proposal for a mechanism to monitor Iraq's exports and imports of dual-purpose capabilities.

By a letter dated 26 August 1996 addressed to the President of the Security Council,²²¹ the Chairman of the Committee submitted, in accordance with the presidential note of 29 March 1995,²²² a report focusing primarily on the Committee's activities during 1995 and early 1996.

3. Security Council Committee established pursuant to resolution 724 (1991) concerning the former Yugoslavia

Mandate implementation

The Committee established pursuant to resolution 724 (1991) following the imposition of an arms embargo against the territory of the former Yugoslavia²²³ and, subsequently, the imposition of a comprehensive sanctions regime consisting of economic, financial and diplomatic sanctions,²²⁴ as well as prohibitions on participation in sporting events, on scientific and technical cooperation and on cultural exchanges and visits, against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) continued to exist during the period under review.²²⁵

On 17 April 1993 by resolution 820 (1993), the Council tightened the existing economic and financial sanctions against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. Certain exemptions to the sanctions were made subject to approval by the Committee established pursuant to resolution 724 (1991).²²⁶ The Committee was also requested to submit periodic reports on information submitted to it regarding alleged violations of the relevant Council resolutions, identifying where possible persons or entities, including vessels, reported to be engaged in such violations. By the same resolution, the Council imposed economic sanctions against the Bosnian Serbs.

On 18 June 1993, by resolution 843 (1993), the Council confirmed that the Committee established pursuant to resolution 724 (1991) was entrusted with the task of examining requests for assistance under the provisions of Article 50 of the Charter. The Council welcomed the establishment by the Committee of a working group to examine these requests, and invited the Committee, as it completed the examination of each request, to make recommendations to the President of the Security Council for appropriate action.

On 23 September 1994, by resolution 942 (1994), the Council imposed additional economic sanctions, as well as an assets freeze and a travel ban, targeting the Bosnian Serb forces. Certain exemptions to the sanctions were made subject to approval by the Committee established pursuant to resolution 724 (1991).²²⁷ The Committee was also requested to establish and maintain an updated list of persons meeting the criteria established for the imposition of the travel sanctions.

On 23 September 1994 by resolution 943 (1994), the Council suspended the prohibitions on participation in sporting events and cultural exchanges as well as the economic sanctions relating to the operation of certain aircraft and ferries.²²⁸ The Council also invited the Committee established pursuant to resolution 724 (1991) to adopt appropriate streamlined procedures for expediting its consideration of applications concerning legitimate humanitarian assistance, in particular applications from the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees and the International Committee of the Red Cross.

In 1994 and 1995, following recommendations to that effect from the Committee,²²⁹ the Security Council, by resolutions 967 (1994) and 992 (1995), respectively, made temporary exceptions to the economic sanctions against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia.²³⁰ In the latter resolution, which allowed the passage of vessels of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia through the lock system on the left bank of the Danube while the lock system on the right bank was being repaired, the Council also decided that the Chairman of the Committee should, after consulting members of the Committee, transmit to the Council any substantiated evidence of a violation of the relevant Council resolutions by those vessels. The resolution also confirmed that the import to the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia of supplies essential to the repair was subject to approval by the Committee.

Following the initialling of the General Framework for Peace in Bosnia and Herzegovina (the "Peace Agreement") by the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina, the Republic of Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia on 21 November 1995 at Dayton, Ohio, signifying agreement between the parties to formally sign the Peace Agreement, the Security Council, on 22 November 1995, by resolution 1021 (1995), terminated the general arms embargo maintained against the successor States of the former Yugoslavia under resolution 713 (1991), on a phased schedule. On the same day the Council also adopted resolution 1022 (1995), by which it suspended the sanctions against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia; it left the sanctions against the Bosnian Serb party in place until the latter had met certain obligations.

4. Security Council Committee established pursuant to resolution 748 (1992) concerning the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya

The Committee established pursuant to resolution 748 (1992) at the same time as the imposition of sanctions against the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, which consisted of an arms embargo together with aviation, travel and diplomatic sanctions, continued to exist during the period under review.²³¹ On 11 November 1993 by resolution 883 (1993), the Council expanded the sanctions regime to include additional aviation-related sanctions, financial sanctions, and prohibitions on the supply of equipment used to refine, transport and export oil. The Council instructed the Committee established pursuant to resolution 748 (1992) to draw up expeditiously guidelines for the implementation of the relevant provisions of resolution 883 (1993), and to amend and supplement, as appropriate, the guidelines for the implementation of the relevant provisions of resolution 748 (1992), especially the paragraph relating to the non-provision of arms and military equipment and expertise. It also entrusted the Committee with the task of examining possible requests for assistance under the provisions of Article 50 of the Charter and making recommendations to the President of the Security Council for appropriate action.

On two occasions in 1994, the Security Council requested the Secretary-General to inform the Committee of flights made to or from the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya,²³² by the Secretary-General's reconnaissance team and, subsequently, the United Nations Aouzou Strip Observer Group, both of which were exempted from the aviation sanctions.

By a letter dated 29 December 1995 addressed to the President of the Security Council,²³³ the Chairman of the Committee submitted, in accordance with the presidential note of 29 March 1995,²³⁴ a report on the Committee's activities since the beginning of that year.

6. Security Council Committee established pursuant to resolution 841 (1993) concerning Haiti

Establishment and mandate

On 16 June 1993, by resolution 841 (1993), the Council, targeting the "de facto authorities" in Haiti, imposed an arms embargo and financial and petroleum sanctions. The Council also decided to establish, in accordance with rule 28 of its provisional rules of procedure, a committee of the Security Council, consisting of all the members of the Council, to undertake the following tasks and to report on its work with observations and recommendations: (a) to examine the reports submitted by States on the measures they had initiated for meeting their obligations concerning the sanctions; (b) to seek from all States further information regarding the action taken by them concerning the effective implementation of the resolution; (c) to consider any information brought to its attention by States concerning violations of the measures imposed by the present resolution and to recommend appropriate measures in response thereto; (d) to consider and decide expeditiously requests for the approval of imports of petroleum and petroleum products for essential humanitarian needs in accordance with the relevant provision of the resolution; (e) to make periodic reports to the Council on information submitted to it regarding alleged violations of the resolution, identifying where possible persons or entities, including vessels, reported to be engaged in such violations; and (f) to promulgate guidelines to facilitate implementation of the resolution.

Mandate implementation

Following the signing of the Governors Island Agreement between the President of Haiti and the Commander-in-Chief of the Armed Forces in Haiti, and the confirmation and assumption of office of the Prime Minister of Haiti, the Security Council, on 27 August 1993, by resolution 861 (1993), suspended the sanctions against Haiti. On 13 October 1993 the Council adopted resolution 873 (1993), noting that the military authorities in Haiti had not complied in good faith with the Governors Island Agreement and thus revoking the suspension of sanctions. The Council also decided that the Committee established pursuant to resolution 841 (1993) would have the authority to grant exceptions to the financial sanctions, and to the other prohibitions on a case-by-case basis under the no-objection procedure, at the request of President Aristide or Prime Minister Malval of Haiti.

On 6 May 1994 by resolution 917 (1994), the Council imposed additional measures against Haiti, consisting of economic sanctions, aviation sanctions (excluding regularly scheduled commercial passenger flights) and a travel ban on individuals to be designated based on the criteria contained in the resolution. The Council also decided that the Committee established pursuant to resolution 841 (1993) would undertake the following tasks in addition to those set out in resolutions 841 (1993) and 873 (1993): (a) to maintain an updated list, based on information provided by States and regional organizations, of persons subject to the travel ban; (b) to examine the reports submitted by States on the measures they had initiated on the implementation of resolution 917 (1994) and earlier relevant resolutions; (c) to seek from all States, in particular neighbouring States, further information regarding the action taken by them concerning the effective implementation of the measures contained in the resolution and earlier relevant resolutions; (d) to consider any information brought to its attention by States concerning violations of such measures and, in that context, to make recommendations to the Council on ways to increase their effectiveness; (e) to make recommendations in response to violations of such measures and provide information on a regular basis to the Secretary-General for general distribution to Member States; (f) to consider and to decide upon expeditiously any application by States for the approval of flights or entries exempt from the aviation and travel sanctions; (g) to amend the guidelines referred to in resolution 841 (1993) to take into account the measures contained in the present resolution; and (h) to examine possible requests for assistance under Article 50 of the Charter and to make recommendations to the President of the Council for appropriate action.

Termination

On 29 September 1994 by resolution 944 (1994), the Council decided to terminate the sanctions against Haiti and to dissolve the Committee established pursuant to resolution 841 (1994), with effect from 0001 hours eastern standard time on the day after the return to Haiti of President Aristide.

7. Security Council Committee established pursuant to resolution 864 (1993) concerning the situation in Angola

Establishment and mandate

On 15 September 1993, by section B of resolution 864 (1993), the Security Council imposed an arms embargo and petroleum sanctions against the National Union for the Total Independence of Angola (UNITA). The Council also decided to establish, in accordance with rule 28 of its provisional rules of procedure, a committee of the Security Council, consisting of all the members of the Council, to undertake the following tasks and to report on its work with observations and recommendations: (a) to examine the reports that all States were requested to submit, by 15 October 1993 to the Secretary-General, on the measures they had adopted in order to meet their obligations concerning the sanctions against UNITA; (b) to seek from all States further information regarding the action taken by them with a view to effectively implementing the sanctions; (c) to consider information brought to its attention by States concerning violations of the sanctions and to recommend appropriate measures in response thereto; (d) to make periodic reports to the Council on information submitted to it regarding alleged violations of the sanctions, identifying where possible persons or entities, including vessels, reported to be engaged in such violations; and (e) to promulgate guidelines that may be necessary to facilitate the implementation of the sanctions.

Mandate implementation

On 30 June 1994 by resolution 932 (1994), the Council, inter alia, urged the two neighbouring States which had thus far failed to respond substantively to the requests from the Committee established pursuant to resolution 864 (1993) for information required regarding alleged sanctions violations to do so promptly. It also requested the Committee to provide a report, by 15 July 1994, on compliance with the sanctions regime and in particular on possible violations of that regime by those neighbouring States. The Committee submitted its report pursuant to paragraph 8 of resolution 932 (1994).²³⁷ A similar reminder of their obligations vis-à-vis the Committee was addressed to the Member States concerned in a subsequent presidential statement.²³⁸

8. Security Council Committee established pursuant to resolution 918 (1994) concerning Rwanda

Establishment and mandate

On 17 May 1994, by section B of resolution 918 (1994), the Security Council imposed an arms embargo against Rwanda. The Council also decided to establish, in accordance with rule 28 of its provisional rules of procedure, a committee of the Security Council consisting of all the members of the Council to undertake the following tasks and to report on its work with observations and recommendations: (a) to seek from all States information regarding the action taken by them concerning the effective implementation of the arms embargo; (b) to consider any information brought to its attention by States concerning violations of the embargo, and in that context to make recommendations to the Council on ways of increasing the effectiveness of the embargo; and (c) to recommend appropriate measures in response to the violations of the embargo and provide information on a regular basis to the Secretary-General for general distribution to all Member States.

Mandate implementation

In a presidential statement of 27 April 1995,²³⁹ the Council, inter alia, invited States and organizations which had information on the transport of arms into countries neighbouring Rwanda for the purpose of their use in Rwanda in contravention of resolution 918 (1994) to pass that information to the Committee established pursuant to resolution 918 (1994), and requested the Committee to consider that information as a matter of urgency and to report thereon to the Council. On 17 July 1995 by resolution 1005 (1995), the Council decided that appropriate amounts of explosives intended exclusively for use in established humanitarian demining programmes might be supplied to Rwanda upon application to and authorization by the Committee established pursuant to resolution 918 (1994).

On 16 August 1995, by section B of resolution 1011 (1995), the Security Council exempted the Government of Rwanda from the arms embargo, while confirming that the embargo continued to apply to non-Government entities in Rwanda or entities in States neighbouring Rwanda who might forward the arms to the non-Government entities in Rwanda. The Council decided that all States would notify the Committee established pursuant to resolution 918 (1994) of all exports from their territories of arms or related materiel to Rwanda, that the Government of Rwanda would mark and register and notify the Committee of all imports of arms and related materiel, and that the Committee would report regularly to the Council on notifications so received.

On 7 September 1995 the Council, by resolution 1013 (1995), requested the Secretary-General to establish an International Commission of Inquiry with the mandate, inter alia, of collecting information and investigating reports relating to the sale or supply of arms and related materiel to former Rwandese Government Forces in the Great Lakes region. In that context, the Council called upon States, relevant United Nations bodies, including the Committee established pursuant to resolution 918 (1994), and, as appropriate, international humanitarian organizations, to collate information in their possession relating to the mandate of the Commission, and requested them to make this information available as soon as possible.

9. Security Council Committee established pursuant to resolution 985 (1995) concerning Liberia

By resolution 788 (1992) of 19 November 1992 the Security Council imposed an arms embargo against Liberia. On 13 April 1995 by resolution 985 (1995), the Council decided to establish, in accordance with rule 28 of its provisional rules of procedure, a Committee of the Security Council, consisting of all the members of the Council, to undertake the following tasks and to report on its work with observations and recommendations: (a) to seek from all States information regarding the action taken by them concerning the effective implementation of the arms embargo imposed by resolution 788 (1992); (b) to consider any information brought to its attention by States concerning violations of the embargo, and, in that context, to make recommendations to the Council on ways of increasing the effectiveness of the embargo; and (c) to recommend appropriate measures in response to violations of the embargo and provide information on a regular basis to the Secretary-General for general distribution to Member States.

E. Ad hoc commissions/Coordinator for the Return of Property

During the period under review, the Security Council continued to oversee three ad hoc commissions: United Nations Iraq-Kuwait Boundary Demarcation Commission, United Nations Special Commission and United Nations Compensation Commission, and the United Nations Coordinator for the Return of Property, all of which were established during the prior reporting period. Of those, one Commission was terminated.²⁴⁰

1. United Nations Iraq-Kuwait Boundary Demarcation Commission established pursuant to resolution 687 (1991)

Termination

The United Nations Iraq-Kuwait Boundary Demarcation Commission, established pursuant to resolution 687 (1991), concluded its work during the period under review.²⁴¹ By a letter dated 21 May 1993,²⁴² the Secretary-General transmitted to the Council the Commission's final report. He noted that, as stated in the report, the Commission had fulfilled its mandate: it had demarcated in geographic coordinates of latitude and longitude the international boundary between Iraq and Kuwait set out in the agreement between them signed on 4 October 1963,²⁴³ made arrangements for the physical representation of the boundary through the emplacement of an appropriate number of boundary pillars or monuments, and provided for arrangements for continuing maintenance and location accuracy of the surficial boundary representation.

On 27 May 1993, by resolution 833 (1993), acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, the Council inter alia welcomed the successful conclusion of the Commission's work and reaffirmed that the Commission's decisions regarding the demarcation of the boundary were final. By two subsequent presidential statements of 28 June 1993 and 16 November 1994,²⁴⁴ the Council reacted to two separate letters from Iraq concerning the Commission's decisions and resolution 833 (1993).²⁴⁵

2. United Nations Special Commission established pursuant to resolution 687 (1991)

The United Nations Special Commission established pursuant to section C of resolution 687 (1991), to implement those provisions of the resolution relating to the elimination of Iraq's chemical and biological weapons and ballistic missiles with a range greater than 150 kilometres and to the non-acquisition by Iraq of the prohibited items, as well as to assist the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) in implementing the nuclear areas of the resolution, continued to exist during the period under review.²⁴⁶

The Executive Chairman of the Special Commission submitted, through the Secretary-General, the fifth to tenth reports on the activities of the Special Commission pursuant to resolution 687 (1991).²⁴⁷ He also submitted the third to eighth reports²⁴⁸ on the implementation of the Special Commission's plan, approved by resolution 715 (1991), for the ongoing monitoring and verification of Iraq's compliance with the relevant part of section C of resolution 687 (1991).

In two presidential statements,²⁴⁹ the Security Council reacted to impediments to the activities of the Special Commission and IAEA in Iraq, and demanded that Iraq abide by its obligations under all relevant Council resolutions and cooperate fully with those two bodies. Subsequently, in a letter dated 3 December 1993 addressed to the representative of Iraq,²⁵⁰ the President of the Council stated that the members of the Council had welcomed the "unconditional acknowledgement" of Iraq's obligations under resolution 715 (1991).²⁵¹ Finally, in 1994, in a third presidential statement the Council underlined "the complete unacceptability" of the possible withdrawal of cooperation by Iraq with the Special Commission.²⁵²

3. United Nations Coordinator for the Return of Property from Iraq to Kuwait under resolutions 686 (1991) and 687 (1991)

Mandate implementation

The United Nations Coordinator for the Return of Property from Iraq to Kuwait continued his work under the relevant provisions of Security Council resolutions 686 (1991) and 687 (1991).²⁵³ On 2 March 1994, the Secretary-General submitted, pursuant to the above resolutions and a letter from the President of the Security Council dated 25 January 1994,²⁵⁴ a report on the return of Kuwaiti property seized by Iraq,²⁵⁵ annexed to which was a list of all the handover operations which had been carried out. In the report, the Secretary-General noted that the Coordinator's role had been one of receiving, registering and submitting to Iraq claims presented by Kuwait and facilitating the return of property which Iraq had declared that it had in its possession and was ready to return. Therefore the Coordinator had not considered it within the scope of his mandate to investigate or verify claims from Kuwait that specific property items were removed by Iraq or claims by Iraq that specific items were not removed or, if removed, were subsequently destroyed during the hostilities.

4. United Nations Compensation Commission established pursuant to resolutions 687 (1991) and 692 (1991)

Mandate implementation

Mandated to verify and value the claims of loss, damage and injury to foreign Governments, nationals and corporations resulting from Iraq's unlawful invasion and occupation of Kuwait, and to administer the payment of compensation, the United Nations Compensation Commission established pursuant to resolutions 687 (1991) and 692 (1991) continued to exist during the period under review.²⁵⁶ In 1994 the Commission faced what the Secretary-General described as a "financial emergency" as it would be unable to pay in full the second group of compensation payments, estimated to be over $200 million, by the end of that year.²⁵⁷ In view of this, the Secretary-General put forward, and the members of the Council approved, a proposal to seek information directly from oil companies in order to identify Iraqi oil-related funds, 30 per cent of which were earmarked for the Compensation Fund, and to arrange for their transfer to an escrow account, in accordance with Council resolution 748 (1992).²⁵⁸

By letters addressed to the President of the Security Council, the President of the Commission's Governing Council reported on the Commission's activities at its regular sessions²⁵⁹ and its second and third special sessions.²⁶⁰ In the letters submitted between November 1994 and November 1995,²⁶¹ he also noted that compensation for many approved claims could not be paid because of lack of sufficient resources in the Compensation Fund. He expressed concern over the “serious negative repercussions” that the lack of resources entailed for the credibility of the Commission and eventually for the whole United Nations system. He stated that the Governing Council looked to the Security Council for finding appropriate and expedited solutions to ensure that the increasing number of compensation awards that were issued, were honoured.

F. International Tribunals

During the period under review, the Security Council, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, established international tribunals for the former Yugoslavia and for Rwanda, as detailed below.

1. International Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of the Former Yugoslavia since 1991

On 22 February 1993, by resolution 808 (1993), the Security Council decided that an international tribunal should be established for the prosecution of persons responsible for serious violations of international humanitarian law committed in the territory of the former Yugoslavia since 1991. It requested the Secretary-General to submit a report on all aspects of this matter, taking into account suggestions put forward by Member States.

On 25 May 1993, by resolution 827 (1993), acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, the Council approved the report of the Secretary-General²⁶² and decided to establish “an international tribunal for the sole purpose of prosecuting persons responsible for serious violations of international humanitarian law committed in the territory of the former Yugoslavia between 1 January 1991 and a date to be determined by the Security Council upon the restoration of peace”. The Council also adopted the statute of the Tribunal which was annexed to that report.

²⁶² S/25704 and Corr.1; see also S/25704/Add.1 which contains the cost estimates for the first full year of operation of the Tribunal.

The Council decided that the Tribunal would consist of three organs; the Chambers, comprising two trial chambers and an Appeals Chamber, to which 11 judges were assigned; the Office of the Prosecutor, headed by the Prosecutor; and the Registry, headed by the Registrar. The expenses of the Tribunal were to be borne by the regular budget of the United Nations, in accordance with Article 17 of the Charter. As proposed by the Secretary-General,²⁶³ and subsequently decided by the Council,²⁶⁴ The Hague was determined to be the seat of the Tribunal, with the proviso that the Tribunal might sit elsewhere when it considered it necessary for the efficient exercise of its functions.

Election of judges

In accordance with article 13 of the statute of the Tribunal, the Security Council adopted resolution 857 (1993) whereby it established a list of 23 candidates from which the General Assembly could elect the 11 judges of the Tribunal. The Assembly elected those judges for a term of four years, beginning on 17 November 1993. The judges then proceeded to elect a President of the Tribunal, from among themselves.

Appointment of the Prosecutor

In accordance with article 16 of the statute of the Tribunal, the Security Council adopted resolution 877 (1993) whereby it appointed the Secretary-General’s nominee, Mr. Ramón Escovar-Salom, as Prosecutor of the Tribunal for a term of four years. However, Mr. Escovar-Salom did not take up his functions and, in February 1994, informed the Secretary-General that he was no longer available for this appointment. Consequently, the Security Council adopted resolution 936 (1994), whereby it appointed the Secretary-General’s new nominee, Mr. Richard Goldstone, as Prosecutor for a term of four years.

Annual reports to the Security Council and the General Assembly

During the period under review, in accordance with article 34 of the statute of the Tribunal, the President of the Tribunal submitted, through the

2. International Criminal Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Genocide and Other Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of Rwanda and Rwandan Citizens Responsible for Genocide and Other Such Violations Committed in the Territory of Neighbouring States, between 1 January 1994 and 31 December 1994

On 8 November 1994, by resolution 955 (1994), acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, the Council decided, having received the request of the Government of Rwanda,²⁶⁶ to establish “an international tribunal for the sole purpose of prosecuting persons responsible for genocide and other serious violations of international humanitarian law committed in the territory of Rwanda and Rwandan citizens responsible for genocide and other such violations committed in the territory of neighbouring States, between 1 January 1994 and 31 December 1994”. The statute of the Tribunal was annexed to the resolution. The Council also requested the Secretary-General to report periodically to it on the implementation of the resolution.²⁶⁷

The Council decided that the Tribunal would consist of three organs; the Chambers, comprising two trial chambers and an Appeals Chamber to which were assigned 11 judges; the Office of the Prosecutor, headed by the Prosecutor; and the Registry, headed by the Registrar. The expenses of the Tribunal were to be borne by the regular budget of the United Nations, in accordance with Article 17 of the Charter. As recommended by the Secretary-General,²⁶⁸ and subsequently decided by the Security Council,²⁶⁹ Arusha was determined to be the seat of the Tribunal, with the proviso that the Tribunal might sit elsewhere when it considered it necessary for the efficient exercise of its functions. The Council also decided that an office would be established and proceedings would be conducted in Rwanda, where feasible and appropriate.²⁷⁰

In accordance with article 12 of the statute of the Tribunal for Rwanda, the members of the Appeals Chamber of the Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia would also serve as members of the Appeals Chamber of the Tribunal for Rwanda. On 24 April 1995, the Security Council adopted resolution 989 (1995) whereby it established a list of 12 candidates for judges of the Tribunal for Rwanda, from which the General Assembly could elect six. The Assembly elected those judges for a term of four years, to begin, upon two months’ notice, shortly before the commencement of trial proceedings. The judges then proceeded to elect a President of the Tribunal, from among themselves.

The Prosecutor

In accordance with article 15 of the statute of the Tribunal for Rwanda, the Prosecutor of the Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia, Mr. Richard Goldstone, also served as the Prosecutor of the Tribunal for Rwanda.

Annual reports to the Security Council and the General Assembly

In accordance with article 34 of the statute of the Tribunal for Rwanda, the President of the Tribunal submitted, through the Secretary-General, the first and second annual reports of the Tribunal to the Security Council and the General Assembly, on 29 August 1994 and 23 August 1995, respectively.²⁷¹

This chapter deals, in parts I to V, with relations of the Security Council with the other principal organs of the United Nations. It also includes, in part VI, material relating to the Military Staff Committee, which has been placed, by Articles 45, 46 and 47 of the Charter, in a special relationship with the Security Council.

Part I Relations with the General Assembly

Note

Part I concerns various aspects of the relationship between the Security Council and the General Assembly. Section A deals with the election by the Assembly of non-permanent members of the Council. Section B considers the General Assembly's practice in making recommendations to the Council under Articles 10 and 11 of the Charter, and calling its attention under Article 11 (3) to situations which are likely to endanger international peace and security. Section C concerns the limitation imposed by Article 12 (1) on the authority of the General Assembly to make recommendations with respect to any dispute or situation while the Council is exercising the functions assigned to it by the Charter in respect of that dispute or situation. It also describes the procedure under Article 12, paragraph 2, by which the Secretary-General notifies the Assembly of matters relating to the maintenance of international peace and security which are being dealt with by the Council, and when the Council ceases to deal with such matters.

Section D considers those instances in which a decision by the Council must be taken before that of the General Assembly: for example, the appointment of the Secretary-General, the admission, suspension, or expulsion of Members, and the election of the judges of the International Tribunals for the former Yugoslavia and Rwanda, respectively.

Section E describes the annual and special reports submitted by the Council to the General Assembly.

Lastly, section F concerns relations between the Security Council and certain subsidiary organs established by the General Assembly which have reported to or otherwise play a role in the work of the Council.

A. Election by the General Assembly of non-permanent members of the Security Council

Note

During the period under review, in accordance with Article 23 of the Charter, the General Assembly, at each regular session, elected five non-permanent members to the Security Council for a two-year term to replace those members whose terms of office were to expire on 31 December of the respective year. At the forty-eighth session, the Assembly elected four non-permanent members during its 43rd plenary meeting and the fifth non-permanent member at its 44th plenary meeting. At the forty-ninth and fiftieth sessions, the Assembly elected the five non-permanent members in the course of one plenary meeting. A table of those elections is set out below.

B. Recommendations by the General Assembly to the Security Council in the form of resolutions under Articles 10 and 11 of the Charter

The General Assembly may discuss any questions or any matters within the scope of the present Charter or relating to the powers and functions of any organs provided for in the present Charter, and, except as provided in Article 12, may make recommendations to the Members of the United Nations or to the Security Council or to both on any such questions or matters.

1. The General Assembly may consider the general principles of co-operation in the maintenance of international peace and security, including the principles governing disarmament and the regulation of armaments, and may make recommendations with regard to such principles to the Members or to the Security Council or to both.

2. The General Assembly may discuss any questions relating to the maintenance of international peace and security brought before it by any Member of the United Nations, or by the Security Council, or by a state which is not a Member of the United Nations in accordance with Article 35, paragraph 2, and, except as provided in Article 12, may make recommendations with regard to any such questions to the state or states concerned or to the Security Council or to both. Any such question on which action is necessary shall be referred to the Security Council by the General Assembly either before or after discussion.

3. The General Assembly may call the attention of the Security Council to situations which are likely to endanger international peace and security.

4. The powers of the General Assembly set forth in this Article shall not limit the general scope of Article 10.

Note

During the period under review, the General Assembly made a number of recommendations, in the form of resolutions, to the Security Council regarding the maintenance of international peace and security. Several of these recommendations were of a general nature, touching upon the “powers and functions” of the Council under the Charter, and/or upon “the general principles of cooperation in the maintenance of international peace and security”. As such, they may be seen to be illustrative of the General Assembly’s recommendation-making powers under Articles 10 and 11 (1), respectively, of the Charter. A table of those recommendations is set out in section 1 below.

In other instances, the General Assembly made recommendations to the Security Council either with regard to specific questions relating to the maintenance of international peace and security, or requesting action from the Council with regard to such questions, in accordance with Article 11 (2). The recommendations all concerned items already on the Council’s agenda. Examples of the General Assembly requesting action from the Council include its resolutions urging the Council to take “all appropriate steps to uphold and restore fully the sovereignty, political independence, territorial integrity and unity of the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina”. A table of the recommendations relating to Article 11 (2), which also includes one instance in which the Assembly resolution was subsequently referred to in a request for a meeting of the Council, is set out in section 2.

48/264 29 July 1994	Revitalization of the work of the General Assembly	3. Welcomes the ongoing efforts of the Security Council to improve its working methods, and in that context encourages the Council, in the submission of reports to the Assembly, to provide in a timely manner a clear and informative account of its work, including its resolutions and other decisions, inclusive of measures taken under Chapter VII of the Charter.
49/31 9 December 1994	Protection and security of small States	7. Calls upon the Security Council and other relevant organs of the United Nations to pay special attention to the protection and security of small States in the restructuring and revitalization of the work of the United Nations, especially within the context of the Special Committee on the Charter of the United Nations and on the Strengthening of the Role of the Organization and in the follow-up activities of the report of the Secretary-General of 17 June 1992 entitled "An Agenda for Peace".
49/57 9 December 1994	Declaration on the Enhancement of Cooperation between the United Nations and Regional Arrangements or Agencies in the Maintenance of International Peace and Security	1. In accordance with the provisions of the Charter of the United Nations concerning the role of regional arrangements or agencies in the maintenance of international peace and security, in particular Chapter VIII of the Charter: (b) The Security Council shall encourage the development of pacific settlement of local disputes through such regional arrangements or by such regional agencies either on the initiative of the States concerned or by reference from the Council; (d) The Security Council shall, where appropriate, utilize such regional arrangements or agencies for enforcement action under its authority, but no enforcement action shall be taken under regional arrangements or by regional agencies without the authorization of the Council; 5. Regional efforts undertaken by regional arrangements or agencies in the area of the maintenance of international peace and security, within their respective fields of competence and in accordance with the purposes and principles of the Charter, should be encouraged and, where appropriate, supported by the Security Council.

At its 3454th meeting, on 8 November 1994, the Security Council included the letter in its agenda, under the item entitled "The situation in the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina", and considered the matter.

C. Practice in relation to Article 12 of the Charter

1. While the Security Council is exercising in respect of any dispute or situation the functions assigned to it in the present Charter, the General Assembly shall not make any recommendation with regard to that dispute or situation unless the Security Council so requests.

2. The Secretary-General, with the consent of the Security Council, shall notify the General Assembly at each session of any matters relative to the maintenance of international peace and security which are being dealt with by the Security Council and shall similarly notify the General Assembly, or the Members of the United Nations if the General Assembly is not in session, immediately the Security Council ceases to deal with such matters.

Note

During the period under review, the Council did not request that the General Assembly make a recommendation in respect of a dispute or situation in accordance with the exception provided for in Article 12 (1). There was no discussion in the Security Council of the nature of the limitation placed by Article 12 (1) upon the authority of the General Assembly to make recommendations.

In accordance with Article 12 (2), the Secretary-General continued to notify the General Assembly of “matters relative to the maintenance of international peace and security which are being dealt with by the Security Council” and of matters with which the Council has ceased to deal.¹ These notifications were based upon the summary statement of matters of which the Security Council is seized and of the stage reached in their consideration, circulated each week to the members of the Security Council, in accordance with rule 11 of the provisional rules of procedure of the Council.² The items in the notifications were the same as those in the summary statements for the relevant period, apart from the omission of those items not considered to relate to the maintenance of international peace and security.

The matters being dealt with by the Security Council in the notifications have been listed since 1951 in two categories: (a) matters discussed during the period since the last notification; and (b) other matters of which the Council remained seized, but which it had not discussed at a formal meeting since the last notification. When the Council subsequently ceased to deal with a matter listed in a notification, the Secretary-General so informed the General Assembly in an addendum to the relevant notification in the period under review.³ The addenda also indicated one instance in which the Council had altered the list of items of which it was seized, subsuming four previously discussed items under a single new item,⁴ as well as one instance in which the Council had concluded its consideration of a particular item.⁵

The consent of the Council for the notifications, required by Article 12 (2), was obtained through the circulation by the Secretary-General to the members of the Council of copies of the draft notifications. The General Assembly formally took note of the various notifications.

D. Practice in relation to provisions of the Charter involving recommendations by the Security Council to the General Assembly

Note

On a number of matters, the Charter provides for joint decision-making by the Security Council and the General Assembly, but requires the decision by the Council to be taken first. This is the case, for instance, with respect to the appointment of the Secretary-General (Article 97), the admission, suspension or expulsion of Members (Articles 4, 5 and 6), and the conditions under which a State which is not a United Nations Member may become a party to the Statute of the International Court of Justice (Article 93 (2)).

The Statute of the International Court of Justice provides for the Security Council to make recommendations to the General Assembly regarding the conditions under which a State which is a party to the Statute but is not a Member of the United Nations may participate in electing members of the Court, and in making amendments to the Statute (Articles 4 (3) and 69 of the Statute).

This section considers briefly the Council's practice during the period under review in relation to the admission of Members. No questions arose concerning the other matters.

1. Membership in the United Nations

Note

The admission of a State to membership in the United Nations, and the suspension or expulsion of a Member State from the Organization, is effected by "the General Assembly upon the recommendation of the Security Council" (Articles 4 (2), 5 and 6 of the Charter). In accordance with rule 60 of its provisional rules of procedure, the Council submits to the General Assembly within specified time limits its recommendation concerning each application for membership together with a record of its discussion of the application.

During the period under review, the Council recommended to the General Assembly the admission of seven States to membership in the United Nations.⁶ It made no negative recommendations requiring it to submit a special report to the General Assembly. The Council did not discuss or recommend the suspension or expulsion of any Member.

Concerning the former Yugoslavia, the Council, in resolution 821 (1993) of 28 April 1993, reaffirmed that the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) could not continue automatically the membership of the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia in the United Nations;⁷ and therefore recommended to the General Assembly "that, further to the decision taken in resolution 47/1, it decide that the

⁷ In its resolution 47/1 of 22 September 1992, the Assembly had, on the recommendation of the Council, decided that the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) should apply for membership in the United Nations and that it should not participate in the work of the General Assembly.

Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) shall not participate in the work of the Economic and Social Council". The General Assembly so decided.⁸

2. Election of the judges of the International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia and of the International Tribunal for Rwanda

Note

The procedure for the election of judges of the two Tribunals is set out in article 13(2), (3) and (4) of the statute of the International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia and article 12(2), (3), (4) and (5) of the statute of the International Tribunal for Rwanda.⁹

In each case, in accordance with the statute, the Secretary-General forwarded to the President of the Security Council the nominations received. The Security Council then convened a meeting, in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, and adopted a resolution establishing the list of candidates for judges. Subsequently, the President of the Security Council formally transmitted, via letter, the text of the resolution to the President of the General Assembly. The Assembly then proceeded to elect the judges from the list contained in that resolution.

At its 3265th meeting, on 20 August 1993, the Security Council adopted resolution 857 (1993) whereby, in accordance with article 13(2)(c) of the statute of the International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia, it established a list of 23 candidates from which the General Assembly could elect the 11 judges of the Tribunal. By a letter of the same date,¹⁰ the President of the Security Council transmitted to the President of the General Assembly the text of resolution 857 (1993). At the 111th plenary meeting of its forty-seventh session, from 15 to 17 September 1993, in accordance with article 13(2)(d) of the statute, the General Assembly elected 11 judges for the Tribunal — that is, those candidates who received the absolute majority of the votes of States Members of the United Nations and of the non-Member States maintaining permanent observer missions at United Nations Headquarters. In accordance with article 13(4) of the statute, the judges were elected for a term of four years, beginning on 17 November 1993.

At its 3524th meeting, on 24 April 1995, the Security Council adopted resolution 989 (1995) whereby, in accordance with article 12(3)(c) of the statute of the International Tribunal for Rwanda, it established a list of 12 candidates from which the General Assembly could elect the six judges of the Tribunal. In accordance with article 12(2) of the statute, the members of the Appeals Chamber of the International Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia would also serve as members of the Appeals Chamber of the International Tribunal for Rwanda. By a letter of the same date,¹¹ the President of the Security Council transmitted to the President of the General Assembly the text of resolution 989 (1995). At the 103rd plenary meeting of its forty-ninth session, on 24 May 1995, in accordance with article 12(3)(d) of the statute, the General Assembly elected six judges for the Tribunal — that is, those candidates who received the absolute majority of the votes of States Members of the United Nations and of the non-Member States maintaining Permanent Missions at United Nations Headquarters. In accordance with article 12(5) of the statute, the judges were elected for a term of four years, to begin, upon two months' notice, shortly before the commencement of trial proceedings.

E. Reports of the Security Council to the General Assembly

Article 24, paragraph 3

The Security Council shall submit annual and, when necessary, special reports to the General Assembly for its consideration.

Article 15, paragraph 1

The General Assembly shall receive and consider annual and special reports from the Security Council; these reports shall include an account of the measures that the Security Council has decided upon or taken to maintain international peace and security.

Note

In accordance with Article 24(3) of the Charter, the Security Council continued during the period under review to submit annual reports to the General Assembly.¹² Each report covered the period from 16 June of one year to 15 June of the next. The basic format of the report remained unaltered during this period, though the content contained in the "introduction" was expanded, beginning from the report covering the period 1993/94. As before, the report comprised four main parts: part I provided a summary of the questions considered by the Security Council under its responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security; part II dealt with "other matters" considered by the Council, such as the admission of new Members to the United Nations, the election of members of the International Court of Justice, the appointment of the Prosecutor of the International Tribunals for the Former Yugoslavia and Rwanda, and Security Council documentation and working methods and procedure; part III provided an account of the work of the Military Staff Committee; and part IV noted matters that were brought to the attention of the Council but not discussed during the period covered by the report.

Annual reports of the Security Council to the General Assembly were adopted at private meetings until the 47th report. On 30 June 1993, in a note by the President,¹³ the members of the Council indicated their agreement to the proposal that, thenceforth, the draft reports should be adopted at a public meeting of the Council. They also agreed to proposals concerning the timing of the submission of the report, the use of cross-referencing within the report, and the accessibility of the report in its draft version.¹⁴ In addition, on 29 March 1995, in a note by the President,¹⁵ the members of the Council indicated their agreement to a number of proposals related to making the procedures of Security Council sanctions committees more transparent, including the proposal that the annual report should contain, in the introduction, more information about each Committee than it did at that time.

Thus, from 1993 onwards, a member of the Secretariat, at the request of the President of the Security Council, made an explanatory statement on the draft report at a public meeting of the Council,¹⁶ following which the Council adopted the report without a vote. The Council's decision was subsequently reflected in a note by the President.¹⁷

For its part the General Assembly, in 1993, encouraged Member States to "participate actively in a substantive and in-depth discussion on, and consideration of, the reports of the Security Council".¹⁸ Subsequently, in 1994, the Assembly invited the President of the General Assembly to "propose appropriate ways and means to facilitate an in-depth discussion by the Assembly of matters contained in the reports submitted to it by the Security Council".¹⁹

In the General Assembly, the President of the Security Council introduced the Council's report each year. His statement was followed, on each occasion, by discussion by the Member States.²⁰ Some of the points raised during the discussion were reflected in resolution 48/264, in which the General Assembly also encouraged the Council to "provide in a timely manner a clear and informative account of its work, including its resolutions and other decisions, inclusive of measures taken under Chapter VII of the Charter".²¹ Subsequently, following the conclusion of its debate on the Council's report for the period 1995/96,²² the General Assembly, in 1996, encouraged the Council to "provide in a timely manner a substantive, analytical and material account of its work" and called upon the Council to adopt a number of measures, which it outlined, in connection with the content of future reports.²³ One such measure was the inclusion, as appropriate, of "information on the consultations of the whole undertaken prior to action or deliberation by the Council on issues within its mandate and on the process leading to such action".

During the period covered by this Supplement, the Council did not submit any special reports to the

¹⁴ The relevant paragraphs of the note read as follows:

1. The Security Council should take all the necessary measures to ensure the timely submission of its report to the General Assembly. For that purpose: (a) The Security Council should retain the existing practice whereby the annual report is submitted to the General Assembly in a single volume covering the period from 16 June of one year to 15 June of the next year; (b) The Secretariat should submit the draft report to the members of the Security Council no later than 30 September immediately following the period covered by the report, so that the report may be adopted by the Council in time for consideration by the Assembly during the main part of its regular session.

3. The appendices in the annual report of the Security Council listing the resolutions and presidential statements should provide cross-references to the relevant chapter, section and subsection of the report, for each resolution and presidential statement.

4. The draft annual report of the Security Council to the General Assembly should no longer be issued as a confidential document; it should be a document with a "limited distribution" designation, as is the common practice in other bodies of the United Nations.

F. Relations with subsidiary organs established by the General Assembly

Note

Certain subsidiary organs established by the General Assembly have played a part in the work of the Security Council, either because they have been placed in a special relationship to the Council by resolution of the General Assembly, or because the Council has made use of the services of a subsidiary organ or invited its officers to participate in its meetings.

During the period under review, there was no constitutional discussion bearing on the relations between such subsidiary organs and the Security Council. Those subsidiary organs still active included the following: the Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples; the Special Committee against Apartheid; the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People; and the Intergovernmental Group to Monitor the Supply and Shipping of Oil and Petroleum Products to South Africa. These entities submitted reports and recommendations to the Security Council, and/or to the General Assembly, as appropriate, pursuant to a request by the General Assembly. Two of them, the Intergovernmental Group to Monitor the Supply and Shipping of Oil and Petroleum Products to South Africa and the Special Committee against Apartheid, submitted their last communications, respectively, in November 1993 and June 1994. The mandate of the Intergovernmental Group was terminated by General Assembly resolution 48/159 C of 20 December 1993. The mandate of the Special Committee against Apartheid was terminated by General Assembly resolution 48/258 A of 23 June 1994, following the end of apartheid and the establishment of "a democratic and united, non-racial South Africa".²⁵

The Chairman of the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People participated in meetings of the Council. The President of the Council participated in two meetings of the Committee commemorating the International Day of Solidarity with the Palestinian People during the period covered by the present Supplement.²⁶

The tables below give an account of the communications from those organs to the Council; participation in Council meetings is recorded in chapter III of the present Supplement. During the period under consideration, no decisions adopted by the Security Council contained references to these entities. The Council did, however, mention four other subsidiary organs (see cases 3-6) established by the General Assembly in its decisions.

Continuing its consideration of the report of the Secretary-General entitled "An Agenda for Peace: preventive diplomacy, peacemaking and peacekeeping",²⁷ the Security Council acknowledged the contributions made by the Special Committee on Peacekeeping Operations, on the same subject. In a statement of 28 May 1993, the President said:

The Security Council has studied thoroughly the recommendations of the Secretary-General contained in "An Agenda for Peace". It pays tribute to the valuable contributions made by the Special Committee on Peacekeeping Operations and other relevant bodies of the General Assembly. These discussions and consultations make it possible to formulate more clearly the common priorities of the Member States.²⁸

In a subsequent statement made on 3 May 1994, the President touched on the Special Committee's consideration of the report of the Secretary-General entitled "Improving the capacity of the United Nations for peacekeeping".²⁹

The Security Council notes that the report "Improving the capacity of the United Nations for peacekeeping" has been transmitted to the General Assembly and also notes that the

Special Committee on Peacekeeping Operations has made recommendations on the report.³⁰

In several decisions taken during the period under review, in connection with the item entitled “The question concerning Haiti”, the Council expressed support for, and acknowledged the contribution of, the joint United Nations/Organization of American States International Civilian Mission to Haiti (MICIVIH). The United Nations participation in this Mission had been authorized by the General Assembly in resolution 47/20 B of 20 April 1993 in connection with the item entitled “The situation of democracy and human rights in Haiti”.

By its resolution 867 (1993) of 23 September 1993, adopted at its 3282nd meeting, the Security Council authorized the establishment and immediate dispatch of the United Nations Mission in Haiti (UNMIH). In paragraph 5 of the same resolution, the Council welcomed the intention of the Secretary-General to place the peacekeeping mission under the oversight of the Special Representative of the Secretaries-General of the United Nations and of the Organization of American States, who also oversaw the activities of MICIVIH.

In a statement made at the Council’s 3403rd meeting, on 12 July 1994, the President, on behalf of the Council, condemned the decision of the “illegal de facto regime and military leadership in Haiti” to expel from the country the joint United Nations/Organization of American States International Civilian Mission, “whose work ha[d] the highest approbation of the Council and whose mandate [had been] extended by the ... General Assembly on 8 July 1994 [resolution 48/27 B]”.³¹

In its resolutions 944 (1994) and 948 (1994) of 29 September and 15 October 1994, adopted at the 3430th and 3437th meetings, respectively, the Council, inter alia, expressed support for the immediate return to Haiti of MICIVIH.

Following the return to Haiti of President Jean-Bertrand Aristide, and the subsequent return of MICIVIH, the Council, in 1995, took three decisions in which, inter alia, it expressed its appreciation for the work of that mission, particularly for its assistance with the electoral process in Haiti.³² In the last of those decisions, the Council also expressed its confidence that “the Special Representative of the Secretary-General, UNMIH and UN/OAS MICIVIH [would] continue to assist the Government and the people of Haiti”.

Case 5

In four statements made during the period under review, in connection with the situation in Afghanistan, the President, on behalf of the Council, supported a special mission to the country authorized by the General Assembly. In a statement made at the Council’s 3330th meeting, on 24 January 1994, he stated:

The Council notes General Assembly resolution 48/208 requesting the Secretary-General to dispatch as soon as possible a United Nations special mission to Afghanistan to canvass a broad spectrum of Afghanistan’s leaders to solicit their views on how the United Nations can best assist Afghanistan in facilitating national rapprochement and reconstruction. The Council welcomes the reaffirmation of support for such a mission issued on 12 January 1994 by the Secretary-General and his intention to dispatch this mission.³³

In a subsequent statement made at the Council’s 3353rd meeting, on 23 March 1994, the President said:

The Council welcomes the Secretary-General’s appointment of a special mission to Afghanistan, in accordance with General Assembly resolution 48/208. [...] The Council supports this mission, which is due to leave Geneva soon, and urges all Afghans to assist it in carrying out its mandate and thus promote a cessation of hostilities, the resumption of humanitarian aid and the restoration of peace in Afghanistan.³⁴

In a third statement made at the Council’s 3415th meeting, on 11 August 1994, the President stated:

The [Council] notes with appreciation the efforts of the United Nations Special Mission to Afghanistan in accordance with General Assembly resolution 48/208, headed by Ambassador Mahmoud Mestiri, and welcomes his progress report of 1 July 1994 (S/1994/766), in particular the recommendations contained in paragraph 40 [on “the first phase of a re-engaged United Nations effort” in Afghanistan] of the report.

The Council expresses its appreciation for the cooperation the Afghan people and leaders provided to the Special Mission. It calls on all Afghans to continue to work with the Special Mission as it seeks to help Afghans begin a peaceful political process to end their differences.³⁵

Finally, in a statement made at the Council's 3474th meeting, on 30 November 1994, the President stated:

The Security Council notes with appreciation the progress made by the United Nations Special Mission to Afghanistan, led by Ambassador Mahmoud Mestiri, and the report of the Secretary-General of 22 November 1994 (A/49/688).

The Security Council fully supports the Special Mission's broad-based consultations with Afghan representatives and its proposals to bring about an end to the factional fighting, institute a process of political reconciliation and begin the tasks of rehabilitation and reconstruction of Afghanistan.

Recognizing that the rehabilitation, reconstruction and development of war-torn Afghanistan will be dependent in large part upon the progress made towards the establishment of a reliable ceasefire and the development of a viable political process, the Security Council urges all States to support the peacemaking proposals of the Special Mission and to recognize its primary role in the peacemaking process.³⁶

At its 3583rd meeting, held at the level of Foreign Ministers, on 26 September 1995, the Council met to commemorate the fiftieth anniversary of the United Nations. At the conclusion of the meeting, the President made a statement on behalf of the Council in which she, inter alia, took note of the conclusion of the Working Group of the General Assembly on the Question of Equitable Representation on and Increase in the Membership of the Security Council and Other Matters Related to the Security Council.³⁷ This entity had been established by the General Assembly by resolution 48/26 of 3 December 1993 and its mandate had been extended annually thereafter.³⁸ Thus, commenting on the subject of "strengthening" and "revitalizing" the United Nations, the President of the Security Council stated:

[The members of the Security Council] take note of the conclusions of the Working Group of the General Assembly on the Question of Equitable Representation on and Increase in the Membership of the Security Council and Other Matters Related to the Security Council, inter alia, that the Council should be expanded, and that its working methods should continue to be reviewed, in a way that further strengthens its capacity and effectiveness, enhances its representative character and improves its working efficiency and transparency; and that important differences on the key issues continue to exist.

S/25895	16 June 1993	Letter dated 2 June 1993 from the Chairman submitting the report of his mission to South Africa, from 1 to 11 March 1993.
S/26048	7 July 1993	Letter dated 7 July 1993 from the Chairman transmitting the following texts: the Declaration of the International Conference on Southern Africa: Making Hope a Reality, held in London on 14 and 15 June 1993; the report of the Secretary of the Conference; and the Appeal of its Conveners.

Document symbol	Date	Subject
S/26714	17 November 1993	Letter dated 3 November 1993 from the Chairman submitting the report of the Special Committee against Apartheid, in which, inter alia, the Special Committee recommended (para. 247 (f)) that the General Assembly request that mandatory measures imposed by the Security Council with regard to South Africa remain in effect and urge Member States to continue to respect them until the Council, in response to the election of a non-racial and democratic Government, may decide to lift them.
S/1994/261	7 March 1994	Letter dated 3 March 1994 from the Acting Chairman transmitting the texts of his opening statement, the keynote address and the concluding remarks made at the International Briefing on South Africa's First Democratic and Non-Racial Elections, held at Brussels from 28 February to 1 March 1994.
S/1994/383	5 April 1994	Letter dated 31 March 1994 from the Chairman submitting the report of his mission to South Africa, from 28 February to 6 March 1994.
S/26714/Add.1	14 June 1994	Letter dated 14 June 1994 from the Chairman submitting the addendum to the report of the Special Committee against Apartheid, in which the Special Committee noted that the system of apartheid having been brought to an end, it had fulfilled its mandate in accordance with the provisions of relevant General Assembly resolutions and had successfully concluded its work.

(b) Communications from the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People

Document symbol	Date	Subject
S/25464	23 March 1993	Letter dated 23 March 1993 from the Chairman drawing attention to the increasingly grave situation in the occupied Palestinian territory since the deportation of over 400 Palestinians in mid-December, and appealing to the Security Council to take the necessary measures to provide appropriate protection to the Palestinian people.
S/25862	28 May 1993	Letter dated 28 May 1993 from the Chairman drawing attention to the serious situation in the occupied Palestinian territory as a result of Israel's prolonged and indefinite closure of the West Bank and Gaza Strip and the isolation of East Jerusalem since 30 March, and stating that it was of the utmost importance for the international community as a whole, and the High Contracting Parties to the Fourth Geneva Convention in particular, to take all necessary measures to ensure the safety and protection of Palestinian civilians, particularly children, living under Israeli occupation.
S/1994/220	25 February 1994	Letter dated 25 February 1994 from the Chairman drawing attention to the tragic massacre of unarmed Palestinian worshippers in Hebron, and calling on all concerned to do everything possible to surmount current obstacles in the "peace negotiations" and to advance towards full implementation of the agreements that had been reached.

S/1995/50	18 January 1995	Letter dated 17 January 1995 from the Chairman expressing concern at the growing Israeli settlement activity in the occupied West Bank, and appealing to the Secretary-General, the Security Council, the co-sponsors of the peace process and all others concerned to exert their influence on the Israeli Government to end its settlement policy.

(c) Communications from the Intergovernmental Group to Monitor the Supply and Shipping of Oil and Petroleum Products to South Africa

Document symbol	Date	Subject
S/26789	22 November 1993	Letter dated 3 November 1993 from the Chairman transmitting the report of the Intergovernmental Group, which, inter alia, concluded that the changes in South Africa were sufficiently profound and irreversible to warrant the lifting of the oil embargo against South Africa (para. 31) and recommended to the General Assembly that, provided that the Transitional Executive Council was operational at that time, the mandate of the Group be terminated upon the adoption of the report by the Assembly (para. 35).

Part II

Relations with the Economic and Social Council

Practice in relation to Article 65 of the Charter

Article 65

The Economic and Social Council may furnish information to the Security Council and shall assist the Security Council upon its request.

Note

During the period under consideration, the Security Council did not formally address a request for information or assistance to the Economic and Social Council nor mention Article 65 in its decisions. The Security Council did, however, receive information from the Economic and Social Council, through one of its subsidiary bodies, the Commission on Human Rights, about grave human rights abuses and violations of international humanitarian law identified by the Security Council as being of concern in three situations before the Security Council: respectively, the situation between Iraq and Kuwait; the situation in the former Yugoslavia; and the situation concerning Rwanda. These instances are dealt with in cases 7 to 9 below. The Security Council also received information in relation to the situation in Burundi from a commission of inquiry established by the Secretary-General at its request. The commission's report included information provided by the Special Rapporteur of the United Nations Commission on Human Rights. This is dealt with in case 10.

In his report entitled "An agenda for peace: preventive diplomacy, peacemaking and peacekeeping", submitted in 1992 at the request of the Security Council, the Secretary-General had touched upon the potential relevance of Article 65 as part of an early warning system. He had recommended "that the Security Council invite a reinvigorated and restructured Economic and Social Council to provide reports, in accordance with Article 65 of the Charter, on those economic and social developments that may, unless mitigated, threaten international peace and security". During the period under review, in a follow-up report entitled "Implementation of the recommendations contained in an 'Agenda for Peace'",³⁹ the Secretary-General recalled his earlier recommendation and expressed the hope that discussion would continue on ways to put it into practice. In a subsequent report entitled "Supplement to an agenda for peace: position paper of the Secretary-General on the occasion of the fiftieth anniversary of the United Nations",⁴⁰ the Secretary-General did not expressly refer to the Economic and Social Council. The Security Council considered the latter report at its 3492nd meeting, on 18 and 19 January 1995. One Council member, echoed by two additional speakers, supported cooperation between the Security Council and the Economic and Social Council to help better identify and address economic and social tensions before the outbreak of conflict or after its conclusion.⁴¹

The situation between Iraq and Kuwait

At its 49th, 50th and 51st sessions, the Commission on Human Rights adopted resolutions⁴² by which it extended, for one year, the mandate of the Special Rapporteur on the situation of human rights in Iraq. In each of the three resolutions, the Commission requested the Special Rapporteur to submit an interim report to the General Assembly as well as a report to the Commission on Human Rights.

In his interim report of 18 November 1993,⁴³ the Special Rapporteur concluded, inter alia, that a number of acts of the Government of Iraq constituted a policy of repression in violation of paragraph 2 of Security Council resolution 688 (1991). He also concluded that the continuing difficulties in facilitating the humanitarian work of international organizations in the country constituted a violation of paragraph 3 of that resolution.

By a letter dated 7 December 1993,⁴⁴ the representative of Hungary drew the attention of the President of the Security Council to the interim report of the Special Rapporteur, highlighting the references made therein to resolution 688 (1991), and asked that it be circulated as a document of the Security Council.

The situation in the former Yugoslavia

At its 49th, 50th and 51st sessions, the Commission on Human Rights adopted resolutions by which it extended, for one year, the mandate of the Special Rapporteur on the situation of human rights in the territory of the former Yugoslavia. In each of the three resolutions,⁴⁵ the Commission requested the Special Rapporteur to continue to submit periodic reports, as appropriate, to the Commission on Human Rights and the General Assembly, and requested the Secretary-General to continue to make the reports of the Special Rapporteur available also to the Security Council. The Secretary-General did so by means of notes, to which the reports were annexed.⁴⁶

At its 3612th meeting, on 21 December 1995, the Security Council adopted resolution 1034 (1994) on the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina. The Council affirmed that the violations of humanitarian law and human rights in the areas of Srebrenica, Zepa, Banja Luka and Sanski Most from July to October 1995 had to be fully and properly investigated by "the relevant United Nations and other international organizations and institutions". It demanded that the Bosnian Serb party give immediate and unrestricted access to the areas in question, including for the purpose of the investigation of the atrocities, to representatives of "the relevant United Nations and other international organizations and institutions, including the Special Rapporteur of the Commission on Human Rights".

The situation concerning Rwanda

At its third special session, the Commission of Human Rights adopted a resolution,⁴⁷ in the preambular part of which it, inter alia, recalled the request of the Security Council to the Secretary-

General to collect information on the responsibility for the tragic incident that had resulted in the deaths of the Presidents of Rwanda and Burundi.⁴⁸ In the operative part, the Commission requested its Chairman to appoint a special rapporteur to investigate first-hand the human rights situation in Rwanda. It also requested the Secretary-General to make the report of the Special Rapporteur available to the Economic and Social Council, the General Assembly and the Security Council. The Secretary-General did so by means of notes, to which the reports were annexed.⁴⁹

At its 3388th meeting, on 8 June 1994, the Security Council unanimously adopted resolution 925 (1994) on the situation concerning Rwanda. In the preambular part of the resolution, the Council noted the appointment, by the Commission on Human Rights, of a Special Rapporteur for Rwanda. In the operative part, the Council, inter alia, requested the Secretary-General to ensure that the United Nations Mission for Rwanda (UNAMIR) extended close cooperation to the Special Rapporteur. During the discussion, the representative of China expressed reservations on “the resolution’s elements relating to the human rights rapporteur”. Recalling that the Charter contained explicit provisions on the mandates of the Security Council, the General Assembly and other United Nations organs, he stressed that the Council should “refrain from involvement in activities that [went] beyond its mandate”. He added that his delegation was “not in favour of wilfully linking the work of the Council with that of other organs”.⁵⁰ Conversely, the representative of New Zealand welcomed “the recognition given in [the] resolution to the importance of close cooperation between UNAMIR and the activities of the ... recently appointed United Nations Special Rapporteur for Rwanda”.⁵¹ The representative of the Czech Republic spoke of “going ... beyond the horizon of today’s draft resolution”, suggesting that in future the Council might wish to request the Special Rapporteur to report to it directly.⁵²

At its 3400th meeting, on 1 July 1994, the Security Council unanimously adopted resolution 935 (1994), in the preambular part of which it again noted the appointment of the Special Rapporteur. By the operative part, the Council, inter alia, requested the Secretary-General to establish a commission of experts which would provide to him its conclusions on the evidence of grave violations of international humanitarian law committed in the territory of Rwanda, and also requested the Secretary-General to make the information submitted to the Special Rapporteur available to the Commission of Experts and to facilitate adequate coordination and cooperation between the work of the Commission of Experts and the Special Rapporteur in the performance of their respective tasks. At the Council meeting, the representative of China reiterated his reservations on the involvement of the Council in matters within the purview of other organs, whereas other Council members stressed the need for close cooperation between the Special Rapporteur and the Commission of Experts.⁵³

The situation in Burundi

At its 3571st meeting, on 28 August 1995, the Security Council adopted resolution 1012 (1995) on the situation in Burundi. By that resolution, the Council requested the Secretary-General to establish an international commission of inquiry which would, inter alia, establish the facts relating to the assassination of the President of Burundi on 21 October 1993, the massacres and other related acts of violence that followed. By the same resolution, the Council called upon States, “relevant United Nations bodies” and, as appropriate, international humanitarian organizations to collate substantiated information in their possession relating to the above-mentioned acts, to make such information available as soon as possible and to provide appropriate assistance to the commission of inquiry. The Commission of Inquiry noted in its final report that it had, in the course of its work, met with the Special Rapporteur of the Commission on Human Rights for Burundi.⁵⁴

Part III

Relations with the Trusteeship Council

Note

This part of chapter VI concerns the relationship between the Security Council and the Trusteeship Council in relation to those trust territories designated as “a strategic area or areas”, under Articles 77 and 82 of the Charter. Article 83 (1) provides that “all functions of the United Nations” relating to strategic areas — “including the approval of the terms of the trusteeship agreement and of their alteration or amendment” — are to be exercised by the Security Council. Article 83 (2) further provides that the Security Council shall “avail itself of the assistance of the Trusteeship Council to perform those functions of the United Nations under the trusteeship system relating to political, economic, social and educational matters in the strategic areas”. Those supervisory functions are specified in Articles 87 and 88 of the Charter. Only one territory, the Pacific Islands, was placed under a trusteeship agreement as a strategic area and the agreement was approved by the Security Council in resolution 21 (1947) of 2 April 1947.

During the period under review, the Security Council adopted a resolution terminating the applicability of the Trusteeship Agreement for the Pacific Islands with respect to Palau. Palau was the sole remaining Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands and the last Trust Territory under the International Trusteeship system to have attained independence (case 12). The Trusteeship Council had thus completed its mandate under the Charter. On 25 May 1994, the Trusteeship Council adopted an amendment to its rules of procedure under which it no longer needed to meet regularly.⁵⁵

⁵⁵ Trusteeship Council resolution 2200 (LXI), adopted on 25 May 1994.

A. Practice relating to the termination of a trusteeship agreement under Article 83, paragraph 1, of the Charter

By a letter dated 2 November 1994,⁵⁶ the President of the Trusteeship Council transmitted to the President of the Security Council a draft resolution recommended for adoption by the Council on the termination of the Trusteeship Agreement for the Trust Territory of the Pacific Island (Palau). In the draft resolution, the Council would determine, in the light of the entry into force on 1 October 1994 of the new status agreement for Palau,⁵⁷ that the objectives of the Trusteeship Agreement had been fully attained, and that the applicability of the Trusteeship Agreement had terminated with respect to Palau.

At its 3455th meeting, on 10 November 1994, the Council included the above-mentioned letter in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 956 (1994). Speaking in explanation of vote, the representative of France acknowledged that with Palau’s accession to independence, the Trusteeship Council had successfully completed the task entrusted to it under the Charter with respect to those territories placed under the Trusteeship System following the Second World War. He cautioned, however, against an amendment to the Charter to terminate the legal existence of the Trusteeship Council, arguing that a recent amendment of its rules of procedure, under which the Trusteeship Council would no longer need to meet regularly, reduced to a minimum the budgetary implications of its continuation, and thus obviated the need to modify its status. The speaker concluded by stating that the Trusteeship Council remained an instrument that the international community could resort to if necessary.⁵⁸

B. Transmission of reports to the Security Council by the Trusteeship Council

From 1 January 1993 to 31 December 1995, the Secretary-General transmitted to the Council the following reports of the Trusteeship Council on the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands, which continued to be the only Territory designated as a strategic area:

(a) Forty-fifth report, covering the period from 22 December 1992 to 18 January 1994;⁵⁹

(b) Forty-sixth report, covering the period from 19 January to 1 November 1994.⁶⁰

Part IV Relations with the International Court of Justice

Note

This part concerns the relationship between the Security Council and the International Court of Justice. Section A deals with the election of the members of the Court, which requires that action be taken by the Security Council in conjunction with the General Assembly, but with both organs proceeding independently. During the period under review, five elections were held to elect nine members to fill casual and regular vacancies (see cases 13-17). Section B notes the discussion that continued in the Security Council regarding the respective roles of the Council and the Court, in connection with the situation concerning the alleged involvement of Libyan nationals in the destruction of two civilian airliners (see case 18). It also deals with two instances where the Council took decisions: noting an Order of the Court, in connection with the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina (see case 19); and assisting the parties, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya and Chad, in implementing a Judgment of the Court concerning their territorial dispute (see case 21). An instance is also described where the members of the Council, by a letter, welcomed the referral to the Council of a dispute between Cameroon and Nigeria concerning the Bakassi peninsula, to the Court (see case 20).

A. Practice in relation to the election of members of the International Court of Justice

The procedure for the election of members of the Court is set out in Articles 4, 8 and 10 to 14 of the Statute of the International Court of Justice; rules 150 and 151 of the rules of procedure of the General Assembly; and rules 40 and 61 of the provisional rules of procedure of the Security Council.

For each of the five elections held during this period, the Security Council began the election procedure to fill a vacancy, or vacancies, by fixing the date of election, in accordance with Article 14 of the Court's Statute.⁶¹ The Security Council and the General Assembly then proceeded independently with the elections.⁶² At the Security Council meetings, the President of the Council drew attention to a memorandum by the Secretary-General describing the composition of the Court and setting out the procedure to be followed in the conduct of the election.⁶³ He reminded the Council that Article 10, paragraph 1, of the Court's Statute provides that, "Those candidates who obtain an absolute majority of votes in the General Assembly and in the Security Council shall be considered as elected", adding that the required majority in the Security Council was, therefore, eight votes. He explained further that the voting would be by secret ballot.

⁶³ See, for example, S/26489.

At its 3209th meeting, on 10 May 1993, the Council met to elect a member of the International Court of Justice, to fill a vacancy in the Court caused by the death of one of its members. On the first ballot, one candidate obtained the required majority of votes in the Council. The President stated that he would communicate the result of the vote to the President of the General Assembly, and requested the Council to remain in session until the result of the voting in the General Assembly had been received. Subsequently, he informed members of the Council that he had received a letter from the President of the General Assembly informing him that the same candidate had received an absolute majority in the General Assembly at the 103rd plenary meeting of its forty-seventh session. The candidate in question was therefore elected a member of the International Court of Justice. As the new member was elected to replace a member whose term of office had not expired, he was elected to the remainder of his predecessor's term of office, expiring on 5 February 1994.

Case 14

At its 3309th meeting, on 10 November 1993, the Council proceeded with the election of five members of the International Court of Justice, to fill the seats which would become vacant on 5 February 1994. At the outset, the President of the Council reported his decision to the Council not to preside over its proceedings in connection with the election of five members of the International Court of Justice and to invite the President for the following month to assume the presidential chair.⁶⁴ He noted that having fully considered the exceptional circumstances of the case — the President himself having been among the candidates for election to the International Court of Justice — he had reached the conclusion to act within the discretion of rule 20 of the Council's provisional rules of procedure.⁶⁵ then devolve, for the purpose of the consideration of that question, on the representative of the member next in English alphabetical order, it being understood that the provisions of this rule shall apply to the representatives on the Security Council called upon successively to preside. This rule shall not affect the representative capacity of the President as stated in rule 19, or his duties under rule 7.

⁶⁵ Rule 20 states:

Whenever the President of the Security Council deems that for the proper fulfilment of the responsibilities of the presidency he should not preside over the Council during the consideration of a particular question with which the member he represents is directly connected, he shall indicate his decision to the Council. The presidential chair shall

The election required three meetings.⁶⁶ On the first ballot, five candidates obtained the required majority of votes in the Council. The Council then remained in session until the result of the voting at the 51st plenary meeting of the forty-eight session of the General Assembly had been received. The results, when compared, revealed that the Security Council and the General Assembly had agreed on four candidates. Those four candidates had therefore been elected as members of the Court for a term of office of nine years, beginning on 6 February 1994. The President of the Council then stated that, in accordance with Article 11 of the Statute of the Court, the Council would proceed to hold a new meeting to elect one candidate, by further ballot, for the seat remaining to be filled. He accordingly adjourned the first meeting and called to order the second meeting — the 3310th meeting. On the first ballot, one candidate received the required majority of votes in the Council. However, at the 52nd plenary meeting of the General Assembly, a different candidate received the absolute majority of votes. Having been informed of this result, the President of the Council announced that the Council would have to proceed to a third meeting on the item. At the 3311th meeting of the Security Council and the 53rd plenary meeting of the General Assembly, held in accordance with Article 11 of the Statute of the Court, the same candidate received the required majority of votes in the Council and the absolute majority of votes in the Assembly and was therefore elected a member of the International Court of Justice for a term of office of nine years, beginning on 6 February 1994.

At its 3493rd meeting, on 26 January 1995, the Council met to elect a member of the International Court of Justice, to fill a vacancy in the Court caused by the death of one of its members. On the first ballot, one candidate obtained the required majority of votes in the Council. The President stated that he would communicate the result of the vote to the President of

then devolve, for the purpose of the consideration of that question, on the representative of the member next in English alphabetical order, it being understood that the provisions of this rule shall apply to the representatives on the Security Council called upon successively to preside. This rule shall not affect the representative capacity of the President as stated in rule 19, or his duties under rule 7.

the General Assembly, and requested the Council to remain in session until the result of the voting in the General Assembly had been received. Subsequently, he informed members of the Council that he had received a letter from the President of the General Assembly informing him that the same candidate had received an absolute majority in the General Assembly at the 96th plenary meeting of its forty-ninth session. The candidate in question was therefore elected a member of the International Court of Justice. As the new member was elected to replace a member whose term of office had not expired, he was elected to the remainder of his predecessor's term of office, expiring on 5 February 1997.

At its 3546th meeting, on 21 June 1995, the Council met to elect a member of the International Court of Justice, to fill a vacancy in the Court caused by the death of one of its members. On the first ballot no candidate obtained the required majority of votes in the Council. The Council thus proceeded to a second ballot, in accordance with rule 61 of the provisional rules of procedure. No candidate obtained the required majority of votes in the Council on the second, nor on the subsequent ballot. The Council thus proceeded to a fourth ballot. The President stated that he would communicate the result of the vote to the President of the General Assembly, and requested the Council to remain in session until the result of the voting in the General Assembly had been received. Subsequently, he informed members of the Council that he had received a letter from the President of the General Assembly informing him that the same candidate had received an absolute majority in the General Assembly at the 104th plenary meeting of its forty-ninth session. The candidate in question was therefore elected a member of the International Court of Justice. As the new member was elected to replace a member whose term of office had not expired, he was elected to the remainder of his predecessor's term of office, expiring on 5 February 1997.

Case 17

At its 3552nd meeting, on 12 July 1995, the Council met to elect a member of the International Court of Justice, to fill a vacancy in the Court caused by the resignation of one of its members. On the first ballot, one candidate obtained the required majority of votes in the Council. The President stated that he would communicate the result of the vote to the President of the General Assembly, and requested the Council to remain in session until the result of the voting in the General Assembly had been received. Subsequently, he informed members of the Council that he had received a letter from the President of the General Assembly informing him that the same candidate had received an absolute majority in the General Assembly at the 105th plenary meeting of its forty-ninth session. The candidate in question was therefore elected a member of the International Court of Justice. As the new member was elected to replace a member whose term of office had not expired, he was elected to the remainder of his predecessor's term of office, expiring on 5 February 2000.

B. Consideration of the relationship between the Security Council and the Court

During the period under review, the Security Council continued its consideration of the situation concerning the alleged involvement of Libyan nationals in the destruction of two civilian aircraft (Pan Am flight 103 over Lockerbie, Scotland, in 1988 and UTA flight 772 over Niger in 1989). In particular, in 1993, the Council intensified the sanctions against the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, on the basis of its determination that that country's continued failure to demonstrate by concrete action its renunciation of terrorism, and in particular its continued failure to respond fully and effectively to the requests and decisions in resolutions 731 (1992) and 748 (1992) concerning full cooperation in establishing responsibility for the terrorist acts, constituted a threat to international peace and security. Meanwhile, the Applications of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya before the International Court of Justice,⁶⁷ contending that the acts alleged in the indictment by the United States and the United Kingdom of the two accused Libyan nationals constituted an offence under the 1971

⁶⁷ Cases concerning Questions of Interpretation and Application of the 1971 Montreal Convention arising from the Aerial Incident at Lockerbie (Libyan Arab Jamahiriya v. United Kingdom and Libyan Arab Jamahiriya v. United States).

Montreal Convention and should be dealt with within the framework of that Convention, remained pending for judgement. Thus, on the occasion of the expansion of the sanctions against the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, some discussion again arose concerning the respective roles of the Council and the Court.

At its 3312th meeting, on 11 November 1993, the Council adopted resolution 883 (1993) whereby, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, it expanded the sanctions against the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya.⁶⁸ At the same meeting, speaking before the vote, the representative of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya challenged the argument that the Security Council was considering a matter that threatened international peace and security. He contended that the matter should be dealt with by the Council under Chapter VI, instead of Chapter VII, of the Charter, due to the fact that the issue in question was a legal dispute over which country had the competence to try the two accused Libyan nationals — a dispute which was essentially settled by the provisions of the 1971 Montreal Convention. He cautioned against involving the Council in the question of extradition which would set a “dangerous precedent”.⁶⁹ The representative of the Sudan, speaking in his capacity as Chairman of the Group of Arab States, characterized it as “curious” that the draft resolution was based on Chapter VII of the Charter; this, in his opinion, did not apply to the dispute between the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya and the three other States involved, as it was a legal dispute relating to the extradition of two accused Libyan nationals. Such a dispute, he said, should be dealt with in a court of law, and specifically by the International Court of Justice. Alternatively, it should be addressed in conformity with Chapter VI of the Charter, and especially on the basis of Article 33.⁷⁰

Conversely, speaking after the vote, several Council members pointed out that the issue in question related to “international terrorism”, as well as the non-compliance of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya with Security Council resolutions 731 (1992) and 748 (1992), both of which threatened international peace and security. The Council was, therefore, justified in imposing additional measures on the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, in order to fight international terrorism and secure its compliance with its previous decisions.⁷¹ One Council member added that, in his understanding, the action taken by the Council was aimed exclusively at addressing a “political problem”, as the body could not pass judgement on the merits of a criminal case. Echoed by another Council member,⁷² he stated that such action could not be construed in a manner inconsistent with the presumption of innocence. He also noted that the action taken by the Council was not intended to establish a “legal precedent” — especially not a precedent that would question the validity of time-honoured rules and principles of international law or the appropriateness of different domestic legislations with respect to the prevention and elimination of international terrorism.⁷³ Only one Council member explicitly opposed the imposition, and expansion, of sanctions against the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya as, in its view, only “negotiation and consultation” could lead to a solution.⁷⁴

On 16 and 20 June 1995, respectively, at the International Court of Justice, the United Kingdom and the United States filed preliminary objections to the jurisdiction of the Court to entertain the Applications of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya. On 22 September 1995, the Court issued Orders that fixed, in each case, 22 December as the time limit within which the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya might present a written statement of its observations and submissions on those preliminary objections, which the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya did.⁷⁵

International Court of Justice, “for violating the Genocide Convention”.⁷⁶ On the same day, it also filed a request for provisional measures, “to prevent further the loss of human life in Bosnia and Herzegovina”.⁷⁷ On 8 April 1993, the Court issued an Order indicating interim measures of protection.⁷⁸

By a letter dated 16 April 1993 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁷⁹ the representative of Bosnia and Herzegovina requested that the Council, pursuant to Article 94 (2), of the Charter, “take immediate measures under Chapter VII of the Charter to stop the assault” on Bosnia and Herzegovina, which he alleged was being carried out by forces directed, controlled and supported by the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro), and “enforce the Order of the International Court of Justice”. On the same day, at its 3199th meeting, the Security Council, acting under Chapter VII, adopted resolution 819 (1993) in which it demanded, inter alia, that the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) immediately cease the supply of military arms, equipment and services to the Bosnian Serb paramilitary units in the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina, having noted that “the International Court of Justice in its Order of 8 April 1993 in the case concerning application of the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide (Bosnia and Herzegovina v. Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro)) unanimously indicated as a provisional measure that the Government of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) should immediately, in pursuance of its undertaking in the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide of 9 December 1948, take all measures within its power to prevent the commission of the crime of genocide”. At its 3200th meeting, on 17 April 1993, the Council adopted resolution 820 (1993) whereby, acting under Chapter VII, it strengthened both the economic and financial sanctions against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) in order to secure improved compliance. No reference was made, however, to the Order of the Court in that resolution.

On 27 July 1993, Bosnia and Herzegovina filed a second request for provisional measures, “because the Respondent ha[d] violated each and every one of the three measures of protection on behalf of Bosnia and Herzegovina that were indicated by [the] Court on 8 April 1993, to the grave detriment of both the People and State of Bosnia and Herzegovina”. On 10 August 1993, the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) filed a request for provisional measures, “to prevent commission of the crime of genocide against the Serb ethnic group”.⁸⁰ On 13 September 1993, the Court issued an Order by which it reaffirmed the provisional measures indicated in its Order of 8 April 1993, which measures, the Court stated, should be immediately and effectively implemented.⁸¹

By a letter dated 15 September 1993 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁸² the representative of Bosnia and Herzegovina requested that the Council, pursuant to Article 94 (2) of the Charter, “take the necessary measures under Chapter 7 of the Charter in order to enforce the order of 13 September 1993 of the International Court of Justice”. He also called upon the Council to “take the necessary and immediate steps to lift the sieges [of Bosnian cities] and thereby confront the ongoing genocide”. The Security Council did not take any action on that particular request.

By a letter dated 28 February 1994 addressed to the President of the Council,⁸³ the representative of Cameroon reported an incident involving the Cameroonian army and the Nigerian army in the Cameroonian peninsula of Bakassi and requested an urgent meeting of the Security Council “given that this matter has implications for peace and security in the region”. By a follow-up letter dated 28 March 1994,⁸⁴ the representative of Cameroon transmitted the communiqué of the Central Organ of the Mechanism for Conflict Prevention, Management and Resolution of the Organization of African Unity (OAU) on its border dispute with Nigeria.

By a letter dated 4 March 1994 addressed to the President of the Council,⁸⁵ the representative of Nigeria expressed his Government’s surprise that Cameroon had, among other things, called for a discussion of the issue by the Security Council, and expressed the hope that the Council would encourage a bilateral resolution of the dispute, in accordance with Article 33 (1) of the Charter of the United Nations.

On 29 March 1994, Cameroon instituted proceedings against Nigeria before the International Court of Justice in a dispute concerning the question of sovereignty over the peninsula of Bakassi,⁸⁶ and requested the Court to determine the course of the

In a third letter to the President of the Council, dated 20 April 1994,⁸⁸ the representative of Cameroon recalled that in his recent conversation with the Council President he had confirmed and reiterated his Government’s request for an urgent meeting of the Council and, in that context, stated that he was submitting an informal text of a draft resolution “that could mark the conclusion of the Council’s consideration of this case”.⁸⁹

The President of the Security Council responded to the four aforementioned letters, on behalf of the members of the Council, in identical letters dated 29 April 1994,⁹⁰ addressed to the representatives of Cameroon and Nigeria, respectively. He stated, inter alia, that the members of the Council “welcome[d] the fact that the dispute ha[d] been referred to the International Court of Justice”. They also requested the Secretary-General, in consultation with the Secretary-General of OAU, to follow developments and to use his good offices to help promote the ongoing dialogue aimed at resolving peacefully the dispute between the two countries over the peninsula, and to keep Council members appropriately informed.

On 13 December 1995, at the International Court of Justice, Nigeria filed certain preliminary objections to the jurisdiction of the Court and to the admissibility of Cameroon’s claims.

At its 3363rd meeting, on 14 April 1994, the Council included in its agenda the item entitled, “Agreement signed on 4 April 1994 between the

Subsequently, the Security Council adopted, at its 3373rd meeting, on 4 May 1994, resolution 915 (1994), by which, expressing its determination to "assist the parties in implementing the Judgment of the International Court of Justice concerning their territorial dispute and thereby to help promote peaceful relations between them, in keeping with the principles and purposes of the Charter of the United Nations", it established the United Nations Aouzou Strip Observer Group (subsequently to be known as UNASOG) and set out its mandate.

Part V Relations with the Secretariat

Note

This part is concerned with the functions other than those of an administrative nature entrusted to the Secretary-General by the Security Council under Article 98 of the Charter (section A) and with the Secretary-General's power of initiative under Article 99 (section B).⁹³

Article 98

The Secretary-General shall act in that capacity⁹⁴ in all meetings of the General Assembly, of the Security Council, of the Economic and Social Council, and of the Trusteeship Council, and shall perform such other functions as are entrusted to him by these organs. ...

Article 99

The Secretary-General may bring to the attention of the Security Council any matter which in his opinion

⁹³ The functions and powers of the Secretary-General in regard to the meetings of the Security Council, conferred under Article 98, are delineated in rules 21 to 26 of the Council's provisional rules of procedure: see also chapter I, part IV.

⁹⁴ Article 97 of the Charter stipulates that the Secretary-General shall be the chief administrative officer of the Organization.

may threaten the maintenance of international peace and security.

A. Functions other than those of an administrative nature entrusted to the Secretary-General by the Security Council

During the period under review, the Secretary-General was requested or authorized by the Security Council to carry out a broad range of actions, particularly in relation to the peaceful settlement of disputes and peacekeeping. His functions in that regard expanded during that period as the activities of the Security Council continued to expand and diversify. In addition to carrying on his responsibilities in the area of peaceful settlement of disputes (political/diplomatic functions) and peacekeeping (security functions), the Secretary-General was entrusted with the establishment of international criminal tribunals as subsidiary bodies of the Security Council and with the implementation of sanctions regimes (legal functions). The practice described below is illustrative and does not purport to be comprehensive.⁹⁵

⁹⁵ For details of these and other instances where the Security Council entrusted functions to the Secretary-General, see the case studies in chapter VIII.

Measures to ascertain the facts

In a number of instances, the Secretary-General was asked to investigate the facts of a particular situation or his efforts to do so were endorsed:

(a) In relation to the situation in the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina, the Secretary-General was requested to investigate a number of incidents involving UNPROFOR and/or committed in the territory of Bosnia and Herzegovina;⁹⁶

(b) In relation to the situation concerning Western Sahara, the Secretary-General was invited to “intensify his efforts, with the parties, in order to resolve some outstanding issues, in particular those relating to the interpretation and application of the criteria for voter eligibility” and “to make the necessary preparations for the organization of the referendum of self-determination and to consult accordingly with the parties for the purpose of commencing voter registration on a prompt basis ...”.⁹⁷ In a letter dated 6 December 1993 to the Secretary-General,⁹⁸ the Council reaffirmed the Secretary-General’s role as “a guarantor of an objective and impartial referendum ...”;

(c) With regard to the situation relating to Nagorny Karabakh, the Council requested the Secretary-General, in consultation with the Conference for Security and Cooperation in Europe, to ascertain facts, as appropriate, regarding the situation on the ground;⁹⁹

(d) In relation to the situation in the Republic of Yemen, the Council requested the Secretary-General “to send a fact-finding mission to the area as soon as practicable to assess prospects for a renewed dialogue among those concerned and for further efforts by them to resolve their differences”;¹⁰⁰

(e) In connection with the situation concerning Rwanda, the Council requested the Secretary-General to “establish an impartial Commission of Experts to examine and analyse information submitted pursuant to resolution 935 (1994) ..., with a view to providing the Secretary-General with its conclusions on the evidence of grave violations of international humanitarian law committed in the territory of Rwanda, including the evidence of possible acts of genocide”.¹⁰¹ In connection with the same item, the Council requested the Secretary-General “to establish, as a matter of urgency, an International Commission of Inquiry” to, inter alia, “collect information and investigate reports relating to the sale or supply of arms and related matériel to former Rwandan government forces in the Great Lakes region in violation of Council resolutions 918 (1994), 997 (1995) and 1011 (1995)”;¹⁰²

(f) With regard to the situation in Burundi, the Council requested the Secretary-General to establish an International Commission of Inquiry “to establish the facts relating to the assassination of the President of Burundi on 21 October 1993 and the massacres which followed and to recommend measures of a legal, political or administrative nature ...”.¹⁰³

The Secretary-General was often requested to exercise or continue to exercise his “good offices” function: his independent political role in preventing or mediating conflicts between or within States, or his role in that regard was endorsed:

(a) In relation to the item entitled “Central America: efforts towards peace”, the Security Council reaffirmed its support for “the Secretary-General’s use of his good offices in the El Salvador peace process”.¹⁰⁴ In November 1994, the Council set 30 April 1995 as the date by which the United Nations Observer Mission in El Salvador (ONUSAL) would fulfil its mandate. That deadline was observed.

(b) In connection with items relating to the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, the Security Council invited the Secretary-General “to continue his role as set out in paragraph 4 of resolution 731 (1992)”.¹⁰⁵

(c) In connection with the situation in Cyprus, the Council requested the Secretary-General to “continue his mission of good offices”.¹⁰⁶ In July 1994, the Council requested the Secretary-General “to begin consultations with members of the Council, the Guarantor Powers and with the two leaders in Cyprus with a view to undertaking a fundamental and far-reaching reflection on ways of approaching the Cyprus problem in a manner that will yield results.”¹⁰⁷

(d) In identical letters dated 24 April 1994 from the President of the Security Council to the representatives of Cameroon and Nigeria,¹⁰⁸ the members of the Council requested the Secretary-General, in consultation with the Organization of African Unity, “to follow developments and to use his good offices to help promote the ongoing dialogue aimed at resolving peacefully the dispute” between Cameroon and Nigeria over the Bakassi peninsula, and to keep them appropriately informed.

Joint efforts to promote a political settlement

In several instances during the period under review, the Secretary-General was asked to undertake diplomatic efforts in conjunction with regional arrangements or other actors in order to achieve a political settlement.¹⁰⁹

(a) In relation to the situation in Liberia, the Council requested the Secretary-General, in consultation with the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS), to consider the possibility of convening a

(b) With regard to the situation in Georgia, the Council expressed its support for and encouraged the Secretary-General’s efforts aimed at achieving a comprehensive political settlement of the conflict, including on the political status of Abkhazia, respecting fully the sovereignty and territorial integrity of the Republic of Georgia, with the assistance of the Russian Federation as facilitator, and with the support of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe, to that end.¹¹¹

(c) In relation to the situation in Haiti, the Security Council commended the efforts of the Secretary-General’s Special Representative for Haiti and the efforts of the Secretary-General of the Organization of American States to establish a political dialogue with the Haitian parties. The Council, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, inter alia, welcomed the request by the General Assembly that the Secretary-General take the necessary measures to assist, in cooperation with OAS, in the solution of the crisis, and requested the Secretary-General to report to the Security Council on progress achieved in the efforts jointly undertaken by him and the Secretary-General of OAS with a view to reaching a political solution to the crisis in Haiti.¹¹²

(d) Regarding the situation in Somalia, the Security Council urged the Secretary-General to redouble his efforts at the local, regional and national levels to continue the process of national reconciliation and political settlement; called on all Member States to assist, in all ways possible, the Secretary-General, in conjunction with regional organizations, in his efforts to reconcile the parties and rebuild Somali political institutions; and invited the Secretary-General to consult the countries of the region and regional organizations concerned on means of further reinvigorating the reconciliation process.¹¹³

Peacekeeping and implementation of peace agreements

The Secretary-General was also entrusted with a leading role in dispatching and directing a number of peacekeeping missions authorized by the Council.¹¹⁵ The Council authorized 12 new missions during the period under review,¹¹⁶ many of which were multifaceted operations, containing political, humanitarian, social and economic components. They were tasked with helping to regroup and demobilize combatants, destroy weapons, coordinate humanitarian assistance, monitor human rights and organize elections. The Secretary-General had the responsibility for the executive direction and command of these peacekeeping operations, that is, their establishment, deployment, withdrawal and the implementation of their mandates.

During the period under review, the Security Council requested the Secretary-General to undertake certain actions relating to the establishment of international tribunals.

The Council, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, adopted resolutions 827 (1993) of 25 May 1993 and 955 (1994) of 8 November 1994, by which it established, respectively, the International Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of the Former Yugoslavia, and the International Criminal Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Genocide and Other Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of Rwanda and Rwandan Citizens Responsible for Genocide and Other Such Violations Committed in the Territory of Neighbouring States between 1 January 1994 and 31 December 1994.

In the case of the International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia, the Security Council, by resolution 808 (1993) of 22 February 1993, had previously decided that an international tribunal should be established “for the prosecution of persons responsible peace accords and the Lusaka Protocol; the United Nations Confidence Restoration Operation in Croatia (UNCRO) to perform the functions envisaged in the ceasefire agreement, facilitate implementation of the economic agreement, monitor the crossing of military equipment and personnel over specified international borders, facilitate humanitarian assistance and monitor the demilitarization of a specified zone; the United Nations Preventive Deployment Force (UNPREDEP) to monitor the borders in the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia; and the United Nations Mission in Bosnia and Herzegovina (UNMIBH) to perform tasks set out in the peace agreement.

¹¹⁴ See resolutions 922 (1994) of 31 May 1994; 932 (1994) of 30 June 1994; 952 (1994) of 27 October 1994; and 966 (1994) of 8 December 1994.

¹¹⁵ For further details of these decisions, see chapter V.

for serious violations of international humanitarian law committed in the territory of the former Yugoslavia since 1991”¹¹⁸ and had requested the Secretary-General to submit to the Security Council “a report on all aspects of [that] matter, including specific proposals and where appropriate options for the effective and expeditious implementation of the decision contained in paragraph 1 [...] taking into account suggestions put forward in [that] regard by Member States”.¹¹⁹ Pursuant to that request, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report entitled “Report of the Secretary-General pursuant to paragraph 2 of Security Council resolution 808 (1993)”,¹²⁰ which set out, inter alia, the legal basis for the Tribunal, the competence of the Tribunal and proposals for the organization of the Tribunal. It also contained, as an annex, a draft statute of the International Tribunal. By resolution 827 (1993) by which the Council formally established the Tribunal, it also, inter alia, requested the Secretary-General to “submit to the judges of the International Tribunal, upon their election, any suggestions received from States for the rules of procedure and evidence called for in Article 15 of the Statute of the International Tribunal”¹²¹ and, further, to “implement urgently the present resolution and in particular to make practical arrangements for the effective functioning of the International Tribunal at the earliest time and to report periodically to the Council”.¹²²

With respect to the establishment of the International Tribunal for Rwanda, by resolution 955 (1994), the Security Council decided, having received the request of the Government of Rwanda (S/1994/1115), “to establish an international tribunal for the sole purpose of prosecuting persons responsible for genocide and other serious violations of international humanitarian law committed in the territory of Rwanda and Rwandan citizens responsible for genocide and other such violations committed in the territory of neighbouring States, between 1 January 1994 and 31 December 1994 and to this end to adopt the Statute of the International Tribunal for Rwanda”. The Council also requested the Secretary-General to implement the resolution urgently and in particular to make practical arrangements for the effective functioning of the tribunal, including recommendations to the Council as to possible locations for the seat of the Tribunal.¹²³ The Council was periodically informed on the implementation of resolution 955 (1994) through, inter alia, oral briefings and through the progress report on the United Nations Assistance Mission for Rwanda (UNAMIR).¹²⁴ On 13 February 1995, the Secretary-General submitted his first formal report pursuant to that request by the Council, in which he, inter alia, reported on the legal basis for the establishment of the Tribunal, the competence of the Tribunal, its organization and structure, and made a recommendation for the seat of the Tribunal.¹²⁵

Regarding the election of the judges of the two Tribunals, the role of the Secretary-General is set out in the statutes of the respective tribunals, adopted by the Council. With respect to the International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia, article 13, subparagraph 2 (a), provides that the Secretary-General shall invite nominations for judges of the Tribunal from States Members of the United Nations and non-Member States maintaining permanent observer missions at United Nations Headquarters. Subparagraph 2 (c) stipulates that the Secretary-General shall forward the nominations received to the Security Council. At its 3265th meeting, on 20 August 1993, in accordance with that article, the Council established, by resolution 857 (1993), a list of 23 candidates from the nominations received by the Secretary-General.¹²⁶ By a memorandum dated 26 August 1993, the Secretary-General transmitted the list of candidates to the General Assembly.¹²⁷

With respect to the International Tribunal for Rwanda, the role of the Secretary-General was similarly set out in article 12 of its statute, which provides in subparagraph 3 (a) that the Secretary-General shall invite nominations for judges of the Tribunal from States Members of the United Nations and non-Member States maintaining permanent observer missions at United Nations Headquarters. Subparagraph 2 (c) stipulates that the Secretary-General shall forward the nominations received to the Security Council. At its 3524th meeting, on 24 April

1995, in accordance with that article, the Council established, by resolution 989 (1995) a list of 12 candidates from the nominations received by the Secretary-General.¹²⁸ By a memorandum dated 2 May 1995, the Secretary-General transmitted the list of candidates to the General Assembly.¹²⁹

Implementation of sanctions regimes

During the period under review, the Security Council established four sanctions regimes bringing the total number of sanctions committees in place to nine.¹³⁰ In addition to providing all necessary assistance to the sanctions committees established to monitor implementation of the sanctions, the Secretary-General was also requested to support from within a territory the implementation of an arms embargo, in the case of Somalia;¹³¹ to consult with countries of a region and other regional organizations about the practical implementation of an arms embargo, with regard to Rwanda;¹³² and to ensure that all information on arms embargo was made available to the Council and publicized more widely as appropriate, in relation to Liberia.¹³³

B. Matters brought to the attention of the Security Council by the Secretary-General

Note

During the period under review, the Secretary-General did not invoke Article 99, either expressly or by implication. In a number of instances, however, he drew the attention of the Security Council to situations, already on the Council's agenda, that were deteriorating, and requested the Council to consider taking appropriate action.¹³⁴ In addition, the Secretary-General exercised the implicit rights conferred upon him under Article 99 by initiating, for example, good offices missions in respect of Burundi, Georgia, Rwanda-Uganda and Sierra Leone.¹³⁵ In the case of Burundi, the Security Council noted "with satisfaction the immediate response of the Secretary-General to this situation by the dispatch of a Special Envoy on a good offices mission ..."¹³⁶ With regard to Georgia (the situation in Abkhazia), initially, the Secretary-General had sent on his own initiative a goodwill mission to the region in 1992. The Council then authorized the Secretary-General to begin to organize a United Nations observer group and welcomed the Secretary-General's continuing efforts to launch a peace process

¹³⁴ Thus, for example, in connection with the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina, the Secretary-General, by a letter dated 2 April 1993 addressed to the President of the Security Council (S/25519), requested the members of the Council to consider "what supportive action they might take" in the "extremely worrying situation" which had developed in Srebrenica in eastern Bosnia; in connection with the situation [prevailing in and adjacent to the United Nations protected areas] in Croatia, the Secretary-General, in a letter dated 14 July 1993 (S/26082), stated that the developments at the Maslenica bridge and the Zemunik airport deserved the "urgent attention of the Council", and that the Council might wish to consider the "danger" posed by that situation and decide upon appropriate action; in connection with the situation concerning Rwanda, the Secretary-General, in a letter dated 29 April 1994 (S/1994/518), stated that his Force Commander had reported "a further deterioration of the situation in Kigali and other parts of Rwanda", and urged the Council to re-examine the decisions it had taken in resolution 912 (1994) and to consider again what action, including forceful action, it could take, or could authorize Member States to take, in order to restore law and order and end the massacre.

¹³⁵ The Repertory of Practice of United Nations Organs states in its Supplement No. 8 (1989-1994), volume VI, under Article 99, that "the implicit powers of the Secretary-General in the spirit of Article 99 have been more liberally construed to include the right to initiate fact-finding missions, investigative commissions and the offer of good-offices or mediation" (available from http://untreaty.org/cod/repertory/art99/english/rep_supp8_vol6-art99_e_advance.pdf). with the participation of the Russian Federation and supported the Secretary-General's continuing cooperation with the Chairman-in-Office of the Commission on Security and Cooperation in Europe in that regard.¹³⁷ In connection with Rwanda-Uganda, the Council welcomed "the decision of the Secretary-General to send a goodwill mission to the region ..."¹³⁸ Regarding the situation in Sierra Leone, the Council expressed "its appreciation to the Secretary-General for his offer of good offices in Sierra Leone ..."¹³⁹

In his report of 17 June 1992 entitled "An Agenda for Peace: preventive diplomacy, peacemaking and peacekeeping",¹⁴⁰ the Secretary-General had stressed that preventive diplomacy required timely and accurate knowledge of facts. He had said that an increased resort to fact-finding was needed, initiated either by the Secretary-General — to enable him to meet his responsibilities under the Charter, including Article 99 — or by the Security Council or the General Assembly. He had made a number of proposals in that regard on enhancing informal and formal fact-finding. During the period covered by the present Supplement, the Security Council continued its consideration of the Secretary-General's report. At the Council's 3225th meeting, on 28 May 1993, to consider agenda item "An Agenda for Peace: preventive diplomacy, peacemaking and peacekeeping", the President of the Council made a statement on behalf of the Council, in which, inter alia, the Council noted with satisfaction the increased use of fact-finding missions. It invited Member States to provide the Secretary-General with relevant detailed information on situations of tension and potential crisis. It invited the Secretary-General to consider appropriate measures for strengthening the Secretariat capacity to collect and analyse information.

In a position paper of 25 January 1995 entitled "Supplement to an Agenda for Peace: position paper of the Secretary-General on the occasion of the fiftieth anniversary of the United Nations",¹⁴¹ the Secretary-General, under the section on preventive diplomacy and peacemaking, noted that "collectively Member States encourage the Secretary-General to play an active role in this field; individually they are often reluctant that he should do so when they are a party to the conflict". He stated that the "solution" might lie "in creating a climate of opinion, or ethos, within the international community in which the norm would be for Member States to accept an offer of United Nations good offices". At the Council's 3503rd meeting, on 22 February 1995, the President of the Council made a statement¹⁴² on behalf of the Council, in which, inter alia, the Council welcomed and shared the priority given by the Secretary-General to action to prevent conflict. It encouraged all Member States to make the fullest possible use of instruments of preventive action, including "the Secretary-General's good offices ..."

In a letter dated 1 February 1995 (S/1995/120), the Secretary-General had informed the Council that the Head of State of Sierra Leone had formally requested his good offices to facilitate negotiations between his Government and the Revolutionary United Front and that he had dispatched an exploratory mission to Sierra Leone to initiate consultations to that effect.

Part VI

Relations with the Military Staff Committee

Note

The Military Staff Committee, established pursuant to Article 47 of the Charter, is composed of the Chiefs of Staff of the permanent members or their representatives. Its function is “to advise and assist the Security Council on all questions relating to the Security Council’s military requirements for the maintenance of international peace and security, the employment and command of forces at its disposal, the regulation of armaments, and possible disarmament”.¹⁴³

During the period under review, the Military Staff Committee met regularly under its draft rules of procedure and remained prepared to carry out the functions assigned to it under Article 47. The need to revitalize the Military Staff Committee was discussed by Council members during the discussions on the Secretary-General’s Agenda for Peace and its Supplement (case 23).

At the Council’s 3492nd meeting, on 18 January 1995, in connection with the item entitled “Supplement to an Agenda for Peace: position paper of the Secretary-General on the occasion of the fiftieth anniversary of the United Nations”, two speakers referred to the role of the Military Staff Committee.

The representative of the Russian Federation, commenting on the Secretary-General’s position paper and the proposal to create rapid reaction forces,¹⁴⁴ stressed the importance of giving “the Military Staff Committee, which is intended to advise and assist the Security Council on all questions relating to the Security Council’s military requirements, not only formal, but substantive work”. He stated that it would also be useful “to analyse the Committee’s potential to further the work of the Secretariat in developing the Agenda for Peace.”¹⁴⁵

Touching on the issue of the command and management of peacekeeping operations, the representative of Ukraine noted that difficulties faced in that area could be addressed by revitalizing Article 47 of the Charter. Quoting paragraph 4 of that Article, the speaker believed that the Military Staff Committee should make use of the possibility of establishing regional subcommittees under that paragraph and that appropriate countries that contribute troops to peacekeeping operations could be included in the membership of such regional subcommittees.¹⁴⁶

At the Council’s 3611th meeting, on 20 December 1995, in connection with the item entitled “An agenda for peace: peacekeeping”, the representative of Italy suggested reflecting on the idea of revitalizing the Military Staff Committee, providing for inclusion in it of the countries that contributed troops to each operation.¹⁴⁷

The present chapter considers the practice of the Security Council in its recommendations to the General Assembly concerning applications for membership in the United Nations.

Part I sets forth the applications for admission considered and the decisions taken thereon by the Security Council and the General Assembly during the period under review. A comprehensive table, contained in section D shows the chain of proceedings from the submission of the applications to the decisions taken thereon by the General Assembly.

Parts II to IV concern the procedures employed by the Council in the consideration of the applications. The parts entitled "Consideration of the adoption or amendment of rules 58 to 60 of the provisional rules of procedure" and "Roles of the General Assembly and the Security Council" have been deleted from the present Supplement as there was no material for inclusion.

Part V deals with practices relating to the applicability of Articles 4, 5 and 6 of the Charter.

During the period under review, the Council recommended the admission of seven States to membership in the United Nations.

The application of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, whose admission had been pending since 30 July 1992, was finalized when the Security Council recommended its admission to the General Assembly under that provisional name, and the General Assembly decided to admit that country to membership in the United Nations (case 1).

The Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) did not submit an application for admission to membership in the United Nations during the period under review.¹ The Security Council made a recommendation to the General Assembly regarding the participation of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) in the work of the Economic and Social Council (case 2).

¹ By resolution 777 (1992) of 19 September 1992, the Security Council considered that the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) could not continue automatically the membership of the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia in the United Nations and recommended to the General Assembly that it decide that the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) should apply for membership in the United Nations and that it should not participate in the work of the General Assembly. Acting on the recommendation of the Security Council, the General Assembly, on 22 September 1992, adopted resolution 47/1, by which it decided that the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) should apply for membership in the United Nations and that it should not participate in the work of the General Assembly.

Part I

Applications for admission to membership in the United Nations and actions taken thereon by the Security Council and the General Assembly, 1993-1995

Note

As in the previous volumes of the Repertoire, part I provides information on the applications before the Council during the period under review and the decisions taken thereon by the Council and the General Assembly. Section A (Applications recommended by the Security Council), section B (Discussion of the question in the Security Council), section C (Applications pending on 1 January 1993) and section D (Applications submitted and action taken thereon by the Security Council and the General Assembly) have been maintained.

The table in section D includes additional information on the dates of circulation of the applications, as distinct from their dates of submission, the meetings at which the applications were first considered by the Council and their reference to the Committee on the Admission of New Members, the meetings, reports and recommendations of the Committee, and the presidential statements adopted by the Council following adoption of its resolutions. The sections concerning applications that failed to obtain a recommendation and applications pending at the end of the period under review contained in previous Supplements have been omitted as there was no material for inclusion.

A. Applications recommended by the Security Council

During the period from 1 January 1993 to 31 December 1995, the Council recommended the following seven States for admission to membership in the United Nations:

- Andorra
- Czech Republic
- Eritrea
- Monaco
- Palau
- Slovakia
- The former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia

By a letter dated 30 July 1992 addressed to the Secretary-General,² the President of the country referred to in the letter as “the Republic of Macedonia” requested its admission to membership in the United Nations.

By a note dated 22 January 1993,³ the Secretary-General circulated the application in accordance with rule 135 of the rules of procedure of the General Assembly and rule 59 of the provisional rules of procedure of the Security Council and

“following informal consultations held by the President of the Security Council at the request of the Secretary-General concerning the receivability” of that application.

In a letter dated 25 January 1993 addressed to the Secretary-General, the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Greece stated the views and position of the Government of Greece on that application. He stated the strong objection of Greece to the admission of the applicant to membership of the United Nations “prior to a settlement of certain outstanding issues necessary for safeguarding peace and stability, as well as good-neighbourly relations in the region”.⁴ Greece further pointed out that admission “prior to meeting the necessary prerequisites, and in particular abandoning the use of the denomination ‘Republic of Macedonia’, would perpetuate and increase friction and tension and would not be conducive to peace and stability in an already troubled region.”⁵

By resolution 817 (1993) adopted at the 3196th meeting, held on 7 April 1993 to consider the item entitled “Report of the Committee on the Admission of New Members concerning the application for admission to membership in the United Nations contained in document S/25147”, the Security Council recommended to the General Assembly that “the State whose application is contained in document S/25147 be admitted to membership in the United Nations”, that State being provisionally referred to for all purposes within the United Nations as “the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia” pending settlement of the difference that had arisen over the name of the State.

In a statement issued subsequently by the President of the Council on behalf of the members of the Council,⁶ the President stated that the reference in the resolution that had just been adopted to “the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia” carried no implication whatsoever that the State concerned had any connection with the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) and that it merely reflected the historic fact that it was in the past a republic of the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia.

B. Discussion of the question in the Security Council

The Security Council held 14 meetings to consider applications for admission during the period under review.⁷

At the 3204th meeting, held on 28 April 1993 on the item entitled “Participation of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) in the work of the Economic and Social Council”, the question of the membership of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) was discussed in the context of the adoption of a draft resolution on the question of the participation of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) in the work of the Economic and Social Council.⁸

⁵ By a letter dated 6 April 1993 addressed to the President of the Security Council (S/25543), the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Greece stated, inter alia, that the Government of Greece considered the draft resolution before the Council “an acceptable basis for addressing the issue of the application of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia for admission to the United Nations”.

Part II Presentation of applications

Note

Material concerning the presentation of applications — that is, the submission of applications to the Secretary-General pursuant to rule 58, their communication by the Secretary-General to representatives on the Security Council pursuant to rule 59 and their subsequent inclusion in the provisional agenda of the Council — is found in the table of applications in section D of part I.

Rule 59 provides, inter alia, that the Secretary-General “shall immediately place the application for membership before the representatives on the Security Council”.

During the period under review, the Secretary-General circulated to the members of the Council all applications received by him for admission to membership in the United Nations under cover of a note. In the case of the application for membership by the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, which was submitted on 30 July 1992, that application was communicated to members of the Council in a note by the Secretary-General dated 22 January 1993⁹ and included in the agenda of the Council at its 3195th and 3196th meetings, held on 6 and 7 April 1993, respectively. In the note by which the application was transmitted, the Secretary-General also noted that “informal consultations held by the President of the Security Council at the request of the Secretary-General concerning the receivability of the application” had preceded the circulation of the application.

Part III Referral of applications to the Committee on the Admission of New Members

Note

During the period under review, all applications were referred by the President of the Security Council to the Committee on the Admission of New Members, in accordance with rule 59 of the provisional rules of procedure. There were no proposals to waive the application of that rule.¹⁰ On all occasions,¹¹ upon recommendation of the Committee on the Admission of New Members, the Council waived the time limit set forth in paragraph 4 of rule 60, in accordance with paragraph 5 of that rule.¹²

¹⁰ Rule 59 provides, inter alia, that “unless the Security Council decides otherwise, the application shall be referred by the President to a committee of the Security Council upon which each member of the Security Council shall be represented”.

¹² The fourth and fifth paragraphs of rule 60 provide as follows:

“In order to ensure the consideration of its recommendation at the next session of the General Assembly following the receipt of the application, the Security Council shall make its recommendation not less than twenty-five days in advance of a regular session of the General Assembly, nor less than four days in advance of a special session.

“In special circumstances, the Security Council may decide to make a recommendation to the General Assembly concerning an application for membership subsequent to the expiration of the time limits set forth in the preceding paragraph.”

Part IV

Procedures in the consideration of applications within the Security Council

Note

During the period under review, the Council decided upon all applications in the chronological order of their receipt. All applications were decided upon separately. The Council adopted the draft resolutions submitted by the Committee on the Admission of New Members, without debate and without a vote, “in accordance with the understanding reached in prior consultations among members of the Council”. In each case, following the adoption of the resolution, the President of the Council made a statement on behalf of the members of the Council.

Part V

Practices relative to the applicability of Articles 4, 5 and 6 of the Charter

Note

During the period under review, the Security Council did not take or consider any measures under Article 5 or Article 6 of the Charter. In the deliberations of the Council in connection with the adoption of resolution 821 (1993) on the participation of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) in the work of the Economic and Social Council, the criteria for membership contained in Article 4 of the Charter were referred to (case 2).

Article 4 of the Charter provides as follows:

1. Membership in the United Nations is open to all other peace-loving states which accept the obligations contained in the present Charter and, in the judgment of the Organization, are able and willing to carry out these obligations.
2. The admission of any such state to membership in the United Nations will be effected by a decision of the General Assembly upon the recommendation of the Security Council.

At its 3204th meeting, held on 28 April 1993 in connection with the item entitled “Participation of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) in the work of the Economic and Social Council”, the Council adopted resolution 821 (1993) by 13 votes in favour, with 2 abstentions (China, Russian Federation). By that resolution, the Council reaffirmed that the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) could not continue automatically the membership of the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia in the United Nations, and therefore recommended to the General Assembly that, further to the decisions taken in Assembly resolution 47/1, it decide that the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) should not participate in the work of the Economic and Social Council.

In a statement made following the vote, the representative of the United States stated that her country would support the application of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia for membership in the United Nations when Serbia and Montenegro met the criteria in the Charter, that is, the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia would have to show that it was a peace-loving State and had demonstrated its willingness to comply fully with Chapter VII resolutions of the Security Council.¹³

Chapter VIII of the Repertoire focuses on the substance of each of the questions included in the agenda of the Security Council that relate to its responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security. Examining the entire chain of proceedings of the Council on each agenda item gives an overall sense of their political context.¹ The range of agenda items covers broadly those that may be deemed to fall under Chapters VI and VII of the Charter.

The overview of the proceedings of the Council provided in chapter VIII of the Repertoire constitutes a framework within which the procedural developments recorded in chapters I to VII and legal and constitutional discussions recorded in chapters X to XII may be considered. Chapter VIII also examines the substantive aspects of the Council's practice that are not covered in other chapters of the Repertoire.

The agenda items are grouped by region, for ease of reference, with an additional category of thematic issues. Within each region, items are listed in the order in which they were first included in the agenda of the Council.

Generally, individual sections cover all proceedings relating to a specific agenda item. In exceptional cases, in order to improve the coherence of the text, related agenda items have been grouped together, under a heading reading "Items relating to ...". When the Council includes a new item in its agenda, the section covering its first consideration bears the heading "Initial proceedings".

Each section is organized around the decisions taken by the Council on each agenda item. All of the meetings leading up to a decision are included under the heading for that decision. Decisions relating to the subject matter of chapters I to VII of the Repertoire are, with certain exceptions, omitted as not relevant to the purpose of this chapter. Affirmative decisions are included under a heading that indicates the form of the decision: a resolution, presidential statement or letter from the President of the Security Council to the Secretary-General. Proposals not adopted are entered under a heading indicative of the origin of the proposal or draft resolution. Affirmative decisions have been reproduced in full, while proposals not adopted are indicated in summarized form. If there has been a discussion concerning the application of the Charter in connection with a draft resolution that was not adopted, the text of the relevant parts of the draft resolution will in most instances be found in chapters X to XII.

¹ The Repertoire of the Practice of the Security Council covers formal meetings and documents of the Security Council. Some of the questions considered in this chapter have also been discussed in informal consultations among the members of the Council.

1. The situation in Angola

Decision of 29 January 1993 (3168th meeting): resolution 804 (1993)

On 21 January 1993, pursuant to resolution 793 (1992), the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council a further report on the United Nations Angola Verification Mission (UNAVEM II), describing the political and military developments in the country and outlining options for the future of the Mission.¹ The Secretary-General reported that following consultations held by his Special Representative during the month of January, both sides had agreed to a two-tiered approach: a meeting between military leaders to bring about a ceasefire, to be followed, immediately afterwards, by political negotiations on all the fundamental issues, including the future of UNAVEM. Arrangements had been made to hold the meeting in Addis Ababa on 16 and 17 January 1993. However, on 14 January, the National Union for the Total Independence of Angola (UNITA) had modified its position, insisting that political talks must take place at the same time as the military meeting. Meanwhile, on 21 January 1993, the Secretary-General received a letter from President dos Santos requesting him to recommend to the Security Council that the mandate of UNAVEM II be extended.

The Secretary-General noted in his report that, in spite of strenuous efforts by himself and his Special Representative, and the Security Council's support, the situation in Angola had continued to deteriorate since the adoption of resolution 793 (1992). The civil war had resumed, and it had been impossible for the United Nations to bring about a ceasefire meeting between the two sides, let alone the sustained political dialogue needed to put the peace process back on track and to define an enlarged United Nations role that he could recommend to the Council. He therefore, concluded that there was no realistic prospect, in the immediate future, of UNAVEM being enlarged to fulfil the role envisaged in the discussion paper which his Special Representative had made available to the two sides on 24 December 1992.² He outlined three options for the Council's consideration regarding the future of UNAVEM II: (a) to maintain UNAVEM II at its authorized strength and to try to re-establish its deployment as it was immediately after the elections; (b) to reduce its provincial deployment to approximately six locations; and (c) to confine its deployment to Luanda for the time being. His Special Representative would in any case pursue his good offices and would be based in Luanda with the necessary civilian, military and police staff. He would also continue to be in charge of all United Nations activities in connection with the peace process.³ The Secretary-General recommended that the Council approve the last option (c), while retaining sufficient equipment in Luanda to permit a subsequent move to option (b) if desirable and feasible. He also recommended 30 April 1993 as the deadline for the Mission's withdrawal, should the two parties fail to agree on a ceasefire and to resume negotiations.

By a letter dated 25 January 1993 addressed to the President of the Security Council, the representative of Angola transmitted a letter of 24 January from the President of Angola to the Secretary-General, informing the latter about military actions conducted by the South African army against the Angolan people and its Government, and the presence of Zairean soldiers and foreign mercenaries alongside UNITA's forces.⁴ The situation threatened peace and stability in central and southern Africa. He therefore requested an urgent meeting of the Council to discuss the issue and take appropriate measures to restore peace and stability.

At its 3168th meeting, on 29 January 1993, held in response to Angola's request of 25 January, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representatives of Angola, Cuba, Guinea-Bissau, Mozambique, Namibia, Nigeria, Portugal, Zaire and Zimbabwe, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President

(Japan) drew the attention of the members of the Council to the text of a draft resolution prepared in the course of prior consultations.⁵ He also drew their attention to several other documents.⁶

At the outset, the representative of Angola said that, despite a short-lived peace, his country continued to be in a virtual state of war caused by the leader of UNITA, which hindered the full functioning of Angola's elected democratic institutions. His delegation appreciated the clear and unequivocal position taken by the international community in condemning the aggressive and militaristic actions of UNITA's leadership. However, that position should be backed up with a resolution of the Security Council condemning UNITA's aggressive military faction. The direct or indirect involvement of Zaire and South Africa in the internal affairs of Angola must also be condemned and the Council should conduct an international investigation to look into the matter. The speaker was optimistic and hopeful that the Council's deliberations on UNAVEM II would be restricted to option A, as set out in the report of the Secretary-General. He stressed that the Government of Angola was the result of democratic elections, which had been endorsed by the international community and the United Nations, and therefore could not be treated on the same level as an armed military party and deserved the Council's support. The speaker further stated that his Government had not "closed the door" to dialogue, provided that UNITA would fully abide by the Peace Accords and would announce a date for an unconditional ceasefire. It must also agree to the confinement, disarmament and demobilization of its troops, under the supervision of UNAVEM II.⁷

The representative of the Russian Federation supported the Secretary-General's proposal to concentrate UNAVEM II personnel in Luanda, since it would guarantee their safety. He believed that a sizeable United Nations presence in the country would make that possible, by stabilizing the situation and ensuring a speedy resumption of the Mission's activities. The Council should call upon all sides immediately to ceasefire and, having resumed a meaningful constructive dialogue, to agree on a clear timetable for the full implementation of the Peace Accords, in particular with regard to the confinement of troops, the collection of weapons, demobilization, the formation of unified national armed forces and effective restoration of central authority throughout the country. UNITA should also give the international community convincing proof of its willingness to resume dialogue. The Russian Federation, as one of the three observer countries, along with Portugal and the United States, of the Peace Accords on Angola would continue to support the efforts of the Secretary-General and his Special Representative to bring about a resumption of peace process and the effective implementation of the mandate of UNAVEM II.⁸

The representative of China stated that the United Nations must make every effort to prevent the escalation of the conflict and to ensure peace and stability in the region. He therefore supported the principled position of the Government of Angola that no outside forces should be involved in the conflict and urged all countries to comply with the relevant Council resolutions and to desist from any action which might further aggravate the situation. He reiterated that the question of Angola should be eventually settled by the Angolans themselves. Mediation and other initiatives made by the international community should contribute to creating conditions favourable to that goal. His delegation believed that the Security Council should take immediate action to support the good offices of the Secretary-General and his Special Representative. It was also in favour of the continued stationing of UNAVEM II in Angola.⁹

The representative of the United States expressed his delegation's support for the draft resolution, which accurately reflected the situation in Angola, clearly outlined the steps to be taken by the warring parties, and provided the Organization with the authority and flexibility to fulfil its responsibilities. It was particularly appropriate for the Secretary-General to adapt the size and scope of UNAVEM II operations to existing political and security conditions. He noted, however, that the Secretary-General, UNAVEM II and concerned nations could not impose peace where the will for peace did not exist. Lasting peace would be possible only when all Angolans, particularly the parties' leadership, desisted from pursuing power through violence.¹⁰

The representative of France stressed that at a time when Angola was going through difficulties, the international community must remain at its side. That meant that any outside interference in the conflict must stop. The United Nations should also continue to lend all possible assistance to restore peace in the country. The draft resolution before the Council, while authorizing the Secretary-General to take the necessary steps for the protection of UNAVEM II personnel, allowed for the possibility of a speedy resumption of the mission when conditions allowed. It also expressed the willingness of the Council to strengthen the United Nations presence in Angola should there be any significant progress in the peace process. He stressed, however, that it was primarily up to the Angolans themselves to restore peace and promote national reconciliation.¹¹

The representative of the United Kingdom stated that the United Nations must remain actively engaged in Angola, as long as there was any prospect for a peaceful solution, with the emphasis being on the diplomatic role of the Special Representative, rather than on the earlier monitoring functions of UNAVEM II. He also called for the immediate release of all foreign prisoners, and for an end to the indiscriminate killing of civilians.¹²

The representative of Venezuela stated that the Council had the obligation to investigate the charges of foreign support and involvement in military actions in Angola and to take appropriate action. His delegation further believed that universal diplomatic recognition of the Government of Angola at that time would strengthen and support the draft resolution before the Council.¹³

The representative of Zaire rejected Angola's "unfounded accusations" against his country. He observed that both countries shared an extremely "porous" 2,650-kilometre border, and that neither Angola nor his country had the means to ensure control over that boundary. Moreover, his country was experiencing a catastrophic economic situation and would not dare to interfere in the internal affairs of

Angola. He pointed out that the Organization of African Unity (OAU) had established an observer mission to which his country and Angola had recourse whenever there was a border violation. Thus there was no reason to bring their disputes before the Security Council.¹⁴

The representative of Namibia, speaking on behalf of the Group of African States, stressed the need for a "visible and effective" United Nations presence in Angola to restore trust and confidence to the Angolan people. He recalled that the Secretary-General of OUA had recently appealed to the international community to give full support to UNAVEM II and to strengthen the Mission's presence, instead of withdrawing or reducing it. The Group of African States supported the meeting taking place in Addis Ababa between the Government of Angola and UNITA, and hoped that it would put the Peace Accords back on track.¹⁵

The representative of Portugal stated that the role of the United Nations was crucial to peace and stability in Angola. However, those efforts must be followed by the countries which had responsibilities in the process, namely the three observers: Portugal, the United States and the Russian Federation. He stressed that the United Nations presence in Angola must be maintained at an adequate level and not reduced to such a degree as to make it lose its visibility and operational capability and its usefulness to put pressure on the parties. The Organization must also adopt a more active attitude within the framework of the Peace Accords, demanding full compliance with their provisions and making it clear that violations would be unequivocally condemned. He commended the clear positions taken by the Council, as reflected in the draft resolution, namely its commitment to preserve the unity and territorial integrity of Angola and to the immediate cessation of any external military interference.¹⁶

Other speakers were also in favour of a continued United Nations presence and involvement in Angola and of a substantial increase in the strength of UNAVEM, as soon as the situation warranted it.¹⁷

The draft resolution was thereupon put to the vote and was adopted unanimously as resolution 804 (1993), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolutions 696 (1991) of 30 May 1991, 747 (1992) of 24 March 1992, 785 (1992) of 30 October 1992 and 793 (1992) of 30 November 1992,

Having considered the further report of the Secretary-General of 21 and 25 January 1993,

Having considered also the request submitted to the Secretary-General by the Government of Angola in its letter dated 21 January 1993,

Gravely disturbed by the recent outbreak of heavy fighting in many parts of Angola and the further deterioration of the already dangerous political and military situation in that country,

Gravely concerned at the continuing non-implementation of the major provisions of the Peace Accords for Angola, Concerned at the recent absence of dialogue between the Government of Angola and the National Union for the Total Independence of Angola, and welcoming the meeting between them under United Nations auspices at Addis Ababa to discuss the ceasefire and political matters,

Also concerned at the outrageous harassment and physical abuse to which personnel of the United Nations Angola Verification Mission II have been subjected, and the looting and destruction of United Nations property, as described in the report of the Secretary-General,

Further concerned at reports of foreign support for and involvement in military actions in Angola,

Regretting that the deteriorating situation has made it increasingly difficult for the Mission to carry out its mandate,

Recalling that democratic elections were held on 29 and 30 September 1992, which the Special Representative of the Secretary-General certified as being generally free and fair, and that steps have been taken to set up a Government of National Unity which would reflect the results of the legislative elections, and deeply regretting the failure of the National Union for the Total Independence of Angola to take part in the political institutions thus established,

Reaffirming its commitment to preserve the unity and territorial integrity of Angola,

Recognizing that the Angolans themselves bear ultimate responsibility for the restoration of peace and national reconciliation in their country,

Reiterating its support for the efforts of the Secretary-General and his Special Representative aimed at resolving the present crisis and resuming the political process, in particular through the completion of the electoral process,

1. Takes note with appreciation of the further report of the Secretary-General;

2. Strongly condemns the persistent violations of the main provisions of the Peace Accords for Angola, in particular the initial rejection by the National Union for the Total Independence of Angola of the election results, its withdrawal from the new Angolan armed forces, its seizure by force of provincial capitals and municipalities and the resumption of hostilities;

3. Demands that the two parties ceasefire immediately, restore continued and meaningful dialogue at their meeting at Addis Ababa and agree on a clear timetable for the full implementation of the Peace Accords, in particular with regard to confinement of their troops and collection of their weapons, demobilization and formation of the unified national armed forces, effective restoration of the Government administration throughout the country, the completion of the electoral process and the free circulation of people and goods;

4. Fully supports the Secretary-General and his Special Representative in their continuing efforts to restore the peace process and to carry out the mandate of the United Nations Angola Verification Mission II under extremely difficult conditions;

5. Urges once again the two parties, and in particular the National Union, to produce early evidence of their adherence to, and fulfilment without exception of, the Peace Accords;

6. Strongly appeals to the Government of Angola and the National Union to confirm as soon as possible to the Secretary-General that real progress has been made towards implementation of the Peace Accords;

7. Appeals to all Member States to render economic and technical assistance to the Government of Angola for reconstruction and development of the country;

8. Calls upon all Member States to support all those concerned in their efforts for the implementation of the Peace Accords;

9. Urges all Member States to take all necessary steps to stop immediately and effectively any direct or indirect military or paramilitary interference from their territories and to respect scrupulously the provisions of the Peace Accords concerning the cessation of supply of lethal material to any Angolan party;

10. Strongly condemns violations of international humanitarian law, in particular the attacks against the civilian population, including the extensive killings carried out by armed civilians, and calls upon both parties to abide by their obligations there under and the appropriate provisions of the Peace Accords;

11. Demands that the National Union immediately release foreign nationals taken hostage;

12. Strongly condemns attacks in Angola against personnel of the United Nations Angola Verification Mission II, and demands that the Government and the National Union take all necessary measures to ensure their safety and security;

13. Expresses its condolences to the family of the Mission police observer who lost his life;

14. Approves the recommendation of the Secretary-General to maintain a Special Representative for Angola based in Luanda, with the necessary civilian, military and police staff with the mandate as described in paragraph 29 of the report of the Secretary-General;

15. Decides to extend the mandate of the Mission for a period of three months, until 30 April 1993, with the proviso that, as a provisional measure based on security considerations, the Secretary-General is authorized to concentrate Mission deployment in Luanda, and at his discretion in other provincial locations, with the levels of equipment and personnel he deems appropriate to be retained in order to allow the subsequent expeditious redeployment of the Mission as soon as this becomes feasible, with a view to the resumption of its functions in accordance with the Peace Accords and previous resolutions on this matter;

16. Requests the Secretary-General to submit to it as soon as the situation warrants, and in any case before 30 April 1993, a report on the situation in Angola, together with his recommendations for the further role of the United Nations in the peace process, and in the meantime to keep the Council regularly informed;

17. Stresses its readiness to take action promptly, at any time within the period of the mandate authorized by the present resolution, on the recommendation of the Secretary-General, to expand substantially the United Nations presence in Angola in the event of significant progress in the peace process;

18. Reiterates its readiness to consider all appropriate measures under the Charter of the United Nations to secure implementation of the Peace Accords;

19. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Decision of 12 March 1993 (3182nd meeting):
resolution 811 (1993)

At its 3182nd meeting, on 12 March 1993, the Security Council resumed consideration of the item. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representative of Angola, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (New Zealand) drew the attention of the members of the Council to the text of a draft resolution prepared in the course of prior consultations.¹⁸ He also drew their attention to several other documents.¹⁹

The draft resolution was thereupon put to the vote and was adopted unanimously as resolution 811 (1993), which reads:

Reaffirming its resolutions 696 (1991) of 30 May 1991, 747 (1992) of 24 March 1992, 785 (1992) of 30 October 1992, 793 (1992) of 30 November 1992 and 804 (1993) of 29 January 1993,

Gravely disturbed by the recent outbreak of heavy fighting in many parts of Angola, the large number of casualties and massive loss of human life which have ensued and the further deterioration of the already dangerous political and military situation, bringing the country to the verge of the resumption of civil war,

Gravely concerned at the persistent violations by the National Union for the Total Independence of Angola of the major provisions of the Peace Accords for Angola,

Also concerned at reports that military support and equipment continue to flow in contravention of the Peace Accords,

Noting with particular concern that a humanitarian tragedy of grave proportions is developing in Angola and the need, therefore, for increased international humanitarian assistance,

Deeply regretting that the second meeting between the delegations of the Government of Angola and the National Union, which had been scheduled to be held on 26 February 1993 at Addis Ababa under the auspices of the United Nations, did not take place because of the failure by the National Union to fulfil its commitment to send a delegation,

Noting with satisfaction the readiness displayed by the Government of Angola to participate in the Addis Ababa meeting,

Reaffirming its commitment to preserve the unity and territorial integrity of Angola,

Welcoming and supporting the efforts of the Secretary-General and his Special Representative aimed at resolving the present crisis through negotiations,

1. Strongly condemns the persistent violations by the National Union for the Total Independence of Angola of the major provisions of the Peace Accords for Angola, in particular the continued rejection by the National Union of the results of the elections held on 29 and 30 September 1992, which the Special Representative of the Secretary-General determined to be generally free and fair, its failure to take part in the political institutions established on the basis of those elections, its failure to engage in meaningful negotiations with the Government of Angola, its withdrawal from the new Angolan armed forces and its seizure by force of provincial capitals and municipalities and the resumption of hostilities;

2. Demands that the National Union accept unreservedly the results of the democratic elections of 1992 and abide fully by the Peace Accords, and also demands that the two parties, particularly the National Union, produce early evidence, not later than 30 March 1993, that real progress has been made towards the implementation of the Accords;

3. Strongly demands an immediate ceasefire throughout the country, and also demands the resumption without delay and without preconditions of a continued and meaningful dialogue under United Nations auspices so that a clear timetable for the completion of the implementation of the Peace Accords may be established;

4. Reaffirms that it will hold responsible any party which refuses to take part in such a dialogue, thereby jeopardizing the entire process, and will consider all appropriate measures under the Charter of the United Nations to advance the implementation of the Peace Accords;

5. Strongly condemns verbal and physical attacks against the Special Representative of the Secretary-General and personnel in Angola of the United Nations Angola Verification Mission II, and demands that these attacks cease forthwith and that the Government of Angola and the National Union take all necessary measures to ensure their safety and security;

6. Condemns the kidnapping of a Mission military observer in Cabinda on 23 February 1993 and demands that he be released unharmed and unconditionally and without further delay;

7. Fully supports the Secretary-General and his Special Representative in their continuing efforts to restore the peace process and to carry out the mandate of the Mission under extremely difficult conditions;

8. Invites the Secretary-General to seek to organize a meeting between the Government of Angola and the National Union at the highest possible level with a view to securing the full implementation of the Peace Accords, which meeting is to take place in good time before 30 April 1993, and to consider also the future role of the United Nations in Angola, and encourages the parties to respond positively;

9. Requests the Secretary-General, pending the submission of the report referred to in paragraph 16 of resolution 804 (1993), to present as soon as possible a progress report on the efforts for the resumption of the talks between the two parties in Angola at all appropriate levels;

10. Calls on all Member States, United Nations agencies and non-governmental organizations to accord or increase humanitarian relief assistance to Angola, and encourages the Special Representative of the Secretary-General, with the resources at her disposal, to coordinate the provision of humanitarian assistance to the civilian population in need;

11. Strongly appeals to both parties strictly to abide by applicable rules of international humanitarian law, including unimpeded access for humanitarian assistance to the civilian population in need;

12. Appeals once again to all Member States to render economic, material and technical assistance to the Government of Angola for the reconstruction and development of the country;

13. Looks forward to the report of the Secretary-General referred to in paragraph 16 of resolution 804 (1993) on the situation in Angola, together with his recommendations for the further role of the United Nations in the peace process;

14. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of the Russian Federation stated that his country was concerned by the developments in Angola. The Security Council should take steps aimed at returning events in that country to a peaceful course. It should also ensure the implementation of its previous decisions, in particular the adoption of measures against the side that had been recognized as responsible for the breakdown of a political settlement in Angola. The legitimate Government of Angola and UNITA could and must return to the negotiating table. If that did not happen, the international community must provide comprehensive support to the Government of Angola, including all necessary assistance. The time had come for the international community to demonstrate responsibility and firmness in dealing with those forces which were ignoring the resolutions of the Council, and individual States must also apply every available means to exert influence on UNITA.²⁰

The representative of France noted that the unanimous adoption of the resolution demonstrated the Council's commitment to the settlement of the Angolan conflict, despite many difficulties and disappointments. His Government welcomed the information provided by the Special Representative, and supported the Secretary-General's proposal for the holding of a high-level meeting between the Government of Angola and

UNITA, under his auspices, with a view to breaking the deadlock.²¹

The representative of the United States noted that over the past months, when Angola rightfully should have been taking the first steps down a democratic path, its citizens had been faced instead with a bitter war and the resulting humanitarian tragedy of growing proportions. Although both sides had acknowledged that the conflict could not be resolved on the battlefield, the war continued to escalate. The United States continued to believe that a dialogue between the two parties without preconditions was the only way out for Angola. Such dialogue must be taken urgently and without preconditions. The speaker warned that the international community's patience was not endless. The party that continued to violate the Peace Accords, refused to engage in a serious dialogue and appeared to rely on a military solution would be held responsible.²²

The representative of China stated that Angola faced an all-round civil war. His delegation supported the Secretary-General and the United Nations in their efforts to bring the peace process "back on track", and urged the two parties to resume negotiations, promptly and unconditionally, under United Nations auspices. It also supported the proposed high-level meeting between the leadership of the two Angolan parties, at an appropriate time.²³

Decision of 30 April 1993 (3206th meeting):

By a letter dated 29 April 1993 addressed to the President of the Security Council,²⁴ the Secretary-General reported the resumption of peace talks, in Abidjan, on 12 April 1993, between the Government of Angola and UNITA, under United Nations auspices and the chairmanship of his Special Representative. They were expected to continue beyond 30 April. He therefore recommended extending the existing mandate of UNAVEM II for an interim period of 31 days, until 31 May 1993. He had hoped that, upon the conclusion of the talks, he would make appropriate recommendations on the future mandate and strength of the Mission.

At its 3206th meeting, on 30 April 1993, the Security Council included the above-mentioned letter in its agenda. After the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representative of Angola, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (Pakistan) then drew the attention of the members of the Council to the text of a draft resolution prepared in the course of prior consultations.²⁵ He also drew their attention to a letter dated 11 March 1993 from the representative of Angola addressed to the President of the Security Council and to a letter dated 17 March 1993 from the representative of South Africa addressed to the Secretary-General.²⁶

Speaking before the vote, the representative of Brazil noted that the humanitarian situation in Angola had deteriorated further, following attacks against humanitarian flights, and in particular the recent shooting of a World Food Programme chartered aircraft. Brazil had welcomed the resumption of the peace talks in Abidjan, and the representative expressed the hope that they would bring about an immediate ceasefire and the speedy and full implementation of the "Acordos de Paz", including the holding of a second round of elections. Turning to the draft resolution, he stated that the one-month extension of the mandate of UNAVEM II was a provisional measure, to be completed by a substantive consideration of the further role of the United Nations in Angola. The draft resolution clearly emphasized the willingness of the Council, at any time within the one-month period of the mandate, to take action to expand the United Nations presence in Angola.²⁷

The draft resolution was thereupon put to the vote and was adopted unanimously as resolution 823 (1993), which reads:

Reaffirming its resolutions 696 (1991) of 30 May 1991, 747 (1992) of 24 March 1992, 785 (1992) of 30 October 1992, 793 (1992) of 30 November 1992, 804 (1993) of 29 January 1993 and 811 (1993) of 12 March 1993,

Recalling its resolution 804 (1993), in particular paragraph 15, in which it decided to extend the mandate of the United Nations Angola Verification Mission II for a period of three months, until 30 April 1993,

Extending its support to the current and ongoing peace talks in Abidjan between the Government of Angola and the National Union for the Total Independence of Angola under United Nations auspices and chairmanship, and expressing the hope that those talks will result in an immediate ceasefire and in the full implementation of the Peace Accords for Angola,

Gravely concerned at the continuing attacks against international humanitarian flights operating in Angola, in particular the recent shooting down of a World Food Programme airplane,

Taking into account the letter dated 29 April 1993 from the Secretary-General addressed to the President of the Security Council,

1. Decides to extend the existing mandate of the United Nations Angola Verification Mission II until 31 May 1993;

2. Requests the Secretary-General to submit to it as soon as the situation warrants, and in any case before 31 May 1993, a report on the situation in Angola with his recommendations for the further role of the United Nations in the peace process and in the meantime to keep the Council regularly informed;

3. Stresses its readiness to take action promptly, at any time within the period of the mandate authorized by the present resolution, on the recommendation of the Secretary-General, to expand substantially the United Nations presence in Angola in the event of significant progress in the peace process;

4. Condemns the attacks against international humanitarian flights operating in Angola and demands that these attacks cease forthwith and that both parties, in particular the National Union for the Total Independence of Angola, take all necessary measures to ensure the safety of these flights as well as the security of Mission personnel;

5. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Decision of 1 June 1993 (3226th meeting):
resolution 834 (1993)

On 25 May 1993, pursuant to resolution 804 (1993), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a further report on UNAVEM II.²⁸ He reported that, despite six weeks of intensive efforts, the Abidjan meeting, which had begun on 12 April 1993, had ended on 21 May 1993 without agreement. The main rock on which the talks had foundered had been the insistence of UNITA on absolute parity in the simultaneous movement and quartering of Government and UNITA troops, rather than just UNITA troops, as foreseen in a draft Protocol of Abidjan which had been prepared by the representatives of the three observer countries, and a Memorandum of Understanding.

The Secretary-General observed that the prospect that was facing Angola was graver than ever. Conflict had intensified throughout most of the country and the breakdown of the Abidjan talks marked a major and tragic setback to the peace process. He further noted that the failure to reach agreement on a ceasefire made it essential to reconsider the United Nations role in Angola. It would, however, be unthinkable to abandon it at that critical juncture.²⁹ In those circumstances, he recommended a further two-month interim extension of the Mission's mandate on a reduced basis. Such a mission would provide good offices and mediation, with the goal of restoring a ceasefire and reinstating the peace process. It would be a smaller mission with a reduced number of military, police and political personnel, some of which might also be deployed in several locations outside Luanda. In the event that, during that interim period, the parties reached an agreement, he would present specific proposals for adapting and strengthening the Mission's capabilities.³⁰ Noting the importance of increasing resources for the coordination of humanitarian assistance, he stated that new arrangements for the delivery of humanitarian aid were being proposed to the parties by his Special Representative. He appealed to them to abide by the rules of international humanitarian law and to facilitate unimpeded access for relief operations.

At its 3226th meeting, on 1 June 1993, the Security Council included in its agenda the report of the Secretary-General. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representatives of Angola and Portugal, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (Spain) then drew the attention of the members of the Council to the text of a draft resolution prepared in the course of prior consultations.³¹

The representative of Angola stated that the Secretary-General's report reflected in great measure the tragic situation in the country, and also made it clear that the failure of the negotiations had been due entirely and exclusively to UNITA. The dramatic situation that prevailed in the so-called areas under its control was a result of Mr. Savimbi's refusal to allow international humanitarian organizations to move around the country to evaluate the actual needs in those areas. More than 2 million refugees from all parts of the country had been registered. The international community should recognize that UNITA constituted a serious threat to regional peace and security. He therefore urged the Council to adopt strong “condemnatory and sanctioning measures” to compel UNITA to accept de facto the results of the 1992 democratic elections, and to participate in the overall process of pacification and national reconciliation.³²

The representative of Portugal stated that the Angolan war must not become a forgotten war. The effects of the conflict were not limited to that country alone, but affected peace and international security in the whole southern African region. The international community, the observer countries, neighbouring States and the Security Council must unite their efforts and apply maximum pressure on the party that refused to seek a peaceful solution to the conflict. The Council’s weight must be felt effectively, and its resolutions, particularly resolutions 804 (1993) and 811 (1993), must not become merely exercises in rhetoric. Those who violated the Peace Accords and failed to respect the minimum standards of international behaviour must be made aware of the consequences unless they changed their position. He stated that his Government would continue to endeavour to ensure the early resumption of negotiations in order to bring an end to the conflict.³³

Speaking before the vote, the representative of Cape Verde noted that the resolution of the Angolan crisis was vital to peace and stability in the southern African region. He stressed the importance of a continued and effective United Nations presence in Angola and supported the incorporation of humanitarian assistance in the UNAVEM mandate.³⁴

The draft resolution was thereupon put to the vote and was adopted unanimously as resolution 834 (1993), which reads:

Reaffirming its resolutions 696 (1991) of 30 May 1991, 747 (1992) of 24 March 1992, 785 (1992) of 30 October 1992, 793 (1992) of 30 November 1992, 84 (1993) of 29 January

1993, 811 (1993) of 12 March 1993 and 823 (1993) of 30 April 1993,

Having considered the further report of the Secretary-General of 25 and 27 May 1993,

Expressing grave concern at the deterioration of the political and military situation, and noting with consternation the further deterioration of an already grave humanitarian situation,

Gravely concerned at the failure of the talks between the Government of Angola and the National Union for the Total Independence of Angola held at Abidjan under the auspices of the United Nations and the chairmanship of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General with participation of the representatives of the three observer States to the Angolan peace process — Portugal, the Russian Federation and the United States of America — and in particular at the failure to establish a ceasefire,

Welcoming and supporting the efforts of the Secretary-General and his Special Representative aimed at the earliest resolution of the Angolan crisis through negotiations,

Emphasizing the importance of a continued and effective United Nations presence in Angola, with a view to fostering the peace process and advancing the implementation of the Peace Accords for Angola,

Reaffirming its commitment to preserve the unity and territorial integrity of Angola,

1. Decides to extend the existing mandate of the United Nations Angola Verification Mission II for a period of forty-five days, until 15 July 1993, in accordance with the recommendations contained in paragraphs 36 and 37 of the report of the Secretary-General;

2. Stresses the importance of the functions of good offices and mediation by the Mission and the Special Representative, with the goal of restoring a ceasefire and reinstating the peace process for the full implementation of the Peace Accords for Angola;

3. Reiterates its demand that the National Union for the Total Independence of Angola accept unreservedly the results of the democratic elections of 1992 and abide fully by the Peace Accords;

4. Condemns the National Union for its actions and armed attacks, which have resulted in increased hostilities and which endanger the peace process, and demands that it immediately cease such actions and armed attacks;

5. Welcomes the disposition of the Government of Angola to reach a peaceful settlement of the conflict in conformity with the Peace Accords and pertinent Security Council resolutions, deeply regrets the refusal of the National Union at the talks to agree to the withdrawal of its troops from the locations which it has occupied since the resumption of the hostilities, and demands that it do so;

6. Affirms that such occupation is a grave violation of the Peace Accords;

7. Strongly appeals to the two parties, in particular to the National Union, to re-initiate as soon as possible the interrupted peace talks under United Nations auspices with a view to the earliest establishment of a ceasefire throughout the country and the full implementation of the Peace Accords, further undertakings between the two parties, and relevant resolutions of the Security Council, due account being taken of what was achieved during the discussion of the Abidjan draft protocol;

8. Holds the National Union responsible for the breakdown of the talks and for thereby jeopardizing the peace process, and reaffirms that it will consider all appropriate measures under the Charter of the United Nations to advance the implementation of the Peace Accords;

9. Fully supports the continuing efforts of the Secretary-General and his Special Representative aimed at restoring the peace process and at carrying out the mandate of the United Nations Angola Verification Mission II under extremely difficult conditions;

10. Calls on all States to refrain from any action which directly or indirectly could jeopardize the implementation of the Peace Accords, and urges all States to refrain from providing to the National Union any form of direct or indirect military assistance or other support inconsistent with the peace process;

11. Welcomes the steps taken by the Secretary-General to strengthen the humanitarian activities being undertaken by the United Nations system in Angola under the overall coordination of the Special Representative, including the preparation of the United Nations humanitarian assistance plan for Angola, and strongly appeals to the Government of Angola and to the National Union to cooperate fully with the Secretary-General's efforts in this field;

12. Calls on all Member States, United Nations agencies and non-governmental organizations to respond swiftly and generously to the Secretary-General's appeal in implementation of the above-mentioned plan and to accord or increase humanitarian relief assistance to Angola, and encourages the Special Representative of the Secretary-General to continue to coordinate the provision of such assistance;

13. Reiterates its appeal to both parties strictly to abide by applicable rules of international humanitarian law, including to guarantee unimpeded access for humanitarian assistance to the civilian population in need, and commends in particular the efforts of the Secretary-General and his Special Representative to establish agreed humanitarian relief corridors;

14. Also reiterates its appeal to both parties to take all necessary measures to ensure the security and the safety of the personnel involved in humanitarian relief operations;

15. Requests the Secretary-General to submit to it as soon as the situation warrants, and in any case before 15 July

1993, a report on the situation in Angola with his recommendation for the further role of the United Nations in the peace process and, in the meantime, to keep the Council regularly informed of developments;

16. Reiterates its readiness to take action promptly, at any time within the period of the mandate authorized by the present resolution, on the recommendation of the Secretary-General to expand substantially the United Nations presence in Angola in the event of significant progress in the peace process;

17. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

After the vote, the representative of the Russian Federation warned that if the UNITA leadership continued to flout the international community, the Security Council would have to consider all appropriate measures, in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations, to put an end to those actions, which disregarded its decisions and undermined the authority of the Organization.³⁵

Decision of 8 June 1993 (3232nd meeting):
statement by the President

At its 3232nd meeting, on 8 June 1993, the Security Council resumed its consideration of the item on the agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Spain) stated that, after consultations among the members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:³⁶

The Security Council received with grave concern and shock the report of the Secretary-General on the attack on 27 May 1993 by forces of the National Union for the Total Independence of Angola (UNITA) on a train carrying civilians between Quipungo and Matala, which resulted in the death of 225 persons, including women and children, and several hundred wounded.

The Council strongly condemns this action by UNITA, which is a clear violation of Council resolutions and of international humanitarian law, and it reiterates its demand that UNITA immediately cease its armed attacks. The Council expresses its condemnation of such criminal attacks and stresses that those responsible must be held accountable. It urges UNITA leaders to make sure that its forces abide by the rules of international humanitarian law.

The Council emphasizes once again the imperative need for an immediate ceasefire throughout the country. It reiterates its appeal to the two parties, in particular UNITA, to re-initiate the interrupted peace talks with a view to the full implementation of the Peace Accords for Angola.

Decision of 15 July 1993 (3254th meeting):
resolution 851 (1993)

On 12 July 1993, pursuant to resolution 834 (1993), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a further report on UNAVEM II.³⁷ He reported that the political and military situation in the country had continued to deteriorate dangerously as fighting had intensified and as the mistrust had deepened. The consequences, both for Angola and for regional security, were increasingly worrying. The neighbouring countries were receiving large inflows of Angolan refugees. Moreover, the repeated attempts of UNITA to seize additional territory had called into serious question its declarations about peaceful intentions. Meanwhile, the Government of Angola had reintroduced military conscription, and the National Assembly, on 17 June 1993, had empowered it to “use any means,” including placing the country on a war footing, to confront the UNITA offensive. As the fighting had intensified, so had mutual accusations regarding the use of mercenaries and foreign forces. In addition, there had been reports of foreign arrangements by both sides for the supply of military equipment. The Secretary-General further reported on regional efforts and on his Special Representative’s good offices. Since his arrival in Angola on 30 June, his new Special Representative had been pursuing intensive consultations with the parties, during which both sides had expressed their readiness to resume negotiations and to facilitate humanitarian relief operations. UNITA’s leader had also stressed the need for an effective United Nations mediation role.

The Secretary-General observed that in the prevailing circumstances, it would be unthinkable for the international community and the United Nations to abandon Angola. At the same time, it was the Angolans themselves who bore the ultimate responsibility for the establishment of peace and national reconciliation in their country. Noting that UNAVEM II had become an essential factor to facilitate the resumption of negotiations to advance the peace process and in supporting humanitarian activities in the country, as well as an indispensable channel for communication between the parties, he recommended a three-month extension of the Mission’s mandate.

At its 3254th meeting, on 15 July 1993, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. After the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representatives of Angola, Egypt, Namibia, Portugal, the United Republic of Tanzania, Zambia and Zimbabwe, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (United Kingdom) drew the attention of the members of the Council to several documents.³⁸

The representative of Angola stated that his Government had repeatedly called the attention of the Security Council to the persistence of UNITA in resorting to arms to obtain the power that had been denied it at the polls. The time had come to move from the phase of simple resolutions of condemnation to the adoption of coercive mechanisms to put an end to the UNITA rebellion against the legitimate Government and the international community. He stressed the importance of safeguarding the Council’s authority, which was being challenged by the “militaristic wing” of UNITA, in order to avoid creating a precedent that might jeopardize the resolution of various international conflicts. Never before, since the resumption of the war, had Angola suffered so many deaths and so much destruction, in such a short period of time. His delegation was of the view that the outright adoption by the international community of a set of restrictive measures would help persuade UNITA to give up war and violence. Measures such as freezing UNITA bank accounts, imposing travel restrictions, closing its overseas offices and banning the use of propaganda facilities in Member States should be taken urgently. He stressed that although his Government continued to believe that a negotiated settlement was the only alternative, it would nevertheless resort to any means, including military action, to enforce the law and restore democratic rule. To that end, the Government would accept all assistance and international aid available under the Charter of the United Nations to defend Angola's sovereignty and territorial integrity and to protect its people.³⁹

The representative of Zimbabwe stated that the collective measures proposed in the draft resolution should be imposed forthwith. In the view of his delegation, the time had come for initiating and implementing a comprehensive programme for UNAVEM III. The Council and the international community should take the initiative to create peace by adopting collective measures that would give UNITA and its leader no other alternative but to return to the negotiating table on the basis of the Peace Accords and the Abidjan formulas. His delegation was also concerned that the involvement of too many negotiators might actually retard progress and allow UNITA to buy time to continue its military offensive. It therefore urged that discussions continue to be conducted solely under the auspices of the United Nations and OAU.⁴⁰

The representative of Namibia stated that Africa and the world could not afford another Somalia. Thus Angola should not be allowed to drift into a similar tragedy. The Security Council must take strong and effective measures to deprive UNITA of its supply of arms and other war materiel. The region needed peace and stability to start its economic reconstruction; it did not need any more weapons. In that regard, he urged the Council to request the Secretary-General to elaborate a plan for the reconstruction of Angola, including the convening of a pledging conference. He also called for a sizeable and effective United Nations presence in Angola. The speaker reiterated his Government's invitation to Mr. Savimbi to come to Windhoek with a view to seeking a solution to the conflict.⁴¹

The representative of Egypt, speaking on behalf of OAU, stated that the tragic developments in Angola clearly demonstrated the deterioration of the political and military situation in that country as a result of unabated hostilities and the growing mistrust between the parties. It also posed a threat to security and peace in the region. OAU fully endorsed the draft resolution, which condemned UNITA violations and warned of serious consequences if it failed to return to the negotiating table. She noted that the OAU Summit Declaration on the situation in Angola, adopted in Cairo, inter alia, laid down the foundations for a solution to the crisis and reflected the African leaders' commitment to the preservation of the unity and territorial integrity of Angola, as well as their strong condemnation of UNITA actions. The Declaration recommended that the Council take concrete measures against UNITA, such as the adoption of sanctions, including the closure of its offices abroad. It further called on the Governments of neighbouring countries to prevent their territories and space from being used as a springboard for any action against the Government of Angola. Her delegation expressed full support for extending the mandate of UNAVEM II and reinforcing its personnel. In conclusion, the speaker emphasized the importance of continuing coordination and consultation between the United Nations and OAU in regard of the Angolan problem.⁴²

The representative of Portugal stated that, as a mediator of the process that had led to the signing of the Peace Accords, and as an observer, his country had special responsibilities. It was not his delegation's intention to take sides in the Angolan conflict nor to suggest that one of the parties be subjugated or annihilated. On the contrary, his delegation was convinced that the future of Angola could only be built on a political solution respecting the results of the elections and including all the signatory parties. However, it felt compelled to denounce UNITA's violation of the Peace Accords and its choice of a strategy of war. The latter must understand that its behaviour would inevitably incur costs and lead to international isolation. It was in that context that the three observers had discussed in Moscow additional measures that might be considered by the Council. His delegation took note of the Council's determination to consider the imposition of measures against UNITA and supported the extension of the mandate of UNAVEM II and the possibility of enlarging it.⁴³

The representative of the Russian Federation stated that the continuing deterioration of the military, political and humanitarian situation in Angola posed a serious threat not just to the people of that country, but also to the security of the entire region. The Council must send a serious warning to UNITA that, if it failed to cease hostilities and fully implement the Peace Accords, the Council would consider imposing measures under the Charter, including a mandatory arms embargo. Moreover, if it continued to defy the relevant resolutions, the Council would consider additional measures, such as freezing its overseas assets and bank accounts.⁴⁴

Speaking before the vote, the representative of China urged UNITA to cease immediately all hostile actions, to withdraw from the occupied territories and to return to the negotiating table. It must also ensure the safe departure of foreign nationals from areas under its control and allow unimpeded access for humanitarian relief. He contended that UNAVEM II had not only become an indispensable channel of communication between the two warring parties, but it also played an essential role by monitoring the escalation of the conflict. His delegation thus supported the draft resolution and the extension of the Mission's mandate.⁴⁵

In the course of the debate, other speakers supported the imposition of collective measures, under the Charter of the United Nations, to persuade UNITA to desist from its military actions, to comply with previous Council resolutions and to return to the negotiating table.⁴⁶

The draft resolution was thereupon put to the vote and was adopted unanimously as resolution 851 (1993), which reads:

Reaffirming its resolutions 696 (1991) of 30 May 1991, 747 (1992) of 24 March 1992, 785 (1992) of 30 October 1992, 793 (1992) of 30 November 1992, 804 (1993) of 29 January 1993, 811 (1993) of 12 March 1993, 823 (1993) of 30 April 1993 and 834 (1993) of 1 June 1993,

Welcoming the Declaration on the Situation in Angola adopted by the Assembly of Heads of State and Government of the Organization of African Unity at its twenty-ninth ordinary session, held at Cairo from 28 to 30 June 1993, and the resolution on the situation in Angola adopted by the Council of Ministers of the Organization of African Unity at its fifty-eighth ordinary session, held at Cairo from 21 to 26 June 1993,

Welcoming also the joint statement issued in Moscow on 8 July 1993 by the representatives of Portugal, the Russian Federation and the United States of America, the three observer States to the Angolan peace process,

Taking note of the Special Declaration on Angola adopted by the World Conference on Human Rights, held at Vienna from 14 to 25 June 1993,

Expressing grave concern at the deterioration of the political and military situation, and noting with consternation the further deterioration of an already grave humanitarian situation,

Deeply concerned that the peace talks remain suspended and that a ceasefire has not been established,

Welcoming and supporting the efforts of the Secretary-General and his Special Representative aimed at the earliest resolution of the Angolan crisis through negotiations,

Emphasizing the importance of a continued and effective United Nations presence in Angola with a view to fostering the peace process and advancing the implementation of the Peace Accords for Angola,

Reaffirming its commitment to preserve the unity and territorial integrity of Angola,

1. Welcomes the further report of the Secretary-General of 12 and 14 July 1993, and decides to extend the existing mandate of the United Nations Angola Verification Mission II for a period of two months, until 15 September 1993;

2. Reiterates its readiness to consider taking action promptly, at any time within the period of the mandate authorized by the present resolution, on the recommendation of the Secretary-General, to expand substantially the United Nations presence in Angola in the event of significant progress in the peace process;

3. Stresses the importance of the functions of good offices and mediation by the Mission and the Special Representative, with the goal of restoring a ceasefire and reinstating the peace process for the full implementation of the Peace Accords for Angola;

4. Reiterates its demand that the National Union for the Total Independence of Angola accept unreservedly the results of the democratic elections of 1992 and abide fully by the Peace Accords;

5. Condemns the National Union for continuing military actions, which are resulting in increased suffering for the civilian population of Angola and damage to the Angolan economy and again demands that it immediately cease such actions;

6. Also condemns the National Union's repeated attempts to seize additional territory and its failure to withdraw its troops from the locations which it has occupied since the resumption of the hostilities, and demands once again that it immediately do so and agree without delay to return its troops to United Nations-monitored areas as a transitional measure pending full implementation of the Peace Accords;

7. Reaffirms that such occupation is a grave violation of the Peace Accords and is incompatible with the goal of peace through agreements and reconciliation;

8. Stresses the fundamental need to re-initiate without delay the peace talks under United Nations auspices with a view to the immediate establishment of a ceasefire throughout the country and the full implementation of the Peace Accords and relevant resolutions of the Security Council;

9. Takes note of statements by the National Union that it is prepared to resume peace negotiations and demands that it act accordingly;

10. Welcomes the continued disposition of the Government of Angola to reach a peaceful settlement of the conflict in conformity with the Peace Agreements and the relevant Security Council resolutions;

11. Urges all States to refrain from any action which directly or indirectly could jeopardize the implementation of the Peace Accords, especially from providing any form of direct or indirect military assistance to the National Union, or any other support to the National Union inconsistent with the peace process;

12. Expresses its readiness to consider the imposition of measures under the Charter of the United Nations, including a mandatory embargo on the sale or supply to the National Union of arms and related materiel and other military assistance, to prevent it from pursuing its military actions, unless by 15 September 1993 the Secretary-General has reported that an effective ceasefire has been established and that agreement has been reached on the full implementation of the Peace Accords and relevant Security Council resolutions;

13. Recognizes the legitimate rights of the Government of Angola, and in this regard welcomes the provision of assistance to the Government in support of the democratic process;

14. Welcomes the steps taken by the Secretary-General to implement the emergency humanitarian assistance plan;

15. Takes note of statements by the National Union that it will cooperate in ensuring the unimpeded delivery of humanitarian assistance to all Angolans and demands that it act accordingly;

16. Calls upon all Member States, United Nations agencies and non-governmental organizations to respond swiftly and generously to the Secretary-General's appeal in implementation of the above-mentioned plan and to accord or increase humanitarian relief assistance to Angola, and encourages the Special Representative of the Secretary-General to continue to coordinate the provision of humanitarian assistance;

17. Demands that the National Union continue to extend its cooperation in ensuring the immediate evacuation of foreign nationals and their family members from Huambo and other locations which it has occupied;

18. Reiterates its strong condemnation of the attack by National Union forces on 27 May 1993 on a train carrying civilians, and reaffirms that such criminal attacks are clear violations of international humanitarian law;

19. Reiterates its appeal to both parties strictly to abide by applicable rules of international humanitarian law, including to guarantee unimpeded access for humanitarian assistance to the civilian population in need, and commends in particular the efforts of the Secretary-General and his Special Representative to establish agreed humanitarian relief corridors;

20. Also reiterates its appeal to both parties to take all necessary measures to ensure the security and safety of personnel of the United Nations Angola Verification Mission II, as well as of the personnel involved in humanitarian relief operations;

21. Requests the Secretary-General to submit to it as soon as the situation warrants, and in any case before 15 September 1993, a report on the situation in Angola with his recommendation for the further role of the United Nations in the peace process and, in the meantime, to keep the Council regularly informed of developments;

22. Also requests the Secretary-General to submit as soon as possible the budgetary implications of bringing the Mission up to its full strength as mandated in resolution 696 (1991);

23. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of the United States expressed her delegation's support for the United Nations effort to relieve the humanitarian suffering in Angola, as well as its concern about the plight of the people of Angola. She called on UNITA to refrain from military action and to return to the peace process. Noting that peacekeeping had become a growth industry, she contended that, before the increased demand could be effectively met, her delegation would need clarification on the relevant costs and their duration.⁴⁷

⁴⁷ Ibid., pp. 114-115.

The representative of France expressed his Government's concern at the deterioration of the situation in Angola and reiterated its appeal for dialogue between the leaders of the two parties and looked forward to the resumption and speedy conclusion of the negotiations. Should they fail, his Government would support the imposition by the Council of any necessary measures against the party opposed to peace.⁴⁸

Decision of 15 September 1993
(3277th meeting): resolution 864 (1993)

On 13 September 1993, pursuant to resolution 851 (1993), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a further report on UNAVEM II.⁴⁹ He reported that despite intensified international efforts to steer the peace process back on track, the grave situation in Angola had worsened further and had become particularly tragic in the humanitarian domain. Since early August, the Government had embarked on a counter-offensive which had resulted in UNITA being removed from several places it had held before. On 11 August, Mr. Savimbi had proposed, via a press interview, an immediate ceasefire without preconditions which was reiterated to the Special Representative on 20 August through the Special Envoy of the President of Zaire. Despite his request to meet with Mr. Savimbi in order to obtain additional information concerning the UNITA proposal, the Special Representative had not yet been able to meet with the leader of UNITA. Meanwhile, the international community had persevered in its efforts towards a peaceful resolution of the Angolan crisis. The Secretary-General highlighted two of the initiatives that were under way. One sought the convening of a meeting between the President of Angola and the leader of UNITA, under the auspices of the King of Morocco, the President of Cote d'Ivoire and the President of the African National Congress of South Africa, while the other involved efforts of the OAU Ad Hoc Committee on Southern Africa to meet with Mr. Savimbi.

He outlined the action taken by his Special Representative and some African Presidents towards the crisis. He further noted that the humanitarian situation had worsened dramatically and described the steps taken by the United Nations to provide humanitarian assistance. Regarding the situation of UNAVEM II, he stated that the number of international civil staff was inadequate to carry out the various tasks under the Mission's mandate, especially that of mediation and good offices.

Voicing his concern at the continued tragic situation, the Secretary-General urged both parties to return to the negotiating table without delay, in order to agree on an immediate ceasefire which would allow for the distribution of desperately needed humanitarian assistance. He also urged the OAU Ad Hoc Committee on Southern Africa, the Heads of State of neighbouring countries, and the three observer States, to continue their efforts. He recommended a three-month extension of the Mission's mandate and that the Council confirm its readiness to take prompt action to expand the United Nations presence in Angola, in the event of significant progress in the peace process.

At its 3277th meeting, on 15 September 1993, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representatives of Angola, Egypt, Nigeria and Portugal, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (Venezuela) then drew the attention of the members of the Council to the text of a draft resolution prepared in the course of prior consultations, as well as to a letter dated 3 September 1993 from the representative of Angola addressed to the President of the Security Council.⁵⁰

The representative of Angola stated that, in spite of the efforts made by his Government, the international community and the Special Representative, to end hostilities, there had been no progress since the adoption of the Council's last resolution, due to UNITA's continued refusal to participate in the negotiation process. For its part, his Government had made several concessions at the Abidjan talks, with a view to ending the suffering of the people and stopping the destruction by UNITA of the country's social and economic infrastructure. UNITA, on the other hand, had intensified its military operations to gain additional territory. The time had come to impose mandatory sanctions against UNITA to force it to cease hostilities and to resume the political dialogue. He therefore called for the adoption of the following measures, under Chapter VII of the Charter: a mandatory comprehensive arms embargo; a ban on the sale or supply of petroleum and petroleum products to UNITA; the closure of UNITA's foreign offices or any form of representation; and a ban of its political and propaganda activities in any country. The Council should also seize and freeze UNITA's bank accounts, and take appropriate measures, under Chapter VII, to guarantee the delivery of humanitarian assistance to the population. Moreover, it should recognize the legitimate rights of the Government of Angola and welcome all assistance to the Government in restoring peace, defending its sovereignty, territorial integrity and the consolidation of democracy; demand that UNITA respect human rights and free all Angolan citizens and foreigners being held captive and call upon the international community to contribute to the humanitarian emergency plan of assistance to Angola.⁵¹

The representative of Egypt, speaking on behalf of OAU, stated that the Angolan conflict threatened peace and security in the region. By resolution 851 (1993) of 15 July 1993, the Security Council had given UNITA a chance to participate in the national efforts to achieve peace, however the latter had not complied with that resolution. The Council must therefore take the necessary measures, under Chapter VII, to prompt UNITA to abide by the international will. Expressing his delegation's support for the draft resolution, he emphasized the importance of consultation and continuous coordination between the United Nations and OAU to put an end to the crisis.⁵²

During the debate, other speakers while recognizing the need for, and supporting, the imposition of mandatory sanctions against UNITA, under Chapter VII of the Charter, noted that the resolution gave that organization a final opportunity to comply with previous Council resolutions.⁵³

Speaking before the vote, the representative of China contended that the imposition of sanctions against UNITA was not the end, but rather the means to persuade it to resume negotiations with the Government of Angola. He expressed his delegation's support for the draft resolution and its hope that the sanctions envisaged would bring about a genuine ceasefire at an early date and an agreement on the comprehensive implementation of the Peace Accords and Council resolutions so that it would be able to consider lifting the sanctions in due course.⁵⁴

The draft resolution was thereupon put to the vote and was adopted unanimously as resolution 864 (1993), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolutions 696 (1991) of 30 May 1991, 747 (1992) of 24 March 1992, 785 (1992) of 30 October 1992, 793 (1992) of 30 November 1992, 804 (1993) of 29 January 1993, 811 (1993) of 12 March 1993, 823 (1993) of 30 April 1993, 834 (1993) of 1 June 1993 and 851 (1993) of 15 July 1993,

Having considered the further report of the Secretary-General of 13 and 14 September 1993,

Expressing grave concern at the continuing deterioration of the political and military situation, and noting with consternation the further deterioration of an already grave humanitarian situation,

Deeply concerned that, despite its previous resolutions and the efforts undertaken by the Secretary-General and his Special Representative, the peace talks remain suspended and a ceasefire has not been established,

Welcoming the joint statement issued in Lisbon on 10 September 1993 by the representatives of Portugal, the Russian Federation and the United States of America, the three observer States to the Angolan peace process,

Welcoming also and supporting to that end the efforts of the Secretary-General and his Special Representative aimed at the earliest resolution of the Angolan crisis through negotiations, and stressing the importance it attaches thereto,

Welcoming further the efforts of the Ad Hoc Committee on Southern Africa of the Organization of African Unity and of heads of State of neighbouring countries to facilitate the resumption of the peace process in Angola,

Emphasizing the importance of a continued and effective United Nations presence in Angola with a view to fostering the peace process and advancing the full implementation of the Peace Accords for Angola,

Reaffirming its commitment to preserve the unity and territorial integrity of Angola,

1. Welcomes the further report of the Secretary-General of 13 and 14 September 1993, and decides to extend the existing mandate of the United Nations Angola Verification Mission II for a period of three months, until 15 December 1993;

2. Reiterates its readiness to consider taking action promptly, at any time within the period of the mandate authorized by the present resolution, on the recommendation of the Secretary-General, to expand substantially the United Nations presence in Angola in the event of significant progress in the peace process;

3. Reaffirms the importance of the functions of good offices and mediation by the Mission and the Special Representative, with the goal of restoring a ceasefire and reinstating the peace process for the full implementation of the Peace Accords for Angola;

4. Welcomes the continued disposition of the Government of Angola to reach a peaceful settlement of the conflict in conformity with the Peace Accords and relevant resolutions of the Security Council;

5. Reaffirms its recognition of the legitimate rights of the Government of Angola and in this regard welcomes the provision of assistance to the Government in support of the democratic process;

6. Reiterates once again its demand that the National Union for the Total Independence of Angola accept unreservedly the results of the democratic elections of 30 September 1992 and abide fully by the Peace Accords;

7. Condemns the National Union for continuing military actions, which are resulting in increased suffering for the civilian population of Angola and damage to the Angolan economy, and again demands that it immediately cease such actions;

8. Also condemns the repeated attempts by the National Union to seize additional territory and its failure to withdraw its troops from the locations which it has occupied since the resumption of the hostilities, and demands once again that it immediately do so and agree without delay to return its troops to United Nations-monitored areas as a transitional measure pending full implementation of the Peace Accords;

9. Reaffirms that such occupation is a grave violation of the Peace Accords and is incompatible with the goal of peace through agreements and reconciliation;

10. Stresses once again the fundamental need to re-initiate without delay the peace talks under United Nations auspices with a view to the immediate establishment of a ceasefire throughout the country and the full implementation of the Peace Accords and Security Council resolutions;

11. Takes note of statements by the National Union that it is prepared to resume peace negotiations and demands that it act accordingly;

12. Welcomes the further steps taken by the Secretary-General to implement the emergency humanitarian assistance plan;

13. Strongly condemns the repeated attacks carried out by the National Union against United Nations personnel working to provide humanitarian assistance and reaffirms that such attacks are clear violations of international humanitarian law;

14. Takes note of statements by the National Union that it will cooperate in ensuring the unimpeded delivery of humanitarian assistance to all Angolans and demands that it act accordingly;

15. Reiterates its appeal to both parties to take all necessary measures to ensure the security and safety of personnel of the United Nations Angola Verification Mission II as well as of the personnel involved in humanitarian relief operations, and strictly to abide by applicable rules of international humanitarian law;

16. Demands that the National Union proceed immediately to the release of all foreign citizens held against their will and to abstain from any action which might cause damage to foreign property;

B

Strongly condemning the National Union for the Total Independence of Angola and holding its leadership responsible for not having taken the necessary measures to comply with the demands made by the Security Council in its previous resolutions, Determined to ensure respect for its resolutions and the full implementation of the Peace Accords for Angola,

Urging all States to refrain from providing any form of direct or indirect assistance, support or encouragement to the National Union,

Determining that, as a result of the National Union's military actions, the situation in Angola constitutes a threat to international peace and security,

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

17. Decides that the provisions set forth in paragraphs 19 to 25 below shall come into force ten days after the date of adoption of the present resolution unless the Secretary-General notifies the Council that an effective ceasefire has been established and that agreement has been reached on the implementation of the Peace Accords and relevant Security Council resolutions;

18. Decides also that if, at any time after the submission of the above-mentioned report of the

Secretary-General, the Secretary-General reports to the Council that the National Union for the Total Independence of Angola has broken the ceasefire or ceased to participate constructively in the implementation of the Peace Accords and the relevant Council resolutions, the provisions set forth in paragraphs 19 to 25 below shall come into force immediately;

19. Decides further, with a view to prohibiting all sale or supply to the National Union of arms and related materiel and military assistance, as well as petroleum and petroleum products, that all States shall prevent the sale or supply, by their nationals or from their territories or using their flag vessels or aircraft, of arms and related materiel of all types, including weapons and ammunition, military vehicles and equipment and spare parts for the afore-mentioned, as well as of petroleum and petroleum products, whether or not originating in their territory, to the territory of Angola other than through named points of entry on a list to be supplied by the Government of Angola to the Secretary-General, who shall promptly notify the Member States of the United Nations;

20. Calls upon all States, and all international organizations, to act strictly in accordance with the provisions of the present resolution, notwithstanding the existence of any rights or obligations conferred or imposed by any international agreement or any contract entered into or any license or permit granted prior to the date of adoption of the present resolution;

21. Calls upon States to bring proceedings against persons and entities violating the measures imposed by the present resolution and to impose appropriate penalties;

22. Decides to establish, in accordance with rule 28 of its provisional rules of procedure, a committee of the Security Council consisting of all the members of the Council to undertake the following tasks and to report on its work to the Council with its observations and recommendations:

(a) To examine the reports submitted pursuant to paragraph 24 below;

(b) To seek from all States further information regarding the action taken by them with a view to effectively implementing the measures imposed by paragraph 19 above;

(c) To consider information brought to its attention by States concerning violations of the measures imposed by paragraph 19 and to recommend appropriate measures in response thereto;

(d) To make periodic reports to the Council on information submitted to it regarding alleged violations of the measures imposed by paragraph 19, identifying where possible persons or entities, including vessels, reported to be engaged in such violations;

(e) To promulgate guidelines that may be necessary to facilitate the implementation of the measures imposed by paragraph 19;

23. Calls upon all States to cooperate fully with the committee established by paragraph 22 above in the fulfilment of its tasks, including supplying such information as may be sought by the committee in pursuance of the present resolution;

24. Requests all States to report to the Secretary-General by 15 October 1993 on the measures they have adopted in order to meet the obligations set out in paragraph 19 above;

25. Requests the Secretary-General to provide all necessary assistance to the committee established by paragraph 22 above and to make the necessary arrangements in the Secretariat for this purpose;

26. Expresses its readiness to consider the imposition of further measures under the Charter of the United Nations, including, inter alia, trade measures against the National Union for the Total Independence of Angola and restrictions on the travel of its personnel, unless by 1 November 1993 the Secretary-General has reported that an effective ceasefire has been established and that agreement has been reached on the full implementation of the Peace Accords for Angola and relevant Security Council resolutions;

27. Expresses also its readiness to review the measures in the present resolution if the Secretary-General reports to the Council that an effective ceasefire has been established and that substantial progress has been achieved towards the full implementation of the Peace Accords for Angola and relevant Council resolutions;

28. Requests the Secretary-General to submit to it as soon as the situation warrants, and in any case in good time before 1 November 1993 and again before 15 December 1993, a report on the situation in Angola and the implementation of the present resolution, with his recommendation for the further role of the United Nations in the peace process and, in the meantime, to keep the Council regularly informed of developments;

29. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of the United Kingdom stated that the unanimous adoption of the resolution reflected the Council's determination to support the democratic process in Angola. The measures adopted were not intended to punish, but rather to persuade UNITA to rejoin the negotiating process. Stressing that the humanitarian priorities were equally clear, he noted that his Government had already pledged two million pounds for emergency humanitarian relief, and it would continue to do its utmost to alleviate the human suffering in that country.⁵⁵

The representative of the United States stressed that the international community held UNITA's

leadership responsible for the Angolan crisis and would not tolerate its continued attempts to wage war on its own people in an effort to conquer militarily what it could not win in a democratic election. UNITA must also understand the Council's readiness to impose additional sanctions unless it fully complied with the Peace Accords and relevant Council resolutions. That was the last warning.⁵⁶

The representative of the Russian Federation noted that the resolution just adopted afforded the leadership of UNITA a final opportunity to return to the path of genuine interaction with the Government of Angola. Should it refuse once again to fully meet its obligations under the Peace Agreements, however, the imposition of Chapter VII measures banning the supply of weapons, oil and petroleum products to UNITA would be automatic. Moreover, if there was no progress in the peace process, the Council should consider taking additional measures under the Charter, including trade measures against UNITA, restrictions on the travel of its representatives and a ban on all air, land and sea deliveries to Angola, with the exception of those previously authorized by the Government of Angola. The resolution would also strengthen the efforts of the Secretary-General and his Special Representative to obtain a peaceful settlement of the conflict.⁵⁷

Noting that the Council had given Mr. Savimbi a reprieve of 10 days, the representative of France expressed the hope that he would "heed the voice of wisdom" and thus avoid the mandatory measures. Such a decision would also allow the establishment of a massive United Nations peacekeeping operation and the restoration of peace in the country.⁵⁸

Decision of 1 November 1993 (3302nd meeting):
statement by the President

On 27 October 1993, pursuant to resolution 864 (1993), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a further report on UNAVEM II.⁵⁹ He reported that on 14 and 15 September 1993 his Special Representative had met with a high-level UNITA delegation in Abidjan

and had received a proposal on a "unilateral declaration of a ceasefire in situ throughout the Angolan national territory" which would come into effect on 20 September 1993. The proposal also called for immediate discussions on a number of political and military issues. His Special Representative had noted, however, that the proposal did not make reference to the legal framework for the peace process, acceptance of the 1992 election results, the understandings reached at Abidjan and relevant Council resolutions, nor to the fact that the UNITA statement was a unilateral declaration of a cessation of hostilities rather than a ceasefire. The Government of Angola, in its peace plan of 22 September 1993,⁶⁰ set out the following principles for the resolution of the post-electoral crisis: UNITA's withdrawal from the occupied areas, followed by a ceasefire; unimpeded access for humanitarian aid and immediate evacuation of the wounded, the sick and foreigners after the ceasefire; full and unequivocal acceptance of the validity of the Accords and the election results; and respect for the legislation produced by the instruments of sovereignty constituted as a result of the elections. Subsequently, in a communiqué issued on 6 October 1993, UNITA had reaffirmed the validity of the Peace Accords as the basis of the peace process but believed they should be updated; reiterated its acceptance of the results of the elections, although it considered them fraudulent; and considered the Abidjan Protocol as a serious basis for negotiations. It had also stated, inter alia, that the institutions resulting from the elections should reflect the position of UNITA; it pledged to maintain the unilateral ceasefire; and would request its verification by United Nations observers; and requested the Special Representative to announce the date of the resumption of negotiations. While welcoming these statements by UNITA, the Special Representative had underlined the need for UNITA to clarify its position on several important aspects, including the Security Council resolutions.

The Secretary-General reported that the ability of UNAVEM II effectively to verify the military situation following UNITA's declaration of a unilateral ceasefire was limited. On the humanitarian situation, he reported that the United Nations system, working with non-governmental organizations had significantly increased the rate of delivery of relief aid to all parts of Angola.

The Secretary-General further reported that following extensive consultations by his Special Representative with the Angolan parties, the observer countries and the countries of the region, the two parties had begun exploratory talks in Lusaka, Zambia, on 25 October 1993, under United Nations auspices. In view of the ongoing negotiations, he recommended postponing until 1 December 1993 the imposition of further measures against UNITA under Chapter VII of the Charter as stipulated in resolution 864 (1993). He also recommended an increase of UNAVEM II personnel who would be deployed in the event of a breakthrough and would enhance the Mission's ability to verify major developments on the ground and to provide good offices. In the meantime, he intended to proceed with the necessary contingency planning for the possible augmentation of the Mission's strength, to enable the United Nations to respond at short notice in the event of significant progress in the peace process.

At its 3302nd meeting, on 1 November 1993, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representative of Angola, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (Cape Verde) drew the attention of the members of the Council to several other documents.⁶¹ The President then stated that, after consultations among the members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁶²

The Security Council has considered the report of the Secretary-General of 27 October 1993 submitted in response to paragraph 28 of resolution 864 (1993). It notes the exploratory talks in Lusaka under the auspices of the United Nations, to which both the Government of Angola and the National Union for the Total Independence of Angola (UNITA) have sent delegations. It affirms its complete support for the Secretary-General and his Special Representative in their efforts aimed at the earliest resolution of the Angolan crisis through negotiations within the framework of the Peace Accords for Angola and Security Council resolutions. It calls upon the Angolan parties to cooperate fully with the Secretary-General and his Special Representative to this end.

⁶¹ Letter addressed to the President of the Security Council from the representative of Angola transmitting the "Peace Plan of the Republic of Angola" (S/26492); letters from the representative of Angola addressed to the Secretary-General and the President of the Council (S/26516 and S/26569).

The Council notes recent actions taken by both parties, including the lessening of hostilities, and considers it essential that the two parties take the necessary steps to resume direct negotiations towards a peaceful settlement and agree without delay on the modalities for an effective ceasefire in accordance with Council resolutions.

The Council notes UNITA's communiqué of 6 October referred to in paragraph 11 of the report of the Secretary-General. It expresses its concern that the Secretary-General has reported that not enough progress has yet been made towards the full implementation of the Peace Accords and relevant Council resolutions. It demands that UNITA take the necessary steps to comply with its previous resolutions. It expresses its readiness to consider the immediate imposition of further measures under the Charter of the United Nations, including, inter alia, trade measures against UNITA and restrictions on the travel of UNITA personnel, at any time that it observes that UNITA is not cooperating in good faith to make the ceasefire effective and implement the Peace Accords and relevant Council resolutions, or upon a report from the Secretary-General to that effect.

The Council expresses its grave concern at the serious deterioration in the humanitarian situation in Angola. It is encouraged, however, by the Secretary-General's report that the United Nations system, working with humanitarian agencies, has now been able significantly to increase the rate of delivery of relief aid to all parts of the country. It welcomes the resumption of humanitarian relief deliveries to the cities of Cuito and Huambo. It calls upon the parties to cooperate fully in ensuring the unimpeded delivery of humanitarian assistance to all Angolans throughout the country, to take all necessary measures to ensure the security and safety of United Nations and other personnel involved in humanitarian relief operations, and strictly to abide by applicable rules of international humanitarian law. It commends the international community for its generous provision of relief aid and calls upon the international community to make available further relief aid rapidly to meet the growing need.

The Council shares the Secretary-General's view that the United Nations Angola Verification Mission II (UNAVEM II) should be able to respond rapidly to any progress which might be achieved in the peace process. It encourages the Secretary-General to carry out urgent contingency planning for the possible augmentation of the existing strength of the military, police and medical components of UNAVEM II for deployment in the event of significant progress in the peace process, including contacting potential troop contributors. It stands ready to take decisions in the matter at any time within the period of the mandate authorized by resolution 864 (1993) of 15 September 1993.

The Council again expresses its strongest appeal that both sides, in particular UNITA, undertake to commit themselves to the peace process that will lead to a comprehensive settlement in Angola on the basis of the Peace Accords.

The Council will remain actively seized of the matter and will review the position again with regard to further measures at the latest on 15 December in the context of its consideration of the report that the Secretary-General is due to make by that date pursuant to its resolution 864 (1993).

Decision of 15 December 1993
(3323rd meeting): resolution 890 (1993)

On 14 December 1993, pursuant to resolution 864 (1993), the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council a report on UNAVEM II.⁶³ He reported that following exploratory contacts held at Lusaka, from 25 to 31 October 1993, under United Nations auspices, with the participation of the three observer States, direct negotiations between the parties had begun on 15 November 1993, with the following agenda: reaffirmation of the acceptance by both parties of relevant legal instruments, namely, the Peace Accords and Security Council resolutions; further implementation of the Accords and completion of the Abidjan work regarding military questions, police, mandate of the United Nations and role of observers in respect of the Peace Accords, national reconciliation and the conclusion of the electoral process, as well as the date and venue for the signing of the Lusaka Protocol. An ad hoc military committee, which was established, considered general and specific roles relating to the military aspects on the agenda. The negotiations had culminated, on 10 December 1993, in the formal adoption of general and specific principles on the re-establishment of the ceasefire and the completion of the formation of the Angolan Armed Forces. Both parties had also insisted on a substantial increase in the involvement of the United Nations for the purpose of verifying and monitoring the withdrawal and quartering of UNITA troops; collecting, storing and guarding UNITA armaments; overseeing the disarming of civilians; and verifying the formation of the Angolan armed forces and the police; and the expansion of the State administration throughout the country.

The Secretary-General underlined that the formal adoption by the Government and UNITA of the general and specific principles constituted a significant accomplishment of the peace process. He, once again, recommended postponing the imposition of additional measures against UNITA, under Chapter VII of the Charter. He also recommended that, in view of the encouraging results achieved at Lusaka, the mandate of UNAVEM II be extended for three months.

At its 3323rd meeting, on 15 December 1993, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. After the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representative of Angola, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (China) then drew the attention of the members of the Council to the text of a draft resolution prepared in the course of prior consultations.⁶⁴

Speaking before the vote, the representative of Brazil noted that, following the adoption of Chapter VII measures against UNITA, the overall situation in Angola had improved to some extent, with reduced military actions, relative progress in humanitarian activities and the resumption of the peace talks. That confirmed the importance of respect for the legal and political framework established by the Council for promoting peace in Angola. The draft resolution reaffirmed the Council's readiness to take action at any time and to impose further measures, if necessary. The Council must confirm and strengthen its unequivocal commitment not only to support the negotiations but also to contribute substantially to the implementation of an eventual agreement between both parties. As to the foreseen expansion of the United Nations presence in Angola, his delegation encouraged the Secretary-General to proceed with the necessary contingency planning and to make his recommendations as soon as appropriate.⁶⁵

The representative of the United States stated that the Government and UNITA must still address the difficult question of national reconciliation. Both parties needed to approach that crucial phase of the negotiations in a spirit of compromise and flexibility. The international community would also need to receive cogent demonstrations that it was indeed committed to peace, if it were to assist in implementing an eventual peace agreement.⁶⁶

The draft resolution was thereupon put to the vote and was adopted unanimously as resolution 890 (1993), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolutions 696 (1991) of 30 May 1991, 747 (1992) of 24 March 1992, 785 (1992) of 30 October 1992, 793 (1992) of 30 November 1992, 804 (1993) of 29 January 1993, 811 (1993) of 12 March 1993, 823 (1993) of 30 April 1993, 834 (1993) of 1 June 1993, 851 (1993) of 15 July 1993 and 864 (1993) of 15 September 1993,

Recalling the statement made by the President of the Security Council on 1 November 1993,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 3 and 15 December 1993,

Reiterating the importance it attaches to the full implementation of the Peace Accords for Angola and relevant Security Council resolutions,

Welcoming the resumption of direct negotiations in Lusaka under the auspices of the United Nations, and the ongoing efforts of the Government of Angola and the National Union for the Total Independence of Angola to reach a negotiated settlement,

Commending the efforts of the Secretary-General and his Special Representative aimed at the earliest resolution of the Angolan crisis through negotiations within the framework of the Peace Accords and relevant Council resolutions,

Noting actions taken by both parties, including the lessening of hostilities, but deeply concerned that an effective ceasefire has not yet been established,

Stressing the importance it attaches to the acceptance by the National Union without reservations, as requested by the Security Council, of the results of the democratic elections of 30 September 1992 held under United Nations supervision and to their abiding fully by the Peace Accords and relevant Council resolutions,

Deeply concerned also about the continued grave humanitarian situation,

Reaffirming its commitment to preserve the unity and territorial integrity of Angola,

1. Welcomes the report of the Secretary-General of 3 and 15 December 1993;

2. Stresses again the importance it places on a peaceful resolution of the conflict in Angola in conformity with the Peace Accords for Angola and relevant resolutions of the Security Council, and urges both parties to continue to demonstrate flexibility in the negotiations and a commitment to peace;

3. Decides to extend the existing mandate of the United Nations Angola Verification Mission II until 16 March 1994;

4. Reaffirms its willingness as necessary to review the existing mandate of the Mission to determine whether it is able to carry out effectively its mission, taking account of any progress achieved towards the early establishment of peace in the country;

5. Reaffirms the importance of the functions of good offices and mediation of the Secretary-General and his Special Representative and the Mission, with the goal of restoring a ceasefire and reinstating the peace process for the full implementation of the Peace Accords and relevant Council resolutions;

6. Calls upon both parties to honour the commitments already made by them at the talks in Lusaka, urges them to exercise maximum restraint and to stop immediately all military actions in order to prevent further suffering on the part of the civilian population of Angola and damage to Angola's economy, and also urges them to agree on the modalities for and establishment of an effective and sustainable ceasefire in accordance with relevant Council resolutions and to conclude a peaceful settlement as soon as possible;

7. Requests the Secretary-General to inform the Council as soon as an effective ceasefire is established and in any case by 1 February 1994 on progress made by the parties in the Lusaka talks, including a report on progress achieved in furthering the peace process, establishing an effective ceasefire and implementing relevant Council resolutions and the Peace Accords;

8. Notes the steps taken by the Secretary-General to initiate contingency planning for the possible augmentation of the existing components of the Mission for deployment in the event of significant progress in the peace process, and requests him to inform the Council periodically in this regard;

9. Reiterates its readiness, in the event of the achievement of an effective and sustainable ceasefire, to consider promptly any recommendations by the Secretary-General on the basis of that contingency planning;

10. Reaffirms further the need for unimpeded delivery of humanitarian assistance to all civilian populations in need;

11. Welcomes the actions taken by the Secretary-General to implement the emergency humanitarian assistance plan;

12. Commends those Member States, United Nations agencies and non-governmental organizations which have already contributed to the relief efforts, and strongly appeals to all Member States, United Nations agencies and non-governmental organizations to provide rapidly further assistance to Angola to meet the growing humanitarian needs;

13. Reaffirms the obligation of all States to implement fully the provisions of paragraph 19 of resolution 864 (1993);

14. Decides, in view of the direct negotiations under way between the parties, not to impose at present the additional measures against the National Union for the Total Independence of Angola contained in paragraph 26 of resolution 864 (1993), but reiterates its readiness to consider at any time further steps, in the light, inter alia, of a recommendation of the Secretary-General, either to impose such additional measures or to review those in effect;

15. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of France stated that, bearing in mind the substantial progress achieved in the peace process, his delegation had voted in favour of the resolution, which postponed the imposition of additional measures against UNITA. He expressed the hope that the negotiations would conclude soon and would lead to a comprehensive agreement aimed at putting an end to the fighting and restoring democracy in the country. France was also ready to give favourable consideration to the United Nations taking an active part in the implementation of an agreement.⁶⁷

The representative of the Russian Federation welcomed the resumption of direct negotiations in Lusaka and the important compromise solutions reached by the parties, including agreement on general and special principles for a ceasefire and on the constitution of the Angolan armed forces. It was the view of his delegation that the primary condition for reaching a peaceful settlement was the full compliance by UNITA with the Peace Accords and the unconditional recognition by its leaders of the results of the elections. The Council should respond duly to any attempts by UNITA to delay the peace process — inter alia, by imposing additional measures, as provided for in the resolution.⁶⁸

Decision of 10 February 1994 (3335th meeting):
statement by the President

On 29 January 1994, pursuant to resolution 890 (1993), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on UNAVEM II.⁶⁹ He reported that the Lusaka talks had been interrupted, following an alleged attempt on Mr. Savimbi's life on 13 December 1993. They resumed briefly, on 21 December, after a United Nations fact-finding mission dispatched to the area had concluded that although the government air force did carry out a bombing raid against UNITA, there was no credible and conclusive evidence that the Government had intended to kill Mr. Savimbi. After being suspended on 23 December 1993, the discussions were reconvened on 5 January 1994 to consider the agenda item dealing with the police and culminated in the adoption of general and specific principles concerning that item.

The Secretary-General noted that, notwithstanding progress made in the political arena, the military situation had continued to deteriorate. He urged both sides to respect the commitments already entered into during the negotiations, to exercise maximum restraint and to put an immediate end to all military operations. Moreover, since UNITA had already indicated its readiness to dismantle its military structure and become a political party, it was essential to reach agreement on how to reintegrate UNITA personnel into the Government and State administration. He reported considerable progress in the humanitarian assistance activities undertaken by United Nations agencies and non-governmental organizations throughout Angola but, nevertheless, highlighted the urgent need to strengthen their capacity to address the enormous needs of the Angolan population. In conclusion, he said that a United Nations team of experts had recently visited Lusaka and Luanda to make a preliminary assessment of the needs in connection with his contingency planning, should a comprehensive settlement be reached.

At its 3335th meeting, on 10 February 1994, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. After the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representative of Angola, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (Djibouti) then stated that, after consultations among the members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁷⁰

The Security Council has considered the report of the Secretary-General on the United Nations Angola Verification Mission II, submitted pursuant to resolution 890 (1993) of 15 December 1993.

The Council commends the Secretary-General, his Special Representative and the Chief Military Observer on their efforts to bring to a successful conclusion the talks between the Government of Angola and the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola, currently taking place at Lusaka, with a view to reaching an effective and sustainable settlement of the conflict, within the framework of the "Acordos de Paz" and the relevant resolutions of the Council. The Council also commends the efforts of the three observer States to the Angolan peace process and those of the Organization of African Unity and of neighbouring States in support of the Lusaka talks, and encourages them to continue these efforts.

The Council notes the progress made to date in the Lusaka talks, in particular the adoption of the general and specific principles, as well as the modalities, relating to all the military and police issues on the agenda. The Council calls upon the parties to renew their commitment to a peaceful settlement. It demands that they redouble their efforts in the Lusaka talks with the aim of urgently attaining an effective and sustainable ceasefire, completing work on the remaining points on the agenda and concluding a peaceful settlement without procrastination.

The Council is deeply concerned at the intensification of hostilities and, in particular, at the recent outbreak of serious military activity at several locations in Angola, particularly at Kuito-Bie. It deplores the great loss of life and destruction of property.

The Council stresses that the only way to achieve an effective, verifiable and sustainable ceasefire is for the parties to conclude and sign a comprehensive peace agreement. It calls upon them to honour the commitments they have already voluntarily agreed to at Lusaka, to exercise maximum restraint, to stop immediately all offensive military actions, and to commit themselves to the urgent conclusion of the Lusaka talks.

The Council welcomes the improvement in the delivery of humanitarian relief assistance to the affected population in Angola, while acknowledging that the overall situation remains serious. It urges the parties to continue to cooperate with the United Nations agencies and the non-governmental organizations in ensuring the unimpeded delivery of humanitarian relief supplies and the necessary security for its efficient distribution. It calls upon the international community to contribute generously to humanitarian aid efforts in Angola.

The Council requests the Secretary-General to keep it informed on a timely basis of developments in the Lusaka peace talks. It reaffirms its readiness to consider promptly any recommendations from the Secretary-General once an agreement has been concluded between the parties. It also reaffirms its readiness to consider further action in accordance with its previous resolutions.

The Council will remain seized of the matter.

Decision of 16 March 1994 (3350th meeting):
resolution 903 (1994)

On 9 March 1994, pursuant to resolution 890 (1993), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on UNAVEM II.⁷¹ He reported that an agreement had been reached on 17 February 1994 on the general principles concerning national reconciliation and that the negotiations were currently focused on the specific principles, particularly UNITA's participation in the management of state affairs. He further reported that the military situation remained volatile and fighting at varying levels of intensity continued in several provinces, hampering emergency relief activities. However, the overall humanitarian situation in Angola had improved over the last months as a result of an increase in multisectoral assistance.

The Secretary-General noted that the precarious nature of the military situation underscored once again the utmost importance for both parties to exercise maximum restraint on the ground. They also needed to show greater flexibility in addressing the remaining issues on the agenda, particularly with regard to the question of national reconciliation, the conclusion of the electoral process and the re-establishment of national administration throughout the country. Stressing that UNAVEM II was an essential factor in the ongoing peace efforts, he recommended a three-month extension of the Mission's mandate, at its existing strength. He also recommended to the Security Council that it authorize, in principle, an increase in the existing strength of UNAVEM II on the understanding that the additional personnel would only be deployed upon achievement of a comprehensive peace agreement.⁷²

At its 3350th meeting, on 16 March 1994, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. After the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representative of Angola, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (France) then drew the attention of the members of the Council to the text of a draft resolution prepared in the course of prior consultations.⁷³ He also drew their attention to a letter dated 2 March 1994 from the representatives of Angola, Brazil, Cape Verde, Guinea-Bissau, Mozambique, Portugal and São Tomé and Príncipe transmitting the joint communiqué of the First Meeting of the Ministers for Foreign Affairs and External Relations of the Portuguese-speaking Countries and to a letter dated 16 March 1994, from the representative of Angola transmitting a message dated 15 March from the President of Angola. Both letters were addressed to the Secretary-General.⁷⁴

⁷⁴ S/1994/263 and S/1994/299.

The representative of Angola recalled that during the preceding two years, the Council had adopted 10 resolutions and various declarations on the situation in Angola, setting forth mandatory measures with which UNITA had never complied. The international community must thus use all available means under international law to ensure that the Angolan people would not continue to be penalized by the ambitions of an organization and the “power obsession” of its leader. For its part, the Angolan Government had always demonstrated a deep commitment to the restoration of peace, national reconciliation and democratization of the country. It had recently offered to UNITA four ministerial portfolios and five deputy ministries, including defence, at the central, provincial and local government levels. UNITA, unfortunately, had responded with an “unrealistic proposal”, asking to head some provincial governments, as well as various key ministries. If implemented, those demands for equal power-sharing would cast a shadow over the democratic electoral process, and would set a dangerous precedent by encouraging the losers to wage war to achieve a similar solution. Since UNITA had not shown the political will to resolve the conflict it had initiated, the Angolan Government believed that the time had come to consider a second package of sanctions against it. The Council might also establish a deadline for the conclusion of the negotiations.⁷⁵

Noting that, in accordance with resolution 864 (1993), which had been adopted under Chapter VII, all States must refrain from and prevent the sale and supply of weapons and military equipment to Angola, the representative of Djibouti expressed his concern at the level of military resupplying which was taking place in Angola in clear violation of that resolution. Those violations were feeding the fighting and bolstering the ability of everyone, particularly UNITA, to withhold agreement.⁷⁶

The resolution was thereupon put to the vote and was adopted unanimously as resolution 903 (1994), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolution 696 (1991) of 30 May 1991 and all subsequent relevant resolutions,

Recalling the statement made by the President of the Security Council on 10 February 1994, ⁷⁵ S/PV.3350, pp. 2-5.

⁷⁶ Ibid., p. 8.

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 9 March 1994,

Reiterating the importance it attaches to the full implementation of the “Acordos de Paz” and relevant Security Council resolutions,

Reiterating also the importance in current circumstances of a continued and effective United Nations presence in Angola with a view to fostering the peace process and advancing the full implementation of the “Acordos de Paz”,

Welcoming the progress, described in the report of the Secretary-General, in the talks being held between the Government of Angola and the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola at Lusaka, under the auspices of the United Nations, and urging the parties to complete the negotiation process expeditiously,

Commending the efforts of the Secretary-General and his Special Representative aimed at the earliest resolution of the Angolan crisis through negotiations within the framework of the “Acordos de Paz” and relevant Security Council resolutions,

Commending also the efforts of the three observer States to the Angolan peace process, the Organization of African Unity and some neighbouring States, in particular Zambia, and encouraging them to continue their efforts,

Stressing the importance it attaches to the acceptance without reservation by the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola of the results of the democratic elections of 30 September 1992 held under United Nations supervision and to their abiding fully by the “Acordos de Paz” and relevant Security Council resolutions,

Strongly urging both parties, and in particular the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola, to exercise maximum flexibility and good faith at this crucial stage of the negotiations at Lusaka and to refrain from any acts which could delay their early and successful completion,

Stressing that its future decisions concerning Angola will take into account the continued demonstration by the parties of their political will to achieve a lasting peace,

Reaffirming its commitment to preserve the unity and territorial integrity of Angola,

Noting that Angolans bear ultimate responsibility for the successful implementation of the “Acordos de Paz” and any subsequent agreement,

Expressing its concern at the continuing hostilities and their effect on the civilian population in terms of loss of life and property, which underlines the need for an effective and sustainable ceasefire,

Welcoming the improvement in the overall humanitarian situation in Angola, while noting that the situation remains serious in certain areas of the country,

1. Welcomes the report of the Secretary-General of 9 March 1994;

2. Calls upon both parties to honour the commitments already made by them in the talks at Lusaka, and urges them to redouble their efforts with the aim of urgently completing work on the remaining points on the agenda, attaining an effective and sustainable ceasefire and concluding a peaceful settlement without procrastination;

3. Expresses its deep concern at continued offensive military actions, and demands the cessation of all such actions immediately;

4. Decides to extend the mandate of the United Nations Angola Verification Mission II until 31 May 1994;

5. Declares its readiness, in principle, to consider authorizing promptly, with a view to consolidating a settlement in its initial and most critical stages, the increase of the strength of the Mission to its previous level of three hundred and fifty military observers, one hundred and twenty-six police observers and fourteen military medical staff, with an appropriate number of international and local civilian staff, following a report from the Secretary-General that the parties have reached an agreement and that the conditions are right for deployment, and invites the Secretary-General to proceed with contingency planning to this effect;

6. Takes note of the preparations and contingency planning undertaken by the Secretary-General for an appropriate United Nations presence in Angola once a comprehensive peace settlement has been reached, and reaffirms its readiness to consider promptly any recommendations from the Secretary-General in this regard;

7. Condemns any actions that threaten the unimpeded delivery of humanitarian assistance to all in need in Angola and put the lives of the humanitarian assistance workers at risk, and calls for the full cooperation of all parties;

8. Strongly appeals to the international community to respond generously to the 1994 revised inter-agency appeal for Angola, and commends those who have already contributed to humanitarian relief efforts in Angola;

9. Reaffirms the obligation of all States to implement fully the provisions of paragraph 19 of Council resolution 864 (1993) of 15 September 1993;

10. Decides, in view of the direct negotiations continuing between the parties, not to impose at present the additional measures against the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola contained in paragraph 26 of resolution 864 (1993), but reiterates its readiness to consider at any time further steps in the light, inter alia, of a recommendation by the Secretary-General either to impose such additional measures or to review those in effect;

11. Requests the Secretary-General to ensure that the Council is informed regularly of the progress of the talks at Lusaka as well as of the military and humanitarian situation in

Angola, and to this end requests the Secretary-General to submit a report by 4 April 1994;

12. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of the United States stated that the ongoing peace negotiations offered the parties a chance to start anew and to begin the process of reconstruction and reconciliation. That chance, however, would not last forever. The United States Government did not accept efforts that were under way to delay essential decisions. Noting her Government's readiness to assist in the implementation of a peace accord, she stressed that Angolans must first demonstrate political will, flexibility and the courage to make peace a reality.⁷⁷

The representative of the United Kingdom stated that the resolution reflected the Council's commitment to an early and successful conclusion of the peace talks. It was not for the international community, however, to define the details of a settlement between the Government and UNITA. Any long-term settlement, must be determined by the Angolans themselves, with the assistance of the Special Representative. The resolution also made it clear that the members of the Council expected the parties to redouble their efforts to achieve an early solution.⁷⁸

The representative of the Russian Federation stated that his country had voted in favour of the resolution because it sent a clear signal to the Angolan parties — and first and foremost to UNITA — that they must redouble their efforts. Expressing concern over UNITA's "obstructionist tactics" at the Lusaka talks, he said that its leadership must be made aware of the Council's readiness to adopt additional measures against that organization. It was important in that regard that the Secretary-General present to the Council, during the first days of April, a progress report on the ongoing direct negotiations to enable the Council to take timely action.⁷⁹

Decision of 14 April 1994: letter from the President to the Secretary-General

On 31 March 1994, pursuant to resolution 903 (1994), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on UNAVEM II.⁸⁰ He reported that, at the Lusaka talks, agreement had been achieved on 12 of the 18 specific principles relating to the question of national reconciliation. The six outstanding principles concerned: UNITA's participation in organs of central, provincial, and local government, and in diplomatic missions; the future status of "Vorgan" radio; the re-establishment of State administration throughout Angola; the return of Government property in the hands of UNITA, and vice-versa; the assumption by UNITA deputies of Parliament of their seats in the National Assembly; and the provision of appropriate facilities to UNITA. One of the six remaining points, UNITA participation in the management of State affairs, had caused the talks to stall for the past month, in spite of efforts undertaken by himself and his Special Representative. He therefore urged both parties to show the flexibility needed to reach a comprehensive settlement and to heed the Council's demands for restraint on the ground and the cessation of all military actions. Notwithstanding a reduction of large-scale armed operations, UNITA had continued its actions. For its part, the Government of Angola had attempted to keep those actions in check and had conducted limited offensive operations. With regard to humanitarian activities, the assistance programme remained on track and United Nations agencies and non-governmental organizations had continued to distribute relief assistance to the affected populations. The Secretary-General believed that it would be essential to strengthen the presence of the United Nations on the ground as soon as a comprehensive peace agreement had been reached. He therefore trusted that the necessary financial resources would be made available in a timely manner, so as to consolidate the agreement in its initial stage, and create the best possible conditions for its successful implementation.

By a letter dated 14 April 1994,⁸¹ the President of the Security Council informed the Secretary-General of the following:

The members of the Security Council have considered your report of 31 March 1994 on the United Nations Angola Verification Mission II.

The members of the Council commend you, your Special Representative, the three observer States to the Angolan peace process, the Organization of African Unity and neighbouring States for the efforts aimed at the prompt resolution of the Angolan crisis and express the strong hope that these efforts will be continued.

The members of the Council have reaffirmed the importance they attach to the prompt and successful conclusion of the Lusaka peace talks. They believe that it is essential that the parties approach the remaining issues with realism and the necessary political will, within the framework of the "Acordos de Paz".

Council members are concerned at continuing outbreaks of hostilities in Angola and their impact on the civilian population in terms of loss of life and property. They expressed their deep concern at continued offensive military actions and demand the cessation of all such actions immediately. They condemn any action that threatens the free and unimpeded delivery of humanitarian assistance to all in need in Angola.

The members of the Council have reaffirmed their readiness, depending on the progress achieved towards the full implementation of the "Acordos de Paz" and relevant Council resolutions, to consider further action in accordance with previous Council resolutions.

The members of the Council consider that the Lusaka peace talks are of crucial importance, and are determined to continue to monitor them closely. In that regard, they have asked me to recall the importance they attach to receiving timely briefings on the state of the Lusaka talks and on the situation in Angola.

Decision of 31 May 1994 (3384th meeting):
resolution 922 (1994)

On 24 May 1994, pursuant to resolution 903 (1994), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on UNAVEM II.⁸² He reported that consideration of the other remaining issues of the Lusaka agenda, namely the completion of the electoral process, the future mandate of the United Nations in Angola and the role of the three observer States of the Peace Accords, had taken place and that on 5 May 1994, agreement had been reached on the question of the completion of the electoral process. However, no decisions had been taken yet on the six specific issues of which the most contentious was UNITA's participation in the management of State affairs. In that regard, he reiterated his appeal to both parties to show the flexibility needed to reach a comprehensive settlement.

The Secretary-General expressed concern at the continuing fighting throughout the country and its devastating impact on Angolan society. He called upon the Council to urge the parties to take all necessary steps to create an atmosphere of trust in the Lusaka negotiations. Should the Lusaka Protocol be concluded, he hoped that the Council would be in a position to decide immediately on the strengthening of the United Nations presence in Angola. However, if the talks did not produce early positive results, the Council might consider taking appropriate action, including a decision on the Mission's future. In the meantime, the Secretary-General recommended that the structure and mandate of UNAVEM II remain unchanged, and that the Mission be extended for an additional three months.

At its 3384th meeting, on 31 May 1994, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. After the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representatives of Angola and Portugal, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (Nigeria) then drew the attention of the members of the Council to the text of a draft resolution prepared in the course of prior consultations,⁸³ and read out revisions to be made to the draft in its provisional form. He also drew their attention to a letter dated 31 May 1994 from the representative of Angola, addressed to the President of the Council, enclosing a list of the Government's most recent offers regarding UNITA's participation in State administration.⁸⁴

The representative of Angola, while commending the Secretary-General's report, expressed reservations about the reference contained therein concerning the Mission's future. He stated that his Government had committed itself, since the beginning of the post-electoral crisis, to find a rapid solution, and had taken the initiative to negotiate with UNITA. However, during the last two years there had been an escalation of the conflict and a premeditated delay on the part of UNITA to proceed with the negotiations. Furthermore, the Security Council resolutions containing mandatory measures had not been fully implemented and the international community had failed to pressure UNITA into showing more flexibility. At the same time, new demands for flexibility had been placed upon the Government of Angola. The Government considered as unconstructive and as bad faith UNITA's efforts to persuade the United Nations to withdraw its forces from Angola at a time when the Organization was playing a crucial role in the attempt to re-establish peace in Lusaka. He contended that UNITA's increased military operations were made possible by the continued support it received from Zaire, in flagrant violation of the arms and fuel embargo. His Government was in possession of evidence of such support and requested the Council to instruct the Sanctions Committee to send an investigating team to Zaire to verify the charges and recommend measures to stop such support. He also contended that the involvement of Zaire constituted an act of aggression, in light of the definition of aggression given by the United Nations in 1974.⁸⁵

The representative of Portugal stated that the negotiations could not be prolonged indefinitely. The Security Council must send a clear and powerful signal to the parties that the international community expected them to reach an agreement within a reasonable time period. It must also be ready to adopt further measures if the situation warranted it. He added that violations of relevant Council resolutions must not be permitted to continue since, apart from flouting its authority, they also had a negative impact on the peace process.⁸⁶

The representative of Brazil stated that the draft resolution was not merely a "routine" renewal of the Mission's mandate. The one-month extension reflected the international community's commitment to a prompt conclusion of the negotiations. His delegation would vote in favour of the draft resolution in the expectation that when the Council would again consider the issue of Angola, it would be to determine how an expanded United Nations presence could best contribute to a comprehensive peace settlement.⁸⁷

The representative of Spain noted that the draft resolution would extend the Mission's mandate only until 30 June 1994. The next review must be exhaustive and, if warranted, must censure the party responsible for delaying the peace talks. The international community's future commitment depended, more than ever before, on the attitude of the parties. Stressing the obligation of all States to comply strictly with the enforcement measures, he said that the

Sanctions Committee must investigate Angola's allegations of violations.⁸⁸

The draft resolution, as orally revised in its provisional form, was thereupon put to the vote and was adopted unanimously as resolution 922 (1994), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolution 696 (1991) of 30 May 1991 and all subsequent relevant resolutions,

Recalling the letter dated 14 April 1994 from the President of the Security Council addressed to the Secretary-General,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 24 May 1994,

Reaffirming its commitment to preserve the unity and territorial integrity of Angola,

Reiterating the importance it attaches to the full implementation of the "Acordos de Paz" and relevant Security Council resolutions,

Reiterating also the importance of United Nations support in fostering the peace process and advancing the full implementation of the "Acordos de Paz",

Commending the efforts of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General and those of the three observer States to the Angolan peace process and of the Organization of African Unity and some neighbouring States, in particular Zambia, and encouraging them to continue their efforts aimed at the earliest resolution of the Angolan crisis through negotiations within the framework of the "Acordos de Paz" and relevant Security Council resolutions,

Recalling its readiness, in principle, in accordance with its resolution 903 (1994) of 16 March 1994, to consider authorizing promptly an increase of the strength of the United Nations Angola Verification Mission II to its previous level,

Noting with grave concern, however, the resurgence of military operations throughout the territory of Angola, which cause continued suffering to the civilian population and hamper the effective implementation of the current mandate of the Mission,

Deeply concerned at alleged violations of the measures contained in paragraph 19 of its resolution 864 (1993) of 15 September 1993,

Concerned also at the protracted duration of the Lusaka peace talks, and reaffirming the importance it attaches to their prompt and successful conclusion,

Emphasizing that Angolans bear ultimate responsibility for the successful implementation of the "Acordos de Paz" and any subsequent agreement,

Reiterating its strong appeal to the Government of the Republic of Angola and the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola to show the good faith and flexibility needed to reach an early and comprehensive settlement at the Lusaka peace talks,

1. Welcomes the report of the Secretary-General of 24 May 1994;

2. Decides to extend the mandate of the United Nations Angola Verification Mission II until 30 June 1994;

3. Stresses that its future decision concerning Angola will take into account the extent to which the parties demonstrate their political will to achieve a lasting peace;

4. Welcomes the formal acceptance by the Government of the Republic of Angola of the proposals on national reconciliation put forward by the Special Representative of the Secretary-General and the three observer States to the Angolan peace process, urges the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola to do likewise, and encourages both parties to finalize outstanding details without further procrastination to allow the successful conclusion of the Lusaka peace talks;

5. Reaffirms its readiness to consider promptly any recommendations from the Secretary-General for an expanded United Nations presence in Angola in the event a comprehensive peace settlement is reached;

6. Declares its intention to reconsider the role of the United Nations in Angola in the event a peace agreement has not been reached at Lusaka by the time of the expiration of the extended mandate of the Mission;

7. Decides, in view of the direct negotiations continuing between the parties, not to impose at present the additional measures against the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola contained in paragraph 26 of resolution 864 (1993), but reiterates its readiness to consider at any time further steps in the light, inter alia, of a recommendation by the Secretary-General either to impose such additional measures or to review those in effect;

8. Reaffirms the obligation of all States to implement fully the provisions of paragraph 19 of resolution 864 (1993);

9. Strongly deplores the resurgence of military actions throughout Angola contrary to resolution 903 (1994), and reiterates its demand that both parties cease immediately all offensive military operations;

10. Further deplores in this regard the worsening of the humanitarian situation, and condemns acts that imperil humanitarian relief efforts and all actions which would inhibit the free and unrestricted movement of humanitarian relief and humanitarian relief workers;

11. Commends those States, United Nations agencies and non-governmental organizations which have already contributed to the relief efforts, and strongly appeals to all States, United Nations agencies and non-governmental organizations to provide rapidly further assistance to Angola to meet the growing humanitarian needs;

12. Requests the Secretary-General to submit to the Council, as soon as there is progress, and in any case by 30 June 1994, a report on the Lusaka peace talks and on the continued political will of the parties to achieve a lasting peace, with recommendations for the future United Nations presence in Angola;

13. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of France warned that his country would not hesitate to reconsider the United Nations presence and the deployment of additional “Blue Helmets” if the parties could not manage to agree.⁸⁹

Similarly, the representative of the United Kingdom noted that if no settlement was reached by the end of June, the Council would be compelled to reconsider the future role of the United Nations in Angola. He added that, in that event, the Council would also be ready to consider at any time further measures against UNITA.⁹⁰

The representative of the Russian Federation also stressed the possibility of adopting additional measures against UNITA and the need to step up the work of the Committee of the Security Council established under resolution 864 (1993).⁹¹

Decision of 30 June 1994 (3395th meeting):
resolution 932 (1994)

On 20 June 1994, pursuant to resolution 922 (1994), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on UNAVEM II.⁹² He reported that agreement had been reached on all but one of the specific principles pertaining to the question of national reconciliation, namely the provision of appropriate facilities to UNITA. Regarding the modalities, the three most contentious issues pertained to UNITA’s participation in the management of State affairs; the re-establishment of State administration throughout Angola; and the future status of the President of UNITA. After intensive consultations, the United Nations and the observer States had put forward a number of proposals on the allocation of senior Government posts to UNITA, which had been accepted by the Government on 28 May 1994. UNITA had indicated, on 8 June 1994, its acceptance of the proposals but had requested an additional post of Governor. His Special Representative had pointed out to UNITA that the proposals constituted an indivisible package. The Secretary-General suggested in that regard that if UNITA persisted in its refusal to accept the complete set of proposals, the Council could consider further measures.

The Secretary-General also reported that both sides were intensifying their military operations throughout the country, resulting in heavy casualties, extensive damage to property and further suffering for the population. The continuing operations were also having a deplorable effect on the humanitarian situation. He recommended that the Council, in addition to urging an immediate suspension of hostilities, press the Government and UNITA to grant immediately security clearances and guarantees for relief deliveries to all locations, and to refrain from any action which could jeopardize the safety of relief personnel or disrupt the distribution of humanitarian assistance to the Angolan people. He further recommended the extension of the Mission’s mandate for an additional three-month period. Should an agreement be reached within that period, he would immediately dispatch a reconnaissance mission to Angola to prepare further recommendations for the Council.

In an addendum to the report, the Secretary-General, in view of the continuing deterioration of the humanitarian situation in Angola, recommended that the Council urge the parties, in particular UNITA, to take the necessary action to permit the resumption of humanitarian assistance in all parts of the country.

At its 3395th meeting, on 30 June 1994, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. After the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representative of Angola, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (Oman) then drew the attention of the members of the Council to the text of a draft resolution prepared in the course of prior consultations.⁹³ He also drew their attention to a letter dated 28 June 1994 from the representative of the United States addressed to the President of the Security Council.⁹⁴

The representative of Angola stated that when his Government had accepted the mediation proposals, providing for greater participation by UNITA at the central, provincial and local Government level, it was convinced that UNITA would respond in an equal manner. The latter had instead made further demands, thus clearly demonstrating its unwillingness to enter into a negotiated solution. It was up to the Security Council to use all the means at its disposal to prevent the failure of the peace talks due to UNITA's intransigence. The Lusaka talks had already covered more than 90 per cent of the issues on the agenda, the sole remaining item awaited UNITA's acceptance of the set of proposals. His Government firmly supported the measures referred to in paragraph 5 of the draft resolution, although it considered that the grace period was excessive and that the measures should be imposed automatically. His Government also favoured a deadline for the completion of the talks.⁹⁵

The representative of the Russian Federation stated that by systematically escalating its demands and disregarding previous Council resolutions and mediation proposals, UNITA was forcing the introduction of additional sanctions by the Council. He warned that if the Council failed to show any resolve against UNITA, it could be construed as being rather soft on the obstructionist leadership of UNITA.⁹⁶

The draft resolution was thereupon put to the vote and was adopted unanimously as resolution 932 (1994), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolution 696 (1991) of 30 May 1991 and all subsequent relevant resolutions,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 20 June 1994,

Reaffirming its commitment to preserve the unity and territorial integrity of Angola,

Reiterating the importance it attaches to the full implementation of the "Acordos de Paz" and relevant Security Council resolutions,

Reiterating also the importance of United Nations support in fostering the peace process and advancing the full implementation of the "Acordos de Paz",

Stressing the importance it attaches to the acceptance without reservation by the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola of the results of the democratic elections of 30 September 1992 held under United Nations supervision and to its abiding fully by the "Acordos de Paz" and relevant Security Council resolutions,

Stressing also that its future decisions concerning Angola will take into account the extent to which the parties demonstrate their political will to achieve a lasting peace,

Strongly urging both parties, and in particular the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola, to exercise maximum flexibility and good faith in the negotiations at Lusaka at this crucial stage and to refrain from any acts which could delay their early and successful completion,

Commending the efforts of the Secretary-General, his Special Representative and those of the three observer States to the Angolan peace process and the Organization of African Unity and some neighbouring States, in particular Zambia, and encouraging them to continue their efforts aimed at the earliest resolution of the Angolan crisis through negotiations within the framework of the "Acordos de Paz" and relevant Security Council resolutions,

Recalling its readiness, in principle, in accordance with its resolution 922 (1994) of 31 May 1994, to consider authorizing promptly an increase of the strength of the United Nations Angola Verification Mission II to its previous level,

Noting with grave concern, however, the intensification of military operations throughout the territory of Angola, which cause extensive suffering to the civilian population and hamper the successful conclusion of the Lusaka peace talks and the effective implementation of the current mandate of the Mission,

Deeply concerned at alleged violations of the measures contained in paragraph 19 of its resolution 864 (1993) of 15 September 1993,

Concerned also at the protracted duration of the Lusaka peace talks, and reaffirming the importance it attaches to their prompt and successful conclusion,

Emphasizing that Angolans bear ultimate responsibility for the successful implementation of the "Acordos de Paz" and any subsequent agreement,

3. Calls upon both parties to honour the commitments already made by them in the talks at Lusaka, and urges them to redouble their efforts with the aim of urgently completing work on the remaining points on the agenda, attaining an effective and sustainable ceasefire and concluding a peaceful settlement without procrastination;

4. Welcomes the formal acceptance by the Government of the Republic of Angola of the proposals on national reconciliation put forward by the Special Representative of the Secretary-General and the three observer States to the Angolan peace process, and strongly urges the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola to do likewise;

5. Declares its readiness to impose additional measures against the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola as indicated in paragraph 26 of resolution 864 (1993) if by 31 July 1994 the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola has not formally accepted the complete set of proposals on national reconciliation put forward by the Special Representative of the Secretary-General and the three observer States, and declares further that in such a case it will decide what further measures it will impose;

6. Welcomes the preparations and the contingency planning undertaken by the Secretary-General for an appropriate United Nations presence in Angola once a comprehensive peace settlement is reached, and reaffirms its readiness to consider promptly any recommendations from the Secretary-General in this regard;

7. Declares its intention to review the role of the United Nations in Angola in the event that a peace agreement has not been reached at Lusaka by the time of the expiration of the extended mandate of the Mission;

8. Reaffirms the obligation of all States to implement fully the provisions of paragraph 19 of resolution 864 (1993), and in that context urges the two neighbouring States which have so far failed to respond substantively to requests from the Security Council Committee established pursuant to resolution 864 (1993) concerning Angola for information required regarding alleged sanctions violations to do so promptly, and requests the Committee to provide a report to the Council, by 15 July 1994, on compliance with the sanctions regime and in particular on possible violations of that regime by those neighbouring States;

9. Strongly deplores the intensification of offensive military actions throughout Angola contrary to resolution 922 (1994), and reiterates its demand that both parties cease immediately all military operations;

10. Further deplores in this regard the worsening of the humanitarian situation, and strongly condemns acts that imperil humanitarian relief efforts and all actions which inhibit the free and unrestricted movement of humanitarian relief and humanitarian relief workers;

11. Strongly urges both parties to grant immediately security clearances and guarantees for relief deliveries to all locations and to refrain from any action which could jeopardize the safety of relief personnel or disrupt the distribution of humanitarian assistance to the Angolan people;

12. Commends those States, United Nations agencies and non-governmental organizations which have already contributed to the relief efforts, and appeals to all States, United Nations agencies and non-governmental organizations to provide rapidly further assistance to Angola to meet the growing humanitarian needs;

13. Requests the Secretary-General to ensure that the Council is informed regularly of the progress of the Lusaka peace talks as well as of the military and humanitarian situation in Angola, and to this end requests the Secretary-General to submit a report by 31 July 1994;

14. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of France stated that the Council had repeatedly given the parties more time to conclude the negotiations, and “its patience was running out”. France called on UNITA to accept the proposals in their entirety or face new sanctions. He however stressed that the goal of the Council was not to punish but, on the contrary, to contribute to the restoration of peace and democracy in Angola. It was in that spirit that the Council had reaffirmed its willingness to increase the Mission’s strength once a peace agreement was reached.⁹⁷

The representative of the United States pointed out that the resolution gave the Angolan leaders two choices: first, hostilities must cease throughout the country, and secondly, UNITA must accept the mediation proposals on national reconciliation, already accepted by the Government.⁹⁸

The representative of the United Kingdom said that the resolution reflected the Council’s unanimous view that the negotiations could not be prolonged indefinitely. Expressing concern at the escalation of hostilities, he contended that it was unacceptable and counterproductive for the parties to pursue military offensives while simultaneously conducting negotiations.⁹⁹

Decision of 12 August 1994 (3417th meeting):
statement by the President

On 22 July 1994, pursuant to resolution 932 (1994), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on UNAVEM II.¹⁰⁰ He reported that his Special Representative had travelled to Angola on 18 June for talks with the President of UNITA and to Cape Town on 23 June for a meeting with the President of South Africa. He had also held meetings with several African leaders, in order to resolve the question of UNITA's participation in the management of State affairs, including the future status of the President and other UNITA senior officials. On 7 July, President Mandela had hosted a summit meeting in Pretoria attended by the Presidents of Angola, Mozambique and Zaire, during which it was decided to revive a long dormant Security and Defence Commission between Angola and Zaire. The Government of Angola and UNITA were examining a compromise text proposed by the United Nations on the modalities pertaining to national reconciliation. The Secretary-General noted that despite those efforts, limited progress had been made at the Lusaka Peace talks. He expressed the hope that the expected visit of Mr. Savimbi to Pretoria, at the invitation of President Mandela, would improve the prospects for the resolution of pending issues. The Secretary-General called upon the Council to urge both parties to cease hostilities forthwith and to refrain from any action that could jeopardize the safety of relief personnel or disrupt the distribution of humanitarian relief. He also reiterated his intention, in the event that a comprehensive agreement was reached, to dispatch an advance team to Angola to prepare further recommendations.

At its 3417th meeting, on 12 August 1994, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representative of Angola, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (Russian Federation) drew the attention of the members of the Council to two letters dated 28 July and 3 August 1994 from the representative of Angola addressed to the President of the Security Council and to the Secretary-General, respectively.¹⁰¹ He stated that, after consultations among the members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:¹⁰²

The Security Council has reviewed the report of the Secretary-General of 22 July 1994 on the situation in Angola, which was submitted in accordance with Security Council resolution 932 (1994) of 30 June 1994.

The Council commends the tireless efforts of the Secretary-General, his Special Representative and the three observer States to the Angolan peace process and encourages them to continue their efforts to put an end to the destructive civil war and bring peace to Angola through negotiations within the framework of the "Acordos de Paz" and relevant Security Council resolutions. It urges both the Government of Angola and the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola to offer their full cooperation to the Special Representative of the Secretary-General to allow the earliest and successful conclusion of the Lusaka peace talks.

Nonetheless, the Council expresses its impatience over the protracted nature of the negotiations, and warns that the peace process cannot be delayed indefinitely. The Council believes that a just and comprehensive peace agreement is within reach and strongly urges the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola to demonstrate its commitment to peace and accept the complete set of proposals put forward by the Special Representative of the Secretary-General and the three observer States.

The Council expresses its appreciation for the efforts of Mr. Frederick Chiluba, President of Zambia, in support of the Lusaka peace process.

Furthermore, the Council expresses its gratitude to Mr. Nelson Mandela, President of South Africa, who offered his assistance to help the finalization of the Lusaka peace process, and agrees that these helpful efforts deserve time to come to fruition.

Consequently, the Council decides to defer temporarily the imposition of the additional measures against the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola as referred to in paragraph 5 of resolution 932 (1994). The Council confirms its readiness to impose further measures against the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola if the latter does not accept the mediation proposals on national reconciliation during the course of the month of August. The Council states that it will start to compile a list of such possible measures and will not tolerate further procrastination in the peace process.

The Council again reminds both parties that offensive military actions threaten all of the progress that has been achieved thus far at Lusaka, and that no tactical battlefield advantage is worth the tremendous cost in human suffering that is being paid by the Angolan people.

¹⁰² S/PRST/1994/45.

The Council expresses its dismay at the actions of both parties, particularly the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola, which have led to deterioration of the humanitarian situation and again reminds them of their responsibility to facilitate the delivery of humanitarian supplies. The Council calls for the necessary steps to ensure that relief flights can resume to Malange and Cuito.

Referring to the report of the Security Council Committee established pursuant to resolution 864 (1993) concerning Angola, the Council reminds the Member States concerned of their obligation to respond substantively to requests from the Committee for the information required regarding alleged sanctions violations, and urges them to do so effectively without further delay. The matter of cooperation with the Committee by those States which have so far failed to respond satisfactorily will be taken up by the Council as a matter of urgency for appropriate action, if such reply is not received forthwith.

Decision of 9 September 1994 (3423rd meeting):
statement by the President

At its 3423rd meeting, on 9 September 1994, the Security Council invited the representative of Angola, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (Spain) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a letter dated 2 September 1994 from the representative of Angola addressed to the President of the Security Council.¹⁰³ He then stated that, after consultations among the members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:¹⁰⁴

The Security Council takes note of the information conveyed to it by the Secretariat on the situation in Angola, in particular in the light of the letter dated 5 September 1994 from the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola to the Special Representative of the Secretary-General. The Council considers this letter as constituting the required formal acceptance by the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola of the complete set of proposals on national reconciliation, which were submitted to it on 28 May 1994 by the Special Representative of the Secretary-General and the representatives of the three observer States of the Angolan peace process.

The Council welcomes this development. By accepting the complete set of proposals, the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola has met the requirements demanded in this regard in Council resolution 932 (1994) of 30 June 1994. In this context and in view of the current negotiations, the Council has agreed not to consider, at present, the imposition of additional measures against the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola as indicated in paragraph 26 of resolution 864 (1993) of 15 September 1993.

The Council considers that, following the acceptance by both the Government of Angola and the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola of the complete set of proposals on national reconciliation, the way is now clear for an early conclusion of the negotiations at Lusaka towards a comprehensive agreement within the framework of the “Acordos de Paz” and relevant Council resolutions. It urges both parties to reach such an agreement before the expiry of the present mandate of the United Nations Angola Verification Mission II on 30 September 1994. It reiterates its intention to reconsider the future role of the United Nations in Angola in the event a peace agreement has not been concluded by that date.

The Council remains deeply concerned by the continuation of the armed conflict in Angola. It reiterates its demand that the parties cease all offensive military actions and reminds them again that all such actions threaten the prospects for a negotiated peace. Attempts to gain short-term military advantage and to procrastinate at the Lusaka peace talks will only prolong the conflict and the continued suffering of the Angolan people and discourage the involvement of the international community in assisting Angola.

The Council expresses its grave concern about any act against United Nations and other international personnel in Angola, and calls upon all parties to ensure the safety and security of the staff and property of the United Nations and all humanitarian organizations. The Council stresses the importance of facilitating the free and unrestricted movement of humanitarian relief supplies and humanitarian assistance workers throughout the territory of Angola.

Decision of 29 September 1994 (3431st meeting):
resolution 945 (1994)

On 17 September 1994, pursuant to resolution 932 (1994), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on UNAVEM II.¹⁰⁵ He reported that he had dispatched a high-level mission to Angola to prepare an assessment of the state of United Nations efforts in the areas of peacemaking, peacekeeping and humanitarian activities. The military situation had been marked by an increase in hostilities. There were widespread reports of concentration of Angolan Armed Forces and UNITA troops in several parts of the country and of preparations for further attacks and offensives. On the humanitarian side, United Nations agencies and non-governmental organizations had been consolidating plans to implement a nationwide mine-awareness campaign and to develop an overall mine-action strategy. Preparatory work on demobilization and reintegration programmes was also continuing.

The Secretary-General noted that the developments in Lusaka had been encouraging, especially the formal acceptance by UNITA of the set of proposals on national reconciliation. However, additional efforts were needed to bring the peace talks to a prompt and successful conclusion. Moreover, while the United Nations efforts would be maintained, it was up to the parties to capitalize on the recent breakthrough in the talks. The Secretary-General further noted that the persistence of hostilities throughout the territory threatened the progress achieved so far. Drawing attention to the renewed attacks against international relief personnel, he urged both parties, and in particular UNITA, to cooperate with the United Nations and to ensure unimpeded delivery of humanitarian supplies to all areas. In the meantime, he recommended that the Mission's mandate be further extended for a short period, until 30 November 1994, to allow time for the conclusion of the talks, for follow-up meetings between the parties' military representatives, for the signing of the Lusaka protocols and for preparations for the expansion of the Mission.

At its 3431st meeting, on 29 September 1994, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. After the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representative of Angola, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (Spain) drew the attention of the members of the Council to the text of a draft resolution prepared in the course of prior consultations, as well as to a letter dated 2 September 1994 from the representative of Angola addressed to the President of the Security Council.¹⁰⁶

The draft resolution was thereupon put to the vote and was adopted unanimously as resolution 945 (1994), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolution 696 (1991) of 30 May 1991 and all subsequent relevant resolutions,

Recalling the statement made by the President of the Security Council on 9 September 1994,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 17 September 1994 and the oral report of his Special Envoy on 23 September 1994,

Reaffirming its commitment to preserve the unity and territorial integrity of Angola,

Stressing also that its future decisions on the future role of the United Nations in Angola will take into account the extent to which the parties demonstrate their political will to achieve a lasting peace,

Commending the efforts of the Secretary-General and his Special Representative and those of the three observer States to the Angolan peace process and of the Organization of African Unity and some neighbouring States, and encouraging them to continue their efforts aimed at the earliest resolution of the Angolan crisis through negotiations within the framework of the "Acordos de Paz" and relevant Security Council resolutions,

Reiterating its grave concern over the continuation of military hostilities throughout the territory of Angola, which cause extensive suffering to the civilian population and hamper the successful conclusion of the Lusaka peace talks and the effective implementation of the current mandate of the United Nations Angola Verification Mission II,

Deeply concerned at alleged violations of the measures contained in paragraph 19 of its resolution 864 (1993) of 15 September 1993,

Concerned also by the protracted duration of the Lusaka peace talks, and reaffirming the importance it attaches to their prompt and successful conclusion,

14. Requests the Secretary-General to ensure that the Council is informed regularly of the progress of the talks at Lusaka, as well as of the military and humanitarian situation in Angola, and to this end requests the Secretary-General to submit a report by 20 October 1994;

15. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Decision of 27 October 1994 (3445th meeting):
resolution 952 (1994)

On 20 October 1994, pursuant to resolution 945 (1994), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on UNAVEM II, including the findings of the mission to Angola.¹⁰⁷ The mission reported that the concept of operations envisaged in the contingency planning for an expanded United Nations presence in Angola was generally compatible with the principles and modalities which had so far been agreed upon at Lusaka. The operational plan would be carried out in three phases: (a) the disengagement of Government and UNITA forces, followed by the deployment of United Nations military and police observers to monitor and verify the ceasefire; (b) the monitoring and verification of the ceasefire by United Nations peacekeeping troops, the quartering of UNITA troops, the collection and storage of arms and ammunition, the demobilization process, the formation of the Angolan Armed Forces, and the reintegration of the police; and (c) the consolidation of national reconciliation activities and the completion of the electoral process.

The Secretary-General noted that the peace talks had entered their final phase and it was expected that their conclusion, including an agreement on the timetable for implementing the Lusaka Protocol, would be followed by the initialling of the agreement, a meeting on technical modalities for re-establishing the ceasefire, the signing of the Protocol by both leaders, and the formal coming into effect of the ceasefire. He urged both parties to make every effort to conclude the peace talks by 31 October 1994 and to ensure that the subsequent military talks produced the earliest possible agreement on the remaining important military questions. The Secretary-General recommended that the mandate of UNAVEM II be extended until 30 November 1994. He further suggested that the Council might consider taking a decision at that time to authorize the restoration of the strength of the mission to its previous level. The consolidation of peace would also require the continuing support of the international community for humanitarian assistance programmes, many components of which would be directly related to the implementation of the Lusaka Protocol. It was therefore of paramount importance that the two sides, in particular UNITA, respect the neutrality of humanitarian personnel and cooperate with the United Nations in determining the whereabouts of relief workers missing since August 1994.

At its 3445th meeting, on 27 October 1994, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representative of Angola, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (United Kingdom) then drew the attention of the members of the Council to the text of a draft resolution prepared in the course of prior consultations.¹⁰⁸

The resolution was thereupon put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 952 (1994), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolution 696 (1991) of 30 May 1991 and all subsequent relevant resolutions,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 20 October 1994,

Reaffirming its commitment to preserve the unity and territorial integrity of Angola,

Reiterating the importance it attaches to the full implementation of the “Acordos de Paz” and relevant Security Council resolutions,

Commending the efforts of the Secretary-General, his Special Representative and the Force Commander and personnel of the United Nations Angola Verification Mission II, the three observer States to the Angolan peace process, the Organization of African Unity and some neighbouring States, in particular Zambia, and encouraging them to continue their efforts aimed at the earliest resolution of the Angolan crisis through negotiations within the framework of the “Acordos de Paz” and relevant Security Council resolutions,

Encouraged by the substantial progress made recently in the Lusaka peace talks, and reaffirming the importance of the parties showing flexibility and bringing them to a prompt and successful conclusion and achieving a comprehensive settlement,

Declaring that renewed obstruction or procrastination in the peace process would be unacceptable,

Deeply concerned, however, at continued military hostilities throughout the territory of Angola, which cause extensive suffering to the civilian population and obstruct humanitarian relief efforts and have delayed the successful conclusion of the Lusaka peace talks and hampered the effective implementation of the current mandate of the Mission,

Reaffirming the obligation of all States to implement fully the provisions of paragraph 19 of resolution 864 (1993) of 15 September 1993,

Emphasizing that Angolans bear ultimate responsibility for the successful implementation of the “Acordos de Paz” and any subsequent agreement,

1. Welcomes the report of the Secretary-General of 20 October 1994;

2. Decides to extend the mandate of the United Nations Angola Verification Mission II until 8 December 1994;

3. Calls upon the parties to honour the commitments already made by them in the talks at Lusaka, and urges them to conclude immediately an agreement and thereafter to establish and respect fully an effective and sustainable ceasefire as a matter of urgency;

4. Authorizes, with the aim of consolidating the implementation of the peace agreement in its initial and most critical stages, the restoration of the strength of the Mission to its previous level of three hundred and fifty military observers and one hundred and twenty-six police observers, with an appropriate number of international and local staff, the deployment of such additional personnel to take place upon receipt of a report from the Secretary-General to the Council that the parties have initialled a peace agreement and that an effective ceasefire is in place;

5. Reaffirms its readiness to consider promptly, once the agreement to be concluded at Lusaka is formally signed, a report from the Secretary-General containing any recommendation for an expanded United Nations presence in Angola based on his assessment of the circumstances that warrant that, and welcomes the contingency planning done in this regard by the Secretary-General;

6. Deplores the continuation of military hostilities throughout Angola contrary to resolutions 922 (1994) of 31 May 1994, 932 (1994) of 30 June 1994 and 945 (1994) of 29 September 1994, and reiterates its demand that both parties cease immediately all military operations;

7. Further deplors the deterioration in the humanitarian situation, condemns all acts, including the laying of landmines, that imperil or inhibit humanitarian relief efforts, and demands that both parties grant security clearances and guarantees for relief deliveries to all locations and refrain from any action which could jeopardize the safety of relief personnel or disrupt the distribution of humanitarian assistance to the Angolan people;

8. Reiterates, in this context, its demand for the immediate release by the responsible parties of the humanitarian relief workers who disappeared on 27 August 1994 and its call for the complete cooperation of the parties, especially the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola, with the United Nations investigation into their disappearance;

9. Commends those States, United Nations agencies and non-governmental organizations which have already contributed to the relief efforts, and appeals to all States, United Nations agencies and non-governmental organizations rapidly to provide further assistance to Angola to meet the growing humanitarian needs;

10. Requests the Secretary-General to ensure that the Council is informed of further developments in the Lusaka peace talks and of the military and humanitarian situation in Angola;

11. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

After the vote, the representative of the United States stated that the international community would not expose United Nations personnel to needless risks by sending them into a war zone. Before deploying an enlarged peacekeeping force into Angola, her Government would require evidence that the parties were serious about holding to a ceasefire and implementing the peace agreement.¹⁰⁹

Similarly, the representative of France stated that, although the Council had authorized the restoration of the Mission's previous strength, the deployment of the personnel was contingent on the Security Council receiving a report from the Secretary-General that the Lusaka Protocol had been initialled and attesting to the establishment of an effective ceasefire between the parties.¹¹⁰

Decision of 4 November 1994 (3450th meeting):
statement by the President

At its 3450th meeting, on 4 November 1994, the Security Council resumed its consideration of the item. After the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representative of Angola, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (United States) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a letter dated 1 November 1994 from the representatives of Portugal, the Russian Federation and the United States, and a letter dated 3 November 1994 from the representative of Angola, both addressed to the President of the Security Council.¹¹¹ The President then stated that, after consultations among the members of the Council, she had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:¹¹²

The Security Council, while welcoming the initialling of the peace protocol at Lusaka on 31 October 1994, is gravely concerned over recent reports of an intensification of military operations, in particular those towards Huambo, which put the lives of Angolan citizens at risk and jeopardize the successful completion of the peace process. It reiterates its demand to the parties to cease immediately military hostilities throughout Angola and to establish quickly an effective and firm ceasefire.

The Council notes that the leadership of both parties must have adequate opportunity to meet with their negotiating teams to prepare for the military talks scheduled to begin on 10 November 1994. It urges the Government of Angola to allow flight clearances into Huambo to enable the negotiating team of the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola to consult with its leadership.

The Council stresses once again that any obstruction to the peace process would be unacceptable. It urges the Government of Angola to exercise its authority to bring an immediate end to the military activities.

At this particular juncture, the Council stresses the need for both parties to spare no effort to bring about a stable and long-lasting peace in Angola. It calls upon them to honour their commitments made at the Lusaka talks, to exercise maximum restraint and responsibility, and to refrain from any action that could jeopardize the signing of the protocol on 15 November 1994.

Decision of 21 November 1994 (3463rd meeting):
statement by the President

At its 3463rd meeting, on 21 November 1994, the Security Council resumed consideration of the item. After the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representative of Angola, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (United States) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a letter dated 14 November 1994 from the representative of Angola addressed to the President of the Security Council.¹¹³ She then stated that, after consultations among the members of the Council, she had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:¹¹⁴

The Security Council welcomes the signing of the Lusaka Protocol by representatives of the Government of Angola and the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola at Lusaka on 20 November 1994. This Protocol, together with the Bicesse Accords, should lay the foundation for lasting peace in Angola. Having signed the Protocol, Angola's parties must continue to demonstrate their commitment to peace through the full and timely implementation of this detailed peace agreement. Most importantly, the ceasefire required by the Protocol must be respected.

The Council acknowledges the tireless efforts of the Secretary-General and his Special Representative, Mr. Alioune Blondin Beye, which have been so vital in reaching this agreement. The Council also commends the role of the observer States to the Angolan peace process and the constructive interventions by leaders throughout Africa. Finally, the Council thanks President Frederick Chiluba and the Government of Zambia, which graciously hosted the negotiations.

¹¹⁴ S/PRST/1994/70.

The Council notes with concern the reports that the fighting in Angola is continuing. The Council reminds the parties of the responsibility they bear to respect fully the ceasefire agreement which is to go into effect on 22 November 1994. The Council looks forward to a report from the Secretary-General that the ceasefire has become effective, thereby allowing the deployment of the United Nations Angola Verification Mission II military and police observers to reinforce United Nations monitoring capabilities in Angola.

The Council remains seized of this matter.

Decision of 8 December 1994 (3477th meeting):
resolution 966 (1994)

On 4 December 1994, pursuant to resolution 952 (1994), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on UNAVEM II.¹¹⁵ He reported that, despite the signing of the Lusaka Protocol on 20 November 1994, there were reports of renewed clashes, with each side blaming the other for the attacks.¹¹⁶ It was therefore imperative that both parties implement the ceasefire on the ground, otherwise the whole process could unravel again. The Secretary-General further reported that, given the wider United Nations role provided for in the Lusaka Protocol, on 24 November he had dispatched a technical survey team to Angola, to check existing contingency plans against the actual situation on the ground and to prepare proposals for an enlarged operation. He however stressed that for the United Nations to consider committing major resources to a substantial expansion of its operation, the parties must abide fully by the Protocol. In the meantime, he recommended that the Council extend the Mission's mandate until 31 January 1995. He also called on Member States, United Nations agencies and non-governmental organizations to make available the necessary resources to carry out the humanitarian aspects of the Protocol and the rehabilitation and reconstruction of the country.

By a letter dated 7 December 1994, addressed to the President of the Security Council, the Secretary-General reported that the ceasefire had entered into force on 22 November 1994 and that, according to information available to UNAVEM, it was generally holding, despite some initial difficulties.¹¹⁷ Both sides were reasonably satisfied with the status of the ceasefire and had requested the planned enlargement of UNAVEM, as soon as possible. Based on the above, and in accordance with resolution 952 (1994), the Secretary-General intended to restore the Mission to its previous level and to deploy it throughout the country. He stressed that the actual enlargement of the Mission would be dependent on the strict observance by the parties of an effective ceasefire, and on the provision by them of satisfactory guarantees regarding the safety and security of United Nations personnel. The Mission would, additionally, monitor and verify all major elements of the Lusaka Protocol and provide good offices to the parties. It would also conduct, if needed, inspections/investigations of alleged violations independently, or jointly with the parties.

At its 3477th meeting, on 8 December 1994, the Security Council included the Secretary-General's report and the above-mentioned letter in its agenda. After the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representative of Angola, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (Rwanda) then drew the attention of the members of Council to the text of a draft resolution prepared in the course of prior consultations.¹¹⁸ He also drew their attention to a letter from the representative of Angola, addressed to the President of the Security Council and a letter from the representative of Mali, addressed to the Secretary-General, both dated 7 December 1994.¹¹⁹

The representative of Angola stated that the Lusaka Protocol represented the beginning of a critical stage in the final resolution of the internal conflict. It also meant compliance with the laws of Angola and with the country's democratic institutions, on a basis of equality with all other political parties. His Government was, however, concerned by the large gap between the signing of the agreement, the entry into force of the ceasefire and the arrival of the first contingent of "Blue Helmets" which might jeopardize the timetable for the implementation of the various phases of the agreement. He therefore called for the urgent deployment of United Nations observers throughout the territory, including those areas under UNITA's control. The war being over, his Government faced many challenges in the social and humanitarian fields, including social reintegration of UNITA troops, support for millions of displaced persons and refugees, reconstruction of basic infrastructure and disarming, tasks which it hoped to address with the continued support of the international community.¹²⁰

Prior to the vote, the representative of the Russian Federation expressed the hope that the mutual understanding achieved in Lusaka would grow into mutual trust during the implementation of the signed agreements. His delegation believed that the dispatch of United Nations personnel to Angola should take place promptly, with the immediate deployment of observer posts in situ.¹²¹

The draft resolution was thereupon put to the vote and was adopted unanimously as resolution 966 (1994), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolution 696 (1991) of 30 May 1991 and all subsequent relevant resolutions, including resolution 868 (1993) of 29 September 1993,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 4 December 1994 and his letter dated 7 December 1994,

Reaffirming its commitment to preserve the unity and territorial integrity of Angola,

Reiterating the importance it attaches to the full implementation of the “Acordos de Paz” and relevant Security Council resolutions,

Encouraged by the signing of the Lusaka Protocol on 20 November 1994, which is a significant step towards the restoration of lasting peace and national reconciliation in Angola,

Reaffirming its readiness to consider promptly any recommendation from the Secretary-General for an expanded United Nations presence in Angola on condition that the ceasefire is maintained,

Commending the efforts of the Secretary-General, his Special Representative and the Force Commander and personnel of the United Nations Angola Verification Mission II, the three observer States to the Angolan peace process, the Organization of African Unity and some neighbouring States, in particular Zambia, which have resulted in the signing of the Lusaka Protocol, and encouraging them to continue their efforts aimed at the full implementation of the “Acordos de Paz”, the Lusaka Protocol and relevant Security Council resolutions,

Declaring that renewed obstruction to or procrastination in the implementation of those accords would be unacceptable,

Deeply concerned at reports of renewed clashes in Angola after the entry into force of the agreed ceasefire, which cause suffering to the civilian population and may jeopardize the successful implementation of the Lusaka Protocol and hamper the effective discharge of the mandate of the Mission,

Reaffirming the obligation of all States to implement fully the provisions of paragraph 19 of resolution 864 (1993) of 15 September 1993,

Emphasizing that Angolans bear ultimate responsibility for the successful implementation of the “Acordos de Paz” and the Lusaka Protocol,

1. Welcomes the report of the Secretary-General of 4 December 1994;

2. Decides, in order to enable the United Nations Angola Verification Mission II to monitor the ceasefire established by the Lusaka Protocol, to extend its mandate until 8 February 1995;

3. Commends the Government of Angola and the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola for signing the Lusaka Protocol, and urges them to respect fully the ceasefire which entered into effect on 22 November 1994;

4. Underlines that it will monitor closely compliance with the ceasefire, and requests the Secretary-General to keep the Council fully informed of any relevant developments;

5. Calls upon the parties to honour the commitments made by them and to continue to work together to achieve national reconciliation on the basis of the “Acordos de Paz” and the Lusaka Protocol;

6. Welcomes the Secretary-General’s decision as conveyed in his letter dated 7 December 1994, in accordance with resolution 952 (1994) of 27 October 1994, to proceed with the restoration of the strength of the Mission to its previous level, the actual enlargement being dependent on the strict observance by the parties of an effective ceasefire and on the provision by them of satisfactory guarantees regarding the safety and security of the United Nations personnel;

7. Encourages the Secretary-General, in order to enhance the verification capabilities of the existing Mission and as an additional confidence-building measure, to continue to deploy personnel to the countryside, subject to the strict compliance by the parties with the conditions in paragraph 6 above;

8. Notes the intention of the Secretary-General to submit a report on the possible mandate for a new United Nations operation in Angola based on his assessment of the circumstances that warrant that, including the maintenance of the ceasefire, such a report to contain a detailed description of the results of his efforts to identify potential troop-contributing countries, the objectives, the concept of operations and financial aspects of such an operation, and progress in discussions with the Government of Angola regarding the conclusion of a status-of-forces agreement, and welcomes the contingency planning being done by him in this regard, including the continuation of the consultations with potential troop contributors to assess their willingness to participate in an enlarged peacekeeping operation in Angola;

9. Declares its intention to review the role of the United Nations in Angola by 8 February 1995 at the latest, in the light of the above report;

10. Welcomes the resumption and the increased flow of humanitarian relief assistance throughout Angola, and demands that both parties grant security clearances and guarantees for relief deliveries to all locations and refrain from any action which could jeopardize the safety of relief personnel or disrupt the distribution of humanitarian assistance to the Angolan people;

11. Emphasizes that both parties must respect and ensure the safety and security of international personnel in Angola;

12. Commends those States, United Nations agencies and non-governmental organizations which have already contributed to the relief efforts, and appeals to all States, United Nations agencies and non-governmental organizations rapidly to provide further assistance to Angola to meet the growing humanitarian needs;

13. Requests the Secretary-General to inform the Security Council of the next steps to be taken by the United Nations to implement a well coordinated and comprehensive mine-clearance programme in Angola;

14. Also requests the Secretary-General to ensure that the Council is regularly informed of further developments in the implementation of the "Acordos de Paz" and the Lusaka Protocol and of the activities of the Mission;

15. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of the United Kingdom stated that despite the signing of the Lusaka Protocol, the situation on the ground remained fragile. The international community could not be expected, and would not be equipped to, enforce peace in Angola. Therefore the deployment of a new, expanded United Nations operation would be possible only if the ceasefire remained effective and the parties demonstrated their commitment to peace.¹²²

Similarly, the representative of France stated that the Angolan parties must strive to complete the process of peace and national reconciliation. They must also abide by the ceasefire agreement, so as to enable the deployment of United Nations personnel.¹²³

Decision of 8 February 1995 (3499th meeting): resolution 976 (1995)

On 1 February 1995, pursuant to resolution 966 (1994), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on UNAVEM II, which provided a detailed description of the objectives and concept of a new United Nations operation in Angola.¹²⁴ The main features of the new mandate would be (a) political: to assist in the implementation of the Lusaka Protocol by providing good offices and mediation to the parties; (b) military: to supervise, control and verify the disengagement of forces, and to monitor the ceasefire, verify information received from the Government and UNITA regarding their forces, verify and monitor all troop movements, assist in the establishment of quartering areas, verify and monitor the withdrawal, quartering and demobilization of UNITA forces, supervise the collection and storage of UNITA armaments, verify the movement of FAA to barracks and monitor the completion of its formation, and verify the free circulation of persons and goods; (c) police: to verify and monitor the neutrality of the Angolan National Police, the disarming of civilians, the quartering of the rapid reaction police and the security arrangements for UNITA leaders; (d) humanitarian; to coordinate, facilitate and support humanitarian activities linked directly to the peace process, in particular these relating to the quartering and demobilization of troops and their reintegration in civilian life, as well as participating in mine-clearance activities; (e) electoral: to declare formally that all essential requirements for the holding of the second round of presidential elections had been fulfilled, and to support, verify and monitor the entire electoral process.¹²⁵ The Mission would be headed by his Special Representative and its political affairs component would include human rights specialists and a public information section with staff available to establish a UNAVEM radio station. In order to carry out the proposed mandate, the Mission would need, in addition to an estimated 6,771 military personnel, 350 military observers and 260 police officers. The Secretary-General noted, however, that it would be difficult to justify the deployment of the main body of United Nations infantry unless the Government and UNITA implemented, according to the agreed timetable, the following essential initial tasks set out in the Lusaka Protocol: an effective ceasefire, effective cessation of hostilities and full disengagement of Government and UNITA forces; the setting up of verification mechanisms; the establishment of reliable communication links between the Government, UNITA and UNAVEM; the provision to, and verification by, UNAVEM of all relevant military data, including troop itineraries; the designation of all quartering areas and withdrawal of troops to the nearest barracks; and the early start of demining activities. He intended to request his Special Representative to determine whether those tasks had been satisfactorily implemented before proceeding with the actual deployment of the infantry battalions and to inform the Council accordingly.¹²⁶

The Secretary-General observed that the ceasefire had been generally holding. The Joint Commission, established in pursuance of the Lusaka Protocol, had held several sessions since the UNITA delegation had returned to Luanda in December 1994. In addition, a series of other high-level contacts between Government and UNITA officials since the signing of the Lusaka Protocol had contributed to improved relations between the two parties. This Special Representative was finalizing arrangements for a meeting between President dos Santos and Mr. Savimbi. The Secretary-General also noted that the delivery of humanitarian assistance had improved considerably. In view of those positive factors, he recommended the immediate establishment of a new United Nations operation in Angola — UNAVEM III — for an initial period of 12 months.

At its 3499th meeting, on 8 February 1995, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. After the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representatives of Algeria, Angola, Brazil, Guinea-Bissau, India, Kenya, Lesotho, Malawi, Mozambique, Namibia, the Netherlands, Norway, Portugal, Senegal, South Africa, Spain, Sweden, Tunisia, the United Republic of Tanzania, Zaire, Zambia and Zimbabwe, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. An invitation was also extended, under rule 39 of the Council's provisional rules of procedure, to the Secretary-General of OAU. The President (Botswana) then drew the attention of the members of the Council to the text of a draft resolution prepared in the course of prior consultations.¹²⁷ He also drew their attention to several other documents.¹²⁸

The representative of Angola declared that the military situation on the ground was calm and the ceasefire was being observed without any major incidents. The Joint Commission was operating normally and the disengagement of Government and UNITA forces in the areas of direct contact had been accelerated. In addition, UNITA's leader had responded positively to an invitation from the Angolan President for a joint meeting within Angolan territory. Taking into account those positive developments, his Government considered that conditions had been created for the establishment and rapid deployment of UNAVEM III and reiterated his country's determination to make every effort to facilitate the Mission's tasks by ensuring its safety and providing the necessary facilities for the discharge of its work. Noting that the implementation of the Lusaka Protocol might cost $1.26 billion,¹²⁹ he announced that the Government of Angola would make an immediate contribution in kind of approximately $64.7 million to defray the expenses. He stressed the importance of the mobilization of financial and humanitarian aid, and appealed to the international community, and to governmental and non-governmental organizations, to lend their support to the Government. In conclusion, he expressed concern regarding paragraphs 6, 8 and 12 of the draft resolution, and added that his delegation would present specific proposals to improve the text at the appropriate time.¹³⁰

The representative of Malawi, speaking on behalf of the OAU Council of Ministers,¹³¹ conveyed Africa's concern that unless urgent and appropriate measures were taken by the international community, particularly the United Nations, to sustain the momentum, the entire peace process would be seriously threatened. He contended that, notwithstanding the concerns of those who urged caution against any increased international involvement until peace had been firmly established, the Angolan people were tired of war and the situation was different. The OAU delegation therefore urged the Council to facilitate the speedy establishment and deployment of UNAVEM III. The speedy deployment of the mechanisms provided for in the Lusaka Protocol would serve as a confidence-builder and encourage the parties concerned to move forwards even further to implement the peace process.¹³²

The representative of Portugal stated that although he understood the rationale behind a phased deployment of UNAVEM III, his delegation believed that the flexibility to deploy additional forces must be retained. The Council must be cautious before establishing conditions for its next phase. He warned that, by giving the parties the opportunity to challenge whether or not such conditions had been fulfilled, the Council was not only allowing for delays in the deployment of additional personnel, but also threatening to derail the peace process itself.¹³³

The representative of Mozambique stressed the importance of upholding the principles of sovereignty, non-intervention and non-interference in the internal affairs of Angola, in line with the Peace Accords and the Lusaka Protocol, and in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations. In that context, his Government would not agree to the deployment of any peacekeeping operation with "strings attached", and therefore supported the views expressed by the Angolan delegation that some paragraphs of the draft resolution should be revised in order to meet the full agreement of the Government of Angola.¹³⁴

Prior to the vote, the representative of Nigeria expressed his delegation's support for the draft ¹³¹ The OAU delegation comprised the Foreign Ministers of Angola, Botswana, Lesotho, Namibia, South Africa, Tunisia and Zambia, as well as representatives of Guinea-Bissau and Senegal.

resolution, contending that none of its paragraphs contained any provisions that derogated from the sovereign rights of the Government of Angola and the territorial integrity of the country.¹³⁵

The representative of China noted that, by sending such a large high-level delegation to New York to participate in the Council's debate on Angola, OAU had demonstrated its readiness, and that of African countries, to contribute to the settlement of conflicts in Africa. The United Nations and the Security Council should attach great importance to resolving African problems and to strengthening cooperation with OAU so as to "help Angola set out along the road towards rebuilding peace at an early date".¹³⁶

The representative of France welcomed the role of OAU in resolving the Angolan conflict, and stressed that the involvement of regional organizations in solving crises was vital to the success of the United Nations. The draft resolution provided a full framework and a clear mandate for UNAVEM III over the next two years. He noted, however, that its adoption would not give carte blanche to the Angolan parties. The Council would review the United Nations role in Angola, should the Secretary-General report that the cooperation required from the parties fell short.¹³⁷

Many other speakers who participated in the debate called for a prompt deployment of UNAVEM III¹³⁸ while some cautioned that the conditions set out in the draft resolution might impede the progress of the operation.¹³⁹

The draft resolution was thereupon put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 976 (1995), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolution 696 (1991) of 30 May 1991 and all subsequent relevant resolutions,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General dated 1 February 1995,

Reaffirming its commitment to preserve the unity and territorial integrity of Angola,

Welcoming the signing of the Lusaka Protocol on 20 November 1994 as a major step towards the establishment of peace and stability in Angola,

Reiterating the importance it attaches to the full implementation of the “Acordos de Paz”, the Lusaka Protocol and relevant Security Council resolutions,

Noting the schedule for implementation set forth in the Lusaka Protocol, in particular the need for the Government of Angola and the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola to provide all relevant military data to the United Nations, to allow freedom of movement and free circulation of goods, and to begin limited disengagement where forces are in contact,

Welcoming the maintenance of a ceasefire which has been generally holding,

Welcoming also the progress made in meetings of the Chiefs of Staff of the Angolan Armed Forces and the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola on 10 January 1995 in Chipipa and on 2 and 3 February 1995 in Waco Kungo,

Welcoming further the deployment of observer forces of the United Nations Angola Verification Mission II and the contributions of Member States to the Mission,

Welcoming the offer from the Government of Angola to provide substantial contributions in kind to United Nations peacekeeping operations in Angola as set out in the document entitled “Cost of the Implementation of the Lusaka Protocol”,

Deeply concerned that the implementation of the Lusaka Protocol has fallen behind schedule,

Stressing the need for the President of Angola, José Eduardo dos Santos, and the leader of the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola, Jonas Savimbi, to meet without delay with a view to building the necessary political momentum for the successful implementation of the Lusaka Protocol,

Welcoming the ministerial delegation of the Organization of African Unity to the Security Council to participate in its consideration of the situation in Angola,

1. Authorizes the establishment of a peacekeeping operation, the United Nations Angola Verification Mission III, to assist the parties in restoring peace and achieving national reconciliation in Angola on the basis of the “Acordos de Paz”, the Lusaka Protocol and relevant Security Council resolutions, as outlined in section IV of the report of the Secretary-General of 1 February 1995, with an initial mandate until 8 August 1995 and with a maximum deployment of 7,000 military personnel, in addition to the 350 military observers and 260 police observers mentioned in the report of the Secretary-General, and an appropriate number of international and local staff;

2. Urges the expeditious deployment of the military and police observers to monitor the ceasefire;

3. Authorizes the immediate deployment of such planning and support elements as are needed to prepare for the deployment of peacekeeping forces, provided that the Secretary-General remains satisfied that an effective ceasefire and effective joint ceasefire monitoring mechanisms are in place and that both parties are allowing the free and safe flow of humanitarian assistance throughout the country, and authorizes the subsequent deployment of such additional elements as are necessary to establish operational quartering areas for the forces of the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola;

4. Decides that the deployment of infantry units will take place on the basis of a report from the Secretary-General to the Security Council that the conditions contained in paragraph 32 of the report of the Secretary-General, inter alia, effective cessation of hostilities, provision of all relevant military data and designation of all quartering areas, have been met, provided the Council does not decide otherwise;

5. Stresses the importance it attaches to the expeditious establishment of a well-coordinated and comprehensive mine clearance programme in Angola as set out in the report of the Secretary-General, and requests him to inform the Council of progress in its implementation;

6. Endorses the Secretary-General’s view set out in his report as to the need for the Mission to have an effective information capability, including a United Nations radio station to be established in consultation with the Government of Angola;

7. Requests the Secretary-General to inform the Council monthly of progress in the deployment of the Mission and in implementation of the Lusaka Protocol, including the maintenance of an effective ceasefire, free access by the Mission to all areas of Angola, free flow of humanitarian assistance throughout Angola and compliance by both the Government of Angola and by the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola with their obligations under the Lusaka Protocol, and also requests the Secretary-General to submit to the Council a complete report by 15 July 1995;

8. Welcomes the Secretary-General’s intention to include human rights specialists in the political component of the Mission to observe the implementation of the provisions related to national reconciliation;

9. Expresses its intention to review the role of the United Nations in Angola should the Secretary-General report that the cooperation required from the parties is substantially delayed or not forthcoming;

10. Declares its intention to conclude the Mission when the objectives of the Lusaka Protocol have been achieved in accordance with the schedule attached to the Lusaka Protocol and with the expectation of its completion by February 1997;

11. Welcomes the substantial contributions of Member States, United Nations agencies and non-governmental organizations to meet the humanitarian needs of the Angolan people, and encourages additional substantial contributions;

12. Reaffirms the obligation of all States to implement fully the provisions of paragraph 19 of resolution 864 (1993) of 15 September 1993, and calls upon the Government of Angola and the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola during the presence of the Mission in Angola to cease any acquisition of arms and war materiel, as agreed upon in the "Acordos de Paz", and to devote their resources instead to priority humanitarian and social needs;

13. Calls upon the Government of Angola to conclude no later than 20 March 1995 an agreement with the United Nations on the status of forces;

14. Encourages the Secretary-General to pursue urgently the offer of direct assistance by the Government of Angola to the Mission, to reflect this as appropriate in the status-of-forces agreement referred to in paragraph 13 above, and to explore with the Government of Angola and the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola possibilities for substantial additional assistance related to peacekeeping and to report to the Council on the results of these explorations;

15. Urges Member States to respond positively to the request made to them by the Secretary-General to contribute personnel, equipment and other resources to the Mission in order to facilitate its early deployment;

16. Demands that all concerned in Angola take the necessary measures to ensure the safety and freedom of movement of United Nations and other personnel deployed under the Mission;

17. Welcomes the presence of the Organization of African Unity ministerial delegation, and notes, in this connection, the need for continued cooperation between the United Nations and the Organization of African Unity in the promotion of peace and security in Angola and the contribution which regional organizations can make to crisis management and conflict resolution;

18. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of the United States stated that her Government wished to emphasize that any deployment of infantry units in UNAVEM III could not proceed without the Secretary-General report that the Lusaka Protocol was being effectively implemented. The United Nations and UNAVEM could assist the process of national reconciliation, but it was up to the parties themselves to demonstrate by their actions the political will to fulfil the Lusaka Protocol. She noted that when the objectives of UNAVEM III were achieved, which she felt could be done within two years, the mandate of the Mission would end.¹⁴⁰

The representative of the United Kingdom stated that the Council's decision to increase the United Nations operation in Angola underlined its commitment to support the people of that country in their long search for peace and national reconciliation. The resolution made it clear that it was not prepared to countenance further substantial delays or lack of cooperation from the parties. His Government saw the resolution as a reaffirmation by the international community of its commitment to United Nations mechanisms for resolving conflicts that were beyond the means or ability of individual nations to solve. As Council resolutions had, however, repeatedly stated, the people of Angola were ultimately responsible for the future of their country. Therefore, the Government of Angola and UNITA must demonstrate that the international community had made the right decision. An early meeting between President dos Santos and Mr. Savimbi would send the right signal in that regard.¹⁴¹

The President, speaking in his capacity as representative of Botswana, noted that the presence in the Council of the African Foreign Ministers and the OAU Secretary-General indicated the importance which Africa attached to the Angolan conflict. He contended that peacekeeping operations were, by nature, expensive and prone to breakdowns, as past experience had amply demonstrated. They could also be wasteful and divert scarce resources that could otherwise be used for economic and social development. The United Nations operation in Angola would not be an easy one; its failure or success would depend to a large extent on the patience, understanding and cooperation of all those involved. At the same time, the operation should not be impeded by too many conditions. He supported a continued United Nations presence in Angola beyond the expiration of the mandate of UNAVEM, to assist the people to adjust to a new life.¹⁴²

The representative of Angola, while assuring the members of the Council of his Government's commitment to all Security Council resolutions, expressed its regret that resolution 976 (1995) included a provision which violated the Lusaka Protocol. Referring to paragraph 12 of the resolution, he said that it contained elements that might harm the legitimate Government of Angola.¹⁴³

Decision of 10 March 1995 (3508th meeting):
statement by the President

On 5 March 1995, pursuant to resolution 976 (1995), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council the first progress report on UNAVEM III.¹⁴⁴ He reported that his Special Representative had continued his efforts to facilitate the implementation of the Lusaka Protocol and had met separately with the leader of UNITA and the President of Angola. Both parties had confirmed their readiness to participate in the proposed joint meeting. The Secretary-General expressed the hope that such a meeting would take place without delay, so as to signal to the international community that national reconciliation had effectively begun.

The Secretary-General further reported that in general the ceasefire continued to hold, and that tension had decreased in many areas. UNAVEM III deployment to the countryside had been slowed down by recent incidents of shooting at UNAVEM aircraft by UNITA, lack of security clearances to visit certain areas and restrictions on freedom of movement. He noted that under the timetable approved by the Council, the deployment of the infantry units of UNAVEM was scheduled to begin on 9 May 1995. That, however, could be achieved only if he was in a position to notify the Council, by 25 March at the latest, that the parties had substantially complied with the conditions set forth in resolution 976 (1995). He therefore urged both parties to take the concrete actions without which the deployment of infantry units could only be deferred.¹⁴⁵ In the meantime, the coming into effect of the ceasefire and the ensuing improvement of security conditions in the country had encouraged the movement of populations and economic activity, thereby decreasing the overall reliance on humanitarian aid. Displaced persons and other vulnerable populations, however, still needed significant assistance, and landmines remained a serious impediment to the movement of people and goods, as well as to the resumption of agricultural activity. The capacity of the humanitarian agencies to contend with those problems depended on full and prompt funding by the donor community of the humanitarian programme set out in the 1995 Inter-agency Appeal for Angola.

At its 3508th meeting, on 10 March 1995, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. After the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representative of Angola, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (China) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a letter dated 9 March 1995 from the representative of Angola, addressed to the Secretary-General.¹⁴⁶

The President then stated that, after consultations among the members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement of behalf of the Council:¹⁴⁷

The Security Council has considered the report of the Secretary-General of 5 March 1995 on the United Nations Angola Verification Mission III.

The Council welcomes the assessment by the Secretary-General that the ceasefire is generally holding. It also welcomes the continued deployment of United Nations military and police observers to sites outside Luanda. It notes, however, that this deployment has been complicated by a lack of full cooperation by the parties, in particular the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola. In the month since its adoption of resolution 976 (1995), a number of developments have taken place which give rise to serious concern. These include the lack of progress in disengagement around Uige and Negage, the escalation of tensions in the last few weeks, especially in the northern region, the lack of security clearances to visit certain areas and restrictions on movement of the Mission personnel, attacks on villages, mine-laying, unauthorized movement of troops and military air activity, and attacks on United Nations aircraft, in particular that by the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola in Quibaxe on 13 February 1995. The Council calls upon the parties, particularly the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola, to refrain from such activities, to end negative propaganda, to improve their cooperation with each other and the United Nations through the Joint Commission and to cooperate fully with humanitarian operations.

¹⁴⁷ S/PRST/1995/11.

The Council reiterates its call upon President dos Santos and Mr. Savimbi to meet without delay as a sign of their joint commitment to the peace process and urges the Government of Angola and the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola to finalize arrangements towards this end immediately, with a view to ensuring the necessary political momentum for the successful implementation of the Lusaka Protocol. It also encourages the observer States to the peace process, the Organization of African Unity and the neighbouring countries involved to continue their efforts aimed at the full implementation of the peace process.

The Council reaffirms the obligations of all States to implement fully the provisions of paragraph 19 of resolution 864 (1993) and reiterates its call upon the Government of Angola and the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola to cease the acquisition of arms and war materiel as agreed in the “Acordos de Paz”.

The Council notes that the United Nations is currently pursuing with the Government of Angola the provision of critical services and access to key facilities such as ports and airports for the Mission. Early and positive responses from the Government of Angola to the United Nations requirements in this respect are essential to the deployment of the Mission. It calls on both parties to expedite the completion of the initial tasks in order to ensure the prompt deployment of Mission units. The Council reiterates the importance it attaches to the Government of Angola and the United Nations agreeing on a status-of-forces agreement by 20 March 1995 as called for in paragraph 13 of its resolution 976 (1995). It will continue to monitor closely developments in these areas.

The Council commends the United Nations agencies and non-governmental organizations for their continuing efforts to distribute humanitarian relief throughout Angola. It reiterates the importance it attaches to a well-coordinated and comprehensive mine clearance programme which will, inter alia, improve the logistics of humanitarian operations. It calls upon both parties to cooperate with the United Nations and with the non-governmental organizations to put this in place. It deplores the killing on 2 March of three Angolans and one German, all members of the “Cap Anamur” non-governmental organization involved in demining activities, as well as attacks in the last month on aircraft and road transport of the International Committee of the Red Cross and reminds the parties of its repeated demands that they refrain from all actions which could jeopardize the safety of humanitarian personnel in Angola.

The Council endorses the Secretary-General’s conclusions that the Government of Angola and the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola must provide more concrete signs of cooperation and goodwill in the implementation of the peace process. It reminds the parties that the deployment of the Mission units will not take place unless the conditions contained in paragraph 32 of his report of 1 February 1995 have been met. It has taken careful note of the Secretary-General’s statement in paragraph 25 of his report of 5 March 1995, that, unless he can report by 25 March 1995 that the parties have complied with those conditions, it will not be possible to ensure that deployment begins on 9 May 1995. Time is short if the opportunity created by the Lusaka Protocol and resolution 976 (1995) is not to be lost. The Council joins the Secretary-General in calling upon the parties to take the necessary steps now to ensure that deployment of these units can begin as planned on 9 May 1995. It requests the Secretary-General to keep it closely informed of developments in this regard.

Decision of 13 April 1995 (3518th meeting):
statement by the President

On 7 April 1995, pursuant to resolution 976 (1995), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council his second progress report on UNAVEM III.¹⁴⁸ He reported that he had dispatched his Special Adviser to Angola, from 17 to 22 March 1995, to deliver letters from him to both parties and to discuss with them the measures to bring the military situation under control and to ensure respect for the ceasefire. He also requested that his Special Adviser assess whether the situation in Angola permitted the deployment of UNAVEM III. During the discussions, President dos Santos and senior government officials had supported the early deployment of the mission’s infantry units. On the basis of his Special Adviser’s report, he had informed the Council by a letter dated 25 March that, in spite of certain risks, he intended to proceed with the preparations for such deployment.¹⁴⁹

The Secretary-General further reported that the ceasefire had generally held and that the level of violations had remained relatively low. Moreover, the first phase of the disengagement of forces had been adequately completed. The humanitarian situation had improved, in spite of the tension that continued in parts of the country. The mine situation, however, remained critical.

The Secretary-General noted that following the visit to Angola by his Special Adviser, there had been encouraging developments in the peace process and the pace of implementation of the Lusaka Protocol had increased. Progress had also been made in the consolidation of the ceasefire, disengagement of forces, freedom of movement of UNAVEM, discussion of the modalities for the global incorporation of UNITA troops into the national army and other critical areas. Arrangements for the dispatch of UNAVEM III infantry units were also under way. In that regard, he reminded the parties that unless they complied without delay with the requirements of the Lusaka Protocol and provided logistic support to the mission, he would not hesitate to recommend postponing or stopping its deployment. He also warned against undue expectations that the arrival of United Nations troops would solve the pressing problems that the Angolans must resolve themselves. The Secretary-General renewed his appeal to President dos Santos and Mr. Savimbi to meet without delay. Such a meeting should provide a strong impetus to national reconciliation.

At its 3518th meeting, on 13 April 1995, the Security Council included the second progress report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Czech Republic) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a letter dated 13 April 1995 from the representative of Angola, addressed to the President of the Security Council.¹⁵⁰

The President then stated that, following consultations among the members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:¹⁵¹

The Security Council has considered the progress report of the Secretary-General of 7 April 1995 on the United Nations Angola Verification Mission III.

The Council welcomes the confirmation by the Secretary-General that the ceasefire is generally holding and that the level of ceasefire violations has remained relatively low. It also welcomes the continued deployment of military and police observers of the Mission to team sites and regional headquarters outside Luanda, and the progress reported by him in a number of important areas, including liaison with the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola, the completion of the first phase of disengagement and discussions of the modalities for the incorporation of the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola into the national army. It commends the parties for their efforts in this regard.

The Council notes that a number of developments give cause for concern. These include reports of continuing military actions and preparations, in particular the attack on the airstrip at Andulo by the Angolan air force, the failure to complete the second phase of disengagement by 10 April 1995, some restrictions on the Mission's access to government military facilities and recent attacks on the personnel of the Mission and non-governmental organizations. It welcomes the improved access by the Mission to areas controlled by the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola but notes that some local commanders of the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola continue to impose restrictions on the movement of Mission personnel and calls upon the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola to ensure unrestricted access.

The Council calls upon the parties to cooperate fully with the United Nations, in particular through the Joint Commission, and to ensure the safety of the personnel of the Mission and non-governmental organizations. It notes with satisfaction that the members of the Joint Commission, including representatives of the Government of Angola, met Mr. Savimbi in Bailundo on 7 April and that at that meeting he publicly confirmed his commitment to the Lusaka Protocol. It reiterates its call for a meeting between President dos Santos and Mr. Savimbi as a matter of urgency because such a meeting may help to improve the climate of trust and give new impetus to the peace process in Angola.

The Council welcomes the Secretary-General's decision to proceed with preparations for the deployment of infantry units of the Mission. It notes that he has reminded the Angolan parties that they must implement without delay the requirements of the Lusaka Protocol, provide the Mission with the indispensable logistic support and undertake essential tasks such as mine clearance, the repair of major transport routes and the designation of quartering areas, to make it possible for United Nations infantry battalions to deploy to Angola in May 1995. The Council fully supports the Secretary-General in this regard and emphasizes the need for full implementation of the Lusaka Protocol. It welcomes his intention to deploy the infantry battalions in stages. It stresses the importance it attaches to the Government of Angola providing the logistic support envisaged for the Mission. In this context, it welcomes the agreement of the Government of Angola to allow the United Nations full operational access to the Catumbela airfield and calls upon the Government of Angola to ensure that this arrangement is extended for as long as required by the Mission. It also welcomes the intention of the Government of Angola to conclude, by 15 April 1995, a status-of-forces agreement with the United Nations.

The Council reaffirms the obligation of all States to implement fully the provisions of paragraph 19 of resolution 864 (1993) and states that the continuing flow of arms into Angola contrary to the provisions of the "Acordos de Paz" and resolution 976 (1995) contributes to the country's instability and undermines efforts at confidence-building.

The Council is encouraged that the Secretary-General has been able to report overall progress in the humanitarian situation in the month since his last report to the Council. It calls upon the parties to continue to facilitate access to all areas of the country for the delivery of humanitarian assistance. It calls once again upon the parties to respect the safety and security of all humanitarian personnel in Angola. It endorses the call upon the parties by the three observer States to the Angolan peace process to cooperate fully in releasing all war-related detainees through the International Committee of the Red Cross, as well as all captured foreign citizens or to provide information about their fate.

While the Council notes the progress made in the implementation of the comprehensive mine action programme, it also takes note of the statement in the report of the Secretary-General that the mine situation in Angola remains critical. The Council therefore urges both parties to support and facilitate mine clearance and to comply fully with the relevant provisions of the Lusaka Protocol. In this context, it welcomes the statement by the Special Representative of the Secretary-General following the 13th meeting of the Joint Commission that the Government of Angola and the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola have pledged to put 800 and 400 personnel respectively, at the disposal of the Mission for mine-clearance activities.

The Council will continue to monitor the situation in Angola closely. It looks forward to the next monthly report of the Secretary-General and requests him, in the meantime, to ensure that it is kept informed of developments in Angola and on prospects for the prompt deployment of the infantry battalions of the Mission.

Decision of 11 May 1995 (3534th meeting):
statement by the President

On 3 May 1995, pursuant to resolution 976 (1995), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council his third progress report on UNAVEM III.¹⁵² He reported that preparations for the meeting between President dos Santos and Mr. Savimbi were at an advanced stage and that agreement had been reached on the agenda and on practical details. His Special Representative had travelled to Lusaka, Zambia on 21 April 1995, to discuss the final arrangements. He also said that the status-of-forces agreement for UNAVEM III had been signed on 3 May 1995.

The Secretary-General further reported that the ceasefire continued to hold generally. There had been a further reduction in the number of ceasefire violations, but the situation in several areas had remained tense, as both sides had continued to occupy forward positions, sporadically attacked the local population and conducted troop movements. Despite some problems, the second phase of disengagement had been almost completed. The deployment of UNAVEM III military observers had been completed and the civilian police component had become fully operational.

The Secretary-General noted that the implementation of the Lusaka Protocol had entered a new phase. There had been a marked improvement in the overall political climate in the country and in the attitude of the parties. He hoped that the meeting between President dos Santos and Mr. Savimbi would result in concrete agreements. He reiterated, however, that he would not hesitate to recommend that the deployment of the troops be postponed or stopped if the parties failed to fulfil their commitments under the Lusaka Protocol and the relevant Council resolutions. He also reiterated his concern about the slow progress in demining, opening up of major roads and repair of airfields and other vital infrastructure. The Secretary-General called upon both parties to make available the necessary facilities and services, in addition to the personnel they had promised to provide to begin mine clearance. The improvement in security conditions had made new areas accessible to humanitarian agencies, thereby increasing their potential to assist the civilian population. He therefore stressed the need for Member States to continue to support the ongoing humanitarian activities in Angola and to disburse expeditiously the contributions pledged during the donors' meeting in February 1995. He also called on the parties to cooperate with the United Nations and its agencies, as well as to non-governmental organizations, to promote the expansion of humanitarian activities throughout the country.

At its 3534th meeting, on 11 May 1995, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (France) stated that, after consultations among the members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:¹⁵³

The Security Council has considered the third progress report of the Secretary-General of 3 May 1995 on the United Nations Angola Verification Mission III and the oral briefing by the Secretariat.

The Council welcomes the positive developments in Angola. It welcomes in particular the meeting in Lusaka on 6 May 1995 between President dos Santos and Mr. Savimbi, which took place in a positive atmosphere and gave new impetus to the consolidation of the peace process and the furthering of national reconciliation in Angola. The Council commends the efforts of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General, of the observer States to the Angolan peace process, of States of the region and, in particular, of the President of Zambia, which assisted in bringing about this meeting. It expresses the hope that the meeting will mark the beginning of a regular and constructive dialogue between the President of Angola and the leader of the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola.

The Council notes with satisfaction the progress in the implementation of the Lusaka Protocol concerning, inter alia, the reduction of ceasefire violations, the disengagement of forces, the cooperation among the parties and the Mission, the signing of the status-of-forces agreement and the providing of logistic facilities for the Mission. The Council welcomes the ongoing deployment of support units of the Mission and stresses the importance of a timely deployment of the infantry battalions of the Mission.

The Council is however concerned by the slow progress in other areas. It stresses the necessity for the increased cooperation of the Government and the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola with the United Nations in carrying out all major provisions of the Lusaka Protocol and relevant Council resolutions. While welcoming the release of the first group of prisoners, the Council urges the parties to expedite this process. Urgent attention should be given to the quartering of soldiers of the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola by the parties as well as the United Nations and the withdrawal of government troops to their barracks in order to permit the incorporation of the troops of the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola within the national army and police in accordance with the Lusaka Protocol. The Council stresses also the importance of the completion of the disengagement process and the improvement of communication links with the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola in all regions. It recalls the conditions set forth in Council resolution 976 (1995) for the deployment of infantry units and calls upon the parties in Angola to take all necessary steps to ensure that these conditions are met promptly for the timely deployment of sustainable infantry units throughout Angola capable of fully discharging their mandated tasks.

The Council particularly underlines the urgency of a mine-clearance programme and calls upon the parties to provide, as promised, the funds and equipment necessary in order for the programme to become operational, and to begin mine-sweeping operations on major roads under their control. The demining, the opening of major roads and repair of air fields and other infrastructure are of crucial importance for the expeditious deployment of infantry units of the Mission, the distribution of humanitarian aid and the return of displaced persons to their places of origin. The Council invites the donors as well as the United Nations and its agencies and non-governmental organizations to support actively demining actions.

The Council notes with satisfaction the amelioration of the humanitarian situation in Angola and calls upon the parties to cooperate without restriction with the United Nations and other humanitarian international organizations to facilitate the distribution of aid in all the regions and to intensify their efforts to guarantee the security of humanitarian transports and of personnel of the Mission. It requests Member States to continue to support the ongoing humanitarian activities in Angola and to disburse as soon as possible the contributions pledged during the donors' meeting in February 1995.

The Council will continue to monitor the situation in Angola closely and looks forward to the next monthly report of the Secretary-General.

Decision of 15 June 1995: letter from the President to the Secretary-General

On 4 June 1995, pursuant to resolution 976 (1995), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council his fourth progress report on UNAVEM III.¹⁵⁴ He reported that President dos Santos and Mr. Savimbi had met in Lusaka on 6 May 1995. In their discussions, both leaders had pledged their cooperation to consolidate peace in Angola and to implement the provisions of the Lusaka Protocol. They had also agreed to meet again in Luanda, at an unspecified date.

The Secretary-General further reported that the ceasefire had continued generally to hold and the number of violations had further decreased. According to the revised timetable, the first infantry battalion was expected to arrive in Angola during the first week of June, deployment of the second was planned for the first half of July, and the third in the second half of July. The further deployment of United Nations infantry would depend on the progress made by the parties in opening up major access roads and in mine clearance.

The Secretary-General noted that the implementation of the Lusaka Protocol had entered a new and promising phase, following the long-awaited meeting between the leaders of both parties. He had strongly encouraged both leaders to pursue actively the issues discussed and to convene a second meeting in Luanda, as soon as possible. He further noted that while much progress had recently been achieved in the implementation of the Lusaka Protocol, the peace process was behind schedule. Recent actions by the parties to initiate mine clearance and road rehabilitation must be reinforced to accelerate free circulation of people and goods throughout the country and to facilitate the deployment inland of United Nations troops. He urged the international community to support those vital efforts, in particular by providing the equipment needed. He also urged the parties to work out modalities for the formation of the new integrated armed forces and to begin preparations for the demobilization of UNITA troops and the withdrawal of government forces to barracks. The Secretary-General noted that as the peace process gathered momentum, the role of humanitarian assistance in sustaining and consolidating the peace acquired additional importance. He appealed to the international community to replenish the humanitarian stocks for Angola as a matter of urgency.

By a letter dated 15 June 1995,¹⁵⁵ the President of the Security Council informed the Secretary-General of the following:

The members of the Security Council have discussed your fourth progress report on the United Nations Angola Verification Mission (UNAVEM III). They welcome the positive developments in Angola that you reported, including continued maintenance of the ceasefire, the start of the deployment of United Nations infantry battalions, the decision on the future strength of the Angolan Armed Forces and improved access to all parts of the country for humanitarian assistance. They strongly support the ongoing dialogue between the two Angolan parties and encourage a further meeting between President dos Santos and Mr. Savimbi.

The members of the Council note with concern that, despite considerable progress in the implementation of the Lusaka Protocol, the peace process is still behind schedule. The members of the Council remain concerned at the problem of mines in the country. Lack of progress in mine clearance has an impact not only on the deployment of the United Nations Angola Verification Mission III but also on the ability of the population to return to their homes and resume agricultural activity. The members of the Council therefore endorse your call upon the parties to reinforce their recent actions in the fields of mine clearance and road and bridge repair. They agree that the international community should support these vital efforts. They also support your appeal to the parties to work out modalities for the formation of the new integrated armed forces and to begin preparations for the quartering of the troops of the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola and the withdrawal of the rapid reaction police to barracks.

The members of the Council learned with distress that, in two tragic incidents, a United Nations police observer lost his life and a United Nations military observer was wounded. In this connection, they recall the responsibility of the parties for the safety and security of all United Nations personnel in Angola.

The members of the Council will continue to monitor the situation in Angola and look forward to your next report.

¹⁵⁵ S/1995/487.

Decision of 7 August 1995 (3562nd meeting):
resolution 1008 (1995)

On 17 July 1995, pursuant to resolution 976 (1995), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on UNAVEM III.¹⁵⁶ He reported that, since the 6 May meeting between President dos Santos and Mr. Savimbi, high-level contacts between the Government and UNITA had intensified. In late June, a high-level UNITA delegation had visited Luanda to review with the Government the practical modalities for accelerating the implementation of the Lusaka Protocol. The review culminated in a comprehensive working document signed by the two parties. He also informed the Council that he had visited Angola from 14 to 16 July 1995 to assess the situation on the ground. During his visit, he had discussed with the parties ways and means of expediting the implementation of the peace process and had also reviewed the reconstruction needs of the country.

The Secretary-General further reported that progress continued to be slow in troop disengagement, demining and the establishment of quartering areas. There were also allegations about renewed laying of mines in some parts of the country. Moreover, the Angolan parties had been registering complaints about human rights violations. In response, UNAVEM had established a small sub-unit to deal with human rights issues and observe implementation of the relevant provision of the Lusaka Protocol. The Secretary-General intended to increase the strength of that unit, in order to station human rights monitors in almost all provinces. The humanitarian situation in Angola had continued to improve, as a direct result of the peace process and the expanded United Nations presence in the country.

The Secretary-General noted that the progressive deployment of United Nations military and police observers and troops had helped to consolidate the ceasefire. Despite occasional military tensions and incidents, both parties had been adhering to the spirit of the Lusaka Protocol. He welcomed, in that regard, the agreement reached between the parties on the adjusted and accelerated timetable for the implementation of the Protocol. At the same time, a comprehensive, fair and workable programme for the formation of the new armed forces should be adopted without delay. It was also essential to accelerate the exchange of prisoners and the repatriation of mercenaries, to reinforce the freedom of movement throughout the country and to speed up demining activities. In the meantime he recommended that the mandate of UNAVEM III be extended for a period of six months, until 8 February 1996.

At its 3562nd meeting, on 7 August 1995, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representatives of Angola and Brazil, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (Indonesia) then drew the attention of the members of the Council to the text of a draft resolution prepared in the course of prior consultations.¹⁵⁷

Speaking before the vote, the representative of Botswana stated that, although the Secretary-General's report dealt with the economic and social aspects of the peace process in Angola, his delegation did not expect that to be part of a peacekeeping mandate, it hoped that the international community would continue to contribute substantially to the economic and social reconstruction of Angola.¹⁵⁸

The draft resolution was thereupon put to the vote and was adopted unanimously as resolution 1008 (1995), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolution 696 (1991) of 30 May 1991 and all subsequent relevant resolutions,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 17 July 1995,

Welcoming the briefing by the Secretary-General on 25 July 1995 on his recent visit to Angola,

Reaffirming its commitment to preserve the unity and territorial integrity of Angola,

Reiterating the importance it attaches to the full implementation by the Government of Angola and the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola of the "Acordos de Paz", the Lusaka Protocol and relevant Security Council resolutions,

Noting the agreement reached between the Government of Angola and the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola on the adjusted and accelerated timetable for the implementation of the Lusaka Protocol,

Commending the continued efforts of the Secretary-General, his Special Representative, the three observer States to the Angolan peace process and the personnel of the United Nations Angola Verification Mission III to facilitate the implementation of the Lusaka Protocol and to consolidate the ceasefire and the peace process which has entered a new and promising phase,

Noting that the situation in most of the country is fairly calm, but concerned at the number of ceasefire violations,

Welcoming the meeting at Lusaka on 6 May 1995 between the President of Angola, José Eduardo dos Santos, and the leader of the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola, Jonas Savimbi, which led to the diminishing atmosphere of mistrust and the intensification of high-level contacts between the Government of Angola and the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola,

Recognizing that the progressive deployment of United Nations military and police observers and troops has significantly contributed to the consolidation of the ceasefire,

Welcoming the commitment of the international community to assist and support the economic, social and reconstruction efforts of Angola, and recognizing the importance of such assistance in sustaining a secure and stable environment,

Expressing concern at reports of human rights violations, and recognizing the contribution that human rights monitors can make in building confidence in the peace process,

1. Welcomes the report of the Secretary-General of 17 July 1995;
2. Decides to extend the mandate of the United Nations Angola Verification Mission III until 8 February 1996;
3. Commends the Government of Angola and the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola for their commitment to the peace process, and notes the progress made thus far in the implementation of the Lusaka Protocol;
4. Expresses concern at the slow pace in the implementation of the Lusaka Protocol, in particular troop disengagement, demining and the establishment of quartering areas, and expects the Government of Angola and the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola, in cooperation with the Mission, to finalize arrangements for the establishment of quartering areas, complete troop disengagement and expedite the conduct of demining;
5. Urges the Government of Angola and the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola to adhere strictly to the revised timetable for the implementation of the Lusaka Protocol and make concerted efforts to accelerate that process;
6. Stresses the importance of the completion of the electoral process, as provided for in the Lusaka Protocol;
7. Calls upon the Government of Angola and the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola to adopt without further delay a comprehensive and workable programme for the formation of the new armed forces, and to accelerate the exchange of prisoners and the repatriation of mercenaries with a view to reinforcing the freedom of movement of people throughout the country;

8. Takes note of the progress noted by the Secretary-General in the establishment of triangular communications between the Angolan parties and the Mission, and requests the Government of Angola and the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola to assign urgently liaison officers to the regional headquarters of the Mission;

9. Urges the two parties to put an immediate and definitive end to the renewed laying of mines and to reported unauthorized movement of troops;

10. Requests the Secretary-General to continue the deployment of infantry units of the Mission and accelerate it as conditions for sustaining and employing troops improve, with the objective of reaching full strength as soon as possible;

11. Urges the Government of Angola and the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola to provide the Mission with the necessary information and ensure its freedom of movement, including full unimpeded access to all military facilities, to enable it effectively to discharge its mandate;

12. Requests the Secretary-General to report on his analysis on the completion of the objectives of the Lusaka Protocol and of the mandate of the Mission, in the light of the alterations in the timetable for its deployment;

13. Stresses the need for the dissemination of objective information through Radio UNAVEM and for the Government of Angola to provide all facilities for the prompt functioning of the Radio;

14. Stresses the importance it attaches to the disarmament of the civilian population, and urges that it begin without further delay;

15. Notes with concern increasing levels of violence perpetrated by unaffiliated groups, and calls upon all parties to seek to control and disarm these threats to the peace process;

16. Authorizes the Secretary-General to increase as appropriate the strength of the human rights unit of the Mission;

17. Commends Member States, United Nations agencies and non-governmental organizations for their substantial contributions to meet the humanitarian needs of the Angolan people;

18. Demands that the Government of Angola and the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola take necessary measures to ensure the safe passage of humanitarian supplies throughout the country;

19. Requests the Government of Angola to continue providing substantial contributions to the United Nations peacekeeping operations, and calls upon the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola to make every effort to contribute proportionally in order to assist with the United Nations peacekeeping operation in Angola;

20. Endorses the Secretary-General's appeal, and encourages donors to respond with generous and timely financial contributions to the humanitarian effort and provision of mine clearance, bridging and road repair equipment and materials and other supplies necessary for setting up the quartering areas;

21. Endorses also the Secretary-General's intention to submit a comprehensive report to the Council every two months;

22. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of the United States stated that his country had been a firm supporter of the Lusaka accord. Over the past two years, his Government had provided more than $200 million in humanitarian and emergency assistance in the form of food aid and medical supplies. The United States also wished to help Angola develop its long-term economic potential and reduce its reliance upon emergency assistance. He expressed concern, however, that road conditions, destroyed bridges and mined areas were hampering the deployment of United Nations peacekeepers and were slowing down the peace process. In order to help surmount those obstacles, his country had offered bridging material to UNAVEM III, in addition to the assistance in mine clearance already pledged. In the longer term, United States assistance would also help to clear crop lands to reduce the need for food aid, and would give Angolans the ability to conduct demining operations themselves.¹⁵⁹

The representative of the United Kingdom noted that his Government had played a major part in humanitarian relief in Angola. He stressed that UNITA and the Angolan Government must cooperate fully with international relief efforts. He welcomed the proposal to expand the human rights component of UNAVEM III. The presence of additional human rights observers would help to ensure that basic rights were respected and to underline the common goals of achieving a stable and democratic Angola.¹⁶⁰

The representative of Angola stated that the prospects for peace and for political and economic stability increasingly appeared to be within reach. The steps taken by the international community, following the signing of the Lusaka Protocol, had given a major

¹⁶⁰ Ibid., pp. 11-12.

boost to the peace process and helped curtail the initial pessimism. The presence and activities of United Nations "Blue Helmets" had contributed to the climate of détente and the observance in practice of the provisions of the Lusaka Protocol. However, the full discharge of the Mission's mandate would be effective only if it continued to be provided with adequate means and if its activities were extended throughout the country. Despite the important progress that had already been made, some dangerous factors still persisted. The implementation of the Protocol was five months behind schedule, because UNITA's troops had so far not been confined to quarters, and the consequent delay in the final formation of the country's single national army. Other issues that were hindering the implementation of the Lusaka Protocol included isolated military actions, the renewed mining by UNITA of areas which had earlier been cleared, the kidnapping of civilians, and the slow pace of the release of prisoners of war. All those issues had to be resolved urgently to avoid the risk of military confrontation and the relapse into war. In order to help shape the new reality created by the peace prospects and to cement national reconciliation, the Angolan Parliament had recently given its permission for the revision of the Angolan Constitution, in order to accommodate the leader of UNITA in one of the two offices of Vice-President that would be part of the Angolan political system. Moreover, to bring to a conclusion the process of the presidential elections, it had also decided that the party that had received the largest number of votes, the Movimento Popular para a Libertação de Angola (MPLA), would designate a Vice-President, while the other Vice-President would be designated by UNITA, which had received the second highest number of votes. In conclusion, the speaker said that the settlement of the Angolan conflict would make an important contribution to stability and security in southern Africa, and to the exploitation of the region's vast economic potential. Moreover, it would also allow the resources currently devoted to humanitarian assistance to be reallocated for development.¹⁶¹

Decision of 12 October 1995 (3586th meeting):
statement by the President

On 4 October 1995, pursuant to resolution 1008 (1995), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council

a report on UNAVEM III.¹⁶² He reported that President dos Santos and Mr. Savimbi had met in Franceville, Gabon, on 10 August, and in Brussels on 25 September 1995 respectively. During the first meeting, the two leaders had agreed on modalities to continue bilateral discussions on the completion of the formation of the Angolan Armed Forces, including the global incorporation of UNITA troops. In Brussels, they had agreed on consolidating the peace process and the progress achieved thus far.

The Secretary-General further stated that reports of ceasefire violations had shown a steady decline. The situation remained relatively calm, except in the northern region with reports of reinforcement and sporadic shelling by both parties. With regard to the establishment of the quartering areas for UNITA troops, significant progress had been made, although much remained to be done. Demining activities by the Angolan Armed Forces and UNITA had continued. However, UNAVEM continued to investigate allegations of renewed laying of mines. There had been also continuing complaints of human rights violations, particularly by elements of the armed forces and police of both sides. The Joint Commission had decided to inscribe human rights on the agenda of its sessions and to request UNAVEM to report periodically on the human rights situation.

The Secretary-General expressed concern at the slow progress in the quartering process, which was essential for the early implementation of the provisions of the Lusaka Protocol. He called on both parties to finalize promptly the arrangements for the return of the Angolan Armed Forces barracks, the quartering of the rapid reaction police and the disarmament of civilians, and to conclude without delay their discussions on the formation of the new armed forces. Although the meetings, and the continuing dialogue between the Government and UNITA in the framework of the Joint Commission, were gradually generating mutual trust and confidence, the parties should continue to demonstrate their political will by backing up their declarations with concrete actions on the ground. They should refrain, in particular, from troop movements or military activities that might create tension or lead to renewed hostilities. Their follow-up on their declaration on free circulation of persons and goods, as well as the repatriation of mercenaries, would also be specifically important in that context. He also called for increased financial, technical and material assistance from the donor community to help rebuild the Angolan economic infrastructure.

At its 3586th meeting, on 12 October 1995, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representative of Angola, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (Nigeria) then stated that, following consultations among the members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:¹⁶³

The Security Council welcomes the report of the Secretary-General of 4 October 1995 on the United Nations Angola Verification Mission III pursuant to paragraph 21 of Council resolution 1008 (1995) of 7 August 1995.

The Council has noted the positive developments in Angola since the report of the Secretary-General of 17 July 1995. The Council is encouraged by the meetings in Franceville, Gabon, and Brussels between President dos Santos and Mr. Savimbi which provided the opportunity to discuss the critical issues and reach agreement on consolidation of the peace process. These meetings, particularly the round table in Brussels, provided important reassurance to the international community. The Council welcomes the continued commitment of both parties to the process of dialogue. The Council commends the efforts of the Secretary-General and his Special Representative, of the observer States to the Angolan peace process and of States in the region to help in carrying forward the process.

The Council notes with satisfaction the progress in the implementation of the Lusaka Protocol, including the reduction of ceasefire violations, the disengagement of forces, the enhanced cooperation between the parties and the Mission, the signing of the status-of-forces agreement, the provision of logistic facilities for the Mission and the conclusion of the joint declaration on the free circulation of persons and goods. The Council also welcomes the ongoing deployment of Mission support units and stresses the importance of a timely deployment of the infantry battalions of the Mission. The Council stresses the importance of an independent Mission radio and urges the Government of Angola to provide, without delay, the facilities to allow it to operate.

The Council nonetheless remains concerned at delays in the peace process, in particular in respect of quartering of the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola and the rapid reaction police, demining, disarmament, the return of the Angolan Armed Forces to barracks and the formation of the new armed forces as well as the repatriation of mercenaries. The Council underscores the peril that may result from further delays. The Council is also deeply concerned at allegations of renewed laying of mines and demands that all parties refrain from such actions.

The Council emphasizes that continuing cooperation between the parties is essential if a sustained cessation of hostilities is to take hold. In this regard, the Council calls upon the parties to refrain from troop movements or military activities that might create tension or lead to renewed hostilities.

The Council is concerned about the continuing complaints of human rights violations and endorses the decision of the Joint Commission to inscribe human rights in the agenda of all its regular sessions.

The Council wishes to emphasize that post-peacekeeping elements can make an important contribution to a viable long-term peace. The Council notes the linkage between political and economic well-being and the need to ensure that displaced people and refugees are able to return to their places of origin. The Council reaffirms the Secretary-General's call for a comprehensive coordinated and integrated effort on the part of all relevant international organizations to help to rebuild the Angolan economic infrastructure. The Council requests Member States to continue to support the ongoing humanitarian activities in Angola. It welcomes the commitments made at the Round Table Conference, held at Brussels in September 1995, and urges those that have made pledges to fulfil their commitments as soon as possible.

The Council will continue to monitor closely the situation in Angola and looks forward to future reports of the Secretary-General.

Decision of 28 November 1995 (3598th meeting): statement by the President

At its 3598th meeting, on 28 November 1995, the Security Council resumed consideration of the item on the agenda. After the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representative of Angola, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (Oman) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a letter dated 28 November 1995 from the representative of Angola, addressed to the President of the Security Council, transmitting the text of the Joint Communiqué issued by the Government and UNITA on 13 November 1995 reaffirming their commitment to the peace process.¹⁶⁴ The President then stated that, following consultations among the members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:¹⁶⁵

The Security Council welcomes the joint communiqué issued by the Government of Angola and the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola on 13 November 1995 in which they reaffirmed their commitment to the peace process. The Council is pleased to note that some of the steps necessary to carry out the provisions of the Lusaka Protocol have been taken recently, including the resumption of the military talks in Luanda and the movement of the first combatants of the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola to quartering areas on 20 November 1995, the first anniversary of the signing of the Lusaka Protocol. The Council underlines the need for the quartering process to be completed as soon as possible.

The Council, however, notes that despite these positive steps there continue to be ceasefire violations, importation of weapons, restrictions on freedom of movement and the presence of mercenaries. The Council stresses that much remains to be done urgently to implement fully the Lusaka Protocol, including strict observance of the ceasefire, the continuation of the quartering process, the quartering of the rapid reaction police, the return of the Angolan Armed Forces to defensive positions and the resolution of questions regarding the modalities of military integration. The Council calls upon the Government of Angola and the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola to continue to cooperate with the United Nations Angola Verification Mission III and to respect fully the status and security of international personnel.

The Council will follow developments in Angola closely and looks forward to receiving the comprehensive report of the Secretary-General on the situation in Angola by 8 December 1995.

Decision of 21 December 1995 (3614th meeting):
statement by the President

On 7 December 1995, pursuant to resolution 1008 (1995), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on UNAVEM III.¹⁶⁶ He reported that military talks between the Government and UNITA on the global incorporation of UNITA troops into the Angolan Armed Forces and the completion of the formation of the joint army had been suspended as a result of a shooting incident on 14 October at the residence of the UNITA Chief of staff. On 13 November, however, both parties had issued a joint communiqué in which they had reaffirmed their commitment to the Lusaka Protocol and their willingness to cooperate in furthering the peace process. On 17 November, negotiations on the completion of the formation of the Angolan Armed Forces had resumed. Those positive developments had been followed by the first movements of UNITA troops into the quartering areas on 20 November.

The Secretary-General noted with satisfaction that quartering had at last begun, but deplored that several important tasks such as the release of prisoners and the resolution of the issue of mercenaries, had hardly yet commenced. It was also unacceptable that violations of the ceasefire and military preparations, including mine-laying, still persisted a full year after the signing of the Lusaka Protocol, and that human rights abuses and restrictions on the free circulation of the population also continued. The unsatisfactory state of affairs was aggravated by recent propaganda attacks and threats against the United Nations. He further noted that, although much had been achieved since the signing of the Lusaka Protocol, many of the factors that had prevented implementation of the earlier peace accords were still much in evidence, such as distrust, continuing military activities, “foot-dragging” over quartering and related activities, obstruction of free movement and the restoration of government administration, as well as lack of respect for United Nations and other international personnel. He therefore urgently appealed to the Government and UNITA to demonstrate through concrete action that they were indeed committed to peace and were ready to correct those negative factors.

At its 3614th meeting, on 21 December 1995, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representative of Angola, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (Russian Federation) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a letter dated 21 December 1995 from the representative of Angola, addressed to the President of the Security Council.¹⁶⁷ He then stated that, following consultations among the members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:¹⁶⁸

The Security Council has considered the report of the Secretary-General of 7 December 1995 on the United Nations Angola Verification Mission III, submitted pursuant to paragraph 21 of Council resolution 1008 (1995) of 7 August 1995.

¹⁶⁵ S/PRST/1995/58.

¹⁶⁷ S/1995/1052.

The Council reiterates its concern at the slow progress in implementation of the provisions of the Lusaka Protocol. The Council stresses the importance of full implementation of the political and all other aspects of the peace process. It underlines that several important tasks that were to have been resolved in the early stages of the peace process remain incomplete, including the exchange of detailed military information, the release of all prisoners, the redeployment of those government troops near quartering areas of the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola, and the final resolution of the issue of mercenaries. In this respect, the Council welcomes the recent announcement by the Government of Angola that it will terminate the contract and repatriate the personnel of the firm involved and will release all remaining prisoners.

The Council notes that the deployment of Mission troops is nearly complete and that four quartering areas are prepared to receive troops. The Council expresses its disappointment at the slow pace at which the quartering process has proceeded. It calls upon the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola and the Government of Angola to fulfil their commitments regarding the expeditious quartering and demobilization of former combatants, the quartering of the rapid reaction police and the return of the Angolan Armed Forces to the nearest barracks.

The Council expresses deep concern at the delays in establishing modalities for the integration of the armed forces, which is vital for the process of national reconciliation. The Council notes with dismay the series of disruptions in the military talks between the parties. It urges the parties to continue the military talks without interruption and to conclude an equitable and practicable agreement without further delay. The Council underlines that such an agreement should give particular attention to the expeditious completion of the demobilization and integration of former combatants. It recognizes that the prompt and complete exchange of military information is vital to the success of these talks and urges the parties to provide the information required by the Lusaka Protocol without further delay.

The Council is gravely concerned by continued violations of the ceasefire and military offensives, in particular events in the north-west. The Council calls upon both parties to refrain from military activities or troop movements which lead to increased tensions and resumed hostilities and to implement without delay the disengagement plan being prepared by the Mission.

The Council deplores the recent threat to the safety of Mission personnel. The Council reminds the parties, in particular the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola, that they must take the steps necessary to ensure the safety and security of all Mission and other international personnel.

The Council expresses regret that the Mission radio is not yet operational. The Council calls upon the Government of Angola to facilitate its immediate establishment. It also calls upon both parties to cease the dissemination of hostile propaganda.

The Council is concerned at delays in implementing mine-clearance programmes planned by the United Nations and by Member States, and calls upon the Government of Angola to facilitate issuance of necessary authorizations to relevant personnel. The Council calls upon the Government of Angola and the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola to intensify their individual and joint demining efforts. It underlines the fact that the opening of roads within Angola, including the clearance of mines and the restoration of bridges, is vital not only to the peace process and the complete deployment of the Mission, but also to the effective delivery of humanitarian assistance and future peacebuilding efforts. The Council is gravely concerned at the reports of remaining in violation of the Lusaka Protocol.

The Council emphasizes that Angolans themselves bear ultimate responsibility for restoring peace and stability in their country. The Council stresses that concrete actions are urgently needed from the parties to put the peace process on an irreversible course. It notes that continued support for the Mission will depend on the extent to which the parties demonstrate their political will to achieve a lasting peace.

The Council notes the important role played by the Special Representative of the Secretary-General and by the three observer States in the promotion of the peace process in Angola and calls upon them to further contribute appropriately to the implementation of the Lusaka Protocol within the agreed time framework and to assist the Mission in the successful fulfilment of its tasks.

The Council requests the Secretary-General to update it on the progress of the Angolan peace process and the deployment and activities of the Mission at least on a monthly basis.

2. The question of South Africa

Decision of 19 February 1993: letter from the President to the Secretary-General

On 22 December 1992, pursuant to resolution 772 (1992) of 17 August 1992, the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council a report on the question of South Africa in which he reported on the findings of his Special Envoys to South Africa, on his good offices and on the activities of the United Nations Observer Mission in South Africa (UNOMSA).¹ The

Secretary-General said that, taking into account ongoing developments in the country, and following consultations with the Government of South Africa and the parties, he had appointed two Special Envoys who had carried out separate missions to South Africa from 16 to 27 September; and 22 November to 9 December 1992, respectively,² and had met with high Government officials and leaders of political parties, as well as with representatives of non-governmental organizations and leaders of the international observer teams.³ They had reported to the Secretary-General that although there were fundamental differences yet to be bridged between the South African Government and the African National Congress (ANC), there appeared to be a convergence of positions and a willingness on both sides to negotiate with one another and with others. The regional structure of a new South Africa, and the relationship of the regions to the central government, remained a major preoccupation with all the parties. Agreement on effective multiparty machinery based on the principle of inclusiveness remained an essential first step for a resumption of multiparty negotiations. They had also reported that despite continued violence, there was a wide agreement that without the deployment of international observers in the country the level of violence would be higher.

The Secretary-General reported on his good office efforts to expedite the resumption of multilateral negotiations. He said that all his interlocutors had expressed support for the efforts being made by the United Nations to facilitate a peaceful transition to a democratic society in South Africa and had assured him of their continued cooperation. At a meeting, on 26 September, between President de Klerk and Mr. Mandela, facilitated by the Secretary-General, agreement was reached on key issues relating to the securing of hostels, release of all remaining political prisoners, the prohibition of the carrying and display of dangerous weapons, and on the need for a democratic constituent assembly/constitution-making body and constitutional continuity during the interim transitional period. The Secretary-General also informed the Council that on 27 November 1992, he had received a letter from the Permanent Representative of South Africa containing a statement and accompanying background paper, issued by the President of South Africa, setting out a proposed timetable for the transitional process in South Africa, which envisaged that a fully representative government of national unity would be in place by the first half of 1994.⁴

The Secretary-General noted that the contribution of the international observer teams had been welcomed by all concerned and had had a salutary effect on the political situation in the country. Some had nevertheless contended that UNOMSA needed to be strengthened while others were of the view that its mandate should be expanded. He therefore informed the Council that, in view of the delicate situation prevailing in South Africa characterized by the rising levels of violence, he intended to reinforce the strength of UNOMSA with an increment of 10 additional observers.

The Secretary-General concluded that, while there had been distinct progress, the Council had to remain actively seized of the situation, as it had undertaken to do, to achieve the goal of the establishment of a democratic, non-racial and united South Africa.

By a letter dated 19 February 1993,⁵ the President of the Security Council informed the Secretary-General that the members of the Council had considered his report of 22 December 1992 and were grateful for the comprehensive and helpful account of events in South Africa contained therein. They noted that the presence of international observers had had a salutary effect on the political situation in the country, and welcomed his decision to reinforce the Mission by 10 additional observers. The members of the Council looked forward to receiving further reports from the Secretary-General on the situation in South Africa and the work of the United Nations there.

Decision of 12 April 1993 (3197th meeting):
statement by the President

At the 3197th meeting, on 12 April 1993, the President (Pakistan) stated that, after consultations among the members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁶

⁴ S/24866.

³ From the Commonwealth, the European Community and the Organization of African Unity (OAU).

The assassination of Chris Hani, a member of the African National Congress National Executive Committee and Secretary-General of the South African Communist Party, is a deplorable and troubling event. This brutal murder saddens all who are working for peace, democracy and justice in South Africa. Mr. Hani's murder further underscores the urgent need to end violence in the country and to push ahead with the negotiations which will create a united, non-racial and democratic South Africa.

Chris Hani actively supported these negotiations and only last week called for an end to violence so the negotiations could proceed in a climate of peace and stability. In this regard, the Security Council welcomes the announcements by all those who have reaffirmed their commitment to the negotiating process, including the ANC, the South African Communist Party and the Congress of South African Trade Unions. Negotiations leading to non-racial democracy must not be held hostage by the perpetrators of violence.

The Council states its determination to remain supportive of efforts to facilitate this peaceful transition to a non-racial democracy for the benefit of all South Africans.

Decision of 24 August 1993 (3267th meeting):
statement by the President

At the 3267th meeting, on 24 August 1993, following the adoption of the agenda, the President (United States) stated that, after consultations among the members of the Council, she had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁷

The Security Council deplores the recent upsurge in violence and discord in South Africa, especially in the East Rand. This violence — terrible in its human toll — is even more tragic as the country proceeds on the path to a democratic, non-racial and united South Africa and a new, more promising future for all its citizens.

The Council recalls its statement in resolution 765 (1992) of 16 July 1992 that it is the responsibility of the South African authorities to take all necessary measures to stop the violence immediately and protect the life and property of all South Africans. The Council affirms that all parties in South Africa must assist the Government in preventing opponents of democracy from using violence to threaten the country's democratic transition. In this regard, the Council notes the proposal for a national peace force to restore and maintain order in volatile areas. Any such force should be genuinely representative of South African society and its major political bodies. Just as importantly, it must have the confidence, support and cooperation of the people of South Africa. The Council also welcomes efforts by the leaders of the African National Congress and the Inkatha Freedom Party to convince their followers to avoid further violence. The Council urges all of South Africa's leaders to work jointly to prevent violence in the election period ahead.

The Council commends the international community, including the Organization of African Unity, the European Community and the Commonwealth, for playing a constructive role in helping to curb the violence in South Africa. The United Nations Peace Monitors, under the able supervision of the Chief of the United Nations Observer Mission in South Africa, have made a difference. People are alive today because of the tireless and courageous efforts of these and other international peace monitors. Yet far too many are dying. The world community must continue to signal firmly that it will not allow the violence to derail South Africa's political transition.

The Council emphasizes the key role of the multiparty negotiating process in securing the transition to a democratic, non-racial and united South Africa. It urges the parties to reaffirm their commitment to the multiparty negotiating process, to redouble their efforts to reach consensus on the transitional arrangements and constitutional issues still outstanding and to proceed to elections as planned in the coming year.

The Council reaffirms its determination to remain supportive of efforts to facilitate the peaceful transition to a non-racial democracy for the benefit of all South Africans. The Council is following developments in South Africa closely and will remain seized of the matter.

Decision of 23 November 1993 (3318th meeting):
statement by the President

At its 3318th meeting, on 23 November 1993, the Security Council invited the representative of South Africa, at his request, to participate in the proceedings without the right to vote. The President (Cape Verde) then stated that, after consultations among the members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁸

The Security Council welcomes the successful completion of the multiparty negotiating process in South Africa and the conclusion of agreements reached therein on an interim constitution and electoral bill. These agreements constitute a historic step forward in establishing a democratic, non-racial and united South Africa.

The Council looks forward to the elections to be held in South Africa in April 1994. It urges all parties in South Africa, including those which did not participate fully in the multiparty talks, to respect agreements reached during the negotiations, to re-commit themselves to democratic principles, to take part in the elections and to resolve outstanding issues by peaceful means only.

The Council reiterates its determination to continue to support the process of peaceful democratic change in South Africa for the benefit of all South Africans. It commends once again the work being done by the Secretary-General and the United Nations Observer Mission in South Africa in assisting that process. It invites the Secretary-General to accelerate contingency planning for a possible United Nations role in the election process, including coordination with the observer missions of the Organization of African Unity, the European Community and the Commonwealth, to enable expeditious consideration of a request to the United Nations for such assistance. In this connection, the Council urges early establishment of the Transitional Executive Council and the Independent Electoral Commission.

The Council considers that South Africa's transition to democracy must be underpinned by economic and social reconstruction and development, and it calls on the international community to assist in this regard.

Decision of 16 December 1993: letter from the President to the Secretary-General

By a letter dated 13 December 1993 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁹ the Secretary-General informed the Council that, taking into account the progress achieved in the peace process, including the establishment of the Transitional Executive Council on 7 December 1993, he intended to appoint Mr. Lakhdar Brahimi as his Special Representative for South Africa, with immediate effect, to assist him in the implementation of relevant Council decisions and resolutions concerning that country. The decision was made in accordance with a statement issued on 23 November 1993 by the President of the Security Council, by which the Council invited the Secretary-General "to accelerate contingency planning for a possible United Nations role in the election process" in South Africa.¹⁰

By a letter dated 16 December 1993, the President of the Security Council informed the Secretary-General that his letter of 13 December had been brought to the attention of the members of the Council and that they had agreed with the proposal mentioned therein.¹¹

On 10 January 1994, the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council a report on the question of South Africa in which he gave an account of the consultations held by his Special Representative for South Africa and submitted his proposal on an expanded UNOMSA mandate.¹²

The Secretary-General reported that, at its first meeting on 7 December 1993, the Transitional Executive Council had endorsed a resolution adopted the previous day by the Multiparty Negotiating Council, which requested, inter alia, the United Nations to provide a sufficient number of international observers to monitor the electoral process and to coordinate the activities of the international observers provided by the Organization of African Unity (OAU), the European Union and the Commonwealth, as well as those provided by Governments. Accordingly, he had dispatched a survey team to South Africa to assess the needs of the United Nations in carrying out the requests made. In the discussions held by his Special Representative for South Africa with the South African Government and the political parties, both had recognized the positive contributions made by UNOMSA to curb the violence and to the peace process and had called for a strong United Nations presence during the electoral process.

In response to those requests, the Secretary-General proposed that the mandate¹³ and size¹⁴ of UNOMSA be expanded to include the observation of the elections scheduled for 27 April 1994. He noted that, in that new context, UNOMSA would have a significant role not only in assessing the ultimate freedom and fairness of the elections, but in monitoring the electoral process at each stage. He also outlined the operational approach for the expanded United Nations operation.

The Secretary-General also informed the Council on his intention to set up a special Trust Fund to finance the participation of additional observers from Africa and other developing countries and expressed the hope that some Member States would make voluntary contributions to the Fund.

¹³ For further details on the proposed expansion, see S/1994/16, para. 57.

¹⁴ An additional number of 1,278 United Nations observers was proposed.

At its 3329th meeting, on 14 January 1994, the Security Council included in its agenda the report of the Secretary-General. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representative of South Africa, at his request, to participate in the proceedings without the right to vote. The Council also extended an invitation under rule 39, at the request of the representatives of Djibouti, Nigeria and Rwanda,¹⁵ to Mr. Kingsley Makhubela, Acting Chief Representative of ANC. The President (Czech Republic) then drew the attention of the members of the Council to the text of a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.¹⁶

The representative of South Africa welcomed the Council's proposal to assist his country to promote the peaceful and transparent constitutional transition to a government of national unity. The main thrust of the expanded UNOMSA mandate, as reflected in the Secretary-General's report, would be to assist in ensuring that the election was free and fair, so that its legitimacy would be placed beyond all doubt. The speaker warned that the electoral process may not be smooth, and attempts may well be made to draw the international observers into local disputes. In that context, the Mission's objectivity and impartiality would be of crucial importance. He assured the Council that the observers would receive the full cooperation of the South African authorities and all those involved in the electoral process, including respect for their safety.¹⁷

Mr. Kingsley Makhubela, observer for ANC, welcomed the Secretary-General's report and hoped that all other parties concerned would adhere to the recommendations contained therein. He expressed the view that the draft resolution would assist his country in its efforts to secure a peaceful transition from apartheid to democracy and the hope that the Council would continue to render effective support to the South African people during the transition.¹⁸

Speaking before the vote, the representative of Djibouti stated that the draft resolution covered most of the requirements for the United Nations to be able to fulfil the requests of the Transitional Executive Council. His delegation therefore supported the draft resolution. It also supported the Secretary-General's intention to set up a trust fund to assist African and other developing countries wishing to participate as observers.¹⁹

While endorsing the deployment programme outlined in the Secretary-General's report, the representative of Pakistan stressed the importance of deploying United Nations observers well ahead of the general election in South Africa. He pointed out that in the ultimate analysis, the adequacy of the number of observers deployed would depend on how peaceful the run-up to the election and the polling itself were. He also made the point that all the regions of the world should be adequately represented in the United Nations Observer Group.²⁰

The draft resolution was thereupon put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 894 (1994), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolutions 765 (1992) of 16 July 1992 and 772 (1992) of 17 August 1992,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 10 January 1994 on the question of South Africa,

Welcoming the further progress made in establishing a democratic, non-racial and united South Africa and in particular the establishment of the Transitional Executive Council and the Independent Electoral Commission and the agreement on the Interim Constitution,

Noting that the legal framework of the electoral process in South Africa leading to the elections to be held on 27 April 1994 is defined by the Independent Electoral Commission and the Electoral Acts, the Independent Media Commission Act and the Independent Broadcasting Authority Act,

Commending the positive contribution already made by the United Nations Observer Mission in South Africa to the transitional process in South Africa and to efforts to curb violence,

Commending also the positive contribution of the Organization of African Unity, the Commonwealth and the European Union in this regard,

Reiterating its determination to continue to support the process of peaceful democratic change in South Africa for the benefit of all South Africans,

Recalling the statement made by the President of the Security Council on 23 November 1993, in which the Council invited the Secretary-General to accelerate contingency planning for a possible United Nations role in the election process, including coordination with the observer missions of the Organization of African Unity, the Commonwealth and the European Union, to enable expeditious consideration of a request to the United Nations for such assistance,

Taking note of General Assembly resolutions 48/159 A of 20 December 1993 and 48/230 of 23 December 1993, in which the Assembly, inter alia, requested the Secretary-General to accelerate planning for a United Nations role in the election process, in consultation with the Security Council and in coordination with the observer missions of the Organization of African Unity, the Commonwealth and the European Union,

Having considered the request of the Transitional Executive Council that the United Nations provide a sufficient number of international observers to monitor the electoral process and to coordinate the activities of the international observers provided by the Organization of African Unity, the Commonwealth and European Union, as well as those provided by Governments, and accepting the need to respond urgently to this request,

1. Welcomes with appreciation the report of the Secretary-General of 10 January 1994, and agrees with the proposals contained therein concerning the mandate and size of the United Nations Observer Mission in South Africa, including the proposals for the coordination of the activities of the international observers provided by the Organization of African Unity, the Commonwealth and the European Union, as well as those provided by any other intergovernmental organizations or Governments;

2. Urges all parties in South Africa, including those which did not participate fully in the multiparty talks, to respect agreements reached during the negotiations, to adhere to democratic principles and to take part in the elections;

3. Calls upon all parties in South Africa to take measures to end the violence and intimidation and thus contribute to the conduct of free and fair elections, and expects that anyone who seeks to disrupt the elections will be held accountable for such actions;

4. Also calls upon all parties in South Africa to respect the safety and security of the international observers and to facilitate the carrying out of their mandate;

5. Welcomes the intention of the Secretary-General to set up a special trust fund to finance the participation of additional observers from Africa and other developing countries, and urges States to contribute generously to this fund;

6. Decides to remain seized of the matter until a democratic, non-racial and united South Africa is established.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of the United States said that the vote marked another step in the United Nations long history of support for the dismantlement of apartheid and the transition to non-racial democracy in South Africa. His Government welcomed the transformation of the role of the United Nations peace observers to that of election observers and, in that regard, strongly supported the resolution which called for the immediate deployment of United Nations observers to assist in South Africa's electoral process. It also called on all South Africans to cooperate with the efforts of the United Nations and other observers to ensure that the elections were free and fair.²¹

The representative of New Zealand stated that the draft resolution responded to South Africa's need for practical assistance from the United Nations. It was appropriate that the United Nations response would involve both the Council and the General Assembly in giving effect to the request from the Transitional Executive Council. His delegation was pleased that the resolution provided for cooperation between the UNOMSA and the Commonwealth Observer Mission as well as with OAU and the European Union.²²

The representative of Nigeria drew attention to a number of issues which had to be urgently addressed by the international community, namely the issue of violence, the elections themselves and the needs of post-apartheid South Africa. On the first issue, his delegation believed that there was an urgent need for the reorientation and retraining of the existing police force. It recommended a more proactive role by UNOMSA in that regard. On the elections, his delegation observed that the presence of an adequate number of international electoral observers was intended not only to help South Africans in the electoral process but also to help in building confidence in that process. As far as the era of post-apartheid was concerned, his delegation stressed that without massive international assistance, South Africa would not be able to cope with the acute social and economic problems.²³

Decision of 19 April 1994 (3365th meeting):
statement by the President

On 14 April 1994, pursuant to resolutions 772 (1992) and 894 (1994) of 17 August 1992 and 14 January 1994, the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council a further report on the question of South Africa.²⁴ The Secretary-General noted that the past three months had witnessed intensive efforts by concerned political parties and the Government of South Africa to establish the transitional structures agreed to in the multiparty negotiations to help level the political playing field and create conditions for free and fair elections. The Transitional Executive Council and the Government had progressively moved towards a modus operandi, where they worked in tandem for the elections. Despite the strenuous efforts that had been made to ensure that all parties took part in the elections scheduled to be held from 26 to 28 April 1994, it would however seem that the Inkatha Freedom Party (IFP) and other parties would not do so. Political violence continued to pose a grave threat to the electoral process.

Reporting on his Special Representative's efforts to enhance the political process, the Secretary-General said that his Special Representative had held consultations with the leaders of the main political parties on the preparations for the elections, the general political situation and the expanded mandate of UNOMSA. The question of security during the elections in general, and safety of observers in particular, had been high on the agenda of all the discussions.

High priority had also been given to the timely and full deployment of the Mission. By 24 March, all the United Nations observers called for in the operational approach had been deployed throughout the country.

Particularly concerned by the opposition to the electoral process by IFP, the Secretary-General urged all parties concerned to eschew violence and to participate peacefully in the political process and respect everyone's right to vote or not to vote.

At its 3365th meeting, on 19 April 1994, the Security Council included in its agenda the report of the Secretary-General. After the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representative of South Africa, at his request, to participate in the proceedings without the right to vote. The President (New Zealand) then stated that, following consultations among the members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:²⁵

The Security Council has noted with appreciation the report of the Secretary-General of 14 April 1994 on the question of South Africa, as well as the oral information received from the Secretariat on the latest developments in the electoral process.

The Council welcomes the agreement reached on 19 April 1994 between the Inkatha Freedom Party, the African National Congress and the Government of South Africa, following which the Inkatha Freedom Party has decided to participate in the forthcoming elections in South Africa. It commends all the parties involved for the statesmanship and goodwill which they have displayed in reaching this result.

The Council expresses the hope that this agreement will bring an end to the violence which has scarred South Africa and that it will promote lasting reconciliation among the people of South Africa. It calls upon all parties to contribute to the conduct of free and fair elections in which all South Africans will be able to participate peacefully.

The Council commends the positive contribution by the United Nations Observer Mission in South Africa and the international community to the transitional process in South Africa and reiterates its determination to support the process of peaceful democratic change for the benefit of all South Africans. It calls upon all parties to respect the safety and security of the international election observers and to assist them to carry out their mandate.

The Council looks forward to the successful completion of the electoral process in South Africa and to the establishment of a democratic, non-racial and united South Africa that will take its place in the international community.

Decision of 25 May 1994 (3379th meeting):

By a letter dated 23 May 1994 addressed to the President of the Security Council,²⁶ the representative of South Africa transmitted to the Council a copy of a letter dated 18 May 1994 from the President of the Republic of South Africa, addressed to the President of the Security Council, in which Mr. Mandela appealed to the Council to revoke all the remaining sanctions enforced against his country at the earliest possible occasion.

At its 3379th meeting, on 25 May 1994, the Security Council included in its agenda the letter dated 23 May 1994 from the representative of South Africa. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representatives of Algeria, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Botswana, the Congo, Egypt, Greece, India, Kenya, Malaysia, Morocco, Senegal, Sierra Leone, South Africa, the United Republic of Tanzania, Tunisia, Zambia and Zimbabwe, at their request, to participate in the proceedings without the right to vote. The Council also extended an invitation, under rule 39, at the request of the representative of Nigeria, to Mr. Abdul Minty, Director of the World Campaign against Military and Nuclear Collaboration with South Africa.²⁷ The President (Nigeria) then drew the attention of the members of the Council to the text of a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.²⁸

²⁶ S/1994/606.

The representative of South Africa said that the Council was meeting to close a particular chapter in the history of the relations between South Africa and the nations of the world, as represented by the United Nations. His delegation trusted that at the conclusion of that meeting, the Security Council would terminate the mandatory sanctions imposed against its country. He recalled that the embargo had been imposed under Chapter VII of the Charter at a time when the prevailing system of government in his country, and its actions, constituted a threat to international peace and security. His delegation viewed the decisions that the Council was about to take as an acceptance by the world body that South Africa had become a democratic country which could be counted on to subscribe and adhere to the pursuit of the important goals of international peace and security. His Government was committed to discharging its responsibilities as a Member of the United Nations in the collective effort to secure peace for its people and for the peoples of the world.²⁹

The representative of Egypt, speaking on behalf of OAU, stated that while the dream had come true at the political level, South Africa's struggle had not yet ended. The reconstruction stage was no less important than the struggle against the racist regime. She stressed that solutions had to now be found for its economic and social problems in order to build a better future and to raise the standard of living of the majority of its population which had long suffered under apartheid and called on the international community to help South Africa. Her delegation supported all steps towards South Africa's recovery of its place within the international community.³⁰

The representative of Greece, speaking on behalf of the European Union, noted its readiness to support the efforts of the new Government of South Africa to accomplish the goal of leading the country to a democratic and non-racial society in which respect for human rights, the rights of minorities, the rule of law, social justice and the elimination of all forms of discrimination would prevail. In that context, he announced that the European Union had decided to lift the last remaining autonomous restrictive measure it had taken since 1985 against South Africa, namely the refusal to cooperate in the military field. Furthermore, the European Union recalled the decision of the General Affairs Council of 19 April 1994, in which it had pledged a package of immediate measures to respond to the immediate needs of the South Africans.³¹

During the course of the debate, most representatives welcomed the establishment of a united, democratic and non-racial Government in South Africa supported the termination of the mandatory arms embargo and other restrictions imposed on that country as timely and appropriate and urged the international community to extend all necessary support to South Africa, as it returned to its rightful place among the community of nations.³²

Speaking before the vote, the representative of China said that the emergence of a united, democratic and non-racial South Africa was bound to have a major impact on peace and stability in the region and the world as a whole. As a permanent member of the Security Council, China had always supported the South African people in their just struggle against apartheid and for racial equality and democratic rights and stood ready to develop friendly relations of cooperation with the new South Africa in all areas, on the basis of the Charter of the United Nations and of the five principles of peaceful coexistence.³³

The representative of the Russian Federation welcomed the Council's prompt and positive response to the appeal made by the President of the Republic of South Africa to abrogate the sanctions against his country. The international community had now to welcome South Africa into the family of nations and help it to participate in the work of the United Nations system.³⁴

The draft resolution was thereupon put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 919 (1994), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolutions on the question of South Africa, in particular resolutions 282 (1970) of 23 July 1970, 418 (1977) of 4 November 1977, 421 (1977) of 9 December 1977, 558 (1984) of 13 December 1984 and 591 (1986) of 28 November 1986,

Welcoming the first all-race multiparty election and the establishment of a united, democratic, non-racial Government of South Africa, which was inaugurated on 10 May 1994,

Taking note of the letter dated 18 May 1994 from Mr. Nelson R. Mandela, President of the Republic of South Africa, Stressing the urgent need to facilitate the process of reintegration of South Africa in the international community, including the United Nations system,

1. Decides, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations, to terminate forthwith the mandatory arms embargo and other restrictions related to South Africa imposed by its resolution 418 (1977);

2. Decides also to end forthwith all other measures against South Africa contained in resolutions of the Security Council, in particular those referred to in resolutions 282 (1970), 558 (1984) and 591 (1986);

3. Decides further to dissolve the Security Council Committee established pursuant to resolution 421 (1977) concerning the question of South Africa, in accordance with rule 28 of the provisional rules of procedure of the Council, effective from the date of the adoption of the present resolution;

4. Invites all States to consider reflecting the provisions of the present resolution as appropriate in their legislation.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of the United Kingdom stated that the lifting of the arms embargo represented the formal and symbolic acknowledgment by the Council that apartheid was dead and that South Africa's isolation had come to an end. The resolution just adopted might be technical in its content, but it represented the culmination of an astonishing political transformation which few had predicted in that timescale. The United Nations could be proud of the role it had played in providing observers for the first multiparty democratic elections in South Africa and in helping to control and mitigate the tide of political violence. The international community had to demonstrate its support and encouragement for the new Government and its policies, not just by lifting any remaining restrictions, but also by helping to encourage investment, providing technical assistance and offering open and liberal trade arrangements. In conclusion, he noted that the resolution also cited the urgent need to facilitate South Africa's reintegration into the international community, including the United Nations system. Citing Article 19 of the Charter, he stated that his Government believed that the question of the arrears owed by South Africa to the United Nations should not prevent it from taking its rightful place in the Organization and from exercising its right to vote. His Government looked forward to the new South Africa resuming its seat in the General Assembly as quickly as possible.³⁵

The representative of France welcomed the recent events in South Africa that had led to the "historic" meeting of the Security Council on Africa Day and the lifting of the sanctions imposed on that country almost 20 years previously. The Council was also showing that it was able to respond to the political evolution of certain situations by putting an end to sanctions when circumstances permitted it. His delegation hoped that South Africa would very quickly recover its place in the family of nations, and more particularly, in Africa, where it had already become the fifty-third member of OAU.³⁶

The representative of the United States stated that the resolution represented a timely recognition of the dramatic changes that had taken place in South Africa, changes that the United Nations had helped to bring about. The resolution was an important step to bring South Africa into the fold of the community of democratic nations. His delegation hoped to see South Africa play a leading role — through OAU and the United Nations — in promoting peace and stability in its region and its continent.³⁷

Decision of 27 June 1994 (3393rd meeting):

On 16 June 1994, pursuant to resolutions 772 (1992) and 894 (1994) of 17 August 1992 and 14 January 1994, the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council his last report on the question of South Africa.³⁸ The report focused on the Mission's electoral mandate and the "breathtaking developments" which had taken place in South Africa during the month of April 1994, culminating in the holding of elections from 26 to 29 April, the proclamation of the official results on 5 May, and the inauguration of the new President of the Republic of South Africa, Mr. Nelson Rolihlala Mandela, on 10 May 1994.

The Secretary-General recalled the public march organized in Johannesburg by IFP which had ended in bloodshed, with over 50 people dead and 250 wounded. Those events had contributed to increasing the tension in some provinces. The constitutional negotiations had been further complicated by King Zwelethini's call on 18 March for the restoration of the Zulu kingdom. At a meeting on 19 April, however, the Government, ANC and IFP reached agreement providing for, inter alia, IFP participation in the elections to be held on 26, 27 and 28 April. The IFP decision to participate in the elections resulted in an immediate and dramatic reduction in violence. On 5 May, the Independent Electoral Commission, after careful consideration of numerous issues raised by various parties relating to alleged or actual irregularities in the polling and voting, pronounced the elections for the National Assembly to have been substantially free and fair.

The Secretary-General noted that, as an exercise in preventive diplomacy, drawing on the strengths of several international organizations to support indigenous efforts towards peace and national reconciliation, the international community's efforts in South Africa since 1992 offered a unique and positive demonstration of the benefits of such cooperation. He intended to invite OAU, the Commonwealth and the European Union, as well as other concerned regional organizations, to work out guidelines for future cooperation based on the success, as well as the mistakes, of their common experience in South Africa.

At its 3393rd meeting, on 27 June 1994, the Security Council included in its agenda the report of the Secretary-General. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representative of South Africa, at his request, to participate in the proceedings without the right to vote. The President (Oman) then drew the attention of the members of the Council to the text of a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations,³⁹ as well as to a letter dated 26 May 1994 from the representative of Greece, addressed to the Secretary-General,⁴⁰ transmitting a declaration by the European Union on South Africa, issued on 6 May 1994.

The draft resolution was thereupon put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 930 (1994), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolutions 772 (1992) of 17 August 1992 and 894 (1994) of 14 January 1994,

Noting with great satisfaction the establishment of a united, non-racial and democratic Government of South Africa,

Welcoming General Assembly resolutions 48/13 C and 48/258 A of 23 June 1994,

1. Welcomes the final report of the Secretary-General on the United Nations Observer Mission in South Africa;
2. Commends the vital role played by the Special Representative of the Secretary-General and the Mission, together with the Organization of African Unity, the Commonwealth and the European Union, in support of the establishment of a united, non-racial and democratic South Africa;
3. Decides that, with the successful completion of its mandate, the Mission is terminated forthwith;
4. Also decides that it has concluded its consideration of the item entitled "The question of South Africa" and hereby removes this item from the list of matters of which the Council is seized.

The Security Council thus concluded its consideration of the item "The question of South Africa", which, in accordance with paragraph 4 of resolution 930 (1994), was removed from the list of matters of which the Council is seized.

3. The situation concerning Western Sahara

Decision of 2 March 1993 (3179th meeting): resolution 809 (1993)

On 26 January 1993, the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council a report on the situation concerning Western Sahara in which he gave, inter alia, an account of the outcome of various consultations held with the parties.¹

The Secretary-General recalled the basic positions of Morocco and the Frente Popular para la Liberación de Saguía el-Hamra y de Río de Oro (Frente Polisario) regarding the provisions of the settlement plan, which related to the establishment of the voter lists.² Morocco maintained that all persons having Saharan status had the right to participate in the referendum and that, accordingly, Saharans who for various reasons were omitted by the Spanish authorities in 1974 should be considered on the same basis as those who were counted; hence, Morocco regarded the list of persons counted in 1974 as a point of reference for the establishment of the voter lists. For its part, the Frente Polisario maintained that, in the initial agreement, the two parties had agreed that the 1974 list would be the sole basis for the application of the criteria for voter eligibility and that, accordingly, the Saharans counted in 1974 should constitute the vast majority of persons authorized to participate in the referendum, while Saharans omitted from the census should constitute an exception to that group. The two parties thus had radically opposing points of view, with one attaching primary importance to the list of persons counted in 1974, and the other considering that its importance was relative.

Referring to a series of talks held by his Special Representative with each of the parties from 25 August to 25 September 1992 on the interpretation of the criteria for participation in the referendum, the Secretary-General stated that the parties' opposing point of view concerning the basic question of the establishment of the voter lists largely accounted for their differences with regard to both the interpretation of the criteria and the equally important question of evidence in support of applications for participation in the referendum. The Frente Polisario had emphasized the special importance of written evidence emanating from the Territory, namely, authentic documents issued by the Spanish authorities in the Territory, while Morocco had stressed the equal importance, in a nomadic and traditional society, of oral testimonies and official documents, regardless of their source. Since the outcome of those talks were not conclusive, the Secretary-General had agreed to the holding of a meeting of tribal chiefs on 30 November and 1 December 1992 in Geneva to advise on questions relating to the means of identifying persons authorized to participate in the referendum. The Secretary-General reported that, because of differences relating to the powers of some participants designated by the Moroccan party, the consultative meeting had to be cancelled, despite the compromise proposals put forward by his Special Representative to the delegations of both parties in Geneva.

The Secretary-General also informed the Council on the referendum on constitutional reform held by the Government of Morocco on 4 September 1992, which resulted in the adoption of a series of proposed amendments to the Moroccan Constitution, one of which introduced the "Region" as a new administrative subdivision. In a public address on 8 September 1992, the King had announced that Western Sahara would form the first such Region and enjoy priority in terms of development. Following the address, municipal elections were held in Morocco and in the Territory of Western Sahara.

The Secretary-General stated that whatever hopes for a compromise that might have existed were frustrated by the inability to hold the planned meeting of tribal chiefs in Geneva. That setback demonstrated starkly the futility of the efforts undertaken by his Special Representative over the past eight months to seek a way out of the existing deadlock. The Secretary-General therefore presented the following options to the Council: (a) continuation and, if possible, intensification of talks between the two parties;

² The implementation plan may be found in the report of the Secretary-General of 18 June 1990 (S/21360). The fourth preambular paragraph of resolution 809 (1993) refers to divergences between the two parties on the interpretation and application of the criteria for voter eligibility set out by the Secretary-General in his report of 19 December 1991.

(b) immediate implementation of the settlement plan on the basis of the instruction for the review of applications for participation in the referendum appearing in the annex to the report of the previous Secretary-General³ — under that option, the implementation would have to proceed without the cooperation of one of the parties; and (c) adopting an alternative approach not based on the settlement plan. Requesting Council guidance by way of a resolution, the Secretary-General said that depending on its decision on how best to proceed, the role and the strength of the United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara (MINURSO) would have to be adjusted.

At its 3179th meeting, on 2 March 1993, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. After the adoption of the agenda, the President (New Zealand) drew the attention of the members of the Council to the text of a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.⁴ The draft resolution was thereupon put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 809 (1993), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolutions 621 (1988) of 20 September 1988, 658 (1990) of 27 June 1990, 690 (1991) of 29 April 1991 and 725 (1991) of 31 December 1991,

Recalling that in conformity with the settlement plan regarding the question of Western Sahara, as adopted by resolutions 658 (1990) and 690 (1991), it was for the Secretary-General to determine the instructions for the review of the applications for participation in the referendum, and that in its resolution 725 (1991) the Council welcomed the report of the Secretary-General of 19 December 1991,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 26 January 1993 on the situation concerning Western Sahara,

Concerned by the difficulties and delays encountered in the implementation of the settlement plan, and in particular the persistent divergences between the two parties on the interpretation and application of the criteria for voter eligibility set out by the Secretary-General in his report of 19 December 1991,

Determined that the settlement plan be implemented without further delay in order to achieve a just and lasting solution,

Stressing the desirability of ensuring the full cooperation of both parties for the implementation of the settlement plan,

1. Welcomes the report of the Secretary-General of 26 January 1993 on the situation concerning Western Sahara;

2. Invites the Secretary-General and his Special Representative to intensify their efforts, with the parties, in order to resolve the issues identified in the report, in particular those relating to the interpretation and application of the criteria for voter eligibility;

3. Invites the Secretary-General to make the necessary preparations for the organization of the referendum of self-determination of the people of Western Sahara and to consult accordingly with the parties for the purpose of commencing voter registration on a prompt basis, starting with the updated lists of the 1974 census;

4. Also invites the Secretary-General to report to the Council as soon as possible and not later than May 1993 on the outcome of his efforts, on the cooperation of the parties and on the prospects and modalities for the holding of the referendum on a free and fair basis with a view that this take place by the end of the current year at the latest, and requests the Secretary-General to include in this report proposals for the necessary adjustments to the present role and strength of the United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara;

5. Urges the two parties to cooperate fully with the Secretary-General in implementing the settlement plan regarding the question of Western Sahara, which has been accepted by them and approved by the Council in its resolutions 658 (1990) and 690 (1991), and in resolving the issues identified in the report of the Secretary-General, in particular those relating to the interpretation and application of the criteria for voter eligibility;

6. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of the Russian Federation stated that his country had consistently supported United Nations efforts to provide for a just solution to the problem of Western Sahara, on the basis of respect for the rights of the people of Western Sahara, including the right to self-determination. His delegation favoured the speedy holding of the referendum, as any delays would not be in keeping with the interests of the peoples of the region and of the world community as a whole, and would create uncertainty about the issue of the continued presence in Western Sahara of United Nations personnel. He also stressed the need to take measures that would lead to mutually acceptable solutions and move the settlement process forward on the basis of appropriate decisions of the Security Council. His delegation believed that the resolution meant a reaffirmation of the support for the Secretary-

General's efforts to organize a referendum on self-determination for the people of Western Sahara, in cooperation with the Organization of African Unity (OAU).⁵

Decision of 28 May 1993: letter from the President to the Secretary-General

On 21 May 1993, pursuant to resolution 809 (1993) of 2 March 1993, the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council an interim status report on the situation concerning Western Sahara, summarizing his efforts to expedite the implementation of the settlement plan.⁶

The Secretary-General informed the Council of his decision to visit the mission area in the first week of June to make one more effort to seek a compromise solution to resolve outstanding issues, particularly those relating to the interpretation and application of the criteria for voter eligibility. He noted that during discussions held in March and April, both parties had confirmed their desire to proceed promptly with the registration of voters and to cooperate with MINURSO on that task. They had also agreed to the participation of tribal chiefs as well as observers from either side, in the registration process. In the light of those consultations, it had been decided to establish an Identification Commission, commencing with a nucleus of about 10 members.⁷ The Commission would start voter registration in June and would also draw up plans, including resource requirements for expanding the identification process to include all potentially eligible voters, in order to complete preparations for the referendum by the end of the year, if possible.

The Secretary-General expressed the hope that his forthcoming visit to the mission area would underscore that the identification and registration process was not to be seen as an open-ended commitment, and that the settlement plan had to be implemented without further delay.

By a letter dated 28 May 1993,⁸ the President of the Security Council informed the Secretary-General that his interim report had been brought to the attention of the members of the Council. They understood the reasons for postponing the publication of his report and welcomed his decision to visit the region in the first week of June. The members of the Council also welcomed the establishment of the Identification Commission and hoped that it would complete its work as soon as possible. They looked forward to receiving a further report containing his recommendations concerning the organization of the referendum, as well as possible adjustments of MINURSO, at the earliest possible date after the completion of his visit, in order to respect the time frame set out in the resolution 809 (1993).

Decision of 4 August 1993: letter from the President to the Secretary-General

On 28 July 1993, the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council a report on the situation concerning Western Sahara.⁹ The report outlined factual developments related to his visit to the mission area, from 31 May to 4 June 1993, and subsequent events.

The Secretary-General recalled that the aim of his visit was to urge the parties to accept a compromise solution with regard to the interpretation and application of the criteria for voter eligibility. To that effect, he had presented to the parties a comprehensive text and had invited them to convey to him as early as possible their views.¹⁰ The Secretary-General noted at subsequent meetings that both sides had reaffirmed their commitment to the implementation of the peace plan in its entirety and their determination to move towards an early referendum. However, while stressing that they did not reject the proposed compromise, they had expressed reservations on certain provisions of the text. The Government of Morocco had reservations on specific provisions concerning tribal links with the Territory, but had since accepted the compromise. For its part, the Frente Polisario, in a favourable change of an earlier position, had conveyed its acceptance of all the criteria for voter eligibility. With regard to the compromise text, reservations were expressed on provisions relating to tribal links with the Territory and to the composition of the tribal chiefs invited to testify. The Secretary-General reported that, shortly after his visit, the parties agreed to hold direct talks from 17 to

The Secretary-General also indicated that the Identification Commission had begun work on establishing with the authorities of both parties the detailed procedures for identification and registration, starting in the Laayoune and Tindouf areas.

In his conclusions, the Secretary-General pointed out that the intensification of efforts to overcome existing difficulties had contributed to the holding of direct talks between the parties, which, if sustained, would hopefully facilitate the implementation of the settlement plan. The exchange of views had sharpened focus on outstanding issues. Foremost among those was the urgency of the acceptance of the compromise on the interpretation and application of the eligibility criteria. He intended to submit in due course a full report to the Council.

By a letter dated 4 August 1993,¹¹ the President of the Security Council informed the Secretary-General of the following:

The members of the Security Council welcome your report of 28 July 1993 on the situation concerning Western Sahara.

The members of the Council fully support your efforts to make early progress on the preparations for holding the referendum in accordance with resolution 809 (1993) of 2 March 1993. They note that the Identification Commission has now begun preparatory work. They welcome the reaffirmation by the two parties of their commitment to the implementation of the peace plan in its entirety and, in particular, their encouraging responses to your compromise proposal concerning the interpretation and application of the criteria and their determination to work towards an early referendum.

The members of the Council agree that the holding of direct talks between the two parties in Laayoune from 17 to 19 July 1993 is a positive development and share your hope that talks will soon resume.

The members of the Council reiterate their support for your renewed efforts to resolve outstanding issues so that an early referendum may be held, and hope they will soon receive your full report in this regard.

Decision of 6 December 1993: letter from the President to the Secretary-General

On 24 November 1993, pursuant to resolution 809 (1993) of 2 March 1993, the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council a report on the situation concerning Western Sahara.¹² It provided, inter alia, an account of the Secretary-General's further efforts to resolve the issues still hindering the implementation of the settlement plan.

The Secretary-General recalled that the Frente Polisario had substantial reservations on some key provisions of the proposed compromise and had requested amendments to the text, whereas Morocco had rejected any modification of the text.¹³ Both parties had agreed that membership of a Saharan subfraction existing in the Territory was a prerequisite to eligibility under any of the five pertinent criteria. They disagreed, however, over which tribes or tribal units had a "clearly established" connection with, or were "existing" in, the Territory. Morocco was of the view that members of all subfractions of a given Saharan tribe should be considered, a priori, for participation in the referendum, including those not represented in the 1974 census. The Frente Polisario, on the other hand, contended that unless the vast majority of the members of a given subfraction had been counted in the 1974 census, that subfraction should not be considered as existing in the Territory, and its members other than those already counted in the census should not be eligible to participate in the referendum. The Secretary-General reported that the Frente Polisario, however, maintained its reservations on his compromise text, as it remained concerned about the possible inclusion of members of some tribal units which it did not consider as existing in the Territory. In view of the persisting difficulties, it would obviously not be possible to meet the expectations and hold the referendum by the end of the year.

The Secretary-General hoped to submit a report to the Council early in 1994, together with a detailed timetable and recommendations for the necessary adjustments to the existing strength of MINURSO, with a view to holding the referendum in mid-1994. He pointed out, however, that any estimated date, as well as the implementation of the settlement plan, depended on the spirit of cooperation and forbearance of both parties. In the meantime, he proposed maintaining the current military and civilian strength of the Mission.

By a letter dated 6 December 1993,¹⁴ the President of the Security Council informed the Secretary-General of the following:

The members of the Security Council welcome your report of 24 November 1993 and fully subscribe to the observations it contains. They also welcome the progress already achieved in narrowing the differences between the two parties.

The members of the Council further agree that your compromise proposal referred to in paragraph 27 of your report is a sound framework for determining potential participation in the referendum for self-determination of the people of Western Sahara as foreseen in the settlement plan. They welcome your determination to move ahead and proceed with voter registration and identification. They reaffirm your role as guarantor of an objective and impartial referendum and expect any difficulties with the compromise to be resolved by early 1994.

While regretting that the timetable suggested in resolution 809 (1993) of 2 March 1993 cannot be maintained, the members of the Council support your goals of presenting a report to the Council early next year and holding the referendum no later than mid-1994. They underline the crucial importance they attach to these goals.

The members of the Council confirm the full confidence they place in you and your Special Representative for a speedy settlement of the situation concerning Western Sahara in conformity with the settlement plan and with relevant resolutions of the Council. They urge both parties to cooperate fully with you and your Special Representative to that end.

Decision of 29 March 1994 (3355th meeting):
resolution 907 (1994)

On 10 March 1994, pursuant to resolution 809 (1993) of 2 March 1993, the Secretary-General submitted a report to the Council on the situation concerning Western Sahara.¹⁵

The Secretary-General informed the Council that his Special Representative had visited the mission area from 2 to 13 January 1994 for consultations with the parties and the neighbouring countries on the situation and ways of resolving the remaining difficulties. He had provided assurances to allay the concerns of the Frente Polisario that, on the basis of the compromise, thousands of individuals foreign to the Territory might be included in the electorate. Those assurances were confirmed and further elaborated in a letter dated 4 February 1994 from the Special Representative to the representative of the Frente Polisario in New York, to follow up the explanatory note on the compromise that he had addressed to the parties on 27 September 1993.

The Secretary-General also informed the Council that the preparatory meeting between the Identification Commission and Moroccan officials, scheduled to be held on 25 October 1993 in Laayoune had been postponed because its date coincided with the expected resumption of direct talks between the two parties in New York. As a result, the timetable the parties had agreed upon had to be adjusted. The identification and registration process was launched on 3 November 1993. The Secretary-General noted, however, that the completion of the identification and final registration of all eligible voters remained uncertain in the absence of agreement by the Frente Polisario to the compromise as a whole.

The Secretary-General stated that he remained confident that his proposals constituted a sound compromise. In order to ensure that the referendum took place without any further delays he proposed the following options: (a) the Council would decide that the United Nations should proceed with the referendum, regardless of the cooperation of either party; the process of identification and registration should be completed by September 1994; (b) the Council would decide that the Identification Commission should continue its work during a prescribed period, for example until 30 June 1994, while the United Nations would continue its efforts to obtain the cooperation of both parties based on the compromise proposal; at the end of the prescribed period, the Council would decide on its next course of action; (c) the Council would conclude, on the basis of the Secretary-General's report,¹⁶ that the cooperation of both parties in the completion of the registration and identification process could not be obtained and would decide either to phase out the whole operation, within a given time frame, or to suspend the registration and identification process, while retaining a reduced United Nations military presence to encourage respect for the ceasefire.

At its 3355th meeting, on 29 March 1994, the Security Council included in its agenda the report of the Secretary-General. After the adoption of the agenda, the President (France) drew the attention of the members of the Council to the text of a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations,¹⁷ and read out a revision to its provisional text.

The draft resolution, as orally revised in its provisional form, was thereupon put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 907 (1994), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolutions 621 (1988) of 20 September 1988, 658 (1990) of 27 June 1990, 690 (1991) of 29 April 1991, 725 (1991) of 31 December 1991 and 809 (1993) of 2 March 1993,

Appreciative of the efforts undertaken by the Secretary-General and his Special Representative for Western Sahara to address concerns of both parties and implement the settlement plan regarding the question of Western Sahara, as adopted by the Council in its resolutions 658 (1990) and 690 (1991),

Recalling the reports of the Secretary-General of 21 May, 28 July and 24 November 1993 on the situation concerning Western Sahara,

Recalling the letters dated 28 May, 4 August and 6 December 1993 from the President of the Security Council in response to those reports,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 10 March 1994 and the annexes thereto,

Recalling paragraph 22 of the report of the Secretary-General,

Recalling that, in conformity with the settlement plan, it was for the Secretary-General to determine the instructions for the review of the applications for participation in the referendum,

Urging the two parties to cooperate fully with the Secretary-General in implementing the settlement plan which has been accepted by them,

Committed to reaching a just and lasting solution of the question of Western Sahara,

1. Welcomes the report of the Secretary-General of 10 March 1994 on the situation concerning Western Sahara;

2. Welcomes the compromise proposal of the Secretary-General concerning the interpretation and application of criteria for voter eligibility as a sound framework for determining eligibility for participation in the referendum for self-determination of the people of Western Sahara, and takes note of the explanatory note of the Special Representative dated 27 September 1993 and the letter dated 4 February 1994 from the Special Representative, included in the annexes to the report of the Secretary-General of 10 March 1994;

3. Expresses its deep concern over continuing difficulties and delays in the work of the Identification Commission;

4. Agrees to the course of action, as outlined in option B in paragraph 25 of the report of the Secretary-General of 10 March 1994, that the Identification Commission should complete the analysis of all applications received and proceed with the identification and registration of potential voters by 30 June 1994, on the basis of the compromise proposal of the Secretary-General, the terms of reference of the Identification Commission and the relevant provisions of the settlement plan, and supports the intention of the Secretary-General to continue his efforts to obtain the cooperation of both parties on that basis;

5. Requests, in this context, the Secretary-General to report to the Council not later than 15 July 1994 on progress achieved in the work of the Identification Commission, as well as other aspects relevant to the fulfilment of the settlement plan with a view to deciding on further action necessary for fulfilment of the United Nations mission in Western Sahara;

6. Urges strict compliance with the timetable for option B as laid out in paragraph 24 (a) of the report of the Secretary-General of 10 March 1994, with a view to holding the referendum by the end of 1994;

7. Calls for full cooperation with the Secretary-General, his Special Representative and the Identification Commission in their efforts to implement the settlement plan, which has been accepted by both parties;

8. Decides, in the event that the Secretary-General notifies the Council in the report called for in paragraph 5 above that the referendum cannot be held by the end of 1994 and in view of obligations of the parties to cooperate fully with the Secretary-General, to consider the future of the United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara, including an examination of options regarding its mandate and continued operations;

9. Urges the Secretary-General, in the context of the implementation of paragraph 4 above, to make every effort to maintain the Mission at the strength needed to carry out option B, and also invites him to make proposals for the necessary adjustments to the present role and strengths of the Mission, as part of the report called for in paragraph 5 above;

10. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Decision of 29 July 1994 (3411th meeting):
statement by the President

On 12 July 1994, pursuant to resolution 907 (1994) of 29 March 1994, the Secretary-General submitted a report to the Security Council on the situation concerning Western Sahara.¹⁸ The Secretary-General reported that the identification process had been launched on 1 June 1994, after the two parties had agreed on two tribal subfractions with which to start, and on the relevant sheikhs to assist the Identification Commission to determine the identity and eligibility of members of those subfractions. The question of the designation of OAU observers,¹⁹ however, could not be resolved in time to enable the Commission to start its work as scheduled. In a letter dated 19 August 1993 addressed to the Secretary-General, the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Morocco had noted that the OAU observers had been designated from among officials of the secretariat of an organization which, in admitting the pseudo "Sahrawi Arab Democratic Republic" (SADR) as a member, had already prejudged the outcome of the referendum. The Minister stated that Morocco would acquiesce in the participation of OAU only if the latter adopted "a rational position with regard to the right of the populations of Western Sahara for self-determination, by at least suspending the participation of the 'pseudo SADR' in the activities of OAU". The Frente Polisario, for its part, accepted the status quo conferred on the OAU observers, and later, stressed that the identification operation could only begin with an OAU presence. The Secretary-General indicated that despite extensive consultations, the problem had not yet been settled. Meanwhile, the Identification Commission had collected a total of over 75,000 completed applications forms, of which 20,000 had already been processed. The Commission intended to set 31 August 1994 as the deadline for the receipt of applications.

The Secretary-General reported further, that assuming that the Identification Commission would soon be able to proceed with the identification and registration of potential voters, and that the Council subsequently decided to hold the referendum, he would recommend in his next report that the transitional period should start on 1 October 1994 and end with the proclamation of the results of the referendum which should take place on 14 February 1995, as proposed in the revised timetable annexed to his report.²⁰ On the basis of the above, he would submit to the Council a final progress report before the end of August 1994.

²⁰ S/1994/819.

At its 3411th meeting, on 29 July 1994, the Security Council included in its agenda the report of the Secretary-General. After the adoption of the agenda, the President (Pakistan) said that, following consultations, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:²¹

The Security Council takes note with satisfaction of the report of the Secretary-General of 12 July 1994 on the situation concerning Western Sahara as well as the oral report by the Secretariat on 28 July 1994. It welcomes the progress made to date on the issues outlined in the report of the Secretary-General towards the implementation of the settlement plan in accordance with the relevant resolutions of the Council. It commends, in particular, the work of the Identification Commission and the efforts of the Deputy Special Representative pursuant to resolution 907 (1994) of 29 March 1994.

The Council notes that, in the light of delays in the registration process, the Secretary-General has proposed a revised timetable for the organization of the referendum for self-determination of the people of Western Sahara on 14 February 1995. It looks forward to the next report of the Secretary-General, at the end of August 1994, on the basis of which it hopes to be able to take appropriate decisions on the organization and timing of the referendum. In the meantime, it welcomes the intention of the Identification Commission to set 31 August 1994 as the deadline for receipt of voter application forms.

The Council welcomes the goodwill shown by the parties thus far and urges them to continue to cooperate with the Secretary-General and the United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara to ensure the earliest possible implementation of the settlement plan.

Decision of 15 November 1994 (3457th
meeting): statement by the President

On 5 November 1994, pursuant to resolution 907 (1994) of 29 March 1994 and the statement by the President of the Security Council of 29 July 1994, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the situation concerning Western Sahara in which he provided, inter alia, an account of further progress made by MINURSO in the identification and registration process.²²

The Secretary-General reported that following extensive consultations with the Chairman of OAU, its Secretary-General and other interested parties, to overcome the difficulties over the OAU observers, the Chairman of OAU had provided a “unique and indivisible” list of four observers. Because of the unavailability of one newly designated observer and delays in the arrival of his replacement in the Mission area, however, the identification and registration of potential voters did not begin until 28 August 1994. The Secretary-General noted that only some 4,000 potential voters had been identified and interviewed so far, equivalent to less than 2 per cent of the total number of application forms, and the potential scale of the operation had been greatly increased by the last-minute flood of applications. The operation, he said, was logistically far more complex than expected because members of the same tribal subgroups, who had to be identified individually with the assistance of their respective sheikhs, were dispersed in different locations and means of communication were limited. Nor was it possible to predict at that stage the number of appeals that might be lodged or the time required to process them.

The Secretary-General stated that he would report further to the Council on the organization and timing of the referendum after his forthcoming visit to the region. He also intended to dispatch to the field, in the immediate future a technical team to reassess the logistical and other requirements for the possible deployment of MINURSO at full strength. In the meantime, he proposed to maintain the existing military and civilian strength of MINURSO.

At its 3457th meeting, on 15 November 1994, the Security Council included in its agenda the report of the Secretary-General. After the adoption of the agenda, the President (United States) said that, following consultations, she had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:²³

The Security Council notes the report of the Secretary-General of 5 November 1994. It shares the view of the Secretary-General that the launching of the identification and registration of potential voters on 28 August 1994, in the presence of the observers as agreed, marked a significant step towards the fulfilment of the United Nations mandate on Western Sahara.

The Council calls upon the two parties to maintain their cooperation with the Secretary-General and the United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara in their efforts to implement as soon as possible the settlement plan in accordance with the relevant resolutions of the Council.

The Council is, however, concerned about the slow speed of the identification process, in particular the fact that only a very small proportion of the potential voters have been identified and interviewed to date. While recognizing the difficulties involved, including the handling of a large number of last-minute applications, the Council urges the two parties to exert all possible efforts to facilitate the work of the Mission, and urges the earliest possible deployment of the Identification Commission staff already approved by the General Assembly in its resolution 48/250 B of 23 June 1994, in order to accelerate this process.

The Council welcomes the decision of the Secretary-General to visit the region later this month, and hopes that on this occasion he will be able to report significant progress towards implementing the settlement plan and holding the now long-overdue referendum. It looks forward to receiving his report following this visit and following the report of the technical team charged with reassessing the logistic and other requirements for possible deployment of the Mission at full strength. In the light of that report, including information on progress achieved in the work of the Identification Commission as well as other aspects relevant to the fulfilment of the settlement plan, the Council hopes to be able to take appropriate decisions on the organization and timing of the referendum. In doing so it strongly believes that there must be no further undue delay in the holding of a free, fair and impartial referendum for self-determination of the people of Western Sahara in accordance with the settlement plan.

Decision of 13 January 1995 (3490th meeting):

On 14 December 1994, the Secretary-General submitted a progress report to the Security Council on the situation concerning Western Sahara in which he gave an account of his visit to the Mission area from 25 to 29 November 1994.²⁴

The Secretary-General reported that during his visit to the Mission area, the Frente Polisario had expressed concern about certain developments since the beginning of the identification and registration process that they viewed as impediments to the smooth implementation of the settlement plan and the conduct of a free, fair and impartial referendum. Addressing their main concern, the large number of application forms submitted at the last minute, the Secretary-General had pointed out that the Identification Commission was an independent body whose members would carry out their mandate with impartiality, fairness and integrity. Both parties had reassured him that they remained fully committed to the settlement plan and had pledged continued support for the activities of MINURSO.

The Secretary-General recalled that he had informed the Council of his intention to send a technical team to MINURSO to reassess the logistic and other requirements for the possible full deployment of the Mission at full strength. He reported that the team had visited MINURSO from 10 to 14 November and found that, given the work still to be completed in the identification of potential voters, it was premature to make final arrangements for the deployment of MINURSO at full strength. The team had agreed that the Mission should focus on finding means to speed up the identification and registration, and strongly supported the idea of expanding the Identification Commission.

The Secretary-General noted that, despite the difficulties and delays experienced over the past few months, the political will still existed to move the process forward. He also noted that, given the large number of applications received, the only way to complete identification and registration in a reasonable time would be through a major reinforcement of personnel and other resources. MINURSO had developed in that regard a plan for the establishment of additional centres and identification and registration teams. He expressed the hope that, by 31 March, progress achieved in the identification and registration process would reach such a level as to enable him to recommend 1 June 1995 as the date for the start of the transitional period. By mid-August, the reduction of Moroccan forces in the Territory would be completed, and all laws or measures that could obstruct the conduct of a free and fair referendum suspended. By that time, he expected, based on the assumption that the Council would approve the proposed expansion of MINURSO, the identification and registration process would be completed and the final list of voters published. The repatriation programme should be completed by the end of September and the referendum could then take place in October 1995.

At its 3490th meeting, on 13 January 1995, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Argentina) drew the attention of the members of the Council to the text of a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.²⁵ The draft resolution was thereupon put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 973 (1995), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolutions 621 (1988) of 20 September 1988, 658 (1990) of 27 June 1990, 690 (1991) of 29 April 1991, 725 (1991) of 31 December 1991, 809 (1993) of 2 March 1993 and 907 (1994) of 29 March 1994,

Recalling the statements by the President of the Security Council of 29 July and 15 November 1994,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 14 December 1994,

Welcoming the efforts of the Secretary-General during his visit to the region from 25 to 29 November 1994,

Committed to reaching a just and lasting solution of the question of Western Sahara,

Urging the two parties to cooperate fully with the Secretary-General and the United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara to ensure prompt and full implementation of the settlement plan,

Noting the Secretary-General's judgement that the only way to complete identification and registration in a reasonable time is through a major reinforcement of personnel and other resources,

Concerned that the implementation of the settlement plan has been delayed and that, in the circumstances, the mandate of the Mission, like the other United Nations operations, should be subject to periodic consideration by the Council,

1. Welcomes the report of the Secretary-General of 14 December 1994 on the situation concerning Western Sahara;

2. Reiterates its commitment to holding, without further delay, a free, fair and impartial referendum for self-determination of the people of Western Sahara in accordance with the settlement plan, which has been accepted by the two parties;

3. Calls upon the two parties to cooperate fully with the Secretary-General and the United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara in their efforts to implement the settlement plan in accordance with the relevant Security Council resolutions and within the timescale outlined in paragraphs 21 and 22 of the report of the Secretary-General;

4. Welcomes the fact that voter identification has begun and is continuing, albeit at a slow pace, and commends the Mission for the progress achieved thus far;

5. Approves the expansion of the Mission as proposed in paragraphs 17 to 19 of the report of the Secretary-General, and expresses the hope that every effort will be made to deploy the observers necessary to complete the identification process in a timely fashion in accordance with the settlement plan;

6. Requests the Secretary-General to report by 31 March 1995 to confirm the arrangements with regard to the logistic, personnel and other resources required for the deployment of the Mission at full strength, on his final plans for implementing all elements of the settlement plan and on the responses of the parties to his proposals in order to fulfil the United Nations Mission in Western Sahara;

7. Encourages the Secretary-General to continue to make all possible efforts in order to create a propitious atmosphere conducive to a speedy and effective implementation of the settlement plan;

8. Expects to be able, on the basis of the report requested in paragraph 6 above, to confirm 1 June 1995 as the date for the start of the transitional period, with a view to holding the referendum in October 1995 and to bringing the Mission to a successful conclusion shortly thereafter, in accordance with the settlement plan;

9. Decides that the mandate of the Mission should continue to 31 May 1995;

10. Also decides to consider the possible extension of the mandate of the Mission after 31 May 1995 on the basis of a further report from the Secretary-General and in the light of progress achieved towards the holding of the referendum and the implementation of the settlement plan;

11. Requests the Secretary-General to keep the Security Council fully informed of further developments in the implementation of the settlement plan during this period;

12. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Decision of 12 April 1995 (3516th meeting):
statement by the President

On 30 March 1995, pursuant to resolution 973 (1995) of 13 January 1995, the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council a report on the situation concerning Western Sahara, covering developments since his last report.²⁶

The Secretary-General reported that, besides monitoring and verifying the ceasefire, the identification of potential voters remained the core activity of the Mission. Although progress had been slow, over 21,000 persons had been identified so far in a process which, less than a year ago, very few believed would ever start. He pointed out that, from the start, the single greatest obstacle to identification had been the issue of tribal leaders (sheikhs). The settlement plan had given the sheikhs the responsibility for identifying applicants as being the persons they claim to be and as belonging to a particular tribal group (subfraction). They were also to provide oral testimony relevant to the eligibility criteria. Most sheikhs, however, elected in 1973, were already of mature years at the time and many had since died or become incapacitated. There were, in consequence, a large number of subfractions, one third of the total, without a recognized tribal leader on at least one side. Since it had been agreed that identification could take place only when two tribal leaders, one from each side, were present to testify, it followed that work had to be suspended when one side or the other experienced difficulties in making its sheikh available. Moreover, the insistence by both sides on strict reciprocity meant that whenever identification could not take place at a centre on one side, work was automatically suspended at a centre on the other side. His Deputy Special Representative, in an effort to solve the issue, had first proposed to the parties that the process start with those subfractions where there was a surviving and competent sheikh on each side. He had then offered a formula to deal with other cases. In that regard, the parties had expressed divergent views. The Secretary-General noted, however, that a measure of convergence had begun to emerge on the basis of a proposal set out by his Deputy Special Representative.

The Secretary-General further indicated that there would soon be four centres on each side with 16 identification teams assigned to them. It was realistic to expect that approximately 20,000 applicants could be processed per month at the centres. He stressed that progress in identification would depend mostly on the collaboration of both parties, and therefore urged them to abandon any insistence on strict reciprocity in the number of centres and on the linkage of centres on each. Nor should limits be imposed on the numbers to be identified on any given day. If they would cooperate in resolving the remaining issues, the transitional period could begin in August 1995 and the referendum could be held in January 1996.

In conclusion, the Secretary-General recommended that there should be no lessening of the Council's support for MINURSO at this stage.

At its 3516th meeting, on 12 April 1995, the Security Council included in its agenda the report of the Secretary-General. After the adoption of the agenda, the President (Czech Republic) said that, following consultations, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:²⁷

The Security Council notes the report of the Secretary-General of 30 March 1995. It welcomes progress achieved so far in the identification and registration process, in particular the acceleration in the rate of identification, and emphasizes the need to continue that acceleration. It endorses the Secretary-General's goal of achieving a rate of identification of at least 25,000 per month. However, the Council regrets that progress was not sufficient to enable the Secretary-General to recommend 1 June 1995 as the date for the commencement of the transitional period.

The Council also notes with concern the delays resulting from the failure to ensure the continuous presence at the identification centres of the necessary subfraction representatives. It welcomes the agreement on a method for choosing alternative subfraction representatives when necessary and it expresses the hope that this will contribute to further acceleration of the process with a view to holding the referendum in January 1996. The Council supports the Secretary-General's call upon both parties to cooperate fully with the Identification Commission in the performance of its work, in particular by abandoning their insistence on strict reciprocity in the number of centres and on the linkage of a centre on one side with a specific centre on the other.

The Council expresses its concern about the slow progress on the other aspects which are relevant to the fulfilment of the settlement plan and must be implemented before the referendum can take place. It calls upon both parties to cooperate fully with the Secretary-General, with his Deputy Special Representative and with the United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara and to coordinate such cooperation to ensure prompt and full implementation of all aspects of the settlement plan.

The Council hopes to see continuous and rapid progress by the time of the next report of the Secretary-General in May 1995, which would enable it to consider favourably the possible extension of the mandate of the Mission.

Decision of 26 May 1995 (3540th meeting):
resolution 995 (1995)

On 19 May 1995, pursuant to resolution 973 (1995) of 13 January 1995 and the statement by the President of the Security Council of 12 April 1995, the Secretary-General submitted a report to the Council on the situation concerning Western Sahara.²⁸

The Secretary-General reported that despite increased operational capabilities, the rate of identification had been uneven and the operation had been interrupted periodically by difficulties relating to the timely availability of tribal leaders (sheikhs) and party representatives, as well as weather conditions and logistics. Identification had resumed on 2 May 1995, at all eight centres, with some 35,000 persons identified as of 15 May. That was far below the figure that MINURSO would be technically capable of achieving if the full cooperation of the parties was invariably forthcoming.

The Secretary-General stated that given the means and the opportunity, MINURSO could address the technical difficulties as they developed, but it could not force the parties to continue with the process if they had chosen not to do so. He pointed out that the parties should not limit the number of persons to be identified to any maximum on any given day, nor should they interrupt the process at a centre on one side if it was technically not possible to proceed with identification in a centre on the other side. He called upon the parties to work with MINURSO in a spirit of genuine cooperation towards making sufficient progress in identification and registration to permit the referendum to be held in early 1996.

In that context, the Secretary-General outlined some benchmarks for assessing progress on certain aspects of the settlement plan, including the final text of the code of conduct, the release of political prisoners, the confinement of Polisario troops and arrangements for the reduction of Moroccan troops in the Territory, in conformity with the settlement plan.²⁹ By the end of September, he would assess the progress achieved and make recommendations accordingly. In the meantime, he recommended the extension of the MINURSO mandate for a four-month period.

At its 3540th meeting, on 26 May 1995, the Security Council included in its agenda the report of the Secretary-General. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (France) drew the attention of the members of the Council to the text of a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.³⁰ The draft resolution was thereupon put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 995 (1995), which reads:

²⁷ S/PRST/1995/17.

²⁸ S/1995/404.

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolutions 621 (1988) of 20 September 1988, 658 (1990) of 27 June 1990, 690 (1991) of 29 April 1991, 725 (1991) of 31 December 1991, 809 (1993) of 2 March 1993, 907 (1994) of 29 March 1994 and 973 (1995) of 13 January 1995,

Recalling the statement by the President of the Security Council of 12 April 1995,

Taking note of the report of the Secretary-General of 19 May 1995,

1. Reiterates its commitment to holding, without further delay, a free, fair and impartial referendum for self-determination of the people of Western Sahara in accordance with the settlement plan, which has been accepted by the two parties;

2. Commends the progress in identifying potential voters since the beginning of the year;

3. Expresses concern, however, that certain practices identified in the report of the Secretary-General are hampering further progress towards the implementation of the settlement plan, and underlines the need for the parties to heed the Secretary-General's call upon them to work with the United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara in a spirit of genuine cooperation;

4. Decides, in this context, and with a view to accelerating the implementation of the settlement plan, to send a mission of the Security Council to the region;

5. Decides also, therefore, to extend at this stage the present mandate of the Mission until 30 June 1995;

6. Decides further to consider the further extension of the mandate of the Mission beyond 30 June 1995 in the light of the report of the Secretary-General of 19 May 1995 and the report of the Security Council mission referred to in paragraph 4 above;

7. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Decision of 30 May 1995: note by the President of the Security Council

On 30 May 1995, the President of the Security Council issued the following note:³¹

1. The President of the Security Council wishes to refer to resolution 995 (1995) adopted by the Security Council at its 3540th meeting, held on 26 May 1995, in connection with the situation concerning Western Sahara.

2. In paragraph 4 of the resolution, the Security Council decided, with a view to accelerating the implementation of the settlement plan, to send a mission of the Council to the region.

3. Following consultations, the members of the Council have agreed that the mission will depart from New York on 3 June 1995, for a duration of approximately six days, and that it will be composed of the following six members of the Council: Argentina, Botswana, France, Honduras, Oman and United States of America.

4. The members of the Council also agreed that the mission's terms of reference would be as follows:

(a) To impress upon the parties the necessity of cooperating fully with the United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara in the implementation of all aspects of the settlement plan and to underline the fact that any further delay would put the whole future of the Mission at risk;

(b) To assess progress and identify problems in the identification process, bearing in mind the deadline for the referendum of January 1996;

(c) To identify problems in other areas relevant to the fulfilment of the settlement plan (including the reduction of Moroccan troops, the confinement of troops of the Frente Popular para la Liberación de Saguía el-Hamra y de Río de Oro, the release of political prisoners and detainees, the exchange of prisoners of war and the return of refugees).

Decision of 30 June 1995 (3550th meeting): resolution 1002 (1995)

By a letter dated 20 June 1995 addressed to the President of the Council, the members of the Security Council mission to Western Sahara on 3 to 9 June 1995 transmitted their report to the Council.³² The mission had left on 3 June for Morocco, Algeria, Mauritania, Tindouf and Laayoune where it had held meetings with the parties and observers. The mission reported that in its discussion with the two parties, it had noted that there was continuing suspicion and lack of trust. As a result, in the course of identification, technical problems that could have been easily resolved had become politicized and blown out of proportion, with each party blaming the other for the lack of progress. While the mission tried to elicit their commitment to abandon their insistence on reciprocity in the number and operation of identification centres on each side, each party insisted that its performance be conditional on the performance of the other. The mission therefore felt that there was a real risk that the identification process might be extended beyond the time previously envisaged and the referendum might not be held in January 1996. It therefore strongly recommended that both parties abandon their insistence on reciprocity on each side and refrain from blaming their lack of cooperation on the other side. The mission also recommended expediting the review process of the identification case files, while ensuring their full confidentiality; and speeding up the compiling of preliminary voter eligibility lists. It urged that the highest possible number of identifications per day be permitted to take place. It called on the Government of Morocco to conduct preliminary vetting of the 100,000 applicants not then residing in the Territory and recommended commencing without delay the identification of applicants living in Mauritania.

The mission further recommended that the Security Council should receive biweekly progress reports on the identification operation and be informed immediately of any interruption or slow-down in the process.

In conclusion, noting that one of the main successes of MINURSO had been the establishment and maintenance of the ceasefire, the mission reported that it had been warned that in the event of the Mission's withdrawal, the risk of a return to some form of hostilities would increase.

At its 3550th meeting, on 30 June 1995, the Security Council included in its agenda the report of the Security Council mission to Western Sahara. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Germany) drew the attention of the members of the Council to the text of a draft resolution submitted by Argentina, Botswana, the Czech Republic, France, Germany, Honduras, Italy, the Russian Federation, the United Kingdom and the United States.³³ He also drew their attention to the letters from the representatives of Morocco and Honduras, respectively.³⁴ In his letter dated 29 June 1995, addressed to the President of the Security Council, the representative of Honduras requested that, on an exceptional basis, the letter contained in the annex, which had been transmitted to the members of the Council by the President on 23 June 1995, be issued as a document of the Council. In that letter, the President of the Saharan Arab Democratic Republic had informed the Council of the decision of the Frente Polisario to suspend its participation in the identification process and to withdraw its observers. The decision was taken in protest against the sentencing by a Moroccan military court, on 21 June 1995, of eight Saharan civilians to prison terms of 15 to 20 years for having participated in a demonstration in Laayoune on 11 May 1995 and against the announcement by Moroccan authorities to the Security Council mission of their intention to have 100,000 Moroccan settlers take part in the voter-identification operation.

In his letter dated 27 June 1995, addressed to the President of the Security Council, the representative of Morocco transmitted the copy of a letter of 26 June from the Prime Minister and Minister for Foreign Affairs and Cooperation of Morocco, addressed to the President of the Security Council, concerning Polisario's decision to suspend its participation in the identification operation. He stated, inter alia, that Morocco could not accept an indefinite postponement of the referendum and called upon the Council to "take all necessary steps to ensure the resumption of the process with a view to holding the referendum on schedule". He also informed the Council that Morocco had transmitted to MINURSO the diskette containing the names of applicants residing outside the Territory and that it was cooperating fully with the Mission to ensure their identification as quickly as possible.

The draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1002 (1995), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolutions 621 (1988) of 20 September 1988, 658 (1990) of 27 June 1990, 690 (1991) of 29 April 1991, 725 (1991) of 31 December 1991, 809 (1993) of 2 March 1993, 907 (1994) of 29 March 1994, 973 (1995) of 13 January 1995 and 995 (1995) of 26 May 1995,

Recalling the report of the Secretary-General of 19 May 1995, Welcoming the work of the mission of the Security Council undertaken from 3 to 9 June 1995 under the terms of reference set out in the note by the President of the Security Council of 30 May 1995,

³³ S/1995/523

Having considered the report of the mission of the Security Council of 21 June 1995,

Committed to reaching a just and lasting solution of the question of Western Sahara,

Concerned that the parties' continuing suspicion and lack of trust have contributed to delays in the implementation of the settlement plan,

Noting that, for progress to be achieved, the two parties must have a vision of the post-referendum period,

Taking note of the letter dated 23 June 1995 from the Secretary-General of the Frente Popular para la Liberación de Saguía el-Hamra y de Río de Oro to the President of the Security Council,

Taking note also of the letter dated 26 June 1995 from the Prime Minister and Minister for Foreign Affairs and Cooperation of the Kingdom of Morocco to the President of the Security Council,

Urging the parties to cooperate fully with the Secretary-General and the United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara to ensure prompt and full implementation of the settlement plan,

Noting that, in his report of 19 May 1995, the Secretary-General has outlined benchmarks for assessing progress on certain aspects of the settlement plan, including the code of conduct, the release of political prisoners, the confinement of troops of the Frente Popular para la Liberación de Saguía el-Hamra y de Río de Oro and arrangements for the reduction of Moroccan troops in the territory in conformity with the settlement plan,

Noting also that the mission of the Council has provided recommendations for moving forward on the identification process and other aspects of the settlement plan, and stressing the need for the identification process to be carried out in accordance with the relevant provisions set out in the plan, in particular in paragraphs 72 and 73 thereof, as well as in the relevant resolutions of the Council,

1. Welcomes the report of the Secretary-General of 19 May 1995 on the situation concerning Western Sahara and the report of 21 June 1995 of the mission of the Security Council to Western Sahara;

2. Reiterates its commitment to holding, without further delay, a free, fair and impartial referendum for self-determination of the people of Western Sahara in accordance with the settlement plan which has been accepted by the two parties referred to above;

3. Expresses its concern that, given the complexity of the tasks to be performed and the continuing interruptions caused by the two parties, implementation of the settlement plan has been further delayed;

4. Calls upon the two parties to work with the Secretary-General and the United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara in a spirit of genuine cooperation to implement the settlement plan in accordance with the relevant Council resolutions;

5. Stresses the need for the parties to refrain from any actions that hinder the implementation of the settlement plan, calls upon them to reconsider recent relevant decisions with a view to establishing confidence, and, in this regard, requests the Secretary-General to make every effort to persuade the two parties to resume their participation in the implementation of the settlement plan;

6. Endorses the Secretary-General's benchmarks described in paragraph 38 of his report of 19 May 1995;

7. Endorses also the recommendations of the mission of the Council, in paragraphs 41 to 53 of its report of 21 June 1995, concerning the identification process and other aspects of the settlement plan;

8. Requests the Secretary-General to report by 10 September 1995 on the progress achieved in accordance with paragraphs 5 and 6 above;

9. Expects to be able, on the basis of the report requested in paragraph 8 above, to confirm 15 November 1995 as the start of the transitional period, to allow the referendum to take place early in 1996;

10. Decides to extend the mandate of the Mission until 30 September 1995 as recommended by the Secretary-General in his report of 19 May 1995;

11. Decides also to consider the possible extension of the mandate of the Mission after 30 September 1995 on the basis of the report of the Secretary-General requested in paragraph 8 above and in the light of progress achieved in accordance with paragraphs 5 and 6 above towards the holding of the referendum and the implementation of the settlement plan;

12. Requests the Secretary-General, in addition to the reports called for in paragraph 48 of the report of the Security Council mission, to keep the Council fully informed of further developments in the implementation of the settlement plan during this period, in particular of any significant delays in the pace of the identification process or other developments that would call into question the Secretary-General's ability to set the start of the transitional period on 15 November 1995;

13. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Decision of 22 September 1995 (3582nd meeting): resolution 1017 (1995)

On 8 September 1995, pursuant to resolution 1002 (1995) of 30 June 1995, the Secretary-General

submitted a report to the Security Council on the situation concerning Western Sahara.³⁵

The Secretary-General reported that the identification operation had recommenced in late July, after the details concerning its resumption had been clarified. A total of over 53,000 persons had been identified since the process began, representing over 40 per cent of persons residing in the Territory and over 51 per cent of those living in the refugee camps near Tindouf. The core problem in the identification process continued to relate to certain tribal groupings. In that regard, there were major differences of perception between both parties. Despite calls to abandon insistence on strict reciprocity, the principle of reciprocity continued to be applied when problems arose with regard to contentious issues on the opposite side, thus interrupting the progress also at another centre.

The Secretary-General noted that progress in the past three months had been disappointing. The benchmarks that he had proposed had largely not yet been achieved both parties had maintained their respective positions concerning the confinement of the Frente Polisario troops, and they had both objected to the terms of the proposed code of conduct. Despite repeated calls on the parties by the Security Council and by himself to permit the process to advance more rapidly, both sides were reluctant to compromise on any issue which they believed could weaken their own position.

The Secretary-General pointed out that although the Council had already warned that the process could not continue indefinitely, premature withdrawal of MINURSO would have very grave and far-reaching implications for the parties and for the whole subregion, and therefore had to be avoided, if possible. He therefore recommended that the mandate of MINURSO be extended until 31 January 1996, but added that, should the conditions necessary for the start of the transitional period not be in place by that date, he would present the Council with alternative options, including the possibility of withdrawal.

At its 3582nd meeting, on 22 September 1995, the Security Council included in its agenda the report of the Secretary-General. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Italy) drew the attention of the members of the Council to the text of a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.³⁶

The draft resolution was thereupon put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1017 (1995), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolutions 621 (1988) of 20 September 1988, 658 (1990) of 27 June 1990, 690 (1991) of 29 April 1991, 725 (1991) of 31 December 1991, 809 (1993) of 2 March 1993, 907 (1994) of 29 March 1994, 973 (1995) of 13 January 1995, 995 (1995) of 26 May 1995 and 1002 (1995) of 30 June 1995,

Reaffirming in particular its resolutions 725 (1991) and 907 (1994) relating to the criteria for voter eligibility and the compromise proposal of the Secretary-General on their interpretation,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 8 September 1995, and noting further the fact that only two out of the eight identification centres are currently functioning,

Committed to reaching a just and lasting solution to the question of Western Sahara,

Reiterating the fact that, for progress to be achieved, the two parties must have a vision of the post-referendum period,

Expressing the hope for a rapid resolution of the problems causing delays in the completion of the identification process,

Expressing its regret that the outcome of the preliminary vetting by the Government of Morocco of the 100,000 applicants not residing in the territory is contributing to the inability of the United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara to maintain its timetable for completing the identification process,

Expressing its regret also that the Frente Popular para la Liberación de Saguía el-Hamra y de Río de Oro is refusing to participate in the identification, even within the territory, of three groups within the disputed tribal groupings, thus delaying completion of the identification process,

Taking note of paragraph 49 of the report of the Secretary-General of 8 September 1995,

Stressing the need for progress to be made on all other aspects of the settlement plan,

Reaffirming its endorsement in its resolution 1002 (1995) of the recommendations of the mission of the Security Council concerning the identification process and other aspects of the settlement plan as described in paragraphs 41 to 53 of the report of the mission of 21 June 1995,

1. Reiterates its commitment to the holding, without further delay, of a free, fair and impartial referendum for self-determination of the people of Western Sahara in accordance with the settlement plan, which has been accepted by the two parties referred to above;

2. Expresses its disappointment that, since the adoption of resolution 1002 (1995), the parties have made insufficient progress towards the fulfilment of the settlement plan, including the identification process, the code of conduct, the release of political prisoners, the confinement of troops of the Frente Popular para la Liberación de Saguía el-Hamra y de Río de Oro and the arrangements for the reduction of Moroccan troops in the territory;

3. Calls upon the two parties to work henceforth with the Secretary-General and the United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara in a spirit of genuine cooperation to implement the settlement plan in accordance with the relevant resolutions, to abandon their insistence on strict reciprocity in the operation of the identification centres and to cease all other procrastinating actions which could further delay the holding of the referendum;

4. Requests the Secretary-General, in close consultation with the parties, to produce specific and detailed proposals to resolve the problems hindering the completion of the identification process in the framework of the relevant Security Council resolutions, in particular resolution 907 (1994) relating to the compromise proposal of the Secretary-General and resolution 1002 (1995) relating to the recommendations of the Security Council mission, and to report on the outcome of his efforts in this regard by 15 November 1995;

5. Decides to review the arrangements for the completion of the identification process on the basis of the report requested in paragraph 4 above and to consider at that time any further measures which might need to be taken to ensure the prompt completion of that process and of all the other aspects relevant to the fulfilment of the settlement plan;

6. Decides to extend the mandate of the Mission until 31 January 1996 as recommended by the Secretary-General in his report of 8 September 1995, and takes note of his intention, if, before then, he considers that the conditions necessary for the start of the transitional period are not in place, to present the Security Council with alternative options for consideration, including the possibility of the withdrawal of the Mission;

7. Requests the Secretary-General to report by 15 January 1996 on progress achieved towards the implementation of the settlement plan and to state in that report whether or not the transitional period will be able to begin by 31 May 1996;

8. Stresses the need to accelerate the implementation of the settlement plan, and urges the Secretary-General to examine ways of reducing the operational costs of the Mission;

9. Stresses also that the existing mechanism for the financing of the Mission remains unchanged, supports the invitation to Member States, by the General Assembly in its resolution 49/247 of 7 August 1995, to make voluntary contributions to the Mission, and requests the Secretary-General, without prejudice to existing procedures, to consider the establishment of a trust fund to receive such voluntary contributions for certain specific purposes to be designated by the Secretary-General;

10. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Decision of 6 November 1995: letter from the President to the Secretary-General

In a letter dated 27 October 1995 addressed to the President of the Security Council, the Secretary-General informed the Council of decisions taken to accelerate the identification process.³⁷ Until that point, procedures had required that identification take place only in the presence of a representative from both parties, a sheikh nominated by each party, and an OAU observer. In many cases identification had been suspended, or had not started, due to the absence of one or more of those persons. The decisions described in the letter were intended to simplify certain aspects of the identification procedures.

In a letter dated 6 November 1995,³⁸ the President of the Security Council informed the Secretary-General that the members of the Council fully supported his efforts to accelerate the identification process and implement the settlement plan. They also requested him to continue his contacts with the parties and to report to the Council by 15 November. The members of the Council urged both parties to cooperate fully with MINURSO in order to overcome the identification delays.

Decision of 19 December 1995 (3610th meeting): resolution 1033 (1995)

On 24 November 1995, pursuant to resolution 1017 (1995) of 22 September 1995, the Secretary-General submitted a report to the Security Council on the situation concerning Western Sahara.³⁹

The Secretary-General recalled that the basic obstacle to continuing and completing the identification process related to certain tribal groups and to persons not residing in the Territory, in whose identification the Frente Polisario did not agree to participate. The operation had also been hindered by the inability or unwillingness of the parties to make a sheikh or alternate available at a given time and place. As a result, identification had been slow and had virtually come to a halt in the last few weeks. To overcome the difficulty, the Secretary-General had made some proposals to which the parties objected. Under his proposal, in cases when no sheikh or alternate was available on both sides, identification would be based on documentary evidence. Morocco wanted to limit the role of documentary evidence and give privilege to that of oral testimony. The Frente Polisario, on the other hand, considered that the new approach would allow for the introduction of applicants who had no ties with Western Sahara. The Secretary-General had, however, concluded that the new approach was the only way the process could be carried forward. Should it fail to proceed with the necessary speed, it was his intention to present the Council with alternative options, including the possibility of the withdrawal of MINURSO.

At its 3610th meeting, on 19 December 1995, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Russian Federation) drew the attention of the members of the Council to the text of a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.⁴⁰ He also drew their attention to two other documents.⁴¹

The draft resolution was thereupon put to the vote and was adopted unanimously as resolution 1033 (1995), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming all its previous resolutions on the question of Western Sahara,

Recalling the letter of the Secretary-General of 27 October 1995 and the reply of the President of the Security Council of 6 November 1995,

⁴¹ Letter dated 28 November 1995 from the representatives of Argentina and the United States (S/1995/989) and letter dated 6 December 1995 from the representative of Algeria (S/1995/1011), both addressed to the President of the Security Council.

Recalling the reports of the Secretary-General of 18 June 1990, 19 April 1991, 19 December 1991 and 28 July 1993,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 24 November 1995,

Noting the response of the Government of Morocco to the proposal of the Secretary-General described in paragraph 10 of his report,

Noting also the response of the Frente Popular para la Liberación de Saguía el-Hamra y de Río de Oro to the proposal of the Secretary-General, described in paragraph 11 of his report,

Noting further other communications received by the Council on this subject,

Stressing that the Identification Commission will be able to carry out its work only if both parties place their trust in its judgement and integrity,

Stressing also the need for progress to be made on all other aspects of the settlement plan,

Committed to reaching a just and lasting solution to the question of Western Sahara,

Reiterating the fact that, for progress to be achieved, the two parties must have a vision of the post-referendum period,

1. Reiterates its commitment to the holding, without further delay, of a free, fair and impartial referendum for self-determination of the people of Western Sahara in accordance with the settlement plan, which has been accepted by the two parties mentioned above;

2. Welcomes the report of the Secretary-General of 24 November 1995 as a useful framework for his ongoing efforts aimed at accelerating and completing the identification process;

3. Welcomes also the decision of the Secretary-General to intensify his consultations with the two parties in order to obtain their agreement to a plan to resolve differences hindering the timely completion of the identification process;

4. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the Council on the results of those consultations on an urgent basis and, in the event those consultations fail to reach agreement, to provide the Council with options for its consideration, including a programme for the orderly withdrawal of the United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara;

5. Calls upon the two parties to work with the Secretary-General and the Mission in a spirit of genuine cooperation to implement all the other aspects of the settlement plan, in accordance with the relevant resolutions;

6. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

4. The situation in Liberia

Decision of 26 March 1993 (3187th meeting): resolution 813 (1993)

On 12 March 1993, pursuant to resolution 788 (1992), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the question of Liberia.¹ The report included an update on events in Liberia and a summary of the activities and findings of the Special Representative for Liberia, who had visited the region from 29 November to 22 December 1992 and from 10 January to 2 February 1993.

The report traced the origins of the three-year civil war in Liberia to the breakdown of law and order and civil authority which had accompanied the overthrow in 1990 of the regime headed by President Samuel Doe. The de facto division of the country, as a result of the civil war, into two administrations, with separate economic zones and two different domestic currencies with widely varying rates of exchange, had further aggravated an already difficult situation. At the time of the report, the country remained partitioned, with the Interim Government of National Unity administering Monrovia and its environs, the National Patriotic Front of Liberia (NPFL) in control of 10 counties, and the United Liberation Movement of Liberia for Democracy (ULIMO) in control of two counties. War-related casualties among civilians and armed combatants were estimated to be as high as 150,000, with the overwhelming majority being civilians. The number of Liberian refugees located in neighbouring countries was estimated to be 600,000 to 700,000.

The Secretary-General reported that the discussions held by his Special Representative with the parties concerned, including the Executive Secretary and States members of the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS), had indicated that there was a general consensus that the United Nations should assume a larger role in the search for peace in Liberia. One proposal, which had the support of all the parties as well as ECOWAS, was that the Secretary-General should convene a meeting of the President of the Interim Government and the warring factions, at which they would conclude and sign an agreement reaffirming their commitment to implement the Yamoussoukro IV Accord. The Secretary-General stated in that regard that, while he was ready to extend whatever assistance he could, it would be more appropriate if ECOWAS were to consider the situation in Liberia, preferably at summit level, to bring about the desired reconfirmation of the commitment of the parties to the Yamoussoukro IV Accord. He had asked his Special Representative to return to the region to discuss the proposed meeting with ECOWAS and with others concerned. Liberia represented a good example of systematic cooperation between the United Nations and a regional organization, as envisaged in Chapter VIII of the Charter. ECOWAS had been involved diplomatically and militarily since the beginning of the conflict, while the Security Council had supported its initiatives and endeavours. The Secretary-General expressed the belief that it would be the wish of the Council to continue to expand, as appropriate, the cooperative relationship between the United Nations and the concerned regional body. If requested, he would be willing to send a few experts who would extend technical assistance to ECOWAS in monitoring the economic sanctions.² He also suggested that the Council might consider enlarging the scope of mandatory sanctions under Chapter VII of the Charter.

At its 3187th meeting, on 26 March 1993, the Security Council included in its agenda the report of the Secretary-General on the question of Liberia. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representative of Liberia to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (New Zealand) then drew the attention of the Council members to the text of a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations,³ and read out a revision that had been made to the draft.⁴

Speaking before the vote, the representative of Cape Verde stated that, taking into account the level of mistrust among the various parties, his delegation was of the view that ways and means had to be sought to promote the necessary confidence among the parties to the conflict and to bring them back to the negotiating table. In particular, he felt that the time had come for a meaningful involvement by the United Nations, in close cooperation with ECOWAS, in restoring peace and stability in Liberia. In that regard, the draft resolution addressed the possibility of sending United Nations observers to Liberia in the context of a cessation of hostilities, which would be followed by the immediate encampment, disarmament and demobilization of the parties to the conflict. His delegation also supported the provision of the draft resolution requesting the Secretary-General to consider the possibility of convening a meeting of the President of the Interim Government of National Unity and the warring factions, within the framework of the Yamoussoukro IV Accord. Such a meeting would help to create an environment that would favour a renewed commitment by the parties to the conflict to the implementation of the Yamoussoukro Accords, in particular of its provisions concerning encampment and disarmament of their forces.⁵

The draft resolution, as orally revised in its provisional form, was then put to the vote and was adopted unanimously as resolution 813 (1993), which reads:

The Security Council,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 12 March 1993,

Recalling its resolution 788 (1992) of 19 November 1992,

Also recalling the statements by the President of the Council on its behalf on 22 January 1991 and 7 May 1992,

Reaffirming its belief that the Yamoussoukro IV Accord of 30 October 1991 offers the best possible framework for a peaceful resolution of the Liberian conflict by creating the necessary climate and conditions for free and fair elections in Liberia,

Deploring that parties to the conflict in Liberia have not respected or implemented the various accords to date, especially the Yamoussoukro IV Accord,

Noting that the continuing breach of earlier accords hinders the creation of a climate and conditions conducive to the holding of free and fair elections in accordance with the Yamoussoukro IV Accord,

Recognizing the need for increased humanitarian assistance,

Welcoming the continued commitment of the Economic Community of West African States to and the efforts towards a peaceful resolution of the Liberian conflict,

Also welcoming the endorsement and support by the Organization of African Unity of these efforts,

Recalling the provisions of Chapter VIII of the Charter of the United Nations,

Determining that the deterioration of the situation in Liberia constitutes a threat to international peace and security, particularly in this region of West Africa,

1. Approves the report of the Secretary-General;
2. Commends the Economic Community of West African States for its efforts to restore peace, security and stability in Liberia;
3. Commends the Organization of African Unity for its efforts in support of the peace process in Liberia;
4. Reaffirms its belief that the Yamoussoukro IV Accord of 30 October 1991 offers the best possible framework for a peaceful resolution of the Liberian conflict by creating the necessary conditions for free and fair elections in Liberia, and encourages the Economic Community of West African States to continue its efforts to assist in the peaceful implementation of that Accord;
5. Condemns the violation by any party to the conflict of the ceasefire established on 28 November 1990;
6. Also condemns the continuing armed attacks against the peacekeeping forces of the Economic Community of West African States in Liberia by one of the parties to the conflict;
7. Reiterates its call upon all parties to respect and implement the ceasefire and the various accords of the peace process, including the Yamoussoukro IV Accord and the final communiqué of the informal consultative group meeting of the Economic Community of West African States Committee of Five on Liberia, issued at Geneva on 7 April 1992, to which they themselves have agreed;
8. Welcomes the appointment by the Secretary-General of Mr. Trevor Gordon-Somers as his Special Representative for Liberia;
9. Calls upon all States strictly to abide by and comply with the general and complete embargo on all deliveries of weapons and military equipment to Liberia imposed by the Security Council in its resolution 788 (1992) under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations;
10. Demands that all parties fully cooperate with the Secretary-General and the Economic Community of West African States with a view to ensuring the full and prompt implementation of the Yamoussoukro IV Accord;

⁵ Ibid., pp. 3-7.

11. Declares its readiness to consider appropriate measures in support of the Economic Community of West African States if any party is unwilling to cooperate in implementation of the provisions of the Yamoussoukro accords, in particular the encampment and disarmament provisions;

12. Reiterates its call on Member States to exercise self-restraint in their relations with all parties to the Liberian conflict, in particular to refrain from providing any military assistance to any of the parties and also to refrain from taking any action that would be inimical to the peace process;

13. Reaffirms that the embargo imposed by resolution 788 (1992) shall not apply to weapons, military equipment and military assistance destined for the sole use of the peacekeeping forces of the Economic Community of West African States in Liberia;

14. Commends the efforts of Member States, the United Nations system and humanitarian organizations in providing humanitarian assistance to the victims of the conflict in Liberia, and in this regard reaffirms its support for increased humanitarian assistance;

15. Demands that the parties concerned refrain from any action that will impede or obstruct the delivery of humanitarian assistance and calls upon them to ensure the safety of all personnel involved in international humanitarian assistance;

16. Reiterates its call upon all parties to the conflict and all others concerned to respect strictly the provisions of international humanitarian law;

17. Requests the Secretary-General, in consultation with the Economic Community of West African States, to consider the possibility of convening a meeting of the President of the Interim Government of National Unity of Liberia and the warring factions, after thorough and detailed groundwork, to restate their commitment to the implementation of the Yamoussoukro IV Accord within an agreed timetable;

18. Also requests the Secretary-General to discuss with the Economic Community of West African States and the parties concerned the contribution which the United Nations could make in support of the implementation of the Yamoussoukro IV Accord, including the deployment of United Nations observers;

19. Further requests the Secretary-General to submit a report to the Security Council on the implementation of the present resolution as soon as possible;

20. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of Brazil expressed the firm belief of his delegation in the desirability and usefulness of maintaining a close dialogue and cooperation between the United Nations and appropriate regional organizations in the settlement of disputes, in accordance with Chapter VIII of the Charter. Brazil supported the idea of strengthening the cooperative relationship established between the United Nations and ECOWAS, with a view to assisting that regional body in its endeavours with regard to Liberia, as put forward by the Secretary-General in his report, while stressing that the ultimate responsibility rested with the Liberian people themselves.⁶

The representative of the United States stated that the resolution just adopted further strengthened the relationship between the United Nations and ECOWAS, which had taken the laudable initiative to address a regional conflict. As the United Nations strove to meet the demands placed upon it by a contentious world in a time of shrinking resources, such cooperation would be vital and there would be an increasing need to look to regional actors for guidance and support. If the ECOWAS initiative in Liberia were to fail, the ultimate cost to the region and to the international community would be great. The continued application of sanctions could help bring about a cessation of hostilities, and the Secretary-General's offer, to provide technical assistance to the ECOWAS Ceasefire Monitoring Group (ECOMOG) in monitoring sanctions, should be accepted. The United Nations could serve as a valuable catalyst to help the ECOWAS peacekeeping effort succeed. The suggestion in the Secretary-General's report for a limited number of United Nations observers to take up positions alongside ECOMOG merited serious consideration. Such observers could provide an important guarantee that the disarmament process would be conducted fairly and in a manner that offered advantage to none of the warring factions. They would also provide assurance that the political process leading to free and fair elections would take place in strict accordance with international norms.⁷

The representative of Liberia described as "practical and prudent" the Secretary-General's observations that the United Nations should continue to play a role supportive of the efforts of ECOWAS. He contended that United Nations support for the subregional initiative would enable all Liberians, working with ECOWAS, to restore peace, security and stability to their country. He also pledged the continuing support of the Interim Government for, and full cooperation with, ECOWAS and the United Nations in their manifold endeavours to assist the people of Liberia.⁸

Decision of 9 June 1993 (3233rd meeting):
statement by the President

At its 3233rd meeting, on 9 June 1993, the Security Council resumed its consideration of the situation in Liberia. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Spain) stated that, following consultations among members of the Security Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁹

The Security Council is shocked and saddened by the senseless killing of innocent civilians which occurred near Harbel, Liberia, on the morning of 6 June 1993. It strongly condemns this massacre of innocent displaced persons, including women and children, which comes at a time when the Special Representative of the Secretary-General, Mr. Trevor Gordon-Somers, is working diligently, in furtherance of the efforts of the Economic Community of West African States, on the basis of the Yamoussoukro IV Accord, to arrange a meeting of the warring factions in order to bring the three-year civil war to a peaceful end.

The Council urges all parties to the conflict to respect the rights of the civilian population and take all necessary measures to secure their safety.

The Council requests the Secretary-General to commence immediately a thorough and full investigation of the massacre, including any allegations as to the perpetrators, whoever they may be, and to report to it as soon as possible. It warns that those found responsible for such serious violations of international humanitarian law will be held accountable for such crimes and demands that the leaders of any faction responsible for such acts effectively control their forces and take decisive steps to ensure that such deplorable tragedies do not happen again.

The Council remains firmly supportive of the efforts of the Economic Community of West African States and the Secretary-General to bring peace to Liberia. It urges all Liberian factions and regional leaders to give their full cooperation to current efforts by the Special Representative of the Secretary-General to assist in the implementation of the Yamoussoukro IV Accord calling, inter alia, for a ceasefire, the encampment of forces, disarmament and democratic elections.

Decision of 10 August 1993 (3263rd meeting):
resolution 856 (1993)

On 2 August 1993, pursuant to resolution 813 (1993), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a further report on Liberia.¹⁰ The Secretary-General described the negotiations that had led to the

Cotonou Agreement of 25 July 1993 and outlined the proposed role of the United Nations in the implementation of that Agreement.¹¹

The Secretary-General noted that the two most difficult issues in the negotiations had been the composition and structure of the transitional government and the procedures for the encampment, disarmament and demobilization of ex-combatants during the transition. The Cotonou Agreement itself provided that a ceasefire and the cessation of hostilities would take effect seven days from the date on which it was signed, that is on 1 August 1993. The Agreement also provided that ECOMOG would supervise and carry out the implementation of the Agreement, while the United Nations would undertake monitoring and verification. In order to ensure against any violation of the ceasefire between 1 August and the arrival of the additional ECOMOG troops and the main body of United Nations observers, the parties had agreed to establish a Joint Ceasefire Monitoring Committee, comprising representatives of the three Liberian parties, ECOMOG and the United Nations. The United Nations had also undertaken to consider dispatching 30 military observers to Liberia to participate in the work of the Joint Ceasefire Monitoring Committee.

On the political side, the parties had agreed that there should be a single Liberian National Transitional Government and that general and presidential elections would take place within seven months from the signing of the Agreement. The United Nations was ready to assist a reconstituted Electoral Commission in the organization and conduct of free and fair elections. On the humanitarian side, the Cotonou Agreement requested that all efforts be made to deliver humanitarian assistance throughout Liberia, using the most direct routes and with inspection to ensure compliance with the sanctions and embargo provisions of the Agreement. The United Nations, and in particular the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, was requested to carry out all necessary planning and mobilization to facilitate the speedy return of refugees and their reintegration into their communities.

The Secretary-General noted that the future role of the United Nations, while continuing to be supportive, would be crucial to the effective implementation of the Liberian Peace Agreement. It was his intention to commence planning for the dispatch to Liberia of the advance team of 30 United Nations military observers and to send a technical team to Liberia to draw up plans for the establishment of a United Nations observer mission. ECOWAS had also requested that the United Nations establish a trust fund to enable African countries to send reinforcements to ECOMOG and to provide assistance to countries already participating in ECOMOG. The rapid expansion of humanitarian assistance activities throughout Liberia would also be essential in establishing conditions conducive to the successful implementation of the Cotonou Peace Agreement. A consolidated inter agency appeal would soon be issued, outlining the estimated requirements for Liberia. The Secretary-General expressed the hope that the international community would respond promptly and generously to the needs identified.

At its 3263rd meeting, on 10 August 1993, the Security Council included in its agenda the further report of the Secretary-General of 4 August 1993 on the question of Liberia. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representatives of Benin, Egypt, Liberia and Nigeria to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (United States) drew the attention of the Council members to the text of a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.¹² She also drew the attention of the Council members to a letter dated 4 August 1993 from the Secretary-General addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹³ in which the Secretary-General reported that he had appointed a Panel of Inquiry to undertake a comprehensive investigation into the massacre of civilians that had occurred near Harbel, Liberia, on 6 June 1993, and to a letter dated 6 August 1993 from the Chargé d'affaires a.i. of Benin addressed to the Secretary-General,¹⁴ transmitting the text of the Cotonou Agreement.

The representative of Liberia informed the Council that, since the signing of the Cotonou Agreement, all of the parties were acting in a most constructive manner. The guns were silent and the ceasefire fully observed. There was cause for optimism. He stated that the adoption of the draft resolution would prove a significant milestone on the road to peace. The establishment of a United Nations Observer Mission in Liberia, as envisaged by the Peace Agreement, would constitute an important confidence-building measure in the effort to end the war. The speaker observed that a crucial concern was whether the United Nations would find it possible to help Liberians to have the Transitional Government installed within the following 30 days, concomitant, as required by the Agreement, with the beginning of a process of comprehensive disarmament of combatants. He referred to the ECOWAS request for funds to enable reinforcement of ECOMOG and stated that additional troops, together with United Nations observers, were urgently needed for the commencement of the disarmament process. He appealed to the Council to give timely consideration to the request from ECOWAS, so that those countries that were willing to commit their troops could secure the funding necessary to facilitate their deployment.¹⁵

The representative of Benin stressed that the role of the United Nations had been decisive in introducing a climate of confidence between the parties, without which there would have been no Cotonou Agreement. The Agreement opened the way to implementing the various important provisions of the Yamoussoukro IV Peace Accord, namely: respect for the ceasefire; the regrouping, disarming and demobilization of troops; and the holding of general and presidential elections. The implementation of the Agreement would encourage the expediting and distribution of humanitarian assistance to the Liberian population, and the return of the displaced peoples, in order to strengthen the social bases for political settlement. He welcomed the provisions in the draft resolution relating to the creation of the United Nations Observer Mission in Liberia and the involvement of the United Nations in monitoring the ceasefire. On behalf of the President of ECOWAS, he assured the Council that ECOWAS would cooperate fully with the United Nations in the fulfilment of its mission in Liberia. The civil war in Liberia had hampered the integration programme — especially economic — of ECOWAS. The restoration of peace, security and stability in Liberia was one of its priorities.¹⁶

Speaking before the vote, the representative of Djibouti expressed the support of his delegation for the dispatch team of 30 military observers called for in the draft resolution, noting that it signalled the inception of formal United Nations involvement in the resolution of the Liberian conflict. The presence of the United Nations in Liberia would serve to give all the parties the assurance of the interest of the international community in the conflict and its willingness to become involved in seeking a fair and equitable resolution. The Cotonou Agreement was framed as a cooperative exercise by ECOWAS, ECOMOG and the United Nations, mirroring the complementary role each had played until then under the lead of ECOWAS. It would serve as a “shining example” of the regional and international division of labour in the maintenance of international peace and security.¹⁷

The representative of Morocco described the conclusion of the Cotonou Agreement as a good example of sound cooperation between the United Nations and regional organizations, as advocated in Chapter VIII of the Charter of the Organization. He also expressed support for the Secretary-General’s decision to create a special trust fund for Liberia to furnish assistance to countries of the subregion that had made sacrifices, as well as to other African countries that might be able to supply reinforcements to ECOMOG.¹⁸

The representative of China described the Cotonou Agreement as a major contribution to the restoration of peace and stability in Liberia and in the subregion of western Africa. The achievement of a genuine and lasting peace in Liberia depended, however, on the parties to the conflict cooperating with the United Nations and ECOWAS, adopting practical and effective measures to fulfil their commitments and strictly observing the Agreement and relevant Security Council resolutions. That would ensure a successful general election, thereby creating conditions for an early national reconciliation. He also expressed the hope that the Secretary-General would send the advance group of 30 military observers as soon as possible in order to facilitate the efforts of ECOWAS to achieve a political settlement.¹⁹

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and was adopted unanimously as resolution 856 (1993), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolution 813 (1993) of 26 March 1993,

Welcoming the signing under the auspices of the Economic Community of West African States, on 25 July 1993, at Cotonou, Benin, of a Peace Agreement between the Interim Government of National Unity of Liberia, the National Patriotic Front of Liberia and the United Liberation Movement of Liberia for Democracy,

Considering that the signing of the Peace Agreement constitutes a major achievement and an important contribution to the restoration of peace and security in Liberia and in this region of West Africa, and creates the opportunity to bring an end to the conflict,

Taking note of the further report of the Secretary-General of 2 August 1993,

1. Welcomes the decision of the Secretary-General to send a technical team to Liberia to gather and evaluate information relevant to the proposed establishment of a United Nations Observer Mission in Liberia;

2. Approves the dispatch to Liberia as soon as possible of an advance team of thirty military observers to participate in the work of the Joint Ceasefire Monitoring Committee, including in particular to monitor, investigate and report ceasefire violations in conjunction with the said Committee, the mandate of said team to expire within three months;

3. Looks forward to the report of the Secretary-General on the proposed establishment of the United Nations Observer Mission in Liberia, including in particular a detailed estimate of the cost and scope of this operation, a time frame for its implementation, the projected conclusion of this operation, how to ensure coordination between the Mission and the peacekeeping forces of the Economic Community of West African States and their respective roles and responsibilities;

4. Calls upon all parties to the conflict to respect and implement the ceasefire provided for in the Peace Agreement signed at Cotonou on 25 July 1993 and to cooperate fully with the advance mission and ensure the safety of all United Nations personnel and all other peacekeeping and humanitarian personnel within Liberia;

5. Urges the conclusion at the earliest possible stage of a status of mission agreement;

6. Commends the Economic Community of West African States for its efforts to restore peace, security and stability in Liberia;

7. Commends also the Organization of African Unity for its efforts in support of the peace process in Liberia;

8. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of the United Kingdom described the Cotonou Agreement as an excellent example of cooperation between the United Nations, the Organization of African Unity (OAU) and ECOWAS. It was vital, however, that the ceasefire should hold, and his delegation supported the dispatch of an advance group of 30 military observers for the Ceasefire Committee. In order for the process to move further forward and proceed to elections and a new government, ECOMOG would have a crucial role in maintaining internal security. The United Kingdom strongly supported the efforts that had been made by ECOMOG in difficult circumstances. The proposals that had been put forward at Cotonou, to widen the circle of contributors and to supplement ECOMOG with United Nations observers, represented a valuable opportunity to build confidence.²⁰

The representative of France welcomed the fact that it was one of the first times that the United Nations, in the spirit of Chapter VIII of the Charter, had undertaken a peacekeeping operation in cooperation with a regional organization. His Government would watch carefully the way in which the operation was conducted, and, in particular, the coordination between the United Nations Observer Mission in Liberia and the ECOWAS forces contributing to the operation. For that first experiment it was important that the competences and prerogatives of the two organizations were strictly respected, with it being understood that the United Nations must maintain its “precedence”. That clearly defined sharing of responsibilities should also apply to the area of funding, where confusion should be avoided. United Nations activities should be funded through mandatory contributions, whereas ECOMOG activities should be financed through the special trust fund, contributions to which would be voluntary.²¹

The representative of the Russian Federation stated that his delegation had consistently advocated a solution to the Liberian problem on a regional basis. It was therefore significant that the Cotonou Agreement had been achieved under the aegis of a regional organization, ECOWAS. A positive precedent had thus been established for seeking ways to solve military conflicts and crises on the African continent, within the framework of African efforts. The Russian Federation had voted in favour of the resolution just adopted as it was aimed at promoting a settlement to the conflict and at effectively ensuring compliance by the parties with the conditions for a ceasefire. His delegation was prepared to support the activities of African States aimed at finding ways to settle military conflicts and crisis situations on the continent within the context of regional efforts.²²

The President, speaking in her capacity as the representative of the United States, stated that her Government welcomed the Council’s decision to dispatch an advance team of monitors to Liberia to participate in the monitoring of the ceasefire. It noted that the ceasefire had taken effect on 1 August, and she accordingly urged that the advance team be sent as quickly as possible to reinforce the ceasefire and increase the confidence of the Liberian parties in the international monitoring effort. The speaker referred to the deteriorating humanitarian situation in the interior of the country and urged the United Nations to find on an urgent basis some mechanism to allow cross-border relief shipments from Côte d’Ivoire and Guinea to resume, until such time as the full observer contingent referred to in the Agreement might arrive. As the prospective United Nations mission would work closely with peacekeeping forces of ECOMOG, the United States noted that the ECOWAS States would require outside assistance to deploy additional peacekeeping forces. The United States encouraged the Secretary-General to consider setting up a trust fund to facilitate the collection of international contributions to the ECOWAS/ECOMOG peacekeeping effort. She also stated that while the support for the United Nations and the international community was crucial for implementing the Agreement, only the Liberian parties themselves could make it work and effect a transition to democracy.²³

Decision of 27 August 1993: letter from the President to the Secretary-General

By a letter dated 27 August 1993,²⁴ the President informed the Secretary-General that the Council would support the establishment by the United Nations of a voluntary trust fund for Liberia to finance the implementation of the Agreement, including the deployment of ECOWAS peacekeeping troops, demobilization of combatants, elections and humanitarian assistance, as called for by ECOWAS at its summit meeting held in Cotonou from 22 to 24 July 1993.

Decision of 22 September 1993 (3281st meeting):
resolution 866 (1993)

On 9 and 17 September 1993, pursuant to resolution 856 (1993), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on Liberia in which he outlined a plan for the establishment and deployment of the proposed United Nations Observer Mission in Liberia (UNOMIL).²⁵

The Secretary-General informed the Council that the planning mission dispatched to Liberia to gather data relevant to the proposed establishment of UNOMIL, had visited the country from 6 to 13 August 1993. The mission had met with the three parties to the Cotonou Agreement and had reported their strong commitment to its implementation. As UNOMIL would be the first instance where the United Nations would undertake a major peacekeeping operation in cooperation with another organization, the planning mission had paid attention in its discussions to the respective roles of, and relationship between, UNOMIL and ECOMOG in implementing the Agreement. Since the foreseen role of UNOMIL would be to monitor and verify the implementation of the Agreement, its concept of operation must be parallel to that of ECOMOG. UNOMIL and ECOMOG were to have separate chains of command. UNOMIL would be under the command of the United Nations, vested in the Secretary-General under the authority of the Security Council, and ECOMOG would operate under the auspices of ECOWAS. The missions were to consult on decisions affecting them both.

The Secretary-General outlined detailed proposals relating to the structure and concept of operations for the proposed mission.²⁶ It would be composed of military and civilian components, including an electoral component. It should comprise an estimated 303 military observers. As far as ECOMOG was concerned, 4,000 additional troops would be necessary to fulfil the requirements of the Peace Agreement. The Secretary-General, in that regard, informed the Council, that, in response to a letter from the President of the Security Council of 27 August 1993,²⁷ strongly endorsing the establishment of a voluntary trust fund, he had taken the necessary steps to set up the trust fund in order to finance ECOMOG operations. The fund would also cover demobilization and elections.

Under the Cotonou Agreement, elections were to take place seven months after the signing of the Agreement, in February/March 1994. Several factors might undermine that target, however, including the fact that representatives of the Electoral Commission had not yet been nominated, the difficulty of incorporating into the electoral rolls refugees and internally displaced persons, and the need to ensure that demobilization was completed before the elections were held. While the peace process was already behind schedule, the establishment of the Transitional Government was crucial to reinforcing national reconciliation. The Secretary-General therefore urged ECOMOG to move quickly in commencing the disarmament process, with monitoring provided by the advance team of UNOMIL, even before full deployment of the expanded ECOMOG and UNOMIL. He also expected the Liberian parties to cooperate fully with ECOMOG and UNOMIL and to work together in a spirit of national reconciliation. Only under those conditions would it be possible to hold the elections on schedule.

The Secretary-General noted that the role foreseen for the United Nations in the implementation of the Cotonou Agreement was predicated on the assumption that the ECOMOG force would be in a position to perform the wide-ranging tasks entrusted to it by the Liberian parties. Should the additional troops not be deployed or should some ECOMOG troops be withdrawn prematurely, the successful implementation of the Agreement would be in jeopardy. In such an event, the Secretary-General would bring the situation to the attention of the Security Council and might recommend the withdrawal of UNOMIL.

The Secretary-General stated that the fundamental prerequisite for the establishment and maintenance of lasting peace and stability in Liberia was that the leaders and people of Liberia adhere to and implement faithfully the Cotonou Agreement. He also stated that the United Nations must supplement the efforts of the Liberian people to establish peace. He therefore recommended that the Security Council approve the establishment and deployment of UNOMIL.

At its 3281st meeting, on 22 September 1993, the Security Council included in its agenda the report of the Secretary-General of 9 and 17 September 1993. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representative of Liberia, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (Venezuela) then drew the attention of the Council members to the text of a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations,²⁸ and read out revisions that had been made to the draft resolution.²⁹

The representative of Liberia noted that since the signing of the Cotonou Agreement there had been no significant violations of the terms of that Agreement. Most of the political components of the Agreement, including the selection of a five-member transitional Council of State, had been implemented, and Liberians were optimistic that peace was finally at hand, but the situation in Liberia was still unsettled. The crucial military components of the Cotonou Agreement, were yet to be implemented. As long as the combatants remained armed, the situation in the country would continue to be unpredictable. His delegation therefore welcomed the Secretary-General's proposal that the disarmament process be undertaken as soon as possible. It would allow the installation of the transitional Government which, according to the Cotonou Agreement, was to be seated concomitantly with the commencement of the disarmament process. He further observed that the deployment of some members of the advance team of UNOMIL pursuant to resolution 856 (1993) had served as an important confidence-building measure. It was therefore most important that the remaining members of UNOMIL be deployed as soon as possible. The disarmament of the combatants would also be greatly enhanced by the deployment of additional troops to augment ECOMOG. The funding for those additional troops would depend, inter alia, on voluntary contributions to the Trust Fund by Member States. His delegation echoed the request already made by the Secretary-General for Member States to make generous contributions to the Trust Fund. The continued provision of humanitarian assistance also would complement the efforts of the Liberian people to achieve a peaceful resolution of the Liberian conflict. The speaker concluded by stating that, by adopting the draft resolution, the Council would be acting in accordance with its mandate under Chapter VIII of the Charter of the United Nations. Additionally, by endorsing the draft resolution, the Council would be taking a bold step in undertaking peacekeeping, peacemaking and peace-monitoring in concert with the subregional organization that had initiated the process. By exerting its best efforts to ensure that UNOMIL was successful, the Council could provide a model for future cooperation between the United Nations and other subregional organizations.³⁰

The representative of Djibouti stated that the creation of UNOMIL established an important precedent for the United Nations — that of a peacemaking mission set up after one was already in place through another organization. Consequently, the issues of coordination, command and responsibilities were significant and would require careful monitoring and assessment. The supportive but independent role of the United Nations needed to be safeguarded, particularly where hostilities might resume and peacemaking action would be required against one of the parties. His delegation therefore supported the draft resolution.³¹

The draft resolution was then put to the vote, as orally revised in its provisional form, and was adopted unanimously as resolution 866 (1993), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolutions 813 (1993) of 26 March 1993 and 856 (1993) of 10 August 1993,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 9 and 17 September 1993 on the proposed establishment of the United Nations Observer Mission in Liberia,

Noting that the Peace Agreement signed by the three Liberian parties at Cotonou, Benin, on 25 July 1993 calls on the United Nations and the Military Observer Group of the Economic Community of West African States to assist in the implementation of the Agreement,

Emphasizing, as noted in the report of the Secretary-General of 2 August 1993, that the Peace Agreement assigns the Military Observer Group the primary responsibility of supervising the implementation of the military provisions of the Agreement and envisages that the United Nations role shall be to monitor and verify this process,

Noting that this would be the first peacekeeping mission undertaken by the United Nations in cooperation with a peacekeeping mission already set up by another organization, in this case the Economic Community of West African States,

Recognizing that United Nations involvement would contribute significantly to the effective implementation of the Peace Agreement and would serve to underline the international community's commitment to conflict resolution in Liberia,

Commending the Economic Community of West African States for its continuing efforts to restore peace, security and stability in Liberia,

Commending also the efforts of the Organization of African Unity in support of the peace process in Liberia,

Stressing the importance of full cooperation and close coordination between the United Nations Observer Mission in Liberia and the Military Observer Group in the implementation of their respective mandates,

Taking note of the deployment of an advance team of United Nations military observers to Liberia as authorized under resolution 856 (1993),

Welcoming the establishment of the Joint Ceasefire Monitoring Committee composed of the three Liberian parties, the Military Observer Group and the United Nations, Welcoming also the formation in Cotonou on 27 August 1993 of the five-member Council of State representing all three Liberian parties which, in accordance with the Peace Agreement, shall be installed concomitantly with the commencement of the disarmament process and shall be responsible for the day-to-day operation of the transitional government,

Noting that the Peace Agreement calls for legislative and presidential elections to take place approximately seven months after the signing of the Peace Agreement,

1. Welcomes the report of the Secretary-General of 9 and 17 September 1993 on the proposed establishment of the United Nations Observer Mission in Liberia;

2. Decides to establish the United Nations Observer Mission in Liberia under its authority and under the direction of the Secretary-General through his Special Representative for a period of seven months, subject to the proviso that it will continue beyond 16 December 1993 only upon a review by the Council based on a report from the Secretary-General on whether or not substantive progress has been made towards the implementation of the Peace Agreement signed at Cotonou on 25 July 1993 and other measures aimed at establishing a lasting peace;

3. Also decides that the Mission shall comprise military observers as well as medical, engineering, communications, transportation and electoral components, in the numbers indicated in the report of the Secretary-General, together with minimal staff necessary to support it, and shall have the following mandate:

(a) To receive and investigate all reports on alleged incidents of violations of the ceasefire agreement and, if the violation cannot be corrected, to report its findings to the Violation Committee established pursuant to the Peace Agreement, and to the Secretary-General;

(b) To monitor compliance with other elements of the Peace Agreement, including at points on Liberia's borders with Sierra Leone and other neighbouring countries, and to verify its impartial application, and in particular to assist in the monitoring of compliance with the embargo on delivery of arms and military equipment to Liberia and the cantonment, disarmament and demobilization of combatants;

(c) To observe and verify the election process, including the legislative and presidential elections to be held in accordance with the provisions of the Peace Agreement;

(d) To assist, as appropriate, in the coordination of humanitarian assistance activities in the field in conjunction with the existing United Nations humanitarian relief operation;

(e) To develop a plan and assess financial requirements for the demobilization of combatants;

(f) To report on any major violations of international humanitarian law to the Secretary-General;

(g) To train the Military Observer Group engineers in mine clearance and, in cooperation with the Group, coordinate the identification of mines and assist in the clearance of mines and unexploded bombs;

(h) Without participation in enforcement operations, to coordinate with the Military Observer Group in the discharge of the Group's separate responsibilities both formally, through the Violation Committee, and informally;

4. Welcomes the intention of the Secretary-General to conclude with the Chairman of the Economic Community of West African States an agreement defining, before deployment of the Mission, the roles and responsibilities of the Mission and the Community in the implementation of the Peace Agreement, in accordance with the concept of operations outlined in chapter IV of the report of the Secretary-General, and requests the Secretary-General to keep the Council informed on the progress and outcome of the negotiations leading thereto;

5. Encourages African States to provide the additional troops requested from them by the Economic Community of West African States for the Military Observer Group;

6. Welcomes also the steps taken by the Secretary-General to establish a Trust Fund for Liberia, which would facilitate the sending of reinforcements by African States to the Military Observer Group, assist in supporting troops of participating Group countries and also assist in mine-clearing, humanitarian and development activities, as well as the electoral process, and calls on Member States to support the peace process in Liberia by contributing to the Trust Fund;

7. Urges the Liberian parties to commence the encampment, disarmament and demobilization process without delay;

8. Welcomes the decision to establish the transitional government and urges also the Liberian parties to begin the exercise of that government's responsibilities concomitantly with the process described in paragraph 7 above and consistent with the Peace Agreement;

9. Calls on the transitional government to conclude expeditiously, and no later than sixty days after its installation, a status of mission agreement with the United Nations to facilitate the full deployment of the Mission;

10. Urges the Liberian parties to finalize the composition of the Elections Commission so that it can promptly undertake the necessary preparations for legislative and presidential elections by March 1994, at the latest, in accordance with the timetable foreseen in the Peace Agreement;

11. Calls on the Liberian parties to cooperate fully in the safe delivery of humanitarian assistance to all parts of the country by the most direct routes, in accordance with the Peace Agreement;

12. Welcomes the stated commitment of the Military Observer Group to ensure the safety of observers and civilian staff of the United Nations Observer Mission in Liberia and urges the Liberian parties to take all necessary measures to ensure the security and safety of Mission personnel, as well as of the personnel involved in relief operations, and strictly to abide by applicable rules of international humanitarian law;

13. Requests the Secretary-General to submit progress reports to the Council on the implementation of the present resolution by 16 December 1993 and by 16 February 1994;

14. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of the United States observed that the role of ECOMOG would be pivotal. His delegation trusted that adequate and appropriate coordination between all levels of command of ECOMOG and UNOMIL would enable both groups to operate in the complementary manner foreseen by the Council and the parties to the Agreement. The precedent of side-by-side operations by the United Nations and a regional group might have reverberations in other conflict areas, which could perhaps be tackled in a similar manner if it were to work well in Liberia.³²

The representative of France stated that the resolution just adopted attested to the resolve of the international community to implement a peace agreement in a strife-torn nation and created a United Nations force that was called upon, pursuant to Chapter VIII of the Charter, to work in close cooperation with the regional organization. That represented one of the first instances of a joint peacekeeping operation and could serve as a precedent if it were to succeed. UNOMIL would fully play its role of monitoring and verifying the implementation of the Cotonou Agreement, while the primary responsibility for actually implementing the Agreement would fall to ECOMOG.³³

The representative of the United Kingdom noted that the conflict had had a destabilizing effect on the countries of the subregion as a whole, and particularly on Sierra Leone. His delegation welcomed the fact that, under the resolution just adopted, UNOMIL would have a monitoring function on Liberia's borders with its neighbours, and in particular with Sierra Leone. He also noted that UNOMIL would represent the first example of a United Nations peacekeeping mission in cooperation with the mission already established by a regional organization. ECOMOG and UNOMIL's roles would be separate but complementary. He emphasized that close coordination and the fullest cooperation between the two bodies would be vital to the success of the enterprise.³⁴

Decision of 16 December 1993: letter from the President to the Secretary-General

On 13 December 1993, pursuant to resolution 866 (1993), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on UNOMIL in which he described the progress made in the implementation of the Peace Agreement.³⁵ The parties to the Cotonou Agreement had met in Cotonou from 3 to 5 November 1993 and had agreed on the distribution of the majority of cabinet posts of the Transitional Government, as well as on the composition of the Elections Commission, on the Speaker of the Legislature and the members of the Supreme Court. The Secretary-General indicated that his Special Representative had been consulting regularly with the parties to the Agreement, particularly in regard to the commencement of disarmament of the Liberian parties and the deployment of the expanded ECOMOG troops. There was every indication that disarmament would begin shortly. He pointed out that the most important factor holding up the implementation of the Peace Agreement had been the delay in the deployment of the expanded ECOMOG troops. In spite of those delays, there had been no major violations of the ceasefire. The Secretary-General expected to be able to provide more precise information on the timetable for elections, which the transitional government should be able to hold during the first half of 1994. In conclusion, he recommended to the Council that UNOMIL should continue to implement the mandate entrusted to it by resolution 866 (1993).

³³ Ibid., pp. 14-15.

By a letter dated 16 December 1993,³⁶ the President informed the Secretary-General as follows:

The members of the Council have taken note of your report of 13 December 1993 on the United Nations Observer Mission in Liberia, on the basis of which they have completed the review provided for in paragraph 2 of resolution 866 (1993) of 22 September 1993.

The members of the Council take this opportunity to inform you, that, in spite of the unavoidable delays to date, they share your expectation that disarmament of combatants will begin presently, the transitional government will soon be installed and the elections in Liberia will be held in the first half of 1994. They look forward to your recommendations on these aspects of the peace process in the report which the Council has requested by 16 February 1994, or earlier, if you consider that the situation warrants.

The members of the Council also reaffirm the importance they attach to the United Nations Trust Fund for Liberia. They welcome the contributions made to date and urge Member States to support the peace process in Liberia by contributing generously to the Trust Fund.

Decision of 18 January 1994: letter from the President to the Secretary-General

By a letter dated 18 January 1994,³⁷ the President informed the Secretary-General as follows:

The members of the Security Council wish to thank you for making it possible for your Special Representative, Mr. Trevor Gordon-Somers, to brief the Council on 14 January 1994 on the most recent developments in Liberia.

In this regard, they welcome the fact that the deployment of additional troops of the Economic Community of West African States Monitoring Group is now well under way. They are also pleased to learn that the deployment of United Nations Observer Mission in Liberia is almost complete. There should be no further delay in implementation of the Cotonou Agreement.

The members of the Council note that, pursuant to resolution 866 (1993) of 22 September 1993, a report is expected by 16 February 1994. They are concerned that the transitional government has still not been installed, disarmament has not yet commenced, that the implementation of the Cotonou Agreement is thus being delayed, and that efforts to deliver humanitarian assistance to all parts of the country have met with difficulties. The continued support of the international community for the efforts of the Mission will depend on the full and prompt implementation by the parties of the Cotonou Agreement, including installation of the transitional government, disarmament and the unimpeded delivery of humanitarian assistance.

As noted in the letter dated 16 December 1993 addressed to you by the President of the Security Council, the members of the Council share your expectation that the elections due to take place under the terms of the Cotonou Agreement should take place during the first half of this year. In this connection they express the hope that, by the time you submit your report, the progress achieved by the Liberian parties in the implementation of the peace process will enable you to recommend a precise timetable for the holding of the elections in Liberia.

Decision of 25 February 1994 (3339th meeting):
statement by the President

On 14 and 23 February 1994, pursuant to resolution 866 (1993), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council his second progress report on UNOMIL,³⁸ which described the progress achieved in the implementation of the Cotonou Agreement.

The Secretary-General reported that, at a meeting held at Monrovia on 15 February 1994 and facilitated by his Special Representative, the parties to the Cotonou Agreement had reached agreement on most of the outstanding issues impeding the commencement of disarmament and the installation of the Transitional Government. In the final communiqué of the meeting,³⁹ the parties had reiterated their commitment to the Cotonou Agreement. They had agreed to provide ECOMOG and UNOMIL, within 48 hours, with the information required for the preparation of schedules for disarmament. They had also agreed that free and fair elections would be held on 7 September 1994, and that on 7 March 1994 disarmament would commence and the Transitional Government would be installed. However, it had not been possible at that meeting to resolve the question of the remaining Cabinet posts in the Transitional Government. The Secretary-General warned that if that issue was not resolved expeditiously, it could delay the commencement of disarmament and the installation of the Transitional Government. He again urged the Liberian parties to demonstrate maximum flexibility and spare no effort to arrive at an acceptable accommodation. The Secretary-General undertook to keep the Security Council informed of any further developments in that matter.

Another positive development was that one of the new armed groups to emerge in Liberia had indicated its willingness to hand over territory under its control to ECOMOG and UNOMIL. The Secretary-General noted, however, that conflict between new armed groups continued and that the influx of displaced persons was increasing. Humanitarian assistance had also been severely disrupted in some areas.

The Secretary-General further reported that ECOMOG was facing major financial difficulties and he urged Member States to assist the peace process in Liberia by providing financial assistance through the Trust Fund for Liberia to help ECOMOG to meet the costs of stipends for the additional troops and logistic support for the existing troops. He reiterated that UNOMIL's ability to carry out the mandate entrusted to it by the Security Council depended on the capacity of ECOMOG to discharge its responsibilities in accordance with the Agreement.

At its 3339th meeting, on 25 February 1994, the Security Council included in its agenda the second progress report of the Secretary-General on UNOMIL. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representatives of Benin and Liberia, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (Djibouti) drew the attention of the Council's members to a letter dated 16 February 1994 from the representative of Liberia,⁴⁰ transmitting the final communiqué of the meeting held on 15 February 1994 by the parties to the Cotonou Agreement. He then stated that, after consultations among members of the Security Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁴¹

The Security Council takes note of the report of the Secretary-General of 14 February 1994 on the situation in Liberia.

The Council welcomes the agreement reached at Monrovia contained in the communiqué of 15 February 1994, in which the parties once again reaffirmed their commitment to the Cotonou Agreement as the basis for a lasting political settlement to the Liberian conflict. The Council calls upon the parties to uphold strictly the timetable outlined in that communiqué: the commencement of disarmament and the installation of a transitional government on 7 March 1994, and the holding of free and fair general elections on 7 September 1994. The Council urges the parties to resolve quickly their differences on the disposition of the four remaining Cabinet posts.

The Council, however, wishes to express its concern about the recent upsurge in violence in Liberia and the related disruption of humanitarian relief shipments, to which the rise of new military groups and problems of military indiscipline among the existing factions have contributed. It deplores the consequent loss of life, destruction of property and the increased number of people that have since been displaced. The Council calls upon all Liberian parties to adhere strictly to the ceasefire agreement and to cooperate fully with the international relief efforts in order to put an end to the obstacles periodically impeding the delivery of humanitarian aid.

The Council is gravely concerned at the delays in implementing the commitments entered into by the parties under the Cotonou Agreement, in particular the commencement of disarmament and the installation of the transitional Government.

The Council reminds the parties that they themselves bear ultimate responsibility for the successful implementation of the Cotonou Agreement. The Liberian parties should bear in mind that the support of the international community and of the Council will not continue in the absence of tangible progress towards full and prompt implementation of the Agreement, in particular the revised timetable. These delays jeopardize both the viability of the Agreement itself and the ability of the United Nations Observer Mission in Liberia to fulfil its mandate.

The Council looks forward to the proposed meeting of Ministers for Foreign Affairs of States members of the Economic Community of West African States in March and to continued progress on the ground. The Council underlines the importance of adhering to the timetable and will review the situation again in March 1994 to evaluate what progress has been made.

The Council underlines the importance of disarmament to the successful implementation of the Cotonou Agreement and, in this context, notes the central role in the disarmament process given to the Economic Community of West African States Monitoring Group under the Agreement.

The Council, therefore, takes note of the Secretary-General's observation that the Monitoring Group's forces face considerable financial and logistical difficulties and strongly supports his call upon Member States to assist the peace process by providing the necessary financial and logistical resources to the Monitoring Group to enable it to meet its obligations under the Cotonou Agreement. The Council supports the Secretary-General's appeal to all Member States which have not already done so to contribute generously to the United Nations Trust Fund for Liberia. The Council concurs with the Secretary-General that the ability of the Mission to carry out its mandate depends on the capacity of the Monitoring Group to discharge its responsibilities.

The Council commends the Economic Community of West African States and the Organization of African Unity for their continued efforts to restore peace, security and stability in Liberia. The Council notes with appreciation that the Monitoring Group's force has now been expanded pursuant to resolution 866 (1993) of 22 September 1993 and commends all countries which have contributed troops and resources to the Monitoring Group since its inception in 1990.

The Council commends also the efforts of Member States and humanitarian organizations in providing humanitarian assistance to the victims of the Liberian civil war. The anticipated reunification of the country by 7 March 1994 and the ensuing repatriation of Liberian refugees will accelerate the demand for additional humanitarian relief, and in this regard the Council urgently appeals to Member States and humanitarian organizations to increase their assistance to Liberia.

The Council reaffirms its appreciation for the tireless efforts of the Secretary-General and his Special Representative towards the establishment of a lasting peace in Liberia.

Decision of 21 April 1994 (3366th meeting):
resolution 911 (1994)

On 18 April 1994, pursuant to resolution 866 (1993), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council his third progress report on UNOMIL,⁴² in which he reported on the progress made in the implementation of the Cotonou Agreement .

The Secretary-General reported that the Liberian parties had successfully completed a number of important steps in the implementation of the Cotonou Agreement. On 7 March 1994 the Council of State and the executive arm of the Transitional Government had been installed and the disarmament process had begun. On 11 March the Transitional Legislative Assembly had been inducted, while on 14 March the Supreme Court of Liberia had opened for the March term. Furthermore, 7 September 1994 had been set as the date for the holding of elections.

Notwithstanding those positive achievements, however, a number of obstacles remained. The parties were yet to resolve the issue of the distribution of the four remaining Cabinet posts in the Transitional Government. Military conflicts involving various parties persisted. In that regard, the Secretary-General urged the Liberian parties to cooperate with one another to overcome the remaining impediments to the full installation of the Transitional Government. He also called on them to respect the terms of the Cotonou Agreement by ensuring that their combatants laid down their arms.

In relation to the holding of elections, the Elections Commission had intensified its preparations. One major problem had arisen, which was that if, as planned, the elections were to be based on single-member constituencies, then it would be necessary for refugees and internally displaced persons to have returned to their constituencies of residence before the end of the registration period. The registration period itself should be completed well before the election date in order to ensure broad participation in the electoral process. The Secretary-General urged the Liberian authorities to consider organizing the elections on the basis of a single national constituency with proportional representation. He offered to send a team of international experts to Liberia to consult with the Liberian National Transitional Government and the Elections Commission on how that could be done.

The Secretary-General recommended that the Security Council extend the mandate of UNOMIL for a further period of six months, which would include the period of the elections scheduled for September 1994. Provision should also be made for the liquidation phase of the Mission, which would end by 31 December. However, if the impasse over the remaining four posts in the Transitional Government was not resolved within two weeks and there was no further progress in the peace process, he would request the Council to review UNOMIL's mandate.

At its 3366th meeting, on 21 April 1994, the Security Council included in its agenda the report of the Secretary-General of 18 April 1994. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representative of Liberia, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (New Zealand) drew the attention of the Council to the text of a draft resolution,⁴³ which had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations and read out revisions that had been made to the draft resolution.⁴⁴

The representative of Liberia informed the Council that the Transitional Council of State had nominated the Ministers of Justice, Finance and Defence and that the only remaining portfolio, that of Minister of Foreign Affairs, would be filled shortly. The filling of the four remaining ministerial portfolios would facilitate the full operation of the Government. His delegation shared the concerns of the Secretary-General regarding the delay in the disarmament of combatants due to the continuation of armed hostilities in the country. The Transitional Council of State had appealed to the parties concerned to discontinue the fighting and allow the peaceful resolution of the conflict, in keeping with the terms of the Cotonou Agreement. What the Liberian people had accomplished respecting the political components of the Cotonou Agreement could be effectively implemented when its military component, the disarmament of the combatants, had been executed. While pointing out that the disarmament of the combatants was the responsibility of ECOMOG, the speaker stated that the Liberian National Transitional Government was encouraging dialogue among the parties in order to accelerate the disarmament process. Addressing the elections, he noted that the recommendation of the Secretary-General, concerning the need for changes in the constitutional requirements of the electoral procedure, was receiving the consideration of the Transitional Council of State. He further observed that the Elections Commission required financial assistance for all the elections, and that financial and technical assistance would also be required for the demobilization and reintegration of ex-combatants and for the reconstruction and rehabilitation of Liberia. His delegation therefore joined the Secretary-General's appeal to Member States to contribute to the Trust Fund and to provide increased humanitarian assistance to the country.⁴⁵

Speaking before the vote, the representative of Nigeria stated that in the view of his delegation, the draft resolution represented a satisfactory effort to move the Liberian peace process forward. First, by deciding to extend UNOMIL's mandate for six months, the draft resolution underscored continued international and United Nations support for the Liberian peace process. Nevertheless, by making specific provisions for a review of the Liberian situation by 18 May, it underlined the need for the parties to take concrete steps to move the peace process forward as a basis for continued United Nations support. Second, the draft resolution urged the Liberian parties to cease all hostilities everywhere in Liberia and to cooperate fully with ECOMOG in completing the disarmament process. That was of crucial importance for the restoration of confidence between the parties, the early return and settlement of refugees, the functioning of the Transitional Government, and the prospects of holding the elections by the date scheduled. Finally, the draft resolution recognized the necessity for additional contributions to the Liberian Trust Fund, increased assistance to ECOMOG to enable it to cope satisfactorily with the tasks assigned to it under the Cotonou Agreement, and support for humanitarian and development activities in Liberia.⁴⁶

The draft resolution was then put to the vote, as orally revised in its provisional form, and was adopted unanimously as resolution 911 (1994), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolutions 813 (1993) of 26 March 1993, 856 (1993) of 10 August 1993 and 866 (1993) of 22 September 1993,

Having considered the reports of the Secretary-General of 13 December 1993, 14 February 1994 and 18 April 1994 on the activities of the United Nations Observer Mission in Liberia,

Welcoming the progress made towards establishing the Liberian National Transitional Government, but concerned about subsequent delays in implementing the Cotonou Agreement,

Expressing its concern over renewed fighting between the Liberian parties and the negative impact that this fighting has had on the disarmament process, the effort to provide humanitarian relief, and the plight of displaced persons,

Commending the positive role of the Economic Community of West African States in its efforts to help to restore peace, security and stability in Liberia, and urging it to continue its efforts with the aim of assisting the Liberian parties to complete the process of political settlement in the country,

Recognizing, as noted in the report of the Secretary-General of 2 August 1993, that the Cotonou Agreement assigns the Economic Community of West African States Monitoring Group to assist in the implementation of the Agreement, ⁴⁴ See S/PV.3366.

⁴⁶ Ibid., pp. 4-5.

Commending those African States which have contributed troops to the Monitoring Group, and those Member States which have contributed to the United Nations Trust Fund for Liberia or have provided other assistance in support of the troops,

Welcoming the close cooperation between the Mission and the Monitoring Group, and stressing the importance of continued full cooperation and coordination between them in the implementation of their respective tasks,

Noting that the revised timetable of the Cotonou Agreement established on 15 February 1994 at Monrovia calls for legislative and presidential elections to take place by 7 September 1994,

1. Welcomes the report of the Secretary-General of 18 April 1994 and the progress the parties have made towards the implementation of the Cotonou Agreement and other measures aimed at establishing a lasting peace;

2. Decides to extend the mandate of the United Nations Observer Mission in Liberia until 22 October 1994, on the understanding that the Security Council will, by 18 May 1994, review the situation in Liberia, including the role played by the Mission in that country, based on a report by the Secretary-General on whether or not the Council of State of the Liberian National Transitional Government has been fully installed and on whether there has been substantial progress in disarmament and in implementing the peace process;

3. Also decides to review again the situation in Liberia, including the role played by the Mission, on or before 30 June 1994, on the basis of a report of the Secretary-General, such review to include consideration of whether sufficient progress has been made in implementing the revised timetable of the Cotonou Agreement to warrant continued involvement of the Mission, in particular the effective operation of the Liberian National Transitional Government, progress in carrying out disarmament and demobilization and preparations for the holding of elections on 7 September 1994;

4. Notes that, if it considers, during either of the above reviews, that progress has been insufficient, it may request the Secretary-General to prepare options regarding the mandate and continued operations of the Mission;

5. Urges all Liberian parties to cease hostilities immediately and to cooperate with the forces of the Economic Community of West African States Monitoring Group to complete the disarmament process expeditiously;

6. Calls upon the Liberian parties as an urgent priority to complete installation, within the time frame established in paragraph 2 above, of the Liberian National Transitional Government, especially the seating of the full Cabinet and the national assembly, so that a unified civil administration of the country can be established and other appropriate arrangements completed so that national elections may be held as scheduled on 7 September 1994;

7. Calls again upon the Liberian parties to cooperate fully in the safe delivery of humanitarian assistance to all parts of the country by the most direct routes, in accordance with the Cotonou Agreement;

8. Welcomes the ongoing efforts of the Monitoring Group in furthering the peace process in Liberia and its commitment to ensuring the safety of Mission observers and civilian staff, and urges the Liberian parties to continue to take all necessary measures to ensure the security and safety of Mission personnel, as well as of the personnel involved in relief operations, and strictly to abide by applicable rules of international humanitarian law;

9. Encourages Member States to provide support for the peace process in Liberia by contributing to the Trust Fund or by providing other assistance to facilitate the sending of reinforcements by African States to the Monitoring Group, to assist in supporting troops of countries participating in the Group and also to assist in humanitarian and development activities, as well as in the electoral process;

10. Commends the efforts made by Member States and humanitarian organizations to provide emergency humanitarian assistance;

11. Welcomes the continued efforts by the Secretary-General and his Special Representative to promote and facilitate dialogue among all parties concerned;

12. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of the United States observed that the resolution just adopted provided for two reviews in the following months, one to check on whether the parties had resolved their differences over several key Cabinet posts and the other to check on overall progress. His delegation expected the Liberians to have passed certain goalposts by 30 June: first, the Liberian National Transitional Government should be fully installed and operating effectively in Monrovia and beyond; second, additional disarmament and demobilization camps should have been established and approximately 30 per cent of the combatants should have been disarmed; third, the Elections Commission should be actively planning for the 7 September elections, including setting up a timetable for the registration of voters, filing candidates and other vital preparatory activities; and fourth, the ceasefire should be holding. The attainment of those goals was essential for the continued presence of UNOMIL. If the parties could not pass those goalposts, the United States would be prepared to seek consideration of whether the Mission ought to be curtailed or terminated.⁴⁷

Decision of 23 May 1994 (3378th meeting):
statement by the President

On 18 May 1994, pursuant to resolution 911 (1994), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council his fourth progress report on UNOMIL,⁴⁸ in which he provided an update on progress in the implementation of the peace process. He reported that the issue of the four remaining Cabinet posts in the Transitional Government had been resolved, removing a major impediment to the full seating and functioning of the Transitional Government. The Liberian National Transitional Government Cabinet had held its first meeting, on 13 May 1994, at which it had issued a statement that, inter alia, called on leaders of all warring factions and armed combatants to surrender unconditionally all their arms and declared that the Liberian National Transitional Government was thenceforth the government authority throughout the territory of Liberia. That had enabled the parties to bring to an effective end all factional claims to the territory.

The Secretary-General noted that during the period of negotiations between the parties on the distribution of the remaining posts, the pace of disarmament had slowed considerably. With the installation of the Transitional Government, the parties had recommitted themselves to the complete implementation of the Cotonou Agreement, including disarmament. It was therefore expected that the pace of disarmament would quicken. The Secretary-General again called on the Liberian parties to respect the timetable for disarmament and to ensure that their combatants laid down their arms. He also reported on the mediation efforts by ECOMOG and UNOMIL to resolve disputes among and within parties, which had resulted in the outbreak of fighting.

The Secretary-General informed the Council that the team of international experts referred to in his previous report would arrive in Liberia on 22 May to consult with the Transitional Government and the Liberian Elections Commission on how the United Nations could best assist in the holding of the elections.

The Secretary-General noted that the efforts of the parties in Liberia were finally yielding some positive results, but he observed that much remained to be accomplished, especially in the areas of disarmament and demobilization. He called on Member States to support the Transitional Government in the discharge of its responsibilities under the Cotonou Agreement and stated that he had instructed his Special Representative to advise him on concrete measures that Member States might take in that regard.

At its 3378th meeting, on 23 May 1994, the Security Council included in its agenda the report of the Secretary-General of 18 May 1994. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representative of Liberia, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (Nigeria) drew the attention of the Council's members to a letter dated 18 May from the representative of Liberia addressed to the Secretary-General.⁴⁹ He then stated that, following consultations among members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁵⁰

The Security Council welcomes the report of the Secretary-General of 18 May 1994 on the situation in Liberia).

In this connection, the Council notes with satisfaction the full installation of the Council of State of the Liberian National Transitional Government, as well as indications that the Transitional Government has begun to assume its responsibilities and functions throughout the country.

The Council commends the United Nations Observer Mission in Liberia and the Economic Community of West African States Monitoring Group for their contributions to the demobilization and disarmament efforts in Liberia, a critical requirement of the Cotonou Agreement.

The Council notes with concern, however, the continued fighting among and within factions. Political differences and renewed violence among and within certain factions have caused the disarmament process to come to a virtual halt. The ongoing hostilities make it very difficult for the Mission to accomplish critical elements of its mandate and prevent the peacekeeping troops of the Monitoring Group from carrying out their functions regarding disarmament and demobilization, a situation which directly threatens the ability of the parties to maintain the timetable outlined in the Cotonou Agreement and the communiqué of 15 February 1994.

In the light of these developments, the Council calls upon the parties to resolve their differences within the forum of the

⁴⁷ Ibid., p. 5.

Transitional Government and the Cotonou Agreement, to end any hostilities and to accelerate the pace of disarmament with the aim of bringing it to a successful conclusion, all of which are crucial to creating suitable conditions for elections. The Council wishes to remind the parties of the importance it attaches to the holding of those elections on 7 September 1994.

The Council reaffirms its intention to review the situation in Liberia again on or before 30 June 1994, including the role played by the Mission, such review to include consideration of whether sufficient progress has been made in implementing the revised timetable of the Cotonou Agreement to warrant continued involvement of the Mission, in particular the effective operation of the Liberian National Transitional Government, progress in carrying out disarmament and demobilization, and preparations for the holding of elections on 7 September 1994. In accordance with the terms of its resolution 911 (1994) of 21 April 1994, the Council requests the Secretary-General to prepare by 30 June 1994 options regarding the future implementation of the mandate of the Mission and its continued operations.

The Council reminds the parties that the ultimate responsibility for the success of the peace process in Liberia rests with them and with the Liberian people. It urges them to respect fully the terms of the Cotonou Agreement and reaffirms its expectation that the parties will continue to make every effort to achieve a lasting peace in Liberia.

Decision of 23 May 1994: letter from the President to the Secretary-General

By a letter dated 23 May 1994,⁵¹ the President of the Council informed the Secretary-General that the members of the Council had taken note of his report of 18 May 1994 on UNOMIL,⁵² on the basis of which they had completed the review provided for in paragraph 2 of resolution 911 (1994). They reaffirmed their intention to review the situation in Liberia again, including the role played by the Mission, on or before 30 June 1994, in accordance with paragraph 3 of resolution 911 (1994).

Decision of 13 July 1994 (3404th meeting):
statement by the President

On 24 June 1994, pursuant to resolution 911 (1994), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council his fifth progress report on UNOMIL.⁵³ The Secretary-General noted that beyond the difficulties the Transitional Government was experiencing in filling the vacant posts, the continuing fighting within and between parties constituted the most serious obstacle in the way of the peace process. The parties' mistrust of one another had extended to ECOMOG, making its role as a peacekeeper increasingly complex. Soldiers of ECOMOG contingents had been abducted. Under those circumstances and despite the efforts of ECOMOG and UNOMIL, the parties had refused to engage actively in the disarmament of their combatants or to give up control of territory. As a result, the Transitional Government had found it difficult to exert authority throughout the entire country, further impeding the advancement of the peace progress. The continuing hostilities had also led to new population displacements.

Another serious concern was the failure of the international community to provide financial support for those Governments which had contributed to ECOMOG. The Secretary-General had urged them not to withdraw their troops and had endeavoured to obtain additional financial support. He therefore urged the international community to contribute to the Trust Fund for Liberia.

The Secretary-General further noted that the civil conflict in Liberia had been characterized by major abuses of human rights, such as the use of children in combat, and mental and physical abuses. His Special Representative had been holding discussions on those issues with Liberian human rights organizations. A joint plan of action had been developed and consideration was being given to the establishment of a national committee on human rights.

The Secretary-General continued to believe that UNOMIL's mandate was relevant to the circumstances in Liberia, and that the Mission's efforts were critical to the implementation of the Cotonou Agreement and to assisting the Transitional Government and the Liberian people to achieve national reconciliation. It was imperative that the Liberian parties extend greater cooperation to ECOMOG and UNOMIL in order to move the peace process forward and achieve the objectives outlined in the Cotonou Agreement, including the holding of national elections. The Secretary-General suggested that the Security Council might consider the possibility of laying down specific monthly targets to be met by the Liberian parties, particularly with respect to disarmament and the demobilization of combatants. His Special Representative would then be ready to advise the Liberian parties on how targets set by the Security Council could be met. He warned that, should the Liberian parties fail to maintain their commitment to the peace process, he would have no alternative but to recommend to the Security Council that the involvement of the United Nations in Liberia be reconsidered.

At its 3404th meeting, on 13 July 1994, the Security Council included in its agenda the report of the Secretary-General of 24 June 1994. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representative of Liberia, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (Pakistan) then stated that, following consultations among members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁵⁴

The Security Council welcomes the report of the Secretary-General of 24 June 1994 on Liberia. On the basis of this report, as well as the oral briefing provided by the Special Representative of the Secretary-General for Liberia, the Council has carried out a review of the situation in Liberia, including the role played by the United Nations Observer Mission in Liberia as called for in its resolution 911 (1994) of 21 April 1994.

In this context, the Council notes that, since the interim review in May 1994, there has been limited progress in the peace process and that the Liberian National Transitional Government has been unable to extend its authority effectively outside the Monrovia area. The Council notes further with concern that preparations for national elections have been hampered by the continued fighting and the consequent virtual halt of the disarmament process. It underscores the fact that, until the disarmament process is substantially accomplished, the holding of free and fair elections will not be possible. It reiterates, nevertheless, the need to make urgent preparations to enable the timely holding of free and fair elections. To this end, a substantial acceleration of the disarmament process is essential. It notes that continued delay may have an adverse effect on international participation in the Liberian peace process.

The Council therefore calls upon the Transitional Government, in cooperation with the Economic Community of West African States and the Organization of African Unity, with the support of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General and the United Nations Observer Mission in Liberia as necessary, to convene a meeting of the Liberian factions concerned to address the problems affecting disarmament. The Council considers that the objectives of such a meeting should be to agree on a realistic plan to resume disarmament and to set a target date for its completion. The Council calls upon the Transitional Government to convene the meeting as soon as possible, at the latest by 31 July 1994. The Council stresses the importance it places on the Liberian factions concerned attending such a meeting.

The Council further calls upon all factions in Liberia to demonstrate the resolve and commitment necessary to achieve national reconciliation.

The Council expresses its concern about the increase in military activities being carried out in violation of the general ceasefire and the consequent large-scale displacement of persons and atrocities which have been committed throughout the country. The Council condemns all those who initiate fighting and who violate international humanitarian law.

The Council strongly deplores attacks on and the abduction and harassment of United Nations and Economic Community of West African States Monitoring Group personnel in Liberia, as well as looting of United Nations and Monitoring Group property. It demands that such hostile acts cease forthwith.

The Council urges the Liberian parties to take all necessary measures to ensure the security and safety of Mission and Monitoring Group personnel, as well as of the personnel involved in relief operations, and strictly to abide by the applicable rules of international humanitarian law. It demands that all factions in Liberia extend full cooperation to organizations engaged in the delivery of humanitarian assistance.

The Council commends the positive role of the Economic Community of West African States in its continued efforts to facilitate peace and security in Liberia, including through the provision of Monitoring Group troops. It welcomes the continued close cooperation between the Monitoring Group and the Mission.

The Council also commends other African States that have provided troops to the Monitoring Group and those Member States which have contributed to the United Nations Trust Fund for Liberia established pursuant to paragraph 6 of resolution 866 (1993) of 22 September 1993, or provided other assistance in support of the troops. However, the Council expresses its concern that sufficient financial and other support for the Monitoring Group troops has not yet been forthcoming despite the importance of their continued presence in the Liberian peace process. The Council calls upon all Member States urgently to consider providing financial or material support either through the Trust Fund or on a bilateral basis to enable the Monitoring Group to fulfil its responsibilities in accordance with the Cotonou Agreement.

The Council commends the Secretary-General for the priority given to reporting on violations of international humanitarian law and other atrocities and encourages continued attention to these aspects of the situation in Liberia.

The Council requests the Secretary-General to ensure that all information on ceasefire and arms embargo violations obtained by the Mission, in pursuit of its mandate, is made promptly available to the Security Council and publicized more widely as appropriate.

The Council expresses concern at problems encountered by the Transitional Government in extending its authority outside the Monrovia area, and requests the Secretary-General to explore, in consultation with the Economic Community of West African States, whether there are any steps which might be taken to facilitate the efforts of the Transitional Government in this regard.

The Council urges the Economic Community of West African States to continue its efforts to help the Liberian parties to make substantial progress towards a political settlement in the country.

The Council requests the Secretary-General to report on the situation in Liberia by 2 September 1994 and to consider in that report whether the meeting on disarmament has resulted in a realistic plan for disarmament and whether implementation of such a plan has begun. The report should also provide options for the size and mandate of the Mission that reflect the outcome of the meeting and the progress in implementing the disarmament plan.

The Council will remain actively seized of the matter.

Decision of 13 September 1994 (3424th meeting): statement by the President

At its 3424th meeting, on 13 September 1994, the Security Council resumed its consideration of the situation in Liberia. After the adoption of the agenda, the President (Spain) stated that, following consultations among members of the Security Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁵⁵

The Security Council strongly condemns the detention and mistreatment of forty-three unarmed military observers of the United Nations Observer Mission in Liberia and six staff members of non-governmental organizations, in flagrant violation of international humanitarian law as well as of the Cotonou Agreement. It demands that those responsible release immediately the detained personnel and return their property and that of the Mission and humanitarian organizations. It urges all parties strictly to observe the Agreement and to ensure the safety, security and freedom of movement of the Mission, other United Nations personnel and those of humanitarian organizations.

The Council requests the Economic Community of West African States to ensure that its Monitoring Group continues to extend protection to the extent possible to Mission personnel, in accordance with the exchange of letters of 7 October 1993 between the Secretary-General and the Chairman of the Economic Community of West African States defining the respective roles and responsibilities of the two missions in Liberia. It calls upon the international community to assist the Economic Community of West African States with the necessary resources to enable the Monitoring Group to fulfil its mandate effectively throughout Liberia.

The Council is following closely the situation in Liberia and in this connection welcomes the ongoing efforts, in particular those of the President of Ghana as Chairman of the Economic Community of West African States, to secure the release of the detained personnel.

Decision of 21 October 1994 (3442nd meeting):

On 14 October 1994, pursuant to resolution 911 (1994), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council his seventh progress report on UNOMIL in which he gave an account of his Special Envoy's mission to Liberia and described recent political developments in the country.⁵⁶

The Secretary-General recalled that in his previous report⁵⁷ he had indicated his increasing concern about the recent evolution of the situation and the absence of progress in the peace process in Liberia. He had also informed the Council that he had decided to send to Liberia a fact-finding mission headed by his Special Envoy. The mission had visited Liberia from 16 to 26 August and had made the following recommendations: (a) that the United Nations and ECOWAS should consult on the latter's future strategy for ECOMOG, and on the role of UNOMIL in relation to that strategy; (b) that the political support of the international community for the regional peacekeeping efforts undertaken by ECOWAS in Liberia should have been accompanied by the substantial financial support which ECOMOG needed to be able to carry out its responsibilities effectively; (c) given the security situation in Liberia and the fact that ECOMOG could not provide the necessary protection for UNOMIL unarmed military observers, UNOMIL should be reduced to about one third of its authorized strength of 368; (d) with regard to internal Liberian security, the issue of a national army should be addressed and donor Governments should provide technical assistance and other resources necessary for the formation of a new army.

The Secretary-General reported that several significant events had taken place shortly after the

⁵⁷ S/1994/1006.

Special Envoy had left Liberia. First, the Chairman of ECOWAS had convened a meeting at Akosombo, Ghana, to review the continuing delays in the implementation of the Cotonou Agreement. The meeting had culminated in the signing, on 12 September 1994, of the Akosombo Agreement,⁵⁸ a supplementary agreement to the Cotonou Agreement. Second, the Liberian National Conference, convened from 24 August to 3 October 1994, had adopted a set of resolutions concerning the peace process. Third, a dissident group within the Armed Forces of Liberia had attempted to stage a coup against the Transitional Government on 15 September. The attempted coup had been successfully foiled by ECOMOG.

The Secretary-General noted that the political, military and humanitarian developments of the past month had left Liberia in a desperate state. It was obvious that the peace process had stalled. At the ECOWAS summit, held at Abuja on 5 and 6 August, President Rawlings of Ghana had indicated that if there was no progress by the end of the year, he would be obliged to consider withdrawing the Ghanaian contingent from ECOMOG. Other countries had also indicated that they might withdraw. The Secretary-General pointed out that a withdrawal or significant downsizing of ECOMOG would have serious consequences both for Liberia and for the subregion. He had decided to dispatch a high-level mission to consult the Chairman of ECOWAS about the respective roles and responsibilities of ECOMOG and UNOMIL in Liberia, taking recent developments into account. That review would seek to determine how best the international community could continue to assist Liberia in bringing about a cessation of hostilities. He therefore recommended that the Security Council extend the mandate of UNOMIL for a period of two months to allow the high-level mission time to conduct its work and present its conclusions. After consideration of its findings, he would be in a position to make the appropriate recommendations to the Council on the future role of UNOMIL in Liberia.

At its 3442nd meeting, on 21 October 1994, the Security Council included in its agenda the report of the Secretary-General of 14 October 1994. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representative of Liberia, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The

President (United Kingdom) drew the attention of the Council to the text of a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.⁵⁹ He also drew the attention of the Council's members to a letter dated 14 October 1994 from the representative of Ghana addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁶⁰ transmitting the text of the Akosombo Agreement of 12 September.⁶¹

The representative of Liberia stated that the Security Council had the responsibility to prevent threats to international peace and security. He pointed out that the Liberian conflict had long ceased to be an internal matter. It had heightened the possibility of creating instability in the West African subregion and it had had repercussions beyond that region. The presence in Liberia of UNOMIL was therefore indispensable to the peaceful resolution of the conflict. He expressed the view that the "laudable" and "pioneering" efforts of the United Nations in collaborating with a subregional organization in conflict resolution must not be allowed to fail because of a lack of resolve by the international community. His delegation joined the Secretary-General and the Security Council in the appeal for increased financial assistance to the Trust Fund for Liberia. It also appealed for assistance to address the urgent humanitarian needs that had arisen as a result of the recent escalation of fighting in Liberia.⁶²

Speaking before the vote, the representative of Nigeria queried whether the international community would remain "lukewarm" towards ECOMOG or whether it would support the regional effort to head off a crisis capable of threatening peace and security, which the Charter of the United Nations committed it to try to prevent. At that point in the evolution of the peace process, the Liberia factions, who alone bore full responsibility for its continuing lack of progress, should realize the futility of further intransigence and the necessity to opt for dialogue and peace. His delegation would, however, vote in favour of the draft resolution for the following reasons. First, the draft resolution would extend UNOMIL's mandate for a three-month period, showing that the international community was prepared to continue to assist Liberians until peace was achieved. Nigeria hoped that

⁶¹ Ibid., annex.

⁶² S/PV.3442, pp. 2-3.

that commitment on the part of the international community would find concrete expression in new financial and logistical support for ECOMOG. Second, the draft resolution reiterated the call for the full application of the arms embargo on the Liberian warring parties. Nigeria felt that the continued violation of the embargo had been largely responsible for fuelling the crisis. Third, the draft resolution reiterated calls to all Liberian factions to cease hostilities immediately and to agree to a new timetable for disengagement, disarmament and demobilization. Fourth, the draft resolution called upon Member States to contribute to the Trust Fund for Liberia. Several States, including Nigeria, that were contributing troops to ECOMOG, had served notice that without new financial assistance they would seriously consider withdrawing their troops. Nigeria sincerely hoped that the international community would act to prevent such an eventuality, which would likely have tragic consequences for peace in Liberia and even throughout the subregion. His delegation had reservations, however, concerning the reduction in the strength of UNOMIL and the setting of new conditions for future augmentation of the UNOMIL presence. Nigeria felt that it would have been wiser to allow the Secretary-General to use his discretion to continue to deploy UNOMIL personnel as and when appropriate.⁶³

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and was adopted unanimously as resolution 950 (1994), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolutions 788 (1992) of 19 November 1992, 813 (1993) of 26 March 1993, 856 (1993) of 10 August 1993, 866 (1993) of 22 September 1993 and 911 (1994) of 21 April 1994,

Having considered the reports of the Secretary-General of 18 May, 24 June, 26 August and 14 October 1994 on the United Nations Observer Mission in Liberia,

Commending the positive role of the Economic Community of West African States in its continuing efforts to restore peace, security and stability in Liberia,

Commending also the initiative taken by the President of Ghana, in his capacity as current Chairman of the Economic Community of West African States, to reactivate the peace process and find a durable solution to the conflict,

Noting the recommendations of the Liberian National Conference, and stressing the importance it attaches to strengthening the authority of the Liberian National Transitional Government in administering the country,

Commending those African States which have contributed troops to the Economic Community of West African States Monitoring Group and those Member States which have contributed to the United Nations Trust Fund for Liberia or have provided other assistance in support of the Monitoring Group,

Also commending the Monitoring Group for its role in quelling an attempted coup d'état against the Transitional Government in Monrovia,

Deeply concerned at the breakdown in the ceasefire, the severe deterioration in the security situation and the impact this is having on the civilian population of Liberia, particularly in rural areas, as well as on the ability of humanitarian agencies to provide emergency relief,

Expressing grave concern at the level of factional and ethnic warfare now prevailing in much of Liberia,

Stressing the importance it attaches to the achievement of an effective ceasefire as a necessary pre-condition for progress in the peace process and the holding of national elections,

1. Welcomes the report of the Secretary-General of 14 October 1994 and his intention to send a high-level mission to consult with States members of the Economic Community of West African States on how the international community can best continue to assist the peace process in Liberia;

2. Decides to extend the mandate of the United Nations Observer Mission in Liberia until 13 January 1995;

3. Recognizes that circumstances on the ground warranted the Secretary-General's decision to reduce the strength of the Mission, and considers that any decision to return it to the authorized level will depend on consideration by the Security Council of a further report from the Secretary-General reflecting a real improvement in the situation on the ground, in particular the security situation;

4. Calls upon all factions in Liberia to cease hostilities immediately and to agree to a timetable for disengagement of forces, disarmament and demobilization;

5. Also calls upon the Liberian National Transitional Government and all Liberians to seek political accommodation and national reconciliation and to work with the Chairman of the Economic Community of West African States and with the Special Representative of the Secretary-General to achieve a durable settlement;

6. Calls once again upon all States strictly to abide by and comply with the general and complete embargo on all deliveries of weapons and military equipment to Liberia imposed by resolution 788 (1992) under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations;

7. Condemns the widespread killings of civilians and other violations of international humanitarian law by the factions in Liberia and the detention and maltreatment of

Mission observers, Economic Community of West African States Monitoring Group soldiers, humanitarian relief workers and other international personnel, and demands that all the factions strictly abide by applicable rules of international humanitarian law;

8. Demands that all factions in Liberia strictly respect the status of Monitoring Group and Mission personnel, and those of other international organizations and humanitarian relief agencies working in Liberia, refrain from any acts of violence, abuse or intimidation against them and return forthwith equipment seized from them;

9. Urges Member States to provide support for the peace process in Liberia through the United Nations Trust Fund for Liberia, in order to enable the Monitoring Group to fulfil its mandate;

10. Commends the efforts of Member States and humanitarian organizations to provide emergency humanitarian assistance, including to Liberian refugees in neighbouring countries, and calls upon all factions in Liberia to cooperate fully in creating the conditions necessary for the delivery of humanitarian assistance to all in need in Liberia;

11. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the Security Council well in advance of the end of the current mandate period with recommendations as to the future role of the Mission, in the light of developments in the peace process and in the situation on the ground and the recommendations of his high-level mission;

12. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of Brazil referred to paragraph 3 of the resolution and stated that the decision to reduce the strength of UNOMIL fell entirely within the purview of the Secretary-General's responsibilities. That "temporary measure", as it had been described in the Secretary-General's report, was adopted in view of the lack of security in some parts of Liberia. It was the Secretary-General's prerogative to take decisions on force strength, provided that they did not violate the authorized level determined by the Security Council. Since the resolution just adopted did not provide for a change in the force level or concept of operations of UNOMIL, a decision by the Secretary-General to re-establish the number of UNOMIL military observers should not require specific authorization from the Council. It was Brazil's view that the Council should be consistent. It was undeniable that circumstances sometimes required changes or adaptations of mandates in the light of new realities. In this particular case, however, where UNOMIL had not been altered, there should not be a change in the mandate or concept of the Mission, with the imposition of "non-existent" conditionalities.⁶⁴

The representative of the United States stated that UNOMIL was sent in to observe a ceasefire, but the firing had not ceased. Instead, UNOMIL observers had been abused and humiliated by the warlords whose country they had come to protect. Humanitarian relief workers had come to help, yet they had been harassed and treated inhumanely. The Secretary-General had been right to pull out two thirds of the UNOMIL observers. They should not go back until there was a real ceasefire, assumption of authority by a transitional Government and a commitment to disarmament by all the factions. In the view of the United States, given the precarious situation in Liberia, they should not go back until the Security Council decided to send them back.⁶⁵

The representative of the Russian Federation stated that his delegation had voted in favour of the resolution because it believed it sent a clear signal to the Liberian factions that the stagnation of the peace process was unacceptable. It also showed that the Security Council intended to take developments in the situation into account and to adjust its activities accordingly if the contending factions did not take rapid and effective steps towards a peaceful settlement. The Russian Federation also regarded it as highly important that the resolution just adopted called upon all States strictly to abide by and comply with the general and complete embargo on all deliveries of weapons and military equipment to Liberia.⁶⁶

Decision of 13 January 1995 (3489th meeting):
resolution 972 (1995)

On 6 January 1995, pursuant to resolution 950 (1994), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council his eighth progress report on UNOMIL.⁶⁷ The report contained the findings of a high-level mission to ECOWAS member States and described the consultations held among the parties during the reporting period.

The Secretary-General reported on the findings of the high-level mission, which had been sent to Ghana, Côte d'Ivoire, Nigeria, Liberia, Guinea and Sierra Leone to discuss with States members of ECOWAS the deterioration of the situation in Liberia. The mission had concluded that, notwithstanding the tireless efforts of the Chairman of ECOWAS, the Liberian political and factional leaders were not yet committed to a sustainable peace in their country. Accordingly, it had made the following recommendations: (a) the Liberian political and factional leaders must be brought to understand that, in the absence of political accommodation and reconciliation, continued support from the international community would not be forthcoming; (b) ECOWAS member States, particularly the six directly involved with Liberia, should urgently organize an extraordinary meeting of Heads of State to resolve their differences and harmonize their policies on Liberia; (c) if the above could not be accomplished, ECOWAS should be encouraged to consider strengthening ECOMOG and restructuring it in order to achieve a better balance of troops, including contributions from other African countries; (d) international support, including financial support, logistics and equipment, should be sought to enable ECOMOG to carry out its mandate, particularly with respect to deployment, encampment and disarmament. A planning and logistics team from the Department of Peacekeeping Operations could visit Liberia to offer ECOMOG technical assistance in preparing the necessary proposals; and (e) the future of UNOMIL should depend on the successful implementation of the above steps. Meanwhile, UNOMIL's mandate should be extended for a limited period of three months from 13 January 1995.

The Secretary-General recalled that he had informed the Security Council that the Akosombo Agreement had been a source of significant controversy among those Liberian parties and interest groups which had not taken part in the negotiations. The Chairman of ECOWAS had dispatched delegations to Liberia and to several ECOWAS member States to seek a compromise. Negotiations had taken place in Accra, which had led to the presentation by Ghana of a compromise proposal. The Secretary-General noted that, although agreement had been reached in several areas, the parties had failed to reconcile their differences over the composition of the Council of State and the process of selecting its members. On 21 December 1994, having resolved their key differences, the parties were able to sign an agreement in Accra, which clarified and expanded the Akosombo Agreement. It stipulated that a ceasefire would come into effect by midnight on 28 December 1994. In addition, a new five-member Council of State would be installed within 14 days. The signatories to the Accra Agreement further agreed to facilitate the establishment of safe havens and buffer zones throughout Liberia.

The Secretary-General further reported that the military situation in Liberia had remained unstable. Hostilities had spread to over 80 per cent of the country, causing massive population displacement. The inability of ECOMOG to deploy troops along the borders, in accordance with the Cotonou Agreement, had been a factor in the continuous breach of the arms embargo. ECOMOG was deployed in less than 15 per cent of the country, while factions were continuing to acquire arms across the borders and from sources within Liberia. The Secretary-General expressed concern that that situation would have serious consequences for stability in the subregion. He called on the States members of ECOWAS to adhere strictly to the arms embargo and to renew their commitment to the principles of collective security in ensuring that the Liberian crisis was brought to an end.

The Secretary-General also recommended that the Security Council extend UNOMIL's mandate for a period of three months. During that period, his Special Representative would conduct an in-depth assessment of the role the United Nations military observers in Liberia could play in support of the peace process, and would make recommendations on adjustments in the strength of UNOMIL which might be required on the assumption that the Liberian leaders had provided the necessary evidence of their commitment to peace and their readiness to implement all the provisions of the Accra Agreement.

At its 3489th meeting, on 13 January 1995, the Security Council included in its agenda the report of the Secretary-General of 6 January 1995. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representative of Liberia, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (Argentina) then drew the attention of the Council's members to the text of a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.⁶⁸ He also drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 5 January 1995 from the representative of Ghana addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁶⁹ transmitting the text of an acceptance and accession agreement, signed by the leaders of the Liberian parties who had not signed the Akosombo Agreement, and an agreement on the clarification of the Akosombo Agreement.

The representative of Liberia stated that, while it was disappointing that talks in Accra among the faction leaders, which should have culminated in the establishment of a new Council of State, appeared to have ended in a stalemate, his delegation was hopeful that that was only a temporary setback. While his delegation recognized that it was up to Liberians to end the war and that the international community, particularly Member States of ECOWAS, had expended large resources on peacekeeping and peacemaking in Liberia, their continuing engagement in Liberia was needed. Even though his delegation welcomed the Secretary-General's recommendations for the extension of the new mandate of UNOMIL, it would have preferred a longer extension in view of UNOMIL's direct responsibilities in the implementation of the agreed schedule for the ceasefire and the disarmament and demobilization of the combatants, as well as in the holding of democratic elections on 14 November. The report of the Secretary-General had emphasized the urgent need for full compliance with the Council's arms embargo on Liberia. As long as arms were being provided to the factions, that would continue to result in the use of force. His delegation welcomed the request of the Secretary-General that an ECOWAS summit be convened to address those and other concerns. The Security Council needed to take appropriate steps, however, to ensure compliance with its own embargo. His delegation joined the Secretary-General's appeal for increased contributions to the Trust Fund and welcomed the Council's appeal for increased humanitarian assistance as set forth in the draft resolution.⁷⁰

Speaking before the vote, the representative of Nigeria stated that his delegation would have favoured an extension of UNOMIL's mandate for a six-month period, to allow sufficient time for the initial and critical stage of the military aspects of the Accra Agreement to commence and be observed before the Secretary-General presented his report to the Council. Because of the proposed three-month duration of the mandate, such a report by the Secretary-General would, of necessity, be tentative and could give the wrong impression of the prospects for implementing the relevant aspects of the Agreement. He also contended that the international community had a responsibility to continue to assist the process in Liberia, as it represented a classic example of cooperation between the United Nations and a regional organization in peacemaking and peacekeeping. Otherwise, the burden on ECOWAS countries, which was already a matter of great concern to most Governments of the subregion, would become even more unbearable. His delegation looked forward to the Secretary-General's forthcoming report on the assistance needed by ECOWAS member States in order to maintain their troops in ECOMOG. Another important element in the draft resolution related to the continuing flow of weapons into Liberia in violation of the arms embargo imposed by resolution 788 (1992). That proliferation of weapons not only complicated the prospects for disarmament but also compounded the problems of security and jeopardized the safety of ECOMOG and UNOMIL personnel in the country. It was important that all Member States abide by and comply with the embargo on deliveries of weapons and military equipment to Liberia.⁷¹

Referring to the length of the extension of UNOMIL's mandate, the representative of Italy stated that, on the one hand, three months was long enough to allow verification of whether or not the Liberian factions were complying with the Accra Agreement. On the other hand, the extension was short enough to issue a clear warning to the parties that the time had come for them to demonstrate their willingness to ensure peace in their country. The draft resolution also called for tightening the application of the arms embargo. A clear message should go out to the countries concerned that no peace would be reached until the arms flow across Liberian borders was interrupted.⁷²

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and was adopted unanimously as resolution 972 (1995), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolutions 788 (1992) of 19 November 1992, 813 (1993) of 26 March 1993, 856 (1993) of 10 August 1993, 866 (1993) of 22 September 1993, 911 (1994) of 21 April 1994 and 950 (1994) of 21 October 1994,

Having considered the reports of the Secretary-General of 18 May 1994, 24 June 1994, 26 August 1994, 14 October 1994 and 6 January 1995 on the United Nations Observer Mission in Liberia,

Viewing with appreciation the diplomatic achievement of the current Chairman of the Economic Community of West African States, Mr. Jerry Rawlings, President of Ghana, in bringing together the faction leaders of Liberia to sign the Accra Agreement on 21 December 1994, which builds upon the Yamoussoukro, Cotonou and Akosombo agreements and includes a timetable for the implementation of its provisions, Commending once again the efforts of the Economic Community of West African States, which has played a crucial role in the search for a peaceful solution to the Liberian conflict,

Commending also those African States which have contributed troops to the Economic Community of West African States Monitoring Group and those Member States which have provided assistance in support of the peace negotiations and the peacekeeping forces, including contributions to the United Nations Trust Fund for Liberia,

Expressing the hope that a summit of the States members of the Economic Community of West African States will be convened at the earliest possible date to harmonize their policies on Liberia and promote implementation of the Accra Agreement, including tightening the application of the arms embargo,

Taking note with concern that there has been a continuing inflow of arms in Liberia in violation of the existing arms embargo, which has further destabilized the situation in Liberia,

Deeply concerned that the humanitarian situation in Liberia has worsened owing to the lack of security in the country and the resulting inability of national and international relief organizations to function effectively,

Calling upon the Liberian leaders and factions to demonstrate their commitment to the peace process by maintaining the ceasefire, which came into effect on 28 December 1994, recommitting themselves to the disarmament process and implementing without delay all provisions of the Accra Agreement,

1. Welcomes the report of the Secretary-General of 6 January 1995;

2. Decides to extend the mandate of the United Nations Observer Mission in Liberia until 13 April 1995;

3. Expresses deep concern at the failure of the Liberian parties so far to reach agreement, at the recent talks in Accra, on the composition of the Council of State as stipulated in the Accra Agreement, and calls upon them to work together to implement the Agreement by upholding the ceasefire, resuming disarmament and demobilization of combatants and implementing the other relevant aspects of the Agreement in accordance with the timetable, including the prompt installation of the New Council of State;

4. Requests that the Secretary-General base any decision to return the Mission and its civilian staff to the level authorized under resolution 866 (1993) on the existence of an effective ceasefire and on the ability of the Mission to carry out its mandate;

5. Also requests that the Secretary-General report to the Security Council on or before 1 March 1995 on the situation in Liberia and on the role of the Mission and of the Economic Community of West African States Monitoring Group, including on the needs of States members of the Economic Community of West African States to maintain their troops in the Monitoring Group;

6. Reminds all Member States of their obligation strictly to abide by and comply with the embargo on all deliveries of weapons and military equipment to Liberia imposed by resolution 788 (1992);

7. Demands once more that all factions in Liberia strictly respect the status of personnel of the Monitoring Group and the Mission and those of organizations and personnel delivering humanitarian assistance throughout Liberia, and further demands that those factions facilitate such deliveries and that they strictly abide by applicable rules of international humanitarian law;

8. Urges Member States to provide support for the peace process in Liberia by contributing to the United Nations Trust Fund for Liberia and by providing financial, logistical and other assistance in support of the troops participating in the Monitoring Group in order to enable the Monitoring Group to deploy fully and to carry out its mandate, particularly with respect to encampment and disarmament of the Liberian factions;

9. Requests, in this regard, the Secretary-General to continue his efforts to obtain financial and logistical resources from Member States;

10. Commends the efforts made by Member States and humanitarian organizations to provide emergency humanitarian assistance and especially the efforts of neighbouring countries to assist Liberian refugees;

11. Commends also the ongoing efforts of the Economic Community of West African States to further the Liberian peace process, and the commitment of the Monitoring Group to ensure the safety of military observers and civilian staff of the Mission;

12. Welcomes the tireless efforts by the Secretary-General and his Special Representative to promote the cause of peace in Liberia;

13. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of France stated that his delegation had voted in favour of the resolution just adopted to enable the parties to provide concrete proof of their good will and spirit of responsibility. The Government of France urged the Liberian factions to respect the ceasefire concluded on 28 December and called for strict implementation of the arms embargo. His Government supported the Secretary-General's recommendation for the holding of a summit of the Heads of State of the region to harmonize their policies towards Liberia and promote the implementation of the Accra Agreement. The continuation of the conflict in Liberia was a threat to stability in the region. The humanitarian situation, which had left the population in extreme distress, was of deep concern to France, which called upon the parties to respect their commitments and to ensure that military commanders allow assistance to reach its destination.⁷³

The representative of the United Kingdom stated that his delegation welcomed the signing of the Accra Agreement as a positive step towards the solution of the Liberian conflict. In the light of that development and, in particular, the implementation of a ceasefire, the United Nations should maintain its involvement in the peace process in Liberia. It was for that reason that his delegation had voted in favour of the resolution. One of the important issues covered in the resolution just adopted was that of reminding all Member States of their obligation strictly to abide by, and comply with, the arms embargo. The damaging effect of the brutal conflict in Liberia, not only on the people of that country but also on Liberia's neighbours, was a matter of growing concern to his delegation. The conflict was being sustained by arms traffic across and within Liberia's borders, which could only increase the risk of regional destabilization.⁷⁴

The representative of the United States stated that his delegation was pleased to support the extension of UNOMIL's mandate for another three months. UNOMIL, in conjunction with ECOMOG, had a critical role to play. If the peace agreement was implemented and the ceasefire was maintained, UNOMIL should be returned to the level authorized by resolution 866 (1993). The United States strongly supported humanitarian efforts to alleviate the suffering of the hundreds of thousands of persons displaced by the conflict. He urged all members of the international community to help further the peace process in Liberia and to support international and regional efforts to aid implementation of the Accra Agreement, and he hoped that other Member States of the United Nations would contribute generously to the Trust Fund for Liberia, because it was a tangible expression of support for the Liberian people's desire for peace.⁷⁵

The representative of the Russian Federation stated that the resolution just adopted provided for the optimum period for which, in existing conditions, the mandate of UNOMIL could be extended. It sent the Liberian parties a clear signal that they must strictly implement all the provisions of the peace agreement. His delegation considered appropriate the linkage of the establishment of the former level of UNOMIL personnel with the existence of a stable ceasefire. Russia had always considered that the active participation of African countries in the achievement of a settlement in Liberia was important for that country's return to the path of peaceful, democratic development. For that reason, his delegation viewed as most important the provisions in the resolution for strengthening the potential of ECOMOG, including through the help of the international community, and the provisions on convening a summit of the leaders of ECOWAS States with a view to harmonizing their policies on Liberia and promoting the implementation of the Accra Agreement through, among other things, tightening the embargo on the supply of arms to Liberia.⁷⁶

The representative of Rwanda stated that his delegation deplored a widespread attitude in the Security Council vis-à-vis the resolution of African conflicts. In 1994, the withdrawal of troops had, in some cases, led to massacres. In the case of another African country, the decision by the United Nations to disengage its forces had not been the best solution for the people of that country who were victims of warlords. In the case of Liberia, the decision to extend the presence of UNOMIL's peace forces by three months had not been taken for the good of the population but was, instead, a solution based on a strategy of threatening the parties to the conflicts. The search for solutions to conflicts like the one in Liberia should not be limited to a three-month period. Only a process, a slow path, could lead to consensus by all parties concerned. That was evidenced by the fact that in other regions of the world the Council had acted differently. As a gesture of solidarity and cooperation his delegation had voted in favour of the extension of UNOMIL's mandate until 13 April 1995.⁷⁷

⁷⁶ Ibid., p. 9.

Decision of 13 April 1995 (3517th meeting):
resolution 985 (1995)

On 10 April 1995, pursuant to resolution 972 (1995), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council his tenth progress report on UNOMIL.⁷⁸ The Secretary-General recalled that, under the Accra Agreement, a new Council of State should have been installed by 11 January 1995. As noted in his report of 24 February,⁷⁹ the parties had met in Accra, in January, under the auspices of ECOWAS, to decide on the membership of the Council. They were, however, unable to agree on that issue. The Secretary-General noted in that regard that the installation of the Council of State was an essential step in the implementation of the Accra agreement. Since, the parties had failed both to agree on the membership of the Council and to undertake the preparatory work necessary for the implementation of the agreement's other provisions. The Secretary-General also recalled that the Security Council had, in its resolution 972 (1995), expressed the hope that the States members of ECOWAS would convene a summit with a view to harmonizing their policies on Liberia, including tightening the application of the arms embargo. He indicated, in that regard, that he had exchanged views with the Chairman of ECOWAS and that they had agreed that the summit might be held in Abuja. The Nigerian Head of State had welcomed the proposal. The Chairman of ECOWAS was consulting with the other ECOWAS members to prepare the summit and to achieve a consensus on its agenda. The Secretary-General observed that it was essential that the proposed ECOWAS summit on Liberia be convened as soon as possible. It would, it was hoped, re-start the peace process and achieve concrete results by harmonizing the policies of ECOWAS member States and installing the Council of State. He urged the member States

⁷⁷ Ibid., pp. 9-10.

⁷⁹ S/1995/158. The report also provided for a number of options regarding the role of UNOMIL.

concerned to hold the summit in the near future and to do all they could to ensure it was a success.

The Secretary-General reported that military activities had intensified throughout the country and the overall situation had further deteriorated. The civilian population continued to suffer and the factions' military activities had impeded the delivery of essential relief items to most areas of the country.

The Secretary-General recalled the options he had proposed to the Council in his previous report and acknowledged that it could be argued that the continuing political impasse made it necessary for the Council to address those options at that time. He contended, however, that the proposed ECOWAS summit offered a possibility that the peace process might shortly be re-launched. He was therefore of the opinion that it would be premature to withdraw UNOMIL. He recommended that the Council extend the mandate of UNOMIL until 30 June 1995. It was his intention, given that the security situation was preventing UNOMIL from carrying out its mandate, to reduce its military strength by about 20 observers. As soon as the situation improved, the military component of UNOMIL would be strengthened as necessary.

At its 3517th meeting, on 13 April 1995, the Security Council included in its agenda the report of the Secretary-General of 10 April 1995. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representative of Liberia, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (Czech Republic) then drew the attention of the Council to the text of a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.⁸⁰

Speaking before the vote, the representative of Nigeria stated that the draft resolution was right in extending the mandate of UNOMIL until 30 June 1995. It was also appropriate to call on all Liberian parties once again to implement the Akosombo and Accra Agreements, by re-establishing an effective ceasefire and installing the Council of State. Violations of the arms embargo imposed under resolution 788 (1992) had not helped the collective efforts to promote peace in Liberia. Therefore his delegation endorsed paragraph 4 of the draft resolution, which aimed to tighten the arms embargo and which established a

Committee of the Security Council to monitor compliance with the arms embargo regime.⁸¹

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and was adopted unanimously as resolution 985 (1995), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolutions 813 (1993) of 26 March 1993, 856 (1993) of 10 August 1993, 866 (1993) of 22 September 1993, 911 (1994) of 21 April 1994, 950 (1994) of 21 October 1994 and 972 (1995) of 13 January 1995,

Recalling also its resolution 788 (1992) of 19 November 1992, in which it decided, under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations, that all States should, for the purpose of establishing peace and stability in Liberia, immediately implement a general and complete embargo on all deliveries of weapons and military equipment to Liberia until the Security Council decided otherwise, and in which it decided also that the embargo should not apply to weapons and military equipment destined for the sole use of the peacekeeping forces of the Economic Community of West African States in Liberia, subject to any review that may be required in conformity with the report of the Secretary-General,

Having considered the reports of the Secretary-General of 24 February and 10 April 1995 on the United Nations Observer Mission in Liberia,

Deeply concerned that the ceasefire in Liberia has broken down, precluding the full deployment of the Mission and preventing it from carrying out its mandate fully,

Noting with deep concern that in violation of resolution 788 (1992) arms continue to be imported into Liberia, exacerbating the conflict,

Welcoming the decision of the Economic Community of West African States to hold a summit of Heads of State in May 1995,

1. Decides to extend the mandate of the United Nations Observer Mission in Liberia until 30 June 1995;

2. Urges all Liberian parties to implement the Akosombo Agreement and the Accra Agreement by re-establishing an effective ceasefire, promptly installing the Council of State and taking concrete steps towards the implementation of the other provisions of the agreements;

3. Encourages the States members of the Economic Community of West African States to promote implementation of the Akosombo and Accra Agreements and to continue to do all in their power to facilitate a political settlement in Liberia;

4. Urges all States, and in particular all neighbouring States, to comply fully with the embargo on all deliveries of weapons and military equipment to Liberia imposed by resolution 788 (1992), and, to that end, decides to establish, in accordance with rule 28 of its provisional rules of procedure, a Committee of the Security Council, consisting of all the members of the Council, to undertake the following tasks and to report on its work to the Council with its observations and recommendations:

(a) To seek from all States information regarding the action taken by them concerning the effective implementation of the embargo imposed by paragraph 8 of resolution 788 (1992);

(b) To consider any information brought to its attention by States concerning violations of the embargo, and, in that context, to make recommendations to the Council on ways of increasing the effectiveness of the embargo;

(c) To recommend appropriate measures in response to violations of the embargo imposed by paragraph 8 of resolution 788 (1992) and provide information on a regular basis to the Secretary-General for general distribution to Member States;

5. Expresses its appreciation to the Chairman of the Economic Community of West African States for his initiative in organizing a regional summit on Liberia and to the Government of Nigeria for agreeing to host it, and urges all parties to participate;

6. Demands once more that all factions in Liberia strictly respect the status of personnel of the Economic Community of West African States Monitoring Group and the Mission, and of organizations and personnel delivering humanitarian assistance throughout Liberia, and further demands that these factions facilitate such deliveries and that they strictly abide by applicable rules of international humanitarian law;

7. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the Security Council by 15 June 1995 on the situation in Liberia, including whether there is an effective ceasefire and whether the Mission can carry out its mandate, and on the status of contributions of financial and logistical resources from the international community in support of the troops participating in the Monitoring Group, and notes that the Council will consider the future of the Mission in the light of the report of the Secretary-General;

8. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of the United States expressed her delegation's belief that UNOMIL had a key role to play in monitoring implementation of the peace process and protecting civilians. Unfortunately, it had been unable thus far to carry out its mandate because of the continuing hostilities. The United States supported the limited extension of the UNOMIL mandate, in the hope that the ECOWAS summit would give real impetus to peace. She warned, however, that technical roll-overs were not a solution and that the patience of the international community was not endless.⁸²

The representative of the Russian Federation stated that his delegation had voted in favour of the resolution just adopted because it gave the Liberian parties a clear signal that the international community was prepared to continue to render assistance in settling the conflict, while also containing a warning that the future extension of UNOMIL would hinge on how far the Liberians succeeded in making progress towards re-establishing the peace process. That was one of the last real chances for a peace settlement to the crisis and that it must not be missed. The Russian Federation hoped that the ECOWAS summit would play an important and constructive role in resolving the conflict. The decision to establish a Security Council Committee to monitor compliance with the embargo imposed under resolution 788 (1992) would help normalize the situation not only in Liberia, but in the region as a whole. The Russian Federation urgently called on all States, especially Liberia's neighbours, to help improve the effectiveness of the arms embargo and to cooperate fully with the Committee.⁸³

The representative of Liberia stated that, until all forms of support to them were curtailed, the factions would not honour the agreements to which they were signatories. His delegation therefore welcomed the proposed ECOWAS summit and it was also grateful to the Security Council for the resolution just adopted, which contained elements that would help to ensure that the arms embargo was respected. The ECOWAS summit would offer the last, best hope for the Liberian parties to reach political accommodation and fully implement the terms of the previous agreements, including a ceasefire and installation of the Council of State. If the parties failed to avail themselves of that opportunity, the goodwill and support of the international community would be eroded. While Liberians realized that the Organization, indeed Member States, could not continue to utilize scarce resources to assist parties which were unwilling to resolve their differences peacefully, it should be borne in mind that the majority of Liberians desired to live in peace: it was the armed factions which continued to hold the people hostage. His delegation strongly believed that, in the post-cold-war era, the Organization should consider bold and imaginative measures to address problems resulting from internal conflicts in Member States. The Liberian people could only appeal to the international community not to leave them before there was a resolution to the conflict.⁸⁴

Decision of 30 June 1995 (3549th meeting):
resolution 1001 (1995)

On 10 June 1995, pursuant to resolution 985 (1995), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council his eleventh progress report on UNOMIL.⁸⁵ The Secretary-General indicated that fighting between the factions had continued, and they had continued to block access routes into inhabited areas, resulting in the disruption of the delivery of relief supplies and the unnecessary suffering of civilians. Several towns had changed hands and there had been reports of human rights abuses as combatants moved into or out of a particular area.

The Secretary-General reported that the Summit of ECOWAS had been held at Abuja, from 17 to 20 May 1995. While the Liberian parties had not reached a final agreement on the composition of the Council of State, a substantial measure of agreement had emerged on nearly all of the outstanding issues. The ECOWAS leaders had requested the leaders of the Liberian parties to conduct the necessary consultations towards a definitive solution. They had noted that, if and when agreement was secured, it would be imperative that the United Nations fully supported the implementation of the peace process, not only by bringing UNOMIL back to full strength, but also by securing resources both for ECOMOG and for rebuilding the country. They had also expressed their concern over the continued flow of arms into Liberia, in violation of the arms embargo and had reminded ECOWAS member States, as well as the international community at large, of their obligation to abide strictly by the arms embargo established by ECOWAS and the Security Council. They had also called on Member States to bring all violations of the embargo to the attention of the sanctions committee established by the Security Council under resolution 985 (1995). In addition, they had requested ECOMOG and UNOMIL to improve the existing monitoring mechanisms and had appealed to the international community to provide logistical support to ECOWAS, in order to facilitate the effective patrolling of Liberia's borders and stem the flow of arms into that country.⁸⁶

In view of those developments, the Secretary-General recommended that the Council extend UNOMIL's mandate for three months, until 30 September 1995. The Secretary-General hoped that, during that three-month period, the parties would reach an agreement on the outstanding issues and that they would demonstrate, through concrete steps, the political will necessary to bring the crisis to an end. Those steps would include: the installation and functioning of the Council of State; a comprehensive ceasefire; the disengagement of forces; and an agreed schedule for the implementation of the other aspects of the peace process, in particular disarmament. In the event that, at the end of that three-month period, the political stalemate continued and the necessary steps had not been implemented, UNOMIL would, subject to the consent of the Security Council, be terminated on 30 September 1995 and converted into a good offices mission. The Secretary-General would consult with ECOWAS on the modalities of the good offices role of the United Nations and would make recommendations to the Council in that regard.

If, on the other hand, there was significant progress over the following three months, the Secretary-General would recommend that the Council consider restoring UNOMIL to its full strength. UNOMIL's role in Liberia and its relationship with ECOMOG would then have to be adjusted, to enable the two operations to function more effectively. Over the next three months, he would consult with ECOWAS, with a view to enhancing cooperation between UNOMIL and ECOMOG and defining a joint concept of operations, and he would submit the necessary recommendations to the Council before 30 September 1995.

At its 3549th meeting, on 30 June 1995, the Security Council included in its agenda the report of the Secretary-General of 10 June 1995. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representative of Liberia, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (Germany) then drew the attention of the Council to the text of a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.⁸⁷

The representative of Liberia stated that the Secretary-General's proposal for an extension of the mandate was justified in view of several positive developments, such as the substantial measure of agreement among the Liberian factions, the visit of the leader of the National Patriotic Front of Liberia to Nigeria, the assumption by the Liberian National Transitional Government of administrative control of two additional political subdivisions of the country, and steps taken to remove landmines in fulfilment of one of the important requirements of the disarmament process. However, his delegation was aware that the slow progress in the peace process had resulted in a high cost to the international community, particularly to the Member States of ECOWAS. It believed, nevertheless, that the persistent demands of the international community, that the factional leaders end the war, had facilitated the progress achieved in the peace process. Without the pressure and the active support of the United Nations, the Liberian conflict would long ago have degenerated into a state of anarchy. His delegation would urge the reconsideration of any action by the United Nations which would suggest an abandonment of Liberia, as that would only embolden the warring factions to accelerate the use of arms and terror to achieve their political ends.⁸⁸

Speaking before the vote, the representative of Nigeria stated that his delegation was proud that ECOMOG represented a first-case initiative by a subregional organization within the ambit of regional arrangements in crisis management and conflict resolution in respect of a situation that threatened not only the survival of the country but also regional and international peace and security. The creation of ECOMOG had given practical expression to the cooperation envisaged in Chapter VIII of the Charter of the United Nations between regional organizations and the United Nations in the maintenance of international peace and security. In relation to the draft resolution, the Nigerian delegation had hoped for a renewal of UNOMIL's mandate of at least three months, as had been recommended by the Secretary-General in his report. In its view, such a time frame was the minimum required for the Liberian parties to deliver fully on the new commitments they had undertaken in Abuja, as well as to enable the consultations that were taking place in the subregion to bear fruit. Any undue shortening of the period would send a negative message to the factions in Liberia and could result in a full-scale resumption of warfare. There was also a need to assist ECOMOG with logistics and financial resources so that it could deliver on its commitments. Without a viable ECOMOG, UNOMIL's role and effectiveness in Liberia would be seriously constrained.⁸⁹

The representative of Botswana stated that the intractability of the situation in Liberia was discouraging, but that it would be wrong for the Council to give up trying to find a solution to it. The United Nations was a source of hope for the Liberian people, and the presence of UNOMIL assured them that the international community was actively engaged in the search for solutions to their tragedy. The contribution of UNOMIL to the peace process far outweighed its numerical strength. He also noted that ECOWAS had contributed to a new experience in the responsibilities of regional organizations in the maintenance of peace and security under Chapter VIII of the Charter. The efforts of ECOWAS provided important lessons for future peacekeeping operations and deserved the full support of the Security Council and the international community as a whole. He further observed that the States in the subregion had a pivotal role to play in the monitoring and stemming of the flow of arms to Liberia. Botswana welcomed their commitment to report violations of the arms embargo to the United Nations sanctions committee.⁹⁰

The representative of China observed that ECOWAS had made tremendous efforts and sacrifices in the search for a settlement of the Liberian question, including sending peacekeeping forces to Liberia in accordance with Chapter VIII of the Charter. The repeated setbacks in the Liberian peace process had proved once again, however, that peace could not be achieved by military means. China had always maintained that the Security Council should attach the same importance to the settlement of conflicts in Africa as it did to conflicts on other continents, that it should support the reasonable demands of the African countries and peoples, and that it should refrain from applying double standards when it came to peacekeeping operations in Africa.⁹¹

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1001 (1995), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolutions 788 (1992) of 19 November 1992, 813 (1993) of 26 March 1993, 856 (1993) of 10 August 1993, 866 (1993) of 22 September 1993, 911 (1994) of 21 April 1994, 950 (1994) of 21 October 1994, 972 (1995) of 13 January 1995, and 985 (1995) of 13 April 1995,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 10 June 1995 on the United Nations Observer Mission in Liberia, Emphasizing that the people of Liberia bear the ultimate responsibility for achieving peace and national reconciliation,

Commending the positive role of the Economic Community of West African States in its continuing efforts to restore peace, security and stability in Liberia,

Welcoming the recent summit meeting of Heads of State and Government of the Committee of Nine on Liberia of the Economic Community of West African States, in Abuja, Nigeria, from 17 to 20 May 1995,

Noting that a further concerted and harmonized effort by all concerned, including the States members of the Economic Community of West African States, would be helpful to advance the peace process,

Concerned that the Liberian parties have so far failed to install the Council of State, re-establish an effective ceasefire and take concrete steps towards the implementation of the other provisions of the Accra Agreement,

Deeply concerned also at the continuing inter-factional and intra-factional fighting in parts of Liberia, which has further worsened the plight of the civilian population, particularly in rural areas, as well as affected the ability of humanitarian agencies to provide relief,

Calling upon the Liberian factions, especially the combatants, to respect the human rights of the civilian population and to respect international humanitarian law,

Expressing great concern over the continued flow of arms into Liberia in violation of Security Council resolution 788 (1992),

Commending those African States which have contributed troops to the Economic Community of West African States Monitoring Group and those Member States which have provided assistance in support of the peace negotiations and the peacekeeping forces, including contributions to the United Nations Trust Fund for Liberia,

1. Welcomes the report of the Secretary-General of 10 June 1995;

2. Stresses that continued international community support for the peace process in Liberia, including the continued presence of the United Nations Observer Mission in Liberia, is contingent on immediate actions by the Liberian parties to resolve their differences peacefully and achieve national reconciliation;

3. Decides to extend the mandate of the Mission until 15 September 1995;

4. Urges that the Liberian parties use this period to make serious and substantial progress towards the implementation of the Akosombo Agreement and the Accra Agreement and specifically to accomplish the following steps:

(a) Installation of the Council of State;

(b) Re-establishment of a comprehensive and effective ceasefire;

(c) Disengagement of all forces;

(d) Creation of an agreed timetable and schedule for the implementation of all other aspects of the agreements, in particular the disarmament process;

5. Declares its intention, after consideration of the report of the Secretary-General, not to renew the mandate of the Mission on 15 September 1995, unless the steps in paragraph 4 above are complied with by that date;

6. Declares its readiness, if significant progress in the peace process in Liberia regarding the steps in paragraph 4 above is achieved by 15 September 1995, to consider restoring the Mission to its full strength with appropriate adjustment of its mandate and the relationship with the Economic Community of West African States Monitoring Group to enable these two operations to carry out their respective functions more effectively, as well as to consider other aspects of post-conflict peacebuilding in Liberia;

7. Urges the Ministers of the Committee of Nine on Liberia of the Economic Community of West African States, as authorized by their heads of State and Government at the Abuja Summit of 17 to 20 May 1995, to reconvene a meeting of the Liberian parties and political leaders as soon as possible in order to resolve finally the outstanding issues of political settlement;

8. Urges Member States in the meantime to provide additional support for the peace process in Liberia by contributing to the United Nations Trust Fund for Liberia and by providing financial, logistical and other assistance in support of the troops participating in the Monitoring Group in order to enable it to deploy fully and to carry out its mandate, particularly with respect to encampment and disarmament of the Liberian factions;

9. Requests the Secretary-General, in this regard, to continue his efforts to obtain financial and logistical resources from Member States, and urges those States that have pledged assistance to fulfil their commitments;

10. Reminds all States of their obligations to comply strictly with the embargo on all deliveries of weapons and military equipment to Liberia imposed by resolution 788 (1992) and to bring all instances of violations of the arms embargo before the Security Council Committee established pursuant to resolution 985 (1995);

11. Reaffirms the continued necessity for the Monitoring Group and the Mission to cooperate in fulfilling their respective mandates, and, to this end, urges the Monitoring Group to enhance its cooperation with the Mission at all levels to enable the Mission to discharge its mandate;

12. Urges the Monitoring Group in accordance with the agreement regarding the respective roles and responsibilities of the Mission and the Monitoring Group in the implementation of the Cotonou Agreement, to take necessary action to provide security for observers and civilian staff of the Mission;

13. Demands once more that all factions in Liberia strictly respect the status of personnel of the Monitoring Group and the Mission, as well as of organizations and agencies delivering humanitarian assistance throughout Liberia, and further demands that these factions facilitate such deliveries and that they strictly abide by applicable rules of international humanitarian law;

14. Commends the efforts made by Member States and humanitarian organizations in providing emergency humanitarian assistance and especially those of neighbouring countries in assisting Liberian refugees;

15. Urges the Organization of African Unity to continue its collaboration with the Economic Community of West African States in promoting the cause of peace in Liberia;

16. Expresses its appreciation to the Secretary-General and his Special Representative for their tireless efforts to bring peace and reconciliation to Liberia;

17. Requests the Secretary-General to continue, as described in his report, to review the level of personnel of the Mission, to adapt the practical implementation of the mandate and to report as appropriate;

18. Also requests the Secretary-General to report to the Security Council before 15 September 1995 on the situation in Liberia;

19. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of the United States stated that her Government supported the extension of UNOMIL's mandate, despite its deep disappointment over the lack of progress of the Mission. She stressed, however, that unless by

15 September there was a real ceasefire, the installation and assumption of real authority by a new Council of State, a serious commitment by all the factions to disarmament and disengagement and a specific schedule for the rest of the peace process, UNOMIL would end.⁹² The latter view was echoed by the representatives of France and the Russian Federation.⁹³

The representatives of Italy and Germany shared the view of the Secretary-General that in the event conditions in Liberia would not permit UNOMIL to fulfil its mandate,⁹⁴ it would have to be turned into a good-offices mission.

Decision of 15 September 1995 (3577th meeting): resolution 1014 (1995)

On 9 September 1995, pursuant to resolution 1001 (1995), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council his twelfth progress report on UNOMIL.⁹⁵ The Secretary-General reported that there had been some positive developments on the political front and the prospects for peace were perhaps better than they had been at any time since the outbreak of the civil war. The Chairman of ECOWAS had convened a meeting of the factions at Abuja, from 16 to 19 August, which had culminated in the signing of the "Abuja Agreement". The Abuja Agreement amended and supplemented the Cotonou and Akosombo accords, as subsequently clarified by the Accra agreements. It provided for, and resulted in, inter alia, the establishment of a ceasefire on 26 August and the installation of a new Council of State on 1 September. According to reports the Secretary-General had received, the new transitional government was enjoying the full support of all the key political leaders in Liberia. It was also reported that the parties had begun the process of disengaging their forces. In addition, over the past few months, the ECOWAS States had effectively harmonized their policies towards Liberia. Their representatives had met with the leaders of the factions on numerous occasions to facilitate a final agreement, and a new spirit of cooperation seemed to have emerged between the Liberian parties and ECOWAS.

⁹⁵ S/1995/781.

The Secretary-General noted that, while the success of the peace process in Liberia was primarily dependent upon the goodwill of the Liberian parties, there were several critical elements in the process, which required the full involvement and support of the international community. Among them were the demobilization and reintegration of combatants into civilian life and the provision of technical and logistical assistance to the national police.

The Secretary-General intended to consult the Chairman of ECOWAS on the possibility of holding a pledging conference for Liberia to raise resources needed by ECOMOG and for other needs critical to the advancement of the peace process in Liberia. He also planned to dispatch a mission to Liberia to assess the requirements in the evolving implementation of the Abuja Agreement. It was also his intention to deploy 42 additional military observers to UNOMIL to enable it to carry out its responsibilities in monitoring the ceasefire and the disengagement of forces. At the same time, UNOMIL would continue to work with ECOMOG on the adoption of a joint concept of operations, which would be presented to the Security Council for its consideration. He recommended that the Council consider extending the mandate of UNOMIL until 31 January 1996. During that period, in accordance with the Abuja Agreement, the parties should make every effort to complete the disengagement, assembly, disarmament and demobilization of their forces. Should they, at any time, fail to fulfil their commitments under the agreement, the Secretary-General would not hesitate to invite the Security Council to reconsider UNOMIL's involvement in the process.

At its 3577th meeting, on 15 September 1995, the Security Council included in its agenda the report of the Secretary-General of 13 September 1995. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representatives of Ghana and Liberia, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (Italy) then drew the attention of the Council members to the text of a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations,⁹⁶ and read out a revision that had been made to the draft resolution.⁹⁷ He also drew their attention to a letter dated 25 August 1995 from the representative of Nigeria addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁹⁸ transmitting the text of the Abuja Agreement, and to a letter dated 30 August from the representative of Ghana addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁹⁹ transmitting the text of a letter dated 28 August 1995 from the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Ghana addressed to the Secretary-General, also attaching the text of the Abuja Agreement.

The representative of Ghana stated that, after many false starts and failures, the Liberian civil war was finally being brought to an end. The States of the West African subregion, themselves in dire economic straits, had borne an enormous burden in trying to contain the Liberian civil war. Nigeria and Ghana especially had felt compelled to make great sacrifices to resolve the Liberian situation and they were now exhausted. The United Nations needed to assume its rightful duty in marshalling the financial and material resources needed to turn the hope of a permanent peace and ordered civil life in Liberia into reality. The international community should shoulder its responsibility towards Liberia. It was crucial that the Security Council extend the mandate of UNOMIL, but beyond that was the Council's added duty to give support for any measures proposed by the Secretary-General to obtain the necessary resources for the tasks ahead. Those tasks included the augmentation of the troop strength of ECOMOG in a significant way to enable the force to fulfil its mandate to deploy throughout Liberia; to seal all the Liberian borders in order to ensure that no arms or ammunition were brought into Liberia; to encamp and disarm combatants of all factions; to establish roadblocks to check the movement of arms and assist in directing refugees and internally displaced persons; and to carry out confidence patrols to create an atmosphere conducive to the holding of free and fair elections. Those engaged in the situation in Liberia were on the verge of achieving a great victory for the international community and realizing the hope embodied in the Charter. Ghana appealed to the members of the Security Council to meet their responsibility.¹⁰⁰

The representative of Liberia observed that the Abuja Agreement was being implemented and offered better prospects than before for a final peaceful resolution of the Liberian crisis. He recalled that in resolution 1001 (1995) the Council had set a number of conditions for the extension of UNOMIL's mandate. Since then, the Council of State had been installed, the Cabinet had been appointed and was governing the country, and the ceasefire was generally holding. Against that background, Liberians were more hopeful than ever before that there would be a lasting peace. The Government was devising strategies to launch the revival of the economy, and was endeavouring to meet the food and health needs of the population, to reopen schools in areas that were now accessible and under its control, and to restore electric power, potable water and other social amenities to the capital. Discussions were also being held on the key issue of the reintegration of former combatants into civil society. All of those efforts could only be pursued, however, in an atmosphere of sustained peace and security. The Government was therefore working with ECOMOG and UNOMIL to implement, in a timely manner, the crucial elements of disarmament and demobilization of combatants, as stipulated in all the relevant Agreements. His delegation joined in the appeal that ECOMOG be provided with additional resources and other logistical support in order to execute its mandate. For five years ECOWAS had borne a substantial burden to maintain its presence in Liberia. In keeping with Article 52 of Chapter VIII of the Charter of the United Nations, which encouraged regional arrangements in the maintenance of international peace and security, the Security Council, through the creation and dispatch of UNOMIL, had complemented the efforts of ECOWAS. UNOMIL's involvement in the peace process had inspired confidence among Liberians that the international community was supportive of their desire to restore peace and normality in Liberia. It was the hope of the Government and people of Liberia that the United Nations would provide even more financial support to ECOMOG. When a democratically elected government was inaugurated in Liberia, the cooperation between ECOWAS and the United Nations would indeed be recorded in the annals of the Organization as a unique success story, the lessons of which could be applied to other conflicts in other parts of the world.¹⁰¹

Speaking before the vote, the representative of Nigeria stated that a breakthrough had occurred in the search for peace in Liberia following the successful conclusion of the Abuja Agreement. Nonetheless, his delegation realized that the real test of the new commitment to peace would lie in the readiness of the Liberian parties to implement the key aspects of the Agreement, particularly disengagement, encampment and disarmament, as provided for in the revised schedule. The ECOWAS leaders had played their part and the Liberian parties had done what the Security Council had asked of them. They were waiting to see what the international community, particularly the Security Council, was prepared to do in assisting the Liberian parties to implement all their Agreements and to support ECOMOG. The Secretary-General had rightly observed that, while the success of the peace process in Liberia was primarily dependent on the goodwill of the Liberian parties, there were several critical elements in the process that required the full involvement of the international community. They included disarmament and demobilization, the reintegration into civilian life of an estimated 50,000 to 60,000 combatants, and assistance to ECOMOG. More needed to be done to support ECOMOG. His delegation hoped that the proposal of the Secretary-General to organize a pledging conference for Liberia to raise the resources needed by ECOMOG would soon get off the ground and it appealed to the international community to respond generously. His delegation was happy to go along with the recommendation of the Secretary-General for a renewal of the UNOMIL mandate until 31 January 1996, but would have wished, however, for a commitment from the Council to a restoration of UNOMIL to its full strength as a firm expression of political support and of the support of the Council to the Liberian peace process. Nigeria looked forward to the recommendations of the Secretary-General relating to a new concept of operations for UNOMIL, including its relationship with ECOMOG.¹⁰²

The representative of China stated that his delegation was of the view that the peace process in Liberia had proved that only when the parties concerned demonstrate good will for a political settlement could there be a momentum for peace. In conflicts in certain regions, particularly those between various parties within a country, peace could not be brought about by mandatory means or imposed from outside. His delegation was also of the view that the active participation of the international community, particularly regional organizations, in the mediation and peacekeeping activities had also facilitated the peace process in Liberia.¹⁰³

The draft resolution was then put to the vote, as orally revised in its provisional form, and was adopted unanimously as resolution 1014 (1995), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling all its previous resolutions concerning the situation in Liberia, in particular resolution 1001 (1995) of 30 June 1995,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 9 September 1995 on the United Nations Observer Mission in Liberia,

Welcoming the recent Abuja Agreement signed by the Liberian parties on 19 August 1995, which amends and supplements the Cotonou Agreement and the Akosombo Agreement as subsequently clarified by the Accra Agreement,

Welcoming also the installation of a new Council of State, the re establishment of a comprehensive and effective ceasefire, the beginning of the disengagement of forces and the agreement on a new timetable and schedule for the implementation of all other aspects of the Agreement,

Commending the positive role of the Economic Community of West African States in its continuing efforts to restore peace, security and stability in Liberia,

Commending in particular the efforts of the Governments of Nigeria and Ghana as host and Chairman respectively of the Abuja meeting, which have significantly contributed to the conclusion of the Abuja Agreement by the Liberian parties,

Noting that with these positive developments the Liberian parties have made appreciable progress towards the peaceful resolution of the conflict,

Emphasizing the need for all the Liberian parties to respect and implement fully all the agreements and commitments they have entered into, in particular with regard to maintenance of the ceasefire, disarmament and demobilization of combatants and national reconciliation,

Emphasizing once again that the people of Liberia bear the ultimate responsibility for achieving peace and national reconciliation,

Expressing its appreciation to those African States that have contributed and are contributing troops to the Economic Community of West African States Monitoring Group,

Commending those Member States which have provided assistance in support of the peace process, including contributions to the United Nations Trust Fund for Liberia,

Noting that, with the signing of the Abuja Agreement, additional resources in terms of troops, equipment and logistic support would be required by the Monitoring Group if it is to be able to deploy throughout the country to oversee the implementation of the various aspects of the Agreement, in particular the disarmament and demobilization process,

1. Welcomes the report of the Secretary-General of 9 September 1995;

2. Decides to extend the mandate of the United Nations Observer Mission in Liberia until 31 January 1996;

3. Welcomes the intention of the Secretary-General to increase immediately by forty-two the number of military observers to monitor the ceasefire and the disengagement of forces, and considers that any increase beyond that should be based on progress on the ground in implementing the peace agreement;

4. Welcomes also the intention of the Secretary-General to submit by the end of October 1995, for the Council's consideration, recommendations concerning the new concept of operations of the Mission which should address, inter alia, measures to enhance the relationship between the Mission and the Economic Community of West African States Monitoring Group, aspects of disarmament and demobilization and the resources which the Mission will require to carry out its tasks effectively; and expresses its intention to review and respond to the recommendations of the Secretary-General in an expeditious manner;

5. Urges Member States to provide additional support for the peace process in Liberia by contributing to the United Nations Trust Fund for Liberia, and in this regard calls upon those States which have pledged assistance to fulfil their commitments;

6. Also urges all Member States to provide financial, logistical and other assistance in support of the Monitoring Group to enable it to carry out its mandate, particularly with respect to encampment and disarmament of the Liberian factions;

7. Requests the Secretary-General in this regard to continue his efforts to obtain financial and logistical resources from Member States, and welcomes his intention to organize, in consultation with the Chairman of the Economic Community of West African States, the holding of a pledging conference for Liberia as soon as possible to raise the resources needed by the Monitoring Group and for other needs critical to the advancement of the peace process in Liberia;

8. Welcomes the intention of the Secretary-General to dispatch a mission to Liberia to consult with the Liberian leaders and other interested parties on the requirements in the evolving implementation of the Abuja Agreement, and looks forward to his report on the mission's results and recommendations;

9. Encourages Member States, in particular African countries, to consider providing troops to the expanded Monitoring Group;

10. Stresses that continued support by the international community for the peace process in Liberia, including the continued participation of the Mission, is contingent on the continued commitment by the Liberian parties to resolve their differences peacefully and to achieve national reconciliation;

11. Reminds all States of their obligations to comply strictly with the embargo on all deliveries of weapons and military equipment to Liberia imposed by resolution 788 (1992) of 19 November 1992 and to bring all instances of violations of the arms embargo before the Security Council Committee established pursuant to resolution 985 (1995);

12. Calls upon the Monitoring Group, in accordance with the agreement regarding the respective roles and responsibilities of the Mission and the Monitoring Group in the implementation of the Cotonou Agreement, to take necessary action to provide security for the observers and civilian staff of the Mission;

13. Demands once more that all factions in Liberia strictly respect the status of personnel of the Monitoring Group and the Mission, as well as of organizations and agencies delivering humanitarian assistance throughout Liberia, and further demands that these factions facilitate such deliveries and that they strictly abide by applicable rules of international humanitarian law;

14. Commends the efforts made by Member States, including those of neighbouring countries, and humanitarian organizations in providing emergency humanitarian assistance to Liberian refugees, and calls upon them to increase the efforts already made to handle the voluntary and rapid return of refugees in their countries and other aspects of humanitarian assistance;

15. Encourages the Organization of African Unity to continue its post-conflict peacebuilding collaboration with the Economic Community of West African States in promoting the cause of peace in Liberia;

16. Expresses its appreciation to the Secretary-General, his Special Representative and all Mission personnel for their tireless efforts to bring peace and reconciliation to Liberia;

17. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of the United States stated that the adoption of the resolution just voted upon, renewing the mandate of UNOMIL, signalled the Council's recognition that the warring factions in Liberia had taken the important steps necessary to put their peace process back on track. Without that development, the United States could not have endorsed further support of UNOMIL at that time. She warned, however, that there was still a long way to go. Her delegation urged the Liberian Transitional Government to build on the steps already taken so that the peace would be lasting. The arms embargo declared by the Security Council must be strictly enforced. The Liberian factions and people must keep in mind, as the resolution reiterated, that continuing international support, including the participation of UNOMIL, would be contingent on their demonstrating through actions their commitment to resolve their differences peacefully. Above all, the ceasefire needed to be observed strictly by all sides. She also observed that Liberia would need the continued assistance of the international community to re-establish the social and institutional fabric of its society. She stated that the resolution not only supported the Secretary-General's immediate recommendations, but also laid down the groundwork for further changes and improvements in UNOMIL and its relationship with ECOMOG. Her delegation looked forward to the report of the Secretary-General at the end of October and was of the view that it would be premature to make further changes, particularly in the number of United Nations observers, until the Council had had the opportunity to review those recommendations.¹⁰⁴

The representative of France supported an increase in the numbers of UNOMIL observers, in order to monitor respect for the commitments undertaken by the Liberian factions at Abuja. His delegation also awaited with interest the report that the Secretary-General was to submit to the Council on the new concept of UNOMIL's operations, especially in the context of enhancing the relationship between UNOMIL and ECOMOG. The involvement of the United Nations also related to humanitarian aspects and it should extend to the economic sphere. The implementation of the Peace Agreement should be accompanied by a greater involvement of international financial institutions, whose assistance could be decisive in the implementation of troop demobilization, on which the restoration of peace depended.¹⁰⁵

The representative of the United Kingdom welcomed the decision to increase immediately the number of observers in UNOMIL. His delegation hoped that they would be deployed as soon as possible and looked forward to the Secretary-General's presentation of a new concept of operations for UNOMIL. Improved and effective cooperation between UNOMIL and ECOMOG would be the key to the success of both missions. He also stated that while the primary responsibility for the reconstruction of their country lay with the Liberian people, the international community would have an important role to play.¹⁰⁶

The representative of Rwanda stated that his delegation was convinced that the United Nations and the Security Council in particular, were not able to put an end to conflict in the region without the participation of regional and subregional African organizations. That was the reason why cooperation between the Security Council and the Secretariat and African regional organizations must be recommended. He also stated that one could not speak of peace in Liberia without talking about development. The demobilization of some tens of thousands of combatants, including children, required an enormous economic effort in order to involve those active forces in the economy and ensure schooling for children. Such demobilization should be funded by the international community, so as to avoid the new recruitment of demobilized individuals. Rwanda also called for financial support for ECOMOG, so that it might maintain peace throughout the country and ensure respect for the Abuja Agreement and the proper functioning of the new Council of State.¹⁰⁷

meeting): resolution 1020 (1995)

On 23 and 30 October 1995, pursuant to resolution 1014 (1995), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council his thirteenth progress report on UNOMIL.¹⁰⁸ The Secretary-General reported that, from 19 to 30 September, the technical team had travelled to Liberia to meet the Liberian parties, and on 1 and 2 October it had had consultations with ECOWAS at Accra. The Transitional Government had recognized that it was its responsibility to ensure the effective implementation of the Abuja Agreement, including the disarming and demobilization of combatants. It had also expressed the desire to work closely with ECOWAS, UNOMIL and the international community in the implementation of the Agreement. In accordance with the Peace Agreements, ECOWAS would continue to play the lead role in the peace process in Liberia, while ECOMOG would retain the primary responsibility for assisting the Transitional Government in the implementation of the military provisions of the agreements. With regard to UNOMIL, the Secretary-General recommended that it should continue to have the mandate of observing and monitoring the implementation of the Peace Agreements, with some adjustments.¹⁰⁹ He also made recommendations relating to the new concept of operations for UNOMIL.¹¹⁰ The new concept of operations would require 160 military observers. ECOMOG had estimated that it would require an additional 4,731 troops to carry out its concept of operations. The Secretary-General recalled that he had pointed out that the mission would be able to discharge its mandate only if ECOMOG had adequate resources to carry out its own responsibilities. He therefore intended to convene a conference on assistance to Liberia in New York, on 27 October.

In his conclusions, the Secretary-General expressed concerns about recent reports of ceasefire violations and the delays that such incidents had created in the disengagement process. He urged the Transitional Government to take the necessary action to avoid further incidents and to maintain the momentum of the peace process.

At its 3592nd meeting, on 10 November 1995, the Security Council included in its agenda the thirteenth progress report of the Secretary-General on UNOMIL. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representative of Liberia, at this request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (Oman) then drew the attention of the Council to the text of a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.¹¹¹

The representative of Liberia stated that, for the first time since the commencement of the Liberian conflict in 1989, the faction leaders had taken on the responsibility of administering the affairs of Government by serving as members of the Council of State. The new leadership had publicly pledged its total commitment to the peace process and had declared it to be irreversible. While deeds and not words would ultimately determine the outcome, his delegation believed in the sincerity of the Liberian leaders. His delegation also firmly believed that the support of the international community was indispensable. It endorsed the report of the Secretary-General, which reaffirmed the urgent need for international support to assist ECOMOG fully to achieve its mandate, to provide humanitarian assistance, to aid in the repatriation and resettlement of refugees, to facilitate the demobilization and reintegration of combatants into civil society, and to assist law enforcement, the judiciary and the electoral process. His delegation also endorsed the Secretary-General's recommendations on a new concept of operations for UNOMIL and was of the view that the implementation of the new mandate would ensure more effective coordination between UNOMIL and ECOMOG.¹¹²

Speaking before the vote, the representative of Nigeria stated that, while the main responsibility for the implementation of the Peace Agreement rested with the Liberian parties, the critical phase of disarmament and demobilization required the assistance and support of ECOMOG, UNOMIL and all the leaders of the region. In that regard, Nigeria had decided to increase its contingent in ECOMOG and had disbursed additional funds for the procurement of vital equipment for ECOMOG. Nevertheless, the regional efforts should be supplemented by those of the international community to provide ECOMOG with the logistical support, assistance in transportation, communications equipment and fuel that would enable it to discharge its functions effectively. His delegation supported the proposed adjustments to the mandate and concept of operations of UNOMIL, as they would enhance the ability of UNOMIL effectively to complement ECOMOG in the peace process.¹¹³

The representative of Botswana stated that ECOMOG had a vital role to play in the implementation of the ceasefire and the disarmament and demobilization of combatants. Referring to operative paragraph 7 of the draft resolution, he stated that the time had come for the international community to assume its responsibilities in the restoration of peace in Liberia. He also concurred with the Secretary-General that the demobilization and reintegration of combatants were essential to the success of the peace process. The United Nations had the responsibility to ensure that the gains that had been made were not reversed by the lack of resources for demobilization. Botswana fully supported the provision of resources for the demobilization under the assessed budget, as the demobilization was too important to be left to voluntary contributions, which might not be disbursed in a timely manner. Subparagraphs (a) to (g) of operative paragraph 2 of the resolution clearly outlined the adjusted mandate of UNOMIL. The successful implementation of the mandate would depend to a large extent on the cooperation of the Liberian parties with ECOMOG and UNOMIL.¹¹⁴

The representative of the United Kingdom expressed the support of his delegation for the Secretary-General's recommendations for an adjustment of the mandate of UNOMIL. He referred to the commitments that his Government had made at the Conference on Assistance to Liberia and urged others to provide assistance to ECOMOG to enable it to carry out its mandate. Without the necessary resources, ECOMOG would not be able to carry out the tasks assigned to it under the Abuja Agreement.¹¹⁵

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1020 (1995), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling all its previous resolutions concerning the situation in Liberia, in particular resolutions 866 (1993) of 22 September 1993 and 1014 (1995) of 15 September 1995,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 23 October 1995 on the United Nations Observer Mission in Liberia,

Commending the positive role of the Economic Community of West African States in its continuing efforts to restore peace, security and stability in Liberia,

Stressing the importance of full cooperation and close coordination between the Mission and the Economic Community of West African States Monitoring Group in the implementation of their respective mandates,

Noting the appreciable progress the Liberian parties have recently made towards the peaceful resolution of the conflict, including the re establishment of a ceasefire, installation of the new Council of State and an agreement on a timetable for the implementation of the peace process from ceasefire to election,

Noting also that the Liberian parties appear more determined than ever before to take tangible steps towards the restoration of peace and stability in their country,

Expressing its concern about the incidence of ceasefire violations and delays in the process of disengagement of forces,

Expressing its appreciation to those African States which have contributed and are contributing troops to the Monitoring Group,

Commending those Member States which have provided assistance in support of the peace process, including contributions to the United Nations Trust Fund for Liberia,

1. Welcomes the report of the Secretary-General of 23 October 1995;

2. Decides to adjust the mandate of the United Nations Observer Mission in Liberia to be defined as follows:

(a) To exercise its good offices to support the efforts of the Economic Community of West African States and the Liberian National Transitional Government to implement the peace agreements and to cooperate with them for this purpose;

(b) To investigate all allegations of violations of the ceasefire reported to the Ceasefire Violations Committee, to recommend measures to prevent the recurrence of such violations and to report to the Secretary-General accordingly;

(c) To monitor compliance with the other military provisions of the peace agreements, including disengagement of forces, and disarmament and observance of the arms embargo and to verify their impartial application;

(d) To assist, as appropriate, in the maintenance of assembly sites agreed upon by the Economic Community of West African States Monitoring Group, the Transitional Government and the factions and in the implementation of a programme for demobilization of combatants, in cooperation with the Transitional Government, donor agencies and non-governmental organizations;

(e) To support, as appropriate, humanitarian assistance activities;

(f) To investigate and report to the Secretary-General on violations of human rights and to assist local human rights groups, as appropriate, in raising voluntary contributions for training and logistic support;

(g) To observe and verify the election process, in consultation with the Organization of African Unity and the Economic Community of West African States, including the legislative and presidential elections to be held in accordance with provisions of the peace agreements;

3. Decides that the number of military observers should be a maximum of one hundred and sixty;

4. Welcomes, in this context, the recommendations contained in the report of the Secretary-General concerning the new concept of operations for the Mission;

¹¹⁴ Ibid., pp. 4-5.

¹¹⁵ Ibid., pp. 9-10.

5. Calls upon all the Liberian parties to respect and implement fully and expeditiously all the agreements and commitments they have entered into, in particular with regard to the maintenance of the ceasefire, disarmament and demobilization of combatants, and national reconciliation, taking into account the fact that the restoration of peace and democracy in Liberia is primarily the responsibility of those parties which signed the Abuja Agreement on 19 August 1995;

6. Urges Member States to provide additional support for the peace process in Liberia by contributing to the United Nations Trust Fund for Liberia, and in this regard encourages States that have pledged assistance to fulfil their commitments;

7. Urges also all Member States to provide financial, logistical and other assistance in support of the Monitoring Group to enable it to carry out its mandate, particularly with respect to assembly and disarmament of the Liberian factions;

8. Welcomes the commitments made at the Conference on Assistance to Liberia, held in New York on 27 October 1995;

9. Reiterates that continued support by the international community for the peace process in Liberia is contingent on the continued commitment by the Liberian parties to achieve national reconciliation in line with the peace process;

10. Urges the Transitional Government to take the necessary action to avoid further incidents of ceasefire violations and maintain the momentum of the peace process;

11. Reminds all States of their obligations to comply strictly with the embargo on all deliveries of weapons and military equipment to Liberia imposed by resolution 788 (1992) and to bring all instances of violations of the arms embargo before the Security Council Committee established pursuant to resolution 985 (1995);

12. Calls upon the Monitoring Group, in accordance with the agreement regarding the respective roles and responsibilities of the Mission and the Monitoring Group in the implementation of the Cotonou Agreement and the new concept of operations, to take necessary action to provide security for observers and civilian staff of the Mission;

13. Stresses the need for close contacts and enhanced coordination between the Mission and the Monitoring Group in their operational activities at all levels;

14. Demands once more that all factions in Liberia strictly respect the status of personnel of the Monitoring Group and the Mission, as well as of organizations and agencies delivering humanitarian assistance throughout Liberia, and further demands that these factions facilitate such deliveries and that they strictly abide by applicable rules of international humanitarian law;

15. Stresses the need for improved coordination in carrying out the repatriation of refugees and the resettlement of internally displaced persons;

16. Stresses also the importance of respect for human rights in Liberia as well as the necessity to rehabilitate promptly the penitentiary system in this country;

17. Requests the Secretary-General to submit by 15 December 1995 a progress report on the situation in Liberia including the implementation of the adjusted mandate of the Mission, as well as its new concept of operations;

18. Expresses its appreciation to the Secretary-General, his Special Representative and all Mission personnel for their tireless efforts to bring peace and reconciliation to Liberia;

19. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of France stated that, in order to ensure the success of the peace process, several conditions must be met. First, peace could return only if the Liberian factions fully abided by their Abuja commitments. Second, it was necessary for the United Nations to continue, along with ECOMOG, to support the completion of the peace process. The French delegation had voted in favour of the resolution because it clarified the division of tasks between UNOMIL and ECOMOG, with a view to enhancing the effectiveness of the personnel on the ground. Finally, the international community must continue to support those working for peace in Liberia. The convening of the Conference on Assistance to Liberia had been a major initiative. The French delegation hoped that States, international organizations and international financial organizations would demonstrate generosity and responsibility in order to enable Liberia and the entire African region to return to stability and the path of progress.¹¹⁶

The representative of the Russian Federation stated that the resolution just adopted and the recent Conference on Assistance to Liberia were a clear confirmation of the international community's readiness to support, not only in words but in deeds, the efforts of the Liberian parties, States members of ECOWAS, and OAU to put an end to the war in Liberia. Of particular importance was the factor of confidence-building among the participants in the peace process. His delegation deemed important the provision of the resolution that stressed the need for close contacts and enhanced coordination between UNOMIL and ECOMOG in their operational activities at all levels. Such action would foster the success of the peace process in Liberia. The positive experience gained through practical cooperation between the

United Nations and the regional organization in the maintenance of international peace and security would also prove useful for other peacemaking operations.¹¹⁷

The representative of the United States observed that, under the new concept of operations, UNOMIL would have a major role in the management of, and financial responsibility for, the demobilization process. The demobilization of tens of thousands of Liberian combatants was critical to the peace process. The United States believed that international humanitarian agencies and non-governmental organizations should be brought into the peace process as soon as possible — not only to ease the burden on UNOMIL, but also to ensure that the entire process, from disarmament through demobilization to reintegration into society, was carried out in an efficient, speedy and coordinated manner. The United States, along with many other countries, was working hard to mobilize resources for logistical support of ECOMOG's deployment, which was a precondition for UNOMIL's own deployment and the actual start of the disarmament and demobilization process. But the Liberian National Transitional Government, the Liberian factions and ECOMOG needed to do the maximum with the resources they already had to keep the process moving. If ECOMOG did not deploy in December, many combatants and civilians would lose faith in the peace process.¹¹⁸

The representative of Rwanda stated that his country wished to reiterate again its appeal to the Security Council and the Secretariat to resolve African problems only through Africa's own institutions, for the effect would be greater and would cost less. In the light of the African continent's economic situation, regional and subregional organizations needed only material and moral support in order to better carry out the tasks that States had assigned them. He contended that one could not ensure peace and stability in Somalia, Rwanda and Liberia without ensuring economic development, which was why his delegation was inviting the Security Council to take a different approach. He suggested that a "Marshall Plan" for Somalia, Rwanda and Liberia was not only possible and feasible, but it was necessary and indispensable in order to help those countries get back on their feet. Neglecting Africa might have adverse consequences, not only for African countries, but also for neighbouring continents.¹¹⁹

5. The situation concerning Rwanda

Initial proceedings

Decision of 12 March 1993 (3183rd meeting): resolution 812 (1993)

By a letter dated 28 February 1993 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹ the representative of Rwanda requested him to circulate as a document of the Council his letter dated 22 February 1993 in which he informed the Council of the resumption on 8 February 1993 of hostilities in the northern part of the country by the Rwandese Patriotic Front (RPF), and requested the deployment of a team of United Nations military observers on both sides of the frontier between Rwanda and Uganda. Such a team might ensure that no military assistance reached Rwandese territory from Uganda.

By a letter dated 22 February 1993 addressed to the President of the Council,² the representative of Uganda stated that his Government viewed the resumption of hostilities between the Rwandese Government Army and RPF as a flagrant violation of the Arusha ceasefire agreement signed by both parties and sought the assistance of the Council to authorize a United Nations observer/monitor force of appropriate size to be stationed on the border with Rwanda on the Uganda side in order to forestall any spread of the conflict into Uganda.

By a letter dated 4 March 1993 addressed to the President of the Council,³ the representative of Rwanda, describing the deterioration of the situation in his country as a threat to peace and security in the region, requested an immediate meeting of the Council to consider ways of ensuring the cessation of the fighting, the observance of the ceasefire agreement signed at Arusha,⁴ and the implementation of the declarations⁵ issued, respectively, by RPF and the Government of Rwanda on 21 and 22 February 1993 with a view to restoring the ceasefire and thereby enabling the search for a negotiated political solution to the crisis. His Government considered that an international force to maintain the ceasefire could supervise the zone between the positions occupied by RPF and those occupied by the Rwandese armed forces prior to the violation of the ceasefire. The representative of France made a similar request by a letter of the same day addressed to the President of the Council.⁶

At its 3183rd meeting, held on 12 March 1993 in response to the requests from the representatives of Rwanda and France, the Council included the two letters dated 4 March 1993 from those representatives in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representative of Rwanda, at his request, to participate in the discussion, without the right to vote. In addition to the two letters dated 22 and 28 February 1993, the President (New Zealand) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a note verbale dated 8 March 1993⁷ and a letter dated 10 March 1993⁸ addressed to the Secretary-General from the representatives of Rwanda and Senegal, respectively. The President also drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.⁹

The representative of Rwanda stated that, since 1 October 1990, his country had been the victim of a particularly atrocious war that jeopardized peace and security in the Great Lakes region, despite the efforts for peace made by his Government, with the assistance of the States of the subregion and the Organization of African Unity (OAU). While the negotiation process in Arusha between his Government and RPF had held hopes for peace, the resumption of hostilities at the beginning of February should be deplored. Many civilians were still being killed and mutilated and 1 million persons had been displaced. The Government of Rwanda proposed to relocate the war refugees in a neutral demilitarized zone. If responsibility for the comprehensive care of those refugees rested with the Government, the same could not be said for guaranteeing their safety, because of lack of human and material means. For that reason, it was a humanitarian imperative for Rwanda to be provided with a multi-purpose international force which would assure the safety of the refugees while also guaranteeing that the ceasefire was kept. He concluded by stating that the hope of Rwanda, whose fate and future were in the hands of the Secretary-General and the members of the Council, lay in the draft resolution before the Council.¹⁰

Speaking before the vote, the representative of Morocco expressed concern at the resumption of hostilities in Rwanda and the humanitarian situation prevailing in that country. He welcomed the swiftness with which the Secretary-General had dispatched a goodwill mission to the region and expressed support for the ongoing negotiation process between the parties, including the agreement reached in Dar-es-Salaam on the modalities of a ceasefire, which came into force on 9 March 1993, and the fate of displaced persons. He noted that the draft resolution took account of efforts made at the regional level and responded to the provisions of Chapter VI of the Charter.¹¹

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 812 (1993), which reads:

The Security Council,

Taking note of the request contained in the letter dated 4 March 1993 addressed to the President of the Security Council by the Chargé d'affaires a.i. of the Permanent Mission of Rwanda to the United Nations,

Also taking note of the letters dated 22 February 1993 from the Permanent Representative of Rwanda and the Permanent Representative of Uganda to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council in which the Governments of both those countries called for the deployment of United Nations observers along their common border,

Gravely concerned by the fighting in Rwanda and its consequences regarding international peace and security,

Alarmed by the humanitarian consequences of the latest resumption of the fighting in Rwanda, in particular the increasing number of refugees and displaced persons, and by the threats to the civilian populations,

Stressing the need for a negotiated political solution, in the framework of the agreements signed by the parties in Arusha, United Republic of Tanzania, in order to put an end to the conflict in Rwanda,

Paying tribute to the efforts of the Organization of African Unity, to promote such a solution,

Taking note of the statements made by the Government of Rwanda and the Rwandese Patriotic Front by which the Rwandese armed forces would remain in their current positions, the army of the Rwandese Patriotic Front would pull back to the positions it occupied before 7 February 1993 and the buffer zone between the forces would be considered as a neutral demilitarized zone used to monitor the implementation of the ceasefire by an international force,

Welcoming with satisfaction the joint communiqué issued at Dar-es-Salaam, United Republic of Tanzania, on 7 March 1993 by the Government of Rwanda and the Rwandese Patriotic Front, concerning in particular the modalities of the ceasefire to take effect on 9 March 1993 and the situation of displaced persons,

Welcoming also with satisfaction the decision of the Secretary-General to send a goodwill mission to the region, and having heard a first oral report on the mission,

Determined that the United Nations, in consultation with the Organization of African Unity and in support of its ongoing efforts, should consider how a United Nations contribution might assist the process towards a political settlement in Rwanda, in particular by preventing the resumption of fighting and by monitoring the ceasefire,

1. Calls upon the Government of Rwanda and the Rwandese Patriotic Front to respect the ceasefire which took effect on 9 March 1993, to allow the delivery of humanitarian supplies and the return of displaced persons, to fulfil the obligations they have accepted in the agreements they have signed and to implement the commitments they have undertaken in their above-mentioned statements and joint communiqué;

2. Invites the Secretary-General to examine in consultation with the Organization of African Unity the contribution that the United Nations could bring to strengthen the peace process in Rwanda, in support of the efforts of the Organization of African Unity, in particular through the possible establishment, under the aegis of the Organization of African Unity and the United Nations, of an international force entrusted, inter alia, with humanitarian assistance and the protection of the civilian population and support of the Organization of African Unity force for the monitoring of the ceasefire, and to report to the Council most urgently on the matter;

3. Also invites the Secretary-General to examine the request by Rwanda and Uganda for the deployment of observers along the border between these two countries;

4. Expresses its readiness to examine without delay the recommendations that the Secretary-General might submit in this regard;

5. Requests the Secretary-General to coordinate closely his efforts with those of the Organization of African Unity;

6. Calls upon the Government of Rwanda and the Rwandese Patriotic Front to cooperate fully with the efforts of the United Nations and the Organization of African Unity;

7. Urges the Government of Rwanda and the Rwandese Patriotic Front to resume the negotiations on 15 March 1993 as agreed, in order to resolve the pending questions with a view to signing a peace agreement at the beginning of April 1993 at the latest;

8. Urges both parties strictly to respect the rules of international humanitarian law;

9. Urges all States to refrain from any action that could increase the tension in Rwanda and jeopardize respect for the ceasefire;

10. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

After the vote, the representative of France stated that the situation in Rwanda seriously compromised that country's chances to quickly regain the path of peace and democracy and was gravely threatening the political stability of the region. The situation could cause a very serious humanitarian crisis, as shown by the number of refugees and displaced persons, which could in turn affect the neighbouring countries. The French Government felt that resolute action had to be taken to reach an effective and lasting cessation of hostilities, to promote the intensification of humanitarian assistance, and to enable the peace efforts to continue. It fully supported the process begun in Arusha, under the auspices of OAU, by the Government of Rwanda and RPF, and would continue to participate in that process as an observer. He emphasized, however, that progress depended above all on the cooperation of the Rwandese parties. At the same time, efforts by the Rwandese to settle the conflict should be actively supported by the United Nations. It was in that spirit that the Government of France had supported Rwanda's request to convene a meeting of the Council. He noted further that, by inviting the Secretary-General to examine urgently in consultation with OAU the contribution that the United Nations could bring to strengthening the peace process, resolution 812 (1993) was fully consistent with the approach of supporting the efforts of regional organizations that had guided the Council in several other cases. The Government of France welcomed the particular reference to the possibility of a United Nations contribution in the fields of protection of the civilian population and respect for the ceasefire — if necessary, by the establishment of an international force. Those were the two areas for priority intervention which should be stressed in order effectively to support the efforts to achieve a political settlement and to alleviate the suffering of the civilian population. The deployment of United Nations observers at the border between Rwanda and Uganda, as requested by those two countries, could contribute to creating a more peaceful climate in the region. France awaited the recommendations of the Secretary-General in that regard. The representative stressed the urgency of ensuring that the combined energies of all concerned — the United Nations, the regional organizations and those of States and non-governmental organizations — be brought to bear to restore stability to Rwanda.¹²

The representative of Brazil stated that it was incumbent on the United Nations to examine, in close consultation with OAU, how best the United Nations could support such efforts with a view to strengthening the peace process in Rwanda, in particular through the possible establishment of an international force under the aegis of OAU and the United Nations, in accordance with the agreement reached by the parties. He stressed that the responsibility for the achievement of a satisfactory political settlement rested upon the parties themselves. However, OAU and the countries in the region had an important role in facilitating and furthering the attainment of that goal. Citing Article 52 (3) of the Charter, he said that close cooperation between the United Nations and OAU in the case of Rwanda, with due cognizance and respect for their respective roles, constituted a good example of the constructive relationship that should exist between the universal organization of the United Nations and regional organizations for the promotion of peace. The terms of resolution 812 (1993) should be read in that light by all parties concerned.¹³

Decision of 13 April 1993: letter from the President to the Secretary-General

By a letter dated 8 April 1993 addressed to the President of the Council,¹⁴ the Secretary-General, recalling resolution 812 (1993) by which the Council had welcomed the goodwill mission to Rwanda and had asked him to examine the requests of Rwanda and Uganda for the deployment of observers, reported that the mission had visited Rwanda and Uganda and was observing the peace talks in Arusha. There were disturbing reports that the Arusha discussions were at an impasse, and as a result, there were fears that fighting might resume. In those circumstances he had decided to strengthen the goodwill mission by the addition of three military advisers. He had also asked the goodwill mission to report promptly so that he could advise the Council further accordingly.

In a letter dated 13 April 1993,¹⁵ the President of the Council informed the Secretary-General of the following:

I have the honour to inform you that your letter dated 8 April 1993 concerning the situation in Rwanda has been brought to the attention of the members of the Security Council. They welcome your decision to strengthen the goodwill mission by the addition of three military advisers. They also note the urgency of the security situation in Rwanda and look forward to a prompt report.

Decision of 22 June 1993 (3244th meeting): resolution 846 (1993)

On 20 May 1993, pursuant to resolution 812 (1993), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council an interim report on Rwanda.¹⁶ The Secretary-General reported that talks between the Government of Rwanda and RPF had resumed in Arusha on 16 March 1993, under the auspices of the United Republic of Tanzania, acting as facilitator. Negotiations focused on military issues, refugees and displaced persons, outstanding political matters, and the establishment of an international neutral force for the implementation of the proposed peace agreement. He also reported on the findings of a technical mission that had visited Uganda and Rwanda, respectively, from 2 to 5 April and on 6 April 1993 to, inter alia, gather and evaluate all information relevant to the possible deployment of United Nations military observers on the Rwanda/Uganda border. The mission had concluded that it would be possible to deploy United Nations military observers to monitor the Uganda/Rwanda border and verify that no military assistance was being provided across the border between the two countries. RPF, which controlled about four fifths of the border, was opposed to the deployment of observers on the Rwanda side of the border, but did not object to the presence of United Nations military observers on the Ugandan side, as long as the purpose of that presence was to verify that no military assistance reached its forces through Uganda. In addition, RPF had expressed the view that similar monitoring activities regarding the provision of military assistance to the Government of Rwanda should also be considered. The Secretary-General therefore recommended that the Council authorize the establishment of a United Nations observer mission on the Uganda side of the Rwanda/Uganda border, for an initial period of up to six months. An advance party would be deployed within 15 days of the adoption of the resolution. The Secretary-General further informed Council members that in order to support the ongoing peacekeeping efforts of OAU in Rwanda, he had decided to put two military experts at the disposal of that organization to assist it in determining the needs and concept of an expanded neutral military observer group in Rwanda.

At its 3244th meeting, on 22 June 1993, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representative of Rwanda, at his request, to participate in the discussion, without the right to vote. The President (Spain) drew the attention of the members of the Council to several documents¹⁷ and to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.¹⁸

¹⁷ Letter dated 2 April 1993 from the representative of France to the Secretary-General (S/25536); letter dated 18 May 1993 from the representative of Uganda to the President of the Council (S/25797); letter dated 14 June 1993 from the representative of Rwanda to the President of the Council (S/25951).

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 846 (1993), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolution 812 (1993) of 12 March 1993,

Taking note of the interim report of the Secretary-General of 20 May and 2 June 1993,

Also taking note of the requests of the Governments of Rwanda and Uganda for the deployment of United Nations observers along the common border of their countries as a temporary confidence-building measure,

Emphasizing the need to prevent the resumption of fighting, which could have adverse consequences on the situation in Rwanda and on international peace and security,

Emphasizing also the need for a negotiated political solution, in the framework of the agreements to be signed by the parties in Arusha, United Republic of Tanzania, in order to put an end to the conflict in Rwanda,

Paying tribute to the efforts of the Organization of African Unity and the Government of the United Republic of Tanzania to promote such a solution,

Taking note of the joint request to the Secretary-General by the Government of Rwanda and the Rwandese Patriotic Front concerning the establishment of a neutral international force in Rwanda,

Stressing the importance of the ongoing negotiations in Arusha between the Government of Rwanda and the Rwandese Patriotic Front, and expressing its readiness to consider assistance to the Organization of African Unity in the implementation of the agreements as soon as they are signed,

1. Welcomes with appreciation the report of the Secretary-General;

2. Decides to establish the United Nations Observer Mission Uganda-Rwanda to be deployed on the Ugandan side of the border for an initial period of six months, as set out in the report of the Secretary-General, and subject to review every six months;

3. Decides that the Mission shall monitor the Uganda-Rwanda border to verify that no military assistance reaches Rwanda, focus being put primarily in this regard on transit or transport, by roads or tracks which could accommodate vehicles, of lethal weapons and ammunition across the border, as well as any other material which could be of military use;

4. Requests the Secretary-General to conclude with the Government of Uganda, before the full deployment of the Observer Mission, a status-of-mission agreement including the safety, cooperation and support the Government of Uganda will provide to the Mission;

5. Approves the dispatching of an advance party within fifteen days of the adoption of the present resolution, or as soon as possible after the conclusion of the status-of-mission agreement, and the full deployment within thirty days of the arrival of the advance party;

6. Urges the Government of Rwanda and the Rwandese Patriotic Front strictly to respect the rules of international humanitarian law;

7. Also urges the Government of Rwanda and the Rwandese Patriotic Front to refrain from any action that could contribute to tension;

8. Welcomes the decision of the Secretary-General to support the peace efforts of the Organization of African Unity by putting two military experts at its disposal with a view to assisting the Neutral Military Observer Group, in particular through logistic expertise to help expedite deployment of the enlarged Group to Rwanda;

9. Further urges the Government of Rwanda and the Rwandese Patriotic Front to conclude quickly a comprehensive peace agreement;

10. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the Security Council on the results of the Arusha peace talks;

11. Also requests the Secretary-General to report to the Council on the contribution the United Nations could make to assist the Organization of African Unity in the implementation of the above-mentioned agreement and to begin contingency planning in the event that the Council decides such a contribution is needed;

12. Further requests the Secretary-General to report to the Security Council on the implementation of the present resolution within sixty days of the deployment of the Observer Mission;

13. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

After the vote, the representative of France stated that the Council's decision sent the parties a clear signal regarding the international community's commitment and determination that the conflict should be resolved by non-military means. His Government welcomed the forthcoming signing of the Arusha agreements by the Government of Rwanda and RPF, noting that those agreements were reached under the auspices of OAU and the Government of the United Republic of Tanzania. It further thought it important to consider in due course the contribution the international community might make to the implementation of the agreements. In that connection, the presence of the United Nations Observer Mission Uganda-Rwanda (UNOMUR), which was a first confidence-building measure aimed at easing tension, could create a favourable climate and enhance the implementation of the overall peace agreements. France believed that the United Nations intervention, requested by both parties, was a precondition for the success of a lasting settlement of the conflict in Rwanda. Moreover, it was in keeping with the Secretary-General's approach of support for the efforts of regional organizations.¹⁹

Decision of 10 September 1993 (3273rd meeting): statement by the President

At its 3273rd meeting, on 10 September 1993, the Council resumed its consideration of the item. The President (Venezuela) stated that, following consultations among the members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:²⁰

The Security Council welcomes the Peace Agreement between the Government of the Republic of Rwanda and the Rwandese Patriotic Front concluded on 4 August 1993 at Arusha, United Republic of Tanzania. The Council is aware of the hopes the Rwandese parties entertain that the international community will lend its assistance in the implementation of the agreement. It has also taken note of the importance they attach to 10 September 1993, the date that is to mark the establishment of transitional institutions.

The Council welcomes in this regard the decision taken by the Secretary-General to send a reconnaissance mission to Rwanda. It hopes to have the report of the Secretary-General based on the recommendations of the mission in the next few days so that it can consider the contribution the United Nations could make to facilitate the implementation of the Arusha Peace Agreement.

The Council urges the Government of Rwanda and the Rwandese Patriotic Front to continue to honour the Arusha agreement in accordance with their commitments. It further urges them to continue to cooperate with the Neutral Military Observer Group, whose mandate the Secretary-General of the Organization of African Unity has decided to extend on an interim basis.

Decision of 5 October 1993 (3288th meeting): resolution 872 (1993)

On 24 September 1993, pursuant to resolution 846 (1993), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on Rwanda concerning the contribution the United Nations could make towards the implementation of the Arusha peace agreement signed on 4 August 1993.²¹ The peace agreement called for a United Nations peacekeeping operation entrusted with the following tasks to assist in ensuring the security of Kigali; to monitor the ceasefire, including demobilization and the establishment of a demilitarized zone and the security situation during the transitional period; to assist with mine-clearance; investigate, at the request of the parties, or on its own, alleged non-compliance with any of the provisions relating to the agreement; and to provide security for the repatriation of Rwandese refugees and displaced persons. The Secretary-General reported that a reconnaissance mission had visited Rwanda, the United Republic of Tanzania and Ethiopia from 19 August to 3 September 1993 to examine the functions that such a force could perform and to assess the resources needed to carry them out.²² On the basis of the recommendations of the mission, the report set out the concept of operations, proposed structure and deployment schedule of the new operation.

¹⁹ S/PV.3244, pp. 4-5.

The Secretary-General noted that both sides seemed determined to achieve a durable peace through disarmament, demobilization and national reconciliation. There was serious concern, however, that an inordinate delay in establishing the transitional Government may endanger the peace process. He therefore considered that the United Nations should respond positively to the appeal of the parties for assistance in the implementation of the peace agreement, especially since the mandate of the OAU Neutral Military Observer Group (NMOG II) would terminate by 31 October 1993, and recommended that the Council authorize the establishment of a United Nations Assistance Mission for Rwanda (UNAMIR), with the mandate to contribute to the establishment and maintenance of a climate conducive to the secure installation and subsequent operation of the transitional Government. The operation would incorporate NMOG II, and would integrate the UNOMUR chain of command. Its military personnel would be deployed progressively and would conduct the operation in four phases.²³ The immediate deployment of an advance party would underscore the determination of the United Nations for the rapid build-up of the military presence needed in Kigali and of the logistic base for the deployment of the force. The subsequent introduction of observers and formed units would enable the force to contribute to the implementation of the disengagement, demobilization and integration phase, while providing an adequate level of security and a credible United Nations presence. Finally, the reduction of the military and civilian police components should ensure that the operation was carried out in a cost-effective manner while contributing to the maintenance of the stability required for the period culminating with the elections.

At its 3288th meeting, on 5 October 1993, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representative of Rwanda, at his request, to participate in the discussion, without the right to vote. The President (Brazil) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.²⁴

Speaking as head of a joint delegation representing the Government of Rwanda and RPF, the representative of Rwanda stated that the dynamic created by the Arusha peace agreement had put an end to the war and had provided the parties with the appropriate framework for setting up transitional institutions designed to consolidate political pluralism and the ongoing democratic process in Rwanda. He informed the Council that the Secretary-General's report was acceptable to both parties and asked the Council to approve the report and follow up the recommendations contained therein with the urgency they deserved. Rwanda viewed the United Nations mission for Rwanda as a valuable tool for implementing the peace agreement for the two belligerent parties. The mission would serve as an arbiter and facilitator as they progressed towards consolidating peace and achieving national reconciliation and democratization throughout the country. He assured the Council that the Government of Rwanda and RPF would do all in their power to abide strictly by the peace agreement and see to it that the United Nations assistance mission would not encounter any problems. He emphasized that the mission should be in place as soon as possible and requested that the deadlines set forth in the Secretary-General's report for its deployment be advanced. Everything must be done to ensure that the two armies were immediately disengaged and a joint national army established. He noted further that nearly 1 million people displaced by war awaited the deployment of the United Nations mission so that they might return home safely. By re-establishing conditions of security, the United Nations mission would further the recovery of Rwanda's economy and would establish confidence in the countries in the subregion, fostering the re-establishment of the regional economic aid programmes dislocated by war.²⁵

Speaking before the vote, the representative of Cape Verde stated that the proper and rapid implementation of the consensus draft resolution before the Council was a sine qua non for the United Nations assistance mission for Rwanda to carry out its work successfully. That decisive contribution of the United Nations to the resolution of the conflict in Rwanda was, at the same time — and especially in the eyes of small countries — an assurance that the United Nations was the main instrument at the service of the peoples in questions relating to the promotion and preservation of international peace and security. Noting the importance of international humanitarian assistance to Rwanda, he expressed the hope that the political will of the international community would be speedily translated into concrete acts of support for national reconstruction. He also praised the decisive role played by OAU and the United Republic of Tanzania, as facilitator, in the process leading to the settlement of the conflict in Rwanda. The action of OAU showed the correctness of the Secretary-General's proposals in his report "An agenda for peace", dealing with the role of organizations and regional arrangements in the realm of conflict resolution in concert with the United Nations. He encouraged OAU to pursue its efforts, to avail itself of the help of the entire international community and to arm itself with more mechanisms and necessary means to prevent and resolve conflicts in Africa.²⁶

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 872 (1993), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolutions 812 (1993) of 12 March 1993 and 846 (1993) of 22 June 1993,

Reaffirming also its resolution 868 (1993) of 29 September 1993 on the security of United Nations operations, ²⁵ S/PV.3288, pp. 3-12.

²⁶ Ibid., pp. 13-15.

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 24 and 29 September 1993,

Welcoming the signing, on 4 August 1993, of the Peace Agreement between the Government of the Republic of Rwanda and the Rwandese Patriotic Front (including its Protocols) at Arusha, United Republic of Tanzania, and urging the parties to continue to comply fully with it,

Taking note of the conclusion of the Secretary-General that in order to enable the United Nations to carry out its mandate successfully and effectively, the full cooperation of the parties with one another and with the Organization is required,

Stressing the urgency of the deployment of an international neutral force in Rwanda, as underlined both by the Government of the Republic of Rwanda and by the Rwandese Patriotic Front and as reaffirmed by their joint delegation to the Headquarters of the United Nations in New York,

Paying tribute to the role played by the Organization of African Unity and by the Government of the United Republic of Tanzania in the conclusion of the Arusha Peace Agreement,

Resolved that the United Nations should, at the request of the parties and under peaceful conditions with the full cooperation of all the parties, make its full contribution to the implementation of the Arusha Peace Agreement,

1. Welcomes the report of the Secretary-General;
2. Decides to establish a peacekeeping operation entitled "United Nations Assistance Mission for Rwanda" for a period of six months subject to the proviso that it will be extended beyond the initial ninety days only upon a review by the Council on the basis of a report from the Secretary-General as to whether or not substantive progress has been made towards the implementation of the Peace Agreement between the Government of the Republic of Rwanda and the Rwandese Patriotic Front;
3. Also decides that, drawing from the Secretary-General's recommendations, the Mission shall have the following mandate:
 - (a) To contribute to the security of the city of Kigali, inter alia, within a weapons-secure area established by the parties in and around the city;
 - (b) To monitor observance of the ceasefire agreement, which calls for the establishment of cantonment and assembly zones and the demarcation of the new demilitarized zone and other demilitarization procedures;
 - (c) To monitor the security situation during the final period of the transitional Government's mandate, leading up to the elections;
 - (d) To assist with mine clearance, primarily through training programmes;
 - (e) To investigate at the request of the parties, or on its own initiative, instances of alleged non-compliance with the provisions of the Protocol of Agreement on the Integration of the Armed Forces of the Two Parties, and to pursue any such instances with the parties responsible and report thereon as appropriate to the Secretary-General;

(f) To monitor the process of repatriation of Rwandese refugees and resettlement of displaced persons to verify that it is carried out in a safe and orderly manner;

(g) To assist in the coordination of humanitarian assistance activities in conjunction with relief operations;

(h) To investigate and report on incidents regarding the activities of the gendarmerie and police;

4. Approves the proposal of the Secretary-General that the United Nations Observer Mission Uganda-Rwanda established by resolution 846 (1993) should be integrated within the Assistance Mission;

5. Welcomes the efforts and the cooperation of the Organization of African Unity in helping to implement the Arusha Peace Agreement, in particular the integration of the Neutral Military Observer Group within the Assistance Mission;

6. Also approves the proposal of the Secretary-General that the deployment and withdrawal of the Assistance Mission should be carried out in stages, and notes in this connection that the mandate of the Assistance Mission, if extended, is expected to terminate following national elections and the installation of a new Government in Rwanda, events which are scheduled to occur by October 1995, but no later than December 1995;

7. Authorizes the Secretary-General in this context to deploy in the shortest possible time, the first contingent, at the level specified in the report of the Secretary-General, to Kigali for an initial period of six months, which, when fully in place, will permit the establishment of the transitional institutions and implementation of the other relevant provisions of the Arusha Peace Agreement;

8. Invites the Secretary-General, in the context of the report referred to in paragraph 2 above, also to report on the progress of the Assistance Mission following its initial deployment, and resolves to review as appropriate, on the basis of that report and as part of the review referred to in paragraph 2 above, the requirement for further deployments in the scale and composition recommended by the Secretary-General in his report;

9. Also invites the Secretary-General to consider ways of reducing the total maximum strength of the Assistance Mission, in particular through phased deployment without thereby affecting its capacity to carry out its mandate, and requests the Secretary-General, in planning and executing the phased deployment, to seek economies and to report regularly on what is achieved in this regard;

10. Welcomes the intention of the Secretary-General to appoint a special representative to lead the Assistance Mission in the field and exercise authority over all its elements;

11. Urges the parties to implement the Arusha Peace Agreement in good faith;

12. Requests the Secretary-General to conclude expeditiously an agreement on the status of the Mission, and all personnel engaged in the operation in Rwanda, to come into force as near as possible to the outset of the operation and no later than thirty days after the adoption of the present resolution;

13. Demands that the parties take all appropriate steps to ensure the security and safety of the operation and personnel engaged in the operation;

14. Urges Member States, the specialized agencies and non-governmental organizations to provide and intensify their economic, financial and humanitarian assistance to the Rwandese population and of the democratization process in Rwanda;

15. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

After the vote, the representative of France stated that, in acting promptly, the Council had made it possible to establish an element essential to the full implementation of the Arusha peace agreement. UNAMIR would make it possible to set in motion the peace process by installing provisional institutions which would be able, in turn, to launch the process of economic reconstruction and organize the repatriation of many refugees and displaced persons. The Secretary-General was authorized to deploy a contingent in Kigali as soon as possible, followed by the dispatching of other elements to be put gradually in place. In establishing that operation, the Council did not intend to wait passively for the peace process to conclude. The Council had clearly indicated that the United Nations did not intend to stay in Rwanda indefinitely. UNAMIR had, in fact, been set up with a specific deadline and the Council would soon consider a report reviewing the implementation of the Arusha peace agreement, on which might hinge the successive deployments that were foreseen. He concluded by stating that the all too rare example set by the Government of Rwanda and RPF of the coming together of two parties long opposed must lead the Council to recognize that that was a special case of United Nations intervention.²⁷

The representative of the United Kingdom regarded the Arusha peace agreement as a good example of the way in which a regional organization could contribute to conflict resolution. In a sense, an African solution was found to an African problem. The

United Kingdom encouraged regional organizations, and in particular OAU, to build on that experience. It was important that OAU should remain engaged in the implementation of the settlement. While ultimately it was for the Rwandese themselves to bring about a solution and ensure the return of refugees and the resettlement of displaced persons, it was right that the international community should help them in that task. His Government attached importance to the early integration of UNOMUR into the force being set up in Rwanda, but regarded that as being without any prejudice to the continuing validity of the different mandates of those two forces, the mandate of UNOMUR being set out in resolution 846 (1993) and not changed in any way by resolution 872 (1993). He concluded by stressing that, as recent events elsewhere had demonstrated, the United Nations could not impose peace where there was no willingness to sustain compromise. It was essential, therefore, that the parties continue to cooperate fully and stick firmly to the timetable that they had set for themselves for national reconciliation and elections.²⁸

The representative of the United States said that the adoption by the Council of resolution 872 (1993) was a crucial prerequisite which allowed both parties to build on the trust they had created. The deployment of the force would advance the goals of peaceful conflict resolution and democratization, and allow the return of hundreds of those who had fled their homes. His Government was deeply concerned about the increasing burden — both in terms of manpower and financial resources — which the United Nations was being asked to shoulder. For that reason, it was pleased to note that resolution 872 (1993) had a tightly focused mandate. The Council's continued support would depend in large measure on the demonstration of substantive progress towards the implementation of the peace agreement and the establishment of transitional institutions in advance of national elections. His Government would continue to monitor and work to reduce costs and personnel levels throughout that peacekeeping operation.²⁹

According to the representative of the Russian Federation, the signing of the Arusha peace agreement demonstrated the ability of the regional machinery of OAU to unravel the intricate knots of conflict on the African continent by political methods. Russia had consistently advocated the pooling of United Nations efforts and those of regional organizations in the resolution of conflicts. In that connection, the experience of effective interaction between the United Nations and OAU in the Rwanda settlement could also be utilized in other areas of the world which required determined intervention by the international community. Russia was also prepared, together with the international community, to support United Nations efforts and efforts of regional organizations aimed at seeking peaceful ways to resolve military conflicts and crises.³⁰

Other speakers welcomed the signing of the Arusha peace agreement and the political willingness demonstrated by the parties to restore stability to their country. They noted with appreciation the role played, among others, by OAU and the Government of the United Republic of Tanzania, as facilitator, towards the achievement of a political settlement. They expressed support for the establishment of UNAMIR as requested by the parties and recommended by the Secretary-General. They called upon the parties to abide by their undertakings with a view to implementing the peace agreement.³¹

On 15 December 1993, pursuant to resolution 846 (1993), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council his second report on UNOMUR.³² The Secretary-General reported that UNOMUR activities had been effective both as a deterrent and as interdiction. As a result, clandestine cross-border traffic had decreased appreciably. The civilian and military authorities in the mission area had generally shown cooperation, despite some isolated attempts to curtail the freedom of movement of UNOMUR. Regarding the proposal that UNOMUR be integrated within UNAMIR, he recalled that Uganda had expressed some concern. Following consultations with the Government of Uganda, the Under-Secretary-General for Peacekeeping Operations had confirmed to the representative of Uganda by a letter dated 22 October 1993 that the proposed integration would be purely administrative in nature and that it would in no way affect the mandate of UNOMUR as set out in resolution 846 (1993). Assurances were also provided that the UNOMUR status-of-mission agreement, concluded on 16 August 1993, remained valid and would continue to govern relations between Uganda and the United Nations on that matter. The Secretary-General believed that UNOMUR had been a factor of stability in the area and that it was playing a useful role as a confidence-building mechanism. It was his understanding that his view was shared by the Governments of Uganda and Rwanda. He therefore recommended to the Council that the mandate of UNOMUR be extended for a period of six months, as envisaged in resolution 846 (1993).

At its 3324th meeting, on 20 December 1993, the Security Council included the above report in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representatives of Rwanda and Uganda, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (China) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.³³

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 891 (1993), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolutions 812 (1993) of 12 March 1993 and 846 (1993) of 22 June 1993,

Recalling its resolution 872 (1993) of 5 October 1993 by which it established the United Nations Assistance Mission for Rwanda,

Having examined the report of the Secretary-General of 15 December 1993 on the United Nations Observer Mission Uganda-Rwanda, Welcoming the substantial results obtained by the deployment of the Observer Mission,

Endorsing the Secretary-General's view, shared by the Governments of Uganda and Rwanda, that the Observer Mission has been a factor of stability in the area and that it is playing a useful role as a confidence-building mechanism,

1. Welcomes with satisfaction the report of the Secretary-General;

2. Decides to extend the mandate of the United Nations Observer Mission Uganda-Rwanda for a period of six months, as envisaged in resolution 846 (1993);

3. Notes that the integration of the Observer Mission within the United Nations Assistance Mission for Rwanda is purely administrative in nature and that it will in no way affect the mandate of the Observer Mission as set out in resolution 846 (1993);

4. Expresses its appreciation to the Government of Uganda for its cooperation and support of the Observer Mission;

5. Urges the civilian and military authorities in the mission area to continue to have a cooperative attitude;

6. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

After the vote, the representative of France noted the indications in the Secretary-General's report that UNOMUR had achieved tangible results on the ground: it had succeeded in monitoring the Rwanda-Uganda border and had enjoyed the full cooperation of the Ugandan authorities in carrying out its mandate. Hence, UNOMUR had been a factor of stability in the region and had played a useful part in restoring the confidence that was necessary for the implementation of the Arusha peace agreement. The Mission's success warranted the renewal of its mandate for a further six months. It also justified UNOMUR's continuing to exercise its own legal autonomy, in line with the wishes of the Ugandan authorities, who had signed a status-of-mission agreement with the United Nations.³⁴

Decisions of 6 January 1994 (3326th meeting):
letter from the President and resolution
893 (1994)

On 30 December 1993, pursuant to resolution 872 (1993), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on UNAMIR.³⁵ The Secretary-General reported that following a series of violent incidents in November and December 1993, which had caused the death of some 40 persons, his Special Representative had undertaken several initiatives in order to help defuse the tension prevalent in the country and to get the signatories to the Arusha peace agreement to renew their commitment to implementing the peace plan. Those initiatives included the convening, on 10 December 1993, at Kinyihira, of a meeting between the Government of Rwanda and RPF, at which the parties issued a joint declaration whereby they reaffirmed their commitment to do their utmost in order to achieve the goals of peace and national reconciliation set by the Arusha peace agreement and agreed to set up a broad-based transitional government before 31 December 1993.

The Secretary-General noted that the initial deployment of UNAMIR had proceeded largely on schedule. Although the logistic support capabilities of UNAMIR were still inadequate, there was, on the ground, a minimum viable force which could respond to the most pressing needs in Kigali. However, the situation in the demilitarized zone and in the north-west of the country remained unstable and the situation in which Burundi had developed following the coup d'état had created a new source of tension on the southern border. The deployment of the personnel required for the second phase of the operation should therefore be undertaken on an urgent basis. He therefore recommended that the Council agree that UNAMIR should continue to implement the mandate entrusted to it under resolution 872 (1993) and stated that he intended to proceed with the implementation plan outlined in his report of 24 September 1993, including the early deployment of the second battalion in the demilitarized zone.³⁶ As far as the reduction of the total maximum strength of UNAMIR was concerned, he would continue to seek economies through the phased deployment and withdrawal of UNAMIR personnel. He was convinced, however, that, under the circumstances, a reduction in the projected resource levels would negatively affect the performance and credibility of UNAMIR in the discharge of its mandate and could also jeopardize the peace process in Rwanda.

In a letter dated 6 January 1994,³⁷ the President of the Council informed the Secretary-General of the following:

The members of the Security Council have taken note of your report of 30 December 1993 on the United Nations Assistance Mission for Rwanda, on the basis of which they have completed the review provided for in paragraph 2 of resolution 872 (1993) of 5 October 1993.

At its 3326th meeting, on 6 January 1994, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Czech Republic) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations³⁸ and read out a revision to be made to the draft text in its provisional form.

Speaking before the vote, the representative of Rwanda stated that the Council's consideration of the Secretary-General's recommendations could generate fresh momentum and provide additional guarantees of the success of the peace process in Rwanda. The nature of the important functions given to UNAMIR under resolution 872 (1993) showed that the success of the peace process depended completely on the carrying out of UNAMIR's mission. The ceasefire and the deployment in Kigali of the RPF security battalion would make it possible, after the ongoing consultations, to put in place a transitional National Assembly and a broader-based transitional Government. To establish lasting peace, the security of the population must be ensured, especially in the demilitarized zone. Rwanda therefore welcomed the Council's decision to deploy a second battalion, to be based in the demilitarized zone. The additional deployments were especially necessary and urgent since the situation in the demilitarized zone and in the north-west of the country remained precarious. The operation would also make it possible to limit the consequences of the horrific events in Burundi, which had led to an influx of refugees. The speaker felt that UNAMIR must be given logistic support and that it was necessary to continue activities related to providing emergency assistance and guaranteeing the return of displaced persons to their homes.³⁹

The representative of Nigeria noted with satisfaction that the situation in Rwanda had, on the whole, stabilized, to the extent that it was possible for a President to be sworn in. Nigeria concurred with the specific request of the Secretary-General that an additional battalion should be deployed, on an urgent basis, to secure the demilitarized zone and protect the large population living there. He confirmed the decision of his Government to send personnel to augment UNAMIR. Nigeria hoped that with increased international assistance and support for existing efforts and actions in Rwanda it would soon be possible for a transitional Government to be established there so that the tasks of reconciliation, reconstruction and development could begin in earnest. Increased international assistance for Rwanda was necessary not only to boost the military and logistic capacities of UNAMIR, but also to provide humanitarian support for the population adversely affected by the internal conflict and to alleviate the refugee problem and the attendant dislocation of population and economies in Rwanda.⁴⁰

The draft resolution, as orally revised, was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 893 (1994), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolution 872 (1993) of 5 October 1993 establishing the United Nations Assistance Mission for Rwanda,

Recalling its resolutions 812 (1993) of 12 March 1993, 846 (1993) of 22 June 1993 and 891 (1993) of 20 December 1993,

Having examined the report of the Secretary-General of 30 December 1993, in the context of the review called for in its resolution 872 (1993), as well as his previous report of 24 September 1993,

Welcoming the conclusion, on 5 November 1993, of an agreement on the status of the Mission and its personnel in Rwanda,

Taking note of the progress described in the report of the Secretary-General of 30 December 1993 in implementing the Arusha Peace Agreement,

Welcoming further the valuable contribution made to peace in Rwanda by the Mission,

Noting with concern the incidents of violence in Rwanda and the consequences for Rwanda of the situation in Burundi, and urging all concerned to reaffirm their commitment to peace,

Welcoming also the joint statement made by the parties at Kinyihira, Rwanda, on 10 December 1993 concerning the implementation of the Arusha Peace Agreement and, in particular, the prompt establishment of a broad-based transitional Government,

1. Reaffirms its approval of the proposal of the Secretary-General concerning the deployment of the United Nations Assistance Mission for Rwanda as outlined in his report of 24 September 1993, including the early deployment of the second battalion to the demilitarized zone as indicated in paragraph 30 of his report of 30 December 1993;

2. Strongly urges the parties to cooperate fully in furthering the peace process, to comply fully with the Arusha Peace Agreement on which the schedule contained in the report of the Secretary-General of 24 September 1993 is based, and in particular to establish a broad-based transitional Government at the earliest opportunity in accordance with the Agreement;

3. Stresses that continued support for the Mission will depend upon the full and prompt implementation by the parties of the Arusha Peace Agreement;

4. Welcomes the continued efforts by the Secretary-General and his Special Representative to help promote and enhance dialogue among all the parties concerned;

5. Commends the efforts of Member States, United Nations agencies and non-governmental organizations which have provided humanitarian and other assistance, and urges others to provide such assistance;

6. Commends in particular the efforts of the Organization of African Unity, its member States and agencies in providing diplomatic, political, humanitarian and other support for the implementation of resolution 872 (1993);

7. Reiterates its request to the Secretary-General to continue to monitor the size and cost of the Mission to seek economies;

8. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

After the vote, the representative of France noted that the positive developments in Rwanda reported by the Secretary-General were made possible by the prompt deployment of an initial contingent in Kigali, whose presence had allowed RPF to establish itself in the capital. That brought nearer an agreement that would make it possible for transitional institutions to be established. The main objective of the deployment of a second battalion was to bring security to the populations of the regions where violence had occurred. He stressed that the continuation of the United Nations action in Rwanda depended directly on the efforts by the parties to restore peace definitely to Rwanda.⁴¹

The representative of Brazil noted that in the first 90 days following the Council's adoption of resolution 872 (1993), there had been sufficient compliance with the provisions of the Arusha peace agreement allowing enough substantive progress to be achieved towards its implementation, thus warranting the extension of UNAMIR beyond its initial period. The early deployment of a second battalion in the demilitarised zone should take place promptly so as not to jeopardize UNAMIR's mandate in assuring the unimpeded continuation of the peace process in Rwanda. Brazil recognized that the full and continued cooperation of all parties concerned was an essential prerequisite for a successful implementation of the Arusha peace agreement. In that connection, the Council should not lose sight of the importance of the prompt establishment of a broad-based transitional Government in Rwanda as a key element of the agreement.⁴²

⁴¹ Ibid., pp. 10-11.

The President, speaking in his capacity as the representative of the Czech Republic, noted that the developments in Burundi jeopardized the national process of political and social reconciliation in Rwanda and threatened to convulse the region at large. He noted further that the prerequisites for extension of UNAMIR's mandate beyond the initial 90-day period had not all been met. Nonetheless, the establishment of a transitional government would have been a sign of definite progress, but the parties had continued to show goodwill and cooperation and the ceasefire had been generally respected.⁴³

Decision of 17 February 1994 (3337th meeting):
statement by the President

At its 3337th meeting, on 17 February 1994, the Security Council resumed its consideration of the item. The President (Djibouti) stated that, following consultations among members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁴⁴

The Security Council, which welcomed the conclusion of the Arusha Peace Agreement and the political will demonstrated by the Rwandese parties in implementing it, remains deeply concerned by the delays in establishing the broad-based transitional Government which is one of the key points in the Agreement. The absence of such a Government is an impediment to progress under the Agreement and the functioning of institutions of the State. Furthermore, it is having adverse effects on the humanitarian situation in the country, the deterioration of which is of profound concern to the international community. The speedy installation of a broad-based transitional Government would facilitate the provision of more effective assistance to the populations in need.

The Council, taking note of the fact that the President of Rwanda has been sworn in as the interim head of State, encourages him, in the context of that responsibility, to continue his efforts for the speedy installation of the other transitional institutions, in conformity with the Arusha Peace Agreement.

The Council calls on all the parties concerned to overcome their differences and cooperate fully with the Special Representative of the Secretary-General of the United Nations and the Organization of African Unity in order to advance the process of national reconciliation. It strongly urges the establishment, without delay, of the provisional institutions provided for in the Arusha Peace Agreement.

The Council is also deeply concerned at the deterioration in the security situation, particularly in Kigali. In this connection, it reminds the parties of their obligation to respect the weapon-free zone established in and around the city.

The Council calls the attention of the parties to the consequences for them of non-compliance with that provision of the Arusha Peace Agreement. It notes that the United Nations Assistance Mission for Rwanda will be assured of consistent support only if the parties implement the Agreement fully and rapidly.

Decision of 5 April 1994 (3358th meeting):
resolution 909 (1994)

On 30 March 1994, pursuant to resolution 872 (1993), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council his second progress report on UNAMIR.⁴⁵ The Secretary-General reported that despite the fact that the parties had agreed, at Kinihira, on 10 December 1993, to set up the broad-based transitional Government and the Transitional National Assembly before 31 December 1993, those steps had not yet been taken due to the inability of the parties concerned to agree on the relevant modalities. Of the new institutions envisaged, thus far, only the Presidency, which was officially installed on 5 January, had thus far been put in place. The prolonged delay in putting the transitional institutions in place had not only prevented UNAMIR from carrying out its tasks in accordance with the approved implementation schedule, but had also posed a threat to the peace process. The failure to establish the broad-based transitional Government and the Transitional National Assembly constituted a serious impediment to the implementation of the peace agreement and to the smooth functioning of State institutions. The Secretary-General and his Special Representative had stressed to the Rwandese political leaders that, without the early establishment of the Government and the Transitional National Assembly, it would be difficult to affirm that sufficient progress had been made in the implementation of the peace agreement to warrant the continued support of the international community.

⁴² Ibid., pp. 12-14.

⁴⁵ S/1994/360.

The Secretary-General further reported that despite the increased tension and insecurity engendered by the political impasse, the ceasefire generally appeared to hold and UNAMIR continued to play a stabilizing role. Regarding the civilian police component, he noted that it had been able to deploy and operate only in Kigali. An additional 45 civilian police monitors would be required for deployment in the country's provinces.⁴⁶

In his conclusions, the Secretary-General noted that progress made thus far in the negotiations suggested that a compromise could be reached on the transitional institutions. He therefore recommended that the Council decide to extend the mandate of UNAMIR for a period of six months. However, in the event that the transitional institutions were not installed within the next two months and if, by that time, sufficient progress in the implementation of the next phase of the peace agreement had not also been achieved, the Council should then review the situation, including the role of the United Nations.

At its 3358th meeting, on 5 April 1994, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (New Zealand) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.⁴⁷

Speaking in explanation of vote, before the vote, the representative of Rwanda observed that an evaluation of the peace process in Rwanda showed that there had been some progress in implementing the Arusha Peace Agreement, although there had been difficulties which had delayed the establishment of some transitional institutions. The progress included, at the political level, the establishment of the presidency on 5 January 1994. With regard to the establishment of the other institutions, the only remaining problem concerned the participation in the National Assembly by one party. The parties had only to overcome that one problem as soon as possible, with the support of the international community and the Security Council, in particular, before proceeding to the establishment of the transitional institutions. In parallel, the parties had also made progress at the military level, with the support of UNAMIR. It was also noteworthy that the difficulties in establishing the transitional institutions had not affected the ceasefire, which demonstrated the parties' unwavering commitment to the peace process. The speaker further stated that extending UNAMIR's mandate would help to support the stabilizing role it played in Rwanda. The renewal of UNAMIR's mandate would also contribute to international peace and security because of the role the Mission continued to play in efforts to deal with the results of the situation caused by events since 21 October 1993 in Burundi. That situation came on top of the general problem of insecurity, which must be resolved in order to make the process of peace and democratisation under way in Rwanda sturdy and lasting. Increasing the size of UNAMIR's civilian police contingent would respond to that need. With reference to the draft resolution before the Council, the speaker said that the people of Rwanda were aware that, given the review of the situation in Rwanda that was scheduled to take place within the next six weeks, the parties must respond without delay to that strong message from the Council and make progress by establishing the transitional institutions and by taking the necessary steps for phase II of the Secretary-General's plan to come into effect.⁴⁸

The representative of Nigeria noted that the Secretary-General's report contained both positive and negative elements. First, UNAMIR had continued to assist the implementation of the Arusha peace agreement and a President had been sworn in on schedule. Secondly, following the signing of the Peace Agreement, the ceasefire had generally been respected, a fact which attested to the commitment of the parties to the peace process as set out in the Agreement. Thirdly, the success achieved in the deployment area and the presence of UNAMIR military personnel in parts of the country had helped to stabilize the situation and foster a climate conducive to peace negotiations. On the other hand, it was regrettable that efforts to establish a broad-based transitional Government and the Transitional National Assembly had not yet yielded the desired result, due to the inability of the parties to agree on the relevant modalities. It was vital that the political deadlock that had stalled fulfilment of the four-phase plan not be allowed to continue. His delegation believed that, while efforts to bring all the parties on board the peace train might continue, the collective will of the people of Rwanda must not be held hostage to the whims and caprices of one party.

⁴⁸ S/PV.3358, pp. 2-3.

His delegation believed that the draft resolution that the Council was about to adopt would make a significant contribution to moving the political process forward by extending the mandate of UNAMIR, by agreeing to strengthen the civilian police contingent, and by encouraging an increased provision of humanitarian and other assistance.⁴⁹

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 909 (1994), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolution 872 (1993) of 5 October 1993 establishing the United Nations Assistance Mission for Rwanda, as well as its resolution 893 (1994) of 6 January 1994,

Recalling its resolutions 812 (1993) of 12 March 1993, 846 (1993) of 22 June 1993 and 891 (1993) of 20 December 1993,

Recalling also the statement by the President of the Council of 17 February 1994,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 30 March 1994,

Welcoming the valuable contribution to peace being made in Rwanda by the Mission,

Expressing its deep concern at the delay in the establishment of the broad based transitional Government and the Transitional National Assembly,

Emphasizing that the Security Council, in its resolution 893 (1994), authorized the deployment of a second battalion to the demilitarized zone as recommended by the Secretary-General in his report of 30 December 1993, and that the international community has thus done its part in ensuring that conditions exist for implementing the Arusha Peace Agreement,

Considering that the fact that the transitional institutions have not been established constitutes a major obstacle to the implementation of the Arusha Peace Agreement,

Concerned at the deterioration in security in the country, particularly in Kigali,

Concerned also at the deterioration of the humanitarian and health situation,

1. Welcomes the report of the Secretary-General of 30 March 1994;

2. Decides to extend the mandate of the United Nations Assistance Mission for Rwanda until 29 July 1994, on the understanding that the Security Council will, within the next six weeks, review the situation in Rwanda, including the role played in that country by the United Nations, if the Secretary-

General informs it in a report that the transitional institutions provided for under the Arusha Peace Agreement have not been established and that insufficient progress has been made for the implementation of phase 2 of the Secretary-General's plan contained in his report of 24 September 1993;

3. Regrets the delay in the implementation of the Arusha Peace Agreement, and urges the parties to resolve their latest differences without delay with a view to the immediate establishment of those transitional institutions still required for the continuation of the process, and particularly the implementation of phase 2;

4. Welcomes the fact that, despite the difficulties encountered in implementing the Arusha Peace Agreement, the ceasefire has been respected, and commends in this respect the essential contribution made by the Mission;

5. Recalls, nevertheless, that continued support for the Mission, including the provision of an additional forty-five civilian police monitors as described in paragraph 38 of the report of the Secretary-General of 30 March 1994, will depend upon full and prompt implementation by the parties of the Arusha Peace Agreement;

6. Welcomes the continued efforts by the Secretary-General and his Special Representative to help promote and facilitate dialogue between all parties concerned;

7. Commends the efforts of Member States, United Nations agencies and non-governmental organizations which have provided humanitarian and other assistance, encourages them to continue and increase such assistance, and again urges others to provide such assistance;

8. Commends in particular the efforts of the Organization of African Unity and its agencies, as well as those of the Tanzanian facilitator, in providing diplomatic, political, humanitarian and other support for the implementation of the relevant resolutions of the Council;

9. Reiterates its request to the Secretary-General to continue to monitor the size and cost of the Mission to seek economies;

10. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

After the vote, the representative of France stated that the Rwandese parties had continuously reaffirmed that they were deeply committed to implementing the Arusha peace agreement, as demonstrated by the fact that the ceasefire had been generally observed. For that reason, it was essential for the United Nations to continue to support the process. Noting that the only difficulty remaining in the establishment of the transitional institutions was the participation of one political party in the Transitional National Assembly and, further, that the President of Rwanda had committed himself to establishing the transitional institutions as soon as that obstacle was overcome, the ⁴⁹ Ibid., pp. 3-5.

French Government saw no reason why that could not be done within the six-week period provided for in resolution 909 (1994). He warned that if no progress was noted during that time, the Council might proceed to a reassessment of the Organization's commitment to Rwanda. Since UNAMIR would enjoy continued support only if the parties wholly and promptly implemented the peace agreement, they should understand that henceforth they were under an obligation to produce results.⁵⁰

The representative of the United States strongly supported the Council's decision to limit the extension of UNAMIR's mandate and to review within six weeks the progress made by the parties towards implementing the Arusha peace agreement and the role of the United Nations, including UNAMIR's future. While UNAMIR had played a key role in keeping the peace in Rwanda under difficult circumstances, the continuing political impasse had made its mission much more difficult, and had contributed to the deteriorating security situation in Rwanda. The Arusha accords were justifiably hailed as an historic achievement in regional conflict resolution. They provided the blueprint for transition to full democracy and national reconciliation and must be fully and expeditiously implemented in their entirety. The United States called on all sides to redouble their efforts and act in the national interest to put the transitional government in place as soon as possible.⁵¹

Decision of 7 April 1994 (3361st meeting):
statement by the President

At its 3361st meeting, on 7 April 1994, the Security Council resumed its consideration of the item. The President stated that, following consultations among members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁵²

The Security Council is deeply disturbed by the tragic incident that resulted in the deaths of the Presidents of Burundi and Rwanda on 6 April 1994 and the ensuing violence. The Council expresses regret at the incident. It invites the Secretary-General to collect all available information with all means at his disposal and report to the Council as soon as possible.

The Council is following with great concern the situation as described by the Secretariat in its oral report. There has been considerable loss of lives, including the deaths of government leaders, many civilians and at least ten Belgian peacekeepers, as well as the reported kidnapping of others. The Council strongly condemns these horrific attacks and their perpetrators, who must be held responsible.

The Council strongly condemns all these acts of violence and in particular these attacks against United Nations personnel, and urges the Rwandese security forces and military and paramilitary units to put an end to these attacks and to cooperate fully with the United Nations Assistance Mission for Rwanda in the implementation of its mandate. It further demands that all measures be taken to provide security throughout the country and particularly in Kigali and the demilitarized zone. Furthermore, the Council expresses its extreme concern at the implications for United Nations personnel and requests the Secretary-General to report on and take measures necessary to ensure their safety and security. The Council also demands that free access to the airport be restored in order to allow those who wish to enter or leave the country to do so.

The Council appeals to all Rwandese and to all parties and factions to desist from any further acts or threats of violence and to maintain the positions they held before the incident. It urges respect for the safety and security of the civilian population and of the foreign communities living in Rwanda, as well as of Mission and other United Nations personnel.

The Council earlier this week renewed the mandate of the United Nations operation in Rwanda for a further four months, with a six week review provision on the understanding that progress would be made in establishing all the transitional institutions provided for under the Arusha Peace Agreement. It reaffirms its commitment to the Agreement and urges all parties to implement it fully and in particular to respect the ceasefire.

The Council will remain seized of the matter.

Decision of 21 April 1994 (3368th meeting):
resolution 912 (1994)

On 20 April 1994, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a special report on UNAMIR.⁵³ He reported that following the plane crash at Kigali airport on 6 April 1994, which caused the deaths of, among others, the Presidents of Rwanda and Burundi, widespread killings had taken place. Authority had collapsed, the provisional Government disintegrated and some of its members had been killed. The Prime Minister and other members of the Government of Rwanda, as well as 10 members of the Belgian contingent serving with UNAMIR, had been brutally murdered by unruly members of the Presidential Guard. In addition, fighting had resumed between Government troops and RPF and the efforts of ⁵⁰ Ibid., pp. 5-6.

⁵¹ Ibid., p. 6.

⁵² S/PRST/1994/16.

⁵³ S/1994/470.

UNAMIR to bring about a ceasefire had so far been fruitless.

The Secretary-General stated that it had become impossible for UNAMIR to continue the tasks under its mandate. In that critical situation, he proposed three options: (a) an immediate and massive reinforcement of UNAMIR and a change in its mandate so that it would be equipped and authorized to coerce the opposing forces into a ceasefire, and to attempt to restore law and order. Several thousand additional troops would be required and UNAMIR might have to be given enforcement powers under Chapter VII of the Charter; (b) a small group headed by the Force Commander would remain in Kigali to act as intermediary between the two parties in an attempt to bring them to an agreement on a ceasefire, that effort being maintained for a period of up to two weeks or longer, should the Council so prefer. The team would require the support of an infantry company to provide security, as well as a number of military observers to monitor the situation, the total being estimated at about 270; and (c) a complete withdrawal of UNAMIR, an option which the Secretary-General did not favour.⁵⁴ With regard to the first option, the Secretary-General indicated that Rwanda and Uganda had urged that UNAMIR be reinforced and retained in Rwanda.

At its 3368th meeting, on 21 April 1994, the Council included the special report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (New Zealand) drew the attention of the members of the Council to several documents.⁵⁵ He also drew their attention to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.⁵⁶

Speaking before the vote, the representative of Nigeria noted that while the Secretary-General's report constituted the basis for the draft resolution before the Council, none of the three options presented in the report completely met the satisfaction of his Government. The first option was, in the circumstances, not feasible, considering that a massive United Nations force could not be raised immediately. It was not certain, either, that enforcement process and action would really meet the security and political challenges posed by the situation in Rwanda. Option three would seriously, if not irretrievably, undermine the credibility of the Council as the organ charged with the responsibility for maintaining international peace and security. The second option seemed, therefore, a reasonable one, which his delegation would be able to support, although reluctantly. In the view of his delegation, the issue was moral, transcended politics, and went to the heart of the credibility of the United Nations. He concluded by calling upon the parties to cease all hostilities and agree to a ceasefire immediately, and to cooperate fully with the ongoing efforts of the United Nations and OAU to resolve the conflict.⁵⁷

The representative of Oman said that, while appreciating the position that called for the continuation of UNAMIR's mandate, his delegation believed that it would be most appropriate to reduce the presence of UNAMIR to a minimum. However, a United Nations political presence must be preserved in allowing the Special Representative of the Secretary-General in Rwanda to carry on with his intermediary efforts. His country supported that alternative because the Rwandese parties were still hesitant to put Kigali airport under the control of UNAMIR.⁵⁸

The representative of Djibouti stated that although the warning signals were clearly evident, and in fact repeatedly taken note of, it was regrettable that the peace process leading to the establishment of the agreed transitional institutions called for in the Arusha agreement had never been completed. The situation in Rwanda was one in which the United Nations was perhaps the only entity capable of preserving some order and saving lives, while bringing about a halt to the fighting so that negotiations leading to a return to the Arusha agreement principles could be initiated. He further stated that of the three options offered by the Secretary-General, option three was both inhuman and unacceptable and would undermine all the good the United Nations had done and stood in a position to do. His delegation would argue for an intermediate position, between the Secretary-General's options one and two. It saw not so much the need to coerce the combatants into a ceasefire and force law and order as the need to maintain minimum safety for innocent civilians and to offer some protection, while pushing for a return to negotiations. The United Nations should certainly be able to provide, with the acceptance of both parties, safety and refuge for innocent civilians. By agreement, neither party would attack safe areas, under threat of being charged with international human rights violations. Additionally, by agreement, United Nations Headquarters should be considered secure or diplomatic areas which neither party could violate. Given those factors, his delegation supported option two as probably the most workable one. Although that option would perhaps not permit the United Nations to undertake those tasks which it could and should undertake, and, through its reduced presence and visibility, might indirectly contribute to prolonging the violence, it was nevertheless preferable to a total withdrawal.⁵⁹

The representative of Rwanda stated that the assassination of the Head of State of Rwanda had led to acts of violence causing thousands of deaths, including that of United Nations personnel. The tragedy reached its climax with the resumption of hostilities, armed attacks and a wave of massacres, launched by RPF. Hence, the interim Government set itself the objective of restoring order and security, and of pursuing contacts with RPF, to ensure the putting into place without delay of enlarged transitional institutions, within the framework of the Arusha peace agreement. Success in that field depended on the cessation of hostilities and the international community's support in coming to the aid of the suffering people. Beyond the legitimate concern over the evacuation of foreign nationals, the international community did not seem to have acted in an appropriate manner to reply to the appeal of the people of Rwanda. That question had been examined from the point of view of the ways and means of withdrawing UNAMIR, without giving appropriate weight to the concern that, in view of the security situation prevailing in Rwanda, UNAMIR's numbers should be increased to enable it to contribute to the re-establishment of the ceasefire and to assist in the establishment of security conditions that could bring an end to the violence. The option chosen by the Council to reduce the number of troops in UNAMIR to approximately 200 was not a proper response to the crisis, as no measures were envisaged to help those exposed to all kinds of peril as a result of the hostilities. He further stated that his delegation's vote on the draft resolution would indicate the hope of the people of Rwanda that the Council would realize that it had a duty to act resolutely to maintain peace in Rwanda and to guarantee stability in the region. It would also indicate that Rwanda associated itself with the Council's appeal for an immediate cessation of hostilities and the violence. To that end, the Council should persuade RPF to agree to a comprehensive ceasefire, it being understood that it was futile to think that the crisis in Rwanda could be settled by military means. Moreover, Rwanda hoped that the Council's request that all countries avoid any action that might exacerbate the situation in Rwanda would be respected. In that regard, he emphasized the important role UNOMUR must play on the Rwanda Uganda border as an indispensable factor for regional stability.⁶⁰

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 912 (1994), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming all its previous resolutions on the situation in Rwanda, in particular its resolution 872 (1993) of 5 October 1993, by which it established the United Nations Assistance Mission for Rwanda,

Recalling its resolution 909 (1994) of 5 April 1994, by which it extended the mandate of the Mission until 29 July 1994 with a six-week review provision on the understanding that progress would be made in establishing the transitional institutions provided for under the Arusha Peace Agreement between the Government of Rwanda and the Rwandese Patriotic Front,

Recalling also its presidential statement of 7 April 1994 in which, inter alia, it reaffirmed its commitment to the Arusha Peace Agreement and urged all parties to implement it fully,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 20 April 1994,

Stressing that the Arusha Peace Agreement remains central to the peace process in Rwanda, ⁵⁹ Ibid., pp. 4-5.

⁶⁰ Ibid., pp. 5-6.

Expressing deep regret at the failure of the parties to implement fully the provisions of the Arusha Peace Agreement, particularly those provisions relating to the ceasefire,

Recognizing the initiatives made by the late Presidents of Rwanda and Burundi towards resolving the problems in their countries through peaceful means and in collaboration with regional leaders,

Shocked at the tragic incident that resulted in the deaths of the Presidents of Rwanda and Burundi on 6 April 1994,

Appalled at the ensuing large-scale violence in Rwanda, which has resulted in the death of thousands of innocent civilians, including women and children, the displacement of a significant number of the Rwandese population, including those who sought refuge with the Mission, and the significant increase in refugees to neighbouring countries,

Deeply concerned by continuing fighting, looting, banditry and the breakdown of law and order, particularly in Kigali,

Stressing the need for all countries to avoid any action that might exacerbate the situation in Rwanda,

Expressing its deep concern for the safety and security of the Mission and other United Nations personnel, and personnel of non-governmental organizations who are assisting in implementing the peace process and in distributing humanitarian relief,

1. Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General of 20 April 1994;

2. Expresses regret at the tragic incident in which the Presidents of Rwanda and Burundi lost their lives, and reiterates its invitation to the Secretary-General to report to the Council as requested in its presidential statement of 7 April 1994;

3. Expresses regret also at the ensuing violence which has claimed the lives of the Prime Minister, Cabinet Ministers, government officials and thousands of other civilians;

4. Condemns the ongoing violence in Rwanda, particularly in Kigali, which endangers the lives and safety of the civilian population;

5. Strongly condemns the attacks against the United Nations Assistance Mission for Rwanda and other United Nations personnel leading to the deaths of and injury to several Mission personnel, and calls upon all concerned to put an end to these acts of violence and to respect fully international humanitarian law;

6. Demands an immediate cessation of hostilities between the forces of the Government of Rwanda and the Rwandese Patriotic Front and an end to the mindless violence and carnage engulfing Rwanda;

7. Commends the active role of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General and of the Force Commander of the Mission to bring about a ceasefire and to mediate between the parties in order to bring about the earliest resolution of the Rwandese crisis;

8. Decides, in the light of the current situation in Rwanda, to adjust the mandate of the Mission as follows:

(a) To act as an intermediary between the parties in an attempt to secure their agreement to a ceasefire;

(b) To assist in the resumption of humanitarian relief operations to the extent feasible;

(c) To monitor and report on developments in Rwanda, including the safety and security of the civilians who sought refuge with the Mission; and authorizes a force level as set out in paragraphs 15 to 18 of the report of the Secretary-General of 20 April 1994 for that purpose;

9. Decides to keep the situation in Rwanda under constant review, and states its readiness to consider promptly any recommendations which the Secretary-General may make concerning the force level and mandate of the Mission in the light of developments;

10. Reiterates the crucial importance of the full implementation of the Arusha Peace Agreement to the settlement of the Rwandese conflict, and invites the Organization of African Unity to continue to cooperate fully with the United Nations in this regard;

11. Commends the efforts made by the leaders of the region at finding a solution to the crisis in Rwanda, and calls on the leaders of the region, especially the facilitator of the Arusha peace process, to persevere and intensify their efforts, in cooperation with the Organization of African Unity and the United Nations;

12. Reaffirms that the Arusha Peace Agreement remains the only viable framework for the resolution of the Rwandese conflict and serves as the basis for peace, national unity and reconciliation in the country, and calls upon the parties to renew their commitment to the Agreement;

13. Also calls upon the parties to cooperate fully in ensuring the unimpeded delivery of humanitarian assistance to all in need throughout Rwanda, and in this regard appeals to the international community to provide increased humanitarian assistance commensurate with the scale of the human tragedy in Rwanda;

14. Affirms its commitment to preserving the unity and territorial integrity of Rwanda;

15. Invites the Secretary-General to continue to monitor the events in Rwanda and to report fully to the Council on the evolving situation not later than fifteen days after the adoption of the present resolution;

16. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of France emphasized that no military solution was acceptable or possible, and that the Arusha peace agreement remained the only legitimate framework for seeking a political solution to the problem in Rwanda. He noted that the United Nations had given the parties several days to conclude a ceasefire, which would have allowed UNAMIR to carry out the mandate given to it by resolution 872 (1993). Unfortunately, there was still no ceasefire, and the Council was therefore compelled to reconsider the conditions for UNAMIR's presence, reducing it to a minimal level. He expressed the hope that the parties would come to their senses and realize that the United Nations could neither take their place nor impose peace on them.⁶¹

Decision of 30 April 1994 (3371st meeting):
statement by the President

At its 3371st meeting, on 30 April 1994, the Security Council resumed its consideration of the item. The President (New Zealand) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a letter dated 27 April 1994 addressed to the President of the Council from the representative of the United Republic of Tanzania.⁶² He stated that, following consultations among members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁶³

The Security Council is appalled at continuing reports of the slaughter of innocent civilians in Kigali and other parts of Rwanda and reported preparations for further massacres. It endorses the concern expressed by the Central Organ for Conflict Prevention, Management and Resolution of the Organization of Africa that the massacres and wanton killings have continued unabated in a systematic manner in Rwanda. It recalls that such killings have already been condemned by the Council in its resolution 912 (1994) of 21 April 1994.

Attacks on defenceless civilians have occurred throughout the country, especially in areas under the control of members or supporters of the armed forces of the interim Government of Rwanda. The Council demands that the interim Government of Rwanda and the Rwandese Patriotic Front take effective measures to prevent any attacks on civilians in areas under their control. It calls on the leadership of both parties to condemn publicly such attacks and to commit themselves to ensuring that persons who instigate or participate in such attacks are prosecuted and punished.

⁶³ S/PRST/1994/21.

The Council condemns all these breaches of international humanitarian law in Rwanda, particularly those perpetrated against the civilian population, and recalls that persons who instigate or participate in such acts are individually responsible. In this context, the Council recalls that the killing of members of an ethnic group with the intention of destroying such a group, in whole or in part, constitutes a crime punishable under international law.

The Council reiterates the demand in its resolution 912 (1994) for an immediate ceasefire and cessation of hostilities between the forces of the interim Government of Rwanda and the Rwandese Patriotic Front. It commends the efforts by the Special Representative of the Secretary-General and the Force Commander of the United Nations Assistance Mission for Rwanda to mediate such an outcome, and requests them to continue their efforts in liaison with countries of the region and the Organization of African Unity. It also commends the courage and determination of Mission personnel in affording protection to civilians who sought refuge with the Mission.

The Council welcomes the efforts that have been made by countries of the region, with the assistance of the Organization of African Unity, to bring about an end to the fighting and the killings in Rwanda. It also commends the efforts of States, United Nations agencies and non-governmental organizations to provide emergency humanitarian assistance to the suffering people of Rwanda.

The Council is deeply concerned at the situation of the many thousands of refugees and displaced persons who have been forced to flee the fighting and killings in Rwanda.

The Council calls on all States to assist the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees and other humanitarian and relief agencies operating in the area in meeting the urgent humanitarian needs in Rwanda and its bordering States. The Council calls on States bordering Rwanda, working with the Organization of African Unity, to provide appropriate protection to refugees and to facilitate transfer of goods and supplies to meet the needs of the displaced persons within Rwanda.

The Council calls on all Rwandese parties to guarantee the protection of displaced persons and refugees in Rwanda and refugees outside Rwanda and to ensure safe passage for humanitarian assistance.

The Council underlines the urgent need for coordinated international action to help bring peace to Rwanda and to alleviate the suffering of the Rwandese people. It requests the Secretary-General, in consultation with the Secretary-General of the Organization of African Unity and countries of the region, to take appropriate measures to ensure that international efforts to assist the situation in Rwanda are carried out in an effective and coordinated manner, and to ensure that all relevant parties are kept fully informed.

The Council emphasizes the importance of the Kigali airport for the provision of international relief efforts to Rwanda, as well as for the requirements of the Mission. It calls on the parties to allow the airport to be kept open at all times for such purposes.

The Council stresses the importance of ensuring that the situation in Rwanda does not affect adversely the security and stability of neighbouring countries.

The Council warns that the situation in Rwanda would be further seriously aggravated if either of the parties were to have access to additional arms. It appeals to all States to refrain from providing arms or any military assistance to the parties to the conflict. It states its willingness in principle to consider promptly the application of an arms embargo to Rwanda.

The Council reaffirms its commitment to preserving the unity and territorial integrity of Rwanda. It reiterates its conviction that the Arusha Peace Agreement remains the only viable framework for the resolution of the Rwandese conflict and serves as the basis for peace, national unity and reconciliation in the country. It calls again on the parties to renew their commitment to the Agreement.

The Council requests the Secretary-General:

(a) In consultation with the Secretary-General of the Organization of African Unity, to report further on action which may be undertaken with a view to assisting in the restoration of law and order in Rwanda and in providing security for displaced persons;

(b) To work with the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, the Organization of African Unity and countries of the region to take such preventive diplomatic steps as may be necessary to prevent the spread of violence and atrocities to neighbouring countries;

(c) To explore urgently ways of extending humanitarian relief assistance to refugees and displaced persons;

(d) To consult the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees on measures to provide humanitarian assistance to those displaced persons congregated along the borders with the United Republic of Tanzania, Uganda, Zaire and Burundi;

(e) To bring to its attention any information that he may receive concerning arms flows into Rwanda, and to consult the countries of the region and the Organization of African Unity about the practical implementation of an arms embargo on Rwanda;

(f) To make proposals for investigation of the reports of serious violations of international humanitarian law during the conflict.

The Council states its intention to consider urgently the letter of the Secretary-General dated 29 April 1994 and further recommendations that the Secretary-General may provide.

Decision of 6 May 1994: letter from the President to the Secretary-General

By a letter dated 29 April 1994 addressed to the President of the Council,⁶⁴ the Secretary-General noted a further deterioration of the situation in Kigali and other parts of Rwanda. UNAMIR had reported that there was evidence of preparations for further massacres of civilians in the city and that massacres continued on a large scale in the countryside, especially in the south. Those developments raised serious questions about the viability of the revised mandate which the Council had given to UNAMIR by resolution 912 (1994). Clearly, that mandate did not give UNAMIR the power to take effective action to halt the continuing massacres. According to some estimates, as many as 200,000 people might have died during the past three weeks. That humanitarian catastrophe demanded urgent action by the international community. In those circumstances, the Secretary-General urged the Security Council to re-examine its decisions of 21 April 1994 (resolution 912 (1994)) and to consider again what action, including forceful action, it could take, or could authorize Member States to take, in order to restore law and order and end the massacres.

By a letter dated 3 May 1994 addressed to the President of the Council,⁶⁵ the Secretary-General, referring to the presidential statement of 30 April 1994, reported that he had consulted with the Secretary-General and the Chairman in Office of OAU and with leaders of a number of several African countries to consider in what way they could assist in the restoration of law and order in Rwanda and, in particular, whether they could contribute troops to a regional effort to that end. Based on their responses, he would submit recommendations to the Council on how the United Nations could help the efforts of the countries in the region.

In a letter dated 6 May 1994,⁶⁶ the President (Nigeria) informed the Secretary-General as follows:

The members of the Security Council have considered your two letters of 29 April and 3 May 1994 on the situation in Rwanda.

The members of the Council commend you, your Special Representative, the Force Commander and the personnel of the United Nations Assistance Mission for Rwanda for the exemplary manner in which you have all continued to carry out your respective tasks, under very difficult circumstances.

The members of the Council have agreed that, in view of the unabated hostilities and killings, urgent and effective means of action be considered. In order to do so, they have asked me to request you to provide in the first instance indicative contingency planning with regard to the delivery of humanitarian assistance as well as support to the displaced persons in Rwanda.

The Council may, at a later stage and as the situation develops, request from you a further indication as to what would be required in terms of logistics and financial implications of an expanded United Nations or international presence in Rwanda and/or neighbouring countries capable of assisting the parties in Rwanda, monitoring a ceasefire and contributing to the resumption of the peace process under the Arusha Peace Agreement.

The members of the Council do not expect at this stage any firm or definitive recommendations from your Office, since, as we understand, consultations with regard to future United Nations courses of action are ongoing.

Decision of 17 May 1994 (3377th meeting):
resolution 918 (1994)

On 13 May 1994, pursuant to the letter of 6 May 1994 from the President of the Council, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the situation in Rwanda.⁶⁷ The Secretary-General reported that the situation in Rwanda remained unstable and insecure, with widespread violence and continuing combat between the Rwandese Government Forces and RPF. An estimated 2 million persons had been displaced and a major humanitarian crisis had developed.

Referring to the letter of 6 May 1994 by which the President of the Council had stated that urgent and effective means of action must be considered, the Secretary-General proposed that UNAMIR's mandate be expanded as follows: the new UNAMIR would provide security assistance to humanitarian organizations for the distribution of relief supplies, and would establish access to sites where displaced and other affected persons were concentrated, and could assure their protection; it would also monitor border crossing points as well as the deployment of the parties in conflict, in order to assure the effective conduct of its operations. A minimum viable force of approximately 5,500 troops would be required to carry out the expanded mandate. Moreover, the deployment of the expanded UNAMIR would be conducted in three phases.

The Secretary-General observed that the solution to the crisis in Rwanda must be found through the implementation of the Arusha agreement. For that to be achieved, the parties must agree to a ceasefire. His Special Representative and the Force Commander would continue to give the highest priority to that objective. In addition, the Council could issue a call to the parties to accept the designation of Kigali airport as a neutral zone under the exclusive control of the United Nations. Meanwhile, there was an urgent requirement for the United Nations to increase its efforts to address the desperate humanitarian crisis created by the conflict. Protected sites should be established close to Rwanda's borders and assistance should be provided to persons in need in the interior of Rwanda. The Secretary-General recommended that the Council approve the phased expansion of UNAMIR for a period of six months, on the understanding that it would be reviewed by the Council as necessary and, in particular, following an agreement on a ceasefire. He reiterated that in order for UNAMIR II to attain its objective, there could be no delay in its deployment.

At its 3377th meeting, on 17 May 1994, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. The President drew the attention of the members of the Council to several documents.⁶⁸ He also drew their attention to a draft resolution submitted by the Czech Republic, France, the Russian Federation, Spain, the United Kingdom and the United States,⁶⁹ and read out revisions to be made to the draft text in its provisional form. The President then stated that a separate vote on section B of the draft resolution had been requested. In the absence of any objection, he would first put section B of the draft resolution to the vote and thereafter put the rest of the draft resolution to the vote.

Speaking before the vote, the representative of Rwanda stated that peace required a candid dialogue

⁶⁷ S/1994/565.

⁶⁸ Letters dated 2 May 1994 from the Chargé d'affaires a.i. of the United Republic of Tanzania (S/1994/527), 9 May 1994 from the representatives of Uganda and the United States (S/1994/552), 10 May 1994 from the Chargé d'affaires a.i. of Uganda (S/1994/553) and 12 May 1994 from the representative of Burkina Faso (S/1994/562), all addressed to the President of the Security Council.

between the Government of Rwanda and RPF, which implied that military hostilities and inter-ethnic violence must first cease. The international community — especially the Security Council — must shoulder its responsibilities by compelling RPF to enter into dialogue with the Government so as to bring about an immediate ceasefire. The Government, for its part, was willing to conclude a ceasefire agreement with RPF immediately. Such an agreement, guaranteed by the international community, and especially the United Nations, should make it possible for the two armies to resume the positions they held before 6 April 1994. The Government of Rwanda believed that the only way of ensuring respect for a ceasefire was the establishment in Rwanda of an international buffer force made up of troops from truly neutral countries and excluding Rwanda's neighbours. Nonetheless it welcomed the consensus achieved on certain points relating to UNAMIR's expansion to allow it to contribute to the security and protection of the civilian population and the delivery of humanitarian assistance. The Rwandese Government was convinced that the ceasefire would not be respected nor the Rwandese conflict resolved until Uganda ended its aggression against Rwanda and stopped supplying war materiel and troops to RPF. The Security Council should ensure that that occurred. In that connection, the Government had conveyed to the Council documents clearly showing Uganda's involvement in the Rwandese conflict. To prevent that country from destabilizing Rwanda and other countries of the region, it was urgent that an arms embargo be imposed upon it. He stated that it was upon Uganda that a military embargo should be imposed, not upon Rwanda; and that it was not the victim who should be punished but the aggressor. The embargo against Rwanda would be tantamount to direct support for Ugandan aggression. He further noted that an embargo against Rwanda would violate the Charter, which enshrined the principle of self-defence. He concluded by reaffirming that the Government of Rwanda remained committed and determined to resume dialogue with RPF on the basis of the Arusha Peace Agreement.⁷⁰

The representative of Oman stated that the most urgent measure was to extend all forms of humanitarian assistance to the displaced people and refugees and to all those in need in Rwanda. He stressed the importance of coordinating those efforts with OAU and the necessity of ensuring full cooperation from both parties to the conflict in establishing Kigali airport as a neutral zone and keeping it open at all times for humanitarian relief. Despite its hesitation to involve peacekeeping forces in internal disputes, and in view of the desirability of seeing a more successful UNAMIR, Oman supported its expansion and the amendment to its mandate. Furthermore, while believing that the arms embargo would not bring the satisfactory results expected of it, his delegation fully supported that endeavour and considered it an important step in the right direction to contain the conflict and to halt its proliferation to other areas.⁷¹

The representative of Pakistan noted that the situation into which the contributing countries would be sending their troops was highly dangerous. It was therefore essential not only that UNAMIR be adequately equipped in terms of armaments, but also that it be given clear-cut rules of engagement under which its troops could effectively defend themselves or those they were required to protect. Pakistan hoped that the restriction placed on the supply of arms and ammunition to Rwanda would be scrupulously observed. The speaker further cautioned that the pressure to withdraw UNAMIR could mount once again if the Rwandese parties failed to bring the hostilities and killings to an end within a reasonable period.⁷²

The representative of Djibouti stated that there was a universal recognition that in some significant way the international community must become directly involved in Rwanda. The approach of letting events run their course while diplomatic attempts were intensified, had proved fruitless. The Rwandese catastrophe clearly constituted a serious threat to peace and security in the region, which must be addressed. He noted that the Secretary-General correctly recommended a revision of the mandate of UNAMIR and an upward adjustment in its composition. The draft resolution, however, only partially addressed that requirement, with the hope that the whole spectrum of deployment would have been taken care of shortly after the next report of the Secretary-General. Meanwhile, the job of the United Nations would be to remove the innocent from harm's way and protect them during that process, while responding forcefully only to direct attacks upon itself or the relief efforts. The mandate would not authorize the use of force to stop ethnic massacres and bloodshed. His delegation found that difficult to accept. He noted further that the heaviest burden must be assumed by the countries of Africa, which was possible with the cooperation and assistance of other Member States on an urgent basis. It was indeed a sad reflection on the state of collective security if that capability did not exist and could not be expeditiously mobilized. His delegation further supported the call on Member States to restrict the sale of arms and related material to any of the parties. Although his delegation would have liked to have seen a stronger mandate for UNAMIR, time was crucial. Should the Secretary-General find that the measures called for were insufficient, it might be possible in the near future to upgrade UNAMIR's mandate to include more authority to halt the fighting.⁷³

⁷¹ Ibid., pp. 6-7.

⁷² Ibid., pp. 7-8.

The representative of China stated that the Council's agreement to expand the mandate of UNAMIR and increase the number of its personnel based on humanitarian considerations was a reflection of the international community's good will and its sincere desire to create conditions for the early restoration of peace and security in Rwanda. His delegation held the view that, first of all, the parties should cease hostilities and agree to an effective and lasting ceasefire. Secondly, the Arusha Peace Agreement was the framework and bridge agreed by the two Rwandese sides for the peaceful settlement of the conflict in Rwanda. Thirdly, the two sides should closely cooperate with the Special Representative of the Secretary-General, with UNAMIR and with the international community's peace endeavour. At the same time, they should adopt every possible measure to ensure the safety of United Nations personnel and of those engaged in humanitarian relief activities. Fourthly, in the course of settling the crisis in Rwanda, attention should continue to be given to the role of OAU and the countries neighbouring Rwanda.⁷⁴

The representative of the Russian Federation shared the view of the Secretary-General that the carnage in Rwanda was a humanitarian catastrophe of unprecedented scope. Hence, the Council was correct to focus its attention on resolving that urgent aspect of the problem of Rwanda. His delegation was of the view that a most important factor for ensuring the success of the expanded United Nations operation was the unconditional cooperation of both parties. It proceeded from the premise that the central element of the planned operation was the establishment of secure humanitarian areas, primarily in Rwanda's border areas, for the protection of refugees and displaced persons and of members of the civilian population under threat. In that connection, he noted that the report of the Secretary-General referred to the provision of assistance to those requiring it in the interior of the country — not instead of, but in addition to, the establishment of those secure humanitarian areas. The concept of those secure humanitarian areas would undoubtedly make it easier to establish them fairly quickly and would not require such a large United Nations force. His delegation also viewed as particularly important the draft resolution's provision with respect to the imposition of an arms embargo on Rwanda, which was critical in the absence of a ceasefire, and for whose effective implementation of which neighbouring African States would bear special responsibility. In the light of the urgent humanitarian nature of the United Nations operation, he stressed that it must be carried out quickly and efficiently, warning that if the conditions necessary for continuing the peacekeeping operation did not come about in Rwanda during that time, and if there was no progress towards a political settlement, the Council would have to give serious thought to what further action it should take. Finally, his delegation was convinced of the need for close coordination between the efforts of the Secretary-General and those of the OAU and Rwanda's neighbours — which had far from exhausted the opportunities to bring influence to bear on the Rwandese parties with a view to a swift settlement of the conflict.⁷⁵

Section B of the draft resolution was put to the vote and was adopted by 14 votes in favour to 1 against (Rwanda). The rest of the draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously. The draft resolution, as orally revised in its provisional form, was adopted as resolution 918 (1994), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming all its previous resolutions on the situation in Rwanda, in particular its resolution 872 (1993) of 5 October

⁷³ Ibid., p. 8.

⁷⁴ Ibid., 9.

⁷⁵ Ibid., pp. 9-10.

1993 by which it established the United Nations Assistance Mission for Rwanda, its resolution 909 (1994) of 5 April 1994 by which it extended the mandate of the Mission until 29 July 1994, and its resolution 912 (1994) of 21 April 1994 by which it adjusted the mandate of the Mission,

Recalling the statements made by the President of the Security Council on 7 April and 30 April 1994,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 13 May 1994,

Reaffirming its resolution 868 (1993) of 29 September 1993 on the security of United Nations operations,

Strongly condemning the ongoing violence in Rwanda and particularly condemning the very numerous killings of civilians which have taken place in Rwanda and the impunity with which armed individuals have been able to operate and continue operating therein,

Stressing the importance of the Arusha Peace Agreement to the peaceful resolution of the conflict in Rwanda and the necessity for all parties to recommit themselves to its full implementation,

Commending the efforts of the Organization of African Unity and its organs, as well as the efforts of the Tanzanian facilitator, in providing diplomatic, political and humanitarian support for the implementation of the relevant resolutions of the Council,

Deeply concerned that the situation in Rwanda, which has resulted in the death of many thousands of innocent civilians, including women and children, the internal displacement of a significant percentage of the Rwandese population, and the massive exodus of refugees to neighbouring countries, constitutes a humanitarian crisis of enormous proportions,

Expressing once again its alarm at continuing reports of systematic, widespread and flagrant violations of international humanitarian law in Rwanda, as well as other violations of the rights to life and property,

Recalling in this context that the killing of members of an ethnic group with the intention of destroying such a group, in whole or in part, constitutes a crime punishable under international law,

Strongly urging all parties to cease forthwith any incitement, especially through the mass media, to violence or ethnic hatred,

Recalling also its request to the Secretary-General to collect information on the responsibility for the tragic incident that resulted in the death of the Presidents of Rwanda and Burundi,

Recalling further that it had requested the Secretary-General to make proposals for the investigation of reports of serious violations of international humanitarian law during the conflict,

Underlining the urgent need for coordinated international action to alleviate the suffering of the Rwandese people and to help restore peace in Rwanda, and in this connection welcoming cooperation between the United Nations and the Organization of African Unity as well as with countries of the region, especially the facilitator of the Arusha peace process,

Desiring in this context to expand the mandate of the Mission for humanitarian purposes, and stressing the importance it attaches to the support and cooperation of the parties for the successful implementation of all aspects of that mandate,

Reaffirming its commitment to the unity and territorial integrity of Rwanda,

Recognizing that the people of Rwanda bear ultimate responsibility for national reconciliation and reconstruction of their country,

Deeply disturbed by the magnitude of the human suffering caused by the conflict, and concerned that the continuation of the situation in Rwanda constitutes a threat to peace and security in the region,

A

1. Demands that all parties to the conflict immediately cease hostilities, agree to a ceasefire, and bring an end to the mindless violence and carnage engulfing Rwanda;

2. Welcomes the report of the Secretary-General of 13 May 1994;

3. Decides to expand the mandate of the United Nations Assistance Mission for Rwanda under resolution 912 (1994) to include the following additional responsibilities within the limits of the resources available to it:

(a) To contribute to the security and protection of displaced persons, refugees and civilians at risk in Rwanda, including through the establishment and maintenance, where feasible, of secure humanitarian areas;

(b) To provide security and support for the distribution of relief supplies and humanitarian relief operations;

4. Recognizes that the Mission may be required to take action in self-defence against persons or groups who threaten protected sites and populations, United Nations and other humanitarian personnel or the means of delivery and distribution of humanitarian relief;

5. Authorizes in this context an expansion of the Mission's force level up to 5,500 troops;

6. Requests the Secretary-General, as recommended in his report, and as a first phase, immediately to redeploy to Rwanda the military observers of the Mission currently in Nairobi and to bring up to full strength the elements of the mechanized infantry battalion currently in Rwanda;

7. Also requests the Secretary-General to report as soon as possible on the next phase of the Mission's deployment including, inter alia, on the cooperation of the parties, progress towards a ceasefire, availability of resources and the proposed duration of the mandate for further review and action, as required, by the Council;

8. Encourages the Secretary-General to accelerate his efforts, in conjunction with the Secretary-General of the Organization of African Unity, to obtain from Member States the necessary personnel to enable the deployment of the expanded Mission to proceed urgently;

9. Invites Member States to respond promptly to the Secretary-General's request for the resources required, including logistical support capability for rapid deployment of the expanded force level of the Mission and its support in the field;

10. Strongly urges all parties in Rwanda to cooperate fully with the Mission in the implementation of its mandate and in particular in ensuring its freedom of movement and the unimpeded delivery of humanitarian assistance, and further calls upon them to treat the Kigali airport as a neutral zone under the control of the Mission;

11. Demands that all parties in Rwanda strictly respect the persons and premises of the United Nations and other organizations serving in Rwanda and refrain from any acts of intimidation or violence against personnel engaged in humanitarian and peacekeeping work;

12. Commends the efforts of States, United Nations agencies and non-governmental organizations which have provided humanitarian and other assistance, encourages them to continue and increase such assistance, and urges others to provide such assistance;

B

Determining that the situation in Rwanda constitutes a threat to peace and security in the region,

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

13. Decides that all States shall prevent the sale or supply to Rwanda by their nationals or from their territories or using their flag vessels or aircraft of arms and related materiel of all types, including weapons and ammunition, military vehicles and equipment, paramilitary police equipment and spare parts;

14. Also decides to establish, in accordance with rule 28 of the provisional rules of procedure of the Security Council, a Committee of the Security Council consisting of all the members of the Council, to undertake the following tasks and to report on its work to the Council with its observations and recommendations:

(a) To seek from all States information regarding the action taken by them concerning the effective implementation of the embargo imposed by paragraph 13 above;

(b) To consider any information brought to its attention by States concerning violations of the embargo, and in that context to make recommendations to the Council on ways of increasing the effectiveness of the embargo;

(c) To recommend appropriate measures in response to violations of the embargo imposed by paragraph 13 above and provide information on a regular basis to the Secretary-General for general distribution to Member States;

15. Calls upon all States, including States not Members of the United Nations, and international organizations to act strictly in accordance with the provisions of the present resolution, notwithstanding the existence of any rights or obligations conferred or imposed by any international agreement or any contract entered into or any licence or permit granted prior to the date of the adoption of the present resolution;

16. Decides that the provisions set forth in paragraphs 13 and 15 above do not apply to activities related to the United Nations Assistance Mission for Rwanda and the United Nations Observer Mission Uganda-Rwanda;

17. Requests the Secretary-General to provide all necessary assistance to the Committee and to make the necessary arrangements in the Secretariat for this purpose;

18. Requests the Secretary-General to submit a report as soon as possible on the investigation of serious violations of international humanitarian law committed in Rwanda during the conflict;

19. Invites the Secretary-General and his Special Representative, in coordination with the Organization of African Unity and countries in the region, to continue their efforts to achieve a political settlement in Rwanda within the framework of the Arusha Peace Agreement;

20. Decides to keep the situation in Rwanda under constant review, and requests the Secretary-General to report further, including on the humanitarian situation, within five weeks of the adoption of the present resolution and again in good time before the expiration of the current mandate of the Assistance Mission;

21. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

After the vote, the representative of France stated that the Council had been compelled to reduce the size of UNAMIR, which thereby had been prevented from fulfilling its mandate. His delegation had taken that decision reluctantly and underscored at that time that it was a temporary measure. By voting in favour of resolution 918 (1994) which decided to expand UNAMIR up to 5,500 troops, his delegation was expressing its will to help the Rwandese people to find peace and security. He noted that while the objective of that resolution was first of all humanitarian, the longer term objective of the United Nations was political. The United Nations was determined to contribute, in due course, to the resumption of the peace process within the framework of the Arusha Peace Agreement, which remained the only way to resolve the crisis in Rwanda.⁷⁶

The representative of New Zealand said that, although his delegation voted in favour of resolution 918 (1994), it was disappointed that the resolution only approved a very modest first phase of the expanded United Nations presence which was essential in Rwanda. New Zealand agreed that there needed to be a detailed, hands on process of interaction between the Council and the Secretariat to update and fine-tune the operational concept as planning was finalized in the period prior to deployment. In that connection, he would like to see institutional arrangements within the Council for a more hands-on approach to all of the complex operations supervised by the Council.⁷⁷

The representative of the United Kingdom stated that there was no easy international response to the tragedy which had occurred in Rwanda. The United Nations could not impose an end to the bloodshed, but neither could it stand idly by. It was right that new tasks should be added to UNAMIR's mandate to help the civilian population. The priority must be to ensure the early deployment of the troops needed for those tasks. While the focus of that expanded United Nations operation would rightly be humanitarian, the Council must not lose sight of the need to achieve a ceasefire between the parties and to get the peace process back on track. In that regard, the Arusha Agreement remained the only viable basis for national reconciliation in Rwanda. In the meantime, the parties could not escape their responsibility for events in the areas which they controlled.⁷⁸

The representative of the United States noted that the Council had struggled to formulate a response to the humanitarian disaster in Rwanda that was both appropriate and effective. To ensure the success of the United Nations in Rwanda, the United States wanted to bring the ends and means of the Council's resolutions into balance. The speaker expected the next report of the Secretary-General on Rwanda to closely examine the following factors: a well defined concept of operations; availability of resources; consent of the parties; progress towards a ceasefire; and the duration of the mandate. He further stated that whatever efforts the United Nations might undertake, the true key to the problems in Rwanda was in the hands of the Rwandese people, which meant that the killing — by all parties — must stop. Furthermore, the parties must consent to unimpeded United Nations operations providing humanitarian assistance to and protection for displaced persons, and refugees. In that regard, it was critical that all parties respect absolutely the inviolability of United Nations personnel and peacekeepers. If the parties could meet those simple but vital requirements for an effective United Nations peacekeeping operation, then the international community would be willing and able to help.⁷⁹

The representative of the Czech Republic stated that although the situation in Rwanda was being described as a humanitarian crisis, it was his delegation's view that the proper description was genocide.⁸⁰

Speaking in his capacity as representative of Nigeria, the President stated that, while OAU and the neighbouring countries had an important role to play in efforts to halt the violence and restore peace in Rwanda, the United Nations had an even more critical role in galvanizing international assistance for that country. Nigeria believed that the credibility of the United Nations was not particularly well served if, in moments of crisis, it prevaricated and took positions which, in hindsight, were mistaken. Nigeria saw the tasks facing the international community in Rwanda as three fold: humanitarian, security and political, all of which were closely interconnected. He noted further that, in contrast to the drastic reduction of UNAMIR undertaken by resolution 912 (1994), resolution 918 (1994) authorized the deployment of the UNAMIR force level up to 5,500 troops. While the primary focus of the expanded UNAMIR was humanitarian, it was important that the Council address the wider political purpose of the United Nations involvement in Rwanda by helping to obtain a ceasefire and to promote the peace process. He further stated that although his country had voted in favour of the resolution, it had reservations on two aspects. First, it was not entirely satisfied with the manner in which African issues that came before the Council tended generally to be treated. Secondly, it was unhappy with the import of operative paragraph 7 of resolution 918 (1994), which seemed to imply that the second phase of UNAMIR's deployment would be dependent on a number of conditionalities, including a further decision or action by the Council. Nigeria's own expectation was that the second phase of UNAMIR's deployment would achieve the force level of 5,500 troops, or as close to that as possible and necessary, as called for by the Secretary-General in his report.⁸¹

Decision of 8 June 1994 (3388th meeting):
resolution 925 (1994)

On 31 May 1994, pursuant to resolution 918 (1994), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the situation in Rwanda.⁸² The Secretary-General informed the Council that a United Nations special mission had visited Rwanda from 22 to 27 May 1994 for the purpose of moving the parties towards a ceasefire, getting their views and intentions on the implementation of resolution 918 (1994), and reviewing the modalities of the concept of operations proposed by the Secretary-General for an expanded UNAMIR. The mission had reported that an estimated 250,000 to 500,000 had been killed and tens of thousands more had been maimed or wounded. According to information received by the mission, the killers included members of the Rwandan government forces, particularly the Presidential Guard and the youth militia. The mission had found that the RPF zone was virtually empty and that in the Rwandan government forces-controlled zones there were increasing numbers of displaced persons. That exodus was due in part to alarming radio broadcasts from Rwandan government force zones, which also broadcast incitements to eliminate RPF supporters. RPF declared that the aim of its military offensive was to rescue those persons in danger of their lives in the Rwandan government forces zone and to seize those responsible for the massacres. It insisted that a condition for a ceasefire was the commitment of the Rwandan government forces to halt the killings. The mission was able, however, to obtain the agreement of the two sides to initiate talks for the establishment of a ceasefire. The conclusion of the mission was that the concept of operations would require some adjustments. The implementation of phase 1 of the operation clearly remained urgent and must be commenced without further delay, even before a ceasefire was effected. Because of the projected delay in deploying the troops and equipment for phase 1, phase 2 should be initiated immediately, in close synchronization with phase 1. The need to deploy the two battalions envisaged for phase 3 would depend on the establishment of a ceasefire.

The Secretary-General further noted that there could be little doubt that the human calamity that had engulfed Rwanda constituted genocide, since there had been large-scale killings of communities and families belonging to a particular ethnic group. The continuing hostilities impeded a full investigation of those massacres and, regrettably, procedures in the United Nations did not lend themselves to immediate action in such circumstances. However, the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights had visited Rwanda and had presented his report to the Commission on Human Rights, which had designated Mr. René Degni Segui as Special Rapporteur for Rwanda. The Secretary-General stressed that both parties must immediately cease all the violence, there being strong evidence that the overwhelming responsibility lay with the "interim Government" and the Rwandan government forces, which must immediately take effective measures to halt such killings in the zones under their control. Only when the killings were halted, when a ceasefire was effective, and when humanitarian relief was provided, could the underlying political issues be addressed through negotiations. At that stage, it would be essential that OAU and all interested Governments exert their influence upon both sides to demonstrate their commitment to compromise. It was also essential that the arms embargo imposed by resolution 918 (1994) be respected, and that no armaments reach either party across any of Rwanda's borders. In that context, he intended to review the role of UNOMUR, which monitored only the border with Uganda, to assess whether it would be advantageous to integrate its resources into UNAMIR to strengthen the latter. On the basis of the above, the Secretary-General recommended that the Council authorize the expanded mandate for UNAMIR for an initial period of six months, with the anticipation that at least another six month renewal would be required. He intended to establish a special trust fund to support effective rehabilitation programmes in Rwanda, and appealed to all Governments to contribute to it.

⁸² S/1994/640.

At its 3388th meeting, on 8 June 1994, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Oman) drew the attention of the members of the Council to several documents.⁸³ He also drew their attention to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.⁸⁴

Speaking before the vote, the representative of Djibouti observed that, against the backdrop of international indecisiveness, the objectives and intent of the warring sides remained the same, and the fighting continued. If anything, the calls for a ceasefire in the draft resolution before the Council were weaker than those in the previous one, a fact which could not fail to capture the attention of the parties. What was required was a firm and unequivocal demand by the Council to the parties that fighting must be stopped forthwith, coupled with measures which clearly showed the Council's determination to back up that demand. The international community could not continue to push the issues of security and peace into the background of human rights headlines. The reason for that tragic human rights situation was precisely that the fighting had been allowed to continue. Simply creating more safe areas to protect the victims had become a diversion. He noted that one lesson to be learned from Rwanda was that the United Nations must have a force not defined by national politics, a standing multinational force at the disposal of the Security Council.⁸⁵

The representative of the Czech Republic stated that his delegation was troubled that it had taken so long for the Secretary-General to describe the events in Rwanda as genocide in his reports, on which the Council so heavily based its work so heavily. It was equally confused that even before the outbreak of the holocaust on 6 April, UNAMIR and its representatives had been aware of inflammatory broadcasts on the local radio, of suspicious movements of armed groups and of an inflow of arms into Rwanda. His delegation felt that if such facts had been forcefully communicated to the Council as soon as the Secretariat became aware of them, the Council might have been a step ahead. With reference to the Secretary-General's plans to review the reactive capacity of the entire United Nations system, his delegation would propose that providing timely and unvarnished information might be of some help. Such information would help galvanize, rather than paralyse, the international community. He further recalled that resolution 918 (1994) requested the Secretary-General to present a report on investigations of serious violations of international humanitarian law. He suggested that the Special Rapporteur for Human Rights might be requested to report to the Council directly, and that a fact-finding mission be established by the Council.⁸⁶

According to the representative of Brazil, UNAMIR should seek to commence its tasks expeditiously and should be appropriately staffed and equipped to meet its threefold mandate, which was to contribute to providing security and protection for displaced persons, refugees and civilians at risk, to provide security and support for the distribution of relief supplies and for humanitarian operations, and to develop all efforts to mediate and broker negotiations between the warring parties, so that an immediate ceasefire could be reached and the peace process could be resumed. The parties in Rwanda must achieve a ceasefire urgently. His delegation was pleased that the Council again put to use the non-binding criteria for the review of mandates of peacekeeping operations, set out in the presidential statement of 3 May 1994.⁸⁷ In order that these criteria should become the much-needed yardstick for peacekeeping operations, they ought to be implemented consistently, and with sufficient flexibility so as to accommodate unforeseen situations and ensure the effective discharge of the mandate of these operations. He concluded by noting that the draft resolution was an essential step towards the measures the United Nations could adopt even before a ceasefire was achieved.⁸⁸

According to the representative of Nigeria, the draft resolution before the Council, and resolution 918 (1994) which preceded it, had enabled the United Nations to redeem itself and effectively resume its role of contributing to the security and protection of displaced persons, refugees and civilians at risk in Rwanda. His delegation would support the draft resolution out of recognition that it was better late than never. The draft resolution, which was essentially oriented towards the provision of humanitarian assistance in Rwanda, equally anticipated international participation in the political process in that country, which was desirable. He stressed that the Rwandan problem remained an international problem and must be addressed internationally. In that endeavour, the United Nations, OAU and the neighbouring States must act in concert and not in competition.⁸⁹

The representative of the Russian Federation stated that his delegation acknowledged that the highly complex and rapidly changing situation in Rwanda dictated the need for a different approach, in particular, of flexible contingency planning. However, in the opinion of his delegation, the complexity of the situation in Rwanda increased the need for tighter control by the Council over the conduct of the operation in order to be able to quickly react and resolve problems that inevitably would arise during the course of its implementation. It deemed justified the provision that UNAMIR would not be used as a buffer force between the parties to the conflict, and supported the demand of the Council that both parties abide by their assurances to cooperate with UNAMIR. His delegation was convinced of the need for further close coordination between the efforts of the Secretary-General and OAU and with the neighbours of Rwanda, which were far from having exhausted their capacity for exerting pressure on the Rwandese parties to resolve the conflict and restore the peace process.⁹⁰

The representative of the United Kingdom noted that the humanitarian mandate and the decision to deploy 5,500 additional troops was a worthy and practical response to the situation, which tried to take account of the bitter lessons the United Nations had to learn in Somalia without, at the same time, being deterred from meeting the necessary obligations under the Charter. The concept of operations proposed by the Secretary-General seemed to be the right one, the key being to ensure flexibility and to allow the Force Commander to adapt to a changing situation on the ground. He added that, in his Government's view, it was of the greatest importance that all neighbouring

Governments and all Council members do their best to ensure strict compliance with the arms embargo.⁹¹

The representative of Spain stated that the time had come to prepare for the establishment of an international commission of experts to examine and analyse all available information about the grave violations of international humanitarian law committed in Rwanda, in order to meet the concern expressed by the Secretary-General in his report. Such an initiative would be carried out separately from the important work initiated by the Commission on Human Rights with the appointment of a Special Rapporteur for Rwanda.⁹²

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 925 (1994), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming all its previous resolutions on the situation in Rwanda, in particular its resolutions 912 (1994) of 21 April 1994 and 918 (1994) of 17 May 1994, which set out the mandate of the United Nations Assistance Mission for Rwanda,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 31 May 1994,

Bearing in mind the statement made by the President of the Security Council on 3 May 1994,

Reaffirming its resolution 868 (1993) of 29 September 1993 on the security of United Nations operations,

Noting with concern that, to date, the parties have not ceased hostilities, agreed to a ceasefire, or brought an end to the violence and carnage affecting civilians,

Noting with the gravest concern the reports indicating that acts of genocide have occurred in Rwanda, and recalling in this context that genocide constitutes a crime punishable under international law,

Reiterating its strong condemnation of the ongoing violence in Rwanda and, in particular, the systematic killing of thousands of civilians,

Expressing its outrage that the perpetrators of these killings have been able to operate and continue operating within Rwanda with impunity,

Noting that the Mission is not to have the role of a buffer force between the two parties,

Noting also that the expanded military component of the Mission will continue only as long as and to the extent that it is needed to contribute to the security and protection of displaced persons, refugees and civilians at risk in Rwanda and to provide security, as required, to humanitarian relief operations,

Underscoring the fact that the internal displacement of some 1.5 million Rwandese facing starvation and disease and the massive exodus of refugees to neighbouring countries constitute a humanitarian crisis of enormous proportions,

Reiterating the importance of the Arusha Peace Agreement as the basis for the peaceful resolution of the conflict in Rwanda,

Commending the countries which have provided humanitarian assistance to Rwandese refugees, as well as emergency aid to alleviate the sufferings of the Rwandese people, and those countries which have contributed troops and logistical support to the Mission, and reiterating the urgent need for coordinated international action in this respect,

Welcoming the cooperation between the United Nations and the Organization of African Unity and the contributions of the countries of the region, especially that of the facilitator of the Arusha peace process, and encouraging them to continue their efforts,

Welcoming the visit to Rwanda and to the region by the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights,

Noting the appointment of a Special Rapporteur for Rwanda, pursuant to Commission on Human Rights resolution S-3/1 of 25 May 1994,

Reaffirming its commitment to the unity and territorial integrity of Rwanda,

1. Welcomes the report of the Secretary-General of 31 May 1994;

2. Endorses the proposals of the Secretary-General contained in that report for the deployment of the expanded United Nations Assistance Mission for Rwanda, in particular:

(a) The immediate initiation of the deployment of the two additional battalions in phase 2 in close synchronization with phase 1;

(b) The continuation of urgent preparations for the deployment of the two battalions envisaged for phase 3;

(c) Flexible implementation of all three phases to ensure effective use of available resources to accomplish the tasks listed in paragraphs 4 (a) and (b) below;

3. Decides to extend the mandate of the Mission, expiring on 29 July 1994, until 9 December 1994;

4. Reaffirms that the Mission, in addition to continuing to act as an intermediary between the parties in an attempt to secure their agreement to a ceasefire, will:

(a) Contribute to the security and protection of displaced persons, refugees and civilians at risk in Rwanda, including through the establishment and maintenance, where feasible, of secure humanitarian areas;

(b) Provide security and support for the distribution of relief supplies and humanitarian relief operations;

5. Recognizes that the Mission may be required to take action in self-defence against persons or groups who threaten protected sites and populations, United Nations and other humanitarian personnel or the means of delivery and distribution of humanitarian relief;

6. Demands that all parties to the conflict cease hostilities, agree to a ceasefire and immediately take steps to bring an end to systematic killings in areas under their control;

7. Welcomes the assurances of both parties to cooperate with the Mission in carrying out its mandate, recognizes that such cooperation will be essential to the effective implementation of the mandate, and demands that both parties adhere to those assurances;

8. Demands further that all parties cease forthwith any incitement, especially through the mass media, to violence or ethnic hatred;

9. Urges Member States to respond promptly to the Secretary-General's request for resources, including logistical support capability for rapid deployment of additional Mission forces;

10. Requests the Secretary-General to ensure that the Mission extends the close cooperation it has with the Department of Humanitarian Affairs of the Secretariat and the United Nations Rwanda Emergency Office also to the Special Rapporteur for Rwanda appointed by the Commission on Human Rights;

11. Demands that all parties in Rwanda strictly respect the persons and premises of the United Nations and other organizations serving in Rwanda and refrain from any acts of intimidation or violence against personnel engaged in humanitarian and peacekeeping work;

12. Emphasizes the necessity that, inter alia:

(a) All appropriate steps be taken to ensure the security and safety of the operation and personnel engaged in the operation;

(b) The security and safety arrangements undertaken extend to all persons engaged in the operation;

13. Commends the efforts of States, United Nations agencies, international organizations and non-governmental organizations which have provided humanitarian and other assistance, encourages them to continue and increase such assistance, and urges others to provide such assistance;

14. Welcomes the intention of the Secretary-General to establish a special trust fund for Rwanda and invites the international community to contribute generously to it;

15. Commends the tireless efforts of the Force Commander of the Mission to prevent more innocent lives from being lost and to bring about a ceasefire between the parties;

16. Commends also the efforts of the Secretary-General and his Special Representative to achieve a political settlement in Rwanda within the framework of the Arusha Peace Agreement, invites them, in coordination with the Organization of African Unity and countries in the region, to continue their efforts, and demands that the parties undertake serious efforts to bring about political reconciliation;

17. Decides to keep the situation in Rwanda and the role played by the Mission under constant review, and to that end requests the Secretary-General to report to the Council as appropriate, and in any case no later than 9 August and 9 October 1994, on progress made by the Mission in the discharge of its mandate, the safety of populations at risk, the humanitarian situation and progress towards a ceasefire and political reconciliation;

18. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

After the vote, the representative of New Zealand, referring to resolution 918 (1994), said that at the time of its adoption, his delegation had been very disappointed that the resolution had approved only a tentative first phase of the expanded United Nations presence in Rwanda. New Zealand believed that the tentativeness displayed by the Council had sent a very confused signal, both to potential troop-contributing countries and others, about the Council's commitment to the idea of an expanded UNAMIR. Turning to resolution 925 (1994), he welcomed the fact that it ended the doubt about the determination of the Council to do what was necessary for Rwanda. Resolution 925 (1994) gave effect to the Council's wish that UNAMIR should deploy as soon as possible to provide security for Rwandans at risk and for essential humanitarian operations. Furthermore, it was very important that the resolution also stated clearly the Council's grave concern at the genocide that had taken place in Rwanda. There was no doubt that genocide had occurred, and it was significant that at last the Council had formally recognized that. New Zealand also welcomed the recognition given in the resolution to the importance of close cooperation between UNAMIR and the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights and the newly appointed United Nations Special Rapporteur for Rwanda. Reconstruction of Rwandan society on the basis of respect for human rights would be an important task for the future, and the United Nations must be equipped to support the people of Rwanda in that effort.⁹³

⁹³ Ibid., p. 10.

The representative of France stressed that, while the priority objective was a humanitarian one, only a political solution could restore lasting peace and stability to Rwanda. The United Nations must play its part in implementing the peace process, which must fall within the framework of the Arusha Peace Agreement. He further stated that it was intolerable that massacres in Rwanda and what could only be described as genocide should continue. Those responsible must be brought to justice and human rights must be respected.⁹⁴

The representative of China recalled that the Charter contained explicit provisions on the mandates of the Security Council, the General Assembly and other United Nations organs. Those bodies should earnestly carry out the respective mandates entrusted to them by the Charter. The Council should therefore refrain from involvement in activities that went beyond its mandate. It was China's consistent position that the Council should work in line with the purposes and principles of the Charter and with the relevant mandates. China was not in favour of wilfully linking the work of the Council with that of other organs. Therefore, it wished to express its reservations on the resolution's elements relating to the human rights Rapporteur.⁹⁵

The representative of the United States stated that it had been necessary to define the mandate of UNAMIR as precisely as possible, keeping in mind the factors enumerated in the Council's presidential statement of 3 May 1994, and staying within the limits of available resources. He noted that, although the parties had begun ceasefire negotiations, in the meantime, there was no ceasefire in effect and no comprehensive agreement among the parties or with the United Nations. In those circumstances, the activities described in the Secretary-General's report might be considered to involve enforcement actions. It was important that troop contributors be made fully aware of the military mission and the anticipated environment. Furthermore, UNAMIR's military units must be provided with the equipment and rules of engagement to execute successfully the assigned mission to defend themselves and to provide basic protection for threatened persons and security for the delivery of humanitarian relief. The Council, to that end, had included in the resolution a reaffirmation that UNAMIR might be required to take action in self-defence. He also stated that the Council had a responsibility, when sending troops into unpredictable situations, to ensure that those troops would not be wilfully mistreated. To that effect, his delegation firmly supported paragraph 12 of resolution 925 (1994). Taking that idea even further, it believed it was unacceptable for any UNAMIR or other United Nations personnel to be detained, under any circumstances, while performing their duties in Rwanda, or to be denied any of the protections equivalent to those contained in the Geneva Convention Relative to the Treatment of Prisoners of War.⁹⁶

The representative of Rwanda, while commending the adoption of resolution 925 (1994), stated that it was regrettable that since the outbreak of the tragic events on 6 April 1994, the reaction of the international community had not matched the magnitude of the tragedy in Rwanda. He noted that, after almost a month, the first phase of the deployment of UNAMIR had not even begun. Therefore, Rwanda welcomed the Secretary-General's proposals contained in the report for the expanded UNAMIR. It also agreed with the Secretary-General that the first task was to organize humanitarian relief operations. Rwanda associated itself with the message conveyed by the Council when it demanded the cessation of hostilities, the conclusion of a ceasefire and the immediate halt of the massacres, which it strongly condemned. He further stated that any solution to the crisis in Rwanda must be based on a political settlement, for which the Arusha Peace Agreement constituted the framework. It was up to the international community to implement resolution 925 (1994).⁹⁷

Decision of 20 June 1994 (3391st meeting):
resolution 928 (1994)

On 16 June 1994, pursuant to resolution 891 (1993), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council his second progress report on UNOMUR.⁹⁸ The Secretary-General reported that, in general, UNOMUR's activities in pursuance of its mandate had been effective. It had continued to be a factor of stability and had been particularly critical in recent months, as UNAMIR had sought to defuse tensions resulting from the resumption of hostilities in Rwanda. While there appeared to be little rationale for monitoring one of Rwanda's borders and not the others, the issue of arms flows was one of the major areas of concern in the ceasefire talks. As UNOMUR's activities allowed UNAMIR to address, at least to some degree, the issue of outside interference in the Rwandese civil war, the Secretary-General believed that UNOMUR should continue its monitoring activities until an effective ceasefire had been established. He therefore recommended that UNOMUR's mandate be renewed for a period of three months. During that period, the number of military observers would be reduced by phases, adjusting to operational requirements. UNOMUR would be closed down by 21 September 1994.

At its 3391st meeting, on 20 June 1994, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President drew the attention of the members of the Council to a letter dated 8 June 1994 from the representative of Rwanda addressed to the President of the Council,⁹⁹ transmitting a note verbale dated 1 June 1994 by which the Government of Rwanda reiterated its request that the numerical strength and the logistical means of UNOMUR be increased. It also reiterated its position concerning the embargo imposed against Rwanda and noted the urgent need for an embargo against the other party to the conflict, arguing that Rwanda must be able to exercise its right of self-defence under Article 51 of the Charter. The President also drew their attention to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations¹⁰⁰ and read out a revision to the draft text in its provisional form.¹⁰¹

The draft resolution, as orally revised in its provisional form, was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 928 (1994), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolutions 812 (1993) of 12 March 1993, 846 (1993) of 22 June 1993 and 891 (1993) of 20 December 1993,

Recalling its resolution 872 (1993) of 5 October 1993 by which it established the United Nations Assistance Mission for

Rwanda, as well as its resolutions 893 (1994) of 6 January 1994, 909 (1994) of 5 April 1994, 912 (1994) of 21 April 1994, 918 (1994) of 17 May 1994 and 925 (1994) of 8 June 1994,

Having examined the report of the Secretary-General of 16 June 1994 on the United Nations Observer Mission Uganda-Rwanda,

Welcoming the extension, as of 14 May 1994, of the observation and monitoring activities of the Observer Mission to the entire Uganda/Rwanda border,

Stressing the need for the observance and strict monitoring of the general and complete embargo of all deliveries of weapons and military equipment to Rwanda, as described in paragraph 13 of its resolution 918 (1994),

Considering that the issue of arms flows is one of the major areas of concern in the ceasefire talks currently being held between the Rwandan parties under the auspices of the Assistance Mission,

1. Welcomes the report of the Secretary-General;
2. Decides to extend the mandate of the United Nations Observer Mission Uganda-Rwanda for a final period of three months until 21 September 1994, and agrees that during this period the number of military observers should be reduced by phases;
3. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the Council on the termination of the Observer Mission before the completion of its mandate;

Decision of 22 June 1994 (3392nd meeting):
resolution 929 (1994)

By a letter dated 19 June 1994 addressed to the President of the Council,¹⁰² the Secretary-General stated that because of the failure of Member States to promptly provide the resources necessary for the implementation of its expanded mandate, UNAMIR might not be in a position, for about three months, to fully undertake the tasks entrusted to it. Meanwhile, the situation in Rwanda had continued to deteriorate and the killing of innocent civilians had not been stopped. Furthermore, the parties had not yet come to an agreement for a ceasefire in the talks under UNAMIR auspices, nor had they respected the ceasefire to which they had agreed at a recent OAU summit in Tunis. In those circumstances, the Secretary-General suggested that the Council might wish to consider the offer of the Government of France to undertake, subject to the Council's authorization, a French-commanded multinational operation under Chapter VII of the Charter, to assure the security and protection of displaced persons and civilians at risk in Rwanda. Should the Council authorize such an operation, it would be necessary to request the Governments concerned to commit themselves to maintaining their troops in Rwanda until UNAMIR was brought up to the necessary strength to take over from the multinational force and the latter had created conditions in which a peacekeeping force operating under Chapter VI of the Charter would have the capacity to carry out its mandate. That would imply that the multinational force should remain deployed for a minimum period of three months. The activities of the multinational force and UNAMIR would be closely coordinated by the respective Force Commanders.

By a letter dated 21 June 1994 addressed to the President of the Council,¹⁰³ the representative of France requested that a formal meeting of the Council be convened immediately following the informal consultations scheduled for 22 June 1994, in order to put to the vote a draft resolution on the situation in Rwanda.

At its 3392nd meeting, on 22 June 1994 in response to the request from the representative of France, the Council included the above-mentioned letters in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Oman) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution submitted by the representative of France.¹⁰⁴ He also drew their attention to a letter dated 20 June 1994 from the representative of France addressed to the Secretary-General.¹⁰⁵

Speaking before the vote, the representative of the Russian Federation stated that his country supported the draft resolution before the Council, which welcomed the proposal of a number of Member States to send contingents to Rwanda. In the view of the Russian Federation, the Council had been forced to take that decision, which was imperative in the prevailing conditions. The Russian Federation believed it was important that the draft resolution clearly stated that that action had the purely humanitarian goal of contributing to the security and protection of the civilian population. It had a clearly formulated mandate and would be conducted within a limited time period, required for the deployment of the expanded UNAMIR. It was also important that, as the draft resolution emphasized, the operation be carried out impartially and neutrally, in close coordination with the activity of UNAMIR. His delegation expected the Secretary-General to regularly inform the Council on the implementation of the operation and on the development of the situation in Rwanda. At the same time, to ensure the success of the operation, it believed it was of paramount importance to obtain the agreement of both Rwandese parties.¹⁰⁶

The representative of Brazil stated that his Government, aside from problems of a political nature related to the implementation of the proposed operation, had serious doubts regarding its likely impact on UNAMIR, considering the political environment. As a principle, Brazil had repeatedly maintained that the Council should do its utmost to avoid invoking the extraordinary powers conferred upon it by Chapter VII of the Charter. In that connection, he noted that the Council had avoided placing the humanitarian mandate given to UNAMIR under that Chapter. His delegation was keenly aware of the difficulty of maintaining simultaneous but separate peacekeeping and peace-enforcement operations in the same country. It had also taken note of the fact that one of the Rwandese parties had made its opposition to the proposed operation fully known. In addition, the proposed operation might cloud the much-needed environment of support and cooperation that would enable UNAMIR to discharge its mandate in a successful manner. UNAMIR's overall mission could ultimately be jeopardized. The Council should continue to concentrate its collective efforts on making UNAMIR viable and operational without further delay. For those political reasons, Brazil was not in a position to endorse the draft resolution. His Government remained to be convinced that the proposed mission was in fact capable of effectively addressing the situation pending the arrival of the expanded forces of

UNAMIR in Rwanda, particularly when there was opposition of one of the parties.¹⁰⁷

The representative of China stated that UNAMIR had expended great effort in seeking a settlement to the crisis in Rwanda and had enjoyed the support of the international community, including African countries and the Rwandese parties to the conflict. China continued to believe that effective measures should be taken towards the early complete deployment of an expanded UNAMIR, which should play its role in accordance with resolutions 918 (1994) and 925 (1994). China had always believed in respecting the opinions of the countries concerned in a given question and those of the relevant regional organizations, and in securing the cooperation of all parties. Such cooperation was an indispensable condition for the success of United Nations peacekeeping operations. It was clear from the current situation, however, that the action which the draft resolution would authorize could not guarantee the cooperation of the parties to the conflict. The speaker also noted that, according to proposals formulated by OAU at its recent summit meeting "any action or effort undertaken by any countries, independently or collectively, should be placed within the framework of UNAMIR" and that "all international efforts and resources should be employed to support the United Nations mandate in Rwanda". Hence, and on the basis of the experience and lessons of the United Nations peacekeeping operation in Somalia, his delegation would abstain in the vote on the draft resolution.¹⁰⁸

The representative of Rwanda stated that the initiative under consideration was especially timely and helpful, as more than two months of efforts to gather the resources needed to deploy an expanded UNAMIR had yet to come to fruition. He noted that the Secretary-General had made it clear that UNAMIR might not be in a position for three months to fully undertake the tasks entrusted to it. The action envisaged in the draft resolution was of particular significance in the circumstances, for it would end the inertia of the international community in the face of the human tragedy in Rwanda. At the same time, the Government of Rwanda agreed that the efforts of the international community to restore peace and stability to Rwanda and end the tragic situation there must focus urgently on achieving an effective ceasefire and on the crucial quest for a political settlement on the basis of the Arusha Peace Agreement. The international community should therefore do all it could to avoid any approach that would involve a military solution, which would only perpetuate the suffering endured by the Rwandese people. He concluded by appealing to Member States to give their full support to the proposed humanitarian operation and to participate in a speedy settlement of the bloody conflict in Rwanda.¹⁰⁹

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted by 10 votes in favour to none against, with 5 abstentions (Brazil, China, New Zealand, Nigeria, Pakistan), as resolution 929 (1994), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming all its previous resolutions on the situation in Rwanda, in particular its resolutions 912 (1994) of 21 April 1994, 918 (1994) of 17 May 1994 and 925 (1994) of 8 June 1994, which set out the mandate and force level of the United Nations Assistance Mission for Rwanda,

Determined to contribute to the resumption of the process of political settlement under the Arusha Peace Agreement, and encouraging the Secretary-General and his Special Representative for Rwanda to continue and redouble their efforts at the national, regional and international levels to promote these objectives,

Stressing the importance of the cooperation of all parties for the fulfilment of the objectives of the United Nations in Rwanda,

Having considered the letter from the Secretary-General dated 19 June 1994,

Taking into account the time needed to gather the necessary resources for the effective deployment of the Mission, as expanded in resolutions 918 (1994) and 925 (1994),

Noting the offer by Member States to cooperate with the Secretary-General towards the fulfilment of the objectives of the United Nations in Rwanda, and stressing the strictly humanitarian character of this operation, which shall be conducted in an impartial and neutral fashion and shall not constitute an interposition force between the parties,

Welcoming the cooperation between the United Nations, the Organization of African Unity and neighbouring States to bring peace to Rwanda,

Deeply concerned by the continuation of systematic and widespread killings of the civilian population in Rwanda,

Recognizing that the current situation in Rwanda constitutes a unique case which demands an urgent response by the international community,

Determining that the magnitude of the humanitarian crisis in Rwanda constitutes a threat to peace and security in the region,

1. Welcomes the letter dated 19 June 1994 from the Secretary-General, and agrees that a multinational operation may be set up for humanitarian purposes in Rwanda until the United Nations Assistance Mission for Rwanda is brought up to the necessary strength;

2. Welcomes also the offer by Member States to cooperate with the Secretary-General in order to achieve the objectives of the United Nations in Rwanda through the establishment of a temporary operation under national command and control aimed at contributing, in an impartial way, to the security and protection of displaced persons, refugees and civilians at risk in Rwanda, on the understanding that the costs of implementing the offer will be borne by the Member States concerned;

3. Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations, authorizes the Member States cooperating with the Secretary-General to conduct the operation referred to in paragraph 2 above using all necessary means to achieve the humanitarian objectives set out in paragraphs 4 (a) and (b) of resolution 925 (1994);

4. Decides that the mission of Member States cooperating with the Secretary-General will be limited to a period of two months following the adoption of the present resolution, unless the Secretary-General determines at an earlier date that the expanded United Nations Assistance Mission for Rwanda is able to carry out its mandate;

5. Commends the offers already made by Member States of troops for the expanded Mission;

6. Calls upon all Member States to respond urgently to the Secretary-General's request for resources, including logistical support, in order to enable the expanded Mission to fulfil its mandate effectively as soon as possible, and requests the Secretary-General to identify and coordinate the supply of the essential equipment required by troops committed to the expanded Mission;

7. Welcomes, in this respect, the offers already made by Member States of equipment for troop contributors to the Mission, and calls on other Member States to offer such support, including the possibility of comprehensive provision of equipment to specific troop contributors, to speed the deployment of the Mission's expanded force;

8. Requests Member States cooperating with the Secretary-General to coordinate closely with the Mission and also requests the Secretary-General to set up appropriate mechanisms to this end;

¹⁰⁹ Ibid., pp. 4-5.

9. Demands that all parties to the conflict and others concerned immediately bring to an end all killings of civilian populations in areas under their control and allow Member States cooperating with the Secretary-General to implement fully the mission authorized in paragraph 3 above;

10. Requests the States concerned and the Secretary-General, as appropriate, to report to the Council on a regular basis, the first such report to be made no later than fifteen days after the adoption of the present resolution, on the implementation of this operation and the progress made towards the fulfilment of the objectives referred to in paragraphs 2 and 3 above;

11. Requests the Secretary-General to report on the progress made towards completing the deployment of the expanded Mission within the framework of the report due no later than 9 August 1994 under paragraph 17 of resolution 925 (1994), as well as on progress towards the resumption of the process of political settlement under the Arusha Peace Agreement;

12. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

After the vote, the representative of France stated that his country had deemed it its duty to propose to the Secretary-General intervention in Rwanda, in the framework of a multinational operation, to protect defenceless civilians and save numerous endangered lives. In so doing, France was merely responding to the urgent appeals which the Secretary-General had been making for two months to all Member States. He stressed that the goal of the French initiative was exclusively humanitarian. It would not be the mission of the French soldiers in Rwanda to interpose themselves between the warring parties, still less to influence in any way the military and political situation. France's objective was simple: to rescue endangered civilians and put an end to the massacres, and to do so in an impartial manner. France earnestly hoped that other countries would associate themselves with that initiative and would respond to the Council's appeal. His delegation recalled that it had regarded UNAMIR's immediate deployment under resolutions 918 and 925 (1994) as being of the utmost importance and stressed that it was not the objective of the French initiative to replace UNAMIR. On the contrary, the action of France and the countries which joined it had only one purpose: to fill a gap which was having disastrous consequences. It would end as soon as the UNAMIR troops had obtained their long-awaited reinforcements, at the latest within two months. He concluded by emphasizing the dedication of France to finding a negotiated political solution on the basis of the Arusha Agreements, adding that the African countries and OAU had an essential role to play in that respect.¹¹⁰

The representative of the United States emphasized her country's strong support for the French initiative. The grave humanitarian crisis in Rwanda demanded a swift response from the international community. She pointed out that the scope of the resolution had been narrowed to address any scepticism regarding the role of the cooperating force and that the mandate of the force was limited to addressing humanitarian needs. In the light of that situation, the United States encouraged the force upon its arrival, and through its actions, to demonstrate its impartiality and even-handedness in dealing with the parties in Rwanda. That would clarify for all that the force had a humanitarian mandate designed to protect innocent civilians and not to intervene in the conflict between the parties. Similarly, the United States called upon the parties in Rwanda to recognize the humanitarian role of the cooperating force and to assist the force in facilitating the provision of humanitarian assistance. She observed that the French decision to send troops to Rwanda reflected the continued need to strengthen the peacekeeping capabilities of the United Nations, as well as the need for cooperative action by Member States that were willing and able to supplement United Nations peace operations in particular situations. Recent examples of such action included the allied coalitions that responded to Iraq's invasion of Kuwait and to the humanitarian crisis in Somalia, the efforts of the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS) in Liberia and the North Atlantic Treaty Organization action to enforce Security Council resolutions in Bosnia. The point was that to respond effectively to the variety of conflicts in the world required enough flexibility to accept imperfect solutions when no perfect solutions were available. Judgements must continually be made, on a case-by-case basis, of what was appropriate, what was consistent with principle and what would work.¹¹¹

The representative of New Zealand explained that his delegation's abstention on the draft resolution was not due to any difference on the objectives or the motives. New Zealand differed only as to the means. Recalling that his delegation had circulated a draft resolution calling for an expanded United Nations

¹¹⁰ Ibid., pp. 5-6.

¹¹¹ Ibid., pp. 6-7.

operation under Chapter VII of the Charter, he stressed that it shared one hundred per cent the humanitarian intentions which underlay the French initiative. However, his delegation was not convinced that that operation would be able to protect civilians from massacres. There was, to the contrary, a very grave risk that the operation would become bogged down and would undermine the United Nations attempt to put in the field the kind of operation that would work. In his delegation's view, the Council must learn from the experience in Somalia, which had shown that trying to run two separate operations in parallel with different command arrangements did not work and, in the long run, those who were to be saved could be those who suffered. Another reservation about the French initiative was that there was already clear evidence that it was having a negative impact on UNAMIR, since some countries that had offered to support UNAMIR were now hesitating. The speaker concluded by observing that the delays faced by UNAMIR would disappear overnight if France's energy, enthusiasm and resources were instead put at the disposal of the United Nations.¹¹²

The representative of Spain stated that resolution 929 (1994) spelled out the French initiative in clear and precise terms by authorizing a temporary operation — under national command and control, and acting under Chapter VII of the Charter — aimed at making an impartial contribution to the security of displaced persons, refugees and the civilian population at risk. In so doing, it attempted to achieve the humanitarian objectives set forth in resolution 925 (1994). His delegation considered it vital for such an operation to have the cooperation of the parties. Resolution 929 (1994) specified the limited objectives of the mission, its interim nature and its status as a strictly humanitarian operation that would be carried out in an impartial and neutral manner. It further specified that the operation would not constitute an interposition force between the parties and much less would it be aimed against any one of them. It was also essential to attain and to maintain close and constant cooperation with UNAMIR.¹¹³

The representative of the United Kingdom regarded the French initiative as a courageous step in response to the urgent need for protection of those groups at risk in Rwanda. But he noted that it was only an interim measure which should not be allowed to hamper in any way UNAMIR's own deployment. His Government called on both parties in Rwanda to accept and to respect the multinational force for what it was — a humanitarian intervention sanctioned by the international community as an interim measure to protect those whose lives were at risk. At the same time, it would be vital that those forces deploying to Rwanda acted and were seen to act with clearly demonstrable impartiality and in no sense became involved in the fighting between the military forces of the parties. He cautioned that the safety of United Nations soldiers and the longer-term UNAMIR mission could well be crucially affected by the way the multinational operation was carried out.¹¹⁴

The representative of the Czech Republic noted that it was in the context of Member States' failure to promptly provide the resources necessary for the implementation of UNAMIR's expanded mandate that the Government of France had offered to undertake, with the consent of the Council and in conjunction with some other Member States, a multinational operation in Rwanda. It was to be an operation strictly humanitarian in character, which should be conducted in an impartial and neutral manner. His delegation took note of the misgivings voiced both within and outside the Council about the proposed operation, and would itself have preferred that consent be secured from the two warring parties in Rwanda prior to the deployment of the multinational force. His delegation was also concerned at the fact that the mandate of the multinational force was limited to a two-month period, whereas it would take almost three months for the expanded UNAMIR to be effectively deployed. He therefore strongly supported the Secretary-General's view that the Governments participating in the multinational force should commit themselves to maintaining their troops in Rwanda until UNAMIR was strong enough to take over.¹¹⁵

The representative of Nigeria saluted the French initiative, particularly after it became clear that the impression was being conveyed that the crisis in Rwanda was an African crisis which required an exclusive African solution. However, his delegation was unable to go along with the French initiative.

Nigeria believed that the most valuable and appropriate framework for pursuing the peace process in Rwanda was UNAMIR. The situation in Rwanda constituted a threat to international peace and security. Under such circumstances, the United Nations, through the Security Council, retained a primary responsibility. Therefore, any effort — be it unilateral, bilateral or multilateral — was best subsumed within it. His delegation also believed that a parallel command structure in Rwanda of UNAMIR on the one hand and of the French-led intervention force on the other was most unlikely to produce a climate conducive to peace in Rwanda. Equally important was that the French initiative had far-reaching political and geo-strategic implications for the entire continent as it tried to grapple with problems of crisis management, conflict resolution and development.¹¹⁶

Decision of 1 July 1994 (3400th meeting):
resolution 935 (1994)

At its 3400th meeting, on 1 July 1994, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General dated 31 May 1994¹¹⁷ in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Pakistan) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution submitted by the representatives of Argentina, the Czech Republic, France, New Zealand, the Russian Federation, Spain, the United Kingdom and the United States.¹¹⁸

Speaking before the vote, the representative of Spain noted that the report of the Secretary-General stressed the genocidal nature of the killings that took place in Rwanda and that, according to the Special Rapporteur of the Commission on Human Rights, there could be no doubt that genocide was being committed in Rwanda. Faced with that situation, the international community could not remain passive, particularly given the specific terms of the 1948 Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide, a crime which was termed a crime against humanity. One objective of the draft resolution before the Council was the establishment of an impartial Commission of Experts to examine and analyse all the available information on the serious violations of international humanitarian law committed in Rwanda since the beginning of the conflict. As the Secretary-General had pointed out in his report, only a proper investigation could establish the facts in order to determine responsibility. Spain had promoted that initiative because it felt that the Council should react to the grave violations of international humanitarian law, including acts of genocide being perpetrated with impunity, by determining the facts and bringing those responsible for such crimes against humanity to justice. At the same time, it was extremely important that efforts continue and be intensified to promote a ceasefire and political dialogue, as well as to speed up the deployment of the expanded UNAMIR. In that regard, the establishment of a Commission of Experts would contribute to clarifying the facts with respect to the killings in Rwanda and to the carrying out of justice and would also make it possible to facilitate a political settlement by focusing responsibility on specific persons rather than on ethnic, social or political groups.¹¹⁹

The representative of the United States stated that, as the Council recognized by passing the draft resolution before it, the international community demanded that those who had committed atrocities in Rwanda since 6 April 1994 be held accountable. It was clear that there were acts of genocide in Rwanda, and they ought to be pursued. He noted that the draft resolution continued the process begun by the appointment by the Commission on Human Rights of a Special Rapporteur for Rwanda. Thus, it was acknowledged that implementation of human rights standards must be an integral part of every United Nations action taken on Rwanda. The Commission of Experts must build upon the work of the Special Rapporteur and work with him to carry out its mandate without duplicating his efforts. The role of the High Commissioner for Human Rights as coordinator of human rights activity throughout the United Nations system was, of course, vital in that regard. The Council's goal must be individual accountability and responsibility for grave violations of international humanitarian law in Rwanda. By fixing responsibility on those who had directed those acts of violence, the Council could transform revenge into justice, affirm the rule of law and bring the cycle of violence to a close. He added that the Council must be ready to respond as quickly as possible to the Commission's report. It was imperative that it avoid any unnecessary delay in bringing to justice those responsible for serious breaches of international humanitarian law.¹²⁰

The representative of France stated that systematic violations of human rights and genocide had been committed in Rwanda. The draft resolution would establish a Commission of Experts to investigate such violations, which should make it possible to identify those responsible for these crimes so that the Council could then decide, on the basis of the Secretary-General's recommendations, under which jurisdiction they could be dealt with. His delegation considered it indispensable that the work of the High Commissioner for Human Rights, of the Special Rapporteur, and of the Commission of Experts be carried out in close cooperation. He noted further that the priority in Rwanda was to put an end to the human rights violations and to the massacres. It was for that sole objective that France had intervened within the framework of "Operation Turquoise", with a United Nations mandate, in order to ensure continuity while awaiting the deployment of the expanded UNAMIR. He concluded by emphasizing the special responsibility of the media that incited ethnic hatred and violence and urged those in charge of the radio stations concerned, and primarily Radio Mille Collines, to put an end to such criminal propaganda.¹²¹

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 935 (1994), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming all its previous resolutions on the situation in Rwanda,

Reaffirming, in particular, its resolutions 918 (1994) of 17 May 1994 and 925 (1994) of 8 June 1994, by which it expanded the United Nations Assistance Mission for Rwanda, and stressing in this connection the need for early deployment of the expanded Mission to enable it to carry out its mandate,

Recalling its presidential statement of 30 April 1994 in which it, inter alia, condemned all breaches of international humanitarian law in Rwanda, particularly those perpetrated against the civilian population, and recalled that persons who instigate or participate in such acts are individually responsible,

Recalling also the requests it addressed to the Secretary-General in its presidential statement of 30 April 1994 and in resolution 918 (1994), concerning the investigation of serious violations of international humanitarian law committed in Rwanda during the conflict,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 31 May 1994, in which he noted that massacres and killings had continued in a systematic manner throughout Rwanda and also noted that only a proper investigation could establish the facts in order to enable the determination of responsibility,

Welcoming the visit to Rwanda and to the region by the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights, and noting the appointment of a Special Rapporteur for Rwanda, pursuant to Commission on Human Rights resolution S-3/1 of 25 May 1994,

Expressing once again its grave concern at the continuing reports indicating that systematic, widespread and flagrant violations of international humanitarian law, including acts of genocide, have been committed in Rwanda,

Recalling that all persons who commit or authorize the commission of serious violations of international humanitarian law are individually responsible for those violations and should be brought to justice,

1. Requests the Secretary-General to establish, as a matter of urgency, an impartial Commission of Experts to examine and analyse information submitted pursuant to the present resolution, together with such further information as the Commission may obtain through its own investigations or the efforts of other persons or bodies, including the information made available by the Special Rapporteur for Rwanda, with a view to providing the Secretary-General with its conclusions on the evidence of grave violations of international humanitarian law committed in the territory of Rwanda, including the evidence of possible acts of genocide;

2. Calls upon States and, as appropriate, international humanitarian organizations to collate substantiated information in their possession or submitted to them relating to grave violations of international humanitarian law, including breaches of the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide, committed in Rwanda during the conflict, and requests States, relevant United Nations bodies and relevant organizations to make this information available within thirty days of the adoption of the present resolution and as appropriate thereafter and to provide appropriate assistance to the Commission of Experts referred to in paragraph 1 above;

3. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the Council on the establishment of the Commission of Experts, and further requests the Secretary-General, within four months from the establishment of the Commission, to report to the Council on the conclusions of the Commission and to take account of those conclusions in any recommendations for further appropriate steps;

4. Also requests the Secretary-General and, as appropriate, the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights, through the Secretary-General, to make the information submitted to the Special Rapporteur for Rwanda available to the ¹²⁰ Ibid., pp. 3-4.

¹²¹ Ibid., p. 5.

Commission of Experts and to facilitate adequate coordination and cooperation between the work of the Commission and the Special Rapporteur in the performance of their respective tasks;

5. Urges all concerned fully to cooperate with the Commission of Experts in the accomplishment of its mandate, including responding positively to requests from the Commission for assistance and access in pursuing investigations;

6. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

After the vote, the representative of New Zealand emphasized that the central purpose of resolution 935 (1994) was to provide a means for establishing the facts of the genocide. Once those facts had been established, then appropriate steps could be taken to determine how persons responsible for such acts, particularly the persons responsible for their planning and organization, could be brought to justice. He noted that genocide and other grave breaches of humanitarian law were international crimes subject to universal jurisdiction. The Council had recently taken steps to ensure that persons suspected of committing war crimes in the former Yugoslavia could be brought to justice. It could be no less concerned about the commission of such offences in Rwanda. The immediate need was therefore to ensure that information on the killings was collected and organized so that there would at least be a basis upon which subsequent prosecutions, whether undertaken internationally or through the Rwandan legal system, could proceed. The aim of the resolution was not retribution but justice. He noted further that it was not intended that the Commission of Experts should duplicate or cut across the work being carried out by the High Commissioner for Human Rights or the Special Rapporteur appointed by the Commission on Human Rights. His delegation saw the tasks to be pursued by the High Commissioner and the Special Rapporteur on the one hand, and the Commission of Experts on the other, as being quite distinct. The mechanism provided for in resolution 935 (1994) was a small step, but it was important. It demonstrated that the international community accepted its responsibility to uphold the laws proscribing genocide and that it had the will to help the Rwandese people come to terms with what had happened in their country.¹²²

The representative of China stated that although his delegation had voted in favour of resolution 935

(1994), he wanted to place on record the following two points: first, his delegation had always maintained that the various organs of the United Nations should perform their functions in accordance with the mandates given them by the Charter. It was concerned with the increasing involvement of the Council in matters that were by nature within the purview of other organs. In its view, the Council should act as directed by the Charter and focus its efforts on its already heavy and important task of maintaining international peace and security as mandated by the Charter. Based on that position, his delegation had reservations on those elements in the resolution concerning the High Commissioner for Human Rights and the Special Rapporteur. Secondly, his delegation held that the establishment of the Commission of Experts as authorized by the resolution was an exceptional action adopted in line with the special situation in Rwanda and, therefore, should not be considered as a precedent.¹²³

Decision of 6 July 1994: letter from the President to the General Assembly

By a letter dated 2 July 1994 addressed to the President of the Council,¹²⁴ the Secretary-General transmitted a letter dated 1 July 1994 from the representative of France on the deterioration of the situation in Rwanda and the danger of a further humanitarian tragedy.¹²⁵ He informed the Secretary-General that fighting outside the capital, which had spread to the south and the west, had resulted in an influx of tens of thousands of fleeing inhabitants. The continued fighting in south west Rwanda was creating a situation that, in humanitarian terms, would quickly become completely uncontrollable. The entire country risked being the scene of major outbreaks of violence. France warned that if a ceasefire was not brought about immediately, it would be obliged to either withdraw from Rwandan territory while endeavouring to save human lives, or to organize a safe humanitarian zone. France believed that, on the basis of resolutions 925 (1994) and 929 (1994), it was authorized to organize such a safe humanitarian zone. Nevertheless, it was its wish that, through the Secretary-General, the United Nations should indicate its support for the establishment of such a zone.

In a letter dated 6 July 1994,¹²⁶ the President of the Council informed the Secretary-General of the following:

I have the honour to inform you that your letter dated 2 July 1994 transmitting a communication from the Government of France has been brought to the attention of the members of the Security Council.

Deliberations of 11 July 1994 (3402nd meeting)

At its 3402nd meeting, on 11 July 1994, the Security Council resumed its consideration of the item.

The representative of France stated that the recent period in the history of the United Nations had demonstrated the limits of the Organization's ability to act, which resulted from the fact that it could not take the place of States or parties to a conflict that themselves lacked the necessary political resolve. Yet, no one could deny the role the United Nations had played in restoring peace in Cambodia and El Salvador or in saving human lives in Somalia and Bosnia. No one could fail to recognize the progress the United Nations had made in helping to resolve humanitarian crises in which a restrictive interpretation of the principles of the Charter and, above all, political obstacles did not permit it to intervene. France had made a major contribution that made it possible — with due respect for the essential principle of the sovereignty of States — to respond to humanitarian crises that represented a clear threat to peace. It was in the spirit of France's commitment, along with the United Nations, to seeing the principles of the Charter increasingly affirmed in international life that the French Government decided to react to the tragedy in Rwanda and appealed to the Council to authorize an emergency humanitarian intervention in that country, an intervention which was the only way of ending the massacres and the exodus of people on a scale never before seen on the continent of Africa. Reporting on the progress made by the French operation, he stated that the operation's humanitarian goal had been largely attained. The massacres had almost completely stopped in places where French forces were present, and a large volume of humanitarian aid had been delivered. However, the needs exceeded the capacity of France and the few countries working with it in the operation. In his view, the action of the entire international community should be pursued in three directions. First, at the humanitarian level, in view of the flow of refugees into the humanitarian safe area set up in south-west Rwanda and the desperate situation of the country as a whole, only firm action by States, United Nations humanitarian agencies and non-governmental organizations could prevent hunger and sickness from following upon the massacres. Secondly, reinforcements for UNAMIR should be deployed as soon as possible. The French and Senegalese forces in Rwanda could not of themselves take the place of an operation established by the Council. That was not their mission, nor was it the intention of the Government of France, which indicated at the very start of Operation Turquoise that it intended to withdraw its troops at the end of July. Only the presence of a sizeable United Nations force on Rwandan territory would make it possible to begin the country's recovery by promoting a return to stability and the expansion of humanitarian action. France therefore urgently appealed to the international community to do everything possible to enable the strengthened UNAMIR to be deployed quickly. Finally, it was up to the United Nations, OAU and the States of the Great Lakes region to use their influence to bring about a stable political solution that would allow Rwanda to find reconciliation and, in the spirit of the Arusha Agreement, the necessary social and political consensus. In that regard, the United Nations bodies with competence in the field of human rights should follow through on the procedures that had been started. He concluded by stating that the fate of Rwanda depended on the international community's ability to ensure that the United Nations peacekeeping mission be successfully carried out. It was thus imperative that France's effort should be assumed by the international community as a whole.¹²⁷

The representative of Argentina stated that the irreproachable humanitarian operation led by France in Rwanda was being carried out in accordance with the norms of neutrality and impartiality established by the Council in resolution 929 (1994) for a strictly humanitarian purpose. The tragic situation in Rwanda demanded that the international community strive to deploy the expanded UNAMIR without further delay in order to allow the Mission to fully carry out its mandate, with the consent of both the international community and the parties to the conflict. In his delegation's opinion, there was an evident need to strengthen the mechanisms of the United Nations system of collective security so that in the future the considerable operational difficulties that had delayed the deployment of UNAMIR could be avoided.¹²⁸

Decision of 14 July 1994 (3405th meeting):
statement by the President

By a letter dated 14 July 1994 addressed to the President of the Council,¹²⁹ the representative of France requested an urgent meeting of the Council in view of the rapid deterioration of the situation in Rwanda resulting in a massive exodus of the civilian population, which, he said, might lead to a further humanitarian disaster and threaten peace and security in the region.

At its 3405th meeting, on 14 July 1994, in response to the request from the representative of France, the Council resumed its consideration of the item. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President stated that, following consultations among members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:¹³⁰

The Security Council is alarmed by the continuation of fighting in Rwanda, which is causing a massive exodus of the population. This situation may lead very quickly to a further humanitarian disaster and endanger the stability of the region, since the flow of these refugees is seriously affecting the neighbouring countries.

In the light of this grave situation, the Council:

Demands an immediate and unconditional ceasefire and invites the parties to report to the Force Commander of the United Nations Assistance Mission for Rwanda on their actions in this respect;

Urges the resumption of the political process in the framework of the Arusha Peace Agreement and calls upon the countries of the region, the Secretary-General, his Special Representative and the Organization of African Unity to contribute actively to it;

Reaffirms the humanitarian nature of the secure area in the south-west of Rwanda and demands that all concerned fully respect this. It will keep the matter under close review;

Urges Member States, United Nations agencies and non-governmental organizations to mobilize all available resources in order urgently to provide humanitarian assistance to the civilian population in distress;

Calls upon Member States to provide the necessary contributions in order to ensure the deployment of the expanded Mission in the immediate future.

The Council is determined to follow very closely the development of the situation in Rwanda and remains actively seized of the matter.

Decision of 10 August 1994 (3414th meeting):
statement by the President

On 3 August 1994, pursuant to resolutions 925 (1994) and 929 (1994), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the situation in Rwanda.¹³¹ The Secretary-General reported that since the adoption of those resolutions, the situation in Rwanda had been transformed. RPF had established military control over most of the country. On 18 July 1994, it had unilaterally declared a ceasefire, effectively ending the civil war, and, on 19 July 1994, a broad-based Government of National Unity was formed. Although the flight of people seemed to have slowed, the humanitarian situation remained volatile and extremely fluid. Of particular concern was the possibility of another massive outflow from the humanitarian protected zone in south-western Rwanda when the French forces withdrew by 31 July 1994. The international community was therefore confronted with four basic humanitarian challenges: to respond to immediate life-saving needs of refugees; to facilitate the early return of those who had fled their homes; to restore basic infrastructure in Rwanda; and to ensure a smooth transition in the humanitarian protected zone established by French forces. With the situation on the ground in Rwanda having changed radically over the past few weeks, UNAMIR had adjusted its operational plans to ensure stability and security in the north-western and south-western regions of Rwanda; stabilize and monitor the situation in all regions of Rwanda in order to encourage the return of refugees and the displaced population; provide security and support for humanitarian assistance operations inside Rwanda as humanitarian organizations arranged the return of refugees; and promote, through mediation and good offices, national reconciliation in Rwanda.

The Secretary-General noted that, given the agony of Rwanda, it was all the more tragic that the international community had hesitated for so long to intervene. It must now ensure that those responsible for such crimes were brought to justice. Moreover, the international community must do everything in its power to alleviate the appalling human suffering in the refugee camps in Zaire, as well as in the United Republic of Tanzania, Uganda and Burundi, and to enable refugees and displaced persons to return to their homes or other safe areas in reasonable security. In that connection, the Secretary-General was grateful to those Governments that had decided to deploy troops to Rwanda and/or Zaire in order to support the humanitarian effort. At the same time, he was becoming concerned by the problems of coordination that would arise if several foreign forces under national command were working alongside UNAMIR, which was under United Nations command and the forces loyal to the new Government. Ideally, all foreign forces engaged in support of the humanitarian effort should be part of UNAMIR. If that were not possible, he would urge that the deployment of the foreign forces should be authorized by the Council, even if their mandate was purely humanitarian, and that formal liaison arrangements be established between them and UNAMIR.

The Secretary-General concluded by stating that the ultimate political aim must be the installation of a broad based system of government that would give all elements of society, irrespective of ethnic origin or social level, a sense of security and a stake in the country. The Arusha Agreement still provided principles and a broad framework for establishing such a system. OAU and the United Republic of Tanzania, which were instrumental in the negotiation of the Arusha Agreement, would have a special role to play. Rwanda's four neighbours also had a special responsibility to promote stability in Rwanda and to ensure that their territories were not used for further destabilization.

At its 3414th meeting, on 10 August 1994, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Russian Federation) drew the attention of the members of the Council to several documents.¹³²

He then stated that, following consultations among members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement¹³³ on behalf of the Council:

The Security Council remains extremely concerned at the situation, as described in the report of the Secretary-General of 3 August 1994 and oral briefings by the Secretariat, in Rwanda and in the countries of the region where millions of displaced persons and refugees are concentrated in extremely precarious conditions from the standpoint of both food and sanitation.

Bearing in mind the extreme seriousness of this situation, the Council considers that at present the most immediate task is to respond to the massive humanitarian crisis created by the population movements. To this end, the Council expresses its appreciation to all Member States, United Nations agencies, non-governmental organizations and individuals who responded to this humanitarian challenge and encourages them to continue and intensify their efforts, in particular in Rwandan territory, with a view to alleviating to the best of their ability the situation of all those who have fled from their homes and villages.

The Council believes, furthermore, that the rapid return of the refugees and displaced persons to their homes is essential for the normalization of the situation in Rwanda. In this regard, the Council strongly condemns attempts to intimidate refugees carried out by those who are seeking to prevent them from returning to Rwanda. It urges the former leadership of Rwanda and those who have assumed political responsibility in the refugee camps to cooperate with representatives of the current Government in reconciliation and repatriation efforts and cease forthwith attempts and propaganda campaigns directed at destabilizing the situation in Rwanda and inducing refugees to stay in exile.

The Council, moreover, welcomes the declared readiness of the new Government of Rwanda to encourage the return of the refugees and displaced persons, ensure their protection and their legal rights and allow aid to reach those who require it anywhere in the country. It considers that the new Government of Rwanda is responsible for the rapid implementation of these commitments, which are essential for speeding up the return of refugees to Rwanda.

The Council also calls upon the Government of Rwanda to ensure that there are no reprisals against those who wish to return to their homes and resume their occupations. To this end, the Council encourages the Government of Rwanda to cooperate with the United Nations, in particular with the Commission of Experts established pursuant to Council resolution 935 (1994) of of Tunisia (S/1994/945) and 4 August 1994 from the Deputy Representative of Germany (S/1994/950), all addressed to the President of the Security Council; and letters dated 4 and 8 August 1994 from the Chargé d'affaires a.i. of France to the Secretary-General and the President of the Council (S/1994/933 and S/1994/944).

¹³³ S/PRST/1994/42.

1 July 1994, in ensuring that those guilty of the atrocities committed in Rwanda, in particular the crime of genocide, are brought to justice through an appropriate mechanism or mechanisms which will ensure fair and impartial trials in accordance with international standards of justice. In this connection, the Council welcomes the recent statement by the new Government of Rwanda supporting the establishment of an international tribunal and welcomes the report of the Secretary-General of 26 July 1994 on the establishment of the Commission of Experts and the letter from the Secretary-General dated 29 July 1994 concerning the appointment of its members, and urges the Commission to submit its conclusions as soon as possible.

The Council welcomes the Secretary-General's intention to adapt the practical tasks of the United Nations Assistance Mission for Rwanda to the evolving situation within the framework of Council resolution 925 (1994) of 8 June 1994. The Council underlines the fact that the full deployment of the Mission will be important to establish a more secure environment in order to accelerate the process of return of refugees and displaced persons and to prevent further population movements, in particular from the secure humanitarian area, which might exacerbate the situation in neighbouring countries. For this reason, it is essential that the contingents that are to be part of the Mission are deployed without further delay and that the technical assistance they require for this purpose is provided to them as soon as possible.

The Council also notes the importance of the deployment in Rwandan territory of civilian observers responsible for monitoring the establishment of a more secure environment, and in this regard welcomes the measures envisaged by the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights, within his mandate, with the assistance of certain Member States.

The Council reaffirms, as the Secretary-General emphasizes in his report of 3 August 1994, that the Arusha Peace Agreement constitutes an appropriate frame of reference for promoting national reconciliation in Rwanda. The Council reminds the Government of Rwanda of its responsibility for bringing its people together again in national reconciliation. In this context, the Council commends the countries neighbouring Rwanda and the Organization of African Unity for their commitment and assistance towards the solution of the conflict in Rwanda, and encourages them to continue to promote stability in the country and the entire region. The Council believes that, for their part, the neighbouring countries are also responsible for ensuring that their territories are not used for further destabilization of the situation.

Decision of 14 October 1994 (3436th meeting):
statement by the President

On 6 October 1994, pursuant to resolution 925 (1994), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a progress report on UNAMIR.¹³⁴ The Secretary-General reported that since the ceasefire was declared on 18 July 1994, the fighting in Rwanda had all but ceased. The Broad-based Government of National Unity had established control over the whole of the national territory. There was steady progress in efforts to normalize the situation inside Rwanda and the Government seemed to recognize the need to include all its citizenry, regardless of ethnicity, within its administrative and security structures. While over 2 million Rwandese refugees remained in the neighbouring countries, the Government had undertaken efforts, in coordination with the United Nations, to encourage their safe and voluntary return to Rwanda. The Secretary-General had instructed his Special Representative to undertake a mission to Zaire and the United Republic of Tanzania to address the problem of the presence of former political leaders, military elements and militia in the Rwandese refugee camps, especially those in Zaire, which had had a destabilizing effect on security in the camps. His Special Representative had concluded that the most effective way of ensuring the safety of the refugees and their freedom to return to Rwanda would be the separation of political leaders, former Rwandese Government Forces soldiers and militias from the rest of the refugee population. In order to address more fully the problems associated with that and to evaluate the financial, logistic and security requirements, a joint Zairian/United Nations working group was established.

The Secretary-General further endorsed the recommendation made by the Commission of Experts in its preliminary report that trials of individuals suspected of serious breaches of international humanitarian law, crimes against humanity and acts of genocide be carried out by an international criminal tribunal. He noted that the Commission considered it preferable that the jurisdiction of the International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia be expanded to cover international crimes committed in Rwanda from 6 April 1994 rather than to create a separate ad hoc international criminal tribunal. It was for the Council to decide on the course of action to be adopted.

The Secretary-General also urged the Government of Rwanda to maintain an open dialogue with all political interest groups, including former government officials, except for individuals who were found, through due process, to have been directly implicated in acts of genocide. He concluded by observing that the evolving developments in and around Rwanda strengthened the case for a broader approach to the question of national reconciliation and the other aspects of the crisis. Recalling that the mission which the Council had dispatched to Burundi on 13 and 14 August 1994 had recommended, inter alia, that an international conference be convened to look into the problems of the subregion, he stated that he would continue to consult with all relevant parties with a view to determining how the United Nations could assist in the preparation and convening of such a conference.

At its 3436th meeting, on 14 October 1994, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (United Kingdom) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a letter dated 28 September 1994 addressed to the President of the Council from the representative of Rwanda.¹³⁵ He then stated that, following consultations among members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:¹³⁶

The Security Council has considered the progress report of the Secretary-General on the United Nations Assistance Mission for Rwanda. The Council stresses the importance it attaches to the role of the Mission, whose neutral and independent presence is crucial to creating conditions of security. It welcomes the Secretary-General's revised deployment schedule for the Mission which is intended to promote security in all sectors of the country and create conditions conducive to the return of refugees. It also welcomes the assistance being provided by the Mission to the efforts of the Government of Rwanda to establish a new integrated police force. It encourages the Mission to continue that assistance and asks the Secretary-General to provide it with detailed information on this programme.

The Council remains extremely concerned at the plight of the millions of refugees and displaced persons in Rwanda and the countries of the region. It reiterates its view that their return to their homes is essential for the normalization of the situation in Rwanda and for the stabilization of the region. It deplores the continuing acts of intimidation and violence within the refugee camps which are designed to prevent the refugee population there from returning home. It welcomes the commitment of the Governments of Zaire, the United Republic of Tanzania and Burundi to help resolve the problems facing the refugees, and calls upon them to do all in their power to ensure the safety of both the refugees and the international personnel providing humanitarian assistance to the refugees.

¹³⁶ S/PRST/1994/59.

The Council notes the view expressed in the report that the most effective way of ensuring the safety of the refugees and their freedom to return to Rwanda would be the separation of political leaders, former Rwandese Government Forces soldiers and militias from the rest of the refugee population, and looks forward to receiving a further report from the Secretary-General on this issue, as soon as possible, based, inter alia, on the findings of the United Nations team participating in the joint Zairian/United Nations working group. It stresses once again the responsibilities which fall upon the neighbouring countries, including that of ensuring that their territories are not used to destabilize the situation.

The return of refugees is also crucially dependent upon the situation within Rwanda itself, including the existence of a climate of confidence and the establishment of a more secure environment. The Council notes the important role human rights monitors and their speedy deployment will have in this context and notes also the importance of cooperation between them and the Mission. The Council stresses the importance it attaches to the Mission having an effective broadcasting service to provide objective information. It hopes that the Government of Rwanda will assist in enabling the proposed United Nations radio station to come into operation as soon as possible.

The Council welcomes the efforts being made by the Government of Rwanda to facilitate the return of refugees and to begin the difficult process of national reconciliation and reconstruction in the country. It notes with concern reports that some reprisals may have occurred and affirms the importance it attaches to the avoidance of reprisals against returnees and to the safeguarding of their property rights. It welcomes the speed with which the United Nations and the Government of Rwanda responded to allegations that some Rwandese Patriotic Army soldiers might have been responsible for systematic killings. It underlines the importance it attaches to the thorough and expeditious investigation of these allegations.

The Council welcomes the assurance given to Council members by President Bizimungu of his Government's commitment to achieving national reconciliation and promoting respect for the fundamental rights of individuals. The Council stresses the importance it attaches to the Government of Rwanda implementing this commitment. In this context, it endorses the Secretary-General's call to the Government of Rwanda to maintain an open dialogue with all political interest groups in Rwanda in an effort to achieve genuine reconciliation between all elements of Rwandan society, within the frame of reference of the Arusha Peace Agreement. In particular, the Council encourages the Government of Rwanda to continue its efforts to invite members of the Mouvement républicain national pour le développement who were not involved in the massacres to participate in the Government and to absorb members of the former Rwandese Government Forces into the new army.

The Council reaffirms its view that those responsible for serious breaches of international humanitarian law and acts of genocide must be brought to justice. It stresses that persons involved in such acts cannot achieve immunity from prosecution by fleeing the country and notes that the provisions of the Convention relating to the Status of Refugees do not apply to such persons. In this context, the Council is currently considering the recommendations of the Commission of Experts in respect of the establishment of an international tribunal and will act expeditiously in the matter.

The Council commends the assistance given by the international community, the United Nations agencies and non-governmental organizations in response to the crisis in Rwanda. It calls on them to maintain their support during the difficult transition period and to begin to redirect their support from relief to rehabilitation and reconstruction. It endorses the Secretary-General's views as to the importance of immediate and coordinated assistance, in particular to the restoration of civil administration and the reconstruction of the social and economic infrastructure of the country.

The Council agrees with the Secretary-General that developments in Rwanda strengthen the case for a broader approach to the question of national reconciliation and other key aspects of the crisis. It encourages him to continue his consultations on how the United Nations can assist in the preparation and convening of an international conference to look into the problems of the subregion.

The Council will remain seized of the matter.

Decision of 8 November 1994 (3453rd meeting):
resolution 955 (1994)

By a letter dated 1 October 1994,¹³⁷ the Secretary-General submitted to the President of the Council the interim report of the Commission of Experts.¹³⁸ The Secretary-General drew his attention to the preliminary conclusions reached by the Commission, namely, that in the period from 6 April to 15 July 1994 individuals from both sides to the armed conflict had perpetrated serious breaches of international humanitarian law; individuals from both sides to the armed conflict had perpetrated crimes against humanity in Rwanda; and acts of genocide against the Tutsi group were perpetrated by Hutu elements in a concerted, planned, systematic and methodical way. The Commission had not uncovered any evidence to indicate that Tutsi elements perpetrated acts committed with the intent to destroy the Hutu ethnic group as such. It recommended that the Council ensure that the individuals responsible for the foregoing grave violations of human rights in Rwanda during the armed conflict were brought to justice before an independent and impartial international criminal tribunal. It had further recommended that the Council amend the statute of the International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia so that it could consider crimes committed in Rwanda.

At its 3453rd meeting, on 8 November 1994, the Council considered the item entitled "The situation concerning Rwanda: Establishment of an international tribunal for the prosecution of persons responsible for serious violations of international humanitarian law committed in the territory of Rwanda and Rwandan citizens responsible for such violations committed in the territory of neighbouring States". Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (United States) drew the attention of the members of the Council to several documents¹³⁹ as well as to a draft resolution submitted by Argentina, France, New Zealand, the Russian Federation, Spain, the United Kingdom and the United States.¹⁴⁰

Speaking before the vote, the representative of the Russian Federation stated that those responsible for the crimes committed in Rwanda must receive the punishment they deserved. That was the major, but not the sole, task of the international tribunal which was to be created. The Russian Federation also believed that by its activity the tribunal must promote the process of national reconciliation, the return of refugees, and the restoration and maintenance of peace in Rwanda. Support for the draft resolution would give yet another clear and unequivocal signal that the international community would not tolerate serious violations of norms of international humanitarian law and disregard for the rights of the individual. He further noted that the history of the establishment of international tribunals, first in the former Yugoslavia and then in

Rwanda, reinforced his country's conviction that a permanent international criminal court must be established in the near future.¹⁴¹

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted by 13 votes in favour, 1 against (Rwanda) and 1 abstention (China), as resolution 955 (1994), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming all its previous resolutions on the situation in Rwanda,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General submitted pursuant to paragraph 3 of resolution 935 (1994) of 1 July 1994, and his letter dated 29 July 1994, and having taken note of the reports of the Special Rapporteur for Rwanda of the Commission on Human Rights,

Expressing its appreciation for the work of the Commission of Experts established pursuant to resolution 935 (1994), in particular its preliminary report on violations of international humanitarian law in Rwanda transmitted by the letter from the Secretary-General dated 1 October 1994,

Expressing once again its grave concern at the reports indicating that genocide and other systematic, widespread and flagrant violations of international humanitarian law have been committed in Rwanda,

Determining that this situation continues to constitute a threat to international peace and security,

Determined to put an end to such crimes and to take effective measures to bring to justice the persons who are responsible for them,

Convinced that in the particular circumstances of Rwanda, the prosecution of persons responsible for serious violations of international humanitarian law would enable this aim to be achieved and would contribute to the process of national reconciliation and to the restoration and maintenance of peace,

Believing that the establishment of an international tribunal for the prosecution of persons responsible for genocide and the other above mentioned violations of international humanitarian law will contribute to ensuring that such violations are halted and effectively redressed,

Stressing the need for international cooperation to strengthen the courts and judicial system of Rwanda, having regard in particular to the necessity for those courts to deal with large numbers of suspects,

Considering that the Commission of Experts established pursuant to resolution 935 (1994) should continue on an urgent basis the collection of information relating to evidence of grave violations of international humanitarian law committed in the territory of Rwanda and should submit its final report to the Secretary-General by 30 November 1994,

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

1. Decides hereby, having received the request of the Government of Rwanda, to establish an international tribunal for the sole purpose of prosecuting persons responsible for genocide and other serious violations of international humanitarian law committed in the territory of Rwanda and Rwandan citizens responsible for genocide and other such violations committed in the territory of neighbouring States, between 1 January 1994 and 31 December 1994, and to this end to adopt the statute of the International Tribunal for Rwanda annexed hereto;¹⁴²

2. Decides that all States shall cooperate fully with the International Tribunal for Rwanda and its organs in accordance with the present resolution and the statute of the Tribunal and that consequently all States shall take any measures necessary under their domestic law to implement the provisions of the present resolution and the statute, including the obligation of States to comply with requests for assistance or orders issued by a Trial Chamber under article 28 of the statute, and requests States to keep the Secretary-General informed of such measures;

3. Considers that the Government of Rwanda should be notified prior to the taking of decisions under articles 26 and 27 of the statute;

4. Urges States and intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations to contribute funds, equipment and services to the International Tribunal for Rwanda, including the offer of expert personnel;

5. Requests the Secretary-General to implement the present resolution urgently and in particular to make practical arrangements for the effective functioning of the International Tribunal for Rwanda, including recommendations to the Council as to possible locations for the seat of the Tribunal at the earliest time, and to report periodically to the Council;

6. Decides that the seat of the International Tribunal for Rwanda shall be determined by the Council, having regard to considerations of justice and fairness as well as administrative efficiency, including access to witnesses, and economy and subject to the conclusion of appropriate arrangements between the United Nations and the State of the seat, acceptable to the Council, having regard to the fact that the Tribunal may meet away from its seat when it considers it necessary for the efficient exercise of its functions, and decides that an office will be established and proceedings will be conducted in Rwanda, where feasible and appropriate, subject to the conclusion of similar appropriate arrangements;

¹⁴² For the text of the statute, see Resolutions and Decisions of the Security Council, 1994 (S/INF/50), resolution 955 (1994), annex.

¹⁴¹ S/PV.3453, pp. 2-3.

7. Decides to consider increasing the number of judges and Trial Chambers of the International Tribunal for Rwanda if it becomes necessary;

8. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

After the vote, the representative of France stated that individuals, regardless of the community to which they belonged, must be brought to trial and judged if they had violated the most fundamental rules of war, if they had committed crimes against humanity and, above all, if they had committed acts of genocide. Such acts unquestionably fell within the jurisdiction of an international court which could forcefully and impartially see that justice was served on behalf of all mankind. Because of their particular seriousness, the offences which fell within the competence of the Tribunal were a threat to peace and international security which justified recourse to Chapter VII of the Charter. Such a solution which was binding on all States had the additional merit of eliminating the possibility of any prosecution that was undertaken against suspects being in any way tinged by suspicion of vengeance or subjectivity. Thus the Tribunal should in its own way contribute to restoring civil peace to the territory of Rwanda. He noted that not all perpetrators of serious offences could be tried by the International Tribunal, which would have to determine itself which cases it could appropriately deal with, while the other suspects would remain subject to the national jurisdiction of Rwanda or of other States. He noted also that the Tribunal would be competent to deal with offences committed between 1 January and 31 December 1994. If major infractions, together with violations of humanitarian law, were repeated after the end of 1994, the Council would be entitled to extend the Tribunal's competence beyond the time period envisaged. In conclusion, he hoped that the judgement of such cases in the future would fall within the competence of a permanent international criminal court established by treaty. In France's view, it was only because such a court did not exist that the Council had had to make use of its powers to establish a first and then a second ad hoc international tribunal. Such an initiative on the part of the organ entrusted with the maintenance of peace was legitimate and indispensable.¹⁴³

The representative of New Zealand stressed that resolution 955 (1994) was a decision which the Council was taking on behalf of all the Members of the United Nations. Article VII of the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide envisaged action under the Charter to suppress genocide, and article VI of the Convention envisaged the establishment of international tribunals to try persons charged with genocide. The Council was therefore acting within the framework of international law when it used its authority under the Charter to respond, as it had done, to the recommendation of the Commission of Experts. The Council had acted quickly, but it had also acted responsibly. It was regrettable, however, that the resolution was not adopted by consensus. The speaker recalled that the Government of Rwanda had requested the Tribunal, and was therefore disappointed that it had not supported the resolution. His delegation understood that that was principally because of the desire of the Government of Rwanda that those convicted of genocide should be executed. In that regard, he noted that for over three decades, the United Nations had been trying progressively to eliminate the death penalty and that it would therefore be entirely unacceptable to introduce it in there. It would also go against the spirit of the Arusha Agreement, which the Government of Rwanda had pledged to honour and which had committed all parties in Rwanda to accept international human rights standards. New Zealand could not support any proposals that would change the international character of the Tribunal or introduce any suggestion that the Tribunal could be subordinated to Rwandan political intervention. The speaker further noted that the Council did not simply produce an add-on to the Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia, for it recognized that there were important differences between the two situations. Moreover, the focus of the jurisdiction of the Tribunal was not on war crimes, but on genocide, as Rwanda had requested. He also noted that the Tribunal would be specific to Rwanda and that its temporal jurisdiction had been expanded backwards, to January 1994, so as to include acts of planning for the genocide that occurred in April of that year. He believed that the Council had tried genuinely to accommodate Rwanda's reasonable concerns and hoped that Rwanda would in turn offer its cooperation to the Tribunal. In that connection, he observed that the guarantee of a fair and impartial trial would go some way to encouraging the millions of Rwandese refugees

in neighbouring countries to return to their homeland.¹⁴⁴

The representative of the United Kingdom noted that the Commission of Experts had strongly recommended the creation of an international criminal tribunal for Rwanda rather than a domestic tribunal because in its view an international tribunal would best meet the objectives of independence, objectivity and impartiality. The Commission had also pointed out that the gravity of the human rights violations committed in Rwanda extended far beyond that country — they concerned the international community as a whole — and, furthermore, that there was a need to ensure justice not only in respect of atrocities already perpetrated, but also as a matter of deterrence for the future. His Government shared those views. The speaker stressed that it was essential to maintain in the statute and in the resolution the international character of the Tribunal, which meant that some changes sought could not be agreed without sacrificing that character. But he was sure that the Council could expect from the Government of Rwanda the degree of cooperation that was demanded of all Member States in relation to resolutions adopted under Chapter VII. Resolution 955 (1994) made clear that all Member States would have obligations in relation to the Rwanda Tribunal.¹⁴⁵

According to the representative of Argentina, the establishment of the ad hoc Tribunal by the Council responded to the specific circumstances being confronted by Rwanda and was the result of a specific request made by the Government of Rwanda for rapid and effective action to contribute to reconciliation and reconstruction and to the maintenance of peace in Rwanda. The Tribunal having been set up as an ad hoc organ, it was clear that it was not authorized to establish rules of international law or to legislate as regards such law but, rather, it was to apply existing international law. He pointed out that for a standing international tribunal to be established as legitimate and effective, it should be the result of a treaty agreed among sovereign States. His delegation was satisfied to see that the guidelines contained in the statute of the Tribunal could adequately ensure due legitimacy and transparency for the decisions of the Tribunal, as well as the human rights and fundamental freedoms of those accused.¹⁴⁶

The representative of Brazil stated that his country was neither convinced that the competence to establish and/or to exercise an international criminal jurisdiction was among the constitutional powers of the Council nor that the option of resorting to a resolution of the Council was the most appropriate method for such a purpose. He noted that the authority of the Council was not self-constituted, but rather originated from the delegation of powers conferred upon it by the whole membership of the Organization under Article 24 (1) of the Charter. For that reason, the Council's powers and responsibilities under the Charter should be strictly construed, and could not be created, recreated or reinterpreted by decisions of the Council itself. Moreover, the Council's responsibilities lay not in the judicial or institution-building field, but in the maintenance of international peace and security. Therefore, in Brazil's view, the invocation of Chapter VII of the Charter for the purpose of establishing an international tribunal went beyond the competence of the Council as clearly defined in the Charter. Moreover, since genocide was one of the most serious crimes to be tried by the Tribunal, the principle set out in article VI of the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide, according to which the jurisdiction of an international penal tribunal must be accepted by the party concerned, should have been observed. Brazil would have preferred that an initiative of that nature had received a much deeper and more thorough examination, with the appropriate participation of the broad membership of the United Nations. Brazil's preferred method for the creation of an international criminal tribunal remained the conclusion of a convention by the international community clearly setting up the tribunal's jurisdiction and terms of reference. As in the case of the establishment of the Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia, Brazil's vote on the establishment of the International Tribunal for Rwanda should not be construed as an overall endorsement of the procedural or substantive elements involved. In Brazil's view, neither of those instances established any legal precedent for the future. Yet, given that the overriding purpose of the International Tribunal was to bring to justice those responsible for the massacres, Brazil voted in favour of its establishment while qualifying its support with the serious foregoing reservations, both procedural and substantive. Exceptional ad hoc initiatives by the Council might not be the best way to promote the consistent, balanced and effective application of international humanitarian law or to create an environment conducive to the enhancement of the rule of law in international public order.¹⁴⁷

According to the representative of China, the establishment of an international tribunal for the prosecution of those who were responsible for crimes that gravely violated international humanitarian law was a special measure taken by the international community to handle special problems. It was only a supplement to domestic criminal jurisdiction and the exercise of universal jurisdiction over certain international crimes. China was not in favour of invoking at will Chapter VII of the Charter to establish an international tribunal through the adoption of a resolution. However, it was for the purpose of upholding justice and bringing to justice as soon as possible those responsible for crimes that seriously violated international humanitarian law — and especially on the basis of the urgent desire of the Government of Rwanda, the unique circumstances then prevailing in that country and the strong demand of the African countries and the international community — that China was originally prepared to give positive consideration to the draft resolution and the draft statute. Noting that the Government of Rwanda had expressed its desire for further consultations with respect to the establishment of the Tribunal, his view was that that request should have been taken into consideration. Without full cooperation and support from the Government, it would be difficult for the Tribunal to perform its duties in an effective manner. It was therefore an incautious act to vote in a hurry on that draft resolution that the Government of Rwanda still found difficult to accept.¹⁴⁸

The representative of Spain noted that it was not only the Rwandese people but the entire international community that was affected by the events in Rwanda. That was why, for the second time in its history, the Council, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, had established a jurisdictional organ with a specific competence but also with broad powers to hand down judgments. While there had been unanimity in the Council on the need for the establishment of an International Tribunal for Rwanda, there had also been some differences of opinion among Council members with regard to the Tribunal's Statute. Just as in the case of the Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia, Spain believed that the independence of the International Tribunal for Rwanda was its most important attribute: independence vis à vis Governments, vis à vis national tribunals and even vis à vis the United Nations itself. Furthermore, although the new Tribunal would share with the Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia certain aspects, it would have legal independence. It was a separate Tribunal with its own Statute, its own sphere of jurisdiction and its own rules of operation. The financial implications of the work of the new Tribunal would be less, however, than those of an entirely new body, as it could benefit from a large part of the resources of the Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia. He also pointed out that the Tribunal's effectiveness would depend in the final analysis on the support, cooperation and encouragement of the international community. The speaker further noted that the decision to adopt resolution 955 (1994) was within the authority conferred by the Charter upon the Council to act in cases of threats to peace. Nonetheless, the establishment of the Tribunal — as in the case of the former Yugoslavia — should in no way cut off the international community's access to the path towards the establishment of a universal criminal jurisdiction. Case-by-case solutions might be adequate for reasons of urgency, but a general institution would provide a better solution to specific problems.¹⁴⁹

The representative of Nigeria, while regretting that Rwanda was unable to support resolution 955 (1994), noted that the new Government of Rwanda had declared its readiness to cooperate and work with the International Tribunal. His delegation understood that the International Tribunal for Rwanda was designed not to replace, but to complement, the sovereignty of Rwanda. The international and impartial character of the Tribunal would enhance the prospects of national reconciliation in Rwanda. At the same time, he noted that the establishment of an international tribunal was without prejudice to the setting up by the Government of Rwanda of a national tribunal that it might wish to ¹⁴⁷ Ibid., pp. 8-10.

¹⁴⁹ Ibid., pp. 11-13.

establish to address issues concurrently on the basis of national perspectives and interest.¹⁵⁰

The representative of Rwanda stated that there were a number of reasons why the Government of Rwanda had requested the establishment of an international tribunal. First, the Rwandese Government wanted to involve the international community and to enhance the exemplary nature of a justice that would be seen to be completely neutral and fair. Secondly, it appealed for an international presence in order to avoid any suspicion of its wanting to organize speedy, vengeful justice. Thirdly, it wanted to make it easier to get at those criminals who had found refuge in foreign countries. Fourthly, the genocide committed in Rwanda was a crime against humankind and should be suppressed by the international community as a whole. His Government, however, was still not satisfied with resolution 955 (1994) or with the statute of the International Tribunal for Rwanda as it stood. It regarded the dates set for the ratione temporis competence of the Tribunal from 1 January to 31 December 1994 as inadequate, having proposed the period from 1 October 1990, the beginning of the war, to 17 July 1994, the end of the war. An international tribunal which refused to consider the causes of the genocide in Rwanda and its planning, and the pilot projects that preceded the major genocide of April 1994, could not be of any use to Rwanda, because it would not contribute to eradicating the culture of impunity or creating a climate conducive to national reconciliation. The composition and structure of the Tribunal were also inappropriate and ineffective. There was an intention to disperse the Tribunal resources and energy by prosecuting crimes that came under the jurisdiction of internal tribunals. The draft resolution and statute did not indicate the order of priority for crimes considered by the Tribunal. There was also a concern that certain countries which took a very active part in the civil war in Rwanda might propose candidates for judges to the Tribunal and participate in their election. His Government could not accept that the draft statute of the Tribunal proposed that those condemned be imprisoned outside Rwanda and that those countries be given the authority to reach decisions about the detainees. That was for the International Tribunal or at least for the Rwandese people to decide. Furthermore, the Tribunal established a disparity in sentences since it ruled out capital punishment, although it was provided for in the Rwandese penal code, thereby generating a situation which was not conducive to national reconciliation in Rwanda. Finally, his Government had called for the establishment of an international tribunal to, inter alia, teach the Rwandese people a lesson, to fight against the impunity to which it had become accustomed and to promote national reconciliation. It therefore seemed clear that the seat of the International Tribunal should be set in Rwanda; it would have to deal with Rwandese suspects, responsible for crimes committed in Rwanda against the Rwandese. Establishing the seat of the Tribunal on Rwandese soil would promote the harmonization of international and national jurisprudence. For those reasons, his Government had decided to vote against the draft resolution.¹⁵¹

The President, speaking in her capacity as representative of the United States, expressed regret at the decision of Rwanda to vote against the resolution and urged its Government to honour its obligation to cooperate fully with the International Tribunal. Her Government fully supported the establishment of a Tribunal office in Kigali and agreed that a great deal of the Tribunal's work should necessarily proceed in Rwanda. It also looked forward to further consultations on the official seat of the Tribunal. The speaker stressed that one major challenge was the finding of adequate funding for the Tribunal and urged all Member States to make voluntary contributions. She concluded by saying that the international community had a responsibility to see that the Tribunal could accomplish its objective, one that the Council increasingly recognized: to hold individuals accountable for their violations of international humanitarian law.¹⁵²

meeting): statement by the President

On 18 November 1994, pursuant to the presidential statement of 14 October 1994, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on security in the Rwandese refugee camps.¹⁵³ The report focused on the issue of security in the camps in Zaire. The Secretary-General reported that an estimated 1.2 million people who had fled Rwanda in mid-July to the Kivu region of Zaire, were living in overcrowded, chaotic and increasingly insecure camps. The camps were controlled by former Rwandese political leaders, government forces and militia who were determined to ensure by force, if necessary, that the refugees did not repatriate to Rwanda. It was believed that they might be stockpiling and selling food distributed by relief agencies in preparation for an armed invasion of Rwanda. Security was further undermined by general lawlessness and criminal activity. That situation had led to the withdrawal of non-governmental relief organizations. Another reason for the slow pace in the repatriation of refugees was their fear of reprisals by the Government for atrocities committed during the genocide.

¹⁵¹ Ibid., p. 13-16.

The Secretary-General identified three options to improve security in the camps: (a) a United Nations peacekeeping operation,¹⁵⁴ which option he favoured; (b) a United Nations force, set up under Chapter VII of the Charter; and (c) a multinational force, authorized by the Council under Chapter VII of the Charter but not under United Nations command. He observed that the first step towards promoting the repatriation of refugees must be a determined effort by the international community to improve security in the Rwandese refugee camps, especially those in Zaire. Any operation to achieve that would be futile without parallel efforts towards national reconciliation in Rwanda. It would also be a difficult, complex, and to some extent, unprecedented enterprise.

The Secretary-General further stated that a two-pronged approach must be adopted of addressing security issues in the camps and, at the same time, helping the Rwandese Government to create conditions in Rwanda under which large-scale repatriation and reintegration of refugees and internally displaced people could take place. The Government also needed immediate and major financial and technical assistance from the international community, in the establishment of security, the maintenance of law and order, the administration of justice, economic and social rehabilitation and national reconciliation for all Rwandese. In that regard, about 60 human rights monitors had been deployed in the country to monitor the conditions of returning refugees and internally displaced people. Furthermore, UNAMIR was planning to deploy political affairs officers specifically to assist the Government in promoting national reconciliation and re establishing civil administration and to facilitate coordination between the activities of UNAMIR and those of other United Nations agencies and programmes.

The Secretary-General indicated that it was his intention to concentrate all the efforts of the United Nations system on the immediate priorities of establishing secure conditions in the refugee camps in Zaire and of providing financial and technical assistance to the Government of Rwanda. Once progress had been made on those two fronts, he would work with OAU to address the wider problems of the subregion. The first step in that direction would be the convening of the regional conference on assistance to refugees, returnees and displaced persons in the Great Lakes region, which was decided upon by OAU at Tunis in June 1994 and endorsed by the General Assembly in its resolution 49/7. At a later stage, a broader conference should be convened jointly by the United Nations and OAU to address a range of political and other issues, including national reconciliation and land related questions, in order to identify long-term solutions which would ensure peace, security and development in the subregion.

At its 3472nd meeting, on 30 November 1994, the Security Council included the report in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President drew the attention of the members of the Council to a letter dated 15 November 1994 addressed to the Secretary-General from the representative of Zaire.¹⁵⁵ She then stated that, following consultations among members of the Council, she had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:¹⁵⁶

The Security Council has considered carefully the report of the Secretary-General of 18 November 1994 on security in the Rwandan refugee camps, particularly those located in Zaire. It is gravely concerned at the situation described in the report of the Secretary-General.

The Council condemns the actions being taken by the former Rwandan leaders and by former government forces and militias to prevent, in some cases by force, the repatriation of the refugees in the camps. It also condemns the ongoing interference by these groups and individuals in the provision of humanitarian relief, and is deeply concerned that this interference has already led to the withdrawal of some non-governmental agencies responsible for the distribution of relief supplies within the camps.

The Council is alarmed at the indications that these same groups and individuals may be preparing for an armed invasion of Rwanda. It deplores the fact that food distributed by relief agencies for those in the camps is apparently being misappropriated for this purpose. The Council condemns all such actions. It warns these persons, many of whom may have been implicated in the genocide and other serious violations of international humanitarian law unleashed on Rwanda in April 1994, that their actions will only reinforce the determination of the international community to ensure that such persons are brought to justice. The Council also stresses once again the responsibilities of neighbouring countries for ensuring that their territories are not used to destabilize the situation inside Rwanda.

The Council notes the statement in the report of the Secretary-General that the first step towards promoting the repatriation of refugees must be a determined effort by the international community to reduce intimidation of prospective returnees and to improve security in the Rwandan refugee camps, especially those in Zaire. The Council attaches equal importance to the Secretary-General's observation that any operation to achieve this would be futile without parallel efforts to promote national reconciliation and reconstruction in Rwanda. The Council stresses the imperative of reinvigorating the political process to provide a framework for any action taken to address security in the camps and the repatriation of Rwandan refugees to Rwanda. The framework should include a mechanism for sustaining a dialogue between the Government of Rwanda, refugee representatives and the United Nations.

The Council considers that the options described in the report of the Secretary-General raise complex issues which require further elucidation. The Council requests the Secretary-General to consult potential troop contributors to assess their willingness to participate in a possible peacekeeping operation modelled along the lines described in paragraphs 18 to 25 of the report of the Secretary-General, namely to create secure areas within large camp sites, providing safe conditions for the refugees in those areas. The Council requests the Secretary-General to provide a detailed description of the objectives, rules of engagement and costs of such an operation as soon as possible. The Council further requests the Secretary-General to continue to explore as appropriate all possible means of addressing the problems in the camps. The Council will be giving further urgent consideration to this question in the light of the additional information it receives from the Secretary-General.

The Council encourages the Secretary-General to assess the taking, on an interim basis, of initial measures aimed at providing immediate assistance to the Zairian security forces in protecting humanitarian operations in the camps, including the possibility of deploying security experts, from member Governments or through contract arrangements, to train and monitor the local security forces. The Council also requests the Secretary-General to consider what steps need to be taken to address the question of security in the refugee camps in the United Republic of Tanzania and Burundi. However, the Council is concerned that the use of local security forces without international involvement may not prove to be an effective approach to the security problems in the camps.

The Council recognizes that, in the wake of the events that have overtaken Rwanda, the Government needs immediate and major financial assistance, particularly in the establishment of security conditions inside the country, the maintenance of law and order, the administration of justice, economic and social rehabilitation and national reconciliation for all Rwandese.

The Council notes the deployment of sixty human rights officers in the country and the steps taken by the United Nations Assistance Mission for Rwanda to promote the re-establishment of civil administration throughout the country and looks forward to full deployment. The Council also welcomes the fact that procedures are being instituted, with the cooperation of the Government of Rwanda, to make operational the International Tribunal for Rwanda established by resolution 955 (1994) of 8 November 1994.

The Council reminds Member States that, in accordance with its resolution 925 (1994) of 8 June 1994, the Secretary-General has established a trust fund which could serve as a useful conduit for contributions to meet the immediate needs of the Government of Rwanda. It calls upon the international community to provide the resources needed for the Rwanda Emergency Normalization Plan, the forthcoming round-table meeting sponsored by the United Nations Development Programme and the consolidated inter-agency appeal.

The Council welcomes the Secretary-General's intention to work with the Organization of African Unity to address the wider problems of the subregion.

The Council notes that preparations are under way for convening at Bujumbura in the near future a regional conference on assistance to refugees, returnees and displaced persons in the Great Lakes region, sponsored by the Organization of African Unity and endorsed by the General Assembly in its resolution 49/7 of 25 October 1994. It also notes the Secretary-General's view that the United Nations and the Organization of African Unity should jointly convene at a later stage a broader conference to address a range of political and other issues, including national reconciliation, in order to identify long-term solutions to ensure peace, security and development in the subregion. Given the urgent need to take forward the political process as part of an overall strategy, including action on security in the camps and conditions inside Rwanda, the Council requests the Secretary-General to consider how preparations for this conference can be accelerated.

The Council will remain seized of the matter.

Decision of 30 November 1994 (3473rd meeting): resolution 965 (1994)

On 25 November 1994, pursuant to resolution 925 (1994), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a progress report on UNAMIR.¹⁵⁷ The Secretary-General reported that the political situation in Rwanda had witnessed both positive and negative developments. The Broad-based Government of National Unity continued to place emphasis on creating conditions that would allow the Rwandese refugees and displaced persons to safely return to their homes. It was concentrating its efforts on ensuring public security, restoring the civil administration and reconstructing the country's social and economic infrastructure. The Government had also publicly advocated the fair treatment of returning refugees, as well as reconciliation between all political groups. A further measure towards national reconciliation had been the incorporation of over 2,000 soldiers of the Rwandese government forces into the Rwandese Patriotic Army. However, while the lack of financial resources had been a major factor in impeding activities towards national reconciliation, there were some reasons to believe that the Government could do more, even within its meagre resources, to ensure that all Rwandese were part of the political process aspects. On the humanitarian front, the Secretary-General reported that in several critical areas throughout the country, both returnee programmes and recovery activities continued to be hampered by the presence of landmines. Efforts were under way to identify those areas and to intensify mine-awareness campaigns. The human rights field operations launched by the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights had established seven regional offices and 60 human rights officers had arrived in Rwanda. Their presence had had a positive effect on the communities where they were deployed. The Secretary-General said he was completing the practical arrangements for the effective functioning of the International Tribunal.

Furthermore, UNAMIR had reached its full authorized strength of 5,500 all ranks and continued to assist with refugees and populations at risk. At the request of the Government, UNAMIR had initiated a police training programme.

The Secretary-General noted that the situation in Rwanda remained critical and the country continued to face daunting problems. While he was encouraged by the Government's efforts, in cooperation with the international community, to stabilize the situation, new threats and challenges continued to emerge that might complicate further an already difficult situation and jeopardize the limited progress made thus far. In particular, the creeping militarization of the refugee camps had created a painful dilemma for the international community. The Secretary-General also underlined the importance of the efforts of the Governments in the region and of OAU, both among themselves and in cooperation with the United Nations, to find durable solutions to the problems of Rwanda.

The Secretary-General recommended that the mandate of UNAMIR be extended for a further six months, until 9 June 1995. During that period, UNAMIR would continue its functions and strengthen its good offices role in order to facilitate more expeditious movement towards peace and national reconciliation. It would also continue to support existing efforts towards a regional approach to the problems created by the crisis in Rwanda. Such a regional approach should include the convening of an international conference to identify long-term solutions that would ensure peace, security and development in the subregion.

At its 3473rd meeting, on 30 November 1994, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.¹⁵⁸

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 965 (1994), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming all its previous resolutions on the situation in Rwanda, in particular its resolution 872 (1993) of 5 October 1993 by which it established the United Nations Assistance Mission for Rwanda, and its resolutions 912 (1994) of 21 April 1994, 918 (1994) of 17 May 1994 and 925 (1994) of 8 June 1994, which set out the mandate of the Mission,

Having considered the progress report of the Secretary-General of 25 November 1994 on the Mission,

Noting the report of the Secretary-General of 18 November 1994 on security in the Rwandan refugee camps, ¹⁵⁷ S/1994/1344.

¹⁵⁸ S/1994/1360.

Recalling its resolution 955 (1994) of 8 November 1994 establishing the International Criminal Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Genocide and Other Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of Rwanda and Rwandan Citizens Responsible for Genocide and Other Such Violations Committed in the Territory of Neighbouring States, between 1 January 1994 and 31 December 1994,

Stressing the importance of achieving genuine reconciliation between all elements of Rwandan society within the frame of reference of the Arusha Peace Agreement,

Noting the deployment of human rights officers to Rwanda by the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights in order to monitor the ongoing human rights situation, to help redress existing problems and prevent possible human rights violations from occurring, to help foster a climate of confidence and the establishment of a more secure environment and thus facilitate the return of refugees and displaced persons, and to implement programmes of technical cooperation in the field of human rights, particularly in the area of administration of justice,

Noting also that the widespread dispersal of landmines is causing hardship to the civilian population and is hampering the return of refugees and displaced persons and other humanitarian relief efforts,

Welcoming the establishment by the Secretary-General of a trust fund, pursuant to resolution 925 (1994) of 8 June 1994,

1. Decides to extend the mandate of the United Nations Assistance Mission for Rwanda until 9 June 1995;

2. Reaffirms that the Mission will:

(a) Contribute to the security and protection of displaced persons, refugees and civilians at risk in Rwanda, including through the establishment and maintenance, where feasible, of secure humanitarian areas;

(b) Provide security and support for the distribution of relief supplies and humanitarian relief operations;

(c) Exercise its good offices to help achieve national reconciliation within the frame of reference of the Arusha Peace Agreement;

3. Decides to expand the mandate of the Mission to include the following additional responsibilities within the limits of the resources available to it:

(a) Contribute to the security in Rwanda of personnel of the International Tribunal for Rwanda and human rights officers, including full-time protection for the Prosecutor's Office, as well as security details for missions outside Kigali;

(b) Assist in the establishment and training of a new, integrated, national police force;

4. Strongly urges the Government of Rwanda to continue its cooperation with the Mission in the implementation of its mandate and in particular in ensuring unimpeded access to all areas of Rwanda by Mission forces, personnel of the International Tribunal for Rwanda and human rights officers;

5. Welcomes the efforts of the Mission to increase its radio broadcasting capabilities so as to reach the refugee camps in neighbouring countries, and expresses the hope that it will soon be possible for the Government of Rwanda to conclude appropriate arrangements with the Mission in this regard, including the allocation of a radio frequency;

6. Commends the efforts of States, United Nations agencies and non-governmental organizations which have provided humanitarian and other assistance, and encourages them to continue and increase such assistance, particularly in Rwanda;

7. Requests the Secretary-General to make recommendations on possible steps that could be taken by the United Nations to promote the establishment of an effective mine-clearance programme in Rwanda;

8. Calls upon the international community to provide resources needed to meet the immediate needs of the Government of Rwanda directly or through the trust fund established pursuant to resolution 925 (1994);

9. Requests the Secretary-General, following the usual consultations, to inform the Council should he consider that the additional tasks set out in paragraph 3 above require consideration of an adjustment in the logistic and personnel requirements of the Mission;

10. Decides to keep under review the situation in Rwanda and the role played by the Mission and, to that end, requests the Secretary-General to report to the Council by 9 February 1995 and 9 April 1995 on the discharge by the Mission of its mandate, the safety of populations at risk, the humanitarian situation and progress towards repatriation of refugees;

11. Commends the efforts of the Secretary-General, his Special Representative and his Special Humanitarian Envoy to coordinate the United Nations response to the various aspects of the crisis in Rwanda;

12. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

After the vote, the representative of France stated that the maintenance of UNAMIR in Rwanda was necessary to enable the country to regain stability. It was also an indispensable guarantee for the return of Rwandese refugees and their reintegration into their country. His delegation welcomed the deployment in the country of human rights observers, whose work should help restore trust among refugees who had already returned to Rwanda. He further stated that the national reconciliation of all Rwandese clearly did not depend solely on financial resources provided to the Government of Rwanda and made reference in that regard to the Secretary-General's remark that while the lack of financial resources had been a major factor in impeding activities towards national reconciliation, there were some reasons to believe that the Government could do more, even within its meagre resources, to ensure that all Rwandese were part of the political process. Trust must be fully restored in Rwanda. It was also essential that the Council act promptly and take the necessary decisions to resolve the security question in the camps. The implementation of those two points — restoration of trust in Rwanda and security in the refugee camps — would make it possible for the international community to continue to commit itself fully to a settlement of the Rwandese crisis by promoting the repatriation of the refugees, which was an indispensable prelude to the reconciliation of all Rwandese.¹⁵⁹

The representative of New Zealand noted that the presidential statement on the security situation in the camps outside Rwanda and the resolution renewing the mandate of UNAMIR for a further six months were two very important decisions which dealt with two critical and related matters. It was thoroughly appropriate that they had both been adopted on the same day and that they were the subject of distinct Council actions. New Zealand believed that UNAMIR continued to have a vital role to play in ensuring security for persons at risk in Rwanda and also in the process of national reconciliation and reconstruction in that country. UNAMIR's neutral and independent presence was crucial to creating the conditions of security which the returnees needed. International assistance in providing relief and in getting reconstruction efforts under way was also absolutely essential, and the protection that UNAMIR could provide to such operations was equally vital. His delegation shared the judgement of the Secretary-General that security would not be restored to the camps unless there was action to separate the genuine refugees from the influence of the political leaders and the military and paramilitary forces of the former Government. He noted that Council members had requested more information on the concept of operations for a separate peacekeeping force suggested by the Secretary-General and the likely availability of personnel before making a decision. In that regard, his delegation did not believe that private security firms could play a meaningful role in that job, adding that the financial, legal and jurisdictional issues that would arise would effectively make such a force not useful. His delegation also queried whether a peacekeeping force alone could do the kind of task to be performed in the camps, which was really a kind of police function and not a job for soldiers. It also seemed to his delegation that if the Prosecutor of the International Tribunal was to carry out investigations, he would need security and protection. Finally, he queried whether UNAMIR itself should be tasked with a military deterrent role, for doing so might undercut its impartiality in Rwanda among the very refugees who, on their return to Rwanda, would rely on UNAMIR for their protection.¹⁶⁰

According to the representative of the United Kingdom, resolution 965 (1994) drew attention to another very important part of UNAMIR's mandate, namely, the exercise of its good offices to help achieve national reconciliation between all elements of Rwandan society. His delegation believed that without a political framework within which to address the key issues relating to national reconciliation, it would be impossible to create the conditions within Rwanda which would allow the refugees and displaced persons to return to their homes. The proposed regional conference could also play an important role in that context. However, his delegation recognized that, while it was clearly the responsibility of the Government of Rwanda to create those conditions, the Government of Rwanda did not have the resources to act alone and needed urgent and substantial assistance. He further noted that a solution to the appalling problems of Rwanda required action both within Rwanda and in the refugee camps outside its borders. His delegation would consider carefully any detailed proposals the Secretary-General may put forward to secure the camps. But any proposal for peacekeeping action put to the Council should be capable of being implemented smoothly and should, in principle, build on the cooperation with neighbouring States, particularly the Government of Zaire.¹⁶¹

According to the representative of China, the adoption of resolution 965 (1994) had demonstrated the support of the international community, and the Security Council in particular, for UNAMIR to further its efforts of good offices to help achieve national reconciliation in Rwanda at an early date. It had also emphasized that the international community should further support the Government of Rwanda and encourage it to play a fuller role in creating the necessary conditions for the return of refugees. Although his delegation had voted in favour of the resolution, he wanted to make it clear that it had reservations about the elements in the resolution concerning human rights officers. While China agreed that UNAMIR should do its best to protect United Nations personnel in Rwanda, it had always held that United Nations agencies should carry out their duties respectively according to the mandates entrusted to them by the Charter and that therefore the Council should refrain from involving itself in what essentially fell within the terms of reference of other agencies.¹⁶²

Commenting on his Government's achievements, the representative of Rwanda stated that its main task was to address the issue of national reconciliation within the framework of the implementation of the Arusha Peace Agreement. At the political level, all the elements of Rwandese society had been integrated into the various national institutions, with the exception of the elements implicated in genocide and other massacres, and more than 2,000 soldiers of the former Rwandese government forces had been incorporated into the Rwandese Patriotic Army. Moreover, the Government had established a territorial administration that sought to promote national reconciliation. The National Assembly, which had been recently established, included all the political parties of the country, except one, including the parties of the army. Turning to economic, administrative and social aspects, he noted that various obstacles had been placed in the path of his Government's efforts, preventing it from achieving results. The lack of adequate personnel and resources explained why his Government was not able to implement its policy of national reconciliation and reconstruction. Bilateral and multilateral aid was needed to enable his Government to live up to the expectations of national and international opinion vis-à-vis national reconciliation, the restoration of total peace, and the reconstruction and socio-economic development of Rwanda. It was highly regrettable in that regard that some countries were having recourse to impediments at their disposal to deprive Rwanda of the massive external assistance it needed. He concluded by stating that his delegation voted in favour of resolution

965 (1994) to show his Government's support for the work of UNAMIR. But he stressed that the national priority was more national reconstruction, and less and less soldiers and weapons.¹⁶³

The representative of the United States stated that because the situation in Rwanda had changed since the Council had last extended UNAMIR's mandate, it was necessary in resolution 965 (1994) to clarify that mandate. She noted that the mandate was originally designed before the establishment of the International Tribunal for Rwanda and before human rights monitors were deployed by the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights. The renewed mandate therefore made it clear that human rights monitors and Tribunal personnel were entitled to protection. Her delegation did not believe that additional UNAMIR personnel would be required to carry out such protection functions, which UNAMIR had already begun to perform. It was important that UNAMIR provide security for all the Tribunal's personnel, as well as for their premises, to ensure that they could carry out their work effectively and free from fear for their personal safety. Her delegation believed that UNAMIR could carry out its responsibilities within existing resources. If the Secretary-General determined that additional resources might be necessary at some time in the future, he should inform the Council, which could then consider whether to authorize additional resources.¹⁶⁴

Deliberations of 15 December 1994 (3481st meeting)

At its 3481st meeting, on 15 December 1994, the Council resumed its consideration of the item. The President (Rwanda), in accordance with rule 20 of the Council's provisional rules of procedure¹⁶⁵ and bearing in mind the presidential statement of 16 September 1994,¹⁶⁶ invited the representative of Argentina to take the chair for the purpose of the consideration of the item on the agenda.

The representative of Rwanda contended that the criminal elements in the refugee camps in the countries neighbouring Rwanda enjoyed support and were strengthened by international assistance directed to them almost blindly because of inconsistent policies and the violation of laws and rules governing some United Nations bodies, such as the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR), with regard to who was a refugee and who was not. The criminals had again started to intimidate and kill ordinary, innocent people. His Government believed that the criminal groups could be disarmed decisively and relocated to places where they could not pose an immediate security threat to Rwanda, and appealed to the international community, within the framework of the United Nations, to assist Zaire in dealing with that problem. He also stated that the role of UNAMIR was certainly appreciated, which was why his Government had favoured the renewal of its mandate. He stressed that his Government had done what it could to meet the immediate needs of the population, but did not have adequate means to do so and to put into practice its principles of good governance based on justice for all Rwandese. It appealed to the international community to shoulder its responsibility to assist the Government in helping Rwandese to help themselves. He concluded by stating that peace and stability in Rwanda and in the region depended upon what the international community could do and how swiftly it could do it.¹⁶⁷

Decisions of 10 February 1995 (3500th meeting): statement by the President and letter from the President

On 25 January 1995, pursuant to the presidential statement of 30 November 1994,¹⁶⁸ the Secretary-General submitted to the Council his second report on security in the Rwandese refugee camps.¹⁶⁹ The Secretary-General noted that, while there had been some positive developments since his last report in respect of the creation of conditions conducive to repatriation, the continuing presence of nearly 2 million Rwandese refugees in Burundi, the United Republic of Tanzania and Zaire was a matter of serious concern. The general security situation in the camps remained dangerous for both refugees and relief workers. The situation was also potentially destabilizing for the host countries and for the subregion as a whole. The only effective solution to that problem remained the safe and voluntary repatriation of refugees. The Government of Rwanda had signed tripartite agreements with UNHCR and the Governments of Burundi and Zaire respectively on the voluntary repatriation of refugees and was involved in an ongoing dialogue with the Government of the United Republic of Tanzania on that issue. The Secretary-General had dispatched a technical mission to Rwanda, the United Republic of Tanzania and Zaire from 11 to 19 December 1994 to review the situation prevailing in the camps. The mission had confirmed the feasibility of a peacekeeping operation along the lines described in the Secretary-General's report of 18 November 1994, but had considered that the operation would require more than the originally estimated 3,000 to 5,000 troops. The Secretary-General stated, however, that only one country had offered troops and that, in those circumstances, the option of deploying a peacekeeping force to address the security issues in the refugee camps in Zaire was not feasible. Following the presidential statement of 30 November 1994, the Secretary-General had explored alternative measures aimed at providing immediate assistance to the Zairian security forces in protecting humanitarian operations in the camps, including the possibility of deploying security experts to train and monitor the local security forces. Neither option appeared feasible, at least at the moment. After consultations with UNHCR, it had been decided that that office would follow up with Zaire to conclude appropriate arrangements to enhance security in the camps.

The Secretary-General observed that peacekeeping was essentially an instrument for conflict management and resolution. It was not designed and had not generally been used to ensure security in refugee camps. Indeed, it had traditionally been the responsibility of the host countries to provide security to the refugees located on their territory, albeit with an appropriate level of support from the international community. There was no doubt, however, that the innocent civilians who fled Rwanda deserved the continued attention and assistance of the international community. The Secretary-General therefore strongly urged the international community to support the efforts of UNHCR, in cooperation with the Governments of Zaire and the United Republic of Tanzania, to put in place satisfactory security arrangements in the camps and to provide generously the resources required for that purpose. Strengthening security in the camps was an indispensable step for creating conditions conducive to the voluntary repatriation of the refugees. The Secretary-General further noted that the summit meeting of the leaders in the subregion, held at Nairobi on 7 January 1995, had usefully contributed towards defining a framework to address security in the camps and repatriation of the refugees. In his view, it should facilitate the work to be undertaken during the Regional Conference on Assistance to Refugees, Returnees and Displaced Persons in the Great Lakes Region to be hosted by OAU and UNHCR at Bujumbura in mid-February. He hoped that the Conference would open the way to the holding of a broader conference aimed at identifying long-term solution to promote and ensure peace, security and development in the subregion.

By a letter dated 1 February 1995 addressed to the President of the Council,¹⁷⁰ the Secretary-General stated that on 27 January 1995, Zaire and UNHCR had signed an aide-mémoire outlining specific measures to improve the security situation in the refugee camps. Under that agreement, the Government of Zaire would deploy 1,500 military and police security personnel to the camps. In accordance with its mandate, UNAMIR would assist in escorting the repatriated refugees to their home communities and would coordinate with UNHCR to facilitate the repatriation process. The Secretary-General's Special Representative would continue to have overall responsibility for all matters relating to United Nations efforts to assist in the restoration of peace and stability in Rwanda.

At its 3500th meeting, on 10 February 1995, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Botswana) drew the attention of the members of the Council to the above-mentioned letter and to a letter dated 1 February 1995 addressed to the President of the Council from the representative of Rwanda.¹⁷¹ He then stated that, following consultations among members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:¹⁷²

The Security Council has considered the second report of the Secretary-General dated 25 January 1995 on the security in the Rwandese refugee camps, particularly those located in Zaire and his letter dated 1 February 1995 on this subject.

The Council agrees with the Secretary-General's assessment that the present situation in many of the refugee camps remains dangerous for both refugees and relief workers and that the situation is also potentially destabilizing for the region as a whole. It is gravely concerned at reports of continuing intimidation and security problems in the camps, particularly in Zaire and reaffirms its condemnation of actions of former Rwandese leaders living in the camps, and of former government forces and militias to prevent, in some cases by force, the repatriation of the refugees. It also remains concerned at the security threat to international relief workers. It welcomes the steps taken by some of the host countries concerned to improve the security situation in the camps. The Council remains concerned at the obstacles posed by the former civil and military authorities and militias to effective local administration by the host countries and the discharge by the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees of its mission.

The Council attaches great importance to the earliest possible action to address the security problems in the camps. In this context it welcomes the decision that the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, under its refugee protection and humanitarian assistance mandate, conclude appropriate arrangements with the Government of Zaire to enhance security in the camps. It welcomes the agreement between the Office of the High Commissioner and the Government of Zaire of 27 January 1995 to deploy 1,500 Zairian security forces and the Office of the High Commissioner liaison group. It also welcomes the agreement reached between the Governments of Zaire and Rwanda on the return of refugees and property and urges its full implementation. The Council urges Member States to provide the Office of the High Commissioner with the resources needed in the context of the agreement concluded between it and the Government of Zaire. It stresses the importance of close coordination of all operations with United Nations Assistance Mission in Rwanda. The Council endorses the efforts of the Office of the High Commissioner, in cooperation with the United Republic of Tanzania, to put in place security arrangements in the Tanzanian camps, and encourages the Office of the High Commissioner also to address the situation in Burundi. The Council requests the Secretary-General to report to it on a regular basis on the implementation of operations carried out by the Office of the High Commissioner.

The Council stresses the importance of ensuring that accurate information about the situation inside Rwanda is disseminated to the camps. In this respect, it reaffirms the importance of Radio UNAMIR commencing its broadcasts as soon as possible.

The Council encourages efforts to provide security in the camps and notes that they have to be accompanied by further efforts in Rwanda to ensure that refugees can return to their homes without fear of retribution or persecution. In this regard it acknowledges the achievements of the Government of Rwanda, despite the difficulty of the task and the lack of resources. It encourages the Government of Rwanda to continue to provide a framework for the action to be taken to repatriate the refugees, to promote national reconciliation, and to reinvigorate the political process and calls upon the international community to continue to support the Government of Rwanda in its task. The Council reaffirms its view that such a framework should also include an appropriate mechanism for sustaining a dialogue between the Government of Rwanda, the refugee community and the United Nations. It welcomes the conclusions of the summit meeting of leaders in the region, held at Nairobi on 7 January 1995. The Council encourages the International Criminal Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Genocide and Other Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of Rwanda and Rwandan Citizens Responsible for Genocide and Other Such Violations Committed in the Territory of Neighbouring States, between 1 January 1994 and 31 December 1994, established by resolution 955 (1994) in its work, and encourages as well efforts to rebuild the local Rwandan judicial system to facilitate the maintenance of law and order. The Council welcomes the commitments made at the recent Round-table Conference on Rwanda and in response to the consolidated inter agency appeal that will assist the Government of Rwanda in its efforts to rebuild the country and to promote national reconciliation.

The Council looks forward to the Regional Conference on Assistance to Refugees, Returnees and Displaced Persons in the Great Lakes Region, to be hosted by the Organization of African Unity and the Office of the High Commissioner at Bujumbura from 15 to 17 February 1995. The Council expresses the hope that the Conference will lead to further progress in creating the conditions necessary for the refugees and displaced persons to return to their homes and that it will facilitate the identification of long-term solutions to promote and ensure peace, security and development in the region, those issues to be the subject-matter of a further and broader conference of a political nature.

The Council underlines the fact that the presence of the refugee camps should only be temporary and that the return of the refugees to their homes in Rwanda remains the ultimate goal. It requests the Secretary-General to continue his exploration of all options and to make any further recommendations necessary for ensuring security in the camps as soon as possible and to submit a further report on this subject in the light of the outcome of the Bujumbura Conference.

The Council will remain seized of the matter and will keep it under close review.

On 6 February 1995, pursuant to resolution 965 (1994), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a progress report on UNAMIR.¹⁷³ The Secretary-General reported that while progress continued to be made in normalizing the situation in Rwanda, many challenges remained. The Government of Rwanda had continued to take steps towards national reconciliation and reconstruction but for the most part lacked the resources to run an effective public administration. Rwanda's court system did not function, its prisons were overcrowded and thousands of suspects were still awaiting trial. The security situation continued to be a matter of serious concern with reports of summary executions, secret detention, torture and other violent acts against civilians. The humanitarian situation remained worrying and fears of reprisals continue to exist among refugees. The Secretary-General reiterated in that regard his conviction that the dissemination of factual information was a vital tool in creating conditions for refugees and internally displaced persons to decide freely to return to their homes. He indicated that UNAMIR, which had, on 14 January 1995, signed an agreement with the Government to establish a United Nations radio in Kigali, was still awaiting the Government's response to its request for the allocation of a frequency and authorization for the installation of radio transmitters. With regard to the establishment of an effective mine-clearance programme in Rwanda, the Secretary-General informed the Council that a comprehensive plan had been proposed to the Government.

The Secretary-General reported that UNAMIR had adjusted its modus operandi in order to fulfil, within existing resources, its expanded mandate of providing security for personnel of the International Tribunal and the human rights officers. However, as the UNAMIR troop strength was gradually reduced to its authorized level of 5,500, difficulties could arise in fulfilling effectively the various aspects of the mandate. The issue of UNAMIR's force strength might, therefore, have to be revisited in the coming months. The Secretary-General further noted that in order to meet its expanding functions under resolution 965 (1994), the civilian police component of UNAMIR required additional observers and material resources. He therefore recommended that the Council raise the authorized strength of the UNAMIR civilian police component from 90 to 120 observers. On the humanitarian aspects, the Secretary-General reported that although the emergency had abated, the humanitarian situation remained worrying overall. There were still some 2 million refugees sheltered in camps in the neighbouring countries and some 350,000 others were internally displaced. As soon as its consent was received, the United Nations would begin to implement the plan.

¹⁷³ S/1995/107.

By a letter dated 10 February 1995 addressed to the Secretary-General,¹⁷⁴ the President of the Council informed him of the following:

The members of the Security Council have considered your progress report on the United Nations Assistance Mission for Rwanda. They draw attention to the statement by the President of the Security Council of 10 February 1995. They agree with your recommendation that the strength of the civilian police component of the Mission should be increased from 90 to 120 police observers. They believe that an increase in the number of human rights officers in the Human Rights Field Operation in Rwanda is desirable. They also note that a functioning judicial system is essential in the government recovery programme for the establishment of internal security, and also for the return of the refugees. They attach importance to the establishment of an effective mine-clearance programme in Rwanda on the basis of the plan submitted by the United Nations in Kigali. They express their hope that the difficulties affecting the radio station of the Mission will soon be overcome and they insist that it commence broadcasting without delay.

Decision of 22 February 1995 (3502nd meeting):

On 13 February 1995, pursuant to resolution 955 (1994), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the establishment of the International Tribunal for Rwanda.¹⁷⁵ The report contained an analysis of the legal basis for the establishment of the Tribunal and its legal status, a succinct review of the main provisions of the statute of the Tribunal where they differed from the provisions of the statute of the International Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia, an outline of the two-stage approach to the establishment of the Tribunal and the practical arrangements made thus far for its functioning, and an examination of the various options for the location of the seat of the Tribunal in the light of the criteria set out in resolution 955 (1994). With regard to the legal basis of the Tribunal, the Secretary-General recalled that the Council, in its resolution 955 (1994), determined that the situation in Rwanda continued to constitute a threat to international peace and security and, accordingly, decided to establish the International Tribunal for Rwanda under Chapter VII of the Charter. He noted that the establishment of the Tribunal under Chapter VII, notwithstanding the request received from the Government of Rwanda, was necessary to ensure not only the cooperation of Rwanda throughout the lifespan of the Tribunal, but the cooperation of all States in whose territory persons alleged to have committed serious violations of international humanitarian law and acts of genocide in Rwanda might be situated. A Tribunal based on a Chapter VII resolution was also necessary to ensure a speedy and expeditious method of establishing the Tribunal. On the question of the location of the seat of the Tribunal, the Secretary-General reported that he had decided to send a technical mission to Rwanda, Kenya and the United Republic of Tanzania with a view to identifying suitable premises for the seat of the Tribunal. On the basis of that mission's findings and given the positions of the Governments of those countries and having, in addition, examined the considerations of justice and fairness as well as administrative efficiency, as mandated by resolution 955 (1994), it was his conclusion that the choice of Rwanda as the location of the seat would not be feasible or appropriate and that Arusha, Tanzania, should be selected as the seat of the Tribunal. He therefore recommended to the Council that, subject to appropriate arrangements between the United Nations and the Government of the United Republic of Tanzania acceptable to the Council, Arusha be determined as the seat of the International Tribunal for Rwanda.

At its 3502nd meeting, on 22 February 1995, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.¹⁷⁶

Speaking before the vote, the representative of Rwanda recalled that one of the reasons that could have prompted his delegation to vote against resolution 955 (1994), which Rwanda itself had requested, was the question of the location of the seat of the Tribunal. The Tribunal should sit in Rwanda given that it was a tribunal for judging Rwandans. For practical reasons, his delegation believed that shifting the seat of the Tribunal away from Rwanda would entail mobilizing immense resources to ensure that the guilty were there to be tried and for travel and subsistence costs for witnesses and plaintiffs. His delegation would have preferred the seat of the Tribunal to be in Rwanda, so that Rwandans could see justice done. Within the framework of cooperation with the Tribunal, however, his Government was not opposed to it being located in a neighbouring country in order to minimize the effects of its being outside the country. His delegation shared the concern expressed by the Secretary-General about the justice and fairness which the Tribunal needed. Nevertheless, the fact that that argument had been used in favour of relocating the Tribunal outside Rwanda did not mean that his delegation agreed with it in any way. He added that the concern for justice in Rwanda shown by the Council implied that serious thought must be given to support for the Rwandan courts competent to supplement the work of the Tribunal.¹⁷⁷

¹⁷⁶ S/1995/148.

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 977 (1995), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolution 955 (1994) of 8 November 1994,

Having regard to its decision contained in paragraph 6 of resolution 955 (1994) that the seat of the International Tribunal for Rwanda shall be determined by the Council,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General dated 13 February 1995 and noting the recommendation of the Secretary-General that, subject to appropriate arrangements between the United Nations and the Government of the United Republic of Tanzania acceptable to the Council, Arusha be determined as the seat of the International Tribunal for Rwanda,

Noting the willingness of the Government of Rwanda to cooperate with the Tribunal, Decides that, subject to the conclusion of appropriate arrangements between the United Nations and the Government of the United Republic of Tanzania, the International Tribunal for Rwanda shall have its seat at Arusha.

Decision of 27 February 1995 (3504th meeting): resolution 978 (1995)

At its 3504th meeting, on 27 February 1995, the Security Council resumed its consideration of the item. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution submitted by the United States.¹⁷⁸

Speaking before the vote, the representative of China stated that while the Rwandese people had to rely mainly on their own strength to gradually achieve national reconciliation, they also needed encouragement and assistance from the international community, including the Security Council. He stressed that all outside efforts and assistance should contribute to political and social stability in Rwanda, and must follow the principles of respect for State sovereignty and non-interference in others' internal affairs, as set forth in the Charter, and must be based on the necessary condition of the consent and cooperation of the Government of Rwanda.¹⁷⁹

According to the representative of the United States, it was important that persons suspected of having committed genocide in Rwanda or in States neighbouring Rwanda should be detained until the International Tribunal for Rwanda could investigate and make decisions about prosecution. Their detention would be a tangible sign of the international commitment to holding individuals accountable for such atrocities and would thus improve prospects for reconciliation in Rwanda. It would also enhance the credibility of the Tribunal. He stressed, first, that the draft resolution underscored the objective of the Tribunal. If the Tribunal was to contribute to terminating the impunity with which atrocities were committed in Rwanda in the past, it was necessary that it be able to take custody of those who committed such acts. Secondly, the draft resolution sought to ameliorate the situation in the refugee camps and to facilitate the return of the refugees. The draft resolution was thus a step in a process, which built on previous resolutions and provided further evidence of the Council's commitment to continue to move that process along.¹⁸⁰

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 978 (1995), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling all its previous resolutions on the situation in Rwanda, in particular its resolutions 935 (1994) and 955 (1994),

Expressing once again its grave concern at the reports indicating that genocide and other systematic, widespread and flagrant violations of international humanitarian law have been committed in Rwanda,

Noting that these reports were confirmed in the final report of the Commission of Experts submitted pursuant to resolution 935 (1994),¹⁸¹

Recalling the obligations contained in resolution 955 (1994), which created the International Tribunal for Rwanda,

Concerned by the conditions in the refugee camps outside Rwanda, including reports of violence directed against refugees who voluntarily wish to return to Rwanda,

Determined to put an end to violations of international humanitarian law and serious acts of violence directed against refugees, and that effective measures be taken to bring to justice the persons who are responsible for such crimes,

Taking note of the reports of the Secretary-General on security in the Rwandese refugee camps of 18 November 1994 and 25 January 1995,

Welcoming the report of the Secretary-General dated 13 February 1995 and stressing the importance of taking all measures for the early and effective functioning of the International Tribunal for Rwanda,

Stressing the need for States to take as soon as possible any measures necessary under their domestic law to implement the provisions of resolution 955 (1994) and of the Statute of the International Tribunal for Rwanda,

1. Urges States to arrest and detain, in accordance with their national law and relevant standards of international law, pending prosecution by the International Criminal Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Genocide and Other Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of Rwanda and Rwandan Citizens Responsible for Genocide and Other Such Violations Committed in the Territory of Neighbouring States, between 1 January 1994 and 31 December 1994, or by the appropriate national authorities, persons found within their territory against whom there is sufficient evidence that they were responsible for acts within the jurisdiction of the International Tribunal for Rwanda;

2. Urges States who detain persons referred to in paragraph 1 above to inform the Secretary-General and the Prosecutor of the International Tribunal for Rwanda of the identity of the persons detained, the nature of the crimes believed to have been committed, the evidence providing probable cause for the detentions, the date when the persons were detained and the place of detention;

3. Also urges States who detain such persons to cooperate with representatives of the International Committee of the Red Cross, as well as investigators for the International Tribunal for Rwanda, in order to secure unimpeded access to those persons;

4. Condemns all attacks against persons in the refugee camps near the borders of Rwanda, demands that such attacks immediately cease, and calls upon States to take appropriate steps to prevent such attacks;

5. Urges States, on whose territory serious acts of violence in the refugee camps have taken place, to arrest and detain, in accordance with their national law and relevant standards of international law, and submit to the appropriate authorities for the purpose of prosecution persons against whom there is sufficient evidence that they have incited or participated in such acts and further urges the States concerned to keep the Secretary-General informed of the measures they have taken to this effect;

6. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

After the vote, the representative of France stated that resolution 978 (1995) might be useful inasmuch as it constituted a political message to all States and, in particular, those neighbouring Rwanda, that they should consider detaining those who had committed genocide and other individuals who had carried out criminal acts in and around the camps. Nevertheless, his delegation felt that adopting a resolution was never the right way to send such a message. Rather, the priority was that the International Tribunal should start work as soon as possible. Once the judges were elected and the rules of procedure adopted, it would be possible for all States that needed to do so to adopt the necessary domestic legislation to enable them to cooperate fully with the Tribunal. Until that time, arrest and detention measures were quite simply impossible in law in many States. That was why a resolution under Chapter VII requiring all States immediately to detain the suspects they had in their territory would have been absolutely out of the question. The most appropriate legal formula would have been a presidential statement calling for the Tribunal to start work soon and for States to take any measures that might be needed to adapt their criminal law, and only then requesting States to make the necessary arrests and detain people. Nevertheless, a presidential statement would have presupposed a consensus among members of the Council, which it had not been possible to achieve. He noted that resolution 978 (1995), in its final version, made no mention of Chapter VII of the Charter, addressed requests to States that were not binding in nature and specified that any detentions would be effected in accordance with their national law — which meant that only those States that had domestic legislation enabling them to act along the requested lines would be able to do so, as the resolution could not serve by itself alone as a legal basis for arresting anyone. Also, the two categories of acts — those that fell within the competence of the Tribunal and others, that is, serious acts of violence in the camps — were clearly distinguished in the text and treated separately. By limiting instances of impunity, the resolution also contributed to the return of the rule of law in Rwanda. He noted, furthermore, that the international community was following very closely any initiatives taken by the Council in the field of international criminal law. Council members should therefore be vigilant and see to it that respect for individual freedoms in criminal legal proceedings was properly ensured under the decisions recommended by the Council.¹⁸²

The representative of Rwanda stated that resolution 978 (1995) was of great importance for Rwanda and its people, for those who committed genocide and other crimes against humanity in Rwanda had held sway in the country for three and a half decades and committed several waves of massacres with impunity, since they were carrying out Government policy. It would also make it possible to protect refugees and other citizens of Rwandese origin living in neighbouring countries. The resolution could also play a preventive role because, if the perpetrators of such crimes were not arrested, their actions were likely to set the subregion ablaze. In the context of preventive diplomacy, he reminded the Council that Rwandese and other criminals were busy training in the countries of the subregion, with the assistance and support of friendly countries, with a view to attacking Rwanda. Should that information turn out to be true, his delegation urged the Council to check and find an appropriate solution before it was too late. He noted further that resolution 978 (1995) sent a clear and firm message to other political and ethnic organizations that might be tempted to repeat what had happened in Rwanda, and told them that their actions would not go unpunished. That was why his delegation had wanted the resolution to be much stronger and much more binding than it was; it did not escape unscathed from the process of making it acceptable for adoption. In conclusion, his delegation asked the Council to ensure that Rwanda's internal security was assured so that the same criminals could not take advantage of the arms embargo against Rwanda to disturb the peace in the country. If Rwanda was to be responsible for its own security and internal peace, the Council must ditch some of the provisions that were no longer warranted from its previous resolutions.¹⁸³

Decision of 27 April 1995 (3526th meeting):
statement by the President

On 9 April 1995, pursuant to resolution 965 (1994), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a progress report on UNAMIR.¹⁸⁴ The Secretary-General reported that since the new Government of Rwanda had assumed office, the overall situation in the country had improved considerably. However, over the past two months, tensions and frustrations had surfaced and the security situation in the country had deteriorated. Those developments had contributed to a considerable decline in the repatriation of refugees from Zaire, the United Republic of Tanzania and Burundi. There were also reports of military training and arms build-up by elements of the armed forces of the former Government of Rwanda in neighbouring countries. The worsening security situation had strained relations between UNAMIR and the Rwandese Patriotic Army, which had frequently restricted the movement of UNAMIR personnel. That had affected UNAMIR's ability to discharge its mandated tasks fully and effectively. The relationship between UNAMIR and the Rwandese Patriotic Army had been discussed by the Secretary-General's Special Representative with the President and the Vice President of Rwanda. Both had reaffirmed their support for UNAMIR. They had also felt that, at an appropriate time, UNAMIR's mandate and its possible phase out from Rwanda should be discussed. Recalling that UNAMIR's mandate would expire on 9 June 1995, he indicated that he had requested his Special Representative to consider, in consultation with the Government, adjustments which could be made to the mandate.

The Secretary-General urged the Government of Rwanda to make more determined efforts to foster a climate of trust and confidence and to create conditions that would encourage refugees and displaced persons not suspected of involvement in the genocide to believe that they could return to their homes in safety. At the same time, steps must be taken to bring to trial, at the earliest opportunity, those who were guilty of genocide. The Secretary-General hoped that Member States would take the necessary follow-up action and help ensure that the International Tribunal for Rwanda became operational as soon as possible. The need for such steps was underlined by the recent disturbing reports of military training and an arms build up by elements of the armed forces of the former Government of Rwanda in neighbouring countries. The Governments on whose territory such activities might be taking place must ensure that their countries did not become bases for incursions into Rwanda.

The Secretary-General also urged donors to do all they could to accelerate the flow of aid to Rwanda, noting that Member States might wish to consider channelling funds through the Trust Fund for Rwanda. The Secretary-General further stated that the increasing harassment of United Nations and international staff serving in Rwanda was another source of serious concern. He urged the Government of Rwanda to extend to UNAMIR the necessary cooperation without which the Mission would not be able to carry out its mandate and the international community would find it more difficult to respond to Rwanda's rehabilitation needs. He also reminded the Government of its responsibility for the safety and security of all UNAMIR personnel, as well as for ensuring that their freedom of movement and access throughout the country was respected. Finally, he stated his intention to carry out necessary consultations with States of the region with a view to determining the type of assistance they might require regarding the organization of an international conference on security, stability and peace in the region.

On 14 April 1995, pursuant to the presidential statement of 10 February 1995, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council his third report on security in the Rwandese refugee camps.¹⁸⁵ The Secretary-General reported that the OAU/UNHCR Regional Conference on Assistance to Refugees, Returnees and Displaced Persons in the Great Lakes Region, held at Bujumbura from 15 to 17 February 1995, adopted a plan of action with a primary focus on voluntary repatriation as the preferred durable solution to the refugee problem. To achieve that goal, it had underscored the roles to be played by the countries of origin, the countries of asylum and the international community, and outlined specific measures to be taken in that regard. The Conference had further expressed the hope that a broader United Nations conference on peace, security and stability, as called for by the Council, would soon be held. Consultations on the holding of such a conference were continuing. The Secretary-General was, however, concerned that recent developments, such as the closure of borders and attacks on refugee camps, were in blatant disregard of the agreement reached at Bujumbura, and appealed to all States to act in accordance with the recommendations of the Conference.

He further observed that both the Government of Rwanda and the international community were seriously concerned by persistent reports about arms shipments into Goma airport, allegedly for arming the former Rwandese government forces, as well as about the training of those forces on Zairian territory. Such allegations, which had been rejected by the representative of Zaire, prompted the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Zaire to request that an independent commission of inquiry be established to investigate and report on the matter. The Secretary-General therefore intended to hold consultations with the Governments of the countries concerned, as well as with OAU, on measures to respond to that request.

The deployment of the Zairian camp security contingent and the civilian security liaison group in the refugee camps had thus far had a positive effect. The Secretary-General stressed, however, that the improvement of security conditions in the camps was not enough to ensure the voluntary repatriation of all the refugees. Reports about numerous arrests and the overcrowded prisons in Rwanda had raised fears among the refugees and hindered the process of voluntary repatriation, a situation which had resulted in the decline in the number of returnees. Rebuilding the Rwandan justice system remained, therefore, an important factor in contributing to the creation of conditions conducive to the return of refugees, and efforts by the Government of Rwanda in that direction should be supported. Ultimately, voluntary repatriation would depend on the efforts of the Rwandan Government to promote genuine national reconciliation among all segments of Rwandan society and to ensure that refugees could return to their communities without fear of persecution.

At its 3526th meeting, on 27 April 1995, the Council included the reports of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Czech Republic) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a letter dated 13 April 1995 addressed to the President of the Council from the representative of Rwanda.¹⁸⁶ The President then stated that, following consultations among members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:¹⁸⁷

The Security Council has considered the progress report of the Secretary-General of 9 April 1995 on the United Nations Assistance Mission for Rwanda and his third report on security in the Rwandese refugee camps of 14 April 1995, as well as the oral briefings from the Secretariat on the tragic events on 22 April 1995 at the Kibeho camp for internally displaced persons.

The Council condemns the killing of numerous civilians in the camp and is encouraged by the decision of the Government of Rwanda to carry out a full investigation of these events without delay and to bring to justice those responsible. In this regard it welcomes the decision of the Rwandan authorities to establish an independent inquiry with United Nations and other international participation to carry out this investigation of the events. The Council also requests the Secretary-General to report to it, without delay, on these events and on the role of the Mission.

The Council is concerned by the generally deteriorating security situation in Rwanda. It underlines that the Government of Rwanda bears primary responsibility for maintaining security throughout the country and for the safety of internally displaced persons and returnees, as well as for ensuring respect for their basic human rights. In this context it reaffirms the need for coordination between the Government of Rwanda and the Mission and other agencies on these matters. The Council does, however, note with satisfaction that the Government of Rwanda has in previous months made considerable efforts directed at national reconciliation, rehabilitation and reconstruction, which are of crucial importance. The Council calls on the Government of Rwanda to intensify these efforts and on the international community to continue to support those efforts, in order to bring about a climate of trust and confidence which would assist in the early and safe return of refugees. In this context, it underlines the importance it attaches to demining, including the United Nations proposal.

The Council notes with deep concern disturbing reports of increased incursions into Rwanda from neighbouring countries, allegations of arms shipments into the Goma airport and of elements of the former Rwandese Government forces being trained in a neighbouring country. It calls upon all States, especially those neighbouring Rwanda, to refrain from any action that would further exacerbate the security situation in that country and to prevent incursions into Rwanda from their own territories. The Council invites States and organizations which have information on the transport of arms into countries neighbouring Rwanda for the purpose of their use in Rwanda in contravention of resolution 918 (1994) to pass that information to the Committee established under resolution 918 (1994) and requests the Committee to consider that information as a matter of urgency and to report thereon to the Council.

The Council notes with satisfaction that the deployment of the Zairian camp security contingent and the civilian security liaison group has had a positive effect on the security situation in refugee camps in Zaire.

The Council pays tribute to all members of the Mission. It reaffirms that the Mission constitutes one essential factor for creating a climate of confidence and for promoting stability and security. In this context, it underlines the responsibility of the Government of Rwanda for the safety and security of all Mission personnel and other international staff serving in the country. It urges the Rwandan authorities to proceed with the exchange of letters supplementing the agreement on the status of the Mission and its personnel, reflecting the changes in the Mission's mandate following from Security Council resolution 918 (1994). The Council calls for increased cooperation and collaboration between the Government of Rwanda, its neighbouring countries and the Mission as well as other agencies, including in the humanitarian field.

The Council expresses grave concern at the situation created by the overcrowded prisons in Rwanda which has resulted in the death of numerous persons in custody and requests the Secretary-General to consider urgently measures which could be taken quickly in conjunction with the Government of Rwanda and humanitarian agencies to improve the conditions of those in detention or under investigation. The Council emphasizes that the development of the Rwandese justice system continues to be an important factor in creating conditions of security, law and order, conducive to the return of refugees from abroad and of displaced persons to their homes. The Council calls on the international community to assist the Government of Rwanda in re-establishing the justice system as a contribution to confidence-building and the maintenance of law and order.

The Council expresses its appreciation for the action of those States which have arrested and detained persons following the adoption of resolution 978 (1995). It urges States, in accordance with that resolution, to arrest and detain persons against whom there is sufficient evidence of responsibility for acts within the jurisdiction of the International Tribunal for Rwanda. It requests the Secretary-General to facilitate the rapid establishment of the Tribunal.

The Council requests the Government of Rwanda to facilitate the delivery and distribution of humanitarian assistance to refugees and displaced persons in need, in conformity with the principles and current practice of the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees. It invites States and donor agencies to deliver on their earlier commitments and to further increase their assistance. It urges all Governments in the region to keep their borders open for this purpose.

The Council appeals to all States to act in accordance with recommendations adopted at the Regional Conference on Assistance to Refugees, Returnees and Displaced Persons in the Great Lakes Region, held at Bujumbura from 15 to 17 February 1995, in order to facilitate the return of refugees. The Council welcomes the Dar es Salaam trilateral agreement of 12 April 1995, on the voluntary repatriation of Rwandan refugees from the United Republic of Tanzania.

The Council reaffirms the view that an international conference would contribute substantially to peace and security in the subregion. It welcomes the intention of the Secretary-General to carry out consultations with all concerned so that such a conference can be held at the earliest possible date.

The Council will remain seized of the matter.

Decision of 9 June 1995 (3542nd meeting):
resolution 997 (1995)

On 4 June 1995, pursuant to resolution 965 (1995), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on UNAMIR.¹⁸⁸ The Secretary-General reported that the country was largely at peace, and the long and arduous process of recovery had begun with the Government taking a number of positive actions. Nonetheless, the situation remained tense, with no significant advances in the process of national reconciliation, grossly overcrowded prisons, arbitrary arrests, tension over property rights and the lack of an effective judicial system. Causes of Rwanda's tensions and frustrations included the military activities and reports of arms deliveries to elements of the former Rwandese government forces in neighbouring countries, which were sources of serious concern for the Government. It was concerned that no effective limitations were seen to be placed on military training of, and delivery of arms supplies to, elements of the former Rwandese government forces, while the arms embargo continued to apply to Rwanda. Another cause of deep frustration was the delay in bringing those responsible for the genocide to justice, both through the International Tribunal and at the national level. A third element of concern was the slow delivery of pledged economic assistance.

The Secretary-General further observed that while UNAMIR had made a significant contribution to the relative stability and normalization achieved in Rwanda over the last year, the complex political and security situation had led the Government of Rwanda to raise questions about the future role of that operation. The Secretary-General recognized that the situation had changed radically since the establishment of the new Government of Rwanda and that the changes called for adjustments in the mandate of UNAMIR, so that its role could reflect the new situation. He recalled that in anticipation of the expiry of UNAMIR's mandate on 9 June 1995, his Special Representative had engaged in extensive consultations with the Government of Rwanda on a new mandate. Under the proposed new mandate, UNAMIR would shift its focus from peacekeeping to confidence-building, undertaking tasks specifically required to sustain a United Nations peacekeeping presence in Rwanda, mainly in Kigali, and tasks aimed at assisting the Government of Rwanda in confidence-building and in the promotion of a climate conducive to stability and to the return of refugees and displaced persons. In order to carry out such functions, UNAMIR would require approximately 2,330 troops, 320 military observers and 65 civilian police. However, the Government of Rwanda had proposed a different and more limited role for UNAMIR, arguing that the conditions on the ground called for a drastic reduction in the number of United Nations troops. It had taken the position that most of the peacekeeping functions so far discharged by UNAMIR had become redundant, and that the concept of promoting security and confidence through the presence of UNAMIR could no longer be accepted, since the Government had assumed responsibility for national security throughout the country. The protection of humanitarian convoys was also the responsibility of the Government, with UNAMIR playing a monitoring role only. On the issue of border monitoring, the Government considered that there was no need for UNAMIR to play such a role in Rwanda. In addition, it expressed the view that the training programme being carried out by the UNAMIR civilian police component should be replaced by bilateral arrangements and could continue only until those arrangements were in place. The Government of Rwanda proposed that UNAMIR should be reduced to a maximum of 1,800 formed troops, to be deployed in Kigali as well as in the provinces. UNAMIR's mandate would be extended for six months, on the understanding that there would be no further extension and that steps to reduce UNAMIR troops outside Kigali should commence immediately. The Secretary-General cautioned, however, that, on the basis of that proposal, UNAMIR would not have the strength to perform adequately the tasks proposed above. While he understood the position of the Government of Rwanda, he was convinced that

UNAMIR remained an essential component of the international community's efforts to assist the Government and people of Rwanda and that it must have the capability to discharge its functions effectively. At the same time, since UNAMIR was a peacekeeping operation established under Chapter VI of the Charter, its continued presence in Rwanda depended on the consent and active cooperation of the Government. He therefore intended to continue consultations with the Government of Rwanda and would report orally to the Council on the outcome thereof. Subject to that report, he recommended that the Council renew the mandate of UNAMIR, adjusted to accommodate the tasks outlined above, for a period of six months, ending on 9 December 1995. Immediate steps should also be taken by the international community to support the earliest activation of the International Tribunal and the rehabilitation of the Rwandan national system of justice. At the same time, effective measures should be taken to ensure that Rwandan nationals in neighbouring countries were not allowed to receive arms supplies or to undertake military activities aimed at destabilizing Rwanda. The Secretary-General was, in particular, concerned that there could be a serious escalation in cross border clashes that would add a new dimension to the tragedy of Rwanda and lead to unpredictable consequences. He concluded by stressing that international assistance to Rwanda needed to be accelerated. It was essential that ways be found to improve the procedures that had delayed the disbursement of assistance to resolve situations that required priority attention. With respect to the long-term solution of the refugee and related problems in the Great Lakes States, he intended to appoint a special envoy to carry out consultations with countries concerned, as well as with OAU, on the preparation and convening of the Regional Conference on Security, Stability and Development at the earliest possible time.

At its 3542nd meeting, on 9 June 1995, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representative of Zaire, at his request, to participate in the Council's discussion, without the right to vote. The President (Germany) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a letter dated 19 May 1995 addressed to the President of the Council from the Secretary-General.¹⁸⁹ He also drew their attention to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations¹⁹⁰ and read out revisions to be made to the draft text in its provisional form.

The representative of Zaire expressed the hope that the provisions of paragraph 3 of the draft resolution, which called on UNAMIR to exercise its good offices to help achieve national reconciliation within the frame of reference of the Arusha Peace Agreement and to assist the Government of Rwanda in facilitating the return and reintegration of refugees, would be speedily implemented. He stated that those measures should be accompanied by a specific timetable for the speedy repatriation of the refugees still in camps in Zaire. His country could do no more in that regard and his Government appealed to the international community to help Rwanda to take back the half of its population now in Zairian territory. The Kigali authorities must get down to creating conditions that would make possible the speedy return of refugees to their homes. With reference to paragraph 6 of the draft resolution, he affirmed that Zaire was not an arms producer, much less an arms merchant. He reiterated the request made by the Foreign Minister of Zaire at the Bujumbura meeting for the creation of an independent commission of inquiry to establish the truth about alleged arms transfers across Zaire's borders. His Government committed itself to participating actively in the consultations that were to be conducted with the Secretary-General.¹⁹¹

Speaking before the vote, the representative of Nigeria noted that, in addition to some negative developments that had stalled the process of national reconciliation, there had also been increasing agitation against the international community in general, and the United Nations in particular for what was perceived by some in Rwanda, perhaps with some justification, as the abandonment of Rwanda in its time of greatest need during the genocide of the previous year and the subsequent inability of the international community to deliver on its promises to help the Government stand on its feet. His delegation had expressed its disquiet about the reported open hostility that had been shown to UNAMIR's personnel recently and believed that it was the responsibility of the Government of Rwanda to address that problem effectively. The Council must in turn address the serious issues of the militarization of the camps, the arms build-up and cross-border infiltration. His delegation viewed the measures spelled out in paragraphs 4, 5 and 6 of the draft resolution as a first step in that direction. He cautioned, however, that the Council might have to return to the matter and proffer more drastic measures for solving the problem, which, if not seriously and promptly addressed, could soon lead to an explosive situation that could engulf not only Rwanda but also some of the neighbouring countries. He further stated that there was no use asking the Government of Rwanda to create favourable conditions for the return of refugees if it did not have the means to do so. Rwanda's situation was one where some conditionalities might have to be waived, at least temporarily, to enable the Government to obtain such financial assistance in a timely fashion. Concerning UNAMIR, his delegation noted with satisfaction that an understanding had been reached between the Government of Rwanda and the United Nations on the appropriate force level that could carry out its tasks under an adjusted mandate. In its view, the new force level responded to the legitimate concern of a sovereign State to take charge of its own destiny, while taking cognizance of the imperatives of effective implementation of an agreed mandate.¹⁹²

According to the representative of China, the actions of the international community, including the actions of the Council, should aim first of all to meet the priority needs of the Rwandese people. In so doing, it must respect the will of the Rwandese Government and people. With respect to the Council's proposed modification of UNAMIR's mandate and reduction in the scope of its activities, UNAMIR would mainly play a good-offices role to help achieve national reconciliation within the framework of the Arusha Peace Agreement. China was of the view that such a change was in the interests of the Rwandese people.¹⁹³

The draft resolution, as orally revised in its provisional form, was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 997 (1995), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling all its previous resolutions on the situation in Rwanda, in particular its resolution 872 (1993) of 5 October 1993 by which it established the United Nations Assistance Mission for Rwanda, and its resolutions 912 (1994) of 21 April 1994, 918 (1994) of 17 May 1994, 925 (1994) of 8 June 1994, and 965 (1994) of 30 November 1994, which set out the mandate of the Mission,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 4 June 1995,

Recalling also its resolution 955 (1994) of 8 November 1994, by which it established the International Criminal Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Genocide and Other Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of Rwanda and Rwandan Citizens Responsible for Genocide and Other Such Violations Committed in the Territory of Neighbouring States, between 1 January 1994 and 31 December 1994, and its resolution 978 (1995) of 27 February 1995, concerning the necessity for the arrest of persons suspected of certain offences in Rwanda,

Stressing the importance of achieving genuine reconciliation among all members of Rwandan society within the frame of reference of the Arusha Peace Agreement,

Noting with great concern reports of military preparations and increasing incursions into Rwanda by elements of the former regime and underlining the need for effective measures to ensure that Rwandan nationals currently in neighbouring countries, including those in camps, do not undertake military activities aimed at destabilizing Rwanda or receive arms supplies, in view of the great likelihood that such arms are intended for use within Rwanda,

Underlining the need for increased efforts to assist the Government of Rwanda in the promotion of a climate of stability and trust in order to facilitate the return of Rwandan refugees in neighbouring countries,

Emphasizing the necessity for the accelerated disbursement of international assistance for the rehabilitation and reconstruction of Rwanda,

Calling again upon all States to act in accordance with recommendations adopted by the Regional Conference on Assistance to Refugees, Returnees and Displaced Persons in the Great Lakes Region, held in Bujumbura from 15 to 17 February 1995,

Recognizing the valuable contribution that the human rights officers deployed by the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights to Rwanda have made towards the improvement of the overall situation,

Acknowledging the responsibility of the Government of Rwanda for the safety and security of all Mission personnel and other international staff serving in the country,

Reaffirming the need for a long-term solution to the refugee and related problems in the Great Lakes States, and welcoming, therefore, the intention of the Secretary-General to appoint a special envoy to carry out consultations on the preparation and convening, at the earliest possible time, of the Regional Conference on Security, Stability and Development, ¹⁹³ Ibid., pp. 8-9.

1. Decides to extend the mandate of United Nations Assistance Mission for Rwanda until 8 December 1995 and authorizes a reduction of the force level to 2,330 troops within three months of the adoption of the present resolution and to 1,800 troops within four months;

2. Decides to maintain the current level of military observers and civilian police personnel;

3. Decides, in the light of the current situation in Rwanda, to adjust the mandate of the Mission so that the Mission will:

(a) Exercise its good offices to help achieve national reconciliation within the frame of reference of the Arusha Peace Agreement;

(b) Assist the Government of Rwanda in facilitating the voluntary and safe return of refugees and their reintegration in their home communities, and, to that end, to support the Government of Rwanda in its ongoing efforts to promote a climate of confidence and trust through the performance of monitoring tasks throughout the country with military and police observers;

(c) Support the provision of humanitarian aid, and of assistance and expertise in engineering, logistics, medical care and demining;

(d) Assist in the training of a national police force;

(e) Contribute to the security in Rwanda of personnel and premises of United Nations agencies, of the International Criminal Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Genocide and Other Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of Rwanda and Rwandan Citizens Responsible for Genocide and Other Such Violations Committed in the Territory of Neighbouring States, between 1 January 1994 and 31 December 1994, including full time protection for the Prosecutor's Office, as well as those of human rights officers, and to contribute also to the security of humanitarian agencies in case of need;

4. Affirms that the restrictions imposed under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations by resolution 918 (1994) apply to the sale or supply of arms and materiel specified therein to persons in the States neighbouring Rwanda, if that sale or supply is for the purpose of the use of such arms or materiel within Rwanda;

5. Calls upon the States neighbouring Rwanda to take steps, with the aim of putting an end to factors contributing to the destabilization of Rwanda, to ensure that such arms and materiel are not transferred to Rwandan camps within their territories;

6. Requests the Secretary-General to consult the Governments of neighbouring countries on the possibility of the deployment of United Nations military observers, and to consult, as a matter of priority, the Government of Zaire on the deployment of observers including in the airfields located in eastern Zaire, in order to monitor the sale or supply of arms and materiel referred to above; and further requests the Secretary-General to report to the Council on the matter within one month of the adoption of the present resolution;

7. Takes note of the cooperation existing between the Government of Rwanda and the Mission in the implementation of its mandate and urges the Government of Rwanda and the Mission to continue to implement the agreements made between them, in particular the status-of-mission agreement of 5 November 1993 and any subsequent agreement concluded to replace that Agreement in order to facilitate the implementation of the new mandate;

8. Commends the efforts of States, United Nations agencies and non-governmental organizations that have provided humanitarian assistance to refugees and displaced persons in need, encourages them to continue such assistance, and calls upon the Government of Rwanda to continue to facilitate their delivery and distribution;

9. Calls upon States and donor agencies to fulfil their earlier commitments to give assistance for Rwanda's rehabilitation efforts, to increase such assistance, and in particular to support the early and effective functioning of the International Tribunal and the rehabilitation of the Rwandan judicial system;

10. Encourages the Secretary-General and his Special Representative to continue to coordinate the activities of the United Nations in Rwanda including those of the organizations and agencies active in the humanitarian and developmental field, and of the human rights officers;

11. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the Council by 9 August and 9 October 1995 on the discharge by the Mission of its mandate, the humanitarian situation and progress towards repatriation of refugees;

12. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

After the vote, the representative of the United Kingdom noted that the overriding requirement of the people of Rwanda was for the development of a climate of stability and confidence, which would encourage further efforts and progress towards national reconciliation. His Government was satisfied that, with resolution 997 (1995), UNAMIR had the mandate to offer effective assistance with that process. It also hoped that the Government of Rwanda would draw confidence from the restatement of the arms embargo in the resolution to make clear to neighbouring countries that the embargo applied if the arms were for use in Rwanda. All countries in the region must continue their efforts to ensure that the embargo was enforced effectively within their jurisdictions, and to prevent activities aimed at the destabilization of Rwanda from taking place within their borders. He further noted that the presence of UNAMIR provided an essential element of the framework for cooperation between the Government of Rwanda and the international community. His Government wished to see the international community increase its effort towards rehabilitation and reunification inside Rwanda, in particular through the rapid delivery of the substantial commitment of aid already entered into by the international community.¹⁹⁴

The representative of the United States stated that UNAMIR continued to have a critical role to play in the joint efforts towards national reconciliation in Rwanda. One of its main functions would be to assist the Government of Rwanda in its daunting tasks of readying the country for the voluntary and safe repatriation of refugees. Reports that bases and camps separate from those under the supervision of UNHCR were being used for military training, recruitment and incursions into Rwanda, constituted a danger that the Council must address. That was why the resolution also asked for an investigation and reduction in the flow of arms to those who sought to destabilize Rwanda. Her Government was particularly pleased that, under its mandate, UNAMIR would contribute to the security of the personnel of the International Tribunal. To carry out their duties, the investigators, prosecutors and judges of the International Tribunal required impartial international military protection. She concluded by noting that, as a member of the Council, Rwanda had an important responsibility to promote the inviolability of international law around the world. She welcomed therefore the Government's cooperation and expected it to meet its obligations pursuant to UNAMIR's new mandate.¹⁹⁵

In the light of the new situation in Rwanda, the representative of the Russian Federation agreed with the need to make certain adjustments to the mandate of UNAMIR and believed that the Mission's new mandate retained an adequate United Nations presence and active role in Rwanda. On the political level, his delegation believed that the Arusha Agreement continued to define the framework for a peaceful settlement and noted the special role that OAU and Rwanda's neighbouring countries were called upon to play. His delegation further hoped that Rwanda's neighbours would take all necessary measures to put an end to the illegal delivery of weapons to extremists from the Rwandan opposition, and thereby contribute to the maintenance of stability both in Rwanda and in the region as a whole.¹⁹⁶

¹⁹⁴ Ibid., pp. 9-10.

¹⁹⁵ Ibid., pp. 12-13.

The representative of France noted that the situation in Rwanda had changed considerably since UNAMIR was established. The Government of Rwanda had requested that the United Nations draw the relevant conclusions from those changes and that the United Nations operation in Rwanda no longer be entrusted with peacekeeping tasks per se. That was what the Council had just done in giving UNAMIR a new mandate. It was also envisaged that the troop strength would be reduced by more than half. France hoped that the Government of Rwanda would cooperate fully with the United Nations operation and especially that it would continue to respect the status-of-mission agreement. Thus reconfigured, UNAMIR would have the primary task of providing assistance to the Government of Rwanda, particularly with regard to the essential priority question: the return of refugees and their reintegration into their communities. France also believed that the refugee question could not be resolved solely in a national framework. It therefore continued to hope that a conference on peace, security and stability would be organized so that the problems facing the countries of the Great Lakes region could be resolved in a regional framework. In conclusion, France believed that confidence could be re-established in Rwanda only if there was a halt to the arms smuggling that fuelled tensions in the region. Measures to that end included the clarification of the embargo regime imposed under resolution 918 (1994) and the possible deployment in neighbouring countries of military observers whose task it would be to monitor the implementation of the embargo.¹⁹⁷

The representative of Rwanda stated that his Government recognized the need to review UNAMIR's mandate. The situation in Rwanda had changed and the Mission's mandate had already been overtaken by events. His Government, like any responsible Government, wished to exercise its sovereignty in the security field throughout Rwanda. It also wished to ensure peace and build confidence between the Rwandans without any go-betweens. So long as there was a go-between, that confidence could never be fully established. There was a need to promote direct contacts between the people and its Government. On the issue of insecurity arising from the refugee camps, his delegation would request the Secretary-General to submit a report to the Council on the situation in the camps rather than allowing the situation to deteriorate and leaving it to non-governmental organizations and journalists to assess the situation. If the countries that were affected by the refugee camps wished to demonstrate transparency, Rwanda would ask them to form an international commission to consider that question. As for the arms embargo imposed on the Government of Rwanda, which helped the criminals of the former Government, it was unfortunate that the new Government of National Unity had become the sole victim of that embargo, which was technically difficult to implement in the refugee camps, since the group there was not a political entity. His delegation requested that the Council urgently review its resolution 918 (1994), which was designed to address a particular situation. That situation and the government to which that resolution applied no longer existed, and the resolution therefore penalized a government that was struggling to ensure security for its people. The Rwandan people not only needed such a review, they had a right to it.¹⁹⁸

Decision of 17 July 1995 (3555th meeting):
resolution 1005 (1995)

At its 3555th meeting, on 17 July 1995, the Council resumed its consideration of the item. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Honduras) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution submitted by the United States.¹⁹⁹

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1005 (1995), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its previous resolutions 918 (1994) of 17 May 1994 and 997 (1995) of 9 June 1995,

Noting with concern that unexploded landmines constitute a substantial hazard to the population of Rwanda, and an impediment to the rapid reconstruction of the country,

Noting also the desire of the Government of Rwanda to address the problem of unexploded landmines, and the interest on the part of other States to assist with the detection and destruction of these mines,

Underlining the importance the Council attaches to efforts to eliminate the threat posed by unexploded landmines in a number of States, and the humanitarian nature of demining programmes,

Recognizing that safe and successful humanitarian demining operations in Rwanda will require the supply to Rwanda of an appropriate quantity of explosives for use in these operations,

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

Decides that, notwithstanding the restrictions imposed in paragraph 13 of resolution 918 (1994), appropriate amounts of explosives intended exclusively for use in established humanitarian demining programmes may be supplied to Rwanda upon application to and authorization by the Security Council Committee established pursuant to resolution 918 (1994).

Decision of 16 August 1995 (3566th meeting):

By a letter dated 5 July 1995 addressed to the President of the Council,²⁰⁰ the representative of Rwanda requested that the arms embargo on Rwanda be lifted to ensure the security of its population and to re-establish its full sovereignty. A country's self-defence was a sovereign right which neither the international community nor the Security Council should restrict. He therefore requested that the Council take urgent action to lift the arms embargo on Rwanda; request that the sanctions Committee on the arms embargo set up under resolution 918 (1994) to consider reports on arms transfers to the leaders, the militia and the soldiers of the former Government of Rwanda, as a matter of urgency, report thereon to the Council; prepare and adopt a resolution to restrict the rearming of the former genocidal Rwandese government leaders and forces regardless of where they were located; deploy United Nations monitors in Zaire with the purpose of restricting the militarization of Rwandan refugee camps in that country; and request Member States to implement resolution 978 (1995) as well as the presidential statement of 27 April 1995.

On 9 July 1995, pursuant to resolution 997 (1995), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the implementation of paragraph 6 of that resolution,²⁰¹ whereby the Council requested him to consult the Governments of the countries neighbouring Rwanda on the possibility of deployment of United Nations military observers in order to monitor the sale or supply of arms and materiel. The Secretary-General reported that he had appointed a Special Envoy to carry out the consultations and that the latter had visited the neighbouring countries from 20 to 28 June 1995. While many of the Governments consulted had taken the view that the primary responsibility lay with the Government of Rwanda, there had been general acknowledgement also of the value of action at the regional level. In some countries, however, there had been strong opposition to the deployment of United Nations observers as proposed in resolution 997 (1995). The Secretary-General indicated that he would explore further the positions of the Governments concerned during his visit to the region.

On 8 August 1995, pursuant to resolution 997 (1995), the Secretary-General submitted a progress report on UNAMIR.²⁰² The Secretary-General observed that, in the last 12 months, the Government of Rwanda had made efforts to stabilize conditions within the country, although the weakness of the economy and the lack of public revenue to run an effective administration continued to frustrate those efforts. Since the tensions on the country's borders could erupt in uncontrollable violence at any moment, the Government of Rwanda, the countries in the subregion and other members of the international community should address the vital issues confronting the country with a sense of urgency. It was imperative that representatives of all sectors of Rwandan society begin talks in order to reach an agreement on a constitutional and political structure to achieve lasting stability. The international community also had an important role to play in Rwanda's reconstruction and in encouraging repatriation and reconciliation. The Secretary-General noted that, in accordance with resolution 997 (1995), UNAMIR was taking the necessary steps to draw down its military presence in Rwanda and to implement its new mandate. In that connection, he urged the Government to ensure that visible measures were put in place to ensure respect for human rights and security for all Rwandan people and to continue to encourage the voluntary return of refugees. That would send a clear message to the international community that its assistance for reconstruction should be accelerated. The Secretary-General further noted that, during his visit to the subregion on 13 and 14 July, there was clear consensus among government leaders that instability in any State in the area could have a dramatic effect on all its neighbours. Strong interest was expressed in the establishment of an international commission under the auspices of the United Nations to address allegations of arms flows to former Rwandese government forces. He undertook to provide his recommendations in that regard to the Council shortly. In the meantime, as discussed with Heads of State and Government in the region, it might be useful to convene, at the earliest possible date, a regional meeting aimed at developing concrete measures to implement the commitments embodied in the Nairobi Summit declaration of January 1995, the Bujumbura Action Plan of February 1995 and the tripartite agreements signed by UNHCR, Rwanda and neighbouring countries hosting Rwandan refugees. He intended to continue intensive consultations on those proposals.²⁰³

At its 3566th meeting, on 16 August 1995, the Council included the reports of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representative of Zaire, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (Indonesia) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.²⁰⁴ He also drew the attention of the members of the Council to a letter dated 5 July 1995 from the representative of Rwanda addressed to the President of the Council²⁰⁵ and a note verbale dated 10 August 1995 from the Permanent Mission of Zaire addressed to the President of the Council.²⁰⁶ In the note verbale, the Government of Zaire, inter alia, opposed the lifting of the arms embargo on Rwanda, rejected the idea of redeploying military observers to Zaire; and reiterated its support for the setting up of an international commission of inquiry under United Nations auspices with a view to conducting investigations into the supply of weapons to the former Rwandan armed forces and to verifying allegations of destabilizing activities.

The representative of Zaire stressed that the compromise text of the draft resolution on lifting the embargo on Rwanda fell far short of Zaire's expectations, given the deterioration of the situation and the exacerbation of tension in the region. By suspending the embargo on the supply of arms to Rwanda for a trial period of one year, the Council would allow Rwanda to obtain military equipment and other modern, sophisticated war materiel at a time when it was barely concealing its warlike intentions and threatening to attack refugee camps in Zaire, and was not promoting a climate of understanding and national reconciliation but was, rather, encouraging new flows of refugees to Zaire, which had the appearance of the expulsion of Rwanda's own nationals for political, ethnic and tribal reasons. Even though the Council had included conditions in the text, adoption of the draft resolution would not contribute to easing tension in the region. In view of that situation, and in accordance with the General Assembly's Declaration on Territorial Asylum of 14 December 1967, Zaire was justified in derogating from the principle that refugees should not be subjected to measures such as refusal of entry at the border, or expulsion or deportation to another State where they might be persecuted, for overriding reasons of national security or in order to safeguard its population, as in the case of a mass influx of persons. He further stated that his country would like the Council to address the worsening situation on its eastern borders, adding that if the situation degenerated it would hold the Kigali and Bujumbura Governments responsible.²⁰⁷

²⁰³ Ibid., para. 45.

²⁰⁶ S/1995/683.

Speaking before the vote, the representative of Botswana recalled that the arms embargo imposed by resolution 918 (1994) was aimed at a Government which had planned, masterminded and presided over the mass execution of its own people. The embargo was, however, clearly being applied not only against the wrong Government but against the one that had stopped the genocide. It was equally true that the geopolitical and military situation in the Great Lakes subregion made it necessary for the Council to maintain the arms embargo for some time. He stressed that there was no deliberate intention on the part of the Council to punish Rwanda or its new Government. The primary concern was to stem the flow of arms to a volatile subregion which could easily be engulfed by military conflict and thus threaten international peace and security. However, recent developments had rendered the maintenance of the arms embargo politically untenable. He with a sense of urgency

further recalled that the Council had repeatedly reminded the Government of Rwanda that it had primary responsibility to create conditions conducive to national reconciliation. There could no longer be any justification for the continued denial to the Government of Rwanda of the wherewithal to defend itself and the people of Rwanda when a clear threat to the national security of the country existed. Rwanda, like every other State, had the legitimate right of self-defence. While the lifting of the arms embargo on Rwanda should not be misconstrued as licence for military preparations by anyone, his delegation hoped that the action of the Council would have a deterrent effect. The Council's message to the Government of Rwanda was also loud and clear. The return of the refugees was at the heart of Rwanda's problems. In that regard, the acquisition of defensive capability was only a temporary measure. The real solution would come with the return of the refugees, national reconciliation and durable peace in the country.²⁰⁸

According to the representative of Nigeria, the lifting of the arms embargo on Rwanda would not only enable the Government of Rwanda to defend itself and its citizens, but also serve to deter military adventurism from opponents of the Government from outside. If the Government of Rwanda was expected to take full responsibility for peace and security inside the country, it could not be denied the legitimate means with which to carry out that responsibility. Nonetheless, the Government of Nigeria was not unaware that introducing more weapons to an already volatile environment would have its own destabilizing effects. That was why the draft resolution incorporated safeguards to ensure that the weapons got only to the intended beneficiary and were put to the use to which a legitimate Government had a right, namely, self-defence. Furthermore, in order to ensure transparency and, more important, to assure the international community — particularly the neighbouring States — that the arms would be used solely for legitimate defensive purposes, the Council had agreed to a one-year trial period during which the restrictions would only be suspended. His delegation supported the proposal to establish a commission to conduct a full investigation of allegations of illegal arms flows into the subregion and looked forward to a termination of the arms embargo in the next 12 months. To make that possible, however, necessary steps in the areas of justice, national reconciliation and political accommodation would have to be undertaken by the Government of Rwanda, supported by the international community.²⁰⁹

The representative of the Russian Federation stated that the tasks of ensuring security and strengthening peace and stability in Rwanda and throughout the region could be fulfilled only through a careful and integrated approach to the elimination of the causes of conflict and tension. The Government of Rwanda, especially in the light of the imminent major reduction of the United Nations presence in that country, should be allowed to meet its own need for weapons within the limits of a sufficient defence capacity. At the same time, in the light of the fragile situation in Rwanda and in a number of neighbouring countries, it was important that that process take place under firm international control and that it proceed in accordance with an internal settlement and with the changes in the military and political situation in the Central African region. In parallel, measures should be taken to bring about cooperation with the Governments of the countries of the region to curb the illegal inflow of weapons and to prevent their delivery to forces of the former Government on the territory of neighbouring States, and also within the refugee camps. An important step in that direction might be the deployment of United Nations military observers on the territory of those countries, and the rapid establishment of a commission of inquiry into the illegal delivery of arms to armed units of the former Rwandese Government. However, such measures would not have their full effect in the long-term strengthening peace and security if priority was not given to peace negotiations. In that connection, the Russian Federation fully supported the idea of rapidly convening a regional conference on security, stability and development, and also of convening a regional meeting to solve problems related to the repatriation of refugees. It was extremely important to develop dialogue within Rwanda, with the participation of representatives of all sectors of the population of the country, and also through the efforts of the Government of Rwanda to strengthen conditions of stability and confidence that would ensure the return of refugees from neighbouring States.²¹⁰

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1011 (1995), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling all its previous resolutions on the situation in Rwanda, in particular its resolutions 918 (1994) of 17 May 1994, 997 (1995) of 9 June 1995 and 1005 (1995) of 17 July 1995,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 9 July 1995 on monitoring the restrictions on the sale or supply of arms,

Having also considered the progress report of the Secretary-General of 8 August 1995 on the United Nations Assistance Mission for Rwanda,

Emphasizing that the uncontrolled circulation of arms, including to civilians and refugees, is a major cause of destabilization in the Great Lakes region,

Welcoming the proposal of the Government of Zaire to establish an international commission under United Nations auspices to investigate reports of arms supplies to former Rwandese Government Forces,

Recognizing that the registration and marking of weapons are of considerable assistance in monitoring and enforcing restrictions on the illicit deliveries of weapons,

Noting with great concern reports of military preparations and increasing incursions into Rwanda by elements of the former regime and underlining the need for effective measures to ensure that Rwandan nationals currently in neighbouring countries, including those in camps, do not undertake military activities aimed at destabilizing Rwanda or receive arms supplies, in view of the great likelihood that such arms are intended for use within Rwanda,

Stressing the need for representatives of all sectors of Rwandan society, excluding those political leaders suspected of planning and directing the genocide last year, to begin talks in order to reach an agreement on a constitutional and political structure to achieve lasting stability,

Taking note of the letter dated 5 July 1995 from the Permanent Representative of Rwanda to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council, requesting urgent action to lift the restrictions on the sale or supply of arms and materiel to the Government of Rwanda to ensure the security of the Rwandan population,

Welcoming the improvement in the working relations between the Government of Rwanda and the Mission, and recalling the mandate of the Mission as adjusted in resolution 997 (1995), in particular to help achieve national reconciliation,

Recalling that the prohibition on the delivery of arms and materiel to Rwanda was originally aimed at stopping the use of such arms and equipment in the massacres of innocent civilians,

Taking note of the Council's decision in its resolution 997 (1995) to reduce the force level of the Mission, and reaffirming that the security of that country is the primary responsibility of the Government of Rwanda,

Deeply concerned by the situation in Rwanda's prisons and judicial system, particularly overcrowding, the lack of judges, detention of minors and elderly prisoners, and absence of speedy judicial or administrative review of charges, and in this respect, welcoming renewed efforts by the United Nations and donor countries, in coordination with the Government of Rwanda, to initiate, on an urgent basis, measures to improve this situation,

Underlining the need for increased efforts by the Government of Rwanda in the promotion of a climate of stability and trust in order to facilitate the return of Rwandan refugees in neighbouring countries,

A

1. Commends the efforts of the Secretary-General and his Special Envoy in pursuing regional responses to the problem of illicit arms supplies in the region, and encourages the Secretary-General to continue his consultations in this regard;

2. Requests the Secretary-General, as proposed in paragraph 45 of his report, to make recommendations to the Security Council, as soon as possible, on the establishment of a Commission mandated to conduct a full investigation to address allegations of arms flows to former Rwandese Government Forces in the Great Lakes region of Central Africa;

3. Calls upon the Governments of Rwanda and neighbouring States to cooperate with the commission's investigation;

4. Encourages the Secretary-General to continue his consultations with the Governments of neighbouring States concerning the deployment of United Nations military observers in the airfields and other transportation points in and around border crossing points and calls on the neighbouring States to cooperate with and assist those observers to ensure that arms and related materiel are not transferred to Rwandan camps within their territories;

5. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the Council within one month of the adoption of the present resolution on his efforts for the preparation and convening, at the earliest possible time, of the Regional Conference on Security, Stability and Development, as well as for the convening of a regional meeting to address the problems facing the repatriation of refugees;

6. Calls upon the Government of Rwanda to continue its efforts to create an atmosphere of trust and confidence for the safe return of refugees and take further steps to resolve the humanitarian problems in its prisons, and to expedite disposition of the charges against those detained;

B

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

7. Decides that, with immediate effect and until 1 September 1996, the restrictions imposed by paragraph 13 of resolution 918 (1994) shall not apply with regard to the sale or supply of arms and related materiel to the Government of Rwanda through named points of entry on a list to be supplied by that Government to the Secretary-General, who shall promptly notify all States Members of the United Nations of the list;

8. Decides also that on 1 September 1996 the restrictions imposed by paragraph 13 of resolution 918 (1994) on the sale or supply of arms and related materiel to the Government of Rwanda shall terminate, unless the Council decides otherwise after its consideration of the second report of the Secretary-General referred to in paragraph 12 below;

9. Decides further, with a view to prohibiting the sale and supply of arms and related materiel to non-governmental forces for use in Rwanda, that all States shall continue to prevent the sale or supply, by their nationals or from their territories or using their flag vessels or aircraft, of arms and related materiel of all types, including weapons and ammunition, military vehicles and equipment, paramilitary police equipment and spare parts, to Rwanda, or to persons in the States neighbouring Rwanda if such sale or supply is for the purpose of the use of such arms or materiel within Rwanda, other than to the Government of Rwanda as specified in paragraphs 7 and 8 above;

10. Decides that no arms or related materiel sold or supplied to the Government of Rwanda may be resold to, transferred to, or made available for use by, any State neighbouring Rwanda, or person not in the service of the Government of Rwanda, either directly or indirectly;

11. Decides also that States shall notify the Committee established pursuant to resolution 918 (1994) of all exports from their territories of arms or related materiel to Rwanda, that the Government of Rwanda shall mark and register and notify to the Committee all imports made by it of arms and related materiel, and that the Committee shall report regularly to the Council on notifications so received;

12. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the Council within six months of the date of adoption of the present resolution, and again within twelve months, regarding, in particular, the export of arms and related materiel referred to in paragraph 7 above, on the basis of the reports submitted by the Committee established by resolution 918 (1994);

13. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

After the vote, the representative of the United States stated that with the adoption of resolution 1011 (1995) the Government of Rwanda would be better able to deter violent action by militia or former army groups or, if necessary, defend the new Rwandan society. He noted that the Government of Rwanda had agreed to certain conditions, such as reporting its purchases to the Council, in order to assuage the concerns of Council members and neighbouring States. The United States fully supported Rwanda's right of self-defence, but underlined that an unwarranted stockpiling of arms should not take place. The speedy establishment of a commission of inquiry into allegations of arms flows to former Rwandan armed forces was also necessary for the reduction of tension and the creation of a climate of trust. He further stated that resolution 1011 (1995) underlined the expectation that the Government of Rwanda would shoulder all the responsibilities of an effective government, including creating the conditions of trust and confidence which were necessary for the safe and voluntary return of refugees. One key element in creating such a climate of trust was an immediate improvement in the overcrowded conditions of Rwandan prisons.²¹¹

The representative of France noted that his delegation had voted in favour of resolution 1011 (1995) in spite of questioning the timeliness of the decision. His Government understood that, from the legal standpoint, the Kigali authorities wished to regain full sovereignty. It was normal for a Government to request full exercise of its competence to ensure the security of its inhabitants, and for it to possess the means to do so. By suspending the embargo against Rwanda until 1 September 1996, the Council had complied with that request. Yet that decision should not be completely separated from the political context in Rwanda and in other countries of the region. Although the Kigali Government had made many efforts to promote normalization of the situation in Rwanda, the Secretary-General's report also stressed that many problems had only barely begun to be resolved. The speaker thought that the decision to lift the embargo would be an added deterrent, which was why he would have preferred a gradual lifting of the embargo that dealt on a priority basis with equipment for maintaining order, and especially for equipping the police and the gendarmerie. He hoped that the authorization granted to the Government of Rwanda to import weapons would be used in a measured, well-advised way, and that the additional flows of weapons would not increase tension among the countries of the region, as some signs seemed to indicate they would.

²¹¹ S/PV.3566, pp. 9-10.

The international community must continue to give its full support to the Kigali Government to enable it to complete the work of national reconciliation and reconstruction to which it had committed itself. Finally, his Government remained convinced that the rapid organization of a regional conference on peace, security and development would lay a solid, indispensable foundation for the restoration of stability in the Great Lakes region.²¹²

The representative of Rwanda stated that the fear in the Great Lakes region had not been created by weapons but, rather, by the impunity that prevailed there. He reiterated that there was no proliferation of arms in Rwanda, and stated that in Rwanda, the priority was not the purchase of weapons, but rather national reconstruction, the return of the refugees and the rebuilding of Rwandan society. Rwanda's main objective in submitting resolution 1011 (1995) was based on the principle of the sovereignty of the country and its right and duty to defend its population and its territory. It had no intention whatsoever of provoking a war against its neighbours. But the Government did not want to inherit an embargo which was imposed upon the genocide Government. He stated that the real danger for the region was the impunity that the international community seemed to be encouraging, which was a much greater danger than the weapons that were being acquired.²¹³

Speaking in his capacity as the representative of Indonesia, the President stressed that it was essential that the Government of Rwanda refrain from the use of arms and related materiel for any purposes other than legitimate purposes in accordance with international law, such as self defence. The resolution would enable Rwanda to take primary responsibility for maintaining its own security structure, independent of United Nations forces, in order to ensure peace and stability throughout the Great Lakes region. In that regard, it was of paramount importance that the countries surrounding Rwanda contribute to monitoring the arms flow in the region in order to prevent civilians or destabilizing forces in the region, especially refugees in Rwandan camps within their territories, from acquiring military materiel. Therefore, his delegation supported the establishment of a commission to investigate the alleged arms flow to former Rwandese government forces in the region. He stressed that the lifting of the embargo on the Government of Rwanda did not come without a measure of responsibility.²¹⁴

Decision of 23 August 1995 (3569th meeting):
statement by the President

By a letter dated 17 August 1995 addressed to the Secretary-General,²¹⁵ the Prime Minister of Zaire requested the latter to indicate to him the arrangements made at the United Nations level in relation to the new country or countries of asylum to which the Rwandan and Burundian refugees in Zaire should be evacuated. In the absence of any clear indication, the Government of Zaire intended to evacuate them to their country of origin at the expense of UNAMIR, the United Nations and the Governments of their respective countries. That decision was the logical sequel to the adoption of resolution 1011 (1995), its aim being to protect Rwanda against the alleged destabilization attempts by former members of the Rwandese armed forces and Rwandan refugees in neighbouring countries, including Zaire.

By a letter dated 18 August 1995 addressed to the Prime Minister of Zaire,²¹⁶ the Secretary-General made an urgent appeal that to the Government of Zaire to continue to provide assistance to the Rwandan and Burundian refugees.

At its 3569th meeting, on 23 August 1995, the Security Council included the above-mentioned letters in its agenda. After the adoption of the agenda, the President stated that, following consultations among members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:²¹⁷

The Council views with deep concern the forcible repatriation of Rwandan and Burundian refugees by the Government of Zaire and the increasingly tense situation in the region.

The Council takes note of the letter dated 17 August 1995 from the Government of Zaire to the Secretary-General and the Secretary-General's dated 18 August 1995, in which he urges the Government of Zaire to continue to provide assistance to Rwandan and Burundian refugees.

The Council considers that Zaire and the other States which have accepted refugees from Rwanda and Burundi make an important contribution, in spite of the considerable difficulties created for them thereby, to peace and stability in the region. Their contribution is of special importance in view of the genocide which took place in Rwanda and the possibility of further bloodshed in Burundi. The Council also notes the commitment of the Government of Rwanda to take the necessary steps to facilitate the safe return of its nationals as soon as possible and encourages it to continue its efforts in order to implement its undertakings in this respect.

The Council calls on the Government of Zaire to stand by its humanitarian obligations regarding refugees, including, those under the Convention relating to the Status of Refugees of 1951, and to reconsider and halt its declared policy of the forcible repatriation of refugees to Rwanda and Burundi.

The Council supports the decision by the Secretary-General to send the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees to the region to engage in urgent discussions with the Government of Zaire and neighbouring States with a view to resolving the situation. It encourages all Governments in the region to cooperate with the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees to achieve the voluntary and orderly repatriation of refugees. It also calls on the international community to provide all possible assistance to help care for the refugees.

Decision of 7 September 1995: letter from the President to the Secretary-General

By a letter dated 29 August 1995 addressed to the President of the Council,²¹⁸ the Secretary-General expressed his concern over recent developments in the Great Lakes Region. He reported that since the refoulement of Rwandese and Burundian refugees from Zaire, he had received assurances from the Government of Zaire that it would not pursue forcible repatriation of refugees. At his request, the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees was undertaking consultations with the Government of Zaire and other countries in the region to ensure the safe, voluntary and orderly repatriation of refugees. While the Prime Minister of Zaire had indicated that he wished the repatriation to be completed by 31 December 1995, the High Commissioner had made it clear that a policy of forcible repatriation would not solve the problem. The Secretary-General added, however, that the enormous economic, environmental and political burden which the presence of almost 2 million refugees placed on the Governments and peoples of Zaire, Tanzania and other countries in the region needed to be fully recognized. The Secretary-

General further reported that following his July visit to Rwanda, he had asked his Under-Secretary-General for Humanitarian Affairs to initiate measures to address the crisis arising as a result of prison conditions in Rwanda and the inability of the justice system to process the cases of those incarcerated. A United Nations mission had just returned from Rwanda and had prepared a two-pronged strategy to address that dual but closely related problem. The strategy would, on the one hand, enable immediate action to improve prison conditions and expand the prison capacity, and, at the same time, provide assistance to the Government of Rwanda to strengthen its justice system as well as to reinforce its commitment and capacity to implement a proper arrest and detention policy. The successful implementation of the strategy would require the full cooperation and support of the Government of Rwanda as well as the donor community. The Secretary-General had also taken steps to reinforce system-wide coordination structures in Burundi and Rwanda. Steps had also been taken to set up a Regional Integrated Information Unit, as recommended by the Inter-Agency Standing Committee, composed of all relevant humanitarian organizations and based at Nairobi, to enhance the international humanitarian community's capacity to develop and implement integrated approaches to address the problems of the region.

The Secretary-General further observed that a lasting solution of the crisis facing the Great Lakes region lay only in the early restoration of political stability and security in the countries of the region. In that connection, he had appointed his Special Envoy for the preparation and convening of the Conference on Peace, Security and Development in the Great Lakes Region called for in resolution 1011 (1995). He had also proposed the establishment of a Commission of Inquiry on the supply of arms to the region and, upon the concurrence of the Council he would dispatch a mission to the area and report further to the Council. The Human Rights Field Operation in Rwanda was concentrating on confidence-building measures aimed at promoting national reconciliation and a programme of technical assistance and advisory services designed principally for the rehabilitation of the Rwanda justice system. The Secretary-General was also concerned over the slow pace of progress in the establishment of the International Tribunal for Rwanda. He had asked the Chief Prosecutor to do his best to accelerate the work of the Tribunal and after his arrival in Rwanda on 30 August, the Secretary-General would report on the outcome of his visit to the region.

In a letter dated 7 September 1995,²¹⁹ the President of the Council (Italy) informed the Secretary-General of the following:

I have the honour to inform you that your letter dated 29 August 1995 concerning recent developments in Rwanda and the Great Lakes region has been brought to the attention of the members of the Security Council. They believe your letter provides a synopsis of political and humanitarian problems facing the region. They share your concern at the continued gravity of the situation and underline the need for a coordinated and effective response from the international community. The members of the Security Council therefore express their support for the initiatives you are undertaking, as described in your letter, and look forward to their implementation. The members of the Council will continue to monitor closely future developments in the area.

Decision of 7 September 1995 (3574th meeting):

By a letter dated 25 August 1995 addressed to the President of the Council,²²⁰ the Secretary-General, in accordance with resolution 1011 (1995), submitted his recommendations on the establishment of a Commission mandated to conduct a full investigation to address allegations of arms flows to former Rwandese government forces in the Great Lakes region. The proposed commission would collect information and investigate reports relating to the sale or supply of arms and related materiel to former Rwandese government forces in violation of the embargo imposed under resolutions 918 (1994) and 1011 (1995) and allegations that such forces were receiving military training in order to destabilize Rwanda; attempt to identify parties aiding or abetting the illegal acquisition of arms by those forces; and recommend measures to curb the illegal flow of arms in the subregion. States, international and other organizations and private individuals were to provide relevant information to the Commission and any other assistance that might be required. He recommended that Governments in whose territories investigations would be conducted should be requested to guarantee the safety and security of the members of the Commission and to ensure their freedom of movement and contacts. Governments concerned should respect the integrity and freedom of witnesses, experts and other persons who might be called by the Commission, including guaranteeing their security. The Commission would be composed of an eminent person, appointed by the Secretary-General, who would serve as Chairman, assisted by 5 to 10 legal, military and police experts and the appropriate support staff. He recommended that the Commission commence its work in Zaire.

At its 3574th meeting, on 7 September 1995, the Council included the letter of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representative of Zaire, at his request, to participate in the Council's discussion, without the right to vote. The President drew the attention of the members of the Council to a note verbale dated 10 August 1995 from the Permanent Mission of Zaire²²¹ and to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.²²²

The representative of Zaire recalled that his country had supported the establishment of the International Commission of Inquiry to address accusations levelled at Zaire by certain elements in the region. He was pleased that, despite the obstacles put in the way by some countries of the region, the Council was able, through the draft resolution, to get that Commission under way. But he pointed out that his country had nothing to hide, stressing that it did not expel refugees but rather authorized them to return to their country, as it was allowed to do under certain provisions. He hoped that the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees would submit her report promptly to the Council so that his Government could make clear its intentions vis-à-vis the situation of the refugees on its territory.²²³

Speaking before the vote, the representative of Nigeria stated that the proposal to establish a Commission to conduct a full investigation of allegations of arms flows to former Rwandese government forces, together with the efforts of the Secretary-General to convene a regional conference on security, stability and development in the Great Lakes region, represented a combined effort to tackle the problems of the area from a regional perspective. That approach was viable, given the Council's awareness that problems in either Rwanda or Burundi had the potential to destabilize the whole subregion. The draft resolution contained the elements — both technical and political — that were required to ensure that the Commission effectively discharged its functions. The proposals regarding the working methods and procedures of the Commission were generally in keeping with the character of such a body as an impartial entity. His delegation believed, however, that the Secretary-General should continue his consultations to convince all the States of the region of the desirability of that idea, possibly as part of the mandate of the Secretary-General's new Envoy who would be organizing the regional conference.²²⁴

The representative of Botswana noted that the draft resolution before the Council mainly resulted from reported violations of resolution 918 (1994). The flow of arms and related materiel to elements of the former Rwandan government forces gravely undermined stability and national reconciliation in Rwanda and constituted a serious threat to peace and security in the Great Lakes region. He noted also that the establishment of an International Commission of Inquiry perhaps represented the Council's last hope in its efforts to end the flow of arms. The significance and urgency of the work of the Commission and its contribution to peace and security in the region could not therefore be overemphasized in that regard. Its success hinged on the cooperation that it could receive from all concerned in the subregion and beyond.²²⁵

The representative of China agreed that the establishment of the Commission would be an important element in preventing renewed conflict in the region. His delegation hoped that the Commission would cooperate fully with the countries concerned, for only with their cooperation and support could it successfully carry out its mandate. It hoped therefore that the Commission, while exercising its rights, would see to it that the sovereignty of those countries was respected and that there was no interference in their internal affairs.²²⁶

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1013 (1995), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling all its previous resolutions on the situation in Rwanda, in particular its resolutions 918 (1994) of 17 May 1994, 997 (1995) of 9 June 1995 and 1011 (1995) of 16 August 1995,

Having considered the letter dated 25 April 1995 from the Secretary-General to the President of the Security Council on the establishment of a commission of inquiry,

Having considered also the note verbale of 10 August 1995 from the Government of Zaire to the President of the Security Council and welcoming the proposal of the Government of Zaire contained therein for the establishment under the auspices of the United Nations of an international commission of inquiry and its offer to assist such a Commission,

Recognizing that destabilizing influences in the Great Lakes region, including the illegal acquisition of arms, can be prevented by the cooperative efforts of all Governments concerned,

Expressing once again its grave concern at allegations of the sale and supply of arms and related materiel to former Rwandan government forces in violation of the embargo imposed under its resolutions 918 (1994), 997 (1995) and 1011 (1995), and underlining the need for Governments to take action to ensure the effective implementation of the embargo,

Underlining the importance of regular consultations between the Commission of Inquiry and the countries concerned, as appropriate, in view of the necessity to respect the sovereignty of States in the region,

1. Requests the Secretary-General to establish, as a matter of urgency, an International Commission of Inquiry, with the following mandate:

(a) To collect information and investigate reports relating to the sale or supply of arms and related materiel to former Rwandese Government Forces in the Great Lakes region in violation of Council resolutions 918 (1994), 997 (1995) and 1011 (1995);

(b) To investigate allegations that such forces are receiving military training in order to destabilize Rwanda;

(c) To identify parties aiding and abetting the illegal acquisition of arms by former Rwandese Government Forces, contrary to the Council resolutions referred to above;

(d) To recommend measures to end the illegal flow of arms in the region in violation of the Council resolutions referred to above;

2. Recommends that the Commission to be appointed by the Secretary-General be composed of five to ten impartial and internationally respected persons, including legal, military and police experts, under the chairmanship of an eminent person, and assisted by the appropriate support staff;

3. Calls upon States, relevant United Nations bodies, including the Security Council Committee established by resolution 918 (1994), and as appropriate, international humanitarian organizations, and non-governmental organizations, to collate information in their possession relating to the mandate of the Commission, and requests them to make this information available as soon as possible;

4. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the Council on the establishment of the Commission and to submit, within three months of its establishment, an interim report on the conclusions of the Commission and, as soon as possible thereafter, to submit a final report, containing its recommendations;

5. Calls upon the Governments of the States concerned in which the Commission will carry out its mandate to cooperate fully with the Commission in the fulfilment of its mandate, including responding positively to requests from the Commission for security, assistance, and access in pursuing investigations, inter alia, by:

(a) The adoption by them of any measures needed for the Commission and its personnel to carry out their functions throughout their respective territories with full freedom, independence, and security;

(b) The provision by them of all information in their possession which the Commission requests, or is otherwise needed to fulfil its mandate, and free access for the Commission and its staff to any relevant archives;

(c) The granting of freedom of access at any time, for the Commission and its staff to any establishment or place as they deem necessary for their work, including border points, airfields and refugee camps;

(d) The adoption of appropriate measures to guarantee the safety and security of the members of the Commission and guarantees from the Governments of full respect for the integrity, security and freedom of witnesses, experts and any other persons working with the Commission in the fulfilment of its mandate;

(e) The granting of freedom of movement to members of the Commission, including freedom to interview any person in private, at any time, as appropriate;

(f) The granting of relevant privileges and immunities in accordance with the Convention on the Privileges and Immunities of the United Nations;

6. Recommends that the Commission begin its work as soon as possible and to this end requests the Secretary-General to pursue his consultations with the countries of the region;

7. Calls upon all States to cooperate with the Commission in facilitating its investigations;

8. Encourages States to make voluntary contributions to the Trust Fund for Rwanda, established by the Secretary-General, as a supplement to financing the work of the Commission as an expense of the Organization, and to contribute equipment and services to the Commission through the Secretary-General;

9. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

After the vote, the representative of France stated that his Government was gratified that the Zaire initiative had led to the adoption of a resolution devoted to the establishment of the International Commission of Inquiry. He noted that since the adoption of resolution 918 (1994), many allegations had circulated regarding the assistance that the former Rwandese Government Forces continued to receive. Such allegations had largely contributed to maintaining in Central Africa an atmosphere of distrust, which in part explained the difficulties facing the international community in restoring peace and promoting national reconciliation in Rwanda and, more generally, in the Great Lakes region. It had therefore become essential to set up a Commission whose mandate would be to shed light, once and for all, on the many accusations that continued to poison relations between the countries of the region. His delegation hoped that the Commission would conclude its inquiry rapidly and with full impartiality. It also hoped that, on the basis of the facts that it gathered, the Commission would be able to recommend concrete measures to end illegal arms flows in the subregion.²²⁷

The representative of the United States noted that with the adoption of resolution 1013 (1995), the Council was taking the steps necessary to enforce the arms embargo on Rwanda. His delegation regretted Zaire's earlier decision to forcibly repatriate refugees, and trusted that it would not return to such drastic measures. At the same time, his delegation commended the Government of Zaire for taking the initiative to suggest the International Commission of Inquiry. Zaire's proposal was an important step in the development of resolution 1013 (1995), which would make a significant contribution to the effort to maintain peace in Central Africa and create the conditions for the voluntary return of refugees in dignity and safety. His delegation was especially pleased that the resolution empowered the Commission to go wherever necessary to gather evidence of possible arms transfers and military training. It believed that the Commission should conduct interviews and place observers at the places where illicit transfers were most likely to occur,

and explore allegations of suspicious activities in and around the reputed military camps of the former Rwandese armed forces.²²⁸

The representative of the United Kingdom stated that his country shared the widespread concern at continuing allegations that arms and related materiel had been reaching former Government forces and militias in the camps, since the activities of those elements represented a real threat to the security and stability of Rwanda, of Burundi, and of the whole Great Lakes region. His delegation hoped that the Commission would be able to establish an accurate picture of whether arms and related materiel were reaching the extremist elements, that is, the armed elements in the camps. Its findings would provide an objective basis for the consideration of possible measures to improve the monitoring and enforcement of the arms embargo established under resolution 918 (1994) and subsequent resolutions. He noted that it was very much in the interests of those countries in the region which had accepted large numbers of refugees to cooperate with the Commission.²²⁹

The representative of Rwanda stated that his delegation fully supported the contents of resolution 1013 (1995), noting that it was time that such a resolution was adopted in order to ensure respect for resolution 918 (1994), which was imposed on Rwanda and on countries that were engaged in violations. His delegation was of the view that any resolution aimed at verifying respect for the embargo must also fall under Chapter VII. Since that was not the case, the members of the Commission would not have a free hand in doing their verification and the result of their work might thereby be blunted. His delegation therefore felt that it was necessary to invoke Chapter VII in order to give resolution 1013 (1995) enough strength, just as it had been for the resolution whose implementation it was intended to verify. In conclusion, the speaker made the following comments: first, the problem of arms was woven into a fabric that could not be touched without referring to the impunity enjoyed by the criminals who had masterminded the genocide in Rwanda and had passed themselves off as refugees, while organizing the arming of the former Rwandan armed forces. The problem of arms was linked to that of the return of refugees: arming them created an atmosphere of tension which did nothing to facilitate their welcome in the country. Secondly, there had been more cooperation in armaments than in development. That situation concerned not only Rwanda, but other African countries, including Angola and Mozambique. It was high time for a resolution to be submitted — in the Council and/or in the General Assembly — demanding that “those countries that help Africans to kill each other be obliged to rebuild the countries that fall victim to this destructive cooperation”. His delegation recognized the right of any country, organization or corporation to sell arms to a State or give it military assistance, but it objected to those weapons being used to violate human rights.²³⁰

Decision of 17 October 1995 (3588th meeting):
statement by the President

On 7 October 1995, pursuant to resolution 997 (1995), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a progress report on UNAMIR.²³¹ The Secretary-General reported on the progress made by the Government of Rwanda in the reconciliation process, including the integration of more than 2,000 members of the former Rwandese Government Forces into the Rwandese Patriotic Army and the repatriation of some 13,000 Rwandese refugees. The Secretary-General stressed, however, that national reconciliation depended not only on the repatriation and safe reintegration of the refugees but also on the establishment of an effective and credible national judiciary. The judiciary had remained largely inoperative. It was vital in that regard to translate into concrete action the good intentions expressed by the Government of Rwanda regarding various recovery efforts, including, for instance, the appointment by the National Assembly of the Supreme Court. He also reported that in spite of some progress made, prison conditions continued to constitute a major humanitarian crisis. He had therefore requested the Under-Secretary-General for Humanitarian Affairs to initiate effective and urgent measures to alleviate the appalling situation in the prisons. Any sustained improvement in prison conditions over the long term, however, could be secured only through parallel action to help restore the Rwandese judicial system.

²³⁰ Ibid., pp. 9-10.

The security situation had been endangered by cross-border infiltration and sabotage, leading to countermeasures by the Government. As requested in resolution 1013 (1995), the Secretary-General was working to set up the International Commission of Inquiry to look into allegations of arms supplies to and training of former Rwandese government forces.

The Secretary-General remained convinced that long-term peace in Rwanda would continue to be elusive as long as large concentrations of Rwandese nationals remained encamped in neighbouring countries. He hoped that the International Commission of Inquiry would help defuse tensions and promote mutual confidence along Rwanda's borders. He also welcomed recent efforts to improve relations among the States in the region, which he thought should help pave the way for the proposed Regional Conference on Peace, Security and Development. The Secretary-General concluded by stating that, while Rwanda had made visible progress in its efforts to overcome the problems created by the tragic events of 1994, the country still had a long road to travel in its search for reconciliation and recovery.

At its 3588th meeting, on 17 October 1995, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Nigeria) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a letter dated 11 October 1995 addressed to the President of the Council from the representative of Kenya.²³² He then stated that, following consultations among members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:²³³

The Council has considered the report of the Secretary-General's on the United Nations Assistance Mission for Rwanda of 7 October 1995.

The Council welcomes progress made by the Government of Rwanda in the reconciliation process, including the integration of more than 2,000 members of the former Rwandese Government Forces into the Rwandese Patriotic Army. The Council calls on the Government of Rwanda to intensify its contacts with all sectors of Rwandan society, except with those directly responsible for the genocide. The Council reiterates its concern at reports about continuing cross-border infiltrations from neighbouring countries which have a destabilizing effect within Rwanda. The Council also reiterates its concern at the danger for peace and stability in the Great Lakes Region which would be caused by uncontrolled arms flows and in this context reaffirms the relevant provisions of its resolution 1013 (1995). The Council condemns all acts of violence in Rwanda. The Council welcomes the fact that the Government of Rwanda has voluntarily and without delay initiated an investigation into the killing of civilians at Kanama and expects that prosecution of those responsible will follow.

The Council calls again upon all States to act in accordance with the conclusions of the summit meeting of the leaders in the region in Nairobi in January 1995 and the recommendations by the Regional Conference on Assistance to Refugees, Returnees and Displaced Persons in the Great Lakes Region, held at Bujumbura from 15 to 17 February 1995. The Council welcomes recent efforts to improve relations among the States in the region, which should help pave the way for the proposed Regional Conference on Peace, Security and Development. In this regard, the Council supports the efforts of the Special Envoy of the Secretary-General to the Great Lakes region for the preparation and convening of such a conference. It requests the Secretary-General to submit his report on the results of the first round of consultations of the Special Envoy in the region as soon as possible.

The Council reaffirms the important role the Mission has played in Rwanda and the region. In this respect, the Council underlines its commitment to the Mission which, inter alia, assists the Government of Rwanda in facilitating the voluntary return and resettlement of refugees and has made available to the Rwandan authorities its engineering and logistics capacity. The Council underlines the fact that the Mission can effectively implement its current mandate only if it has an adequate force level and sufficient means. The Council stands ready to study carefully any further recommendations that the Secretary-General might make on the issue of force reductions in relation to the fulfilment of the mandate of the Mission.

The Council reaffirms its view that genuine reconciliation as well as long-lasting stability in the region as a whole cannot be attained without the safe, voluntary and organized return to their country of all Rwandan refugees. In this respect, the Council welcomes the joint efforts of Rwanda, neighbouring countries and the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees to speed up the voluntary return of refugees through, inter alia, the work of the Tripartite Commissions. The Council underlines that, in order to foster the process of national reconciliation, an effective and credible national judiciary has to be established. In this respect, it welcomes the appointment of the members of the Rwandan Supreme Court. The Council further underlines that the International Tribunal for Rwanda should begin its proceedings as soon as possible. The Council calls on Member States to comply with their obligations with regard to cooperation with the Tribunal in accordance with resolution 955 (1994). It urges once more all States to arrest and detain persons suspected of genocide and other serious violations of international humanitarian law in accordance with resolution 978 (1995). The Council underlines the necessity for the Tribunal to be fully financed, as a matter of priority, and for continued access to the Voluntary Trust Fund established for the Tribunal. The Council continues to support the work of human rights monitors in Rwanda in cooperation with the Rwandan Government.

The Council reaffirms its concern at the appalling situation in the Rwandan prisons. In this respect, it welcomes measures initiated by the Department of Humanitarian Affairs, in coordination with the international community and the Government of Rwanda, to alleviate the intolerable conditions in Rwandan prisons. It calls upon the international community to continue its assistance in this regard and encourages the Rwandan Government to continue its efforts to improve the situation in the prisons. The Council underlines the importance of parallel action by the Rwandan Government to restore the Rwandan judicial system and requests the international community to assist the Rwandan Government in this urgent task.

The Council underlines the fact that sound economic foundations are also vital for achieving lasting stability in Rwanda. In this respect, it welcomes the increased commitments and funds pledged for the Government's programme of national reconciliation and socio-economic rehabilitation and recovery following the mid-term review of the Geneva Round-Table Conference, and calls upon the international community to continue to support Rwanda's rehabilitation process.

The Council will remain seized of the matter.

Decision of 10 November 1995: letter from the President to the Secretary-General

In a letter dated 30 October 1995,²³⁴ pursuant to resolution 1011 (1995), the Secretary-General reported on his efforts and on those of his Special Envoy to prepare the Regional Conference on Security, Stability and Development in the Great Lakes Region of Central Africa. Following his return from the region where he had held high-level consultations with OAU and the Governments of Burundi, Ethiopia, Kenya, Rwanda, Uganda and the United Republic of Tanzania, his Special Envoy had reported to him that most of those Governments had supported the idea of a regional conference. However, the Government of Rwanda had expressed strong opposition to the idea of such a conference and the Government of Uganda had indicated that it was not keen to have the United Nations actively involved in that process. The Secretary-General stated that, notwithstanding those reservations, the United Nations would continue to monitor developments in the region and he would revert to the Council if conditions existed for the successful convening of a conference.

²³⁴ S/1995/945.

In a letter dated 10 November 1995,²³⁵ the President of the Council (Oman) informed the Secretary-General of the following:

The members of the Security Council have considered your letter of 30 October 1995 pursuant to paragraph 5 of Council resolution 1011 (1995) of 16 August 1995. They wish to give every possible support to all efforts to reduce tension and restore stability in the Great Lakes region. They are grateful for your efforts and those of your Special Envoy, Mr. José Luis Jesús, to prepare for the Regional Conference on Security, Stability and Development in the Great Lakes Region of Central Africa. They note the views expressed by the Governments of States in the region. They encourage you to continue your contacts with the aim of convening the conference.

Decision of 8 December 1995 (3604th meeting):
resolution 1028 (1995)

On 1 December 1995, pursuant to resolution 997 (1995), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a further report on UNAMIR,²³⁶ containing recommendations regarding the United Nations role after the conclusion of the Mission's mandate on 8 December 1995. The Secretary-General reported that a climate of relative security and stability had continued to prevail within Rwanda, despite the absence of any discernible effort towards national reconciliation. Some improvements in the socio-economic sectors had occurred, and the first effective steps towards the revival of the national judiciary system had been taken, with the appointment of the Supreme Court on 17 October. At the same time, the former Rwandese Government forces and armed militia had continued their infiltration and sabotage campaigns along the Zaire-Rwanda border. The Secretary-General believed that the main factor that prevented a return to stability, security and harmony in Rwanda was the absence of a process of national reconciliation, which depended on the creation of conditions conducive to the return of the 1.6 million refugees outside Rwanda, and for the judgement of those accused of genocide. Overall, while progress continued to be made within Rwanda on security and normalization, an atmosphere of tension and instability pervaded the region. In the absence of the necessary consensus among the Governments concerned on the convening of a regional conference, the Secretary-General indicated that the United Nations would continue to monitor developments in the region. He informed the Council that a summit attended by the Heads of State of Burundi, Rwanda, Uganda, Zaire and a special presidential envoy from the United Republic of Tanzania, was held in Cairo on 28 and 29 November 1995. The Cairo Declaration on the Great Lakes Region was issued, in which the parties pledged to take concrete actions to advance peace, justice, reconciliation, stability and development in the region.²³⁷

The Secretary-General reiterated that the core issue for Rwanda remained national reconciliation. That required the rapid creation of conditions that would facilitate the safe return of 1.6 million refugees to their homes in dignity and the bringing to justice of the perpetrators of genocide. The refugees had placed formidable socio-economic and environmental burdens on the host countries, and increasing infiltration and sabotage activities by the former Rwandese Government forces and militia had heightened tension both within Rwanda and between Rwanda and its neighbours. All those factors heightened the risk of forceful refoulement of the refugees. It was thus all the more important to address promptly the issue of the refugees' voluntary return and safe reintegration in their home communities. It was vital that neighbouring States support efforts to that end by demonstrating the political will to implement the existing agreements for refugee return contained in the Nairobi Declaration and the Bujumbura plan of action. In that connection, he noted that efforts to induce a large-scale refugee return would need to be viewed in a time frame extending over the next three to six months, taking account of the "commonality of interest" for the return of refugees that the High Commissioner for Refugees had noted after her visit to all the countries in the region. It was in that context that a large part of the international community believed that a further six-month extension of the mandate of UNAMIR was desirable. While UNAMIR's role could only be one of facilitation, and the principal responsibility for providing security and material support for the return of the refugees lay with the Government of Rwanda, the continued presence of UNAMIR could help to build confidence among the refugees and encourage them to take the decision to return. The Government of Rwanda, however, had officially informed the Secretary-General that it did not agree to an extension of UNAMIR's mandate beyond its expiration on 8 December 1995. However, the Government had indicated that it would be receptive to a continued United Nations presence, provided its purpose was to assist Rwanda in its pressing tasks of rehabilitation and reconstruction, including the provision of technical expertise, financial assistance and equipment. Since UNAMIR could not remain in Rwanda without the consent of the Government, the Secretary-General intended to initiate the drawdown of the operation as of 8 December 1995. The Secretary-General recalled that the overarching objective of the Organization was the restoration of peace and stability, not only in Rwanda, but in the region as a whole. That objective not only required solutions to the problems of reconciliation, justice and the return of refugees in Rwanda, but also meant tackling other problems that contributed to tension and instability in the Great Lakes region. He hoped, therefore, that continued progress in cooperation among the countries of the region would create the necessary conditions for the early achievement of such a solution. The Secretary-General recommended that the United Nations maintain a political presence in Rwanda after the withdrawal of UNAMIR. A United Nations office, headed by his Special Representative, could be established with a view to furthering, in consultation with the Government of Rwanda, the search for peace and stability through justice and reconciliation. His Special Representative would have overall authority for the coordination and expansion of the assistance that the United Nations and the international community were providing in support of Rwanda's rehabilitation and reconstruction efforts. Finally, referring to Rwanda's wish that non-lethal equipment belonging to UNAMIR be left to the Government after its departure, he noted that that was clearly an issue on which only the General Assembly could decide.²³⁸

At its 3604th meeting, on 8 December 1995, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Russian Federation) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a letter dated 30 November 1995 from the representative of Rwanda, addressed to the President of the Council,²³⁹ and a letter dated 8 December 1995 from the representative of Rwanda to the Secretary-General,²⁴⁰ transmitting the texts of two letters dated 13 August and

24 November 1995, respectively, from the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Rwanda. He also drew their attention to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.²⁴¹

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1028 (1995), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling all its previous resolutions on the situation in Rwanda, in particular its resolution 997 (1995) of 9 June 1995,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 1 December 1995 on the United Nations Assistance Mission for Rwanda,

1. Decides to extend the mandate of the United Nations Assistance Mission for Rwanda for a period expiring on 12 December 1995;
2. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Decision of 12 December 1995 (3605th meeting): resolution 1029 (1995)

At its 3605th meeting, on 12 December 1995, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General dated 1 December 1995 in its agenda.²⁴² Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representative of Canada, at his request, to participate in the Council's discussion, without the right to vote. The President drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.²⁴³

The representative of Canada stated that in view of the unstable situation prevailing in the Great Lakes region, his delegation would have viewed the renewal of UNAMIR's mandate, with its existing strength and composition, as a very modest but minimal and necessary stabilizing presence. It believed that UNAMIR's activities in assisting in confidence-building and in the peaceful and orderly repatriation of refugees still deserved the full support of the Government of Rwanda and of the international community. The Government of Rwanda had indicated, however, a growing reluctance to have a peacekeeping mission on its territory, in spite of the efforts by a number of countries to convince it that it was in its interest to maintain an effective peacekeeping operation in Rwanda. Moreover, it had sought to impose unacceptable and unworkable constraints on the continuation of UNAMIR. The troop reduction from 5,500 to 1,800 which was accepted by the Council in June was understood by the members of the Council, by the Secretariat and by troop contributors alike to be below the bare minimum for a credible mission. The further reduction of the strength of UNAMIR by one third, which the Council was about to decide, was an unfortunate development. It had allowed the Government of Rwanda to set its own conditions on the mandate and structure of the Mission, independent of expert advice as to what was required. The Council would also be compromising the integrity of a peacekeeping mission and the credibility of the Organization to fulfil the short-term, politically expedient requirement of retaining the Mission in place. Furthermore, UNAMIR would not be able to do the job which it was designed to accomplish. Past experiences had shown that politically motivated creative ambiguity, the willingness to endlessly compromise essential Mission elements, had repeatedly compromised the United Nations, the peacekeepers and the people and interests they were meant to protect. By creating false expectations about what UNAMIR could realistically achieve, the Council would be demonstrating that it had not yet fully absorbed lessons learned from the recent past in peacekeeping operations. In particular, the United Nations must be provided with the resources it needed to perform the tasks assigned by Member States — effectively by the members of the Council. If the Member States were not prepared to provide adequate resources, the United Nations should not be involved. In the case of Rwanda, where the Government was not prepared to accept the presence of a United Nations peace operation with the force structure necessary to accomplish its mandate, it would have been preferable to withdraw UNAMIR immediately, as the Secretary-General had indicated in his report that he intended to do. He concluded by stating that given the new force structure of a limited and possibly ineffective operation, Canada would have to consider its options carefully regarding its own participation in UNAMIR.²⁴⁴

Speaking before the vote, the representative of the United Kingdom stated that he believed that UNAMIR's continued presence, with its new mandate focusing on the issue of refugee return and on assisting

UNHCR in that process, would be the key to ensuring that the refugees returned home in conditions of dignity. Although that was the final extension of UNAMIR's mandate, his delegation also believed that the United Nations and the international community at large would continue to have an important role to play when UNAMIR left on 8 March 1996, and hoped that discussions could soon begin on a possible future role for the United Nations in restoring confidence and building stability in Rwanda.²⁴⁵

The representative of Botswana stressed that, in his delegation's view, the Cairo Conference was not intended to be a substitute for the regional conference proposed by the United Nations. The United Nations and OAU should continue their efforts aimed at enabling the Governments of the region to find common ground on an agenda for such a conference, recalling that the Council was unanimous in its recognition of the fact that Rwanda's difficulties had subregional dimensions that required political and diplomatic solutions. Turning to the draft resolution, he stated that, although pleased with the consensus text, Botswana's preference would have been for UNAMIR's mandate to be extended by a further six months, for the reasons stated in the Secretary-General's report.²⁴⁶

The representative of Nigeria stated that, while recognizing the progress made in Rwanda, his delegation remained concerned about the tense security situation, particularly along the country's borders. It hoped that the International Commission of Inquiry would complete its work soon and that its findings would enable the Council to find ways of addressing the problems. Concerning the problem of the refugees, Nigeria believed that repatriation must be voluntary, safe and orderly, which inevitably carried a regional dimension. In that connection, it was the view of his delegation that the Cairo Conference, useful as it was, could not be a substitute for a United Nations conference co-sponsored by OAU. It therefore requested the Secretary-General to continue his consultations with the countries of the region in order to find a basis for the holding of such a conference. The speaker further stated that the concern of the Government of Rwanda that the existing mandate of UNAMIR was not well suited to the needs of the Government and people for reconstruction, rehabilitation and rebuilding had much merit. Nonetheless, given the efforts that had been exerted to ensure the second deployment of UNAMIR and since UNAMIR still could make useful contributions to improving the overall situation in Rwanda, his delegation did not want UNAMIR's mandate to be terminated abruptly. It was pleased therefore that the draft resolution provided a basis for the renewal and continuation of UNAMIR, with a mandate that was appropriate to the realities in Rwanda. It would therefore vote in favour of the draft resolution, on the understanding, however, that even when UNAMIR's mandate expired on 8 March 1996, the continued presence of the United Nations would be necessary.²⁴⁷

According to the representative of Germany, the revised mandate of UNAMIR reflected the progress made within Rwanda towards stability and security. On the basis of the draft resolution, UNAMIR continued to have a mandate which allowed effectively to assist in the process of repatriation of refugees. Moreover, with the adoption of the draft resolution, the Council would decide upon the request of the Government of Rwanda to withdraw UNAMIR after 8 March 1996. His Government would have preferred not to decide as yet on the end of UNAMIR's mission, but it respected the wish of the Rwandan Government. He noted further that while UNAMIR continued to provide protection for the International Tribunal for Rwanda, the Government of Rwanda had insisted that it alone would provide protection for other international personnel. In that regard, his delegation would have liked a mandate with a longer term and a larger UNAMIR force since international agencies and non-governmental organizations on the ground would not be able to carry out their humanitarian and reconstruction tasks unless their safety was ensured.²⁴⁸

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 1029 (1995), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling all its previous resolutions on the situation in Rwanda, in particular its resolution 872 (1993) of 5 October 1993 by which it established the United Nations Assistance Mission for Rwanda, and its resolutions 912 (1994) of 21 April 1994, 918 (1994) of 17 May 1994, 925 (1994) of 8 June 1994,

965 (1994) of 30 November 1994 and 997 (1995) of 9 June 1995, which set out the mandate of the United Nations Assistance Mission for Rwanda,

Recalling its resolution 955 (1994) of 8 November 1994, establishing the International Criminal Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Genocide and Other Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of Rwanda and Rwandan Citizens Responsible for Genocide and Other Such Violations Committed in the Territory of Neighbouring States, between 1 January 1994 and 31 December 1994, and its resolution 978 (1995) of 27 February 1995, concerning the necessity for the arrest of persons suspected of committing genocide in Rwanda,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 1 December 1995,

Taking note of the letters dated 13 August and 24 November 1995 from the Minister of Foreign Minister of Rwanda to the Secretary-General,

Stressing the importance of the voluntary and safe repatriation of Rwandan refugees and of genuine national reconciliation,

Noting with great concern continuing reports of military preparations and incursions into Rwanda by elements of the former regime, underlining the need for effective measures to ensure that Rwandan nationals currently in neighbouring countries, including those in camps, do not undertake military activities aimed at destabilizing Rwanda or receive arms supplies, in view of the great likelihood that such arms are intended for use within Rwanda, and welcoming, in this context the establishment of the International Commission of Inquiry pursuant to its resolution 1013 (1995) of 7 September 1995,

Underlining the need for increased efforts to assist the Government of Rwanda in the promotion of a climate of confidence and trust in order to facilitate the return of Rwandan refugees in neighbouring countries,

Emphasizing the necessity for the accelerated disbursement of international assistance for the rehabilitation and reconstruction of Rwanda,

Welcoming the summit of heads of State of the Great Lakes Region, held in Cairo on 28 and 29 November 1995 and the Declaration issued by the Summit on 29 November,

Emphasizing the importance of all States acting in accordance with the recommendations adopted by the Regional Conference on Assistance to Refugees, Returnees and Displaced Persons in the Great Lakes Region held at Bujumbura from 15 to 17 February 1995, and those contained in the Cairo Declaration on the Great Lakes Region,

Commending the Government of Rwanda's continuing efforts to maintain peace and security as well as to reconstruct and rehabilitate the country,

Recognizing the valuable contribution that the human rights officers deployed by the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights to Rwanda have made towards the improvement of the overall situation,

Acknowledging the responsibility of the Government of Rwanda for the safety and security of all Mission personnel and other international staff serving in the country,

1. Decides to extend the mandate of United Nations Assistance Mission for Rwanda for a final period until 8 March 1996;

2. Decides also, in the light of current efforts to restore peace and stability through the voluntary and safe repatriation of Rwandan refugees, to adjust the mandate of the Mission so that the Mission will:

(a) Exercise its good offices to assist in achieving the voluntary and safe repatriation of Rwandan refugees within the frame of reference of the recommendations of the Bujumbura Conference and the Cairo summit of the heads of State of the Great Lakes region, and in promoting genuine national reconciliation,

(b) Assist the Government of Rwanda in facilitating the voluntary and safe return of refugees and, to this end, to support the Government of Rwanda in its ongoing efforts to promote a climate of confidence and trust through the performance of monitoring tasks,

(c) Assist the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees and other international agencies in the provision of logistical support for the repatriation of refugees,

(d) Contribute, with the agreement of the Government of Rwanda, to the protection of the International Criminal Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Genocide and Other Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of Rwanda and Rwandan Citizens Responsible for Genocide and Other Such Violations Committed in the Territory of Neighbouring States, between 1 January 1994 and 31 December 1994, as an interim measure until alternative arrangements agreed with the Government of Rwanda can be put in place,

3. Requests the Secretary-General to reduce the force level of the Mission to 1,200 troops to carry out the mandate set out in paragraph 2 above;

4. Also requests the Secretary-General to reduce the number of military observers, headquarters and other military support staff to 200;

5. Further requests the Secretary-General to initiate planning for the complete withdrawal of the Mission after the expiry of the present mandate, that withdrawal to take place within a period of six weeks after the expiry of the mandate;

6. Requests the Secretary-General to withdraw the civilian police component of the Mission;

7. Also requests the Secretary-General to examine, in the context of existing United Nations regulations, the feasibility of transferring non-lethal equipment of the Mission, as elements of the Mission withdraw, for use in Rwanda;

8. Takes note of the cooperation existing between the Government of Rwanda and the Mission in the implementation of its mandate and urges the Government of Rwanda and the Mission to continue to implement the status-of-mission agreement of 5 November 1993 and any subsequent agreement to replace that agreement in order to facilitate the implementation of the new mandate;

9. Calls upon the Government of Rwanda to take all necessary measures to ensure that Mission personnel and equipment that are scheduled to withdraw can do so in an orderly and safe manner;

10. Commends the efforts of States, United Nations agencies and non-governmental organizations which have provided humanitarian assistance to refugees and displaced persons in need, encourages them to continue such assistance, and calls upon the Government of Rwanda to continue to facilitate their delivery and distribution;

11. Calls upon States and donor agencies to fulfil their earlier commitments to give assistance for Rwanda's rehabilitation efforts, to increase such assistance, and in particular to support the early and effective functioning of the International Tribunal for Rwanda and the rehabilitation of the Rwandan justice system;

12. Also calls upon States to cooperate fully with the International Commission of Inquiry established pursuant to resolution 1013 (1995);

13. Encourages the Secretary-General and his Special Representative to continue to coordinate the activities of the United Nations in Rwanda, including those of the organizations and agencies active in the humanitarian and developmental field, and of the human rights officers;

14. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the Council by 1 February 1996 on the discharge by the Mission of its mandate and progress towards repatriation of refugees;

15. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

After the vote, the representative of the United States noted that the situation in Rwanda had changed significantly over the course of the presence of UNAMIR. However, the situation in the region still faced instability, due to the presence of over a million refugees just over Rwanda's borders. The United States believed that UNAMIR could play an important role in facilitating the voluntary and safe return of refugees to their former homes in Rwanda. To that end, the mandate of UNAMIR had been refocused on the range of tasks it could perform to help smooth the way for the refugees' repatriation. Another element in bringing about the return of the refugees and national reconciliation was the work of the International Tribunal for Rwanda. It was vitally important that the Tribunal had a sense of security needed to continue its impartial investigations and prosecutions. The duties of UNAMIR must therefore continue to include assisting in the protection of the Tribunal's personnel and premises until alternate arrangements were operational. The United States also expected UNAMIR to continue to assist the humanitarian agencies as the need arose. United Nations forces had the right — indeed, the obligation — to come to the aid of other United Nations and other international personnel in times of need. The speaker further stated that following the departure of UNAMIR, the United Nations would need to retain a strong presence in Rwanda to provide the assistance in reconstruction, rehabilitation, justice and political reconciliation that was needed there. He concluded by stating that the last three months of UNAMIR's mandate should be used to put into place a non-military logistics lifeline to sustain the various United Nations agencies and non-governmental organizations which had benefited from the presence of UNAMIR's extensive logistics and communications network.²⁴⁹

The representative of France stated that his delegation had voted in favour of resolution 1029 (1995), but had done so without fully supporting it. While his Government had taken note of the positive developments that were taking place, it remained true that Rwanda and the Great Lakes region continued to face very serious problems. Because UNAMIR had so far played a positive role, his Government had hoped that the operation would remain in place to carry out the tasks entrusted to it by the Council. Although his Government would have preferred not to take a decision as yet to end the operation in March 1996, the Government of Rwanda had taken a different decision. France noted that decision but hoped that the ultimate departure of the United Nations would not coincide with a deterioration in the situation in that part of Africa. In that regard, his Government believed that it would be even more necessary for the United Nations to play a role in Rwanda once UNAMIR had departed, and urged the Government of Rwanda to be flexible in the negotiations with the Secretariat on that question.²⁵⁰

The representative of Rwanda stated that national reconciliation was in progress. The new Government of Rwanda, with the cooperation of a large number of Member States, had been able to accomplish a great deal in the past few months, in spite of an acute lack of resources and limited and conditional support from some sectors of the international community. It had been able to establish a climate of security and stability within the country. Much progress had been made in economic and social rehabilitation, and the recent appointment of Supreme Court judges by the National Assembly had contributed to the revival of the national judicial system. However, despite the tremendous efforts of the Government of Rwanda, problems remained, including bringing the perpetrators of genocide to justice, both nationally and internationally; putting an end to infiltration and sabotage by the former Rwandese armed forces along Rwanda's western border; the intimidation of refugees in the refugee camps; and the economic and social reconstruction of Rwanda. UNAMIR could not and was not expected to respond to any of those priorities. Nevertheless, the Government of Rwanda had appreciated the assistance provided by the Mission. UNAMIR's departure would leave a gap in terms of transportation and logistical support in areas of need in Rwanda. For that reason, based on precedents in the case of Cambodia and other United Nations peacekeeping missions, the Government of Rwanda had requested the donation of some of UNAMIR's non-lethal equipment upon UNAMIR's departure. Such a donation would be a gesture of good will on the part of Member States and the Secretariat. The speaker further stated that the Government of Rwanda was willing to extend the presence of UNAMIR for three months on condition that its mandate be adjusted accordingly. During that period and later, the Government would continue to ensure the security of all persons in Rwanda, including United Nations personnel. Additional measures had already been agreed on between the Government of Rwanda and the International Tribunal to ensure the protection of the Tribunal personnel. Any other needs in the area of security would be considered by the Government of Rwanda, as appropriate.²⁵¹

6. The situation in Somalia

Decision of 26 March 1993 (3188th meeting): resolution 814 (1993)

On 3, 11 and 22 March 1993, pursuant to resolution 794 (1992) of 3 December 1992, the Secretary-General submitted a further report on Somalia.¹ In his report, the Secretary-General described his efforts to implement resolution 794 and introduced his plan for the transition from the United Task Force (UNITAF) to the United Nations Operation in Somalia (UNOSOM II). The Secretary-General reported that the situation in many parts of the country remained complex and tense, especially in rural areas and along Somalia's borders with Ethiopia and Kenya. The recent murders of relief workers had highlighted the extreme fragility of the security situation, in spite of the presence of large numbers of military forces. They had also highlighted again the importance of a secure environment for the effective delivery of emergency relief and rehabilitation assistance. Pointing out that the needs of Somalia were immense and urgent, the Secretary-General outlined three major challenges in 1993, which were to facilitate the voluntary return of 300,000 refugees and internally displaced persons; to provide jobs for the many millions unemployed; and to assist in national capacity-building, since national and regional Somali institutions and civil administration had virtually ceased to exist. To achieve those objectives, the United Nations, in close cooperation with relevant organizations of the United Nations system and international non-governmental organizations, as well as Somali representatives, were putting together a humanitarian programme for 1993. The Secretary-General called upon donors to support that programme at the United Nations Humanitarian Conference, to be held in Addis Ababa from 11 to 13 March 1993.

The Secretary-General warned that the proliferation of landmines in Somalia could severely hamper humanitarian efforts. In that regard, he intended to establish a coherent and integrated programme for the removal of mines in Somalia. He stated that a mine awareness programme should also be established among refugees and displaced persons.

With regard to political reconciliation, the Secretary-General reported that he had continued to promote efforts towards such reconciliation in cooperation with the regional organizations. However, his efforts had been hindered by the circumstances prevailing in Somalia, including the non-existence of a government, the multiplicity of parties, factions and leaders, and the absence of law and order in all parts of the country. The major political development since his last report had been the convening in Mogadishu, after significant delays, of the Ad Hoc Committee to resolve the criteria for participation at, and the agenda of, the National Reconciliation Conference. The Committee had met on 23 and 27 February and adopted a report on participation, the draft agenda and decision-making procedures. The Somali National Alliance had submitted reservations regarding the criteria for participation. The Secretary-General pointed out that it was essential to maintain the momentum gained in Addis Ababa, at the informal meeting for a Conference on National Reconciliation and Unity, on 4 January 1993, and to proceed with the convening of the conference. In that regard, he informed the Council of his intention to invite a broad cross-section of Somalis to participate in the conference, to ensure that the validity and decisions of the Conference would be recognized by the Somali public at large.

The Secretary-General reiterated his view that without improved security throughout the country, the political process could not prosper and humanitarian operations would remain vulnerable to disruption. Acknowledging that UNITAF had made an important contribution in that regard, he pointed out, however, that recent events on the ground had demonstrated that the situation was still volatile, that a secure environment had not yet been established and that there was still a threat to international peace and security. Therefore, the Council should be prepared to ensure that UNOSOM II was fully in a position to carry out its tasks. The mandate of UNOSOM II, as set out in his report,² would confer authority for appropriate action, including enforcement action as necessary, to establish throughout Somalia a secure environment for humanitarian assistance. To that end, UNOSOM II would seek to complete, through disarmament and reconciliation, the task begun by UNITAF for the restoration of peace, stability, law and order. The mandate would also empower UNOSOM II to assist the Somali people in rebuilding their shattered economy and social and political life, re-establishing the country's institutional structure, achieving national political reconciliation, recreating a Somali State based on democratic governance, and rehabilitating the country's economy and infrastructure. The Secretary-General also underlined that there must be a smooth transition from UNITAF to UNOSOM II. The deployment of UNOSOM II would be at his discretion, as well as that of his Special Representative and the Force Commander, acting under the authority of the Security Council and would have to cover the whole country, including its borders, in order to control the movement of refugees, prevent the illicit introduction of arms into Somalia, and avoid destabilization of the neighbouring countries. Furthermore, Member States should be encouraged to monitor and report violations of the arms embargo. The Secretary-General maintained that the political will to achieve security, reconciliation and peace must spring from the Somalis themselves. Even if UNOSOM II were authorized to resort to forceful action, it could not and must not be expected to substitute itself for the Somali people, nor could or should it use its authority to impose one system or another of governmental organization. It should, however, be in a position to press for the observance of United Nations standards of human rights and justice. The Secretary-General concluded by saying that UNOSOM II would be the first operation of its kind to be authorized by the international community. It would also be an answer of the international community to the universally shared concern that the situation in Somalia, though primarily of a domestic nature, could affect the peace and stability of the entire region.

At its 3188th meeting, on 26 March 1993, the Security Council included in its agenda the further report of the Secretary-General of 3, 11 and 22 March 1993. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representative of Somalia, at her request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (New Zealand) then drew the attention of the Council members to the text of a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations³ and read out a revision made to the draft. He also drew attention to several other documents⁴ and two reports of the Secretary-General, of 19 December 1992 and 26 January 1993, on the situation in Somalia, submitted in pursuance of resolution 794 (1992) of 3 December 1992.⁵

In his report of 19 December 1992, the Secretary-General had recalled that the Council had accepted his advice that the traditional peacekeeping model was not suitable to the Somali situation and, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, had adopted resolution 794 (1992), entrusting to certain Member States, on a temporary basis, the responsibility for creating a secure environment for the unimpeded delivery of humanitarian assistance. The Secretary-General had set out, in his report of 19 December 1992, his ideas for a new mandate for UNOSOM and the modalities for effecting the transition from UNITAF to continued peacekeeping operations. In doing so, he had pointed out that the UNITAF had been on the ground for only 10 days and that it was too early to make an evaluation of its success and of the resources that would be required to enable UNOSOM to maintain a secure environment for humanitarian operations. Therefore, the plan submitted could only be regarded as a conceptual plan. Moreover, no decision should be taken on the proposed approach until the situation on the ground in Somalia had become clear.

In his report of 26 January 1993, the Secretary-General had reported, inter alia, on his efforts to promote national reconciliation in Somalia. The major development had been the convening of an informal preparatory meeting for a conference of national reconciliation and unity on Somalia, in Addis Ababa, from 4 to 15 January 1993, in which the three following agreements were concluded: (a) General Agreement of 8 January 1993; (b) Agreement on implementing the ceasefire and on modalities of disarmament; and (c) Agreement on the establishment of an ad hoc committee to help resolve the criteria for participation at and the agenda for the national reconciliation conference. The meeting had also agreed on the convening of a national reconciliation conference in Addis Ababa on 15 March 1993.

Speaking before the vote, the representative of Djibouti described Somalia as a modern anomaly, a land with no effective mechanism for governance. There were no financial institutions, government offices, schools, hospitals, police, military or political organs of government. In his view, reconstructing Somalia would entail many critical choices which had to be made by the Somalis themselves. He remained optimistic that available skilled and trained Somali manpower could be lured to participate in the reconstruction. The vital question the international community faced was the manner in which that could be best achieved. He suggested in that regard that its role was, perhaps, at bottom, to provide a secure basis for Somalia's institutional re-emergence. Turning to the draft resolution, the speaker expressed his belief that it sufficiently reflected the mandate, as well as the resources, desired by the Secretary-General to fulfil his responsibilities. He noted in that regard the attention given to matters of transition and coordination between UNITAF and UNOSOM II, the continuing need to realize full and effective disarmament and pacification, to refocus the Council priorities from humanitarian aid to rebuilding and reconstruction, and to help the Somali people achieve political governance.⁶

The representative of the United States contended that, by adopting the draft resolution, the members of the Council would signify that it was time for the United Nations to resume its rightful leadership role in restoring peace to Somalia and in creating conditions for Somalis to choose their own future. She noted that the Council would be embarking on an unprecedented enterprise aimed at the restoration of an entire country as a functioning and viable member of the community of nations. She further noted that the draft resolution would engage the world community to provide the most comprehensive assistance ever given to any country, but to do so with few lessons and no models to guide its path. Meanwhile the Secretary-General had to oversee the continued ceasefire, disarmament, the maintenance of security, further relief and humanitarian assistance, reconstruction and economic renewal, refugee repatriation, the creation of civilian administration, and political reconciliation.⁷

The draft resolution, as orally revised in its provisional form, was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 814 (1993), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolutions 733 (1992) of 23 January 1992, 746 (1992) of 17 March 1992, 751 (1992) of 24 April 1992, 767 (1992) of 27 July 1992, 775 (1992) of 28 August 1992 and 794 (1992) of 3 December 1992,

Bearing in mind General Assembly resolution 47/167 of 18 December 1992,

Commending the efforts of Member States acting pursuant to resolution 794 (1992) to establish a secure environment for humanitarian relief operations in Somalia,

Acknowledging the need for a prompt, smooth and phased transition from the Unified Task Force to the expanded United Nations Operation in Somalia,

Regretting the continuing incidents of violence in Somalia and the threat they pose to the reconciliation process,

Deploing the acts of violence against persons engaging in humanitarian efforts on behalf of the United Nations, States, and non-governmental organizations,

Noting with deep regret and concern the continuing reports of widespread violations of international humanitarian law and the general absence of the rule of law in Somalia,

Recognizing that the people of Somalia bear the ultimate responsibility for national reconciliation and reconstruction of their own country,

Acknowledging the fundamental importance of a comprehensive and effective programme for disarming Somali parties, including movements and factions,

Noting the need for continued humanitarian relief assistance and for the rehabilitation of Somalia's political institutions and economy,

Concerned that the crippling famine and drought in Somalia, compounded by the civil strife, have caused massive destruction of the means of production and the natural and human resources of that country,

Expressing its appreciation to the Organization of African Unity, the League of Arab States, the Organization of the Islamic Conference and the Movement of Non-Aligned Countries for their cooperation with, and support of, the efforts of the United Nations in Somalia,

Also expressing its appreciation to all Member States which have made contributions to the fund established pursuant to paragraph 11 of resolution 794 (1992) and to all those who have provided humanitarian assistance to Somalia,

Commending the efforts, in difficult circumstances, of the initial United Nations Operation in Somalia established pursuant to resolution 751 (1992),

Further expressing its appreciation for the invaluable assistance the neighbouring countries have been providing to the international community in its efforts to restore peace and security in Somalia and to host large numbers of refugees displaced by the conflict, and noting the difficulties caused to them by the presence of refugees in their territories,

Convinced that the restoration of law and order throughout Somalia would contribute to humanitarian relief operations, reconciliation and political settlement, as well as to the rehabilitation of Somalia's political institutions and economy,

Convinced also of the need for broad-based consultations and deliberations to achieve reconciliation, agreement on the setting up of transitional government institutions and consensus on basic principles and steps leading to the establishment of representative democratic institutions,

Recognizing that the re-establishment of local and regional administrative institutions is essential to the restoration of domestic tranquillity,

Encouraging the Secretary-General and his Special Representative to continue and intensify their work at the national, regional and local levels, including and encouraging broad participation by all sectors of Somali society, to promote the process of political settlement and national reconciliation and to assist the people of Somalia in rehabilitating their political institutions and economy,

Expressing its readiness to assist the people of Somalia, as appropriate, on a local, regional or national level, to participate in free and fair elections, with a view towards achieving and implementing a political settlement,

Welcoming the progress made at the United Nations-sponsored informal preparatory meeting on Somali political reconciliation held at Addis Ababa from 4 to 15 January 1993, in particular the conclusion at that meeting of three agreements by the Somali parties, including movements and factions, and welcoming also any progress made at the Conference on National Reconciliation which began in Addis Ababa on 15 March 1993,

Emphasizing the need for the Somali people, including movements and factions, to show the political will to achieve security, reconciliation and peace,

Taking note of the reports of States concerned of 17 December 1992 and 19 January 1993 and of the reports of the Secretary-General of 19 December 1992 and 26 January 1993 on the implementation of resolution 794 (1992),

Having examined the further report of the Secretary-General of 3, 11 and 22 March 1993,

Welcoming the intention of the Secretary-General to seek maximum economy and efficiency and to keep the size of the United Nations presence, both military and civilian, to the minimum necessary to fulfil its mandate,

Determining that the situation in Somalia continues to threaten peace and security in the region,

A

1. Approves the further report of the Secretary-General of 3, 11 and 22 March 1993;

2. Expresses its appreciation to the Secretary-General for convening the Conference on National Reconciliation for Somalia in accordance with the agreements reached during the informal preparatory meeting on Somali political reconciliation in Addis Ababa in January 1993 and for the progress achieved towards political reconciliation in Somalia, and also for his efforts to ensure that, as appropriate, all Somalis, including movements, factions, community leaders, women, professionals, intellectuals, elders and other representative groups are suitably represented at such conferences;

3. Welcomes the holding of the Third United Nations Coordination Meeting for Humanitarian Assistance for Somalia at Addis Ababa from 11 to 13 March 1993 and the willingness expressed by Governments through this process to contribute to relief and rehabilitation efforts in Somalia, where and when possible;

4. Requests the Secretary-General, through his Special Representative and with assistance, as appropriate, from all relevant United Nations entities, offices and specialized agencies, to provide humanitarian and other assistance to the people of Somalia in rehabilitating their political institutions and economy and promoting political settlement and national reconciliation, in accordance with the recommendations contained in his report of 3 March 1993, including in particular:

(a) Assistance in the provision of relief and in the economic rehabilitation of Somalia, based on an assessment of clear, prioritized needs and taking into account, as appropriate, the 1993 Relief and Rehabilitation Programme for Somalia prepared by the Department of Humanitarian Affairs of the Secretariat;

(b) Assistance in the repatriation of refugees and displaced persons within Somalia;

(c) Assistance to help the people of Somalia to promote and advance political reconciliation, through broad participation by all sectors of Somali society, and the re-establishment of national and regional institutions and civil administration in the entire country;

(d) Assistance in the re-establishment of Somali police, as appropriate at the local, regional or national level, to assist in the restoration and maintenance of peace, stability and law and order, including in the investigation and facilitating the prosecution of serious violations of international humanitarian law;

(e) Assistance to the people of Somalia in the development of a coherent and integrated programme for the removal of mines throughout Somalia;

(f) Development of appropriate public information activities in support of the United Nations activities in Somalia;

(g) Creation of conditions under which Somali civil society may have a role, at every level, in the process of political reconciliation and in the formulation and realization of rehabilitation and reconstruction programmes;

B

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

5. Decides to expand the size of the force of the United Nations Operation in Somalia and its mandate in accordance with the recommendations contained in paragraphs 56 to 88 of the report of the Secretary-General of 3 March 1993 and the provisions of the present resolution;

6. Authorizes the mandate for the expanded Operation for an initial period through 31 October 1993, unless previously renewed by the Security Council;

7. Emphasizes the crucial importance of disarmament and the urgent need to build on the efforts of the Unified Task Force in accordance with paragraphs 56 to 69 of the report of the Secretary-General of 3 March 1993;

8. Demands that all Somali parties, including movements and factions, comply fully with the commitments they have undertaken in the agreements they concluded at the informal preparatory meeting on Somali political reconciliation at Addis Ababa, and in particular with their agreement on implementing the ceasefire and on modalities of disarmament;

9. Also demands that all Somali parties, including movements and factions, take all measures to ensure the safety of the personnel of the United Nations and its agencies as well as the staff of the International Committee of the Red Cross, intergovernmental organizations and non-governmental organizations engaged in providing humanitarian and other assistance to the people of Somalia in rehabilitating their political institutions and economy and promoting political settlement and national reconciliation;

10. Requests the Secretary-General to support from within Somalia the implementation of the arms embargo established by resolution 733 (1992), utilizing as available and appropriate the forces of the expanded Operation authorized by the present resolution, and to report on this subject, with any recommendations regarding more effective measures if necessary, to the Security Council;

11. Calls upon all States, in particular neighbouring States, to cooperate in the implementation of the arms embargo established by resolution 733 (1992);

12. Also requests the Secretary-General to provide security, as appropriate, to assist in the repatriation of refugees and the assisted resettlement of displaced persons, utilizing Operation forces, paying particular attention to those areas where major instability continues to threaten peace and security in the region;

13. Reiterates its demand that all Somali parties, including movements and factions, immediately cease and desist from all breaches of international humanitarian law, and reaffirms that those responsible for such acts be held individually accountable;

14. Further requests the Secretary-General, through his Special Representative, to direct the Force Commander of the Operation to assume responsibility for the consolidation, expansion and maintenance of a secure environment throughout Somalia, taking account of the particular circumstances in each locality, on an expedited basis in accordance with the recommendations contained in his report of 3 March 1993, and in this regard to organize a prompt, smooth and phased transition from the Unified Task Force to the expanded Operation;

15. Requests the Secretary-General to maintain the fund established pursuant to resolution 794 (1992) for the additional purpose of receiving contributions for maintenance of forces of the expanded Operation following the departure of forces of the Unified Task Force and for the establishment of Somali police, and calls on Member States to make contributions to this fund, in addition to their assessed contributions;

16. Expresses appreciation to the United Nations agencies, intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations and the International Committee of the Red Cross for their contributions and assistance and requests the Secretary-General to ask them to continue to extend financial, material and technical support to the Somali people in all regions of the country;

17. Also requests the Secretary-General to seek, as appropriate, pledges and contributions from States and others to assist in financing the rehabilitation of the political institutions and economy of Somalia;

18. Further requests the Secretary-General to keep the Security Council fully informed on action taken to implement the present resolution, in particular to submit to the Council as soon as possible a report containing recommendations for establishment of Somali police forces and thereafter to report no later than every ninety days on the progress achieved in accomplishing the objectives set out in the present resolution;

19. Decides to conduct a formal review of the progress towards accomplishing the purposes of the present resolution no later than 31 October 1993;

20. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of China stated that his country was in favour of the United Nations taking strong, exceptional measures in Somalia, in accordance with the Secretary-General's recommendations and at the request of most of the African countries, so as to establish a secure environment for humanitarian assistance, and to create conditions for the final settlement of the Somali question. Authorizing UNOSOM II to take enforcement action under Chapter VII of the Charter, in order to implement its mandate, had made it the first operation of its kind in the history of United Nations peacekeeping. He cautioned, however, that it was his delegation's understanding that such an authorization was based on the needs of the unique situation in Somalia and that it should not constitute a precedent for United Nations peacekeeping operations. He further cautioned that UNOSOM II should act prudently in carrying out such enforcement action and suggested that once the situation in Somalia had improved, it should promptly resume its normal peacekeeping operations.⁸

Noting that satisfactory security conditions had not yet been restored, the representative of France stressed that it was essential that UNOSOM II have the necessary mandate and resources to carry out its mission and to take the necessary steps to improve security. That presupposed that the factions were disarmed in a resolute manner and that the Task Force was deployed throughout Somalia. The Government of France was happy that the resolution just adopted was along the lines of those concerns, and in particular, that a substantial part of the resolution, in accordance with the Secretary-General's recommendations, fell under Chapter VII of the Charter. In adopting the resolution, the United Nations was undertaking an operation that was unprecedented both in its scope and in terms of the situation in which it was intervening, namely the absence of governmental authority and institutions in Somalia.⁹

The representative of the Russian Federation stated that his delegation had voted for the resolution

just adopted on the basis that the mandate of UNOSOM II focused on ensuring safe conditions for the supply of emergency humanitarian assistance, inter alia, by disarming the Somali armed formations. The Russian Federation also attached great importance to strengthening the embargo established by the Security Council on arms supplies to Somalia and considered it important that all States strictly carry out that decision of the Council.¹⁰

The President, speaking in his capacity as the representative of New Zealand, pointed out that the first priority was to complete the process of disarming started by UNITAF and contended that progress towards political reconciliation and economic recovery in Somalia depended upon the creation of sustainable peace and security. His delegation therefore supported the particular emphasis in the resolution on disarming, and believed it was important to define the new parties that were to be disarmed.¹¹

Decision of 6 June 1993 (3229th meeting):

By a letter dated 5 June 1993 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹² the representative of Pakistan requested an urgent meeting of the Council to discuss developments in Somalia, where a Pakistani contingent of UNOSOM II had been attacked, resulting in the deaths of at least 18 Pakistani peacekeepers. By a letter of the same date,¹³ the representative of Italy joined Pakistan in requesting an immediate meeting of the Council.

At its 3229th meeting, on 6 June 1993, the Security Council included the two letters in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Spain) drew the attention of the Council members to the text of a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.¹⁴

Before the vote, the representative of Pakistan stated that Pakistan would vote in favour of the draft resolution because it had been associated with the peacekeeping efforts of the United Nations since its inception, and it regarded peacekeeping as a manifestation of its commitment to the concept of collective security and to the Charter of the United Nations. He noted that the recent casualties were by far the highest ever sustained in any single incident in the history of United Nations peacekeeping operations and warned that “mere admonition or condemnation” was not enough. It was imperative that the Council act in a manner that would swiftly bring to justice the perpetrators of that “murderous defiance” of the Council’s authority.¹⁵

The representative of the United States contended that the actions against UNOSOM II threatened international peace and security and had to be dealt with accordingly. She further stated that factional violence was impermissible under the terms of resolution 814 (1993) and that hostilities aimed at United Nations forces were a gross violation of paragraph 9 of that resolution. The United States supported the draft resolution as the minimum required to restore the conditions for peace and reconciliation in Somalia. The draft reaffirmed the authority of UNOSOM II to take strong and forceful action to safeguard international forces, to punish those who attacked them and to restore security. She warned that those who would challenge the authority of the Council to enforce its resolutions “must know that we stand firm in our resolve to bring peace and reconciliation to Somalia and that they will pay a heavy price for ignoring the Council”.¹⁶

The representative of Cape Verde stated that the time had come for the Council to consider the mechanisms and measures to be implemented to halt and reverse the negative trend that seemed to have been set by attacks launched against United Nations forces in many conflict areas, and he urged that, whether in Somalia, in Cambodia or in Bosnia, attacks against United Nations forces should be sternly condemned, and prompt and effective measures should be taken to try and punish their authors.¹⁷

The representative of Djibouti observed that the situation in Somalia called for a careful and determined approach to disarm all factions and movements, to collect all weapons, and to inculcate a sense of security. He noted that UNOSOM II had both the capacity and the authority to enforce peace in Somalia, and stated that it should therefore be tough and punish anyone who violated “civilized behaviour” and who “unduly” incited others to commit acts of intransigence and violence. He further stated that his delegation regarded the draft resolution as an appropriate response to the incident.¹⁸

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and was adopted unanimously as resolution 837 (1993), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolutions 733 (1992) of 23 January 1992, 746 (1992) of 17 March 1992, 751 (1992) of 24 April 1992, 767 (1992) of 27 July 1992, 775 (1992) of 28 August 1992, 794 (1992) of 3 December 1992 and 814 (1993) of 26 March 1993,

Bearing in mind General Assembly resolution 47/167 of 18 December 1992,

Gravely alarmed at the premeditated armed attacks launched by forces apparently belonging to the United Somali Congress/Somali National Alliance against the personnel of the United Nations Operation in Somalia II on 5 June 1993,

Strongly condemning such actions, which directly undermine international efforts aimed at the restoration of peace and normalcy in Somalia,

Expressing outrage at the loss of life as a result of these criminal attacks,

Reaffirming its commitment to assist the people of Somalia in re-establishing conditions of normal life,

Stressing that the international community is involved in Somalia in order to help the people of Somalia who have suffered untold miseries due to years of civil strife in that country,

Acknowledging the fundamental importance of completing the comprehensive and effective programme for disarming all Somali parties, including movements and factions,

Convinced that the restoration of law and order throughout Somalia would contribute to humanitarian relief operations, reconciliation and political settlement, as well as to the rehabilitation of Somalia’s political institutions and economy,

Condemning strongly the use of radio broadcasts, in particular by the United Somali Congress/Somali National Alliance, to incite attacks against United Nations personnel,

Recalling the statement made by the President of the Security Council on 31 March 1993 concerning the safety of United Nations forces and personnel deployed in conditions of strife, and committed to consider promptly measures appropriate to the particular circumstances to ensure that persons responsible for attacks and other acts of violence against United Nations forces and personnel are held to account for their actions,

Noting the information provided to the Council by the Secretary-General on 6 June 1993,

Determining that the situation in Somalia continues to threaten peace and security in the region,

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

1. Strongly condemns the unprovoked armed attacks against the personnel of the United Nations Operation in Somalia II on 5 June 1993, which appear to have been part of a calculated and premeditated series of ceasefire violations to prevent by intimidation the Operation from carrying out its mandate as provided for in resolution 814 (1993);

2. Expresses its condolences to the Government and people of Pakistan and the families of the Operation personnel who have lost their lives;

3. Re-emphasizes the crucial importance of the early implementation of the disarmament of all Somali parties, including movements and factions, in accordance with paragraphs 56 to 69 of the report of the Secretary-General of 3 March 1993, and of neutralizing radio broadcasting systems that contribute to the violence and attacks directed against the Operation;

4. Demands once again that all Somali parties, including movements and factions, comply fully with the commitments they have undertaken in the agreements they concluded at the informal preparatory meeting on Somali political reconciliation at Addis Ababa, and in particular with their agreement on implementing the ceasefire and on modalities of disarmament;

5. Reaffirms that the Secretary-General is authorized under resolution 814 (1993) to take all measures necessary against all those responsible for the armed attacks referred to in paragraph 1 above, including against those responsible for publicly inciting such attacks, to establish the effective authority of the Operation throughout Somalia, including to secure the investigation of their actions and their arrest and detention for prosecution, trial and punishment;

6. Requests the Secretary-General urgently to inquire into the incident, with particular emphasis on the role of those factional leaders involved;

7. Encourages the rapid and accelerated deployment of all Operation contingents to meet the full requirements of 28,000 men, all ranks, as well as equipment, as indicated in the report of the Secretary-General of 3 March 1993;

8. Urges Member States to contribute, on an emergency basis, military support and transportation, including armoured personnel carriers, tanks and attack helicopters, in order to provide the Operation the capability appropriately to confront and deter armed attacks directed against it in the accomplishment of its mandate;

9. Also requests the Secretary-General to submit a report to the Council on the implementation of the present resolution, if possible within seven days from the date of its adoption;

10. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

After the vote, the representative of China expressed his delegation's strong demand that the Secretary-General investigate the incident. He supported UNOSOM II taking practical and effective measures immediately to protect the lives and safety of its personnel. Meanwhile, his delegation demanded in the strongest terms that the various factions in Somalia comply strictly with the relevant Security Council resolutions and cease all hostilities and violent acts against United Nations peacekeeping personnel.¹⁹

The representative of Venezuela argued that the absence of any judicial machinery had permitted the leader of the United Somali Congress (USC), General Mohamed Farah Aidid, to continue to act with "total impunity". He contended that, with confirmation of his responsibility for the attacks against UNOSOM II, Aidid's impunity would end, because the Secretary-General, apart from ordering his arrest and detention, would be able to proceed to try him so that he may later be punished appropriately. He observed that the resolution just adopted made it clear that the international community would not allow such criminal acts to be committed with impunity. The resolution was a warning to those in Cambodia and in the former Yugoslavia, who thought that they would never have to answer for their crimes.²⁰

The representative of France stated that what had just taken place in Somalia was unacceptable and required from the Council the strongest possible reaction. He contended that the resolution was fully in accord with that objective. He further contended that UNOSOM II was, in effect, entrusted with adopting all necessary measures against those responsible and also with neutralizing their media, whose propaganda he described as having played a decisive role in the tragedy that took place on 5 June 1993.²¹

¹⁹ Ibid., pp. 14-15.

²⁰ Ibid., pp. 16-17.

²¹ Ibid., pp. 18-20.

The representative of the United Kingdom stated that the resolution sent a clear signal that the international community would not tolerate renewed attempts by the warlords in Somalia to challenge UNOSOM II in the exercise of its mandate. He observed that the resolution provided for the use of all necessary measures against those responsible, whether directly or indirectly, for the attacks, and that it looked to their arrest and detention for prosecution, trial and punishment. He further stated that the warlords of USC, and their head General Aidid, had to understand that the United Nations would not be diverted from its purpose in Somalia, any more than in the other theatres in which United Nations peacekeeping forces were committed.²²

The representative of the Russian Federation stated that his delegation believed it necessary for the Security Council to give special consideration to the question of defending United Nations peacekeeping personnel from premeditated attacks, whether in Somalia, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Cambodia, or other parts of the world. He indicated the Russian delegation's intention to would shortly present to the Council concrete proposals about such crimes against the international community.²³

President to the Secretary-General

In a letter dated 27 August 1993,²⁴ the President, referring to the Secretary-General's report of 17 August 1993 submitted in pursuance of resolution 814 (1993) of 26 March 1993, concerning the action taken to implement that resolution, in particular recommendations for the establishment of Somali police forces, and on the progress achieved in accomplishing the objectives set out in the resolution, informed the Secretary-General that the members of the Council had taken note of his report and that they intended to study it as a basis for a possible course of action in the near future.

Decision of 22 September 1993 (3280th meeting): resolution 865 (1993)

On 17 August 1993, pursuant to resolution 814 (1993) of 26 March 1993, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a further report on the situation in Somalia.²⁵ The report covered the activities of UNOSOM up to 31 July 1993 and provided a brief account of the progress made towards the re-establishment of the Somali police force, judicial and penal systems.

The Secretary-General noted that, despite the deliberate attempts of the leaders of a few Somali factions to obstruct UNOSOM from performing the tasks assigned by the Security Council, the overall situation in Somalia had undergone a major transformation. Following the establishment of UNOSOM II, conditions in most parts of the country had stabilized, humanitarian assistance was reaching its destinations, people were going about their normal routines, and schools were reopening. Land was being tilled, crops planted, and livestock exported. Local councils of clan elders were meeting and cooperating with the United Nations efforts to help Somalia to re-establish normal conditions. He further noted that the situation in Somalia contrasted starkly with that at the beginning of 1993, when the Somali people had been suffering from the effects of a brutal civil war that had claimed hundreds of thousands of innocent Somali lives.

The Secretary-General observed that a major task that had fallen to UNOSOM, after it took over responsibility from UNITAF, was the disarmament of the armed groups who had terrorized the people and made extortion from humanitarian assistance agencies the source of their considerable income. He noted that there was strong support for the United Nations role in Somalia from the Organization of African Unity (OAU), the League of Arab States (LAS) and the Organization of the Islamic Conference (OIC), in particular for the need to take appropriate measures to ensure the implementation of the disarmament provisions of the Addis Ababa Agreement. The priority that UNOSOM had given to disarmament had attracted the hostility of a few clan leaders. The ambushing of UNOSOM personnel by such elements, on 5 June 1993 and on subsequent occasions, had left UNOSOM no choice but to take forceful action to effect the disarming required under the Addis Ababa Agreement. The Secretary-General stated that he was conscious of the feeling in some quarters that UNOSOM was deviating from its primary task of ensuring the safe

²⁴ S/26375.

distribution of humanitarian assistance, rehabilitation and reconstruction of Somalia, and was concentrating disproportionate efforts and resources in military operations. He contended, however, that unless disarmament was fully implemented, it would not be reasonable to expect UNOSOM to fulfil the other aspects of its mandate. The country would not enjoy complete stability unless and until the criminal elements had been apprehended and brought to justice, as demanded by the Security Council in resolution 837 (1993).

The Secretary-General also observed that a high priority for UNOSOM was its assistance to the political reconciliation process. District councils had been formed, and efforts would continue in order to form the regional councils and the Transitional National Council as quickly as possible. UNOSOM had also sponsored the reconciliation meetings of clan elders in various regions in Somalia, where the effects were apparent in the restoration of stable and secure conditions, in stark contrast with the suffering from inter-clan conflict. He expressed the hope that those successes would encourage peaceful reconciliation in other parts of the country.

The Secretary-General stated that the restoration of security and stability to Somalia required the re-establishment of the Somali police force, the judicial system and the penal system, in order to enable Somalis quickly to assume full responsibility for law and order in their country. He recalled, in that regard, that the Conference on National Reconciliation in Somalia held at Addis Ababa in March 1993 had agreed, inter alia, on the “need to establish an impartial national and regional Somali police force in all regions of the country on an urgent basis through the reinstatement of the former Somali Police Force and recruitment and training of young Somalis from all regions”, and requested “the assistance of the international community” in that regard. The Addis Ababa Agreement also provided for the Transitional National Council to establish an “independent judiciary”. Following an assessment of the security situation, the Secretary-General introduced a proposed strategy regarding the re-establishment of the police, judicial and penal systems in Somalia. The strategy envisaged the creation of a neutral three-tier (national, regional and district) police force of 10,000 by December 1994, an interim three-tier judicial system by 31 October 1993, renovation and re-establishment of prison facilities and the establishment of an Office of Human Rights to investigate and facilitate prosecution of serious violation of international humanitarian law. It was therefore imperative and urgent that donor Governments make resources available, in the form of funds, training assistance and efficacious transitory arrangements.

At its 3280th meeting, on 22 September 1993, the Security Council included in its agenda the report of the Secretary-General of 17 August 1993. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representative of Somalia, at her request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. At the same meeting the President (Venezuela) drew the attention of the Council members to the text of a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council’s prior consultations,²⁶ and read out a revision to be made to the draft resolution in its provisional form. He also drew the attention of the Council members to two other documents.²⁷

Before the vote, the representative of Djibouti expressed regret that the events transpiring in Mogadishu had captured the headlines and thereby distorted the impressive nature of Somalia’s steady return to normalcy. He noted that implementation of the comprehensive peace accords signed in Addis Ababa was steadily under way and that a transitional national council was intended to serve as the prime political authority during the two-year transition period, supported by a structure of regional and district councils. He warned that the Secretary-General’s rehabilitation programme would not have lasting significance unless the threat of violence was removed. He supported the reference in the draft resolution to the Secretary-General’s intention to convene, as early as possible, a meeting of Member States interested in supporting UNOSOM II in the re-establishment of Somalia’s police, judicial and penal system. It would be helpful to all concerned to receive from the Secretary-General a detailed plan covering the future strategy of UNOSOM II.²⁸

²⁸ S/PV.3280, pp. 7-8.

The draft resolution, as orally revised in its provisional form, was then put to the vote and was adopted unanimously as resolution 865 (1993), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolutions 733 (1992) of 23 January 1992, 746 (1992) of 17 March 1992, 751 (1992) of 24 April 1992, 767 (1992) of 27 July 1992, 775 (1992) of 28 August 1992, 794 (1992) of 3 December 1992, 814 (1993) of 26 March 1993 and 837 (1993) of 6 June 1993,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 17 August 1993,

Stressing the importance of continuing the peace process initiated by the Addis Ababa Agreement of 27 March 1993, and in this connection welcoming the efforts of African countries, the Organization of African Unity, in particular its Horn of Africa Standing Committee, the League of Arab States and the Organization of the Islamic Conference, in cooperation with and in support of the United Nations, to promote national reconciliation in Somalia,

Also stressing the commitment of the international community to help Somalia regain a normal, peaceful life, while recognizing that the people of Somalia bear the ultimate responsibility for national reconciliation and reconstruction of their own country,

Expressing its appreciation for the improvements in the overall situation, which have been achieved by the United Nations Operation in Somalia II, in particular the eradication of starvation, the establishment of a large number of district councils, the opening of schools and the resumption by the Somali people in most areas of the country of their normal lives,

Recognizing the continuing need for broad-based consultations and consensus on basic principles to achieve national reconciliation and the establishment of democratic institutions,

Calling upon all Somali parties, including movements and factions, to show the political will to achieve reconciliation, peace and security,

Also recognizing that the highest priority for the Operation is to assist the people of Somalia in the furtherance of the national reconciliation process and to promote and advance the re-establishment of regional and national institutions and civil administration in the entire country, as set out in resolution 814 (1993),

Noting with great concern, despite the improvements in the overall situation in Somalia, continuing reports of violence in Mogadishu and the absence of law enforcement and judicial authorities and institutions in the country as a whole, and recalling the request to the Secretary-General in resolution 814 (1993) to assist in the re-establishment of the Somali police and the restoration and maintenance of peace, stability and law and order,

Convinced that the re-establishment of the Somali police and the judicial and penal systems is critical for the restoration of security and stability in the country,

Gravely concerned at the continuation of armed attacks against Operation personnel, and recalling resolution 814 (1993), in which it emphasized the fundamental importance of a comprehensive and effective programme for disarming Somali parties, including movements and factions,

A

1. Welcomes the reports by the Secretary-General and his Special Representative on the progress achieved in accomplishing the objectives set out in resolution 814 (1993);

2. Commends the Secretary-General, his Special Representative and all personnel of the United Nations Operation in Somalia II for their achievements in greatly improving the conditions of the Somali people and beginning the process of nation-building apparent in the restoration in much of the country of stable and secure conditions, in stark contrast with the prior suffering caused by inter-clan conflict;

3. Condemns all attacks on Operation personnel and reaffirms that those who have committed or have ordered the commission of such criminal acts will be held individually responsible for them;

4. Affirms the importance it attaches to the successful fulfilment on an urgent and accelerated basis of the Operation's objectives of facilitation of humanitarian assistance and the restoration of law and order, and of national reconciliation in a free, democratic and sovereign Somalia, so that it can complete its mission by March 1995;

5. Requests, in that context, the Secretary-General to direct the urgent preparation of a detailed plan with concrete steps setting out the Operation's future concerted strategy with regard to its humanitarian, political and security activities and to report thereon to the Council as soon as possible;

6. Urges the Secretary-General to redouble his efforts at the local, regional and national levels, including encouraging broad participation by all sectors of Somali society, to continue the process of national reconciliation and political settlement, and to assist the people of Somalia in rehabilitating their political institutions and economy;

7. Calls on all Member States to assist, in all ways possible, including the urgent full staffing of the Operation's civil positions, the Secretary-General, in conjunction with regional organizations, in his efforts to reconcile the parties and rebuild Somali political institutions;

8. Invites the Secretary-General to consult the countries of the region and regional organizations concerned on means of further reinvigorating the reconciliation process;

B

9. Approves the recommendations of the Secretary-General contained in annex I to his report of 17 August 1993 relating to the re-establishment of the Somali police, judicial and penal systems in accordance with resolution 814 (1993), and requests the Secretary-General to take the necessary steps on an urgent and accelerated basis to implement them;

10. Welcomes the Secretary-General's intention to convene at the earliest possible date a meeting of Member States interested in supporting the United Nations Operation in Somalia II in the re-establishment of the police, judicial and penal systems, for the purpose of determining specific requirements and identifying specific sources of support;

11. Requests the Secretary-General to undertake actively and as a matter of great urgency an international recruiting programme for staffing the Operation's Justice Division with police, judicial and penal system specialists;

12. Also welcomes the Secretary-General's intention to maintain and utilize the fund established pursuant to resolution 794 (1992), and maintained in resolution 814 (1993), for the additional purpose of receiving contributions for the re-establishment of the Somali judicial and penal systems in addition to the establishment of the Somali police, other than for the cost of international staff;

13. Urges Member States, on an urgent basis, to contribute to that fund or otherwise to provide assistance for the re-establishment of the Somali police, judicial and penal systems, including personnel, financial support, equipment and training to help attain the objectives outlined in annex I to the report of the Secretary-General;

14. Encourages the Secretary-General to take the necessary steps to ensure continuation of the current police, judicial and penal programme from October to the end of December 1993 until additional funding from Member States is forthcoming, and to make recommendations as appropriate to the General Assembly;

15. Requests the Secretary-General to keep the Council fully informed on a regular basis on the implementation of the present resolution;

16. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

After the vote, the representative of France stressed that Somalia would not return to the path of peace and democracy as long as in certain parts of the country heavily armed factions continued their reign of terror and persisted in attacking United Nations soldiers who had come to that country to carry out a mission of peace. It was also fitting to recall that the long-term objective of the United Nations in Somalia was a fundamentally political and humanitarian one: the United Nations had intervened to re-establish peace and democracy in Somalia and to assist in its reconstruction. The time had come to relaunch the process of national reconstruction and to take the initiative in bringing all Somalis together around a political plan.²⁹

The representative of United Kingdom contended that the re-establishment of the police and the judiciary and a proper penal system clearly had a crucial role to play if the Council was to be able to hand over the running of Somalia to the Somali people and their representatives. He stated that the plans were good, but that they needed further refinement if that goal was to be achieved on a basis that would be sustainable even without the presence of the United Nations, and that therefore the fullest possible involvement of Somalis at all levels — in the police, in the judiciary and in the penal system had to be a high priority.³⁰

The representative of the United States stated that the resolution just adopted did two crucial things. First, it set out in clear, unambiguous terms that the principal goal of the United Nations in Somalia was to bring about political reconciliation. His Government had always seen the United Nations Mission in Somalia as political in nature. Second, it lent support to the basic building-blocks of new political institutions: a police, judiciary and penal system. The resolution provided clear direction for the political process and reinforcement of the Somali institutions that could best protect and foster that process.³¹

The representative of the Russian Federation stated that, as indicated in the resolution just adopted, the highest priority of UNOSOM II was to support the Somali people in carrying out the process of national reconciliation, and to advance and accelerate the restoration of regional and national institutions and civilian administration throughout the country. The Russian Federation considered important the appeal contained in resolution 865 (1993) to all Member States to join with regional organizations in rendering assistance to the Secretary-General in his efforts to reconcile the parties and re-establish political institutions in Somalia. It also believed that the appeal in paragraph 14 of that resolution to the Secretary-General to undertake the necessary steps to ensure continuation of the programme for the establishment of the police, judicial and penal system did not mean that those steps would be carried out through the budget for United Nations operations in Somalia. Expenditures for those specific objectives could not be covered by the budget of the organization.³²

²⁹ Ibid., pp. 14-16.

³⁰ Ibid., pp. 16-17.

³¹ Ibid., p. 22.

Decision of 1 October 1993: letter from the President to the Secretary-General

By a letter dated 1 October 1993 addressed to the President of the Council,³³ the Secretary-General informed the Council that the Acting Zone Director of UNOSOM II for north-western Somalia had been told by Mr. Mohamed Ibrahim Egal, the “President” of “Somaliland”, to withdraw all United Nations personnel from the area. The Acting Zone Director had advised UNOSOM that he expected the security situation for United Nations personnel in the north-west to deteriorate if Mr. Egal did not receive a reply to his communication. In view of the security concerns, and given the fact that the mandate of UNOSOM II was under Chapter VII of the Charter, the Secretary-General sought the guidance of the Council as to how to proceed on the matter.

By a letter also dated 1 October 1993,³⁴ the President informed the Secretary-General of the following:

The members of the Security Council had been apprised of the contents of your letter dated 1 October 1993 regarding the presence of UNOSOM II in north-west Somalia (“Somaliland”).

The members of the Council express the hope that UNOSOM II would be able in due course to continue its work under its mandate in north-west Somalia (“Somaliland”) using all peaceful means for the benefit of the population there.

The members of the Council are confident that you will take the necessary precautions for the safety and protection of all United Nations personnel deployed in north-west Somalia (“Somaliland”).

Decision of 29 October 1993 (3299th meeting):
resolution 878 (1993)

By a letter dated 28 October addressed to the President of the Security Council,³⁵ the Secretary-General, referring to resolution 814 (1993) of 26 March 1993, requested that the Council extend the mandate of UNOSOM II until 18 November 1993 in order to allow time for the preparation of his report on talks with high officials in the region. Those talks had been undertaken in the context of resolution 865 (1993) of 22 September 1993 by which the Council had requested him to direct the urgent preparation of a detailed plan setting out the future strategy of UNOSOM II.

At its 3299th meeting, on 29 October 1993, the Security Council included in its agenda the letter from the Secretary-General dated 28 October 1993. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Brazil) drew the attention of the Council members to the text of a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council’s prior consultations.³⁶ The draft resolution was then put to the vote and was adopted unanimously as resolution 878 (1993), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolutions 733 (1992) of 23 January 1992, 746 (1992) of 17 March 1992, 751 (1992) of 24 April 1992, 767 (1992) of 27 July 1992, 775 (1992) of 28 August 1992, 794 (1992) of 3 December 1992, 814 (1993) of 26 March 1993, 837 (1993) of 6 June 1993 and 865 (1993) of 22 September 1993,

Having considered the letter dated 28 October 1993 from the Secretary-General to the President of the Security Council,

Stressing the need for all the parties in Somalia to exercise maximum restraint and to work towards national reconciliation,

Expressing once again its commitment to a future concerted strategy in Somalia for the United Nations Operation in Somalia II and, in that context, to the undertaking of an in-depth consideration of its humanitarian, political and security activities on the basis of the concrete suggestions to be submitted by the Secretary-General as requested in resolution 865 (1993),

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

1. Decides to extend the mandate of the United Nations Operation in Somalia II for an interim period terminating on 18 November 1993;

2. Requests the Secretary-General, in his report to the Council concerning the further extension of the Operation’s mandate, which should be submitted in good time before 18 November 1993, to report also on recent developments in Somalia in order to enable the Council to take appropriate decisions;

3. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Decision of 16 November 1993 (3315th meeting): resolution 885 (1993)

On 1 July 1993, pursuant to resolution 837 (1993) of 6 June 1993, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report in which he gave an account of the events leading up to the ambush of UNOSOM II troops in Mogadishu on 5 June 1993 and described the action taken by UNOSOM II on the implementation of resolution 837 (1993).³⁷ The Secretary-General stated that the unfolding of events in Mogadishu since 5 June 1993 had to be seen against the background of the conditions that UNOSOM was designed to remedy. He recalled that it was the chaos, civil war, immense suffering and famine afflicting the Somali people that had brought the international community and the United Nations to Somalia. He also recalled that the primary objectives of the mandate entrusted to UNOSOM II were to put an end to the plight of the Somali people, to set them firmly on the path to economic rehabilitation and political reconciliation, and to promote the rebuilding of Somali society and political institutions. He observed that those objectives required the restoration of peaceful conditions throughout Somalia and the effective implementation of the process of disarmament.

The Secretary-General further stated that he considered that the actions of UNOSOM II had been successful in making it possible to return to the pursuit of the main objectives of the United Nations in Somalia. He contended that UNOSOM II military enforcement actions had largely neutralized the heavy weapons and the command and control facilities of the factions responsible for the large scale violations of the ceasefire in Mogadishu, and he stated that those actions had made it clear that deliberate attempts to disrupt United Nations and non-governmental organization humanitarian relief supplies could not be tolerated. He observed that various elements of Somali society had shown an interest in restraint, reconciliation and voluntary disarmament, and suggested that, by demonstrating that it was willing to pay, and exact, the cost of peacemaking, the United Nations might well have saved many more lives and accelerated the disarmament, reconciliation and rehabilitation process.

He expressed the hope that, following the military operations conducted between 12 and 18 June 1993, UNOSOM II would be able to revert to the peaceful disarmament of all factions and militias throughout the country. He pointed out that it had never been the intention of UNOSOM II to oppose any of the factions, as long as they refrained from violations of the ceasefire, acted with due regard to their own commitments to the Addis Ababa agreements and cooperated in the implementation of the mandate entrusted by the Security Council to that humanitarian operation. In fact, UNOSOM II intended to continue to work with all the factions, in an effort to foster conditions for the implementation of the United Nations mandate.

He also stated that the attacks against United Nations peacekeepers had been tragic and disturbing, but that they would not divert the United Nations from its commitment to Somalia. He contended that those attacks had only proved that, in the unique situation prevailing in that country, there were elements that continued to believe that their interests were best served by perpetuating chaos, destruction and death.

In conclusion, the Secretary-General urged all Somali factions to join UNOSOM II in its mission of peace, disarmament and reconciliation, as defined by the Security Council and agreed upon by the faction leaders at Addis Ababa, and he expressed his determination to pursue all necessary efforts to implement Security Council resolutions 814 (1993) and 837 (1993).

On 24 August 1993, pursuant to resolution 837 (1993) of 6 June 1993, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the investigation into the 5 June 1993 attack on United Nations forces in Somalia.³⁸ The Secretary-General attached as an annex to the report the executive summary of the report of an independent expert, who had been engaged to carry out the investigation. In his conclusions, the expert stated that there was "clear and convincing evidence" supporting the claim that General Mohamed Farah Aidid had authorized the 5 June 1993 attack on Pakistani forces serving under the United Nations flag, and that the attack had been executed by elements of the political faction known as the Somali National Alliance (SNA). He further stated that the attack had violated multiple provisions of the 1962 Somali Penal Code, which had never been repealed, and constituted a violation of international law, thus rendering General Aidid and his senior colleagues liable to prosecution before an international tribunal or the criminal courts of any State. The central principle of international humanitarian law — the obligation to respect the distinction between combatants and non-combatants — had been violated and criminal responsibility was thereby incurred when individuals or organizations had used civilians as shields for military operations or had otherwise demonstrated a wanton indifference to the protection of non-combatants. He also stated that there was sufficient evidence to make out a prima facie case that the 13 June 1993 attack, on the Pakistani strong point at the Kilometer Four roundabout in south Mogadishu, had been consciously designed by persons associated with SNA to cause the wounding or killing of non-combatants.

At its 3315th meeting, on 16 November 1993, the Security Council included in its agenda the reports of the Secretary-General of 1 July and 24 August 1993. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representative of Somalia, at her request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (Cape Verde) then drew the attention of the Council members to the text of a draft resolution submitted by the United States,³⁹ and read out revisions to be made to the draft resolution in its provisional form.

He also drew the attention of the Council members to a letter dated 25 October 1993 from the Permanent Representative of Ethiopia addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁴⁰ transmitting a letter dated 24 October from the President of the Transitional Government of Ethiopia. The President of Ethiopia informed the President of the Council that he was writing pursuant to the mandate given to him by the heads of State and Government of OAU and the leaders of States members of the Intergovernmental Authority for Drought and Development to follow developments in Somalia. He attached as an appendix four proposals that could be incorporated by the Council in its decisions addressing the situation in Somalia. The first proposal related to the establishment of an independent commission or a fact-finding mission charged with the task of investigating the events leading up to, and surrounding, the incident of 5 June 1993 in Mogadishu, and with submitting its report and recommendations to the Council. His second proposal was that the Council should reaffirm the responsibility of Somalis to solve their own problems. His third concerned the Council endorsing more explicitly the Addis Ababa Agreement. His fourth was that the Council should explicitly direct UNOSOM II to carry out its mandate in partnership with OAU and the countries of the subregion, especially with regard to seeking and implementing a political solution to Somalia's problems.

The draft resolution, as orally revised in its provisional form, was then put to the vote and was adopted unanimously as resolution 885 (1993), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolutions 733 (1992) of 23 January 1992, 746 (1992) of 17 March 1992, 751 (1992) of 24 April 1992, 767 (1992) of 27 July 1992, 775 (1992) of 28 August 1992, 794 (1992) of 3 December 1992, 814 (1993) of 26 March 1993, 837 (1993) of 6 June 1993, 865 (1993) of 22 September 1993, and 878 (1993) of 29 October 1993,

Also reaffirming its resolution 868 (1993) of 29 September 1993 on the need to ensure the safety and protection of United Nations personnel,

Recognizing the critical need for broad-based consultations among all parties and consensus on basic principles to achieve national reconciliation and the establishment of democratic institutions in Somalia,

Stressing that the people of Somalia bear the ultimate responsibility for achieving these objectives, and in this context noting in particular resolution 837 (1993), in which it condemned the 5 June 1993 attack on personnel of the United Nations Operation in Somalia II and called for an investigation,

Noting proposals made by Member States, and noting in particular proposals from the Organization of African Unity, including those in document S/26627 of 25 October 1993, in which the establishment of an impartial commission of inquiry is recommended to investigate armed attacks on the Operation,

Having received and considered the reports of the Secretary-General of 1 July and 24 August 1993 on the implementation of resolution 837 (1993),

1. Authorizes the establishment of a Commission of Inquiry, in further implementation of resolutions 814 (1993) and 837 (1993), to investigate armed attacks on personnel of the United Nations Operation in Somalia II which led to casualties among them;

2. Requests the Secretary-General, having conveyed his views to the Security Council, to appoint the Commission at the earliest possible time and to report to the Council on its establishment;

³⁹ S/26750.

⁴⁰ S/26627.

3. Directs the Commission to determine procedures for carrying out its investigation, taking into account standard United Nations procedures;

4. Notes that members of the Commission will have the status of experts on mission within the meaning of the Convention on the Privileges and Immunities of the United Nations, which shall apply to the Commission;

5. Urges the Secretary-General to provide the Commission with all assistance necessary to facilitate its work;

6. Calls on all parties in Somalia fully to cooperate with the Commission;

7. Requests the Commission to report its findings through the Secretary-General to the Security Council as soon as possible, taking into consideration the need for a thorough inquiry;

8. Requests that the Secretary-General, under his authority in resolutions 814 (1993) and 837 (1993), pending completion of the report of the Commission, suspend arrest actions against those individuals who might be implicated but are not currently detained pursuant to resolution 837 (1993), and make appropriate provision to deal with the situation of those already detained under the provisions of resolution 837 (1993);

9. Decides to remain seized of this matter.

After the vote, the representative of the United States stated that her delegation believed that the Commission of Inquiry was vitally important to advancing the peace process in Somalia which had been disappointingly slow. She contended that the primary goal in Somalia was to foster a political dialogue that could lead to national reconciliation, and expressed the hope that the resolution just adopted would allow all the key players in Somalia to join together in the crucial task of national reconciliation.⁴¹

The representative of Pakistan stated that his delegation had voted in favour of the resolution just adopted because it felt it would advance two essential objectives. The first was the political process in Somalia, which was essential for a lasting peace in Somalia, the responsibility for which was rightly attributed to the people of Somalia themselves. The second related to the necessity of sending a clear message of support to UNOSOM II.⁴²

The representative of New Zealand stated that his delegation did not accept the argument that the United Nations would have proceeded without allowing suspects the benefits of due process. It understood,

however, that in the extraordinary circumstances of southern Mogadishu it was a fact that fears in that regard had become an obstacle to the political dialogue. His delegation therefore accepted that there was political significance in the resolution, and value in indicating that arrest action would be suspended pending completion of the work of the Commission of Inquiry.⁴³

The representative of Brazil stated that it was particularly important that in adopting the resolution the Council had acted on suggestions coming from the region, notably the proposals submitted by the President of Ethiopia.⁴⁴

On 12 November 1993, pursuant to resolution 814 (1993) of 26 March 1993 and resolution 865 (1993) of 22 September 1993, the Secretary-General submitted a report on the situation in Somalia and on the progress made towards the implementation of UNOSOM mandate.⁴⁵

The Secretary-General stated that for over a year the Security Council had responded, in a flexible and creative manner, to the highly complex and continually evolving situation in Somalia. He observed that the international community had had no precedent to guide it in dealing with the tragic situation in Somalia, and consequently, the response of the Council had had to be adjusted from time to time, to take into account different circumstances that it had not been possible to anticipate. That explained the evolution of the international presence in Somalia from UNOSOM I to UNITAF to UNOSOM II. He contended that the wider international community as well as the people of Somalia, by and large, had appreciated the constructive responses of the Security Council.

The Secretary-General further stated that the uniqueness of the situation in Somalia had changed in some important respects. The most dramatic and visible change was the enormous success in reducing starvation deaths and conditions of famine in the country, but there had also been other significant improvements in the fields of public health, education and agriculture. However, the situation, even in those areas, remained fragile and needed careful watching and continued assistance from the international community. There was still no effectively functioning government in the country, no disciplined national armed force, and no organized civilian police force or judiciary, although impressive progress had been achieved in initiating the recreation of the police and judiciary. He contended, therefore, that the problems of Somalia must continue to engage the attention of the international community.

⁴³ Ibid., pp. 6-8.

The Secretary-General reiterated the importance of effective disarmament to achieve lasting peace and stability, and stressed that that could only be achieved with the cooperation of the Somali people and neighbouring countries. He recalled that the Somali parties had made a commitment, both in the ceasefire agreement and the Addis Ababa Agreement, to complete simultaneous disarmament throughout the country and observed that voluntary disarmament had been successful during UNITAF and in the early weeks of UNOSOM II. He noted, however, that unless the United Somali Congress/Somali National Alliance was effectively disarmed, the prospects for genuine peace and stability in the country would remain bleak. In that connection, he welcomed the unilateral declaration of a cessation of hostilities by USC/SNA with effect from 9 October 1993. In an effort to build on that, UNOSOM II had established a Mogadishu Security Advisory Committee, to which it had invited all the factions. The Secretary-General noted, however, that the initiative had not been very successful.

Having informed the Council of the intention of the United States to withdraw its forces from Somalia by 31 March 1994, after several other countries had already announced their decision to withdraw, the Secretary-General introduced three options relating to the mandate of UNOSOM II. In doing so, he stated that it was not his intention that the Council should pronounce on them at that time. Under the first option, the mandate of UNOSOM II would remain essentially unchanged and UNOSOM would be maintained at its then existing troop strength. Under the second option, the Security Council would decide that UNOSOM II would not use coercive methods but would, rather, rely on the cooperation of the Somali parties in order to discharge its mandate. UNOSOM II would thus use force only in self defence, in accordance with traditional peacekeeping practices, and disarmament would be entirely voluntary. It would not be necessary to replace fully the contingent that would have withdrawn by 31 March 1994, nor to replace those that might withdraw soon thereafter. Under the third option, the mandate of UNOSOM II would be limited to keeping under its secure control the airport and port in Mogadishu, and important ports and airports in other parts of the country, so as to keep the supply routes open for humanitarian purposes. The Secretary-General noted that the main feature of that option was its emphasis on the regions as opposed to the importance, under the other two options, of bringing about a secure environment in Mogadishu. It would call for the deployment of about 5,000, all ranks. The Secretary-General also noted that theoretically there could be one more alternative, namely a complete withdrawal of UNOSOM II from Somalia, which he did not support.

Stating that the overwhelming majority of the Somali people wanted the United Nations to continue to support the process of reconciliation and rehabilitation, he recommended that the mandate of UNOSOM II be renewed until 31 March 1994.

At its 3317th meeting, on 18 November 1993, the Security Council included in its agenda the further report of the Secretary-General of 12 November 1993. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representatives of Ethiopia and Somalia, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President then drew the attention of the Council members to the text of a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations⁴⁶ and read out revisions to be made to the draft resolution in its provisional form. He also drew the attention of the Council members to a letter dated 18 November from the representative of Eritrea addressed to the President of the Security Council.⁴⁷

The representative of Ethiopia stated that the proposal of the President of Ethiopia, inter alia, to reinstate the Addis Ababa agreements and to establish a fact finding mission⁴⁸ would greatly facilitate the reconciliation process and would eventually lead to the formation of civil society in Somalia. He pointed out that solutions had to be sought collectively by the Somalis themselves with the help of the international community. Moreover, a genuine partnership between OAU, the countries of the subregion and the United Nations was important to the political process in Somalia. The speaker suggested that one way in which UNOSOM II could make substantive contributions was the undertaking of comprehensive disarmament. It was therefore crucial that UNOSOM II be present in Somalia and that it have the mandate to take the necessary actions to implement the Addis Ababa agreements. He also contended that the effective implementation of Security Council resolutions would involve a change of attitude, commitment, neutrality and impartiality on the part of the people entrusted to implement them. He urged that the people who implemented the decisions of the Security Council should therefore be very carefully selected. The speaker also stated that the main preoccupation in Somalia at that time should be peacemaking. In his view peacemaking was more cost-effective than peacekeeping or peace enforcement. He argued that if the international community was willing to pay a huge sum of money for peacekeeping and peace enforcement, then it should be ready to invest a modest amount in peacemaking.⁴⁹

The draft resolution, as orally revised in its provisional form, was put to the vote and was adopted unanimously as resolution 886 (1993), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolutions 733 (1992) of 23 January 1992 and all subsequent relevant resolutions,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 12 November 1993,

Noting the significant improvement in the situation in most areas of Somalia achieved by the United Nations Operation in Somalia II as described in that report,

Noting also paragraph 72 of the report of the Secretary-General,

Recognizing that the people of Somalia bear the ultimate responsibility for national reconciliation and reconstruction of their own country,

Stressing the commitment of the international community to continue helping Somalia in its efforts to accelerate the process of national reconstruction and to promote stability, rehabilitation and political reconciliation and to regain a normal, peaceful life,

Recalling that the highest priority of the Operation continues to be to support the efforts of the Somali people in promoting the process of national reconciliation and the establishment of democratic institutions,

Affirming that the General Agreement signed in Addis Ababa on 8 January 1993 and the Addis Ababa Agreement of the First Session of the Conference on National Reconciliation in Somalia, signed on 27 March 1993, establish a sound basis for resolution of the problems in Somalia,

Emphasizing in this context the crucial importance of disarmament in achieving lasting peace and stability throughout Somalia,

Condemning the continuing acts of violence and armed attacks against persons engaged in humanitarian and peacekeeping efforts, and paying tribute to those troops and humanitarian personnel of several countries who have been killed or injured while serving in Somalia,

Determining that the situation in Somalia continues to threaten peace and security in the region,

1. Welcomes the report of the Secretary-General;
2. Commends the Secretary-General, his Special Representative and the personnel of the United Nations Operation in Somalia II for their achievements in improving the conditions of the Somali people and in promoting the process of national reconciliation and reconstruction of the country;
3. Decides, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations, to renew the mandate of the Operation for an additional period expiring on 31 May 1994;
4. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the Security Council by 15 January 1994, or at any time before that if the situation warrants, on the progress made in achieving national reconciliation by the Somali people and that made in the attainment of political, security and humanitarian goals, and also requests the Secretary-General, as part of that report, to provide an updated plan setting out the Operation's future concerted strategy with regard to its humanitarian, political and security activities;
5. Also decides to undertake a fundamental review of the mandate of the Operation by 1 February 1994 in the light of the report of the Secretary-General and his updated plan;
6. Urges all parties in Somalia, including movements and factions, to accelerate their efforts to achieve political reconciliation, peace and security and immediately to abide by the ceasefire and disarmament agreements reached in Addis Ababa, particularly the immediate cantonment of all heavy weapons;
7. Underscores the importance of the Somali people attaining specific goals in the context of political reconciliation, in particular the early establishment and effective functioning of all district and regional councils and an interim national authority;

⁴⁹ S/PV.3317, pp. 3-7.

8. Stresses in this regard the importance it attaches to the accelerated implementation by the Somali people, with the assistance of the United Nations and donor countries, of the recommendations contained in annex I of the report of the Secretary-General of 17 August 1993 and endorsed by the Security Council in its resolution 865 (1993) of 22 September 1993, and in particular the establishment of an operational police, penal and judiciary system at the regional and district level as soon as feasible;

9. Reminds all parties in Somalia, including movements and factions, that continued United Nations involvement in Somalia depends on their active cooperation and tangible progress towards a political settlement;

10. Welcomes and supports the ongoing diplomatic efforts being made by Member States and international organizations, in particular those in the region, to assist United Nations efforts to bring all parties in Somalia, including movements and factions, to the negotiating table;

11. Reaffirms the obligations of States to implement fully the embargo on all deliveries of weapons and military equipment to Somalia imposed by paragraph 5 of resolution 733 (1992);

12. Expresses concern at the destabilizing effects of cross-border arms flows in the region, affirms the importance it attaches to the security of the countries neighbouring Somalia, and calls for the cessation of such arms flows;

13. Welcomes the Fourth Coordination Meeting for Humanitarian Assistance for Somalia, to be held at Addis Ababa from 29 November to 1 December 1993;

14. Emphasizes the relationship between national rehabilitation and progress in the process of national reconciliation in Somalia, and encourages donor countries to make contributions to Somalia's rehabilitation as demonstrable political progress occurs, and in particular to contribute urgently to rehabilitation projects in those regions where progress on political reconciliation and security has been made;

15. Expresses its appreciation to those Member States which have contributed to or provided logistical or other assistance to the Operation or offered to do so, and encourages those who are in a position to do so to contribute, on an urgent basis, troops, equipment, and financial and logistical support to enhance the Operation's capability to carry out its mandate and to ensure the safety of the personnel;

16. Requests the Secretary-General to ask the Somalia Trust Fund Committee to review claims and make payments on an urgent basis and urges Member States to make funds available directly or through the Somalia Trust Fund for priority projects, including the re-establishment of the Somali police and demining, on an urgent basis;

17. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

After the vote, the representatives of the United States, the United Kingdom and France stated that the resolution demonstrated the will of the international community not to abandon Somalia. They stressed, however, that the United Nations could only help and that the people of Somalia bore the ultimate responsibility for national reconciliation and the reconstruction of their country. The representatives of France and the Russian Federation stressed the importance of the efforts made by the countries and organizations of the regions to help find a settlement to the Somali crisis.⁵⁰

The representative of France drew attention to the fact that, while his country welcomed the contribution of the United States to UNOSOM, it would have preferred, for reasons of clarity and consistency and because the problem might arise in the case of other peacekeeping operations, to see the status of the United States forces vis-à-vis UNOSOM clarified in the resolution.⁵¹

The representative of China stated that the international community could only play a supplementary and facilitating role in the promotion of a final settlement. The overall objective of UNOSOM II should be to promote national reconciliation, and it should fulfil its mandate by relying on the Somali people, using peaceful means.⁵²

The representative of the United Kingdom stated that his Government was concerned at the destabilizing effects of cross-border arms flows into neighbouring countries and was therefore pleased that the resolution emphasized the importance of doing what could be done to protect the security of neighbouring countries.⁵³

Decision of 30 November 1993: letter from the President to the Secretary-General

By a letter dated 23 November 1993 addressed to the President of the Council,⁵⁴ the Secretary-General informed the Council that, in response to its request in resolution 885 (1993) of 16 November 1993, he had appointed a Commission of Inquiry to carry out the investigation into the armed attacks on personnel of UNOSOM II. In that letter the Secretary-General also noted that he had decided to establish a separate secretariat to assist the Commission.⁵⁵ By a letter dated 30 November 1993,⁵⁶ the President informed the Secretary-General that the members of the Council took note of the composition of the Commission and welcomed his decision to establish a separate secretariat to assist the Commission. They also looked forward to receiving the Commission's report through him.

Decision of 4 February 1994 (3334th meeting):

On 6 January 1994, pursuant to resolution 886 (1993) of 18 November 1993, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a further report in which he gave an account of the progress made by UNOSOM II in the fulfilment of its mandate and outlined his views for the continuation of UNOSOM II.⁵⁷

The Secretary-General noted that while progress had been achieved by UNOSOM II in implementing its mandate in the political, humanitarian and security fields, that mandate was nevertheless far from being fully accomplished. In his view, the mandate of UNOSOM II would be completed only when the Addis Ababa Agreement of March 1993 had been fully implemented, culminating in the holding of general elections and the installation of a popularly elected Government. That would be predicated on the fulfilment of two indispensable conditions: a spirit of cooperation, compromise and commitment on the part of the Somali people, and the continued involvement of the international community. As far as the international community was concerned, it had given ample evidence of its concern for the people of Somalia. However, there were unmistakable signs of fatigue among the international community as it continued to be called upon to extend such assistance through the United Nations. Despite that, the Secretary-General remained convinced that the international community did not wish to shirk its responsibility towards the Somali people. He noted that at the Fourth Humanitarian Conference, held at Addis Ababa in November/December 1993, representatives of the donor community had reiterated their willingness to help Somalia in its national rehabilitation and reconstruction. But they had also made it clear that their offer to commit further resources was conditional on the Somalis doing their part to bring about national reconciliation and establish at least minimum levels of security. As for the Secretary-General, his position was clear: the international community must not abandon the people of Somalia as long as an overwhelming majority of them desired the presence of the United Nations.

The Secretary-General recalled the three options that he had proposed in his earlier report to the Council regarding the mandate and functioning of UNOSOM II and he recommended the second option,⁵⁸ although he noted that that his preference would have been for the first option. Under the second option, UNOSOM II would not use coercive methods, but would rely on the cooperation of the Somali parties. It would protect the important ports and airports, and the essential infrastructure of Somalia; keep open the main supply routes between Mogadishu and outside areas; pursue as a matter of utmost priority the reorganization of the Somali police and judicial systems; and help with the repatriation of refugees. It would also continue its efforts to provide emergency relief supplies to all in need throughout the country and coordinate its activities in such a manner that programmes of assistance of the international community would be supported in areas of their choice. As far as the political process in Somalia was concerned, UNOSOM II would continue to play a role as desired by the Somali people. In the Secretary-General's view, the Addis Ababa Agreement offered the only agreed framework within which a political solution could be found. UNOSOM II could not and would not stand in the way of the parties to that agreement if they voluntarily decided to modify its terms. The number of troops required under that option would be 16,000. He noted that if that order of troop strength was not available, or if the necessary financial resources were not available after 31 March 1994, then he would bring the matter to the attention of the Security Council, possibly with a modified recommendation regarding the mandate of UNOSOM II.

The Secretary-General concluded by cautioning that the success of UNOSOM II under the second option would depend, more than ever, on the cooperation of the Somali parties. He added that if the Somalis succeeded in establishing the Transitional National Council in the near future, that would be a significant development.

At its 3334th meeting, on 4 February 1994, the Security Council included in its agenda the further report of the Secretary-General of 6 January 1994. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representative of Somalia, at her request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (Djibouti) then drew the attention of the Council members to the text of a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations⁵⁹ and read out a revision to be made to the draft resolution in its provisional form. He also drew the attention of the Council members to a letter dated 4 February 1994 from the Chargé d'affaires a.i. of the Permanent Mission of Malaysia addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁶⁰ in which his Government emphasized the importance of developing a practice or mechanism that would allow direct and close consultations between the Security Council and the countries contributing troops to UNOSOM II and raised the possibility of extending such a practice or mechanism to other peacekeeping operations.

Before the vote, the representative of Nigeria stated that the international community faced once again the crucial question of whether or not the United Nations should divest itself entirely of Somalia. He contended that for the credibility of the Organization, and in the higher interest of the Somali people, UNOSOM II could not simply "fold up" and exit from Somalia. The Council needed to continue to help the people of Somalia so that they could overcome their difficulties and enable their country to rejoin the international community in peace and with dignity. He noted, however, that it was important, as the draft resolution made clear, that in the ongoing efforts at political reconciliation, rehabilitation and reconstruction in Somalia, the Somali people themselves would play the leading part. His Government expressed appreciation for the draft resolution's reaffirmation of the obligation of States to implement fully the embargo on all deliveries of weapons and military equipment to Somalia. His Government was also pleased that the draft resolution placed a premium on the need to assure the safety and protection of the UNOSOM II personnel who would remain in Somalia under the revised mandate. It was also important that, whatever its exact force level after 31 March 1994, UNOSOM should retain the capacity to carry out effectively its duties as redefined.⁶¹

The representative of Pakistan noted that the draft resolution was the result of extensive dialogue and discussion among the Council members. He pointed out that the fresh mandate to be given to UNOSOM II would be more modest than its predecessor. Under the new mandate, the responsibility for the restoration and maintenance of law and order within the country would lie solely with the Somali people, with the assistance of UNOSOM II. The resolution was quite clear that, in the event of inter-clan fighting, UNOSOM II would not get involved. It was also clear that UNOSOM II would only encourage and assist the Somali parties in the process of disarmament and would not be required to enforce the disarmament or other clauses contained in the Addis Ababa Agreement. Obviously, that meant that the Somali parties themselves would have to take greater responsibility for the establishment of viable political institutions and normal conditions in their country. For his country, that was a development in the right direction. Pakistan, as a troop-contributing country, was also grateful that the draft resolution underscored clearly that all necessary material means and military assets would be placed at the disposal of UNOSOM II to enable it to defend its personnel.⁶²

The representative of Rwanda contended that the international community, having made such a great investment in Somalia, should do everything in its power to continue UNOSOM II. He trusted that the United Nations mission in Somalia would be successful only when the Addis Ababa agreements of January and March 1993 had been fully implemented, when general elections had been held, and when a government had been elected and installed in accordance with the wishes of the populace. His delegation was concerned that the critical situation in which Somalia found itself could become extremely difficult if the almost simultaneous withdrawal of some contingents participating in the operation was not approached in the context of a plan that could guarantee the mission the means necessary to carry out its tasks. It encouraged the Secretary-General to step up the contacts he had already initiated with certain States and to request them to contribute to UNOSOM II, which, under Chapter VII of the Charter, would continue to fulfil the mandate set out in paragraph 2 of the draft resolution. His delegation also believed that UNOSOM II should continue to serve as a catalyst for successful political dialogue between the parties. In that context it attached the greatest importance to the establishment of contacts between the Secretary-General and the Somali parties, pursuant to paragraph 13 of the draft resolution, in order to establish a timetable for the implementation of the Addis Ababa agreements.⁶³

The representative of China stated that the experiences and lessons of UNOSOM II had shown that the fundamental and effective way to settle the Somali question was by peaceful means. Resort to coercive military actions would only serve to complicate matters. The second option recommended by the Secretary-General was also in conformity with that principle in its advocacy of non-use of coercive measures to achieve disarmament by the Somali parties themselves. China understood that the draft resolution did not, in essence, run counter to that principle.⁶⁴

The draft resolution, as orally revised in its provisional form, was then put to the vote and was adopted unanimously as resolution 897 (1994), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolution 733 (1992) of 23 January 1992 and all subsequent relevant resolutions,

Reaffirming the decision taken in its resolution 886 (1993) of 18 November 1993 to continue the United Nations Operation in Somalia II up to 31 May 1994,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 6 January 1994,

Stressing the importance the Council attaches to the Somali parties fulfilling in good faith all obligations and agreements to which they commit themselves, and affirming once again that the General Agreement signed at Addis Ababa on 8 January 1993 and the Addis Ababa Agreement of the First Session of the Conference on National Reconciliation in Somalia signed on 27 March 1993 (“the Addis Ababa Agreements”) constitute the basis for the resolution of the problems in Somalia,

Bearing in mind respect for the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Somalia in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations, and recognizing that the people of Somalia bear the ultimate responsibility for setting up viable national political institutions and for reconstructing their country,

Expressing serious concern at reports that Somali factions are re-arming and that a troop build-up is taking place in some regions of Somalia,

Condemning the continuing incidents of fighting and banditry in Somalia, and in particular condemning violence and armed attacks against persons engaged in humanitarian and peacekeeping efforts,

Emphasizing the crucial importance of disarmament by all parties in achieving lasting peace and stability in Somalia,

Paying tribute to the peacekeepers and humanitarian personnel of several countries killed or injured while serving in Somalia, and in this context re-emphasizing the importance the Council attaches to the safety and security of United Nations and other personnel engaged in humanitarian relief and peacekeeping throughout Somalia,

Affirming the importance of the establishment, by the Somali people, of representative district and regional councils and of a transitional national council, as well as the importance of a re-established police force and a judicial system for the restoration of public order throughout Somalia,

Welcoming the efforts made at the fourth humanitarian conference at Addis Ababa, and reaffirming the commitment of the international community to assist the Somali people to attain political reconciliation and reconstruction,

Welcoming also political contacts and consultations between representatives of various parties in Somalia with a view to finding solutions to outstanding matters and disputes among them and promoting the process of political reconciliation,

Commending and supporting the ongoing diplomatic efforts being made by international and regional organizations and Member States, in particular those in the region, to assist United Nations efforts to persuade Somali parties to reach a political settlement,

Reaffirming the objective that the Operation complete its mission by March 1995,

Determining that the situation in Somalia continues to threaten peace and security, and having regard to the exceptional circumstances, including in particular the absence of a government in Somalia, and acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

1. Welcomes the report of the Secretary-General;
2. Approves the Secretary-General’s recommendation for the continuation of the United Nations Operation in Somalia II, as set out in particular in paragraph 57 of his report, with a revised mandate for the following:

⁶³ Ibid., pp. 12-15.

⁶⁴ Ibid., pp. 16-17.

(a) Encouraging and assisting the Somali parties in implementing the Addis Ababa Agreements, in particular in their cooperative efforts to achieve disarmament and to respect the ceasefire;

(b) Protecting major ports and airports and essential infrastructure and safeguarding the lines of communication vital to the provision of humanitarian relief and reconstruction assistance;

(c) Continuing its efforts to provide humanitarian relief to all in need throughout the country;

(d) Assisting in the reorganization of the Somali police and judicial system;

(e) Helping with the repatriation and resettlement of refugees and displaced persons;

(f) Assisting also in the ongoing political process in Somalia, which should culminate in the installation of a democratically elected Government;

(g) Providing protection for the personnel, installations and equipment of the United Nations and its agencies, as well as of non-governmental organizations providing humanitarian relief and reconstruction assistance;

3. Authorizes the gradual reduction of the Operation to a force level of up to 22,000 and necessary support elements, such force level to be reviewed at the next renewal of the mandate;

4. Underlines, in this context, the vital importance of placing at the disposal of the Operation the necessary material means and military assets required to enable it to discharge its responsibilities in an effective manner as well as effectively to defend its personnel in case of armed attack;

5. Also approves giving priority to directing international reconstruction resources to those regions where security is being re-established and to local Somali institutions which are prepared to cooperate with the international community in setting development priorities in accordance with the declaration of the fourth humanitarian conference in Addis Ababa as set forth in paragraphs 23 and 24 of the report of the Secretary-General;

6. Underlines the importance that the Council attaches to demining, and requests the Secretary-General to make arrangements to ensure the start of demining operations as soon as possible wherever conditions permit;

7. Calls upon all parties in Somalia to cooperate fully with the Operation and respect the ceasefire arrangements and other commitments entered into by them;

8. Demands that all Somali parties refrain from any acts of intimidation or violence against personnel engaged in humanitarian or peacekeeping work in Somalia;

9. Reaffirms the obligations of States to implement fully the embargo on all deliveries of weapons and military equipment to Somalia imposed by paragraph 5 of resolution 733 (1992);

10. Commends the Secretary-General, his Special Representative and the personnel of the Operation for their efforts in improving the conditions of the Somali people and in encouraging the process of political reconciliation, rehabilitation and reconstruction;

11. Expresses its appreciation to those Member States which have contributed troops or provided logistical or other assistance to the Operation or have offered to do so, and encourages those that are in a position to do so to contribute, on an urgent basis, troops, civilian personnel, equipment and financial and logistical support so as to enhance the capability of the Operation to carry out its mandate;

12. Also expresses its appreciation to those States which have contributed humanitarian assistance or have supported the Somali justice programmes and encourages further such contributions on an urgent basis;

13. Requests the Secretary-General to consider, in consultation with the Organization of African Unity and the League of Arab States, establishing contacts with the Somali parties with a view to arriving at an agreed timetable for implementing the Addis Ababa Agreements, including the objective of completing the process by March 1995;

14. Also requests the Secretary-General to submit to it, as soon as the situation warrants, and in any case in good time before 31 May 1994, a report on the situation in Somalia and the implementation of the present resolution;

15. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

After the vote, the representative of the United States stressed the following points: First, the resolution stated clearly what many members of the Council had been saying for some time, that the people of Somalia needed to bear the responsibility for national reconciliation and the reconstruction of their country. Secondly, attacks on those providing humanitarian relief and reconstruction assistance needed to stop. Thirdly, as Somali efforts to achieve national reconciliation and security proceeded, there was a role for the international community. The United States strongly supported a regional focus for assistance, giving priority to those areas of the country where there was security and where local institutions were prepared to cooperate. The resolution also made it clear that there was work to be done in laying the groundwork for a return to law and order through support for programmes to rebuild Somalia's police and its system of justice.⁶⁵

⁶⁵ Ibid., pp. 20-22.

The representative of the United Kingdom noted that under the resolution just adopted, UNOSOM II, which remained one of the largest, the most complex and the most costly peacekeeping operations ever undertaken by the United Nations, would operate under a revised and more realistic mandate. The rebuilding of Somalia could not be in the hands of UNOSOM II or of the international community: it needed to be in the hands of the Somali people. His Government was deeply concerned at reports that some Somali factions were rearming, and of increased inter-clan clashes and banditry and by the renewed increase in violence and attacks against humanitarian relief workers. He noted, in that regard, that the resolution gave a clear mandate to UNOSOM II to provide protection not only for United Nations personnel and installations, but also for non-governmental organizations providing humanitarian assistance to the people of Somalia. Another point of particular concern to his Government was the need to ensure the very closest coordination between UNOSOM II and the various bodies engaged in rehabilitation and reconstruction work in Somalia, with clearly defined lines of responsibility.⁶⁶

The representative of Brazil stated that his country had constantly maintained that the Council should avoid invoking the extraordinary powers conferred upon it in Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations except in clearly exceptional circumstances, as in the unique case of Somalia. Even then, it should act in a sparing manner, seeking to limit the application of those powers as much as possible. His delegation therefore welcomed the fact that the text of the resolution made it clear that it was only in the light of the exceptional circumstances then prevailing in Somalia including, in particular, the absence of a national government that the Security Council was acting under Chapter VII of the Charter. It was his delegation's understanding that the reference to Chapter VII applied only to those aspects of the resolution that fell clearly under the provisions of that Chapter of the Charter.⁶⁷

The representative of the Russian Federation stated that his delegation considered the main thrust of the resolution to be a shift in focus, to the activation of political aspects of the work of UNOSOM II and to the creation of conditions for the attainment by the

Somalis of a stable political settlement on the basis of the Addis Ababa agreements. Another important element was the gradual reduction in strength of the military component of UNOSOM II. It was the view of his delegation that the key to an early settlement of the conflict lay in the hands of the Somali people themselves. In addition to the efforts of the United Nations, more active use should be made of OAU, other regional organizations, Somalia's neighbouring countries and all other interested States.⁶⁸

The President, in his capacity as the representative of Djibouti, stated that critical factors were the impending withdrawal of key countries and the implacable opposition by certain factions to the Addis Ababa agreements, including to the role assigned to the United Nations. Together, those factors created a pervasive sense of insecurity and fear among all elements of Somali society, leading to rearming, a breakdown in security and interruptions of the flow of humanitarian aid. He also stated that the forces of peace, development and democracy were strong, and that in its remaining tenure the United Nations must be seen to support those forces in institutions, reconstruction and aid. There would be more hope if there was to be a regional agreement on a peaceful future for Somalia. While he would have liked to see in the resolution a stronger indication of those responsible for the situation and limitations on progress in Somalia, a clearer statement of the purpose of the United Nations and an emphasis on the need to honour past commitments, he nonetheless supported the resolution.⁶⁹

Decision of 26 May 1994: letter from the President to the Secretary-General

By a letter dated 26 May 1994,⁷⁰ the President of the Security Council informed the Secretary-General of the following:

The members of the Security Council have received the report of the Commission of Inquiry established pursuant to resolution 885 (1993) to investigate armed attacks on personnel of the United Nations Operation in Somalia II.

The Council had asked me to convey to you its decision that the report should now be circulated as a document of the Council in the normal manner.

The Council also asked me to indicate its thanks for the report of the Commission.

It is noted that many of the suggestions in the report had already been acted upon by the Operation and by the Council.

The members of the Council believe that the report demonstrates the complexity and difficulty of the operation in Somalia. Many lessons have been learned and the Council will be able to build upon that experience in future peacekeeping operations.

I should be grateful if this letter could be circulated as a document of the Council at the same time as the report is circulated.

Decision of 31 May 1994 (3385th meeting):
resolution 923 (1994)

On 24 May 1994, pursuant to resolution 897 (1994) of 4 February 1994, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a further report on UNOSOM II⁷¹ in which he reported, inter alia, on developments in Somalia relating to the political situation.

The Secretary-General noted that after the adoption of resolution 897 (1994), the political process for national reconciliation in Somalia had gained new impetus. He reported that his Acting Special Representative had launched an initiative to normalize the relationship between UNOSOM II and the Somali National Alliance. He had also persuaded the Somali leaders, including General Aidid, Chairman of SNA, and Mr. Ali Mahdi, Spokesman of the Group of 12, to meet at Nairobi on 15 March 1994 for consultation, with the objective of securing agreement on the indefinite cessation of hostilities and on a long-term solution to the problems of Lower Juba. The meeting had culminated in the signing of the Nairobi Declaration in Nairobi on 24 March 1994, in which both sides had agreed to convene a national reconciliation conference on 15 May 1994, to elect a President and Vice-Presidents and to appoint a Prime Minister. The Conference would also complete and review the formation of local authorities where necessary and establish an independent judiciary. The Conference was postponed, however, due to the deteriorating security situation. On 27 March 1994, an agreement was signed by members of a joint committee representing SNA and the Somali Patriotic Movement (SPM), calling for a Lower Juba Reconciliation

Conference at Kismayo on 8 April 1994. The Conference opened on 24 May 1994.

The Secretary-General also noted that, despite the political reconciliation efforts, the security situation in Somalia had been deteriorating. Militia groups were rearming and banditry was on the rise. He stated, however, that the situation was not entirely devoid of hope. On the one hand, there was the unanimous commitment on the part of the Somali parties to pursue the path of reconciliation and to work together to achieve voluntary disarmament and a permanent ceasefire. On the other hand, some of the factions had used their military strength to increase the areas under their control, in order to enhance their negotiating positions. He observed that all the Somali leaders had appealed to UNOSOM to continue supporting their reconciliation and rehabilitation efforts, which had enabled his Acting Special Representative to pursue a political initiative over the preceding few months. The result had been a resumption of dialogue, normalization of the UNOSOM relationship with SNA, and the very important Declaration adopted by the parties at Nairobi. He also observed, however, that there had been considerable delays in implementing the agreement, and that the preparatory meeting to organize the National Reconciliation Conference was consequently scheduled for 30 May 1994, with no date fixed for the Conference itself.

The Secretary-General noted that the Nairobi Declaration had brought the United Nations Operation in Somalia to a defining moment. The issue before the Security Council was the extension of the UNOSOM II mandate, taking into account the Council's objective, set out in resolution 897 (1994), that UNOSOM II complete its mission by March 1995. In the Secretary-General's opinion, renewing the mandate would signify the Member States' determination to fulfil the United Nations vision of assisting Somalia's efforts towards political reconciliation, national reconstruction and peace, whereas deciding to phase out the Somalia operation would signify abandonment of that vision, and the country might consequently slide back into the abyss from which it had been barely rescued less than two years earlier. Stating that the Somali people deserved one last chance, he recommended that the Security Council reaffirm its objective, set out in resolution 897 (1994), that UNOSOM II complete its mission by March 1995, and that the Council extend the UNOSOM II mandate for a period of six months.

He also recommended that the extension be at the then authorized troop strength of 22,000, and that it be subject to periodic reviews, according to the political and military situation and progress towards reconciliation. His recommendation was based on the assumption that the Somali leaders would prove able and willing to pursue the path to political reconciliation. He warned that, should that assumption prove unfounded, he would not hesitate to report to the Security Council, nor would he rule out recommending that the Council consider withdrawing the United Nations force in part or in full. He had accordingly instructed UNOSOM II to formulate a comprehensive contingency withdrawal plan.

At its 3385th meeting, on 31 May 1994, the Security Council included in its agenda the further report of the Secretary-General of 24 May 1994. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representative of Somalia, at her request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President then drew the attention of the Council members to the text of a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.⁷²

Before the vote, the representative of Rwanda stated that it was disturbing that, despite reconciliation efforts being made at the regional and national levels, the security situation was deteriorating. He referred to the fighting that was continuing among the Somali clans, and to the prevalence of banditry and urged the Council to proceed with the full deployment of the authorized force of UNOSOM II, set at 22,000 men, and to provide the force with the necessary logistical and material means to discharge its mandate. He maintained that collective action was indispensable to support the efforts of the Somali people to reconstruct their country's political and socio-economic structure. For that reason, his delegation supported the draft resolution.⁷³

The representative of Pakistan stated that, while he was concerned at the deterioration in the security situation in Somalia, he could not ignore the positive elements over the last few months, foremost among which was the declared commitment of the Somali parties to pursue the path of reconciliation. His delegation had been willing to accept the Secretary-

General's recommendation to renew the mandate of UNOSOM II for a period of six months, but an equally convincing case had been made for reducing the extension period to four months. He contended that the reduction in length of the mandate should not be seen as an erosion of the commitment of the international community to the people of Somalia, but rather that it signified a desire to persuade the Somali parties to hasten their endeavours towards the objective of national reconciliation. He stated that his delegation was confident that adequate progress during that four-month period would lead to a further renewal of the UNOSOM II mandate.⁷⁴

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and was adopted unanimously as resolution 923 (1994), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolution 733 (1992) of 23 January 1992 and all subsequent relevant resolutions,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 24 May 1994,

Reaffirming the commitment of the international community to assisting the Somali people to attain political reconciliation and reconstruction,

Emphasizing in this context that the people of Somalia bear the ultimate responsibility for achieving national reconciliation and for rebuilding their country,

Stressing the importance the Council attaches to the Somali parties working seriously to achieve peace and national reconciliation in their country and to their fulfilling in good faith all obligations and agreements to which they commit themselves,

Welcoming the declaration of the leaders of the Somali political organizations signed in Nairobi on 24 March 1994, which, inter alia, committed the Somali parties to restoring peace throughout Somalia, to setting up rules and procedures of voting and criteria for participation in the national reconciliation conference, to convening a national reconciliation conference to elect a President and Vice Presidents and to appoint a Prime Minister, to completing and reviewing the formation of local authorities and to establishing an independent judiciary,

Welcoming also the Lower Juba regional conference,

Concerned none the less at the delays in the reconciliation process and at the deterioration in the security situation,

Condemning the continuing incidents of fighting and banditry and, in particular, violence and armed attacks against persons engaged in humanitarian and peacekeeping efforts,

Paying tribute to those troops and humanitarian personnel of several countries who have been killed or injured while serving in Somalia,

Re-emphasizing the importance the Council attaches to the safety and security of United Nations and other personnel engaged in humanitarian relief and peacekeeping throughout Somalia,

Paying tribute to the humanitarian work being undertaken by United Nations agencies and non-governmental organizations in difficult conditions to assist the people of Somalia,

Taking note of the fact that all Somali leaders have appealed to the United Nations Operation in Somalia II to continue supporting their reconciliation and rehabilitation efforts,

Reaffirming the objective that the Operation complete its mission by March 1995,

Determining that the situation in Somalia continues to threaten peace and security, and having regard to the exceptional circumstances, including in particular the absence of a government in Somalia, and acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

1. Welcomes the report of the Secretary-General;

2. Decides to renew the mandate of the United Nations Operation in Somalia II for an additional period expiring on 30 September 1994, subject to a review by the Council no later than 29 July 1994 based on a report by the Secretary-General on the humanitarian mission carried out by the Operation and on the political and security situation in Somalia and progress made in achieving national reconciliation, in the light of which report and review the Security Council may request the Secretary-General to prepare options regarding the mandate and future operations of the United Nations Operation in Somalia;

3. Commends the Secretary-General, his Acting Special Representative and the personnel of the Operation for their efforts towards improving the conditions of the Somali people and in encouraging the process of political reconciliation, rehabilitation and reconstruction;

4. Strongly urges all parties in Somalia to cooperate fully with the Operation, to carry out the commitments and implement the agreements which they have signed, including those relating to the voluntary disarmament, and to pursue without further delay the negotiations aimed at achieving national reconciliation;

5. Demands that all parties in Somalia refrain from any acts of intimidation or violence against personnel engaged in humanitarian or peacekeeping work in the country;

6. Reaffirms the obligations of States to implement fully the embargo on all deliveries of weapons and military equipment to Somalia imposed by paragraph 5 of resolution 733 (1992);

7. Welcomes the progress made by the Operation in establishing the justice and police programmes and calls for their acceleration;

8. Expresses its appreciation to those Member States which have contributed troops or provided logistical or other assistance to the Operation or have offered to do so, and underlines, in this context, the continuing importance of the Operation having at its disposal the necessary troops, civilian personnel, equipment and financial and logistic support to carry out its mandate effectively;

9. Also expresses its appreciation to those Member States which have extended humanitarian assistance or have supported the Somali justice and police programmes, and encourages further such contributions on an urgent basis;

10. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

After the vote, the representative of China stated that the international community should continue to make every possible endeavour to help the Somali people achieve genuine national reconciliation. He contended that that was the key to ending civil war and restoring peace. He stressed in that connection the important role of OAU. Pointing out that the principle of using non-coercive measures should be observed by UNOSOM II in the performance of its mandate, he expressed the belief that the final resolution of the Somali question lay with the Somali people themselves.⁷⁵

The representative of New Zealand suggested that it would be quite wrong to characterize what had been going on in Somalia over the past four months in negative terms. There were a number of notable successes to counterbalance the setbacks and reasons which explained the slow pace on the political front. That was why his delegation had been strongly of the view that the Security Council had no basis for rejecting the recommendation of the Secretary-General that the mandate of UNOSOM II should be extended for a further six-month period. What Somalia and UNOSOM most needed at that point was a period of stability in which they could consolidate the gains already made and tackle the problems that remained. There were also strong reasons, in the context of the responsible management of peacekeeping operations — both financial reasons and in terms of proper planning — for the Security Council to avoid subjecting the terms of a peacekeeping mandate to artificial and politically generated time frames. That did not mean that the Somali parties should have a free hand to delay indefinitely the process of national reconciliation. He suggested that some in Somalia might welcome the opportunity to speed the United Nations on its way and he warned that, if that were to be the result of the Council's action, the Council would have done a grave disservice to the Somali people and to the humanitarian mission. While noting that the Council had a commitment to maintain the operation until March 1995, he stated that in the coming months the Council should turn its attention to considerations such as what kind of United Nations presence should be envisaged for Somalia after March 1995, and how the UNOSOM operations and structure should be implemented to ensure that the transition to that next phase was as smooth and beneficial to the Somali people as possible.⁷⁶

The representative of the United States stated that the resolution just adopted underscored the growing impatience of the international community with the pace of progress towards national reconciliation in Somalia and placed those responsible for obstructing forward movement on notice. He observed that the adjustment in the length of the mandate's renewal to four months and the provision for a review of progress was not an empty exercise. His delegation supported the tough message the Secretary-General had attempted to deliver to the Somali factions and that he would not hesitate to recommend an end to the mission. He observed that the international community had expended considerable resources and many lives to help Somalia, and contended that in the absence of indications to the contrary, the international community was not prepared to continue helping a people who seemed unwilling to help themselves.⁷⁷

The President, in his capacity as the representative of Nigeria, questioned the course of action to be taken by the international community. He queried whether the United Nations should cut off its assistance to Somalia and abandon the Somalis to a fate dictated not so much by the Somali people, but by the parties and factions that controlled the instruments of violence and coercion in the country, even though, statistically, those elements were "in the tiniest of tiny minorities". He noted that his delegation saw merit in the resolution just adopted calling upon the parties to show good faith, if continued United Nations support in Somalia was to be assured. His delegation also believed that the situation in Somalia, because of its exceptional circumstances — including, in particular, the absence of a government — deserved special and more flexible consideration, and should not be treated in the same framework as some other United Nations peacekeeping operations, where credible governmental and non-governmental authorities existed. He warned that it would be a mistake if, because of the desire for quick results, the United Nations were to embark on a precipitate withdrawal from Somalia, before its initial target date of March 1995, without taking into full account Somalia's special circumstances.⁷⁸

Decision of 28 July 1994: letter from the President to the Secretary-General

On 18 July 1994, pursuant to resolution 923 (1994) of 31 May 1994, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a further report on UNOSOM II in which he described the efforts of UNOSOM II to improve the overall situation in Somalia.⁷⁹

The Secretary-General noted that the overall situation in Somalia had deteriorated since his last report, especially in Mogadishu, due both to a resumption of inter-clan fighting and to a further increase in banditry. However, in many regions daily life was returning to normal, agricultural production was recovering, and progress was being achieved in the rebuilding of institutions, especially the police and the judicial system. Despite those positive signs, national reconciliation process was advancing at a pace so slow that there was little or no reason to believe that the target of completing the process by March 1995 could be achieved. Repeated postponements of conferences, the emergence of new subgroups and the lack of a clear reconciliation process had created the impression that talks between Somali leaders could continue indefinitely. The Secretary-General informed the Council that he had asked his Special Representative to prepare an in-depth assessment of the prospects for national reconciliation in Somalia. He had also decided to undertake a comprehensive review of the troop strength of UNOSOM II. In that regard, he intended to dispatch a special mission which would be entrusted with making recommendations on the future size of UNOSOM II.

In a letter dated 28 July 1994,⁸⁰ the President informed the Secretary-General of the following:

The members of the Council have reviewed the situation as envisaged in resolution 923 (1994) of 31 May 1994. The review was considerably facilitated by the comprehensive nature of your report of 18 July 1994.

The Council members noted with satisfaction the gains made in Somalia on the humanitarian front, with the assistance of the United Nations Operation in Somalia II, United Nations agencies and non-governmental organizations. They also welcomed the progress made in the re-establishment of the Somali police and justice systems as well as in demining activities.

The Council members share your serious concern at the very little forward movement registered in the Somali national reconciliation process since the Nairobi declaration of 24 March 1994 and at the recent deterioration in the security situation in Somalia. They are also disappointed at the repeated postponements of the national reconciliation conference and its preparatory meeting, for which there is still no agreement on either the dates or the venue.

In view of the situation in Somalia, described in your report, the Council members considered most appropriate and timely your directive to your Special Representative for Somalia to prepare an in-depth assessment of the prospects for national reconciliation in Somalia. They also welcomed your decision to dispatch a special mission to Somalia and to present recommendations to the Council on the future size of the Operation as soon as possible.

Decision of 25 August 1994 (3418th meeting):
statement by the President

On 17 August 1994, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report in which he presented his assessment of the prospects for national reconciliation in Somalia and reported on the special mission he had sent to discuss and present recommendations on a possible reduction in the level of troops assigned to UNOSOM II.⁸¹

The Secretary-General reported that ongoing factional disputes and conflicts and disagreements had made it impossible thus far to reach agreement on the date and venue for the preparatory meeting for the convening of a national reconciliation conference. Consequently, the national reconciliation conference that was scheduled to take place on 15 May 1994 had been indefinitely postponed. In addition to those efforts at the national level, inter-clan reconciliation meetings at the local, district and regional levels had also been sponsored by the United Nations to move forward the peace process. They included the Galkayo meeting (June 1993), the Jubaland Peace Conference (June-August 1993), the Lower Juba Reconciliation Conference (Kismayo, June 1994) and the Absame Reconciliation Conference (Dobley, June-July 1994). Taken together, the meetings had enhanced the prospects for national reconciliation.

The Secretary-General noted that it was generally acknowledged that conflicts within the dominant Hawiye clan, to which both Mr. Ali Mahdi and General Mohammed Farah Aidid belonged, constituted the major obstacle to national reconciliation. Both had expressed their willingness to participate in a Hawiye reconciliation conference. The Secretary-General conveyed the view of his Special Representative that, with the cooperation of the parties concerned and the support of the international community, the reconciliation of the Hawiye should be achieved in time to create a favourable climate for the convening of a conference on national reconciliation and the establishment of an interim government in the last quarter of 1994. That would leave three months for consolidating agreed transitional arrangements for the interim government before the completion of the mission of UNOSOM II at the end of March 1995. While agreeing with the assessment of his Special Representative, the Secretary-General noted, however, that there were no clear signs that preparations for a Hawiye conference were under way. He had nevertheless instructed his Special Representative to assist the parties concerned to convene such a conference in the next few weeks. There were also disturbing developments which seemed to militate against national reconciliation. The two antagonistic groups, the Somali National Alliance and the Somali Salvation Alliance (SSA) were continuing to encourage and facilitate the creation of new partisan factions, which were not parties to the agreements reached in Addis Ababa and Nairobi. Such a multiplication of factions would complicate further the prospects for the preparatory meeting and the subsequent national reconciliation conference, and had to be overcome without further delay.

With respect to a possible reduction in the UNOSOM II force, the Secretary-General reported that the special mission had recommended that the force be reduced to 17,200 by the end of September 1994 and no more than 15,000 by the end of October or during November 1994. It had warned that any further reductions should be carefully decided and should take into account evolving circumstances.

The Secretary-General stated that, in the light of the foregoing facts, and after a careful review of the reports submitted to him by his Special Representative and the Special Mission, he had come to the conclusion that the United Nations should continue for a little longer, to give the Somali leaders the opportunity to demonstrate that they were ready to cooperate with the United Nations and with each other in order to bring their country back from the abyss. He accordingly recommended that: (a) UNOSOM II should make every effort to facilitate the convening of a Hawiye conference by the end of September 1994; (b) the Force Commander should take immediate steps to reduce the force level by 1,500, as had been recommended by the Special Mission, and should thereafter bring it down to 15,000 all ranks as soon as possible; (c) in the light of the progress made towards national reconciliation up to the end of September 1994, he would report to the Security Council, by 15 October 1994 at the latest, on the future of UNOSOM II; (d) the Security Council consider approving, at that time or later, a one month extension of the UNOSOM II mandate until 31 October 1994, to allow time for study of, and action on, the report he would submit to it by 15 October; and (e) in the interim, contingency plans for the full range of options referred to in (c) above should be elaborated and refined.

At its 3418th meeting, on 25 August 1994, the Security Council included in its agenda the report of the Secretary-General of 17 August 1994. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representative of Somalia, at her request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (Russian Federation) then stated that, following consultations among members of the Security Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁸²

The Security Council takes note of the report of the Secretary-General to the Security Council on Somalia and briefings by the Secretariat.

⁸² S/PRST/1994/46.

The Council, appalled by the killing near Baidoa on 22 August of seven Indian soldiers and the wounding of nine more serving with the United Nations Operation in Somalia II, strongly condemns the premeditated attack on United Nations peacekeepers who were providing essential support and assistance to the humanitarian effort of the international community in Somalia carrying out the mandate of the Council. The Council expresses its condolences to the Government of India and the families of the soldiers who made the ultimate sacrifice in assisting the people of Somalia.

The Council expresses grave concern regarding the deteriorating security situation in Somalia, and deplores attacks and harassment directed against the Operation and other international personnel serving in Somalia.

The Council considers that a durable political settlement remains an indispensable prerequisite for restoring peace and security, re-establishing central governmental structures and services and commencing the process of rehabilitation and reconstruction of the economic and social fabric in Somalia.

The Council is gravely concerned by the lack of progress in reconciliation among Somali factions. It is particularly concerned by the fact that the national reconciliation conference, to which the fifteen signatories of the Addis Ababa Agreement had agreed in Nairobi on 24 March 1994 and which was scheduled for 15 May 1994, has not taken place. The Council commends the efforts of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General to reinvigorate the process of national reconciliation, including through the encouragement of local and regional initiatives and conferences. In this regard, it attaches great importance to an accelerated inter-clan reconciliation, in particular among the Hawiye subclans, with the involvement of all concerned.

The Council stresses that the nature and the duration of the international support and resources the international community is committing to Somalia, including the continuing presence of the Operation, depend very much on the resolve of the Somali parties to achieve political compromise.

The Council reminds the Somali parties that the future of their country lies in their hands and urges them once again to make every effort to advance the process of political reconciliation in Somalia.

The Council believes that the Secretary-General's proposed initial reduction of the Operation's troops is appropriate in the circumstances prevailing in Somalia. It stresses that priority attention should be given to ensuring the safety and security of Operation and other international personnel, including the staff of non-governmental organizations. In this context it underlines the responsibility of the Somali parties for the security and safety of these personnel.

The Council invites the Secretary-General to submit to the Council well before 30 September 1994 a substantive report on prospects for national reconciliation in Somalia and on the possible options for the future of the Operation.

Decision of 30 September 1994 (3432nd meeting): resolution 946 (1994)

On 17 September 1994, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council the first part of a report concerning the situation in Somalia in which he gave a factual account of new developments in the political, security and humanitarian fields.⁸³

The Secretary-General stated that, since his last report, his Special Representative had been engaged in intensive consultations with Mr. Ali Mahdi, General Mohamed Farah Aidid and the Imam of Hirab, concerning arrangements for convening the Hawiye peace conference and the national reconciliation conference. The Imam of Hirab had advised his Special Representative that it would be necessary to arrange separate meetings between the Habr Gedir and the other subclans before proceeding to a plenary session of the Hawiye peace conference. Over the past few weeks, the Imam had held meetings with various subclan leaders. The Secretary-General noted that on the whole, the initiatives of the Imam and other concerned Hawiye clan leaders appeared to have had a salutary effect on the security situation in Mogadishu. He reported that the leaders of the Lower Juba Reconciliation Conference and the Absame Reconciliation Conference had continued to meet in an effort to merge the two peace processes, in order to consolidate peace in both the Lower and the Middle Juba regions. The Chairman of the Somali National Movement (SNN) had met with the other three north-west-based political factions and had issued a joint statement declaring, inter alia, that secession of the north was neither feasible nor desirable and that the national reconciliation conference was long overdue and should be convened no later than September 1994. The statement also proposed a federal system of government and conveyed an offer by the four factions to use their good offices to mediate between the factions in the South. In that regard, a joint delegation had been sent on 30 August 1994 to Mogadishu to mediate between the factions of the south. The delegation had also intended to meet with the Imam.

The Secretary-General stated that, subject to the cooperation of all concerned, the efforts of the Somali parties, with the assistance of UNOSOM II, could lead to the convening of a Hawiye peace conference and the preparatory meeting for the National Reconciliation Conference by the end of September 1994. He warned, however, against overlooking the daunting difficulties that had delayed and frustrated past efforts to implement the Addis Ababa and Nairobi agreements.

On the security aspects, the Secretary-General noted that, although the force would continue to perform the main tasks assigned to it under its mandate, security considerations had already begun to affect the performance of UNOSOM and the Force Commander had therefore decided to concentrate the troops. As a result of the concentration of forces and the reduction process, troops had already been withdrawn from several locations and that process would continue. By the end of October 1994, UNOSOM II would be concentrated mainly in three locations: Mogadishu, Baidoa and Kismayo. He warned that the force, while continuing to protect major seaports and airports and escorting humanitarian convoys, would no longer be in a position to provide permanent protection to United Nations agencies and non-governmental organizations at the locations that had been vacated.

The Secretary-General stated that by mid-October he expected to be in a position to submit to the Security Council the second part of the report, containing his assessment of the prospects for national reconciliation and recommendations for the future of the United Nations operation in Somalia. He recommended therefore that the Council extend the mandate of UNOSOM II for a period of one month.

At its 3432nd meeting, on 30 September 1994, the Security Council included in its agenda the report of the Secretary-General of 17 September 1994. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representative of Somalia, at her request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (Spain) drew the attention of the Council members to the text of a draft resolution submitted by Rwanda and Spain,⁸⁴ who were joined as sponsors by France, Nigeria, New Zealand and the United Kingdom.

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted by 14 votes to none, with 1 abstention (the United States), as resolution 946 (1994), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolution 733 (1992) of 23 January 1992 and all other relevant resolutions,

Recalling also the statement by the President of the Security Council of 25 August 1994,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 17 September 1994,

Deeply concerned by the deteriorating security environment, strongly condemning the attacks and harassment against the United Nations Operation in Somalia II and other international personnel serving in Somalia, and underlining the responsibility of the Somali parties for the security and safety of these personnel,

Reaffirming that the people of Somalia bear the ultimate responsibility for achieving national reconciliation and for rebuilding their country,

Stressing that the nature and the duration of the international support and resources the international community is committing to Somalia, including the continuing presence of the Operation, depend very much on the resolve of the Somali parties to achieve political compromise,

Urging, in this context, the Somali parties to redouble their efforts to advance the process of national reconciliation in Somalia,

Noting the intention of the Secretary-General to submit to the Council by mid-October his assessment of the prospects of national reconciliation and recommendations for the future of the United Nations operation in Somalia,

1. Decides to extend the mandate of the United Nations Operation in Somalia II for a period of one month expiring on 31 October 1994, prior to which the Council will undertake a thorough examination of the mandate of the Operation with a view to deciding on its future;

2. Encourages the Secretary-General to continue with and intensify preparations of contingency arrangements for the implementation of possible decisions, including withdrawal of the Operation within a specified time frame, which the Council may take;

3. Declares its readiness to consider sending a mission of the Council to Somalia at the appropriate time in order to convey directly to the Somali political parties the views of the Council on the situation in Somalia and on the future of the United Nations presence there;

4. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

After the vote, the representative of France recalled that his country had previously supported a progressive reduction of UNOSOM forces with a view to the completion of the operation in March 1995 and that it continued to do so, even if it was ready to participate in a debate on the subject. He cautioned that for the Council to terminate a force prematurely would be a serious decision. His country was aware that the lack of progress towards a political solution in Somalia, and the impotence of UNOSOM II, justified a genuine, thorough debate in the Security Council — a debate after which decisions regarding the future of UNOSOM and the maintenance of the United Nations presence in Somalia should be taken. In any case his country considered that the United Nations should continue, in one way or another, to play a role in Somalia, with a view to consolidating the achievements of UNOSOM, helping to achieve national reconciliation, if that was within the Organization's power, and providing humanitarian assistance and contributing to the reconstruction of the country.⁸⁵

The representative of Oman observed that, unfortunately, the Somali people had not responded positively or shown any desire to solve the problems arising from their differences. He stated that his delegation did not, therefore, see any justification for the continued presence of the United Nations forces in Somalia. He contended that the resolution just adopted showed that the Security Council's patience was running thin and that October would mark a decisive stage in the United Nations Operation in Somalia. Although his delegation would have preferred the resolution to have included a clear reference to the decisive stage through which UNOSOM II was passing, including the possibility of winding up the operation in its entirety, it had nevertheless voted in favour of the resolution just adopted in the belief that it might represent the last chance for the people of

⁸⁵ S/PV.3432, pp. 2-3.

Somalia to overcome its plight and solve its problems.⁸⁶

The representative of the United States stated that, throughout the current four-month mandate of UNOSOM, there had been two constants: the continuing deterioration of the security situation and the total lack of progress on political reconciliation. While the security environment had been getting worse, the political situation had not improved. She contended that the sole legacy of the preceding four months was “a pile of broken promises” and that her Government would not listen to “another assurance of just one more month, just one more conference”. Her Government could not vote for the draft resolution because it had failed to recognize the necessity of stepping up to the critical task of immediate withdrawal. At the same time, conscious of the need to continue the mandate for the protection of the troops during the withdrawal period, her Government was not willing to vote against an extension. It was her firm hope and expectation that the Secretary-General would utilize the coming days to complete planning for the withdrawal and would, in his next report, provide the Council with a realistic proposal for an orderly and expeditious withdrawal. She saw no reason why such a report could not be presented in the near future to permit the Council to consider and act on withdrawal well before the end of the one-month extension.⁸⁷

The President, in his capacity as the representative of Spain, stated that Spain had co-sponsored the resolution as a responsible member of the Council which considered that a decision that affected the future of any United Nations peacekeeping operation, and particularly an operation of that importance, could not be made precipitously and in the absence of all the necessary criteria. The contents of the resolution sent a clear message to the Somali factions that the international community’s patience was coming to an end.⁸⁸

By a note dated 21 October 1994,⁸⁹ the President announced that, at consultations of the whole held on 20 October, the members of the Council had decided to send a mission to Somalia. The members of the Council had agreed that the mission departing for Somalia on 24 October 1994 was to be composed of the following seven members of the Council: China, France, New Zealand, Nigeria, Pakistan, the Russian Federation and the United States.

Decision of 31 October 1994 (3446th meeting):
resolution 953 (1994)

On 14 October 1994, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council the second part of his report concerning the situation in Somalia which drew upon the results of the visit to Somalia of the Under-Secretary-General for Peacekeeping Operations.⁹⁰

The Under-Secretary-General had reported to the Secretary-General that he had found the Somali leaders quite keen to establish a transitional government to fill the political vacuum that had existed for so long in Somalia. They expected the National Reconciliation Conference to appoint such a government and to examine proposals relating to the establishment of a federal system of government. At that time, they expected to convene before the end of September the long-delayed preparatory meeting for the National Reconciliation Conference, to be followed by the National Reconciliation Conference in early October 1994. General Aidid, the leader of the Somali National Alliance, had informed the Under-Secretary-General that the new view of SNA was that there was a sufficient basis to proceed directly to the convening of such meetings, meaning that it was unnecessary to convene the Hawiye Reconciliation Conference. That view was not shared, however, by other leaders of the Hawiye subclans. The Secretary-General noted that, given the hopes placed in the Hawiye Reconciliation Conference, the proposal to bypass it would seem to be a negative development.

The Secretary-General noted that the protracted political impasse in Somalia had created a vacuum of civil authority and of governmental structure, leaving the United Nations with no function to build on in its efforts to help Somalia emerge from its chaotic condition. The presence of UNOSOM II troops had had limited impact on the peace process and on security. If the Council were to maintain its decision to end the mission in March 1995, then he would recommend its extension until 31 March 1995, in order for the withdrawal to take place in a secure, orderly and expeditious manner.

The Secretary-General stated, however, that it should not be assumed that there would be no progress in the process of national reconciliation. On the contrary, he had instructed his Special Representative that, during the new mandate period, he should maintain his efforts to help the Somali leaders achieve national reconciliation, at least to the extent of agreeing to establish a transitional government. He noted that, in the event that progress could be made in that direction, he would not hesitate to revert to the Security Council with recommendations for the continuation of some United Nations presence in Somalia beyond March 1995, if that was justified by the overriding objective of restoring effective government.

The Secretary-General concluded by reiterating that the establishment of a viable and acceptable peace could only come from the Somalis themselves. The international community could not impose peace, it could only assist. Therefore, reaffirmation of the Council's decision that the UNOSOM II mandate should end in March 1995 would not mean United Nations abandonment of Somalia.

At its 3446th meeting, on 31 October 1994, the Security Council included in its agenda the report of the Secretary-General of 14 October 1994. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (the United Kingdom) drew the attention of the Council members to the text of a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.⁹¹

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and was adopted unanimously as resolution 953 (1994), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolution 733 (1992) of 23 January 1992 and all other relevant resolutions,

Recalling also its resolution 946 (1994) of 30 September 1994, in which it, inter alia, declared its readiness to consider sending a mission of the Council to Somalia at the appropriate time in order to convey directly to the Somali political parties

⁹¹ S/1994/1222.

the views of the Council on the situation in Somalia and on the future of the United Nations presence there,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 14 October 1994,

Having decided, at the consultations held on 20 October 1994, to send a mission to Somalia, and convinced that it should consider the report of this mission before completing its review of the mandate of the United Nations Operation in Somalia II and deciding on its future,

1. Decides to extend the mandate of the United Nations Operation in Somalia II for an interim period expiring on 4 November 1994;

2. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Decision of 4 November 1994 (3447th meeting):
resolution 954 (1994)

By a letter dated 3 November 1994 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁹² the members of the Security Council's mission to Somalia transmitted a report of their visit to Somalia, which took place on 26 and 27 October 1994. The report was submitted to the Council in accordance with a decision taken by the Council during informal consultations on 20 October 1994. The mission had met with Somali faction leaders, representatives of the Horn of Africa countries, United Nations agencies and non-governmental organizations. During those meetings it had been made clear to the Somali leaders that only a genuinely inclusive approach to political reconciliation was likely to lead to a secure environment, and that the legitimacy of any unilaterally declared governments would therefore be doubtful. It had also conveyed to all interested parties the message that the Council did not intend to abandon Somalia. The humanitarian and non-governmental organizations had also confirmed their intention to continue to operate in Somalia if security conditions permitted.

Although the Somali factions had received the Council's message with a surprising degree of acceptance, the mission cautioned that everything it had seen had left it with a profound sense of unease and a fear that, whether or not UNOSOM left, it was far from certain that political reconciliation would eventuate or that a Government that enjoyed widespread acceptance would emerge. It warned that the risk of a return to civil war was real and recommended that the Security Council should continue to receive reports and monitor the situation in Somalia, even after the withdrawal of UNOSOM. Since neither the Somali factions nor the humanitarian or non-governmental organizations had requested a longer extension, the mission recommended 31 March 1995 as the appropriate date to end the mandate of UNOSOM II.

At its 3447th meeting, on 4 November 1994, the Security Council included in its agenda the reports of the Secretary-General concerning the situation in Somalia of 17 September 1994 and 14 October 1994.⁹³ Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representatives of Kenya and Somalia, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (United States) then drew the attention of the Council members to the text of a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.⁹⁴

The representative of Kenya claimed that the reports of the Secretary-General had not given sufficient attention to the regional dimension of the Somali conflict. He pointed out that the neighbouring countries, including his own, had shouldered the heavy burden arising out of the Somali conflict. His Government wanted the Council to give that concern adequate consideration as it discussed the future of UNOSOM. He noted that, at the peak of the crisis in Somalia, neighbouring countries had hosted at least 2 million Somali refugees, and that his country alone had hosted about 750,000 of those refugees. Along with the influx of refugees, there had also been widespread infiltration of armed bandits and dangerous weapons into the neighbouring countries, resulting in serious destabilization of the border region. Since 1992, Kenya had lost about 1,000 of its civilian population and 87 members of its security personnel. The loss of livestock and property had also been extensive. That clearly underscored the regional dimension of the Somali conflict as a serious threat to Kenya's security and to the economic system in the border region. Kenya requested that the Council assist in the establishment of a border-monitoring system to reduce the insecurity and tension that threatened the border region. His country also appealed to the Council to authorize a special mission to assess the regional dimension of the Somalia problem before it took a definitive decision on the future of UNOSOM. He stated further that, while the Somali leaders were squarely responsible for the continued interfactional fighting and the destruction of the Somali State, the international community had the responsibility to persevere in the search for a peaceful solution in Somalia, as it was doing in other conflicts elsewhere in the world. Two of the principal missions of the United Nations, namely the maintenance of international peace and security and responding to humanitarian concerns, had yet to be accomplished in the case of Somalia. The Council had to take all necessary precautions and safeguards to ensure that there was no escalation of the conflict after the departure of UNOSOM. He maintained that waiting a little longer in order to allow the establishment of a central authority in Somalia appeared the most logical way forward, and warned that any escalation of the conflict after the departure of UNOSOM would jeopardize humanitarian and rehabilitation efforts and trigger new waves of refugees, which the neighbouring countries could not cope with. Increased banditry in the border region could also lead to more serious regional conflicts.⁹⁵

Before the vote, the representative of New Zealand stated that his country believed very strongly that the United Nations was right to respond to the crisis in Somalia in the way that it had. Intervention under Chapter VII had been necessary and appropriate because of the humanitarian tragedy and the threat to the security of neighbouring countries. Moreover, his country was particularly sensitive to, and supportive of, requests that the collective security mechanisms of the United Nations be equally available for the benefit of the small and underprivileged, as they were for the larger and more powerful. Referring to the Security Council mission, he stated that it had played an important part in restoring the consensus in the Council. It had established that UNOSOM had achieved all it could achieve in Somalia. Neither the Somali people nor the providers of humanitarian assistance had requested that it be extended beyond March of the following year. He contended that the United Nations was not going to abandon Somalia. His delegation had therefore urged that the draft resolution ⁹³ The report of the Secretary-General was submitted in two parts. For the discussion of the first part (S/1994/1068), see the summary of the decision of 30 September 1994. For the discussion of the second part (S/1994/1166), see the summary of the decision of 31 October 1994.

also had to address the future and was very pleased that it did so. He noted that, after the withdrawal of UNOSOM, much of the responsibility would shift away from the Security Council. His country considered, however, that because of the extraordinary situation in Somalia and because of the responsibilities that the Security Council had assumed for the previous two years, those responsibilities would not cease. That was why his delegation had proposed, as was reflected in operative paragraph 13 of the draft resolution, that the situation should continue to be monitored closely. The security situation, humanitarian relief requirements, the situation of the humanitarian workers, the impacts on neighbouring countries, all needed to be the subject of ongoing vigilance. He also noted that, in the draft resolution, the Council asked the Secretary-General, in the light of developments, not only to keep the Security Council informed, but also to reflect creatively about the role the United Nations could continue to play. He further noted that the draft resolution insisted that the arms embargo had to be respected, and he called on all concerned to shoulder their responsibilities in that regard.⁹⁶

The representative of Oman stated that the draft resolution reflected the fact that the international community had exhausted every possible means to put an end to the crisis and thus had decided to withdraw the military units from Somalia before the end of March 1995, without having fully achieved many of its objectives. It also reflected the failure of the Somali people to benefit from the efforts of the international community and to achieve political progress and pave the way to national reconciliation and the formation of a new Government to fill the political vacuum and, later, to restore peace and security in Somalia. His delegation was very much encouraged, however, to note that there would be a continuation of the humanitarian relief assistance, even after the withdrawal of the military units, and that, at the same time, the Secretary-General, through his good offices, would continue to sustain a facilitating or mediating political role in Somalia.⁹⁷

The representative of Nigeria stated that the draft resolution, through which the Council would decide to terminate the mandate of UNOSOM II by the end of March 1995, was a hard but realistic conclusion. He observed that, as the Secretary-General had indicated in his report, the establishment of a viable and acceptable peace could come only from the Somalis themselves; it could not be imposed by the international community. However, the draft resolution recognized that the international community had a continuing role and responsibility in facilitating the political process in Somalia, leading to the establishment of a viable administration for the benefit of the Somali people. His delegation strongly believed that the withdrawal of the military component of UNOSOM II should not mean the abandoning of Somalia by the United Nations. It welcomed the provision in the draft resolution to the effect that, should the Somali authorities succeed in creating and maintaining favourable security conditions in Somalia, the United Nations and the international community stood ready to continue to play a positive role in both the rehabilitation and the reconstruction of the country, thus consolidating the achievements of both UNOSOM I and UNOSOM II. He also noted that the draft resolution gave an assurance that, in the post-UNOSOM II period, the United Nations would be able to retain a presence in Somalia that would be beneficial to the Somali people. His delegation hoped that the next report of the Secretary-General would be able to make concrete suggestions concerning the future role of the United Nations and would take due account of the need for continuing political and humanitarian assistance to Somalia. Finally, he echoed the concern expressed by Kenya that the security and refugee situations that had developed as a result of the continuing Somali crisis should not have further negative effects on the fragile economies of the neighbouring countries. He urged the international community to take positive steps to solve that problem.⁹⁸

⁹⁶ Ibid., pp. 4-7.

⁹⁷ Ibid., p. 7.

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and was adopted unanimously as resolution 954 (1994), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolution 733 (1992) of 23 January 1992 and all other relevant resolutions,

Noting with appreciation the work of the Security Council's mission in transmitting directly to Somalia's political parties the views of the Council on the situation in Somalia and on the future of the United Nations in that country, ⁹⁸ Ibid., pp. 8-9.

Having considered the reports of the Secretary-General of 17 September 1994 and 14 October 1994 and the oral report of the Security Council's mission to Somalia given on 31 October 1994,

Paying tribute to the thousands of personnel of the United Nations Operation in Somalia and the Unified Task Force, as well as to humanitarian relief personnel who have served in Somalia, and honouring, in particular, those who have sacrificed their lives in this service,

Noting that hundreds of thousands of human lives have been rescued from famine in Somalia through the efforts of the United Nations and the international community,

Commending the efforts of the special representatives of the Secretary-General to bring Somali factions together in national reconciliation,

Reaffirming that the people of Somalia bear the ultimate responsibility for achieving national reconciliation and bringing peace to Somalia,

Convinced that only a genuinely inclusive approach to political reconciliation would provide for a lasting political settlement and re emergence of a civil society in Somalia,

Recalling that the date already foreseen for termination of the current United Nations Operation in Somalia is the end of March 1995,

Recognizing that the lack of progress in the Somali peace process and in national reconciliation, in particular the lack of sufficient cooperation from the Somali parties over security issues, has fundamentally undermined the United Nations objectives in Somalia and, in these circumstances, continuation of the Operation beyond March 1995 cannot be justified,

Recognizing further that termination of the mandate of the Operation by the end of March 1995 implies a secure and orderly phasing out of its military component in advance of that date,

Noting the assurances of cooperation and non-interference with such withdrawal received from all Somali parties during the Council's mission to Somalia,

Re-emphasizing the importance the Council attaches to the safety and security of United Nations and other personnel engaged in humanitarian relief and peacekeeping in Somalia,

Underlining particularly in this context the overriding need for all possible measures and precautions to be taken to ensure that the Operation does not suffer any casualties in the process of withdrawal,

Emphasizing its willingness to encourage the Secretary-General to sustain a facilitating or mediating political role for Somalia beyond March 1995 if that is what the Somalis want and if the Somali parties are willing to cooperate with the United Nations,

Concerned that the United Nations should continue to work with regional organizations, in particular the Organization of African Unity, the League of Arab States and the Organization of the Islamic Conference, and with the Governments of neighbouring countries to promote reconciliation in Somalia and the re-emergence of a civil society there,

Recognizing also the impact that the situation in Somalia has had on neighbouring countries including, in particular, flows of refugees,

Noting that the United Nations will do its best to sustain humanitarian activities in Somalia and to encourage non-governmental organizations to do likewise, but that their ability to do so will depend almost entirely on the degree of cooperation and security offered by Somali parties,

Confident of the willingness of the United Nations to remain ready to provide through its various agencies rehabilitation and reconstruction assistance, including assistance to the police and judiciary to the extent that the situation in Somalia develops in such a way as to make that practicable,

Noting further the interest of humanitarian agencies and non-governmental organizations in cooperating with the United Nations after the withdrawal of the Operation in transitional arrangements for mutual assistance,

Determining that the situation in Somalia continues to threaten peace and security, and having regard to the exceptional circumstances including, in particular, the absence of a government in Somalia, and acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

1. Decides to extend the mandate of the United Nations Operation in Somalia II for a final period until 31 March 1995;

2. Affirms that the primary purpose of the Operation until its termination is to facilitate political reconciliation in Somalia;

3. Welcomes the intention of the Secretary-General, expressed in paragraph 23 of his report of 14 October 1994, to continue throughout the period of the mandate of the Operation, and even afterwards, the efforts of his Special Representative to help the Somali parties achieve national reconciliation;

4. Urges all Somali factions to negotiate as soon as possible an effective ceasefire and the formation of a transitional Government of national unity;

5. Decides that every effort should be made to withdraw all the Operation's military forces and assets from Somalia in a secure and orderly manner as soon as possible, as described in the report of the Secretary-General of 14 October 1994, before the expiry date of the current mandate of the Operation and without compromising on the paramount need of ensuring the safety of Operation personnel;

6. Authorizes the military forces of the Operation to take those actions necessary to protect its mission and the withdrawal of its personnel and assets, and, to the extent that the Force Commander deems it practicable and consistent, in the context of withdrawal, to protect personnel of relief organizations;

7. Emphasizes the responsibility of the Somali parties for the security and safety of Operation and other personnel engaged in humanitarian activities, and in this context strongly demands that all parties in Somalia refrain from any acts of intimidation or violence against such personnel;

8. Requests Member States to provide assistance in the withdrawal of all the Operation's military forces and assets, including vehicles, weapons and other equipment;

9. Requests that the Secretary-General keep the Council informed about the progress of the withdrawal process;

10. Invites the Organization of African Unity, the League of Arab States and the Organization of the Islamic Conference to continue their efforts in cooperation with the United Nations in the search for lasting peace in Somalia;

11. Calls upon all Member States, in particular the neighbouring States, to continue to provide support for all Somali efforts towards genuine peace and national reconciliation and to refrain from any action capable of exacerbating the conflict situation in Somalia;

12. Reiterates the need for the observance and strict monitoring of the general and complete embargo on all deliveries of weapons and military equipment to Somalia, as decided in paragraph 5 of resolution 733 (1992), and in this regard requests the Security Council Committee established pursuant to resolution 751 (1992) concerning Somalia to fulfil its mandate as described in paragraph 11 of that resolution, in particular to seek the cooperation of neighbouring States for the effective implementation of the embargo;

13. Further requests the Secretary-General to continue to monitor the situation in Somalia and to the extent possible to keep the Security Council informed in particular about developments affecting the humanitarian situation, the security situation for humanitarian personnel in Somalia, repatriation of refugees and the impact on neighbouring countries, and to report to the Council before 31 March 1995 on the situation in Somalia and submit suggestions concerning the role that the United Nations could play in Somalia beyond that date;

14. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

After the vote, the representative of France stated that the United Nations was not responsible for the failure of attempts to achieve national reconciliation, and observed that certain Somali factions, which had consistently refused to cooperate with the Special Representative of the Secretary-General and the United Nations Operation in Somalia to find a peaceful solution, bore the responsibility for what might subsequently happen in Somalia. His delegation had received alarming information about an inflow of weapons and military equipment into Somalia. As a result of the fear that the departure of the "blue helmets" might be accompanied by an explosion of violence, his delegation had wanted the Council to issue a strong reminder that it had decreed a military embargo at the beginning of 1992 and that that embargo must be fully applied. He urged that the sanctions Committee set up to that end had to fulfil the mandate entrusted to it by resolution 751 (1992). The speaker pointed out that in five months time the "blue helmets" would be fully withdrawn. Therefore that period must be used to keep trying to reach agreement between the factions. His delegation was pleased that the Secretary-General had asked his Special Representative to continue his efforts. He also stressed that the countries of the region and regional organizations in contact with Somalia had a crucial role to play in the settlement of the Somali crisis.⁹⁹

The representative of Pakistan stated that, in the absence of progress in the Somali reconciliation process, coupled with the lack of sufficient cooperation from the Somali parties concerned as well as the continuously precarious security situation in that country, it had become very difficult to justify the presence of UNOSOM II in Somalia beyond the period foreseen in Security Council resolutions 865 (1993), 897 (1993) and 923 (1994). He stated that his delegation therefore fully agreed with the decision of the Council to extend the mandate of UNOSOM II for a final period up to 31 March 1995 and noted that, in the interim, every effort should be made to withdraw all UNOSOM II military forces and assets from Somalia in a secure and orderly manner. He emphasized, however, that the withdrawal of the military component of UNOSOM II should not be seen as a decision by the Council to abandon Somalia. He noted that, under the resolution, the Council had welcomed the intention of the Secretary-General to continue the efforts of his Special Representative to help the Somali parties achieve national reconciliation and had requested the Secretary-General to continue to monitor the situation in Somalia, to report to the Security Council in that regard before 31 March 1995, and also to submit suggestions concerning the role that the United Nations could play in Somalia beyond that date.¹⁰⁰

The representative of China argued that, after UNOSOM II had left Somalia, the international community and the United Nations should continue to care about the Somali people. He contended that the United Nations should not only continue, but should also strengthen, its efforts of peaceful mediation, and international humanitarian assistance. He stated that the international community had come to realize that the key to a lasting settlement in Somalia lay with the Somali people themselves and that the solution was to be found in broad-based national reconciliation, which could not be achieved by resort to military means. His delegation hoped that neighbouring States and regional organizations would continue to help the Somali people achieve an early national reconciliation, thus contributing to peace and stability in the region.¹⁰¹

The representative of the United Kingdom stated that the resolution just adopted had implications not only for Somalia, but also for other countries of the region. He referred to the potential for regional instability if fighting broke out again in Somalia and stated that, for the sake of people in neighbouring countries and of the people of Somalia, neither the United Nations and the international community, nor the regional organizations most directly concerned, nor the neighbouring countries, could afford to turn their backs on the problem. He maintained that the resolution did not imply that the United Nations as a whole had decided to abandon Somalia. The Security Council would continue to monitor the situation, and stood willing to encourage the Secretary-General to sustain a facilitating or mediating political presence in Somalia beyond March 1995. He believed that the United Nations agencies and non-governmental organizations also had a continuing role to play in Somalia, but cautioned that their ability to provide assistance, both humanitarian and rehabilitation, or reconstruction assistance, would depend on the degree of cooperation and security offered by the Somali parties.¹⁰²

The representative of Brazil contended that the Security Council had taken too long to realize that, against the backdrop of an extremely complex political situation, it could not bring peace to Somalia. He argued that too much had been done and too many lives had been spent, with glaringly scarce results, in the attempt to create an environment conducive to the attainment of a peace settlement and lasting political stability. His delegation had voted in favour of the resolution just adopted because it provided the necessary framework for the role of the personnel of UNOSOM II and for the continuation of a United Nations presence in Somalia. He stated that the United Nations should do its utmost to continue to support the political process and all efforts that could lead to an effective ceasefire and to the formation of a transitional Government of national unity.¹⁰³

The representative of the Russian Federation stated that his delegation had voted in favour of the resolution in the belief that it sent a clear signal to the leaders of the Somali factions that the international community could not keep waiting and providing major resources for much longer in circumstances in which the Somali parties were not ready to turn away from confrontation towards national reconciliation and the creation of civil society in their country. He referred to the appeal in the resolution just adopted to OAU, LAS and OIC to continue to cooperate with the United Nations in the search for lasting peace in Somalia, as well as to the call on Member States — in particular the neighbouring States — to continue to provide support for the Somali efforts towards genuine peace and to refrain from any action capable of exacerbating the conflict situation in the country. He also noted that, in that context, the Security Council had issued a pertinent reminder regarding the need for strict observance of the arms embargo imposed on Somalia.¹⁰⁴

Decision of 7 December 1994: letter from the President to the Secretary-General

By a letter dated 10 November 1994 addressed to the President of the Council,¹⁰⁵ the Secretary-General called the attention of the Council to the statement of the Inter-Agency Standing Committee on Somalia. The statement reflected, inter alia, the conclusions of a special meeting that had been convened at Nairobi on 24 and 25 October 1994, with the participation of representatives of United Nations organizations, intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations active in humanitarian assistance operations, to review the future of humanitarian operations in Somalia following the termination of the mandate of UNOSOM II.

By a letter dated 7 December 1994,¹⁰⁶ the President informed the Secretary-General of the following:

I have the honour to inform you that your letter of 10 November 1994 concerning the Inter-Agency Standing Committee on Somalia has been brought to the attention of the members of the Council. They take note of the information contained therein.

The Council continues to believe that the United Nations should do its utmost to sustain humanitarian activities in Somalia. The Council therefore welcomes the statement by the members of the Inter-Agency Standing Committee reconfirming their commitment to continue to the maximum extent possible emergency and rehabilitation activities even beyond the expiry of the mandate of the United Nations Operation in Somalia and their agreement to adopt a common and coordinated approach to such activities.

The Council has consistently recognized that the cooperation of the Somalis on security issues is critical to the continuation of humanitarian activities and agrees fully with the conclusion of the Inter-Agency Standing Committee that the Somali people bear responsibility for ensuring conditions which will permit the effective implementation of humanitarian, rehabilitation and development programmes.

In this context the members of the Council recall their willingness to encourage you to play a facilitating or mediating political role in respect of Somalia after March 1995 if that it was the Somalis want and if the Somali parties are willing to cooperate with the United Nations. They also note that, in its resolution 954 (1994) of 4 November 1994, the Council requested you to continue to monitor the situation in Somalia and the security situation for humanitarian personnel in Somalia and they look forward to receiving your report at an appropriate time.

Decision of 6 April 1995 (3513th meeting):
statement by the President

On 28 March 1995, pursuant to resolution 954 (1994) of 4 November 1994, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the situation in Somalia in which he reported on the new developments since his last report and presented some thoughts on ¹⁰⁶ S/1994/1393.

the role the United Nations could play beyond 31 March 1995.¹⁰⁷

The Secretary-General reported that there had been significant political developments during the last two weeks of the withdrawal of UNOSOM II. Four agreements had been signed by General Aidid and Mr. Ali Mahdi, on behalf of the Somali National Alliance and the Somali Salvation Alliance, respectively. Under the first agreement, which was signed on 21 February 1995, the two sides, inter alia, accepted the principle of power-sharing; pledged not to seek the presidency through military means but through democratic elections; and agreed to the resolution of disputes through dialogue and peaceful means and on a common platform for tackling problems. The second agreement, signed on 23 February 1995, provided for the establishment of two joint committees to manage the operations of the Mogadishu airport and seaport. The reopening of the seaport had resulted from the signing of a third agreement, on 5 March 1995, and on 8 March 1995 the two leaders had initialled a fourth agreement to establish a security committee comprising militia and police officers from both sides. The Secretary-General noted that the signing of the agreements had had a salutary effect on the political process as a whole, with both SNA and SSA emphasizing that there would be no war between them. His Special Representative had reported to him that, on the basis of the agreements reached, the SNA and SSA militias were collaborating in providing security at the Mogadishu airport and seaport, in collaboration with the Somali police force. As a result, the situation in Mogadishu had improved, and it was understood that both sides had settled down to serious discussions on the convening of a broad-based national reconciliation conference, as advocated by his Special Representative. The Secretary-General stated that he was encouraged by the fact that the withdrawal of UNOSOM II had coincided with the signing of those agreements. Those indications of a possible rapprochement between the two sides might justify the hope that the Somali leaders would find the strength and the courage to pursue a more productive peace process in the coming weeks.

The Secretary-General recalled that on numerous occasions he had stated that the withdrawal of UNOSOM II did not mean that the United Nations was abandoning Somalia. He noted that the United Nations agencies and organizations, as well as non-governmental organizations, had voiced their determination to continue humanitarian operations in Somalia. Their focus in the post UNOSOM II era would be on rehabilitation, recovery and reconstruction, without prejudice to emergency relief where that was necessary. He noted, however, that the fulfilment of that objective would depend primarily on the willingness of the Somali people to cooperate effectively and reliably with the agencies and non-governmental organizations. He stated that he would continue to make available his good offices to assist the Somali factions to arrive at a political settlement, maintaining a political presence in the area for that purpose. He observed that the size and mandate of that presence would depend on whether the Somali factions wanted the United Nations to play a facilitating or mediating role, and on whether they were ready to cooperate with it. He recommended that its location should be in Mogadishu, but he noted that it would depend on security considerations. He further noted that it had been because of the lack of security in Mogadishu that he had directed his Special Representative to move temporarily to Nairobi at the end of February, but that it remained his intention to re-establish a United Nations political presence in Mogadishu as soon as practicable. For the time being, he had instructed his Special Representative to remain in Nairobi in order to monitor the situation in Somalia and coordinate United Nations humanitarian activities there. He indicated that he expected to be in a position to take decisions about the level and mandate of the United Nations political presence in Mogadishu by mid-April 1995, at which time he would report his intentions to the Security Council.

The Secretary-General noted that the report itself marked a point of transition in the efforts of the United Nations to succour a people and a country caught in the throes of famine, civil war and the collapse of all institutions of government. He stated that it had been a difficult mission that had not attained all the objectives that the Security Council had set for it, but he contended, nevertheless, that the United Nations Operation in Somalia could claim major accomplishments, especially when one recalled that in late 1992, 3,000 men, women and children were dying daily of starvation and that that tragedy had been ended by the international relief effort. He observed that, as far as national reconciliation was concerned, the international community, through the efforts of UNITAF and UNOSOM I and II, had striven to create an environment conducive to the Somali leaders to achieve that goal.

The Secretary-General observed that the experience of UNOSOM II had thus confirmed the validity of the point that the Security Council had consistently stressed in its resolutions on Somalia, namely that the responsibility for political compromise and national reconciliation must be borne by the leaders and people concerned. He further observed that there were important lessons to be learned about the theory and practice of multifunctional peacekeeping operations in conditions of civil war and chaos, and especially about the “clear line” that needed to be drawn between peacekeeping and enforcement action. The world had changed and so had the nature of the conflict situations that the United Nations was being asked to deal with. The Secretary-General contended that there was a need for careful and creative rethinking about peacemaking, peacekeeping and peacebuilding in the context of the Somali operation, and he noted that some of his initial conclusions were to be found in his position paper, the “Supplement to an Agenda for Peace”.¹⁰⁸

At its 3513th meeting, on 6 April 1995, the Security Council included in its agenda the report of the Secretary-General of 28 March 1995. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President of the Council (Czech Republic) stated that, following consultations among members of the Security Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:¹⁰⁹

The Security Council has considered carefully the report of the Secretary-General of 28 March 1995 on the situation in Somalia and notes the successful conclusion of the withdrawal from Somalia of the forces of the United Nations Operation in Somalia II. It expresses its appreciation to those Governments and agencies which have provided the personnel, humanitarian assistance and other support to the peacekeeping operation in Somalia, including those Governments that participated in the multinational operation for the withdrawal of the United Nations Operation in Somalia II. It pays tribute in particular to all personnel who sacrificed their lives in this service.

The Council underlines the fact that the timely intervention of the United Nations Operation in Somalia II and the humanitarian assistance given to Somalia helped to save many lives and much property, mitigate general suffering and contributed to the search for peace in Somalia. The Council notes that, over the past three years, the United Nations and the international community have made significant efforts to restore peace and stability and facilitate the re emergence of a civil society. However, the continuing lack of progress in the peace process and in national reconciliation, in particular the lack of sufficient cooperation from the Somali parties over security issues, undermined the United Nations objectives in Somalia and prevented the continuation of the mandate of the United Nations Operation in Somalia II beyond 31 March 1995.

The Council believes that the Somalia operation provides important lessons for the theory and practice of peacemaking, peacekeeping and peacebuilding.

The Council remains convinced that only a genuinely representative and broad based approach to reconciliation will bring about a lasting political settlement and allow for the re-emergence of a civil society in Somalia. The Council reaffirms, based on its experience in the United Nations Operation in Somalia II, that the people of Somalia bear the ultimate responsibility for achieving national reconciliation and restoring peace to Somalia. The international community can only facilitate, encourage and assist the process, but not try to impose any particular solution on it. The Council, therefore, calls upon the Somali parties to pursue national reconciliation, rehabilitation and reconstruction in the interest of peace, security and development.

The Council notes the recent agreements reached between the factions in Mogadishu, especially on the control of sea and airport facilities. It expresses the hope that this encouraging development is indicative of a new spirit of cooperation among the factions and that it will lead to further progress in the search for a lasting peace in Somalia.

The Council supports the view of the Secretary-General that Somalia should not be abandoned by the United Nations, which will continue to assist the Somali people to achieve a political settlement and to provide humanitarian and other support services provided that the Somalis themselves demonstrate a disposition to peaceful resolution of the conflict and to cooperation with the international community. It welcomes the Secretary-General's intention to continue a small political mission, should the Somali parties so wish, to assist them in coming together in national reconciliation and looks forward to the report that the Secretary-General has indicated he will forward on this matter. The Council urges close cooperation between the United Nations and regional organizations, in particular the Organization of African Unity, the League of Arab States, the Organization of the Islamic Conference, as well as the Governments of neighbouring countries in these efforts. The Council considers it essential that the Somali parties clearly express their acceptance of such assistance and their willingness to cooperate with the United Nations.

The Council recognizes that humanitarian assistance in Somalia is an important element in the effort to restore peace and security in the country. It is therefore important to sustain

United Nations humanitarian activities in Somalia and to encourage non-governmental organizations to do likewise. However, their ability to do so will depend on the degree of cooperation and security offered by the Somali parties. The Council welcomes the willingness expressed by the international humanitarian agencies and non-governmental organizations to continue to provide rehabilitation and reconstruction assistance in areas where security is guaranteed by the Somalis. The Council stresses that the creation of a long-lasting, stable and secure environment throughout the country is vital for the resumption of large scale activity in these fields.

The Council reaffirms the obligations of States to implement fully the embargo on all deliveries of weapons and military equipment to Somalia imposed by paragraph 5 of resolution 733 (1992), and calls upon States, especially neighbouring States, to refrain from actions capable of exacerbating the conflict in Somalia.

The Council requests the Secretary-General to continue to monitor the situation in Somalia and to keep it informed about further developments. The Council will remain seized of the matter.

Decision of 21 April 1995: letter from the President to the Secretary-General

By a letter dated 18 April 1995 addressed to the President of the Council,¹¹⁰ the Secretary-General informed the Council that, with regard to a continued United Nations political presence in Mogadishu, he had decided to establish a small political office to monitor the situation in Somalia and keep contact with the parties concerned. In his view, the retention of a full-time Special Representative on the situation in Somalia could not be justified at that time, in view of the limited possibilities for United Nations political efforts related to Somalia. The office would operate temporarily from Nairobi, but would be relocated to Mogadishu as soon as circumstances permitted.

By a letter dated 21 April 1995,¹¹¹ the President informed the Secretary-General that his letter had been brought to the attention of the members of the Council and that they had welcomed his decision contained therein.

Decision of 2 June 1995: letter from the President to the Secretary-General informed the Council that, due to the circumstances prevailing in Somalia, he had decided that the political office for Somalia would continue to operate out of Nairobi. He had further decided to reduce the staff of that office.

7. Letters dated 20 and 23 December 1991 from France, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the United States of America

Decision of 8 April 1993: statement by the President

On 8 April 1993, after consultations among the members of the Council, the President issued the following statement on behalf of the Security Council:¹

The members of the Security Council held informal consultations on 8 April 1993 pursuant to paragraph 13 of resolution 748 (1992) of 31 March 1992, by which the Council decided to review every 120 days or sooner, should the situation so require, the measures imposed by paragraphs 3 to 7 against the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya.

After hearing all the opinions expressed in the course of consultations, the President of the Council concluded that there was no agreement that the necessary conditions existed for modification of the measures of sanctions established in paragraphs 3 to 7 of resolution 748 (1992).

Decision of 13 August 1993: statement by the President

On 13 August 1993, after consultations among the members of the Council, the President issued the following statement on behalf of the Security Council:²

The members of the Council held informal consultations on 13 August 1993 pursuant to paragraph 13 of resolution 748 (1992) of 31 March 1992, by which the Council decided to review every 120 days or sooner, should the situation so require, the measures imposed by paragraphs 3 to 7 against the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya.

After hearing all the opinions expressed in the course of consultations, the President concluded that there was no agreement that the necessary conditions existed for modification of the measures of sanctions established in paragraphs 3 to 7 of resolution 748 (1992).

Decision of 11 November 1993 (3312th meeting): resolution 883 (1993)

At its 3312th meeting, on 11 November 1993, the Security Council included the item entitled "Letters dated 20 and 23 December 1991 from France, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the United States of America" in its agenda and considered it at the same meeting.³ The Council invited the representatives of Egypt, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya and the Sudan, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (Cape Verde) then drew the attention of the members of the Council to the text of a draft resolution submitted by France, the United Kingdom and the United States.⁴ He also drew their attention to several other documents.⁵

The representative of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya challenged the fact that the Security Council was meeting to consider a matter that threatened international peace and security. In his view, the Council was meeting to consider a draft resolution that sought to intensify sanctions against his country, under the pretext that it had not complied with resolution 731 (1992). The truth of the matter was that his

³ The Council had agreed, in prior consultations, that the current formulation of the agenda item would overtake the earlier two formulations under which the item had been previously discussed; accordingly, they were deleted from that list (see PV/3312; see also chapter II).

⁴ S/26701.

⁵ Letters dated 13 August 1993 from the representative of France (S/26304) and 22 September and 1, 18 and 22 October 1993 from the representative of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya (S/26500, S/26523, S/26604 and S/26629), all addressed to the Secretary-General.

Government had fully responded to that resolution, except in regard to the demand by the United States and the United Kingdom that the two alleged suspects be extradited. That problem had not yet been solved because of a legal wrangle over which country had the competence to try those individuals. The Libyan Arab Jamahiriya had submitted to the Secretary-General, on 11 September 1993, a memorandum that contained points relating to its legal position vis-à-vis resolutions 731 (1992) and 748 (1992).⁶ In that memorandum, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya had asked questions based on the assumption that the two accused would challenge the charges levelled at them and voluntarily agree to stand trial before a foreign court. The memorandum also asked for clarification and safeguards relating to the foreign country concerned. On 24 September 1993, his Government had received the Secretary-General's answers to some of the questions raised⁷ and had notified him on 29 September 1993 that the two suspects had been given the relevant replies.⁸ The Secretary-General had also been given confirmation that the safeguards he had offered were sufficient and acceptable, and that the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya would not object to the appearance of the two suspects before the Scottish judiciary and would even urge them to appear before the Scottish courts. Furthermore, assurances had also been given that the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya would deal with the French demands with the same determination with which it had been dealing with the American and British demands. The speaker further indicated that the two suspects had not disagreed as to the principle of the trial, but had insisted that it be conducted in a place where neutrality and fairness could be guaranteed and where the proper procedures and arrangements for such a trial could be made. As part of the efforts of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya to find a solution, the Government of Switzerland had been contacted for permission to hold the trial on its soil. He also recalled that his country had responded positively to the request made to pay appropriate compensation, by declaring its readiness to pay if it was proven responsible for the downing of Pan Am flight 103 and UTA flight 772.

The Libyan position, he argued, had been extremely flexible whereas the other side had adopted a rigid and intransigent position based on the logic of force. He contended that the sanctions imposed on his country had severely hurt the Libyan people and had had a negative impact on its development plans. More specifically, the prohibition on the export to the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya of spare parts, engineering services and maintenance required for Libyan aircraft and their components had had adverse effects on a vital sector of the economy. He also charged that the United States and the United Kingdom had been trying, under the auspices of the Committee of the Security Council established under resolution 748 (1992), to widen the scope of the sanctions using "transparent pretexts" and "rigid positions". He warned that the tightening of sanctions would not solve the problem but rather complicate it.

Turning to the draft resolution, he stated that it repeated the same "grave legal mistake" of previous resolutions by linking the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya to international terrorism on no other basis but the suspicions regarding two Libyan nationals based on reports by intelligence agencies, which were an a priori judgement that had not yet been substantiated by any evidence. He recalled, in that regard, that his country had declared, on 14 May 1992, in a letter to the Secretary-General,⁹ its unequivocal condemnation of international terrorism, had affirmed that there were no terrorist training camps or terrorist organizations or groups on its soil, and had invited the United Nations to verify it. He further stated that the draft resolution constituted a "blatant violation" of the provisions of the Charter and the norms of international law, because it dealt with a legal dispute under Chapter VII instead of Chapter VI of the Charter. Finally, there was no justification for the draft resolution since the parties were approaching the final phase in the settlement of the dispute. In that regard, he reiterated the commitment of his Government to find a solution to the problem that arose from the demands of the United States and the United Kingdom within the framework of international law. As for the French demands, he affirmed that they did not contain anything that ran counter to the law. He believed that had the French judge not attempted to come to the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya on a military destroyer, his country's response to the French demands would have had encouraging results.¹⁰

The representative of the Sudan, speaking on behalf of the League of Arab States (LAS), pointed out that the crisis between the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, on one hand, and the United States, France and the United Kingdom, on the other hand, was a legal dispute which should be dealt with on the basis of Article 33, Chapter VI, and not under Chapter VII of the Charter which addressed threats to international peace and security. It should be settled in a court of law, and specifically by the International Court of Justice, and not in the Security Council, which was not mandated by the Charter to exercise judicial functions. Noting that the matter before the Council concerned a State member of LAS, he pointed out that LAS had expressed its willingness to provide its good offices and to cooperate with the Secretary-General and the Security Council. In that context, it had established a seven-member committee entrusted with following developments and finding a just and peaceful solution to the conflict, in conformity with the rules of international law, justice and the relevant international treaties. In dealing with the crisis, the League had based itself on the Charter of the United Nations, which stipulated that all international disputes should be settled by peaceful means and without endangering international peace and security, and especially on Article 52 of the Charter. He contended that the draft resolution before the Council was not the best way to end the dispute. Moreover, it could have negative results and shake the confidence of smaller countries in the legal settlement of such disputes and the Council's neutrality. The interpretation of legal texts, especially the Charter, should be carried out only by judicial organs, and no other body could arrogate that competence for itself. He also warned that the impact of the sanctions had gone beyond the people of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya and had affected neighbouring countries. In that context, Article 50 of the Charter could be of only minimal help to those who were suffering as a result of the impositions of sanctions.¹¹

The draft resolution was thereupon put to the vote and was adopted by 11 votes in favour to none against, with 4 abstentions (China, Djibouti, Morocco and Pakistan) as resolution 883 (1993), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolutions 731 (1992) of 21 January 1992 and 748 (1992) of 31 March 1992, Deeply concerned that after more than twenty months the Libyan Government has not fully complied with these resolutions,

Determined to eliminate international terrorism,

Convinced that those responsible for acts of international terrorism must be brought to justice,

Convinced also that the suppression of acts of international terrorism, including those in which States are directly or indirectly involved, is essential for the maintenance of international peace and security,

Determining, in this context, that the continued failure by the Libyan Government to demonstrate by concrete actions its renunciation of terrorism, and in particular its continued failure to respond fully and effectively to the requests and decisions in resolutions 731 (1992) and 748 (1992), constitute a threat to international peace and security,

Taking note of the letters to the Secretary-General dated 29 September and 1 October 1993 from the Secretary of the General People's Committee for Foreign Liaison and International Cooperation of Libya and his speech in the general debate at the forty-eighth session of the General Assembly in which Libya stated its intention to encourage those charged with the bombing of Pan Am flight 103 to appear for trial in Scotland and its willingness to cooperate with the competent French authorities in the case of the bombing of Union de Transports Aériens flight 772,

Expressing its gratitude to the Secretary-General for the efforts he has made pursuant to paragraph 4 of resolution 731 (1992),

Recalling the right of States, under Article 50 of the Charter of the United Nations, to consult the Council where they find themselves confronted with special economic problems arising from the carrying out of preventive or enforcement measures,

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter,

1. Demands once again that the Libyan Government comply without any further delay with resolutions 731 (1992) and 748 (1992);

2. Decides, in order to secure compliance by the Libyan Government with the decisions of the Council, to take the following measures, which shall come into force at 0001 hours eastern standard time on 1 December 1993 unless the Secretary-General has reported to the Council in the terms set out in paragraph 16 below;

3. Decides also that all States in which there are funds or other financial resources (including funds derived or generated from property) owned or controlled, directly or indirectly, by:

- (a) The Government or public authorities of Libya; or
- (b) Any Libyan undertaking;

shall freeze such funds and financial resources and ensure that neither they nor any other funds and financial resources are made available, by their nationals or by any persons within their territory, directly or indirectly, to or for the benefit of the Government or public authorities of Libya or any Libyan undertaking, which for the purposes of this paragraph, means any commercial, industrial or public utility undertaking which is owned or controlled, directly or indirectly, by:

- (i) The Government or public authorities of Libya,
- (ii) Any entity, wherever located or organized, owned or controlled by the Government or public authorities of Libya, or
- (iii) Any person identified by States as acting on behalf of the Government or public authorities of Libya or by any entity, wherever located or organized, owned or controlled by the Government or public authorities of Libya for the purposes of the present resolution;

4. Further decides that the measures imposed by paragraph 3 above do not apply to funds or other financial resources derived from the sale or supply of any petroleum or petroleum products, including natural gas and natural gas products, or agricultural products or commodities, originating in Libya and exported therefrom after the time specified in paragraph 2 above, provided that any such funds are paid into separate bank accounts exclusively for these funds;

5. Decides that all States shall prohibit any provision to Libya by their nationals or from their territory of the items listed in the annex to this resolution, as well as the provision of any types of equipment, supplies and grants of licensing arrangements for the manufacture or maintenance of such items;

6. Also decides that, in order to make fully effective the provisions of resolution 748 (1992), all States shall:

(a) Require the immediate and complete closure of all Libyan Arab Airlines offices within their territories;

(b) Prohibit any commercial transactions with Libyan Arab Airlines by their nationals or from their territory, including the honouring or endorsement of any tickets or other documents issued by that airline;

(c) Prohibit, by their nationals or from their territory, the entering into or renewal of arrangements for:

- (i) The making available, for operation within Libya, of any aircraft or aircraft components, or

(ii) The provision of engineering or maintenance servicing of any aircraft or aircraft components within Libya;

(d) Prohibit, by their nationals or from their territory, the supply of any materials destined for the construction, improvement or maintenance of Libyan civilian or military airfields and associated facilities and equipment, or of any engineering or other services or components destined for the maintenance of any Libyan civil or military airfields or associated facilities and equipment, except emergency equipment and equipment and services directly related to civilian air traffic control;

(e) Prohibit, by their nationals or from their territory, any provision of advice, assistance, or training to Libyan pilots, flight engineers, or aircraft and ground maintenance personnel associated with the operation of aircraft and airfields within Libya;

(f) Prohibit, by their nationals or from their territory, any renewal of any direct insurance for Libyan aircraft;

7. Confirms that the decision taken in resolution 748 (1992) that all States shall significantly reduce the level of the staff at Libyan diplomatic missions and consular posts includes all missions and posts established since that decision or after the coming into force of the present resolution;

8. Decides that the Governments of all States, and the Government of Libya, shall take the necessary measures to ensure that no claim shall lie at the instance of the Government or public authorities of Libya, or of any Libyan national, or of any Libyan undertaking as defined in paragraph 3 above, or of any person claiming through or for the benefit of any such person or undertaking, in connection with any contract or other transaction or commercial operation where its performance was affected by reason of the measures imposed by or pursuant to the present resolution or related resolutions;

9. Instructs the Committee of the Security Council established by resolution 748 (1992) to draw up expeditiously guidelines for the implementation of paragraphs 3 to 7 above, and to amend and supplement, as appropriate, the guidelines for the implementation of resolution 748 (1992), especially its paragraph 5 (a);

10. Entrusts the Committee of the Security Council established by resolution 748 (1992) with the task of examining possible requests for assistance under the provisions of Article 50 of the Charter of the United Nations and making recommendations to the President of the Council for appropriate action;

11. Affirms that nothing in the present resolution affects Libya's duty scrupulously to adhere to all of its obligations concerning servicing and repayment of its foreign debt;

12. Calls upon all States, including States not members of the United Nations, and all international organizations, to act strictly in accordance with the provisions of the present resolution, notwithstanding the existence of any rights or obligations conferred or imposed by any international agreement or any contract entered into or any licence or permit granted prior to the effective time of the present resolution;

13. Requests all States to report to the Secretary-General by 15 January 1994 on the measures they have instituted for meeting the obligations set out in paragraphs 3 to 7 above;

14. Invites the Secretary-General to continue his role as set out in paragraph 4 of resolution 731 (1992);

15. Calls again upon all Member States individually and collectively to encourage the Libyan Government to respond fully and effectively to the requests and decisions in resolutions 731 (1992) and 748 (1992);

16. Expresses its readiness to review the measures set forth above and in resolution 748 (1992) with a view to suspending them immediately if the Secretary-General reports to the Council that the Libyan Government has ensured the appearance of those charged with the bombing of Pan Am flight 103 for trial before the appropriate United Kingdom or United States court and has satisfied the French judicial authorities with respect to the bombing of Union de Transports Aériens flight 772, and with a view to lifting them immediately when Libya complies fully with the requests and decisions in resolutions 731 (1992) and 748 (1992), and requests the Secretary-General, within ninety days of such suspension, to report to the Security Council on Libya's compliance with the remaining provisions of its resolutions 731 (1992) and 748 (1992) and, in the case of non-compliance, expresses its resolve to terminate immediately the suspension of these measures;

17. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Annex

List of items referred to in paragraph 5 of the present resolution:

- I. Pumps of medium or large capacity whose capacity is equal to or larger than 350 cubic metres per hour and drivers (gas turbines and electric motors) designed for use in the transportation of crude oil and natural gas.
- II. Equipment designed for use in crude oil export terminals:
 - Loading buoys or single point moorings (spm);
 - Flexible hoses for connection between underwater manifolds (plem) and single point mooring and floating loading hoses of large sizes (from 12 to 16 inches);
 - Anchor chains.
- III. Equipment not specially designed for use in crude oil export terminals but which because of their large capacity can be used for this purpose:

- Loading pumps of large capacity (4,000 cubic metres per hour) and small head (10 bars);
- Boosting pumps within the same range of flow rates;
- In-line pipeline inspection tools and cleaning devices (i.e. pigging tools) (16 inches and above);
- Metering equipment of large capacity (1,000 cubic metres per hour and above).

IV. Refinery equipment:

- Boilers meeting American Society of Mechanical Engineers 1 standards;
- Furnaces meeting American Society of Mechanical Engineers 8 standards;
- Fractionation columns meeting American Society of Mechanical Engineers 8 standards;
- Pumps meeting American Petroleum Institute 610 standards;
- Catalytic reactors meeting American Society of Mechanical Engineers 8 standards.
- Prepared catalysts, including the following:

Catalysts containing platinum and those containing molybdenum.

V. Spare parts destined for the items in I to IV above.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of the United States said that the resolution just adopted demonstrated that the Council was steadfast in its opposition to international terrorism which presented a challenge to every nation in the world. Her Government was determined to pursue justice, and that pursuit must, when necessary, include sanctions of the Security Council. The resolution was "balanced and precisely targeted". Its hallmarks were an assets freeze, a limited equipment embargo against the Libyan oil industry, and the tightening of earlier sanctions. She stressed that the resolution was directed at Libya, and Libya alone, and the Libyan Government knew what it must do. The Council awaited the turnover of those indicted for the bombing of Pan Am 103; the Libyan Government's cooperation with the French judiciary; compensation for the victims of Libyan terrorism; and its clear and confirmed renunciation of terrorism.¹²

The representative of France regretted that the Council had found it necessary to reinforce sanctions against the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya. His Government, as well as the Governments of the United Kingdom and the United States, had given that country a final chance to prove its good will by complying with its obligations before 1 October 1993. Unfortunately, the Libyan authorities had continued to delay and obstruct the process. Rejecting the allegation that the aforementioned Governments had a “hidden agenda” against the Libyan regime, he affirmed that if the Libyan Government cooperated effectively with the French judicial authorities in the UTA 772 case, and handed over to the competent courts the two suspects in the attack on Pan Am 103, the Council would immediately suspend all sanctions.¹³

The representative of the United Kingdom said that the new resolution had adopted a carefully balanced approach. Thus, in addition to the “stick” of further sanctions there was also a “carrot”: if the Secretary-General reported to the Council that the Libyan Government had ensured the appearance of those charged with the Lockerbie bombing before the appropriate United States or Scottish court and had satisfied the French judicial authorities with respect to the bombing of UTA 772, then the Security Council would review the sanctions with a view to suspending them immediately. The suspension of the sanctions was to be seen as preliminary to their being lifted immediately after the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya had complied fully with resolutions 731 (1992) and 748 (1992). That new element was designed to make it clear that sanctions were not intended to punish, but rather to bring the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya to compliance. The resolution also contained a grace period before the sanctions came into effect. He concluded by saying that it was important not only to secure justice for the victims, but also to send a clear message to current and would-be terrorists and sponsors of terrorism that the international community would neither condone nor tolerate it, and that it was not cost-free.¹⁴

The representative of Brazil said that his country’s support for the resolution just adopted was an expression of its commitment to eradicating international terrorism. He made it clear, however, that Brazil understood that the action taken by the Council was aimed exclusively at addressing a political problem involving a threat to international peace and security and that it could not be construed in a manner inconsistent with the presumption of innocence.¹⁵ Furthermore, efforts to combat and prevent acts of international terrorism must be based on relevant principles of international law and the existing international Conventions. As provided for in Article 24 (2) of the Charter, the Council was bound to discharge its responsibilities in accordance with the purposes and principles of the United Nations, and therefore its decisions, including those under Chapter VII, had to be construed in the light of those purposes and principles, which, inter alia, required respect for the principles of justice and international law. Finally, he stated that his delegation attached great importance to operative paragraph 10 of the resolution, on possible requests for assistance under Article 50 of the Charter. It also believed that, as there were an increasing number of cases in which sanctions were applied, there was a proportionate need to examine ways in which the United Nations could ensure a more effective application of Article 50 beyond that particular case.¹⁶

The representative of China contended that the disputes between States, no matter how complicated, should be settled peacefully by diplomatic and political means. The Chinese delegation had previously opposed the imposition of sanctions on the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, and under the changing circumstances, was still not in favour of maintaining, let alone intensifying, those sanctions. In that context, regional organizations, such as the Organization of African Unity, LAS and the Movement of Non-Aligned Countries, were in a better position to promote the settlement of the question. He urged the parties concerned to adopt a flexible and compromising attitude in order to create the necessary conditions for a final settlement.¹⁷

The representative of the Russian Federation stated that his country was anxious to cooperate with the world community in putting an end to acts of international terrorism which was essential for the maintenance of international peace and security. His delegation attached particular importance to paragraph 11 of the resolution just adopted, the purpose of which was to ensure that, as a result of the additional sanctions imposed on the Libyan Arab

Jamahiriyah, the interests of other States would be harmed as little as possible.¹⁸

During the course of the debate, a number of speakers reiterated their condemnation of terrorism in all its forms and urged the Libyan Arab Jamahiriyah to comply fully with the relevant resolutions of the Security Council. Some also called upon the Secretary-General, the regional organizations and interested governments to continue their efforts in order to find a peaceful solution to the dispute.¹⁹

8. The situation in Mozambique

Decision of 14 April 1993 (3198th meeting): resolution 818 (1993)

On 2 April 1993, pursuant to resolution 797 (1992) of 16 December 1992, the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council a report on the United Nations Operation in Mozambique (ONUMOZ),¹ in which he reported on the operation's deployment and the progress made in the implementation of the General Peace Agreement.²

The Secretary-General's assessment of the period under review included a number of positive developments. The ceasefire had largely held, both parties had continued to exercise restraint, and a need for peace was strongly felt among the Mozambicans. Arrangements had also been worked out to permit the Zimbabwean and Malawian troops to remain in the transport corridors which ran across Mozambique to neighbouring landlocked countries beyond the time specified in the Agreement. The Secretary-General noted, however, that there were several reasons for concern. Many of the timetables established in the Agreement had proved to be unrealistic. There had been little progress in implementing a crucial aspect of the Agreement, namely demobilization, which had affected the timetable of the whole peace process. Under the terms of the Agreement, the ceasefire was to be followed by the separation of the two sides' forces and their concentration in certain assembly areas. Demobilization of troops who would not serve in the Mozambican Defence Force was to begin immediately thereafter. Continuing deep mistrust between the parties, however, had resulted in reluctance to begin assembly and demobilization of troops, and had contributed to the delay in the deployment of United Nations military observers. Another complication was the insistence by the Resistência Nacional Moçambicana (RENAMO) that its troops would not assemble unless 65 per cent of the United Nations armed components were deployed and ensuring stability in areas under its control. That interpretation, he stated, went beyond the provisions of the Agreement and the operational plan of ONUMOZ. Delays had also accumulated in the implementation of another aspect of the Agreement. The timetable for holding the elections was seriously in question. Although a draft Electoral Law had been circulated, the delays in doing so required adjustment of the timetables, particularly the dates for the elections. He indicated that he would continue his discussions with the parties on the new dates and would keep the Council informed. He reiterated that the military situation must be brought fully under control for the election to be successful, and appealed to both parties, and to interested countries which had offered assistance, to complete as soon as possible the arrangements for the training of the Mozambican Defence Force which remained a high priority.

The Secretary-General also reported delays relating to the full deployment of ONUMOZ. Reasons for that varied from a lack of quick responses by troop-contributing countries to United Nations requests for troops to the absence of a status-of-forces agreement between the Government of Mozambique and the United Nations, which was yet to be approved. He had received personal assurances from the Government that the agreement would be signed without further delay. Further, he had directed that every effort be made to complete the deployment of the ONUMOZ military component by May 1993.

At its 3198th meeting, on 14 April 1993, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representatives of Mozambique and Portugal, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (Pakistan) then drew the attention of the members of the Council to the text of a draft resolution prepared in the course of its prior consultations,³ and read out a revision made to the draft. The President also drew their attention to a letter dated 30 December 1992 from the representative of Italy,⁴ addressed to the Secretary-General, transmitting the summary of the conclusions of the Donors Conference for Mozambique, held in Rome on 15 and 16 December 1992.

The representative of Mozambique stated that six months had already elapsed since the signing of the Agreement and, despite the existence of numerous obstacles, peace, fragile as it might be, was a tangible reality in his country. A ceasefire was being observed by the parties, even in the absence of international supervision and monitoring. The fundamental issue, however, was that the Agreement had to be fully respected and faithfully implemented in letter and spirit. Recalling that the Agreement was made up of seven Protocols, he pointed out that Protocol III, which dealt with the cessation of the armed conflict, was one of its most fundamental and decisive components. The document established an operational timetable for the ceasefire, according to which the separation, concentration and demobilization of forces would take place within 180 days of the entry into force of the Agreement. Since none of the steps described above had been implemented, his Government was therefore concerned that that delay would impose a delay in the timetable for the electoral process. In addition, the electoral campaign could only begin after the formation of the Mozambican Defence Force, a process that had not yet been started because of the failure of RENAMO to select its candidates for the training of the first group of instructors in Nyanga, Zimbabwe. Moreover, due to the failure of RENAMO to appoint its representatives, it had not been possible to set up the National Police Affairs Commission and the Commission on Territorial Administration. Stating that as far as his Government was concerned, all efforts were being made to implement its share of responsibilities, he informed the Council that the Government had just handed over to the political parties a draft electoral law for their consideration and was hoping that their review would conclude in time to allow the Assembly to adopt it next June. The speaker emphasized that the peace process could not be sustained without international supervision and monitoring. The rapid deployment of the United Nations forces was therefore crucial. In that regard, he informed the Council that his Government had just submitted its view on the draft status-of-forces agreement and was looking forward to signing the agreement as soon as the negotiations were concluded. Turning to the issue of refugees and displaced persons, he said that an agreement had recently been concluded in Geneva with the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR), for the repatriation of 1.5 million Mozambican citizens from neighbouring countries. He concluded by stating that his Government would continue to cooperate fully with the Secretary-General and his Special Representative towards the establishment of a lasting peace and effective democracy in Mozambique, as called for in the Agreement.⁵

Many other speakers who participated in the debate expressed concern over the delays in implementing major aspects of the Agreement and urged the parties to comply fully with their commitments without further delays,⁶ and to work together to finalize the precise timetable for its full implementation. They also stressed the importance of an early deployment of ONUMOZ.

The draft resolution, as orally revised, was thereupon put to the vote, and was adopted unanimously as resolution 818 (1993), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolutions 782 (1992) of 13 October 1992 and 797 (1992) of 16 December 1992,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 2 April 1993,

Welcoming the efforts of the Secretary-General to implement fully the mandate entrusted to the United Nations Operation in Mozambique,

Reiterating the importance it attaches to the General Peace Agreement for Mozambique and to the timely fulfilment by all parties in good faith of the obligations contained therein,

Seriously concerned at delays in the implementation of major aspects of the Agreement,

Noting the efforts of the Government of Mozambique and the Resistência Nacional Moçambicana to maintain the ceasefire,

1. Takes note with appreciation of the report of the Secretary-General of 2 April 1993 and the recommendations contained therein;

2. Calls upon the Government of Mozambique and the Resistência Nacional Moçambicana to cooperate fully with the Secretary-General and his Special Representative in the full and timely implementation of the mandate of the United Nations Operation in Mozambique;

3. Stresses its concern about the delays and difficulties which are seriously affecting the timetable for implementation of the peace process envisaged in the General Peace Agreement for Mozambique and in the report of the Secretary-General of 3 and 9 December 1992 containing the operational plan for the Operation;

4. Urges the Government of Mozambique and the Resistência Nacional Moçambicana to take urgent and determined steps to comply with the commitments they entered into within the framework of the above-mentioned Agreement, in particular with respect to the concentration, assembly and demobilization of their armed troops and the formation of the new unified armed forces;

5. Also urges the Government of Mozambique and the Resistência Nacional, in this context, to initiate the training of the first elements of the new Mozambican Defence Forces as soon as possible, and calls upon the countries which have offered assistance to cooperate in this respect, with a view to the earliest possible completion of the arrangements for such training;

6. Welcomes the initiatives and readiness of both parties to convene as soon as possible a meeting between the President of the Republic of Mozambique and the President of the Resistência Nacional Moçambicana, in order to address major issues pertaining to peace in Mozambique;

7. Strongly appeals to the Resistência Nacional to ensure the effective and uninterrupted functioning of the joint commissions and monitoring mechanisms;

8. Strongly appeals also to both the Government of Mozambique and the Resistência Nacional to allow timely investigation of all ceasefire violations and to ensure the freedom of movement of people and goods as foreseen in the General Peace Agreement;

9. Welcomes the Secretary-General's intention to ensure prompt deployment of military contingents of the United Nations Operation in Mozambique, and calls upon troop-contributing countries to expedite the dispatch of their troops earmarked for service in the Operation;

10. Strongly urges the Government of Mozambique and the Resistência Nacional to finalize, in consultation with the Secretary-General, the precise timetable for the full implementation of the provisions of the General Peace Agreement, including the separation, concentration and demobilization of forces, as well as for the elections;

11. Stresses the importance it attaches to the early signature of the status-of-forces agreement between the Government of Mozambique and the United Nations to facilitate the free, efficient and effective operation of the Operation;

12. Strongly urges both sides to guarantee the Operation's freedom of movement and verification capabilities pursuant to the commitments made under the General Peace Agreement;

13. Appreciates the assistance and pledges made by Member States in support of the peace process, and encourages the donor community to provide appropriate and prompt assistance for the implementation of major aspects of the Agreement;

14. Requests the Secretary-General to keep the Security Council informed of developments regarding the full implementation of the provisions of the Agreement, including on progress in the consultations with the Government of Mozambique and the Resistência Nacional concerning the finalization of the precise timetable for separation, concentration and demobilization of forces, as well as for the elections, and to submit a further report to the Council by 30 June 1993;

15. Expresses its confidence in the Special Representative of the Secretary-General and its appreciation for the work he has done to date in coordinating all aspects of the Agreement;

16. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of the United Kingdom hoped that with the arrival of the United Nations forces, the parties would select and send the first groups of trainees to the facility at Nyanga where his Government had provided training facilities. It was also very important that the Government of Mozambique should complete the negotiations with the United Nations on a status-of-forces agreement. He finally urged both parties to work together in a spirit of compromise so that the country could move forward to elections.⁷ Similar views were expressed by the representatives of France,⁸ the Russian Federation⁹ and the United States.¹⁰

The representative of the Russian Federation stated that his delegation had supported the draft resolution just adopted since it would lend additional momentum to the performance of the tasks facing the United Nations in conducting the operation in Mozambique. The resolution contained an important appeal to the Government of Mozambique and to RENAMO to cooperate fully with the Secretary-General and his Special Representative in the full and timely implementation of the mandate of ONUMOZ. He called on the Secretary-General to finalize the precise timetable for the full implementation of the provisions of the Agreement, in consultation with both parties.⁹

Decision of 9 July 1993 (3253rd meeting):
resolution 850 (1993)

On 30 June 1993, pursuant to resolution 818 (1993) of 14 April 1993, the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council a report on ONUMOZ.¹¹ The Secretary-General reported that despite earlier delays, the peace process in Mozambique had finally moved forward. Many positive developments had occurred, namely, the virtually full deployment of ONUMOZ in various regions of the country, the establishment of a trust fund for receiving voluntary contributions to assist RENAMO,¹² as well as the resumption of the work of many of the joint commissions. In addition, a status-of-forces agreement had been signed between the Government of Mozambique and the United Nations on 14 May 1993, and the withdrawal of foreign troops, provided for in the Agreement, had been successfully completed. While noting that a firm foundation existed for advancing the peace process, the Secretary-General observed that unless the major provisions of the Agreement were implemented, the future of the country would continue to remain uncertain. Delays were reported regarding demobilization of troops, the formation of the Mozambican Defence Force and the establishment of two very important bodies, the National Elections Commission and the Commission of State Administration. The latter was of particular significance, as the RENAMO leadership had publicly declared that it would not allow members of the Frente de Libertação de Moçambique (FRELIMO) to conduct political, social or economic activities in RENAMO controlled territory. The Secretary-General noted that moves that obstructed the extension of government administration throughout the country would be in violation of the spirit and letter of the Agreement. A positive factor was that the President of Mozambique and the leader of RENAMO had agreed to meet in Maputo in July 1993. The Secretary-General also indicated that both parties had requested his Special Representative to assume chairmanship of the Joint Commission for the Formation of the Mozambican Defence Force, in order to ensure impartiality in the Commission's work and to provide effective secretariat services. The Secretary-General was willing to accede

¹¹ S/26034.

¹² Italy had contributed almost $6 million to the fund, and a number of Member States had announced their intention to contribute.

to the request, with the consent of the Security Council, on the strict understanding that that would not entail any obligation on the part of the United Nations for training or establishing the new armed forces.

According to the Secretary-General, in order for the peace plan to succeed, the cantonment and demobilization of troops should start in the coming days and be completed early in 1994 and the training of the new army should be initiated as soon as possible. Elections could be held no later than October 1994. While the general parameters of the new timetable for the peace process had been thoroughly discussed, the Secretary-General was still awaiting final agreement from both parties.

At its 3253rd meeting, on 9 July 1993, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representative of Mozambique, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (United Kingdom) then drew the attention of the members of the Council to the text of a draft resolution prepared in the course of prior consultations¹³ and read out a revision made to the draft.

Speaking before the vote, the representative of the United States stated that her Government continued to support strongly the ONUMOZ mission but was concerned over delays in the implementation of the peace accord. Recalling that it was the slow pace of the ONUMOZ's deployment that had contributed to previous delays, she pointed out however that the United Nations had largely delivered on its commitments and that the peacekeeping forces were in place. It was up to the Government of Mozambique and RENAMO to take advantage of the presence of ONUMOZ and move the peace process forward. The United States would find it difficult to support any postponement of the elections past October 1994. The speaker expressed the hope that the forthcoming meeting between the President of Mozambique and the RENAMO leader would serve as a catalyst for resolving outstanding differences and that it would accelerate the pace of the process.¹⁴

The draft resolution, as orally revised, was thereupon put to the vote and was adopted unanimously as resolution 850 (1993), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolutions 782 (1992) of 13 October 1992, 797 (1992) of 16 December 1992 and 818 (1993) of 14 April 1993,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 30 June 1993,

Reiterating the importance it attaches to the General Peace Agreement for Mozambique and to the timely fulfilment by all parties in good faith of obligations contained therein,

Seriously concerned that the delays in the implementation of major aspects of the Agreement have not been entirely overcome,

Encouraged by the efforts of the Government of Mozambique and the Resistência Nacional Moçambicana to maintain the ceasefire,

Noting with satisfaction the signature of the status-of-forces agreement between the Government of Mozambique and the United Nations, and the full deployment of all the main infantry battalions of the United Nations Operation in Mozambique,

Also noting with satisfaction the successful completion of the withdrawal of Zimbabwean and Malawian troops as provided for in the General Peace Agreement,

1. Approves the report of the Secretary-General of 30 June 1993;

2. Pays tribute to the Special Representative of the Secretary-General, to the Force Commander of the United Nations Operation in Mozambique and to the military and civilian personnel of the Operation who are tackling with determination and dedication the difficult task of helping the people of Mozambique to achieve lasting peace and democracy in their country;

3. Welcomes the progress made to date in the implementation of the provisions of the General Peace Agreement for Mozambique, but stresses its concern that the delays previously reported to the Security Council have not been entirely overcome, in particular with respect to the assembly and demobilization of forces, the formation of the new unified armed forces and finalizing the arrangements for the elections;

4. Underlines in this respect the importance it attaches to the holding of the elections no later than October 1994;

5. Welcomes the agreement of the parties to the convening of a meeting between the President of the Republic of Mozambique and the President of the Resistência Nacional Moçambicana in Maputo on 17 July 1993 to address major issues pertaining to the implementation of the General Peace Agreement;

6. Invites the Government of Mozambique and the Resistência Nacional to cooperate fully with the Secretary-General and his Special Representative in their efforts to promote a resolution of these difficulties and to agree without delay to the revised timetable for the implementation of the provisions of the Agreement on the basis of the general parameters described in paragraphs 21 to 23 of the report of the Secretary-General;

7. Urges the Government of Mozambique and the Resistência Nacional to begin, as a matter of urgency, the assembly and demobilization of their forces without waiting for all assembly areas to become operational;

8. Urges the Resistência Nacional to dispatch without further delay its military personnel to the military centre in Nyanga, Zimbabwe, for training, together with military personnel of the Government of Mozambique, as the first elements of the new Mozambican Defence Forces;

9. Approves the recommendation of the Secretary-General that the United Nations Operation in Mozambique should chair the Joint Commission for the Formation of the Mozambican Defence Force, on the strict understanding that this would not entail any obligation on the part of the United Nations for training or establishing the new armed forces, and encourages the Resistência Nacional to participate fully in the work of the Joint Commission;

10. Stresses the importance of the early establishment of the Commission for State Administration and the application throughout the country of the provisions of the General Peace Agreement concerning public administration;

11. Notes with appreciation the assistance and pledges made by Member States in support of the peace process, and encourages donors to provide appropriate and prompt assistance for the implementation of major aspects of the Agreement;

12. Also notes with appreciation the contribution from the Government of Italy to the trust fund described in paragraph 12 of the report of the Secretary-General, and welcomes the intention of a number of other Member States to contribute;

13. Requests the Secretary-General to keep the Council informed of developments regarding the full implementation of the provisions of the General Peace Agreement and to submit a report to the Council by 18 August 1993 on the outcome of the discussions on the revised timetable, including for the assembly and demobilization of forces and the formation of the new unified armed forces;

14. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Decision of 13 September 1993 (3274th meeting):
resolution 863 (1993)

On 30 August and 10 September 1993, pursuant to resolution 850 (1993) of 9 July 1993, the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council a report on

ONUMOZ describing the activities of the Operation in implementing the military, humanitarian, electoral and political aspects of its mandate.¹⁵

The Secretary-General stated that the most significant development since his last report to the Council had been the long overdue start of direct talks between the President of Mozambique and the leader of RENAMO in Maputo, on 21 August 1993, which had resulted in the signing of two major agreements on 3 September 1993. The Government of Mozambique and RENAMO had agreed, in particular, to integrate into the state administration all areas that had been under RENAMO control and to request the United Nations to monitor all police activities in the country, to monitor the rights and liberties of citizens in Mozambique and to provide technical support to the Police Commission. In that context, the Secretary-General informed the Council of his intention to send a survey team of experts to Mozambique. Based on their findings, he would then make his final recommendations about the size of the United Nations police component. Other important developments included the resumption of the dialogue on the draft electoral law, the decision by the Joint Commission for the Formation of the Mozambican Defence Force to send officers to Nyanga for training as instructors, and the work of the four commissions provided for in the Agreement. Three of those commissions had been formally established: the Commission for State Administration, the National Information Commission and the Police Affairs Commission. The establishment of the fourth, the National Electoral Commission, would be determined after the adopting of the draft electoral law.

It was expected that the leader of RENAMO would visit Maputo in the beginning of October 1993. In that context, the Secretary-General emphasized the need for the two parties to formally approve the revised timetable for the implementation of the peace process and to immediately begin assembly and demobilization of troops, as well as to reach early agreement on the draft electoral law, in order for the elections to be held according to the new timetable.

At its 3274th meeting, on 13 September 1993, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. After the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representative of Mozambique,

at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (Venezuela) then drew the attention of the members of the Council to the text of a draft resolution prepared in the course of its consultations,¹⁶ and read out a revision made to the draft. He also drew the attention of the members of the Council to a letter dated 8 September 1993 from the representative of Mozambique¹⁷ addressed to the Secretary-General, transmitting the text of the final document of the meeting between the President of Mozambique and the President of RENAMO, dated 3 September 1993.

Speaking before the vote, the representative of China stated that the peace process in Mozambique was then at a crucial stage. In order to ensure that the general elections were held in October 1994, both parties had to adopt practical measures, fulfil their commitments, cooperate with ONUMOZ and act strictly in accordance with the new timetable. The priority was for the two parties to complete the assembly and demobilization of their troops as early as possible and form a new national defence force. The draft resolution exactly reflected that desire of the members of the Council.¹⁸

The draft resolution, as orally revised, was thereupon put to the vote and was adopted unanimously as resolution 863(1993), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolutions 782 (1992) of 13 October 1992, 797 (1992) of 16 December 1992, 818 (1993) of 14 April 1993 and 850 1993 of 9 July 1993,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 30 August and 10 September 1993,

Reiterating the importance it attaches to the General Peace Agreement for Mozambique and to the timely fulfilment in good faith by all parties of the obligations contained therein,

Commending the efforts of the Secretary-General, his Special Representative and the personnel of the United Nations Operation in Mozambique to implement fully the mandate entrusted to the Operation and to carry it to a successful conclusion,

Commending also the role played by the Organization of African Unity, through the Special Representative of its Secretary-General, in the implementation of the General Peace Agreement,

Noting with satisfaction the recent positive developments in the Mozambican peace process, especially the direct talks in Maputo between the President of Mozambique, Mr. Joaquim Chissano, and the President of the Resistência Nacional Moçambicana, Mr. Afonso Dhlakama, which led to the agreements signed on 3 September 1993,

Also noting with satisfaction the full deployment of the military component of the Operation and the progress made in the establishment by the Operation of assembly areas,

Stressing the unacceptability of attempts to attach conditions to the peace process, in particular to the assembly and demobilization of troops, or to gain more time or further concessions,

Expressing concern at the continuing delays in the implementation of major aspects of the General Peace Agreement as well as at cases of violations of the ceasefire,

1. Welcomes the report of the Secretary-General of 30 August and 10 September 1993;

2. Emphasizes the need to respect fully all the provisions of the General Peace Agreement for Mozambique, in particular those concerning the ceasefire and the movement of troops;

3. Reaffirms the importance it attaches to the holding of elections no later than October 1994;

4. Strongly urges the Government of Mozambique and the Resistência Nacional Moçambicana to agree with, and to apply, without further postponement, the revised timetable for the implementation of all provisions of the General Peace Agreement as described in paragraphs 29 to 31 of the report of the Secretary-General, and appeals to the parties to cooperate fully with the Special Representative of the Secretary-General in this regard;

5. Stresses once again the urgent need for the early initiation of the process of assembly and demobilization of troops, and its continuation, in accordance with the revised timetable without preconditions;

6. Urges the Resistência Nacional Moçambicana to join the Government of Mozambique in authorizing immediate assembly of forces, and equally urges that both the Government of Mozambique and the Resistência Nacional immediately thereupon begin demobilization;

7. Welcomes the progress made by the Joint Commission for the new Mozambican Defence Force, in particular in relation to the training of instructors at Nyanga, and also the progress on mine-clearing;

8. Deplores the lack of progress in the multiparty consultative conference, and urges the Resistência Nacional Moçambicana and other political parties to join with the Government of Mozambique in quickly agreeing on an election law, which should include provision for an effective national election commission;

¹⁶ S/26426.

¹⁷ S/26432.

¹⁸ S/PV.3274, p. 6.

9. Calls on the Government of Mozambique and the Resistência Nacional to make operational without further delay the Commission for State Administration, the National Information Commission and the Police Affairs Commission;

10. Commends the agreements reached in the Maputo talks between the Government of Mozambique and the Resistência Nacional on the reintegration into the state administration of all areas now under the control of the Resistência Nacional as well as on the request for monitoring by the United Nations of all police activities in Mozambique and on undertaking additional tasks, as set out in document S/26385/Add.1;

11. Requests the Secretary-General to examine expeditiously the proposal by the Government of Mozambique and the Resistência Nacional for United Nations monitoring of police activities in the country, as set out in document S/26385/Add.1, and welcomes his intention to send a survey team of experts in connection with the proposed United Nations police contingent and to report thereon to the Council;

12. Urges the Government of Mozambique and the Resistência Nacional to ensure that the momentum towards implementing the General Peace Agreement in full is maintained so that a just and lasting peace in Mozambique can be established, and to this end encourages the President of Mozambique and the President of the Resistência Nacional Moçambicana to continue their direct talks;

13. Encourages the international community to provide appropriate and prompt assistance for the implementation of the humanitarian programme carried out in the framework of the General Peace Agreement, and urges the Government of Mozambique and the Resistência Nacional to continue to facilitate unimpeded access of humanitarian assistance to the civilian population in need;

14. Requests the Secretary-General to keep the Council informed of developments regarding the implementation of the provisions of the Agreement and to submit a report on the matter to the Council in good time before 31 October 1993;

15. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of the United Kingdom warned the parties that the resources of the international community were finite and under great strain at that moment. Therefore, if international commitment were to be sustained, it was essential that progress be continuous and visible. For his Government, the priorities were the following: Firstly, the assembly and demobilization of troops, which were crucial for the elections to be held according to the timetable. Secondly, the arrival of the remainder of the RENAMO trainees for the joint military training at Nyanga. And, thirdly, progress in the multiparty consultative conference on the electoral law. His Government looked forward to the Secretary-General's report on the possibilities for responding to the parties' request for United Nations monitoring of police activities so that the Council could act on his recommendations without delay.¹⁹

Decision of 29 October 1993 (3300th meeting):
resolution 879 (1993)

At its 3300th meeting, on 29 October 1993, the Security Council included the item entitled "The situation in Mozambique" in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representative of Mozambique, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (Brazil) drew the attention of the members of the Council to the text of a draft resolution prepared in the course of its consultations.²⁰

The draft resolution was thereupon put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 879 (1993), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolutions 782 (1992) of 13 October 1992, 797 (1992) of 16 December 1992, 818 (1993) of 14 April 1993, 850 (1993) of 9 July 1993 and 863 (1993) of 13 September 1993,

Reiterating the importance it attaches to the General Peace Agreement for Mozambique and to the timely fulfilment by all parties in good faith of obligations contained therein,

1. Decides, pending examination of the report of the Secretary-General due under resolution 863 (1993), to extend the mandate of the United Nations Operation in Mozambique for an interim period terminating on 5 November 1993;

2. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Decision of 5 November 1993 (3305th meeting):
resolution 882 (1993)

On 1 and 2 November 1993, pursuant to resolution 863 (1993) of 13 September 1993, the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council a report on ONUMOZ in which he described the progress made in the implementation of the Agreement and informed the Council about his visit to Maputo.²¹

The Secretary-General informed the Council that during his visit to Maputo from 17 to 20 October 1993, he had held very positive and constructive meetings with the President of Mozambique and the leader of RENAMO in which he had stressed that the United Nations could only facilitate the peace process and that it could not promote and establish peace without the cooperation of the parties. He had also stressed that the international community would not invest additional human and material resources and risk lives in peacekeeping operations where such political will did not make a substantive contribution to the peace process. Therefore, he had urged the two leaders to build on the progress made so that the elections could be held by October 1994, as scheduled. The Secretary-General noted that a number of agreements had been reached during his visit on outstanding issues. Those agreements covered, inter alia, the assembly and demobilization of RENAMO and Government troops, as well as the simultaneous disarmament of paramilitary forces, militia and irregular troops; the composition of the National Elections Commission and the system and timetable for finalizing the electoral law; and the creation of local National Police Affairs Commission subcommittees to monitor the activities of the Mozambican Police. Following those agreements, the revised timetable with the new dates for assembly and demobilization of troops was approved on 22 October 1993. All troops were to be demobilized by no later by May 1994.

¹⁹ Ibid., pp. 7-8.

The Secretary-General pointed out that the fulfilment of the terms of agreements between the Government of Mozambique and RENAMO would impose a heavy burden on the financial resources of that Government. Therefore, and in order to absorb RENAMO representatives into the structures of the government and society, adequate support from the international community was needed to supplement the limited budgetary resources available. The efforts of RENAMO to transform itself into a political party would be equally costly. In order to facilitate that process, the United Nations had established a trust fund to which some countries had already made contributions.

In view of those recent developments, the Secretary-General recommended the extension of the ONUMOZ mandate until the holding of elections in October 1994, subject to a review of its status every three months. As a contingency measure, he also intended, subject to the concurrence of the Council, to proceed with the selection and deployment of 128 police observers already authorized by the Security Council resolution 797 (1992).

At its 3305th meeting, on 5 November 1993, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representative of Mozambique, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (Cape Verde) then drew the attention of the members of the Council to the text of a draft resolution prepared in the course of its prior consultations,²² and read out some revisions made to the draft.

Recalling resolution 782 (1992) which, inter alia, had approved the dispatch of military observers to his country, followed by the establishment of ONUMOZ, establishment, the representative of Mozambique stated that its adoption had marked the dawning of a new era towards the establishment of a lasting peace in Mozambique. The United Nations presence had been instrumental in encouraging a gradual but steady return of refugees and displaced persons, the normalization of lives throughout the country, the re-establishment of a productive base in the rural areas and the revitalization of the economy. The Secretary-General's visit had been timely and useful. As a result of his extensive talks with the Government, RENAMO and other political parties, a major breakthrough in the Mozambican peace process had been achieved. It was finally possible to achieve far-reaching, positive agreements on all major issues pertaining to full implementation of the Agreement. He noted that an agreement had been reached on the composition of the Electoral Commission which would permit the early and successful completion of the electoral law. Moreover, the Government, RENAMO and other political parties were considering the creation of an electoral tribunal, composed of two Mozambican and three international judges, to deal with, inter alia, cases of disagreement in the Electoral Commission. Underscoring the high importance attached to the issue of credibility of the institutions created to certify the legality and the validity of the electoral process and its outcome, he said that his Government would request the Secretary-General to consult with the Security Council on how best to assist in the selection and nomination of the international judges. He hoped that with political good will and determination by all parties, there would be sufficient time to prepare for and hold general elections no later than October 1994. In conclusion, he called on the Council to hold responsible all those who might wish to subvert the momentum which had been created by the understandings achieved during the Secretary-General's visit.²³

Speaking before the vote, the representative of Brazil stressed that no further issues that could put in jeopardy the timely implementation of the Agreement should be raised at that point. The revised timetable must be complied with without "dragging of feet", so as to allow the successful holding of elections in October 1994. Brazil was committed to supporting the continuation of a strong United Nations presence in Mozambique and looked forward to receiving the Secretary-General's recommendations on the establishment of an ONUMOZ police contingent.²⁴

The representative of Djibouti stated his concern over the humanitarian assistance programme for Mozambique, given the "sheer magnitude of the calamity". There were some 1.5 million refugees, as a result of the conflict, and the job of reintegrating them back into society, along with that of integrating the troops of the combatants, was enormous. In addition, 4 to 5 million internally displaced persons must be returned to their home areas. Related to that problem was that of demining the country, where there were an estimated 2 million mines. He expressed the hope that, of everything proceeded as planned, Mozambique would assume that status of a United Nations success story in Africa.²⁵

The draft resolution was thereupon put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 882 (1993), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolution 782 (1992) of 13 October 1992 and all subsequent relevant resolutions,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 1 and 2 November 1993 on the United Nations Operation in Mozambique,

Reiterating the importance it attaches to the General Peace Agreement for Mozambique and to the timely fulfilment in good faith by all parties of the obligations contained therein,

²⁴ Ibid., pp. 10-12.

²⁵ Ibid., pp. 12-14.

Commending the efforts of the Secretary-General, his Special Representative and the personnel of the Operation to implement the mandate fully,

Reaffirming its conviction that the resolution of conflict in Mozambique would contribute to peace and stability in the region,

Emphasizing with satisfaction the recent positive developments in the Mozambican peace process, including the direct talks between the President of Mozambique, Mr. Joaquim Chissano, and the President of the Resistência Nacional Moçambicana, Mr. Afonso Dhlakama, and the agreements signed on 3 September 1993,

Stressing with mounting concern the continuing delays in the implementation of the General Peace Agreement which both parties signed,

Stressing once again the unacceptability of attempts to gain more time or further concessions or to attach new conditions to the peace process, and strongly urging the parties not to raise any further issues which might jeopardize the implementation of the Agreement, particularly in light of the commitments entered into during the Secretary-General's recent visit to Mozambique,

1. Welcomes the report of the Secretary-General;
2. Commends the agreements that were reached between President Chissano and Mr. Dhlakama during the visit of the Secretary-General to Maputo on outstanding issues that were impeding the peace process;
3. Reaffirms the vital importance it attaches to the holding of elections no later than October 1994;
4. Welcomes the approval by the Mozambican parties of the revised timetable for the implementation of the General Peace Agreement for Mozambique and urges the parties to adhere to it without any delay;
5. Urges the Mozambican parties to commence assembly of troops in November 1993 and to initiate demobilization by January 1994 with a view to ensuring the completion of the demobilization process by May 1994 on the basis of the revised timetable;
6. Notes the progress made with regard to the formation of the new Mozambican Defence Forces, particularly the commencement of full-scale training in Nyanga, Zimbabwe, of troops from the Government and the Resistência Nacional Moçambicana for the new national army;
7. Welcomes the approval of the guidelines for the Ceasefire Commission governing the movement of troops after signature of the General Peace Agreement, and urges the parties to adhere to the guidelines and to cooperate with the United Nations Operation in Mozambique in the efforts to enforce them;
8. Underlines the need to make immediately operational the National Commission for Administration, the National Police Affairs Commission and the National Commission for Information following the agreements reached recently on their chairmanship;

9. Authorizes the Secretary-General to proceed with the selection and deployment of the one hundred twenty-eight United Nations police observers approved in resolution 797 (1992) of 16 December 1992, with a view to deploying them as soon as possible;

10. Underscores the importance of the parties making progress on achieving agreed political goals, specifically, the approval of an electoral law and establishment of an electoral commission by 30 November 1993 and the beginning of the concentration of troops in the assembly areas, demobilization of 50 per cent of troops by 31 March 1994, sufficient progress to meet complete demobilization by 31 May 1994, and accelerated progress in training and integrating forces in the new Mozambican Defence Forces so that the process is complete by August 1994;

11. Calls on the Government of Mozambique and the Resistência Nacional Moçambicana to build on the progress which has been achieved and to respect fully all the provisions of the General Peace Agreement, in particular those concerning the ceasefire and the movement of troops;

12. Decides to renew the mandate of the United Nations Operation in Mozambique for a period of six months, subject to the proviso that the Security Council will review the status of the mandate within ninety days on the basis of a report by the Secretary-General as described in paragraph 13 below;

13. Requests the Secretary-General to report by 31 January 1994 and every three months thereafter on whether the parties have made sufficient and tangible progress towards implementing the General Peace Agreement and meeting the timetable laid out in paragraphs 3 and 10 above, and also to report on the situation concerning the implementation of the mandate of the Operation, taking into consideration the need to achieve cost savings to the greatest extent possible, while remaining mindful of the importance of an effective discharge of its mandate;

14. Appeals to the international community to provide the necessary financial assistance to facilitate the implementation of the Agreement;

15. Also appeals to the international community to make voluntary financial contributions to the trust fund to be set up to support electoral activities of the political parties upon the approval of the electoral law;

16. Reiterates its encouragement to the international community to provide appropriate and prompt assistance for the implementation of the humanitarian programme carried out in the framework of the General Peace Agreement, and urges the Government of Mozambique and the Resistência Nacional Moçambicana to facilitate unimpeded access to humanitarian assistance to the civilian population in need;

17. Calls on all parties to cooperate with the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees and other humanitarian agencies operating in Mozambique to facilitate the speedy repatriation and resettlement of refugees and displaced persons;

18. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of China stated that his delegation maintained that whether the peace process in Mozambique would be completed successfully and whether Mozambique could genuinely enjoy lasting peace depended, in the final analysis, on the people of Mozambique themselves. At that time, the peace process had entered a crucial stage, and the two sides should therefore, in accordance with their commitments and in full cooperation with ONUMOZ, adopt practical measures to strictly follow the new timetable so as to ensure the holding of the general elections as scheduled.²⁶

The representative of France stated that his country had voted in favour of the resolution, which extended the mandate of ONUMOZ for a six-month period, it being understood that progress in the peace process would be subject to periodic review. His delegation called upon the parties to comply strictly with the revised timetable and to cooperate with ONUMOZ for the proper functioning of the electoral process. It emphasized in that respect that it was imperative that the elections be held as planned in October 1994 and that no further delay would be tolerated.²⁷

Decision of 23 February 1994 (3338th meeting):
resolution 898 (1994)

On 28 January and 1 February 1994, pursuant to resolution 882 (1993) of 5 November 1993, the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council a report on ONUMOZ,²⁸ in which he described progress made in the implementation of the Agreement, and made recommendations on the planned deployment of its police contingent.

The Secretary-General noted that a number of important developments had taken place since his last report to the Council. The long-awaited assembly of troops had begun on 30 November 1993, and the dismantling of paramilitary forces, militia and irregular troops was initiated on 12 January 1994. The Electoral Law had been approved on 9 December 1993, and the National Elections Commission had been appointed on 21 January 1994. He pointed out, however, that major problems still remained to be resolved in the immediate future. They included, inter alia, initiation and subsequent completion of the actual demobilization; transfer of weapons from assembly areas to regional warehouses; dismantling of the paramilitary forces; formation of a well-functioning national defence force; and provision of financial support for the transformation of RENAMO from a military movement to a political party. In that regard, the Secretary-General stated that he was exploring the possibility of setting up a more flexible funding mechanism than the existing United Nations-administered trust fund.

The Secretary-General recommended that the Security Council authorize the establishment and progressive deployment of a United Nations police component as an integral part of ONUMOZ.²⁹ It would, inter alia, monitor all police activities in the country and verify that their actions were consistent with the Agreement; monitor the respect of rights and civil liberties of Mozambican citizens throughout the country; provide technical support to the National Police Commission; verify the strength and location of the government police forces; and monitor and verify the process of reorganization and retraining of the “quick reaction” police, including its activities. In addition, it would monitor the electoral campaign, together with other ONUMOZ components, and verify that political rights of individuals, groups and political organizations were respected.

The Secretary-General further noted that it would be beneficial to maintain the Operation’s forces at existing strength until the elections. However, in view of the additional costs associated with the establishment of its sizeable police contingent, as well as the evolution of political developments in the country, he intended to begin a gradual cut-back of its military elements in May 1994 when the demobilization of troops would be nearly completed. Moreover, the Mozambican Defence Force was expected to become fully operational by September 1994, and by that time it would be expected to assume some of the major tasks then being performed by ONUMOZ.

At its 3338th meeting, on 23 February 1994, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representative of Mozambique, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (Djibouti) then drew the attention of the members of the Council to the text of a draft resolution prepared in the course of its prior consultations.³⁰

Addressing the issue of the disengagement of the UNOMOZ military contingent from his country, the representative of Mozambique stated that its reduction should be undertaken in connection with developments in the demobilization of troops and in the training and coming into operation of the Mozambican Defence Force. His Government was, however, aware that the financial resources of the Organization were limited, “if not already stretched beyond capacity”. That is why his delegation had accepted the draft resolution and, in particular, its operative paragraphs 2, 3, 4 and 19. Turning to the issue of assembly and demobilization of troops, he said that the Mozambican authorities had repeatedly explained that logistical and organizational difficulties did not affect the political will and good faith of the Government to honour fully its obligations under the Agreement. As indicated in the report of the Secretary-General, Government troops, fully equipped, had proceeded to the assembly areas in much larger numbers than the RENAMO forces. He stressed that the organizational and logistical problems faced by his Government in the assembly areas were similar to those in RENAMO assembly areas, which were under the full responsibility of ONUMOZ. He noted in that respect that the tripartite mission³¹ had visited some assembly areas in different parts of the country, from 25 January to 5 February 1994, to take an in-depth look at the problems in those areas. Overall, the mission had noted that the problems relating to logistical support and the provision of food and adequate conditions were common to both the Government and ONUMOZ, and that in a number of cases RENAMO areas were in a worse condition. The tripartite mission had also verified that another problem in the assembly areas was related to the inability of ONUMOZ military observers to register more than 50 combatants daily out of the thousands arriving in the assembly areas each day. Another matter of great concern to the Mozambican authorities was the issue of arms collection. Many RENAMO combatants still reported to the assembly areas without their weapons and the authorities had not been able to obtain any information concerning their remaining and most threatening weapons. Moreover, as noted by the mission, a significant portion of RENAMO personnel in the assembly areas was made up of aged people and youngsters. He hoped that the Council would put pressure on RENAMO to assemble all its combatants and surrender all its weapons. For its part, his Government was determined to abide fully by its commitments and to respect the deadlines agreed to in the revised timetable. He also expressed concern at recent pronouncements by the RENAMO leadership, already anticipating that an eventual loss in the general elections could be possible only under conditions of fraud and unfair elections. Those threats, he said, were taking place at a time when all the institutional mechanisms for the conduct of free and fair elections had been established and were fully operational. Moreover, the whole electoral process would be duly supervised by ONUMOZ and other international observers, with the possibility of appealing to the Electoral Tribunal, which would comprise, inter alia, three international judges to be proposed by the Security Council and appointed by the Secretary-General. He called on the Security Council and the Secretary-General to initiate consultations and mechanisms for the early appointment of the international judges in order to allow the establishment, as soon as possible, of the Electoral Tribunal. The Council should also seriously review how best to strengthen its authority among the parties, especially with regard to denouncing and acting upon systematic violations of the Agreement and the understandings reached thereafter.³²

Speaking before the vote, the representative of Nigeria stated that the Mozambique operation stood out as one of the few peacekeeping missions where there were positive indications of an early and smooth conclusion. The assembly and cantonment of both Government and RENAMO troops had begun, preparations for the elections seemed to be on schedule, the Electoral Law had been approved by the Mozambican National Assembly on 9 December 1993, despite occasional incidents, the general ceasefire had been holding. However, great difficulties still lay ahead, particularly the outstanding task of setting up a well-functioning national defence force, which was critical to the survival of a post-ONUMOZ Mozambique. In that context, he stressed the need for a United Nations police force to monitor all police activities in the country and provide technical support for the National Police Affairs Commission. Turning to the draft resolution, he stated that it represented a significant step forward in the collective effort to bring peace to Mozambique and to increase peace in the world. His delegation would support it for three reasons. Firstly, it urged both sides to continue to do all that was necessary to facilitate the full implementation of all commitments they had entered into, especially those relating to the assembly of troops and the formation of a national defence force. Secondly, it recognized the unassuaged humanitarian needs for increased international assistance, and thirdly, it underscored the time constraints in implementing the peace process.³³

The representative of China supported the dispatch of additional police monitors to Mozambique to assist in preparing for the general election and to enhance the peace process. He pointed out, however, that the successful implementation of the Agreement depended on the Mozambican people themselves and on a broad-based national reconciliation.³⁴

The draft resolution was thereupon put to the vote and was adopted unanimously as resolution 898 (1994), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolution 782 (1992) of 13 October 1992 and all subsequent resolutions,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 28 January 1994 on the United Nations Operation in Mozambique, and having completed the review of the status of the Operation called for in its resolution 882 (1993) of 5 November 1993, ³⁴ Ibid., pp. 19-20.

Commending the efforts of the Secretary-General, his Special Representative and the personnel of the Operation in seeking to implement fully the mandate entrusted to it,

Commending also the role played by the Organization of African Unity, through the Special Representative of its Secretary-General, in the implementation of the General Peace Agreement for Mozambique,

Reiterating the importance it attaches to the General Peace Agreement and to the timely fulfilment in good faith by all parties of their obligations under the Agreement,

Noting that the people of Mozambique bear the ultimate responsibility for the successful implementation of the General Peace Agreement,

Welcoming recent positive developments in the implementation of the General Peace Agreement, but concerned none the less at delays in its full implementation,

Taking note of the request by the Government of Mozambique and the Resistência Nacional Moçambicana concerning the monitoring of all police activities and additional tasks set out in the agreements of 3 September 1993, and of the agreement of both parties to the general concept for the police contingent of the Operation,

Stressing the necessity, in this as in other peacekeeping operations, to continue to monitor expenditures carefully during this period of increasing demands on peacekeeping resources, without jeopardizing their purposes,

Noting with appreciation in this context that the Secretary-General, in proposing the establishment of a police component as an integral part of the Operation, has at the same time stated his intention to present specific proposals for the phased reduction of the military component of the Operation, without prejudice to the effective discharge of its mandate, in particular the tasks of its military component,

Reaffirming its conviction that the resolution of the conflict in Mozambique will contribute to peace and security,

1. Welcomes the report of the Secretary-General of 28 January 1994;

2. Authorizes the establishment of a United Nations police component of up to 1,144 personnel as an integral part of the United Nations Operation in Mozambique with the mandate and deployment described in paragraphs 9 to 18 of the addendum of 28 January 1994 to the report of the Secretary-General;

3. Requests the Secretary-General, as the police contingent is being deployed, to begin immediately preparing specific proposals for the drawdown of an appropriate number of military personnel with the objective of ensuring there is no increase in the cost of the Operation without prejudice to the effective discharge of its mandate;

4. Further requests the Secretary-General to prepare a timetable for (a) the completion of the mandate of the Operation, withdrawal of its personnel and turnover of any remaining functions to United Nations agencies and programmes by the target date of the end of November 1994, by which time the elected government is expected to have assumed office and, in this context, (b) the phased drawdown of military forces in the transportation corridors, which should begin as soon as feasible and be completed when the new national defence force is operational and (c) the withdrawal of military observers after demobilization is completed;

5. Welcomes recent positive developments in the implementation of the General Peace Agreement for Mozambique, including the commencement of the assembly of troops and the dismantling of paramilitary forces, militia and irregular troops, the approval of the electoral law and the appointment of the National Elections Commission and of its chairperson;

6. Expresses its concern, however, at the continuing delay in the implementation of some major aspects of the General Peace Agreement, including the commencement of demobilization and the formation of a national defence force, and calls upon the parties to work towards the elimination of further delays;

7. Calls upon the Government of Mozambique and the Resistência Nacional Moçambicana to comply with all the provisions of the General Peace Agreement, in particular those concerning the ceasefire and the cantonment and demobilization of troops, and commends in this respect the commitments made by both President Chissano and Mr. Dhlakama to implement the General Peace Agreement;

8. Further calls upon the Government of Mozambique and the Resistência Nacional Moçambicana to comply fully and promptly with the decisions of the Monitoring and Supervisory Commission;

9. Encourages the Government of Mozambique to continue to fulfil its commitments in respect of the provision of logistic support and adequate food, and making outstanding payments, to the troops in the assembly areas and the training centres;

10. Notes the recent acceleration in the assembly of the troops of the Government of Mozambique, and calls upon the Government to redouble its efforts to achieve balance between the parties in the cantonment of troops and an expeditious and timely conclusion of this process as called for in the revised timetable;

11. Underlines the need for the troops of the Government of Mozambique and the Resistência Nacional Moçambicana to hand over all weapons to the United Nations at the assembly areas and for the parties to come to an immediate agreement on the transfer of all weapons to regional depots so as to ensure security in the assembly areas;

12. Reiterates the vital importance it attaches to the holding of general elections no later than October 1994 and to the early commencement of electoral registration and other electoral preparations, and urges the parties to agree promptly on a specific election date;

13. Appeals to the international community to provide the necessary financial assistance to facilitate the implementation of the General Peace Agreement and also to make voluntary financial contributions to the trust fund to be set up to support electoral activities of the political parties;

14. Notes the decision of the Secretary-General to explore the possibility of establishing a more effective mechanism for the provision of resources, disbursement under which is subject to the scrupulous and timely implementation of the General Peace Agreement, as described in paragraph 35 of his report of 28 January 1994;

15. Welcomes the proposal to extend the present severance payment scheme to facilitate the reintegration of demobilizing soldiers into civil society, and encourages the international community to provide appropriate and prompt assistance for the implementation of this scheme as a complement to the existing efforts made in the framework of the humanitarian assistance programme;

16. Expresses its appreciation to the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, France, Portugal and Italy for their offers of assistance in military training or in rehabilitating the training centres for the new army;

17. Also notes with appreciation the response of the international community to the humanitarian assistance needs of Mozambique, and encourages the international community to continue to provide appropriate and prompt assistance for the implementation of the humanitarian programme carried out in the framework of the General Peace Agreement;

18. Urges all parties to continue to facilitate unimpeded access to humanitarian assistance for the civilian population in need, and also to cooperate with the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees and other humanitarian agencies operating in Mozambique to facilitate the speedy repatriation and resettlement of refugees and displaced persons;

19. Requests the Secretary-General to ensure maximum economy in the operations of the United Nations Operation in Mozambique, while remaining mindful of the importance of an effective discharge of its mandate;

20. Looks forward to the next report of the Secretary-General called for in paragraph 13 of resolution 882 (1993) of 5 November 1993 on whether the parties have made sufficient and tangible progress towards implementing the General Peace Agreement and in meeting the timetable set out in paragraphs 3 and 10 of that resolution, on the basis of which it will consider the mandate of the Operation;

21. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of France stated that his delegation had voted in favour of the resolution, which established a police contingent of more than a thousand observers, as it considered that it had an essential role in preparing for the electoral process and its successful progress. At the same time, France was pleased that, for reasons of economy, the Secretary-General had envisaged, in parallel with the deployment of the police force, a phased reduction of the ONUMOZ military component, while maintaining the efficiency and credibility of the Operation. Noting that the transformation of RENAMO into a true political party was one of the keys to the success of the peace process, he said that France was contributing to the funds created for that purpose. France was also assisting in establishing the new Mozambican army and was contributing to the financing of the electoral process.³⁵

The representative of the United Kingdom stated that his delegation had voted for the resolution because it strongly supported the establishment of a United Nations police component. It was equally important that the Secretary-General present specific proposals to the Council for the phased reduction of the military component of ONUMOZ, starting at the earliest date consistent with not compromising the effective discharge of the Operation's mandate. ONUMOZ was one of the most costly United Nations peacekeeping operations. When its mandate became due for renewal at the beginning of May, the Council would need to consider the degree of progress it had made towards the implementation of the Agreement. He contended that if the elections did not take place in October, then it would be doubtful whether the Operation could be maintained at its current strength. He therefore called on both parties to avoid becoming "bogged down in unnecessary wrangling".³⁶

Referring to the provision in the resolution just adopted which called upon the parties to meet fully their commitments, the representative of the United States said that it reflected the Council's determination that the October elections would be held as scheduled. He, therefore, urged the parties to set up soon a specific date for the elections. The speaker contended that the deployment of a sizeable police observer force in Mozambique would promote the stable security environment necessary for the holding of free and fair elections. Stressing the importance of taking advantage
