When Federal funds go in, sooner or later we will have Federal control. We will find when the Federal Government starts financing purely partisan campaigns and elections, then they will start setting parameters of how many delegates we are going to have, the composition of the delegates. Ultimately we will find there are some disadvantaged ones that say, "We don't have the money to serve as a delegate." So we will see the Federal Government paying the salaries and transportation expenses of delegates to go to national conventions, all out of the taxpayers' pocket. This is one of the things I am adamantly opposed to. I think it is wrong. The taxpayers of the United States should not finance national conventions.

We heard the statement a bit earlier that do not let procedural purity keep us from this historical chance. This historical chance to what, to freeze in the incumbents? Procedural purity, and the thing I objected to when we were discussing the bill and the reason I wanted to vote it down under the discussion of the rule, I wanted to vote down the rule, because for the first time we required a proposed amendment to be printed 24 hours or a calendar day in advance and then moved immediately into the bill without preserving that 24 hours for the Members to avail themselves of the opportunity.

This is ludicrous. This means anybody that did not guess or hear or pick up a rumor yesterday that we were going to pass this rule today, if he did not have inside information and get his amendment in the RECORD yesterday, even though it is germane, even though it is acceptable in every other way, he cannot offer it today.

I think this is bad procedure. I think we are setting a bad precedent. I cannot imagine the Committee on Rules setting up this rule without at least guaranteeing 24 hours to a person to avail himself of this opportunity, but they did so. That was one good reason I think for opening up the rule.

Mr. Chairman, I think we need campaign reform. I think there are many good areas in here. I was very pleased to hear the chairman of our full committee in the colloquy with the gentleman from Illinois saying it was not intended that the overhead expense of the two campaign committees, such as salaries, rent and heat and so forth, be prorated in donations and given to the various incumbents that they serve, but only the cash contributions were to be intended; but as I pointed out in my special views in the report, in setting up the authority, whatever the authority there is to oversee and carry out the aims and wishes of this bill, we must be careful that in the name of reform we do not drive out and scare people away good dedicated honest people who are interested in the Government of this country, scare them out of politics by stringing so many trip wires that they do not know if they are going to jail or not if they are a candidate or even helping a candidate.

I did serve on the special subcommittee that was set up to monitor elections by the Congress. The Clerk of this House certified over 5,000 violations of the last election law of the House of Representatives alone, over 5,000 violations to the Justice Department for investigation and/or prosecution.

I am very fearful if we are not careful in setting up whatever authority is to control this, if we do not get somebody knowledgeable and sympathetic and with commonsense, if we set up a Commission that is going to be headhunters, we are all going to be in danger of what the gentleman from Louisiana said earlier. We will be serving two sentences, one for 2 years in the Congress and one for 2 years in jail.

So, let us be very careful in considering what we are doing here. I am anxious to get a good campaign bill, and I hope I can vote for this on final passage.

But, some of the abuses in here, some of the things provided for such as public financing of some of these elections, make the bill ridiculous, in my opinion. To think the taxpayers should finance me in my campaign, or my opponent and considering the proliferation of candidates that are going to emerge as soon as they find out there is tax money involved, is staggering, I cannot think of a better business to go into than the public relations business for political campaigns.

(Mr. DICKINSON asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. MINISH).

Mr. MINISH. I thank the chairman for yielding. Mr. Chairman, under the Campaign Reporting Act of 1971, the American Federation of Teachers filed a report showing they distributed close to $70,000 to different Members of Congress and to certain other groups. I was charged with that entire amount.

I brought it to the attention of the Clerk of the House, and he said the reason they did that was because in the report that they filed, they said they were supporting Senator MONDALE, and myself, so I was credited with the entire amount.

My question is this: Could that happen under this legislation?

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, I will say absolutely not. It should not have happened under the old legislation. There were many cases exactly like this in the country. Certain groups would make contributions to more than one candidate, but the candidates in turn would say they received money but had not named that group as their contributor.

The gentleman evidently named the Federation of Teachers and he probably turned the name in showing that the organization had contributed to him. However, they also sent in a report stating the amount of money they have spent. Having no other names, and the gentleman having admitted that was his contributor, they turned it all into his account. This happened in many situations all over the country.

Mr. MINISH. Mr. Chairman, as I look around the floor, there are at least eight Members here who received money from the American Federation of Teachers AFL–CIO that I was credited with. I only received $250.

Mr. DENT. The only advice I can give the gentleman is to go see the Clerk.

Mr. Chairman, I yield 11 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. BRADEMAS).

(Mr. BRADEMAS asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BRADEMAS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 16090, the Federal Elections Campaign Amendments of 1974.

I would first like to take this opportunity to pay special tribute to the distinguished chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. HAYS). Mr. HAYS worked diligently day after day in the markup sessions on the bill and if major campaign reform legislation is passed by Congress this year, much of the credit will be due to WAYNE HAYS.

Because the gentleman from Ohio has been subjected to considerable criticsm on this matter, I believe it only fair to make the point I have just made.

Mr. Chairman, members of the House Administration Committee have worked long and hard on this bill. We considered almost 100 amendments, offered by both Republicans and Democrats, and we have reported to the House what I believe to be a very sound campaign reform bill—one which will significantly improve and strengthen current law.

To quote from a letter to me of July 25, 1974, from the able codirectors of the Center for Public Financing of Elections, Susan B. King and Neal Gregory, following the action of the House Administration Committee in reporting H.R. 16090—

We would like to commend you and your colleagues on the House Administration for the months of work which resulted in yesterday's reporting out of the Campaign Reform Bill.

. . . Your action in moving to clean up the way in which we finance Federal elections was a very positive response to the current crisis of confidence in government. This is a good bill of which the Committee can be proud.

Mr. Chairman, the existing campaign finance laws include the Federal Elections Campaign Act of 1971, the Presidential Election Campaign Fund Act, and certain portions of the United States Criminal Code. The most significant of these is, of course, the Federal Elections Campaign Act, which calls for the disclosure of campaign expenditures and contributions.

Although the Federal Elections Campaign Act has only been in effect for little over 2 years, it has become apparent that certain provisions of the law need to be strengthened. Further, the law failed to reach one of the most serious campaign finance problems—the excessive influence of big money in political campaigns.

Mr. Chairman, the committee bill meets these problems by improving the disclosure requirements of the Federal Elections Campaign Act and by providing for a Board of Supervisory Officers to strengthen the enforcement of campaign finance laws. To meet the problem of spiraling campaign expenditures and the excessive influence of big money, the bill sets strict limits on campaign expenditures and contributions. And to limit the influence of big money in the area which, I believe, offers the greatest potential for abuse—all phases of election to the office of President—the committee bill strengthens the existing dollar check-off law with respect to the Presidential general elections and authorizes the use of checkoff funds for presidential nominating conventions and Presidential primary elections.

Mr. Chairman, although I would like briefly to summarize the major provisions of the bill, I would like to focus my remarks on two important features of the bill—the Board of Supervisory Officers and the sections dealing with public financing of Presidential elections.

CONTRIBUTION LIMITS

Mr. Chairman, the committee bill limits contributions to candidates by persons to $1,000 per election—primary, runoff, special election, and general election.

The bill permits committees which have: First, been registered for 6 months pursuant to the Federal Elections Campaign Act of 1971; second, which have received contributions from more than 50 persons; and third, which have contributed to at least 5 candidates for Federal office to contribute to candidates up to $5,000 per election. This limit on contributions by so-called multicandidate committees applies equally to the Republican and Democratic Congressional Campaign Committees and to the National, State, and local committees of the political parties as well as to broadbased citizens groups which support candidates for Federal office.

By providing higher limits on contributions by multicandidate committees, our committee recognized the important role of broad-based citizen interest groups—whether conservative, such as the Americans for Constitutional Action, or liberal, such as the National Committee for an Effective Congress.

To curtail the influence of excessive political contributions by any single person, the bill establishes a $525,000 limit on the amount any individual can give to all candidates for Federal office in a single year.

Mr. Chairman, these limits were subject to lengthy debate in the committee and I believe we have provided for limits which are low enough to bar excessive contributions, yet not so low so that it would be impossible for candidates to raise adequate campaign funds without incurring exorbitant fundraising costs.

EXPENDITURE LIMITS

Mr. Chairman, the bill would curb spiraling campaign expenditures by setting strict limits on campaign spending.

Candidates to the office of President would be able to spend only $20 million; candidates for the nomination to the office of President could spend a total of $10 million.

Senate candidates would be able to spend the higher of either $75,000 or 5 cents times the population in the candidate's State in each of the primary and general elections.

And House candidates would be able to spend $75,000 in each of the primary and general elections.

In addition to these general expenditure limits, the committee bill allows candidates to spend up to 25 percent above the limits to meet the costs of fund raising. This provision is particularly important in view of the cost of raising campaign funds through small contributions.

Mr. Chairman, these expenditure limits were adopted after extensive and thorough debate in our committee, and I believe the limits we have recommended are low enough to prevent excessive campaign expenditures, yet high enough to allow challengers to mount meaningful campaigns and to permit both incumbents and challengers to communicate their positions on campaign issues to the voters.

PRINCIPAL CAMPAIGN COMMITTEES AND DISCLOSURE REPORTS

To simplify reporting requirements and facilitate the dissemination of campaign finance information, the bill eliminates unnecessary disclosure reports and provides for the designation of principal campaign committees to make all committee expenditures on behalf of a candidate and to file a consolidated report of all such expenditures and all contributions of committees which support the candidate.

Mr. Chairman, the committee bill eliminates the 15- and 5-day preelection reports required by existing law and requires instead a single preelection report 10 days before each election. In addition, the bill requires a report 30 days after each election. Quarterly reports would still be required, but a candidate would not have to file a quarterly report if it falls within 10 days of the pre- or post-election report or if in that quarter neither contributions or expenditures exceed $1,000.

BOARD OF SUPERVISORY OFFICERS

To assure full compliance with and effective enforcement of the election laws, the committee bill establishes an independent Board of Supervisory Officers.

The Board would be composed of the three existing supervisory officers—the Clerk of the House, the Secretary of the Senate, and the Comptroller General—and four public members appointed by the Speaker of the House and the President of the Senate. To assure that the members of the Board are selected on a bipartisan basis, one of the Speaker's appointments shall be made from a list of recommendations provided by the House majority leader, and one from a list of recommendations provided by the House minority leader. Similarly, one of the President of the Senate's appointments would be made from a list of recommendations provided by the Senate majority leader and one from a list of recommendations provided by the Senate minority leader.

Under the bill, the supervisory officers would retain their existing authority to maintain disclosure reports and other records. Any apparent violation of election laws which they discover would have to be referred immediately to the Board.

The Board would be responsible for reviewing the actions of the individual supervisory officers, supervising development of rules and regulations, and the preparation of forms to assure they are uniform, to the extent practicable. To assure that the regulations developed by the Board and the supervisory officers conform to the law, all regulations would have to be submitted to congressional committees with election law responsibilities for review.

The Board would have the authority to investigate possible violations of the law, subpena rceords and witnesses, hold hearings, and refer appropriate apparent violations of the election laws to the Department of Justice for criminal and civil enforcement action. To avoid referring technical and minor violations to the Department of Justice, the Board would be authorized to encourage voluntary compliance through informal means.

And to assure expeditious enforcement action by the Justice Department, the bill requires the Attorney General to report to the Board on the status of referrals—60 days after the referral and at the close of every 30 day period thereafter.

Mr. Chairman, I would like here to note that I will later be offering a committee amendment to this section of the bill which will modify the composition of the Board. Very briefly, the amendment will provide for a six-member Board composed of four public members who will be appointed by the Speaker of the House and the President of the Senate, on a bipartisan basis, and the Clerk of the House and the Secretary of the Senate, both of whom will serve as nonvoting members.

The amendment will also amend the "review of regulations" provision in the committee bill to provide that all rules and regulations be submitted to the Senate and the House for review, rather than to the House Administration Committee or the Senate Rules and Administration Committee.

I will provide a more complete explanation when the amendment is considered, but I would like to observe that this amendment received the unanimous support of the House Administration Committee and will, I believe strengthen the enforcement of campaign finance laws.

PUBLIC FINANCING OF PRESIDENTIAL ELECTIONS

And finally, Mr. Chairman, the bill provides a full package for public financing of Presidential elections.

First, the bill strengthens existing law with respect to public financing of Presidential general elections. As you are aware, the dollar checkoff law, first passed in the 92d Congress and amended last year, allows individuals to designate on their annual tax return that a dollar be paid to the Presidential Election Campaign Fund, or the so-called dollar checkoff fund. The amount of money available for Presidential general elections is limited to the amount voluntarily designated by individual taxpayers that candidates may use public funds, or they may continue to finance their campaigns through private resources.

The committee bill amends current law to provide that the amount of public money available from the checkoff fund conforms to the spending limit for Presidential general elections—$20 million and to provide that the dollar checkoff fund be self-appropriating to assure that the dollars checked off by individual taxpayers are actually available.

In addition, the bill authorizes the use of dollar checkoff funds for Presidential nominating conventions.

Mr. Chairman, I think it is important to note that the current system of convention financing is a de facto public financing scheme. The national nominating conventions are now paid for principally by corporate and union advertisements in the convention programs. And much of the cost of this convention advertising is passed on to each taxpayer by means of tax deductions for these ads.

This section of the bill is based on a recommendation of the bipartisan Commission on Convention Public Fnancing, composed of top officials of both the Republican and Democratic national committees. It repeals the provision authorizing tax deductions for convention advertising and provides up to $2 million for major parties and proportionately smaller amounts for minor parties to defray the costs of conducting Presidential nominating conventions. The bill specifically prohibits, however, the use of public funds for direct cash payments to delegates and candidates.

Public financing would be voluntary and any political party that wished to continue to finance its convention with private resources could continue to do so. However, overall expenditures from both public and private sources would, under ordinary circumstances, be limited to $2 million.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, the bill provides for limited public financing of Presidential primary elections by authorizing matching payments from the dollar checkoff fund for small contributions.

Candidates would receive matching payments for the first $250 or less received from each contribution. The maximum amount of public money a candidate could receive would be one-half the expenditure limit for Presidential primaries. Under this bill, that means each candidate could receive up to $5 million. To prevent public financing of frivolous candidates, the bill would require a candidate to accumulate at least $5,000 in matchable contributions in each of 20 States.

All public funds would come from the surplus in the dollar checkoff fund after funds have been set aside to meet the estimated obligations of Presidential general elections and nominating conventions. Since experts estimate that the checkoff fund will contain approximately $64 million by 1976 and that some $46 million would be used for general elections and conventions, approximately $13 million should be available for primary elections.

Mr. Chairman, this Presidential public financing package is one of the most important features of the bill. Clearly, the potential for the abuse of big money is the greatest in the area of Presidential elections, and public financing would, in my view drastically reduce this potential.

Mr. Chairman, H.R. 16090 is a solid piece of campaign reform legislation, one which if passed, will prove to be a major advance in the financing of campaigns for Federal office.

Some critics have charged that the bill is loophole ridden and that it fails to provide an effective enforcement mechanism. These critics allege that the enforcement entity in the bill builds on a system of nonenforcement by the Clerk of the House and the other supervisory officers, and they infer that these deficiencies can never be corrected under the present approach because of the "appearance" of a conflict-of-interest situation. To support their case, they cite a whole litany of alleged shortcomings of the Clerk and the other supervisory officers.

Mr. Chairman, I have gone to some trouble to review the criticisms of this bill to determine if there is any solidity to these charges. And I must say that after investigation, there appears to be no basis for these allegations.

Take, for example, the charge that "the Clerk of the House waited until after the election to forward many of the violations to the Justice of Department. The Clerk reported 5,000 unprocessed violations (most of them trival or minor). The Clerk did not actively search for and investigate incomplete filings."

From April 7, 1972, the effective date of the 1971 elections law, throughout the 1972 election year, the Clerk made 15 separate referrals of violations to the Justice Department. The Clerk averaged making such a referral once every 16 days during 1972. Of the 4,893 referrals of apparent violations made during 1972, 3,192 or approximately two-thirds were made before the general elections of 1972. A goodly portion of the remaining 1,701 apparent violations were either not committed or not uncovered by audit until after the general elections. Each report filed with the Clerk by a candidate or political committee was audited. Each apparent violator was contacted separately on the deficiency by both the Clerk of the House and the Special Committee To Investigate Campaign Expenditures prior to being referred to the Justice Department.

This dual investigatory procedure by the Clerk and the special committee averaged approximately 40 days from the time an apparent violation was uncovered by audit until it was referred to the Justice Department. None of these referrals were for trivial or minor violations such as forms not being signed, or forms not being notarized. These referrals included failure to file, late filing, corporate contributions, union contributions, contributions from Government contractors, exceeding candidate's spending limitations, and other apparent violations of Federal election laws. Under section 308 of the election law, the Clerk's responsibility was to refer apparent violations to the Justice Department. Under the law the Attorney General has prosecutorial discretion on which cases he chooses to prosecute and it is his responsibility to perfect each case prior to trial.

Or take the charge that "since the Clerk apparently did not conduct any field investigations, the Justice Department was forced to reexamine and reinvestigate many of the complaints reported by the Clerk."

The Clerk has regularly conducted numerous field investigations and hearings on complaints. Some of these investigations and hearings were held jointly with the bipartisan House Special Committee To Investigate Campaign Expenditures. During the 1972 elections, the Clerk of the House has been the only supervisory officer to hold field investigations and hearings on election campaign complaints—and all of these hearings have been open to the public.

In fact, a review of the record of the Clerk of the House and the other supervisory officers shows that overall they met their election law responsibilities fairly and efficiently. And the enforcement entity in the bill builds on this expertise by creating a Board composed of these supervisory officers and four public members of national prominence. I am certain that both the high quality of these public members and the scrutiny of the Board by the public will remove any taint of an apparent conflict of interest.

Mr. Chairman, the House Administration Committee has labored long and hard on this measure, and has developed what I believe is a most significant piece of campaign finance legislation, and I would urge all my colleagues to give it their full support.

Mr. Chairman, I want to add just one word to what was observed by the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. UDALL), who has contributed so significantly to the shaping of the climate for the kind of legislation we are today considering. Time is running out. There is scheduled to come before the House in a few days, a very major piece of business which will preoccupy us all and, presumably, the other body as well, and then there will be a brief recess.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that it would be tragic if we were to fail in our obligation to the American people to produce a campaign reform bill in 1974 that can respond to the abuses of which we are all now too painfully aware.

H.R. 16090, with the committee amendments to which I have already alluded and with certain other committee amendments to which the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. THOMPSON) and other Members will address themselves, represents a solid, substantial campaign reform bill around which Members of the House, both Democrats and Republicans, of every point of view, can rally.

The time to act is now, 1974, not 1975. So I urge adoption of H.R. 16090, I hope with overwhelming support from both sides of the aisle.

Mr. BELL. Mr. Chairman, will be gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 additional minute to the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. BRADEMAS).

Mr. BRADEMAS. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. BELL. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask a question of the gentleman. It is a technical one, but I think perhaps the gentleman knows the answer, and I want to make a little legislative history on the floor.

Let us take an off election year. And I might say this happened in California a year or so ago. It was an off year, and a candidate who had not declared himself to be a candidate, but he goes around the State. He makes airplane trips. He has dinners and meetings, and so forth. And this runs up to a considerable amount of expense, and yet at the time he was not a candidate because it was an off election year, and he was not a declared candidate. He may spend over $25,000.

My question is: Would that $25,000 be considered as an expenditure for his election if he was not at that time himself an announced candidate for office, and it was an off election year?

Mr. BRADEMAS. In response to the gentleman's inquiry, I would say that he must declare himself a candidate to be a candidate.

Mr. BELL. But the gentleman from Indiana knows there have been a number of candidates for statewide office who have made speeches and made public appearances who have not announced as to whether they were or were not candidates.

Mr. BRADEMAS. I understand. But if we were to take California, if I were to cite an example——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. BRADEMAS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield an additional minute?

Mr. DENT. I yield 1 additional minute to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. BRADEMAS. I thank the gentleman. And I believe I can respond to his question more fully, and simply, by referring him to page 42 of the committee report on H.R. 16090, and the definition of "candidate" in section 591(b) of title 18, United States Code, which reads as follows:

(b) "candidate" means an individual who seeks nomination for election, or election, to Federal office, whether or not such individual is elected, and, for purposes of this paragraph, an individual shall be deemed to seek nomination for election, or election, to Federal office, if he has (1) taken the action necessary under the law of a State to qualify himself for nomination for election, or election, or (2) received contributions or made expenditures, or has given his consent for any other person to receive contributions or make expenditures, with a view to bringing about his nomination for election, or election, to such office;

Mr. BELL. So that the $25,000, or even above that, could be spent without the person running or apparently not running publicly, at least?

Mr. BRADEMAS. I believe that the definition of "candidate" I have just cited will answer the gentleman's question.

I hope I have responded satisfactorily to the gentleman's question.

Mr. BELL. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 1 minute.

Mr. Chairman, in response to the inquiry made by the gentleman from California (Mr. BELL) I might state that the law says a candidate is a candidate whenever he or she raises or expends money in behalf of a candidacy, or when a committee does so for them. In addition, of course, if he or she is a declared candidate, or a candidate under the particular State law at that time, he or she is also a candidate under our law.

Mr. BELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENZEL. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. BELL. What the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. BRADEMAS) said, was that so long as they are not a declared candidate, or because you cannot exactly prove that they are, then he or she could continue the expenditures as long as they are not declared candidates.

Mr. FRENZEL. If it was for a goodwill trip, yes, but if the expenditure one made was for a sign that said "Vote for Jones for Congress," then maybe they would come under the definition.

Mr. BELL. In other words, if word were mentioned that he or she were a candidate.

Mr. FRENZEL. Exactly; then he or she would be a candidate under the law.

Mr. BELL. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Illinois (Mr. CRANE), a member of the Committee on House Administration, and whose amendments are not allowed under the closed rule.

(Mr. CRANE asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. CRANE. Mr. Chairman, I thank my distinguished colleague from Minnesota for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Chairman, for openers, I would like to extend my congratulations to my colleagues on the Committee on House Administration for the time and energy they have put into preparing this rather prolix campaign "reform" bill. I put the word "reform" into quotation marks, Mr. Chairman, because, unfortunately, my colleagues in this body saw fit earlier this afternoon under our vote on the rule to prohibit me from introducing some amendments which I had anticipated I might have the opportunity to present for consideration, and which, in my judgment, represent the real substance of campaign reform, while much of that contained in the proposed legislation I do not view as reform at all. On the contrary, I think it is going to set our political system back rather considerably.

One of the areas of concern that many people have touched upon in the past several months in connection with the revelations accompanying Watergate and related matters is influence peddling in politics. We are all too familiar with the role of the milk lobby, and the question of whether in fact contributions from the milk lobby had any impact on decisionmaking in the White House.

In this connection we had an amendment introduced before our committee by the distinguished gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. FROEHLICH) which would have dealt with this question of influence-peddling by special-interest groups, and which would remove any doubt in anyone's mind as to whether any vested-interest group was exercising undue influence on the decisionmaking of a Member. This amendment that the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. FROEHLICH) had initially proposed before the committee, and was defeated in the committee, I intended to bring before the whole House. It would have prohibited contributions from political committees to candidates except for contributions from the respective congressional campaign committees of the Democratic and Republican Parties, and the Senate campaign committees.

As the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. FROEHLICH) very capably explained to the committee at the time he introduced this amendment, this would have had the effect of removing any area of doubt as to whether the realtors through REALPAC, or business and industry through BIPAC, or the American Medical Association through AMPAC, or for that matter, even the American Conservative Union through its Conservative Victory Fund.

Also the Political Education Committee of the AFL–CIO—was exercising undue influence over Members through campaign contributions. That, in my estimation, was a salutary amendment. It was one that I think should have been adopted by the committee and incorporated into this bill.

The second amendment I intended to offer deals with contributions in kind. This has been an area where we are all too aware of a number of abuses—and they are not confined exclusively to unions. When corporations provide, for example, unreported aircraft travel, that surely is an abuse as much as when unions engage in the providing of services of a similar nature. Such contributions should have an appropriate fair market value attached to them and classified and reported as in-kind contributions. That was the second amendment that I had hoped to bring up before this committee.

The third is one that I introduced first before the committee at the time we had our Reporting Act legislation 2 years ago. This would have prevented the use of involuntarily raised union moneys for political purposes, whether those were voter registration drives or get-out-the-vote drives. I do not think there is any question in anyone's mind that these have distinctly partisan overtones.

I can understand so long as silence in the law permits this injustice to continue, that those people who are so inclined will exploit this deficiency in the law. I have been waiting vainly for the American Civil Liberties Union to get involved in the fight on behalf of the civil liberties of these people whose involuntarily raised union moneys, which must be paid frequently as a condition for employment, are being used to subsidize political objectives contrary to their own.

Mr. DENNIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 additional minutes to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CRANE. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. DENNIS. I thank both of the gentlemen for yielding.

I simply want to say that in my judgment the gentleman from Illinois in the well is making a very important contribution to this debate, although unfortunately there are very few people here to hear it. The essential cynicism of the process we are going through this afternoon is illustrated by the consideration of this so-called reform bill, which is being considered under a rule where the three important amendments mentioned by the gentleman, indeed, essential amendments for any real campaign reform, to anyone who knows anything about the subject realistically cannot even be considered by this body, cannot even be voted upon. The essential cynicism of this situation is a sad commentary on our whole operation here, and I am glad the gentleman at least is still allowed to point out the need, even though in this body we are not allowed to have a vote.

Mr. CRANE. I thank the gentleman for his comments.

In conclusion I would like to add this one final note. In connection with the abuses we have thought about and heard reported in the media over the past year or so, I think it is essential for us to bear in mind that there is one overriding reason for abuse that this body ought to consider, for it gets to the nub of the problem. In answering the question why people are willing to spend millions of dollars and willing to circumvent the law as a means of obtaining influence here, I think the answer is that the Federal Government in Washington is too vast and too sweeping in its powers and exercises life and death control over too many aspects of American life. When we address ourselves to this problem, we will have begun the most meaningful campaign reform and not before.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Idaho (Mr. SYMMS).

(Mr. SYMMS asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I would like to associate myself with the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. CRANE).

Mr. Chairman, one way or another, this Congress soon will act on campaign spending reform. I am sure all my colleagues will want to be on record back home as being solidly on the side of representative government, and solidly opposed to special interests.

However, unless the campaign reform legislation we enact covers in-kind—noncash—political expenditures by special interest groups, we will be doing more harm than good.

Dave Broder of the Washington Post recently addressed that point:

> If access to large sums (of cash) is eliminated as a potential advantage for one candidate or party by the provision of equal public subsidies for all, then the election outcome will likely he determined by the ability to mobilize other forces. The most important of these factors are probably manpower and publicity. Legislation that eliminates the dollar influence on politics automatically enhances the influence of those who can provide manpower or publicity for the campaign.

Such nonreform legislation would by definition leave virtually unchallenged the bosses of big labor in the political arena—making a mockery of the political ambitions of the estimated 16 million wage earners who must pay union officials for representation they do not want or lose their jobs.

Like most Americans, we recognize the serious need for further careful examination and reform of the practices under which political campaigns are financed. That is why we are supporting efforts in this House to address the reform issue to "in-kind" as well as direct financial aid.

There is not one of us who can honestly deny the excessive influence union officials exert in this Congress, because of the political support they provide. Support which Mrs. Helen Wise, the recent past president of the teachers union, says will amount to "millions and millions" this year.

Twelve years ago, Justice Hugo Black in his dissent in IAM against Street said:

> There can be no doubt that the federally sanctioned union-shop contract here, as it actually works, takes a part of the earnings of some men and turns it over to others, who spend a substantial part of the funds so received in efforts to thwart the political, economic and ideological hopes of these whose money has been forced from them under authority of law.

That situation has not changed. The use of compulsory union dues for political purposes seriously jeopardizes our system of representative government. It dilutes every citizen's political freedom and outrageously violates the basic rights of workers whose money is being misused. We believe that there can be no meaningful campaign reform legislation unless it contains provisions which will put a stop to these political spending abuses.

A recent public opinion study by Opinion Research Corp. showed that 78 percent of all union members—and a greater majority of the general public want union dues kept out of politics.

Can we deny them and still claim to be representatives of the people?

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 4 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, we have reported this bill at great length in the RECORD, and in the committee report, which of course, will stand for itself. Like the chairman of the committee, I hope we do not use all of our time in the scheduled debate and that we do proceed on a prompt basis to the amendments allowed.

Our job has been rendered a great deal easier by the passage of the closed rule, which we on this side disagreed with. But since the vote has gone against us we must proceed as that restrictive rule directs.

Mr. Chairman, the bill before us is a mixed bag. The committee labored mightily, and diligently, and produced a good vehicle, but an imperfect one. The bill has been considerably strengthened within the last 24 hours due to the hard work on the part of the chairman of the committee in constructing what I think are important compromises to be reflected in the committee amendments. These will do a great deal to shore up what I think are some of the weak spots in the bill that is before us.

There are many strengths in the bill and the committee is to be commended for those strengths. For instance, the limitations on contributions and expenses, while all of us may disagree with the various levels, have got to be something that is necessary and something the people want.

The single committee, the limitation on cash, the preemptions of State rules, the restoration of reasonable rights under chapter 611 for Government contractors the removal of State and local employees from unreasonable Hatch Act restrictions, the redefinition of restrictions on foreign nationals, the restrictions on honorariums are all important features of this bill. All of us will undoubtedly agree to the merits of these features even if we might have some complaints with some of the particular numbers involved.

I am particularly pleased with the committee amendment which will relate to the board of supervisory officers because I think it answers a number of the complaints I had about the committee bill. I am pleased that the compromise has been able to worked out.

What has not been worked out is the subject of public financing of elections which in my judgment is destructive to our election processes and will reduce individual participation and reduce party strength in this country.

The bill itself is restrictive to political party activities because it equates a broad-based national political party with any small special interest group of 50 persons. Each is able to contribute $5,000 to any campaign, and in my judgment this particular facet of the bill makes a special interest, a single tiny special interest, the equivalent of a political party. It renders violence to the concept that political parties are important and necessary to our system of government.

It is also my regret that the clearinghouse function, which was previously provided by the General Accounting Office, has been dispensed with in this particular bill. It may be possible to resurrect it now that we have a new board of supervisory officers. It is the one element in the Federal Government that renders some good to State governments.

We seem to have plenty of interest in telling the States how to run elections, but no interest in helping them with the elections. The clearinghouse served in that function and it is my hope that will be restored to the bill.

Mr. Chairman, I hope we adopt some of these amendments, but certainly not the Anderson-Udall amendment, and that we move this bill along and produce for the American people a good election reform bill at a time when confidence in our Government is threatened.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. GAYDOS).

(Mr. GAYDOS asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. GAYDOS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of this bill.

Mr. Chairman, the Committee on House Administration has spent many hours in marking up this bill and, at this time, I want to congratulate both the Chairman, Mr. HAYS, as well as my colleagues on the committee for their diligent efforts in drafting the legislation which is now before the House. It was evident to all the members of the committee that there was no easy answer to the many problems that were raised. I do think, however, that the bill before us is a good one. It reflects an attempt to meet the problems arising out of the 1972 elections and to provide a means of preventing their repetition in future elections.

We must bear in mind the fact that many of the abuses of the 1972 elections which have been exposed, were brought to light only because of the disclosure requirements of the Federal Elections Campaign Act of 1971. Furthermore, we must not lose sight of the fact that many of those responsible for those abuses have been and are still being prosecuted under existing law.

So I submit that we do have existing law that has been beneficial.

I. LIMITATION ON EXPENDITURES AND CONTRIBUTIONS

The purpose of the bill before us is to add to the 1971 act by providing additional restrictions on campaign activities. The 1971 act established limitations on the amount that a candidate could spend on "communication media." The substantial sums spent in the 1972 Presidential campaign, namely $54 million by Mr. Nixon and $28 million by Senator MCGOVERN, as well as some House campaigns involving expenditures by individual candidates in excess of $100,000, and even a few in excess of $200,000 have demonstrated that a limitation on only a portion of the total campaign expenditures is inadequate.

Accordingly, the bill before us would place an overall ceiling on campaign expenditures. For Presidential campaigns this would be $10 million in the preconvention period and $20 million in the general election. When compared with the expenditures on the 1972 election, it is abundantly clear that it is the intent of the bill that the tide must be reversed and allowable Presidential campaign expenses must be substantially reduced.

With respect to senatorial campaigns the limits are 5 cents multiplied by the population of the State—but in no case less than $75,000—for each election; primary and general.

For House campaigns the limits are $75,000 for each election; primary and general—and runoff if needed.

Admittedly the $75,000 limitation has to be arbitrary as many candidates spent substantially less while others spent more, but in order to take into consideration variations between congressional districts, the committee concluded that $75,000 was an appropriate limitation.

The bill does contain two provisions that could affect these limitations. One provision allows an increase in the ceiling based on an increase in the price index from the base period of 1973 and the year preceeding the election. The second provision does allow a candidate to exclude from the limitation any expenses—not to exceed 25 percent of the limitation—for the costs entailed in fundraising. These provisions apply to all Federal elections.

Much has been made about the existence of the few very large contributors who appear to play a disproportionate role in the elections of Federal officials. The provisions of this bill setting very low contribution limits should eliminate the potential for abuse by the very large donors. No individual can contribute more than $1,000 to a candidate for each election—a total of $2,000 for primary and general, or $3,000 if a runoff is included—and no individual can contribute more than $25,000 to all candidates for all Federal elections in a single year.

Strict enforcement of these provisions should both eliminate the undue influence of the very large contributor to past elections as well as encourage many more individuals to contribute to the candidates of their choice. No longer will an individual be discouraged from making a modest contribution to an election campaign because of his feeling that his contribution will mean nothing compared to the substantial contribution of the very affluent individual.

The lack of participation and apathy of such a large segment of the electorate is a problem that concerns all of us. The setting of very low limits on individual contributions should serve to convince these individuals that they should take a more active part in election campaigns, to educate themselves as to the candidates and issues involved and to contribute to those candidates who promote their interests.

With respect to contributions by organizations, the bill provides a limit of $5,000 on contributions by a "political committee" to any candidate for any election.

A candidate cannot contribute more than $35,000 from his personal funds or the personal funds of his immediate family in connection with his own campaign.

There are additional provisions which prohibit contributions by foreign nationals and cash contributions in excess of $100.

II. DISCLOSURE

In order to make the disclosure provisions of the 1971 act more effective, the bill requires that each candidate designate a "principal campaign committee" to make expenditures on behalf of the candidate and to be responsible for the preparation and filing of reports to reflect the activities of all committees which support a candidate. This should inhibit the proliferation of campaign committees and provide a single report to reflect all activities in support of the candidate.

The bill amends existing law by repealing the provision requiring the 15-day and 5-day report and instead requiring a 10-day report which would have to be mailed no later than the 12th day prior to the election. Experience has indicated that the 5-day report has been of little value because the short time span involved between filing and the election prevents the most effective use of the information contained therein.

III. FINANCING OF PRESIDENTIAL ELECTIONS

The bill contains provisions which mark a radical change from the present private system of financing presidential elections. It expands on the dollar checkoff procedure which was adopted in 1971 by providing each major party with funds up to $2 million to cover the expenses of the party's nominating convention. Minor parties would be eligible for a lesser sum based on their past vote or to be reimbursed on the basis of their present vote in the general election.

Payment for convention expenses would be the first claim on the funds available from the checkoff procedure.

The major parties would be eligible to receive up to $20 million to cover expenses incurred in the general election. Minor parties would be eligible to a lesser amount. If a party chooses to use this method and funds available from the dollar checkoff fund are insufficient to cover the entire $20 million then the parties would be allowed to raise the difference from private sources.

With respect to presidential prenomination activities, the bill provides for funds from the dollar checkoff fund to be available on a matching basis. This is to assure that a candidate for nomination has sufficient national support and is not a frivolous candidate.

The use of funds from the dollar checkoff are limited only to the Presidential elections. Experience to date indicates that the overwhelming number of instances of election campaign abuses involved the recent Presidential campaign.

I am not presently convinced that the use of the checkoff system is going to be a complete solution to this problem, but I do support this approach with the hope it will be a viable solution.

On the other hand, I am not convinced at this time that the dollar checkoff system should be applied to other Federal elections. There is a substantial difference both in the magnitude and the process of Presidential elections as compared to elections to congressional office which make the former more appropriate for the use of public rather than private funds. The problem of frivolous candidates alone is one that could be a nightmare in the case of public funding of congressional elections.

Furthermore, I am quite optimistic that the limitations on contributions and expenditures provided in the current bill when combined with the disclosure provisions of the 1971 act as amended by the bill before us will eliminate the opportunity for campaign abuses in congressional elections.

We must not be unmindful of the fact that the constitutionality of funding Federal elections from the dollar checkoff system is far from clear.

Accordingly, I support the approach of the bill before us which limits the dollar checkoff system to the Presidential election.

CONCLUSION

The bill that the House Administration Committee has reported to the full House is a sound and workable approach to a very complex problem.

I sincerely urge my colleagues to give their full support to it.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 7 minutes to the gentleman from Colorado (Mr. ARMSTRONG).

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. Chairman, it is my purpose to ask some questions about provisions of the bill which trouble me. I refer to language on line 21 of page 6. I would like to read it and put it in perspective:

"(e)(1) No person may make any expenditure (other than an expenditure made by or on behalf of a candidate under the provisions of subsection (c)) relative to a clearly identified candidate during a calendar year which, when added to all other expenditures made by such person during the year advocating the election or defeat of such candidate, exceeds $1,000.

I would like to inquire of the floor manager of this legislation whether or not I correctly understand that this section limits not just the right of candidates or their supporters, but other persons who are in no way related to the campaign or the candidates on either side.

Mr. FRENZEL. It is my impression that this $1,000 limitation was the committee's response to the question of free speech, which was at least hinted at in the ACLU-Jennings case. We decided we should let an individual spend $1,000 to defeat or to elect the candidate, which amount would be not spent through the particular candidate's campaign committee or through the candidate personally. What we are doing, I think, in a short phrase, is to allow every individual a thousand dollars' worth of free speech.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Minnesota has come quickly to the heart of my concern. We are talking about other persons, not candidates or their committees.

The thing I do not understand, and I wish we could have some explanation, is how we can limit the right of free speech to $1,000 worth. The first amendment says we may not abridge free speech; we may not curtail; we may not diminish; we may not shorten. Is that not exactly what we are doing by this amendment?

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, the gentleman is correct. We are at least modifying or containing the right of free speech exactly as the Supreme Court said, that one can shout "Fire" anywhere he wanted to except in a closed building. We are saying that a person can have $1,000 worth of free speech to elect a candidate or to defeat him.

We chose $1,000 because that was the limit we put on individual contributions to the committees. We said there ought to be a limit which would be similar for independent expenditures. The constitutionality may be doubtful, but if so, then the individual limitation is also doubtful.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I thank the gentleman for his explanation.

But let me make it clear my concern is not primarily legalistic, but simply to draw attention of the Members to the fact that we are tampering in a very unfortunate way with free-speech rights, not of candidates or their supporters, but other persons, persons who may be entirely unrelated to the candidates, who may be citizens' groups, as was the committee in the New York decision—American Civil Liberties Union against Jennings.

May I now ask whether or not this $1,000 limitation would apply to advertisement or advocacy of the pros and cons of issues which may be clearly identified with the candidates, even though the candidates are not clearly identified within the meaning of the definition which follows this paragraph?

For example, if we have two candidates clearly defined on an emotional issue such as busing, inflation or amnesty, can citizens go out and advocate one side or the other of the issue and not mention candidates and escape this limitation?

Mr. FRENZEL. In my judgment, they cannot. This particular amendment was proposed by the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. NEDZI). The gentleman will find in our committee records that gentleman's explanation. I think he intended to cover by the words "clear and unambiguous" reference to a candidate the kind of thing the gentleman is discussing. One cannot by subterfuge or indirection escape that description if in fact the candidate, opposed or proposed, is apparent.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Let me suggest that while such issues as busing or amnesty may be clear cut, other issues are less sharply defined. I feel that we will find ourselves in a quagmire of litigation as committees try to determine where this line is.

May I ask a further related question of the gentleman? Supposing a committee seeks to advocate the election of 10 candidates and buys a $10,000 ad. Is it then to be prorated among the 10 of them?

Mr. FRENZEL. That is my understanding.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. May I ask, if the money is spent for an organizational effort not directly related to a candidate; for example, suppose to hire poll watchers or campaign workers, which in the end may be the most effective political expenditure of campaign funds, does it escape this limitation and other similar limitations in the bill?

Mr. FRENZEL. In my judgment, that expense would have to be prorated also, depending on the number of candidates.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Suppose it is not for a candidate, but simply an expenditure for this purpose in the area?

Mr. FRENZEL. We can think up all kinds of situations that are difficult to explain. I think we have to take each one on its face. If there is a party expense which is pure overhead and is not directed at any single candidate, or may flow over to non-Federal type candidates, we will simply have to interpret those as they come up.

That is one of the reasons the committee wrote into the bill the advisory opinion section, which I hope will be helpful to candidates of all parties.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. Chairman, in the brief time remaining, I would like to again thank the gentleman from Minnesota for his explanations and to comment the gentleman and others who worked on this legislation for their sincerity of purpose. But I think they have gone far astray. I think they are making a terrible mistake which will be ultimately invalidated by the courts, but which will in the meantime cause a great harm.

I hope that there may yet be a way to amend the bill to strike out this provision.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I will yield if I have any time left.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 1 additional minute.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I wish to associate myself with the gentleman's concerns. I think there is a real question as to whether or not we can put a quantified limit on the individual's constitutional rights of free speech, whether it is about political campaigns or anything else, but in particular political campaigns, which strikes at the heart of the operation of our Government.

I think the gentleman has raised a substantial point which, if this legislation is thoughtfully considered, will sustain his viewpoint.

(Mr. BROWN of Ohio asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. THOMPSON).

(Mr. THOMPSON of New Jersey asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. THOMPSON of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I do not intend to use 5 minutes, but I cannot let this opportunity pass without commending, in particular, the chairman of the committee (Mr. HAYS) and the members of the committee.

I have heard virtually innumerable attacks on the chairman and on members of the committee for being dilatory, for not wanting legislation, and for stalling, all of which attacks which have been unfair and untrue.

This is enormously complicated legislation, and I would expect that of the members of the committee, there were at least an average of 10 amendments in the hands of each one of them. The gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. FRENZEL) himself must have had 50 amendments. I had about 12 or 14.

We operate under the 5-minutes rule, and everyone was given every possible opportunity to be heard and to have his amendments voted upon. Virtually innumerable votes were taken, and in the course of this we saw a committee operate in the best possible and most democratic fashion in terms of give and take.

The gentleman from Minnesota referred to the committee amendments which were agreed upon a bipartisan and unanimous basis. I shall present 4 of them. They are not long, nor are they complicated, but their effect is to tighten up what we consider to be loopholes in this very excellent legislation.

Groups from outside this body, with particular interests, have been heard. They were present at the markups, have had their input, and have been paid attention to. In many cases their suggests have been accepted.

In the final analysis, the votes of the committee, despite individual differences on individual sections or words or interpretations, were agreed upon almost totally unanimously in order to get this legislation to the floor.

I simply want to reiterate my confidence in the chairman and in my colleagues on the committee and to suggest to the Members that it is absolutely impossible to draft a perfect piece of legislation which is as complicated as is this. We think that we voted as well as can be done, and there may be subsequent changes necessary, but nevertheless, we are answering to an honest and much-needed response from the American public for meaningful election reform. That is the essence of this legislation.

We shall achieve the desires of the American public, and we shall do so honorably in this process today.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. BAKER).

(Mr. BAKER asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BAKER. Mr. Chairman, in the catalog of abuses, compulsory political donations by union members rank right up there with the worst.

Absolutely no one argues against union officials' right to assist their political friends. It is precisely the same right enjoyed by business groups. The trouble begins when unions take dues money to finance that assistance.

How do they do this? Mostly through the services they perform for prounion candidates. Union political front organizations, notably the Committee on Political Education, COPE, conduct get-out-the-vote drives in neighborhoods likely to go for right-thinking candidates; they turn over buildings, trucks, telephones, and computers to friends of the union viewpoint.

Now if the dues-paying union man happens to like the candidate his union is helping, he may not worry much about where his dues are going. But what if he hates the fellow, cannot stomach his views for a minute? It is too bad, but there is no help for him: Like it or not, he is going to subsidize a candidate for whom he refuses to vote.

The issue, then, is one of political freedom. Either the union member has the right to withhold support from a given candidate or he has not the right. There is no other way of looking at it.

In 1972 the unions spent some $50 million on their political friends, only about 10 percent of which, according to labor columnist Victor Riesel, came from voluntary giving.

Accordingly, I would have been supporting the proposed amendments to curb "in kind" as well as directed donations.

As the Dallas Morning News wrote in a recent editorial, we can—

Take it from George Meany: "Existing laws aren't nearly strong enough to prevent the use of union dues for political purposes." The ban, as the AFL–CIO chieftain puts it, is "honored as far as I am concerned by everybody in the breach."

I do not know how I can vote for this discriminatory legislation since the rule prohibiting amendments has been adopted.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. MICHEL).

(Mr. MICHEL asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DEL CLAWSON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The CHAIRMAN. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Chair announces that he will vacate proceedings under the call when a quorum of the committee appears.

Members will record their presence by electronic device.

The call was taken by electronic device.

QUORUM CALL VACATED

The CHAIRMAN. One hundred Members have appeared. A quorum of the Committee of the Whole is present. Pursuant to rule XXIII, clause 2, further proceedings under the call shall be considered as vacated.

The Committee will resume its business.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. MICHEL).

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Chairman, I would like first to commend the committee for several of the items that are incorporated in the legislation, namely, the establishment of one central campaign committee through which we would do all of our reporting. I think that is certainly laudable. The fact that it establishes an independent election commission or board, I think, is good and sound and, as the Chairman pointed out, the simplifying of the election reporting requirements is surely desirable.

Then, too, the $100 limitation on cash contributions, in view of the shocking abuses that we have read and heard about within the last 18 months or so. One item that has not been touched upon up to this point, and that is the limitation of $1,000 on honorariums with a total of $10,000 in total for any Federal official.

And while this may in some respects be aimed at some of the Members of this body, I think in the main it is aimed at the members of the other body who have been so piously proclaiming from time to time that Members of Congress do not need any pay raises, while all the time making as much and more in honorariums as their salary as Senators. I commend the committee for facing up to this thing and laying it right out here for everybody to see for what it is worth.

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MICHEL. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. ANNUNZIO. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I want to inform the gentleman that that particular amendment happens to be my amendment, and he is absolutely right.

Mr. MICHEL. I did not know that, but I would expect that the gentleman from Illinois, from conversations we have had in the past, would be the one inclined to offer that kind of an amendment. Obviously he had enough support to persuade his fellow committee members to write that into the legislation brought before us here today.

I do have some reservation, however, about the $1,000 contribution limitation. I do not need it in my own case. I think my maximum contribution is $250 in this particular campaign. But we do have some big, significant races here in this body on both sides of the aisle, and I think from a practical point of view, when one runs for the U.S. Senate, that may very well be a low limitation. I believe the limitation in the Senate-passed bill is $3,000. Of course, that could very well be compromised.

I have some other serious reservations with respect to the $5,000 limit per election on contributions to candidates by our recognized national party organizations, as I engaged the chairman of the committee in a brief colloquy during his presentation. I think that limitation on some of the special interest groups is very much in order, but I would surely much have preferred that each of our national committees and our congressional and senatorial campaign committees would have been excluded from that $5,000 limitation. I want to see both of the principal national parties enhanced. I want to see them as two strong, vigorous parties, and I think by this figure equalizing special interest groups with our national recognized Republican and Democratic national congressional and senatorial campaign committees really downgrades the importance of our respective nationally recognized committees.

I personally would have preferred that limitation to be something in the neighborhood of $10,000 or more. So I have to voice my reservation here today.

I am also concerned about the flat $75,000 limitation on any race. In my own case, I would hope that we would not spend more than $25,000 or $30,000 in a race in which I am running, but as an 18-year incumbent, I would expect that all of the good will that I have built up over the period of many years would not require 50, 60 or more thousand dollars. As I said earlier in the exchange with the gentleman from Alabama (Mr. DICKINSON) for a challenger to unseat an incumbent in 1972, it took an average of $125,000 to get the job done.

And again, representing the party in the minority in this body, I just cannot concede to this figure of $75,000. I think the problem—and I really do not criticize the committee so much in arriving at this figure as I do the incapacity of the general public to really comprehend it, are the differences that prevail throughout the country from one district to the other.

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MICHEL. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. ANNUNZIO).

Mr. ANNUNZIO. I thank the gentleman for yielding again. I would like to point out that I was responsible for the $75,000 amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. WARE. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 4 additional minutes.

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield again to the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. ANNUNZIO).

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Chairman, as I pointed out to my friend, the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. MICHEL), I was also the sponsor of the $75,000 limitation which was a compromise in the committee. We had several figures. But I want to point out that we can add $19,000 more to that, because we provide in the committee bill for 25 percent of the $75,000, but in the end, in reality it amounts to $94,000.

Mr. MICHEL. On that point I might ask the gentleman a question. As I read it, we provided for a 25-percent amount over the $75,000, but would that be limited to the expenditures involved in raising the money, in raising the funds initially?

Mr. ANNUNZIO. It could be limited. I would call it the meat-and-potato amendment. If one has a banquet for example the cost of the meat and the potatoes would come out of that, out of the moneys one would raise.

Mr. MICHEL. Or if there was a direct mail expenditure, that would be included?

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Yes.

Mr. MICHEL. I thank the gentleman.

Then, one final point I would like to make in transgressing upon the Member's time in general debate here is what I see is left out of the bill and which I would liked to have seen offered in the form of an amendment to appropriately treat the in-kind services and goods, for the special interest groups often make substantial contributions by providing in-kind services and goods, such as telephones, cars, airplanes, computer time, staff "volunteers," and the like.

The committee bill would exempt these contributions from both the limitation and in some cases the disclosure requirements.

To prevent this type of campaign abuse, the amendment I had intended to offer before adoption of the closed rule would have prevented or prohibited such in-kind contributions in excess of $100.

I might say that in the four particular special elections for seats in the House of Representatives that were held earlier in the year it has been estimated with pretty good justification, and I will insert with my remarks, when I have asked for permission to revise and extend, some documents that will lead us to believe in just those four special elections the in-kind services provided actually approached or exceeded the amount of hard contributions.

Current law defines the word "contribution" to exclude "services provided without compensation by individuals volunteering a portion or all of their time on behalf of a candidate or political committee," and the committee bill further exempts certain other limited personal services, so my amendment would have had no effect on truly voluntary efforts by individuals on behalf of a candidate.

The amendment would, however, have curbed the type of "in-kind" contributions of special interest groups that have resulted in millions of dollars worth of what are, in effect, unreported campaign contributions.

Such contributions have been extensively documented in past campaigns, and represent a serious violation of the spirit, if not the actual letter, of our campaign law.

While several legislative methods of dealing with this problem have been suggested, a flat prohibition of "in-kind" contributions in excess of $100 is by far the most effective since it would eliminate, beyond the $100 level, the inevitable questions that arise over the worth or dollar value of such services to a candidate.

It seems to me if we hope to maintain any measure of credibility in our efforts at campaign reform, we must certainly take the steps necessary to curb abuses such as this.

Mr. Chairman, I am inserting in the RECORD the material I referred to earlier.

PENNSYLVANIA'S 12TH DISTRICT

The documented record of the race between Democrat John Murtha and Republican Harry Fox reveals that literally tens of thousands of union dollars were poured into the campaign by Murtha for former Representative John Saylor's (R–Pa) seat in the 12th District.

Contributions were of two types:

1. "Hard" contributions, in the form of cash donations, from thirty-two different union political action committees in the amount of $25,450.00 that were made to the Citizens for Murtha Committee.

2. "Soft" contributions, in the form of full time union staff personnel from national COPE, state COPE, the Pennsylvania state AFL–CIO and various other unions, the mailing by unions in behalf of Murtha, organizational activity at Indiana University that was clearly coordinated with Frontlash and supervised by a union "volunteer", last minute get-out-the-vote activities, polls conducted by the state AFL–CIO, and others such "soft" contributions. The amount identified in this area—by no means a full tally since the record for most of these hidden contributions remain in the hands of private organizations—comes to over $40,000—or nearly double the amount of hard contributions made by union officials.

STAFF TIME

It is clear that at least 20 union officials contributed time and effort during the campaign. They were:

1. Alexander Barkan, Director, COPE, $32,274.00 annual salary and $6,727.23 expenses.

2. Joseph Ferguson, Business Agent, International Ladies Garment Workers, $11,388.00 annual salary and $1,274.46 expenses.

3. Douglas Allen, Pennsylvania State AFL–CIO, salary unknown.

4. Mike Trbovich, Vice President, United Mine Workers, $31,100.57 annual salary and $3,049.04 expenses.

5. John Vento, Pennsylvania State AFL–CIO, salary unknown.

6. Carl Stellmack, Pennsylvania State AFL–CIO, salary unknown.

7. Harry Boyer, Pennsylvania State AFL–CIO, salary unknown.

8. Bernard Lurye, Assistant Manager, Garment Workers, $12,855.00 salary and $938.25 expenses.

9. James Myers, Organizer, AFSCME, $8,793 salary and $8,563.05 expenses.

10. Andrew Koban, District 15, Steelworkers, $17,314.59 salary and $4,179.56 expenses.

11. Edward Monborne, District 2, and International Exec. Board Member NMW, $22,491.73 salary and $4,600.61 expenses.

12. Frank Kulish, District 2 President, UMW, $15,314.17 salary and $87.22 expenses.

13. Mike Johnson, Vice President, Pennsylvania State AFL–CIO, salary unknown.

14. Robert Spence, International Representative, COMPAC, salary unknown.

15. Walter Carmo, Pennsylvania Education Assoc., salary unknown.

16. Chuck Krawetz, UMW, salary unknown.

17. Arnold Miller, President, UMW, $36,283.79 salary and $3,966.71 expenses.

18. Irwin Aronson, staff Pennsylvania State AFL–CIO, salary unknown.

19. Tom Reddinger, President, Indiana Labor Council (IAM), union salary, if any, unknown.

20. Dana Henry, member, IAM, no union salary.

Each of these individuals were identified—either through newspaper accounts, internal memos or union newsletters and papers—as having spent from one day to as much as five weeks promoting the Murtha candidacy.

One unionist, Tom Reddinger, identified by the Johnstown Tribune-Democrat as President of the Indiana County Central Labor Council, admitted in a personal interview, that he took five weeks of unpaid leave time from his job at Fisher-Scientific Company, Indiana, Pa., to work in the Murtha campaign. He further stated that all his expenses during this time were paid for by the Pennsylvania State AFL–CIO, including the cost for four telephones at headquarters, that, according to a General Telephone Company spokesman in Johnstown, would cost $126.80 during the five week period. Based on Reddinger's rate of pay with Fisher, his "in-kind" contribution in salary during the five week period would come to approximately $1000.

Where salaries are available, the union official involved was pro-rated at the actual salary (plus identifiable expenses), for the period of time he was involved; where no salary was available, a reasonable figure of $15,000 per annum was assigned (a low figure in light of the bulk of identified salaries of union officials.)

On this basis, it was determined that salaries involved amounted to $5,902.78 and expenses to $2,317.73, for a total of $8,220.51.

PRINTING

There were four mailings to the 66,000 union members in the district and 6,500 active and retired teacher union members by the Pennsylvania AFL–CIO COPE and the Political Action Committee for Education (PACE), political arm of the state teachers union (Penn. State Education Association).

The two mailed under Permit #1, Harrisburg (the permit is held by Speed Mail, Inc.) were costed out by reputable printers at the following rates:

1. Mailing of January 18, 1974 to 1,000 retirees only:

Printing, $10 and postage, $80. (mailed first class); totals $90.

Mailing of January 25, 1974 to 6,500 active and retired educators:

Printing at $10/m, $650 and postage, $520 (mailed first class) totals $1,170.

Two additional mailings were sent out at the non-profit organization rate (1.7 cents per piece) under permit #668 at Pittsburgh, Pa., a permit registered to the Pennsylvania State. . . . Costs of these two mailings, were as follows:

Mailing to 66,000 union members in District by United Labor Committee:

Printing at $27/m, $1,782; postage at 1.7¢, $112; and postage $191, totals $2,025.

The second quoted postage cost is the difference between a non-profit mailing rate of 1.7¢ and what the candidate would have had to pay if the mailing had gone out regular bulk mail rates.

Mailing to same members in district of flyer with four halftones:

Printing at $40/m, $2,640; postage at 1.7¢, $112; and postage, $191; totals $2,943.

Thus, the total value of mailings by unions in behalf of the Murtha candidacy came to $6,288.00.

OTHER CONTRIBUTIONS

Other "soft" contributions by unions to the Murtha race included:

1. At least 15,000 telephone calls by the Indiana County Central Labor Committee to members of the union in the county. (Source—interview with Tom Reddinger.)

2. "at least $12,000 is expected to go into the district from labor for last minute campaign expenses and election day activities." (Philadelphia Bulletin, February 3, 1974.)

3. "$14,000 which . . . the state and national AFL–CIO and COPE committees spent to house and feed staff members at a downtown Johnstown motel during the election campaign." (Johnstown Tribune-Democrat, January 30, 1974.)

4. The AFL–CIO was "operating out of 15 rooms at the Sheraton Inn, on Market Street." (Johnstown Tribune-Democrat, December 18, 1973.)

5. The state AFL–CIO conducted a telephone poll for Murtha in the 12th District (Johnstown Tribune-Democrat, December 18, 1973.)

6. Democratic telephone bank workers use facilities of Gautier Hall, which is owned by the Steelworkers Union (photo in the Johnstown Tribune-Democrat, February 5, 1974.)

SUMMARY

By category, identifiable soft contributions by unions to the Murtha campaign are as follows:

Staff time, salaries and expenses deferred	$8,220.51
Printing and postage for mailings	6,288.00
Student activities	369.52
Other:
Last minute get-out-the-vote	12,000.00
Costs at the Sheraton	14,000.00
Subtotal	40,878.03

When one includes the "hard" (reported) contributions of $28,450.00, it can be seen that the value of the total union effort in the district is at least $66,328.04, or nearly as much as Murtha reported for his entire campaign.

OHIO'S FIRST DISTRICT

There is very little doubt that, both in and off the record, union officials and their political organizations had a tremendous impact on the race between the Democrat, Tom Luken, and the Republican, Bill Gradison, on March 5th.

Direct contributions by union political organizations to the Luken for Congress Committee were made by thirty-three separate union organizations in the amount of $30,875.00.

The scope and significance of the indirect contributions by union officials is captured in the February 8, 1974 edition of The Chronicler, a bimonthly publication of the Cincinnati AFL–CIO Labor Council, which is distributed to 2,000 labor officials in the Cincinnati area.

In it, an announcement is made of the "most important business meeting for all union stewards and committeemen geared to their vital part in labor's effort to insure the election of Tom Luken to Congress." It goes on to note that "materials will be furnished and definite assignments outlined for the action required to build a Luken victory . . ." (emphasis supplied)

The cost of the space devoted in the Chronicler to Luken over the January 8-March 25 period represents an indirect cost of $360 alone.

In addition, William Sheehan, head of the Labor Council, disclosed that at least 4 national and state staffers were in for the election—or as George Meany put it on "Face the Nation" on March 3rd concerning the race, "We're putting in the usual—we're sending in outsiders. Some of our COPE men . . ."

Among those in Cincinnati were Ray Alverez, Area Director of COPE ($2,085.46 contribution in salary and expenses under previous formula); Ruth Colombo, COPE, ($1,977.19 pro rated salary and expenses for one month); Jane Adams Ely, Ohio State AFL–CIO (salary unknown); W. C. Young, National Field Director, COPE (salary $20,373.50 expenses $8,659.84). Ely and Young were in for an undisclosed period of time, but the bare minimum of salary and expenses for even one day's stay could reasonably be put at $500.00.

Thus, identifiable staff time and expenses for union officials came to $4,562.65.

Moreover, Alverez stated in an interview that at least 84,000 telephone calls were made from the phone banks at the Central Labor Council to union members in the District. If the cost of those calls were projected at the same 4½ cents per call rate used in Michigan, that would place their value at $3,780.00.

As in other districts, there were many mailings to union members:

1. At least two—one dated February 18, 1974 and another February 28, 1974 were sent out to members of District 30, United Steelworkers of America.

2. Another mailer dated February 28, 1974 was sent to all members of Local 863, UAW.

3. Yet another mailer dated February 18, 1974 was sent to members of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers.

4. Space was devoted in local union papers to promoting the candidacy of Luken.

In all at least $8,342.65 in paid staff time and telephone costs on a projected basis were pumped into the Luken's campaign.

MICHIGAN'S EIGHTH DISTRICT

As in the case with other special, off-year elections, the race between Democrat Robert Traxler and Republican Jim Sparling was significantly influenced by the infusion of "hard" and "soft" contributions made by union officials to the Traxler campaign.

Hard contributions amounted to nearly $29,000.00 with the United Auto Workers—an independent union based in the state—contributing nearly half the "hard" labor money, as reported by the Traxler for Congress Volunteer Committee.

Some 22 labor political action groups contributed $28,880 in "hard" money to the campaign, a figure that even cursory research shows does not realistically measure the contribution on the part of the union hierarchy in behalf of the Traxler campaign.

STAFF

A minimum of eight national, state, and local union officials contributed their salaried staff time (plus expenses) to the project of getting Traxler elected.

Those officials were:

James George, United Auto Workers (UAW), Detroit, annual salary $17,093.80, expenses $4,285.06,

Sam Fishman, UAW, salary $23,088.10, expenses $6,219.25,

Ray Alverez, Area Director, AFL–CIO COPE, salary $19,772.50, expenses $6,868.17,

Ernest Dillard, UAW, Detroit, salary, $18,294.65, exp., $6,246.37,

W. C. Young, National Field Director, COPE, salary $20,373.60, expenses $8,659.84,

John Dewan, UAW, Madison Heights, Michigan, salary $16,943.80, expenses, $3,992.16,

Ruth Colombo, Assistant Area Director, Women's Activities Program (COPE), salary $20,360.50, expenses $3,365.90.

In addition, Wallace J. "Butch" Warner, 2575 N. Orr Rd., Hemlock, Michigan, was off his job (unpaid) from January 14, 1974 through the election (April 16, 1974) to work as coordinator on the campaign for the "Traxler for Congress Labor Coordinator."

An employee of Michigan Bell and a paid staffer as President of Communications Workers of American Local No. 4108, Warner's worth to the campaign (he is a cable splicer and earns $225 per week under terms of the union contract) come to $3,202.50.

Warner disclosed in an interview that he had indeed worked with COPE and UAW personnel, identifying Sam Fishman as having been on the scene for at least one week, W. C. Young for 10 days, Ruth Colombo as having supervised for "at least 10 days" the phone banks used to contact the 43,000 active UAW members, 5,000 retirees and 25,000 AFL–CIO members in the district.

For various reasons—such as an unlisted number, personnel moving, etc.—some 50% of the 73,000 union members, according to Warner were not contacted. Thus, some 43,800 calls were made, many of them twice, once they were identified as in the Traxler camp. Assuming ½ of those contacted were in this category, that means approximately 65,200 phone calls to union members alone at the rate of 4½ cents per call (as billed in Michigan) for a net cost of $2,922.

In terms of paid staff time, we must weigh in the appropriate pro rata share of Ray Alvarez' salary and expenses. Alvarez candidly admits he was assigned to work in three congressional districts (Ohio 1, Michigan 5 and Michigan 8) from January 3 through April 16—or 28% of his annual time.

Thus, in all three races, his "in-kind" contribution was $6,256.40, a third of which ($2,085.46) is allocated to the race in Michigan 8.

Applying the same pro rata formula, the "in-kind" contributions for other COPE and UAW operatives are as follows:

W. C. Young had salary of $738.00 and expenses of $309 which totals $1,047.

Ruth Colombo had salary of $738.00 and expenses of $309 which totals $1,047.

Sam Fishman had salary of $444.00 and expenses of $120 which totals $564.

In summary, a cursory glance will establish at least $7,945.96 in "soft" contributions of paid staff time to the Traxler campaign.

PRINTING

In addition to the identifiable staff time and expenses involved, a substantial "soft" contribution come in the form of four separate mailings, three of which were sent "To all UAW members in Michigan's 8th Congressional District." Copies of those mailings are attached as "A."

Two different mailing permits were used at the non-profit organization rate, with permit #3333, which belongs to American Mailers and Binders of Detroit, on two mailings, and the UAW's own permit #6000 being used for the third.

In terms of cost, as estimated by a Michigan printer, here is what each of the mailings would cost:

Mailing of March 30, 1974 to 43,000 UAW members:

Printing at $28.80/m, $1,238.40; Postage at 1.7¢, $73.10; and postage, $124.70 totals $1,436.20.

Mailing of April 2, 1974 to 43,000 UAW members: (It is noteworthy that this mailing made from Detroit under permit #3333, contained as an insert a six panel brochure allegedly paid for by the Traxler for Congress Volunteer Committee).

Printing a two page letter at $38.30/m, $1,668.40; postage at 1.7¢, $73.10; and postage at 2.9¢, $124.70, totals $1,866.20.

Mailing of April 6, 1974 to 43,000 UAW members:

Printing, $1,688.40; postage at 1.7¢, $73.10; and postage at 2.9¢, $124.70, totals $1,866.20.

Mailing of "8th Congressional District Special Election Edition" of Michigan AFL–CIO News (Vol. 35, No. 37, April 16, 1974) to UAW members in the 8th District.

Printing, $2,750.00; and postage, $200.00, totals $2,950.00.

Thus, total soft printing costs contributed by the UAW and Michigan State AFL–CIO to the candidacy of Traxler came to a total of $8,118.60.

SUMMARY

It is therefore reasonable to state that many thousands of dollars in soft contributions were funnelled into the Michigan 8 race by the unions and union officials.

The contributions break down as follows:

"Hard" contributions from labor sources, $28,880.

"Soft" contributions:

Staff time and expenses	$7,945.96
Printing	8,118.60
Telephone costs	2,922.00
Total	18,986.56

This "investment" is over and above the reported money, for a grand total union contribution of $47,866.00

Additionally, three union officials were identified as being on the scene, whether as paid or unpaid is not clear. The three were: James George, UAW, Detroit (annual salary of $17,093.80); Ernest Dillard, UAW, Detroit (annual salary of $18,294.64); and John Dewan, UAW, Madison Heights (annual salary $16,943.80).

MICHIGAN'S FIFTH DISTRICT

The race for Vice President Gerald Ford's former seat in Congress was somewhat different from the other three special elections, in that a professional firm—headed by John Martilla—took over direction and management of the Vander Veen campaign.

Nevertheless, the union influence directing the campaign was exercised in both a direct and indirect fashion, much as it was in all other special elections.

1. Direct contributions as filed by the treasurer of the Vander Veen for Congress Committee lists some 12 separate union political action groups contributed a total of $18,711.00 to the Vander Veen campaign—or approximately 38% of the total direct reported contributions of $49,588.70.

2. Indirect contributions. Perhaps because a professional consulting firm was retained to direct the Vander Veen campaign, the "high profile" maintained by union officials while working in other special elections was not as evident. However, Ray Alvarez, area Director of the AFL-CIO's Committee on Political Education (COPE) admitted to having been in Michigan's 5th District. Under the same formula developed for the Michigan's eighth District some $2,085.46 of Alvarez' annual salary and expenses of $26,590.67 could be considered an indirect campaign contribution.

The printing area was one that afforded a good deal of "in-kind" support for the Democrat. Curiously, the same format, type face, halftones, paper, three of the pages are exactly the same and appeared in a tabloid-type mailer that went out under both the permit number of the candidate (#552) and the permit of the Western American mailers (#1), which mailed the piece in behalf of Region 1–D, United Auto Workers, Box H, Grand Rapids, Mich.

In terms of specific mailings and costs, the following were sent during the course of the campaign:

Two page letter, enclosing a xeroxed "fact sheet" on Vander Veen plus a postage paid return card under Permit #4721 addressed to Region 1–D, UAW, soliciting workers for the Vander Veen campaign.

Printing, $1,151.70; postage at 1.7c, $374.00; and postage at 2.9c, $638.00, totals $2,163.70.

Tabloid mailer (mentioned previously) sent to all UAW members in the district.

Printing, $2,373.00; postage at 1.7c, $374.00; and postage at 2.9c, $638.00, totals $3,385.00.

In addition a separate tabloid mailer was also prepared that is, once again, similar & identical in places to the other two tabloids. The difference is that this is printed on offset stock instead of newsprint and in all likelyhood mailed at an estimated cost of $3,315.00 to all UAW members in the district.

Thus total "in kind" printing and contributions to the Vander Veen campaign came to $8,863.70; combined with the salary for just one member of the COPE staff, Ray Alverez, the total in kind contributions in their quietest of the districts comes to at least $10,949.30.

Obviously, not all "soft" contributions are covered in the report on this district—telephones, etc.—but the low profile maintained by union officials during the race makes them almost impossible to detect.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. ANNUNZIO).

Mr. ANNUNZIO asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Chairman, I rise today in support of H.R. 16090. I want to particularly congratulate the chairman of the full committee for the patience that he exercised during the past 6 months while the committee was deliberating all of the amendments that have been offered in committee to this legislation. As a cosponsor of this legislation, I would also like to pay tribute to the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. FRENZEL), the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. DEVINE), the gentleman from Alabama (Mr. DICKINSON), the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. DENT), the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. BRADEMAS) and the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. THOMPSON); in fact, all the members of the full Committee on House Administration for the manner in which they attended all the meetings in order to come out with a bill that deals with limitations, that deals with disclosure and deals with an idea whose time has come. I refer to public financing.

I would like to remind the Members of this House that in 1968 we passed in the House on a Christmas tree bill a $1 contribution the taxpayer would designate to which political party his contribution would go. In the public finance section this legislation we have $24 million that has already been collected by the Internal Revenue Service checked off by the citizens as a voluntary contribution. It is estimated that by 1976 we are going to have $60 million in this fund.

I want to also remind the Members of this House that I am totally against any moneys being taken out of the general revenue fund for purposes of financing an election; but I do strongly favor the fact that the American people checked off and have mandated the Members of Congress to act, "We have given you voluntarily $60 million. We expect you to use this money so that we can have the kind of elections in America that we can feel comfortable with, and especially with the Members of the Congress and the President of the United States."

This is the reason we included in the bill a limitation of $20 million for candidates on a presidential level, $20 million for the Democrats and $20 million for the Republicans, and $2 million for each party convention.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 1 additional minute.

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Chairman, there is $2 million for each party convention and with the Presidential primaries to be financed, as fully explained by my distinguished colleague, the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. JOHN BRADEMAS, that we would have to collect $250 in small contributions, a total of $5,000 in 20 States, a total of $100,000 to be eligible to qualify.

I believe in congressional public financing and the checkoff system. If the money is there and if the committee can work its will this afternoon, I would like to see both the Democratic Congressional Committee and the Republican Congressional Committee, with my good friend from Illinois (Mr. MICHEL), that those committees be used as a vehicle to distribute that public money that has been designated by the taxpayers to be used for public financing of congressional elections.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 7 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. DENT), the chairman of the Elections Subcommittee.

(Mr. DENT asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, with all of the talk about the closed rule and not allowing certain sections of the bill to be open for amendment, I can say to the Members that for the number of years—not only months—that our committee held hearings and so forth, and the committee itself under the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. HAYS), with its meetings and markups for 22 sessions, the major point of discussion in all of these days and hours has been the question of money—m-o-n-e-y—the root of all evil and the source of much good.

Money is the name of the game in politics, and until we admit that and stand up and face it, all of the reforms that we may yap about and talk about and try to get our attention about are just so much talk.

As long as one candidate can spend $204,000 in a general election against a candidate who spends $2,775, it is a farce and a fraud upon the body politic; as long as the total number of candidates in the entire primary and general last year, who were candidates in the primaries and won and went on to the general election, 834 candidates spending a total of $40 million less $8,000.

We are proposing in this legislation to increase that spending allowance, almost by mandate in this law, to $240 million for 835 candidates. Who on God's earth is going to say that this is a reform when we are proposing to spend $7,395,000 for an election for Members of Congress more than the entire salaries of all the membership of the Congress combined?

The reason this has all come to this stage is because those who talk reform do not want reform; because every public organization demanding reform is basing it upon greater expenditures for elections, instead of less; when these same organizations fight every attempt by the Congress or even by the Commission on Salaries to raise or increase the salary of Congressmen. All right, they all agree, Common Cause and the rest, they agree that we should spend $240 million to get elected, but not one cent for an increase in pay to put us in a position where we would not have to go out with cap in hand and a tincup asking for donations.

"Please put money in the pot so that I can run for Congress. Please send me some money so that I can buy some matches and cards. Please do that. I want to serve in the Congress. I want to be a public servant, but you better send me some money or else I will not be able to do it, and if I am not there, I cannot do you any favors."

That is the condition we find ourselves in, because we have allowed this office to be bought and sold and traded around like a commodity. Three hundred and twelve thousand dollars by one candidate who ran against another candidate in the same election, who spent $208,000. It goes from the sublime to the ridiculous. The average spending of the Members of this Congress, of the total number of Members running, was $47,000. But, we are saying to 5 percent—5 percent of the candidates for Congress spent near the amount that we are saying in this bill ought to be the amount to spend for Congress.

The other 95 percent somehow found a way into the Congress with much, much, much less. The limit of one's spending is not the criterion that we measure an election on.

Let me just show the Members some of the examples, if they wish.

We have in one State—I will not mention the names of the Members; it might embarrass them, and I would not want to do that—but a Democrat spent $274,000 against a Republican who spent $152,000. The Republican was a nonincumbent and won.

We have in our House a very wonderful man. I think the Members would recognize him by the clothes he wears. He spent $218,000 to get elected to a seat in Congress. I want to know what kind of service he can render to his people that entitles him to $218,000 worth of expenditures on his part.

He had running against him a candidate who spent $169,000 and another one who spent $212,000 and beat a candidate against him—not a challenger, a candidate; they were both nonincumbents—he beat a candidate who spent $306,000.

Here we have another example of $518,000 and in another instance, $520,000 for a job that pays a total of $85,000.

I do not know. Maybe some of the Members come from some place where they have a money machine.

Here is what happens because of this. Here is an opus written by a well-known newspaperman. Let me give the Members his analysis of Congress: "$661 million puts Congressmen on Easy Street."

He starts off by asking a question, and I will give anyone a dime who can answer it.

This is what he says:

"What costs $661 million a year, travels a lot, talks a lot, talks himself to sleep, and writes letters even when he is not written to? Two guesses. Do you give up? Why, it is an easy answer: The Congress of the United States."

The Congress is now about to come on scene in a great public spectacle on the impeachment.

If we Members figure this out, it comes to about $1 million-plus per Member per year that the taxpayers have to pay.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. HAYS. I have another minute left, I understand. I will be glad to yield it to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. DENT. I do not want to read the whole thing, but I just want to tell the Members what he counts as an emolument, as a great piece of the gravy train.

He says: "The Library of Congress provides him with free reading matter by bedtime if by chance he cannot sleep, and when he dies, the deceased Member receives automatically an extra year's salary to help him out with his own final arrangements."

Mr. Chairman, I think we ought to put this man up for the Pulitzer Prize.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield a minute to the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. BLACKBURN).

(Mr. BLACKBURN asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. Chairman, we are now engaged in trying to pass a campaign reform bill—a bill which most Americans want to see adopted. I believe it is almost incredible, however, that this long and detailed bill makes absolutely no mention of what is probably the largest single abuse of our present campaign laws. I refer to the giant loophole which, in effect, allows union dues to be used in vast quantities, perhaps $100 million in a general election, to be funnelled by the union leaders to their favored candidates. Two international unions—caught red-handed in these practices—have recently agreed as a result of court cases to refund to their members those portions of their union dues which have been spent on political campaigning. These were the Brotherhood of Railway and Airline Clerks and the International Association of Machinists. A recent article in the Wall Street Journal, January 29, 1974, makes it very clear that cash-equivalent political expenditures by union officials far outweigh their direct cash aid to candidates.

I should like to submit this article for the RECORD at this time:

MONEY'S JUST ONE TOOL MACHINISTS USE TO HELP FAVORED OFFICE SEEKERS—INDIRECT AID IS A BIG ITEM, COURT RECORDS INDICATE; HOW DEMOCRATS BENEFITED—SOME OF THE DOUGH IS SOFT

(By Byron E. Calame)

LOS ANGELES.—Like the President himself, some of Richard Nixon's foes in organized labor have been surrendering sensitive political records.

The International Association of Machinists, in a case initiated by a group of dissident members of the union, was forced by a federal court here to release thousands of documents. They reveal in unusual detail how the IAM goes about electing its friends to federal office.

This rare glimpse into the inner workings of one of the AFL-CIO's largest (800,000 members) and most politically active unions shows that there is a lot more to a union's political clout than the direct financial contributions reported to government watchdogs—and labor's political experts say the machinists probably adhere to the campaign spending laws as closely as any union.

The documents indicate that direct gifts are often overshadowed by various services provided free of charge to favored candidates under the guise of "political education" for union members. The indirect aid includes some of labor's most potent political weapons; assignment of paid staff members to candidates' campaigns, use of union computers, mobilization of get-out-the-vote drives.

TRIPS AND DINNERS

Dues have also been used, the documents indicate, to supply IAM-backed candidates with polls and printing services and to finance "nonpartisan" registration drives, trips by congressional incumbents back home during campaigns, and dinners benefiting office seekers endorsed by the machinists. Machinist-backed candidates are almost invariably Democrats.

An important question is whether these dues-financed activities violate federal laws that for decades have barred unions and corporations from using their treasury funds to contribute "anything of value" to candidates for federal office. Money for such direct contributions by unions must come from voluntary donations coaxed out of the members. The federal statutes do permit unions to spend dues for partisan politicking directed at the union's members and their families, on the theory that this sort of thing is internal union business, and the money used for this activity is called "education money," or "soft money."

The political activities of the machinists' union are, indeed, aimed at the union's members and are therefore proper, says William Holayter, director of the union's political arm, the Machinists Non-Partisan Political League.

DRAWING THE LINE

Even labor's critics concede that it is sometimes hard to draw the line between activities designed to sell a candidate to a union's members and those intended to sway voters in general. A member of the machinists assigned to promote a candidate among other machinists may inevitably find himself wooing other voters as well.

Still, the machinists' documents suggest that the union has often sought to provide maximum assistance to a candidate by use of soft money. "The problem," says one labor political strategist, "is that the machinists put too much in writing." The late Don Ellinger, the widely respected head of the Machinists Non-Partisan Political League who died in 1972, evidently had a penchant for memos.

Spending reports filed with the Senate for the 1970 campaign show that the Machinists Non-Partisan Political League openly gave Sen. Gale McGee $5,000; the internal records now disclose that the Wyoming Democrat also received at least $9,300 in noncash assistance. Direct donations to Texas Democrat Ralph Yarborough's unsuccessful Senate reelection bid in 1970 were listed at $8,950; one document indicates he got other help worth at least $10,680. While the league poured $15,200 directly into Democrat John Gilligan's unsuccessful 1968 bid for an Ohio Senate seat, the documents show it indirectly provided more, $15,500.

RECEIPT UNREPORTED

Available records indicate that few, if any, campaign committees for machinist-backed candidates listed indirect aid from dues money as contributions. Prior to a 1972 toughening of disclosure requirements, candidates evidently found it easy to spot loopholes that were used to avoid reporting such indirect assistance.

The dissident machinists who forced disclosure of their union's files had brought their suit with the backing of the National Right to Work Legal Defense Foundation. The dissidents wanted the court to bar the union from using dues money for any political activity—including such clearly legal endeavors as politicking directed at its own members and traditional union lobbying efforts. The real goal of the right-to-work foundation is to eliminate the forced payment of dues. A federal judge dismissed the suit Dec. 19, largely because the union offered to start rebating the dues of any member who disagrees with the union's stand on political or legislative issues. The dissident group appealed the decision Jan. 10.

One questionable arrangement of the machinists helped reelect Sen. McGee in 1970. Alexander Barkan, director of the AFL–CIO Committee on Political Education, asked the machinists early that year to put the names of 65,000 "Democrats in Wyoming" on the machinists' computer for the Senator's use in "mailings, registration, etc." The minutes of the Machinists Non-Partisan Political League executive committee show that Mr. Ellinger recommended handling the chore but warned that it would have to be financed with "general-fund money" (the league's separate kitty composed of voluntary donations and would be considered "a contribution toward the Gale McGee campaign.")

Despite the warning, internal records show that bills totaling $9,302.74 for the operation were paid out of the league's political-education fund, built from dues money. Computing & Software Inc. was paid $4,696.84. Minnesota Mining & Manufacturing Co. received $414, and $4,191.90 went to reimburse the IAM treasury for cards it provided.

Doubts about such arrangements may be raised in the coming report by the Senate Watergate committee. Though Republican hopes for public hearings on union campaign contributions will probably be disappointed, the committee staff has asked unions broad and potentially explosive questions about the services provided to candidates.

Watergate revelations, some union politicians believe, have demonstrated that labor can never collect enough rank-and-file donations to rival campaign contributions by business bigwigs. "There is no way we can match them," says Mr. Holayter of the machinists. "It's silly to try." Hence the importance of the indirect contributions.

This is one reason why the AFL–CIO is pressing for public financing of federal campaigns; its strategists obviously figure that a ban on direct contributions would leave labor in a better position relative to business than it is in now.

If past performance is any guide, the machinists' union would still be a valuable supporter for its political favorites if public financing were adopted. Its indirect assistance in staffers' time alone has totaled in the tens of thousands of dollars, the court documents show.

Printing is another campaign expense that the IAM often helps its friends meet. With the 1970 elections coming up, an aide to Rep. Lloyd Meeds passed to the machinists a bill for the printing of the Washington Democrat's quarterly newsletter. "The newsletter went to every home in the Second District," the aide rejoined in one of the released documents. "We had a tremendous, positive response to it." Although the newsletter had been distributed far beyond the IAM's ranks in an election year, a soft-money check for $695.17 to the printer was quickly dispatched to a local union official.

Early in the 1972 reelection drive of Sen. Thomas McIntyre, the Machinists Non-Partisan Political League agreed to spend $1,000 "for assistance in newsletters" put out by the New Hampshire Democrat. And earlier, during Rep. John Tunney's successful 1970 bid for a California Senate seat, the league picked up a $1,740 tab for printing of a brochure that compared the Democrat's voting record with that of the GOP incumbent, George Murphy. Some of the brochures were passed out at a county fair.

The amount of union staff time devoted to candidates' campaigns is difficult to pin down. Irving Ross, a certified public accountant retained by the suing dissident machinists to analize the IAM documents, filed an affidavit giving "incomplete" tabulations. Mr. Ross says the time that IAM "grand lodge representatives" and "special representatives" spent on campaigns in 1972 was worth $39,175. The amounts were $56,241 in 1970 and $42,921 in 1968, he says. The IAM says the figures are too high, but it didn't challenge them in court.

A stauts report prepared by the machinists political unit in late August 1970 shows that at least one field representative was working full time on each of over 20 congressional campaigns. IAM agents often become almost part of the candidate's campaign staff. When Robert Brown was assigned full time to Indiana Sen. Vance Hartke's reelection campaign in May 1970, he set up an office right in the Democrat's headquarters and had the title of chairman of the Indiana Labor Committee for Hartke. Another IAM representative, William Wolfe, was assigned to Yarborough campaigns in Texas in 1970 and 1972—and was being paid out of the union treasury in May 1972 even though a new law effective in April 1972 specifically barred a union from using dues money to pay for services rendered to a candidate, thus spelling out more clearly an old prohibition.

The union also takes machinists out of the shop for campaign duty, giving them "lost time" compensation out of dues money to make up for the lost of regular pay. Thus, the files show, two Baltimore machinists got $282.40 a week while working for the Humphrey presidential campaign for five weeks in 1968. A Maryland IAM official said later that the two "did a first-rate job, especially in smoking out the local Democratic politicians who were inclined to cut the top of the ticket" and persuading them not to do so.

Rep. Richard Hanna of California got $500 from the machinists to help finance a $6,000 "nonpartisan" registration effort to help get him reelected in 1970. In a letter requesting the union's aid, the Democrat predicted that the drive would "raise the district to at least 53.5% Democratic . . . because most of the unregistered voters are Democrats." He said the registrars would be preceded by "bird dogs," meaning that Democratic workers would roam out ahead of the registrar to identify residence of unregistered Hanna supporters.

The machinists' union's airline credit cards come in handy when incumbents are eager to get home in election years. Early in 1969, the executive committee of the machinist political unit authorized the expenditure of $3,600 to buy plane tickets home for unnamed "western Senators" during the following year's campaign. The league's "education fund" provided Sen. Yarborough and his aides with $705.60 worth of tickets during his 1970 reelection campaign. The files show that $500 went to Sen. Albert Gore, Democrat of Tennessee, during his losing reelection effort in 1970.

Machinist officials contend the organization pays for such travel because the candidate speaks to a union group or "consults with union leadership" in his district. But correspondence in the files indicates that this is more of a rationalization than a reason. Take a 1969 Ellinger memo to Sen. Yarborough outlining procedures "for all transportation matters." It states:

"We would like our files to contain a letter . . . indicating that you intend to be in Texas on a particular date to consult with the leadership of our union. If a trip includes a member of your staff, the letter should also name the staff member as being included in the consultation."

"Appreciation dinners" for Senators and Representatives often serve as a conduit for "soft money." Consider the ten $100 tickets the IAM bought to a 1969 testimony gathering for Sen. Frank Moss, Democrat of Utah, who faced an election in 1970. "Since Moss is not yet an announced candidate, we can use educational money for this event and later consider this as part of our overall contribution," the minutes of the league's executive committee explain.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Texas (Mr. STEELMAN).

Mr. STEELMAN. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

The American public wants campaign reform, and I think the majority of the Members of this body want campaign reform, and I intend to vote for portions of this legislation.

I should say, however, that campaign reform, whether it involves financing or whether it involves special interest groups or whatever, is not genuine reform until we start to face the basic question of personal financial disclosure.

It seems to me that the greatest doubt, the greatest amount of suspicion in the minds of the American people, has to do with the decisions that we in this House make, decisions made in the executive branch and in the judicial branch that affect the public interest, those decisions that are made daily by all of us, whether elected or appointed.

Those decisions are decisions that affect defense contracts and affect mineral leases and all these things, as well as other potential conflicts of interest which we in this body and these other two branches of Government might have.

Mr. Chairman, many of us have voluntarily disclosed not only our statement of assets and liabilities but also our private income tax returns.

However, it is not enough to have voluntary disclosure. The standards which we have to abide by now provided in the form A and form B are minimal. They do not get to our sources of income; they do not get to our assets and liabilities except as it applies to debts and transactions above a certain amount.

It just seems to me that the field of personal financial disclosure is the major uncharted area as far as campaign reform is concerned.

Mr. FREY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEELMAN. I yield to my colleague, the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. FREY. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I want to commend the gentleman for his own personal work in this area. I have also been involved in this matter for several years.

I think to a certain extent this does constitute an invasion of privacy of each and every Member. Yet under the circumstances we face today I think we must take that extra step and make that extra amount of effort to win back the confidence of the people in this country in ourselves and in all those who are in politics.

As distasteful as it is personally to me—and it frankly is—I think it is the price we have to pay. It is the price we have to pay, because of the loss in confidence that we have experienced.

Mr. Chairman, it is a shame that we are not able, under these procedures, to bring this matter up and to get this meaningful reform enacted.

Mr. STEELMAN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman makes a good point.

Under the rule that has been adopted, we will not be able to offer this amendment. I wish to say that I intend to remain active in this field, and I know that the cosponsors of this amendment also intend to remain active in this area of personal financial disclosure, not because of the wrongdoing it may uncover or the wrongdoing it may prevent, but because of the contribution it will make toward restoring public trust. It seems to me that is the lacking commodity right now.

The personal example set by Vice President FORD, I think, with respect to the scrutiny of his public and private affairs during the investigation he underwent, was a major contributing factor to the public support that he has now.

Mr. Chairman, I just want to say that I hope at some point, if not in this session, certainly in the next session we will get a bill, the like of one which I introduced, along with cosponsors, that would require personal financial disclosure, not only on the part of us who serve in the legislative branch but also on the part of those who serve in the executive and judicial branches. I think it is only by this sort of approach that we will make a genuine contribution to restoring public trust and thereby complement the other steps I hope we will take today in reforming campaign finance practices.

Mr. PRITCHARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEELMAN. I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. PRITCHARD. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, earlier in the day, the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. HAYS), stated that he would not object to amendments that were serious. I wonder if the gentleman would indicate now whether he would object to an amendment such as this.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEELMAN. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, I said that I would not object to any amendment that was germane under the rule. The amendment which the gentleman is talking about is not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas (Mr. STEELMAN) has expired.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 30 seconds.

Mr. Chairman, to respond further to the gentleman from Texas and the gentleman from Florida, I would tell the Members on the other side, if they have not already heard it, that Senator GOLDWATER was on television a few minutes ago saying that there would be a resignation today. That will do more to restore confidence than all the breast-beating that the gentleman from Texas can do from here on out.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman. I yield 1 additional minute to the gentleman from Texas (Mr. STEELMAN).

Mr. STEELMAN. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding additional time to me.

I will say for the benefit of the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. HAYS), that this amendment that I sought to offer and which the rule precludes would have applied to the President and to the Vice President the same standards with respect to personal disclosure that I would have applied to those of us who serve here in the legislative branch.

It seems to me the standing of the Congress in the opinion polls, at least the ones I have seen this year, have been lower than those of the President. So I think we have an example to show in that respect, also.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEELMAN. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman that after the performance of the Committee on the Judiciary may I say after the performance of the members of the committee on both sides, I think the next poll will show that the standing of Congress will have gone up a great deal.

Mr. PRITCHARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEELMAN. I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. PRITCHARD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to say that we were led to believe that we were going to have this bill opened up for serious amendments. Now we find the gentleman from Ohio says this does not apply. That is just the reason why I think it is a gag rule. I think we are doing an injustice to the Nation with respect to the cause of election reform when we bring this type of a rule to the floor, limited rule, or whatever you want to call it, instead of an open rule.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FRENZEL. I yield 1 additional minute to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. STEELMAN. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, I resent the inference cast by the gentleman from Washington. I did not mislead anybody, and I did not try to mislead anybody. I said, in response to a question that the gentleman asked about publishing his amendment 24 hours before in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and the gentleman said he did not know until today that that was a requirement, I said I would not object, and hoped that no one else would object to an amendment which would be germane under the rule being offered to the House just because it was not published in the RECORD. And that is all I said.

If the gentleman from Washington was misled, then the gentleman was misled because the gentleman either was not listening or was not here, or did not understand what I said.

Mr. PRITCHARD. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, I desire to state once again that this is a gag rule that we are working under. I believe that this is serious election reform that the gentleman in the well is bringing forth. This is why I believe that we should open up the financial affairs of we Members of the Congress. We are not ordinary citizens—and I repeat, we are not ordinary citizens—we are public servants. If we are going to have election reform that is meaningful, we are going to have to have this included before the public will have some real confidence in the Members of the Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. MATHIS).

(Mr. MATHIS of Georgia asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MATHIS of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I, too, would like to join in with my colleagues on both sides of this body today in offering my congratulations to the chairman of the committee for the time the gentleman has spent in bringing before the House this legislation, which I believe goes a long way toward restoring the confidence and the faith of the American people in our democratic institutions, and hopefully in our public servants, we politicians, if you will.

There is one thing that I would like to point out in this bill that has not been pointed out before, and that is we have removed the limitation on the media expenditures. The House in its wisdom adopted in 1971 legislation fixing a ceiling of $50,000 that could be expended on media. We have repealed that section, and we leave it to the candidate's own judgment as to where he wants to spend the money, where he can get the best results for his dollar in his campaign.

The one big fault that I find in the bill is that it simply allows too much money to be spent on elections.

We come in here, and we talk about campaign reform. We talk about restoring the faith of the people in the processes of our Government, and yet we are allowing $270,000 plus to be spent by a candidate for Congress in any given year. I want to suggest once again to all of you who feel as I do that this figure is too high; that I will offer at the proper time an amendment that will reduce the amount of money that can be spent in any one election to $42,500.

It makes no sense at all to me to allow a candidate for Congress to spend $270,000 for a job that pays $42,500.

I do not think there is any way we are going to restore the confidence of the American people in this Congress as an institution unless and until we adopt some kind of a realistic spending figure.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. MIZELL).

(Mr. MIZELL asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

[Mr. MIZELL addressed the Committee. His remarks will appear hereafter in the Extensions of Remarks.]

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from New York (Mr. KOCH).

(Mr. KOCH asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. KOCH. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from Ohio for yielding me this time.

This bill has three provisions in it which everyone concerned about campaign reform wanted, and they have been accomplished, limitation of expenditures, complete disclosure, and public financing. The committee bill, with the committee amendments is a good one.

I know that there are those who will seek to lessen the amount that can be spent by a candidate for Congress. The bill now provides $75,000 in addition to the actual cost of raising the money. There will be some who are going to say they are going to outreform the reformers by reducing that amount. That would not serve the American public because to give a nonincumbent a reasonable chance of winning requires a reasonable sum for campaigning.

While I thought there should have been a higher limit, for example, $90,000, the amount in the bill is a reasonable amount, and I would hope that it will not be changed.

I also want at this moment to pay my respects to the distinguished chairman of the committee, Mr. HAYES. The chairman of our committee has been the subject of a great deal of what I consider to be unfair attacks and abuse on the ground that he was stopping the reform bill from coming to the floor. It is just the other way. The fact it, it was primarily through his efforts that the bill reached the point where we were able to bring it to the floor. I know that the chairman gives at least as good as he gets in debate, so I do not think he was as upset about the attacks as those of us were who serve on the committee and were aware of what was taking place.

Mr. BADILLO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KOCH. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BADILLO. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I want to compliment the gentleman from New York for his work on the committee.

(Mr. BADILLO asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BADILLO. Mr. Chairman, I am pleased that we have the opportunity today to improve and expand upon the reform of our political process which we began with passage of the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971. We have had ample time over the past 3 years to observe the loopholes and inadequacies of that particular measure, and the bill before us today, H.R. 16090, will remedy some of the deficiencies of our earlier effort.

The Federal Election Campaign Act Amendments of 1974 will for the first time set absolute ceilings on expenditures for campaigns for all Federal offices. It sets much-needed limits on individual contributions to any single candidate and aggregate contributions for all Federal offices in any year. It places limits on cash contributions and restricts a candidate's personal financing of his own campaign. Most importantly, H.R. 16090 authorizes the use of public funds for Presidential elections and establishes qualifications for raising donations in small amounts to receive Federal matching funds for primary elections.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that H.R. 16090 provides us a vehicle to enact a meaningful campaign reform bill in this Congress. The provisions of this bill are important and they set new standards for campaign practices. However, the measure needs considerable amplification if we are not to be accused of being half-hearted in our commitment to campaign reform. The events of the 1972 election, in all their sordid detail, cry out for a response from us, and I am convinced that the American people will accept nothing less in 1974 than comprehensive legislation to eliminate once and for all the pervasive influence of private wealth in the election of candidates for Federal office.

True campaign reform entails much more than setting limits on contributions and expenditures. I support the establishment of such ceilings as a necessary beginning, and though nobody has an excess of wisdom in determining what the magic figures should be, the committee levels provide a yardstick that I am willing to see enacted into law in order to get the principle of such limitations into the statute books. Should experience indicate the advisability of revising the amounts upward or downward at a later date, we will find it relatively simple to amend an existing law.

We all agree that spending for national elections has simply gotten out of hand, Mr. Chairman, and our initiatives should be stimulated by the sorry record of intimidation, coercion, and blatant tradeoffs between candidate and contributors in the 1972 Presidential campaign. By putting ceilings on election expenditures, we can at least limit the opportunities for corruption and conflict of interest when large sums of money are sought from every possible source.

The ceilings in H.R. 16090 of $10 million for Presidential primaries and $20 million for general elections for the highest office in the land are realistic and should be adequate to conduct an effective campaign around the country. Our approval of this principle should be overwhelming since we have witnessed the temptations that are succumbed to by those in possession of funds far in excess of what is needed for election campaigns per se.

The American people have endorsed the principle of public funding of elections by their response to the dollar checkoff on Federal income tax returns. I am gratified that this totally voluntary system will establish a Presidential election campaign fund in the neighborhood of $70 to $80 million for the 1976 election. The healthy public participation is convincing proof to me that the public wants an end to the corrupting influence of private campaign contributions and is willing to provide the funding that will accomplish that reform. Public financing of Presidential elections will not forever end the possibility of corruption or secret deals in the Oval Office, but it will make it far easier for men of integrity seeking that high office to avoid indebtedness to the special interests which can be counted on to show up sooner or later to demand their quid pro quo, usually out of the pockets of the public.

What I find inexplicable, Mr. Chairman, is the omission from H.R. 16090 of public financing for House and Senate election campaigns. I cannot understand how the committee could endorse the removal of private money from Presidential races and not concede that the public interest lies in the same treatment of congressional elections. Consequently, I am joining the movement to amend this bill to provide Federal matching funds for congressional general elections. This particular amendment will authorize public matching funds for up to one-third of the spending limit for the office. A requirement that 10 percent of the candidate's spending limit must be raised in contributions of $50 or less will provide an incentive for the participation of more small donors than has been the case, reducng the traditional reliance on a handful of wealthy donors.

I regret that we are not today voting on full public financing of all Federal elections, but that is a goal which I believe we will reach in succeeding years and one which I am certain the American people will subscribe to if we take the necessary first step of approving the Anderson-Udall amendment to H.R. 16090. It is much cheaper for the public to underwrite election campaigns than it is to pay for Government policies such as the milk price support increase and the late unlamented oil import quota system, two of the most glaring examples of the price extracted from the average person for political deals struck between candidates and well-heeled industry lobbies. When Government decisions are made on the basis of what is right and just for the country as a whole, we will have a climate of greater respect for the political process and greater confidence in officials selected by the people to participate in making those decisions for them.

I will also support the Fascell-Frenzel amendment to create an independent Federal Elections Commission to oversee and insure compliance with the laws governing Federal elections. A commission composed of six full-time public members nominated by Congress and appointed by the President will inspire more public confidence than the committee bill's board of four public members and three—the Comptroller General, Secretary of the Senate, and Clerk of the House—who are intimately involved in the legislative process and whose tenure is decided by incumbent officials they would have to regulate. The confidence of the people in the political process is what this is all about, Mr. Chairman, and to merit that confidence we must make it clear that we in no way are hedging our responsibility to observe the law and submit our conduct to the scrutiny of objective public officers. I regard an independent Federal Elections Commission as absolutely essential to any serious reform of our election campaign laws.

Mr. Chairman, I urge my colleagues to accept these strengthening amendments to the bill and send H.R. 16090 to conference with the Senate to insure enactment of a meaningful Federal election campaign reform law this year. We have had such legislation before us for 3 years, and there can be no excuse for further delay. Grievous abuses of Federal elections are amply documented and have been paraded before us for all too many months now. The American people have a right to expect us to stand up and be counted on this issue, and I do not believe they will settle for partial or limited reform. This is our opportunity to demonstrate whether we believe that we have a living political process worthy of improvement and perpetuation. Passage of a strong campaign reform bill is our mandate from the people, and I hope that we will meet that high expectation in this Chamber today.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from California (Mr. PHILLIP BURTON).

(Mr. PHILLIP BURTON asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. PHILLIP BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to associate myself with the remarks of the gentleman from New York and add my own personal commendation to the distinguished chairman of the Committee on House Administration. The gentleman from Ohio (Mr. HAYS) is really in many, many respects a very misunderstood Member. His basically kind and generous nature is not understood universally. Very importantly, his commitment to make the House a responsive instrument to resolve the public policy issues confronting this country is known by all who watch him and work with him.

I think that the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. THOMPSON) should be commended; the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. BRADEMAS); the chairman of the subcommittee, the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. DENT); the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. ANNUNZIO); the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. GAYDOS); the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. JONES); the gentleman from New York (Mr. KOCH); the gentleman from West Virginia (Mr. MOLLOHAN); the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. GETTYS), and the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. MATHIS); and the whole committee on our side, because they have brought to the floor a most worthy product. More importantly, they have permitted all of those amendments that had meaningful support to be the subject of the House working its will.

I would also like to note, the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. FRENZEL) who has played a very constructive role in the developing of this legislation. While we are at it—the gentleman from Florida (Mr. FASCELL), the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. UDALL), the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. ANDERSON), the gentleman from Washington (Mr. FOLEY), and the gentleman from New York (Mr. CONABLE), have all contributed to the important public dialog on th e nature of the legislation the House should write.

I freely predict when the sound and fury is behind us, just as did our Committee on the Judiciary reflect great credit on this institution by its conduct in recent weeks, similarly the Committee on House Administration and the House itself will send to the Senate a meaningful, responsible, and effective campaign reform bill that will come to grips with most of the urgently pressing campaign financing problems.

So, Mr. Chairman, again I want to commend the committee and say I am sure within the next 2 days we are going to write legislation every single man and women in this House can be most proud of.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, this is an historic day in the life of our political institutions. The bill presently before us offers historic opportunity to help get politics out of the gutter and back onto a platform of public respect envisioned by those who drafted the Constitution.

This clearly is one of the most important bills which will come before us this year. In my opinion, as I shall point out in these remarks, it does not go quite far enough nor perform the total cleanup that I would like to see performed.

But what it does is in every respect salutary. It is, on balance, an exceptionally good bill and a much stronger bill than cynics had thought this Congress would pass.

We owe it to all those who want to believe in the basic goodness and decency of the American system to pass this bill by an overwhelming and resounding majority.

One of the saddest byproducts of the Watergate scandals has been the general impression that politics and our historic system of electing public officials is by its very nature corrupt—that it always has been, always will be, and that there is no use trying to make it otherwise.

This is tragic for two reasons. First, it is not true. Second, by destroying faith in the political processes, this cynical idea destroys faith in the system itself. It is up to us to restore that faith, and to make the American system of public elections worthy of public confidence.

Ridiculed in public print, satirized by cartoonist and comedian, butt of the street corner humorist and self-righteous moralist alike, politics is as necessary to the functioning of our society as water is to the flow of a river. It does not have to be filthy and corrupted—and neither does the river—for man has the wisdom, if he has the will, to keep them both clean.

Politics—the process of elections—is the lifeblood of democracy, the fuel that propels the engines of a free society. To profess love for the democratic form of government but disdain for politics is to pretend to honor the product while despising the process that creates it.

There have been abuses of the system. There is no denying it. We should not close our eyes to those abuses. We should correct them. We must devise laws that prevent their recurrence.

No facet of American life has cried out more loudly for reform than that of political campaign financing. It has cast a lengthening shadow over all else we do in our public institutions.

More than 6 years ago—in April 1967—I wrote an article for Harper's magazine calling for reform of the campaign financing laws. For years their cynical neglect made a mockery of our elective system. Under leave to extend my remarks, I am inserting a copy of that article for printing in the RECORD at the end of my statement.

Three years ago, Congress finally acted. It passed in 1971 the most sweeping campaign reform law since the Corrupt Practices Act of 1925. Although the public seems largely unaware of that law, it was a long step in the right direction. The bill we are considering today would build and improve upon it.

The 1971 law strictly limits total campaign expenditures in communications media. It makes candidates themselves responsible for reporting all moneys spent in their behalf during a campaign, puts an end to the devious practice of hiding behind phony "committees" whose expenditures the candidate pretended to know nothing about.

Under the 1971 law, full public disclosure must be made of every contribution in excess of $100 including the name and address of the contributor. Now, in light of the mammoth contributions revealed by the Watergate hearings—single contributions in the range of $50,000 and upward, some from corporations and thus clearly illegal under even the old 1925 law, which slipped in just days before the new law took effect and went officially unreported—we now are considering an absolute limit of $1,000 that any one individual may lawfully give to any Federal political campaign. I support this provision.

Enactment of this proposed limit will go a long way to reduce the shameful reliance upon a few enormous contributors who more and more have held the keys to the gates of public service, particularly in the larger States—California, New York, Texas, Illinois, Pennsylvania, Ohio—where it now can take $2 million or more to conduct a winning statewide campaign.

The bill presently before us would limit total expenditures in most congressional campaigns to no more than $75,000. Surely that is enough, unless we merely wanted to turn Congress into an exclusive playground of the wealthy and put its seats up for auction to the highest bidder, like seats on the New York Stock Exchange. I think we well could do with a lower ceiling.

Another extremely useful reform which went into effect in 1972 seeks to broaden the base of political fund-raising and give more plain citizens a piece of the action. It permits a tax deduction for any individual American contributing up to $50 to the candidate or party of his choice—or up to $100 on a joint husband and wife income tax return.

Unfortunately, this law has been little publicized. When it becomes generally known, it should provide encouragement for many small and moderate contributors to take up the slack heretofore filled by contributions in the multithousand-dollar range.

Personally, I would support an even stronger inducement, such as a tax credit rather than just a deduction, for any individual contribution up to $25.

Along the same line, Congress has tried to freshen the springs of Presidential campaign financing by permitting every taxpayer to check a square on his income tax report authorizing exactly $1 of his tax to go to the national Presidential campaign. This particular law was administratively emasculated in 1973 by on the 1040 tax return form, the IRS required any citizen desiring to avail himself of it to take the initiative, ask for and fill out an entirely separate form. Most citizens did not know to do so. Most did not even know of the law.

Under outraged pressure from Members of Congress who supported that reform, IRS was forced this year to carry out the intent of the law. The box now appears on the form 1040 itself, and a lot of good Americans did check the form and authorize the $1 deduction. I predict that, as it becomes better understood in subsequent years, more and more Americans will avail themselves of this means to provide clean and unfettered money for Presidential campaigns.

Some now are suggesting public financing of all political campaigns, including congressional elections. In other words, pay campaign expenses out of taxes. There is one thing wrong with this: it does not give the citizen any choice.

It would be thoroughly wrong, in my opinion, to take tax money from an individual and arbitrarily turn it over to some candidate or party of which that citizen does not approve. If you are a Republican, for example, it seems to me that you would have every right to object if the Government took some of your taxes and used them to finance Democratic political campaigns. And a Democrat would have every right to be unhappy about the reverse.

The answer, in my judgment, does not lie in paying congressional campaign costs out of public tax money. It lies in popularizing political contributions among average citizens, helping them to understand that it is a function of citizenship, and making it easier for them to contribute of their own volition to the candidates and parties of their own individual choice and preference.

Tainted money, however, is not the only evil that has been brought to light in the recent Senate and House investigations. One cannot blame the average citizen for being more than a little sickened by the illegal use of spies, burglary, electronic surveillance, fake documents and phony charges against the opposition.

Not only have there been thefts and illegal wiretaps. Telegrams have been sent falsely bearing the names of other parties. One of the rottenest and most callous abuses cited was the forging of a bogus telegram, purporting to be a State Department document, with the sole and express purpose of maligning the reputation of the late President Kennedy.

Phony press releases have been handed out purporting to come from an opposing candidate, with the deliberate intent of misrepresenting and embarrassing him and misleading the public. Elaborate hoaxes have been perpetrated, such as the one that pretended to document a connection between the late President Kennedy and the assassination of President Diem of South Vietnam. A lot of people have innocently believed these malicious frauds. How can they know, so long as this type of deliberate deceit is permitted, until it is too late?

Each of these offenses has been confessed in open hearings, sometimes without any apparent sense of shame or repentance. The cynical defense is that "everybody does it." And that just may be the most monstrous falsehood of all. Many public officials are decent. Many have never corrupted the political process in any such way. Nobody should, and anyone who does should be punished for the irreparable harm he commits not only to the reputation of another but to the sancity of the political process itself.

Certainly it ought to be a punishable offense deliberately and knowingly to spread malicious untruths about the opposition. If lying and deceit about campaign contributions and expenses should be forbidden, as needed they should be, then intentional lying about the opposition is equally reprehensible. It ought to be equally punished.

Without doubt the one thing that has done more than any other to poison the political process, to disenchant decent Americans with political life and keep good men out of it, is the nauseating prevalence of slander and personal abuse in political campaigns.

For this reason, I feel that the bill presently before us, as good as it is, does not go far enough. I would like to see the legislation broadened to make all the penalties which it applies against misrepresenting campaign gifts and expenditures equally applicable against: First, publication of any spurious statement and attributing it to the opposition; second, reproducing any bogus telegram or communication falsely purporting to bear the signature of any other person; third, signing a false name to any political advertisement or letter to a newspaper editor; fourth, the use of "bugging" devices against political opposition; and fifth, using trick photography to cast an opponent in an unfair and untrue light.

I was prepared to offer such an amendment to this bill, but as I understand the rule, an amendment of that type would not be in order. I urge the committee to keep it in mind for future legislation.

If democracy and our form of elective government are sacred, then the political processes that create them should be equally sacred. Those processes can be kept clean. It is up to all of us to insist that they are.

Enactment of this bill today will be one long stride in that direction.

Although something short of a total answer to all of our Nation's electoral problems, the bill deserves to be considered on the basis of the affirmative reforms it makes.

On this basis, it clearly deserves our support.

WASHINGTON INSIGHT: CLEAN MONEY FOR CONGRESS

(By Jim Wright)

No facet of American life cries out more loudly for reform than the dingy gray area of political campaigns financing, which casts a lengthening shadow across all else we do in our elective public institutions.

As a veteran of seven successful campaigns for the U.S. House of Representatives and one losing race for the Senate, I've experienced at first hand the skyrocketing cost of politics. It is now, in fact, nearly impossible in most states for men of modest means to seek high elective office—unless they are willing wards of the wealthy.

The price of campaigning has risen so high that it actually imperils the integrity of our political institutions. Big contributors more and more hold the keys to the gates of public service. This is choking off the wellsprings of fresh, new thought and severely limiting the field of choice available to the public. I am convinced, moreover, that the intellectual quality of political campaigns is deteriorating as a result.

One curious by-product of big money in politics is the slick, shallow public-relations approach with its nauseating emphasis on "image" at the expense of substance. In the arenas where Lincoln and Douglas once debated great issues, advertising agencies last year hawked candidates like soap flakes.

Nineteen sixty-six was the year of the political singing commercial; easily seven or eight times as much money was spent on 20-second or 50-second spots on TV as on programs permitting any serious discussion of issues. Candidates hired professional pollsters to sample the electorate and offer advice on the most effective color combinations, lettering styles, and photographic poses. The whole business was taking on a patently phony, make-believe veneer.

This situation will not change unless Congress enacts a meaningful body of law to reform the antiquated and unenforceable regulations that are evaded by almost every candidate and ridiculed by the public. In the past decade eighteen different proposals designed to do this have been introduced in Congress. Not one has been acted upon.

Campaign expenditures for federal office generally fall under the purview of an ancient statute known as the Corrupt Practices Act of 1925. This law must have had some meaning in its day. But in 1966 it was about as effective as stuffing popcorn into the mouth of a running fire hose. The law stipulates among other things that a candidate for the House may spend no more than $5,000 in his bid for election, and a candidate for the Senate no more than $25,000. If I told you I had never spent more than $5,000 in a House race. I'd be a hypocrite. And if I actually had spent so little in my first race, I'd never have been elected. The same applies to at least 95 per cent of my colleagues. The huge loophole in the law lies in the fact that a candidate need not report the funds collected and spent in his behalf by a committee. The transparent fiction is that this goes on without his knowledge.

No candidate has ever been prosecuted for noncompliance with the Corrupt Practices Act (it carries penalties of two years' imprisonment and a $10,000 fine for willful violation). In times past, revelations of flagrant overspending or unsavory contributions evoked shock and public censure.

But today our very capacity for indignation seems to have withered. We take huge expnditures for granted. In the New York Senate race of 1964, for example, winner Robert F. Kennedy is reported to have spent $1,236,851, and over a million was spent in behalf of loser Kenneth B. Keating.

Last October Republican headquarters in New York announced that $4,330,000 had been spent up to that point in the campaign to reelect Governor Nelson Rockefeller and his running mates.* Jesse M. Unruh, Speaker of the California Assembly and a key political figure in the state, says Republicans spent between $5 million and $6 million in electing Ronald Reagan last year. Unruh believes the steadily mounting price of politics is putting pressure on both parties to nominate movie stars and other political neophytes with well-known names and faces. It simply takes too much cash to publicize an unknown, however well qualified.

Why does the pursuit of public office cost so much? Let me itemize out of my own experience in Texas, which is by no means unique. Just one firstclass letter to every family in Texas requires—in production and postage—approximately $300,000. A single billboard in one of our big cities rents for $550 a month. Others can be had for only $75 or $100 a month. But multiply this by the thousands it takes to cover a large state. A 30-minute TV broadcast which I did on eighteen of the fifty television stations in Texas cost me a little over $10,000. The same amount of time, on the same stations, if taken in 20-second spots, would have cost $400,000. The "quicky" spot announcement is by far the most expensive thing on television.

Even races for House seats, with their more limited constituencies, can consume staggering sums. For example, an unsuccessful primary race for a Congressional nomination in North Carolina last year cost approximately $250,000 in mass-media advertising alone.

My Democratic colleague, Dick Ottinger of New York, frankly reported an outlay of $193,000 in his successful bid for office in 1964. He is to be commended for his candor.

But what kind of example do we give to the public for obedience to law? There may be some excuse when the general populace ignores an obviously unworkable and commonly disobeyed ordinance. But what excuse can there be for us who have it directly in our hands to change the law? It is our very profession to make the law, and to make it mean something—if, in fact, we want it to mean something! By refusing either to abide by it or to change it, we present a sad spectacle indeed.

CONVENIENTLY BLIND AND DEAF

An impossible dilemma confronts a candidate who wants both to obey the law and tell the truth. Last summer John J. Hooker, Jr., a Nashville attorney who unsuccessfully sought the Tennessee gubernatorial nomination, promised during his campaign to make a complete public report on his expenditures. He fulfilled the pledge on September 4, showing total spending of $591,296.27.

Political pros in Tennessee were shocked. Certainly it wasn't the first time there had been expenditures in this range; but it was the first time such a public disclosure had been made in the history of the state. Hooker could hardly have affronted tradition more flagrantly had he denounced old folks or come out in favor of General William Tecumseh Sherman.

The legal limit for a statewide primary race in Tennessee is $25,000. Hooker may have rendered himself subject to prosecution, though it is doubtful that one would be pressed. His successful opponent, Buford Ellington, played it safe and traditional. He filed a solemn declaration just a whisker under the legal limit—$24,809.12. A similar figure was rendered, straight-faced, by the manager of former Governor Frank Clement's winning race for the Senate nomination—$24,089.22.

Ellington, questioned by newsmen conceded that, of course, it costs a lot more than $25,000 to run such a race. But he maintained that a candidate was complying with the law if he did not "personally know" of the various expenditures in his behalf. (His own report made no reference to funds devoted to advertising, the inference being that the candidate had traveled throughout his state blind to billboards, car stickers, and newspaper ads, and deaf to his own radio and TV commercials.)

Ellington should not, however, be singled out for censure. Pretending not to know of expenditures in one's behalf is an accepted practice. When lawmakers generally flout the law, democracy is in peril. But still greater evils result when lawmakers are subjected to mounting financial pressures.

Just last year a Senate committee examined the ethics of Senator Tom Dodd of Connecticut, who paid off his campaign debts with the proceeds of testimonial dinners at each of which the principal speaker was a Vice President (Lyndon Johnson for the first two, Hubert Humphrey for the third). More than two thousand of Senator Dodd's constituents bought tickets to one or more of these gala affairs, which jointly netted over $100,000.

For a public official, debt is delibitating. It can plague his conscience and divide his energies. It can sorely test his integrity, or sap his courage at the very time he needs it most. Ultimately, if he remains single-minded in his devotion to the public weal and keeps his back resolutely turned upon temptation, debt can drive him, despairing, out of public life. Sometimes its shadow hovers over him for years afterwards.

I know this at first hand. In 1961, I made an unsuccessful race in a special election for the U.S. Senate. After it was over, we figured that we had spent some $270,000. Obviously, it hadn't been enough. But I ended up owing $68,000, mostly for debts which I had not personally authorized. It took me two and a half years to retire the notes.

Consider the case of Democrat Leonard Wolf of Iowa, who served one term in the House. He came to Congress in January 1959 owing $89,000 in campaign debts and business losses incurred while campaigning. He was defeated in 1960 when Nixon carried Iowa for the Republicans. Today, six years after leaving office, Wolf has finally paid off most of the $89,000. When friends urged him to run again in 1966, he understandably said, "No, thanks."

But even this financial disaster seems minor compared with the experience of James E. Turman who conducted an unavailing campaign for Lieutenant Governor of Texas in 1962. He came close, made the runoff, but lost in the second primary. For almost five years, he has been making regular monthly payments from his personal income to retire his campaign debt. And he calculates that, on this schedule, he will not be in the clear until 1981. It will take nineteen years to pay for one near-miss at the polls!

Perhaps you're thinking, "That's too bad, but it's his tough luck. A fellow who can't afford it shouldn't take on a campaign of that kind." And perhaps you'd be right. But where does that leave any able young American who genuinely wants to contribute his time and talent to the political life of his country? Unless he has inherited spectacular wealth, it leaves him at the mercy of large contributors, who will expect him in one way or another to serve their interests.

TEN MILLION HANDS TO SHAKE

So far as my own case goes, I've been luckier than most politicians. When I made my first run for Congress I had enough money of my own to pick up the tab personally for half (about $8,000) of the campaign cost. Since the beginning, I've made it an unvarying rule never to accept more than a $100 contribution from any individual. The average over the years has been around $10. This preserves my independence from personal obligation. I wouldn't want it otherwise. A Congressman can get by this way if he's fortunate—as I am—in having a very understanding constituency.

*Richard Nixon, perhaps not a wholly unbiased observer, is reported to believe that Rockefeller actually spent close to $14 million in his reelection race.

But this formula is impossible for a statewide contest, as I discovered in my 1961 try for the Senate. In that race, two balloons of fantasy exploded in my face. The first was the notion that if I announced my candidacy early, I would frighten off prospective aspirants. Instead, seventy-one would-be candidates threw their hats in the ring, creating the biggest field of entries in the history of Texas politics. If this raised some doubts as to my ability to intimidate opposition, I argue that it should have established me as a leader of men, since never before had so many followed the example of one.

My second and more serious fallacy was the assumption that a determined man in good health could make up by prodigious personal effort what he lacked in finances. I would simply campaign harder than anyone else in the race.

In the ensuing four months, I traveled 27,000 miles, made 678 speeches, slept an average of four-and-a-half hours a night and worked off eighteen pounds. During one week, I averaged eleven speeches a day in as many different localities. But it was like trying to siphon off the Gulf of Mexico with an eyedropper. For there were then ten million people in Texas; if I worked sixteen hours a day and wasted no time, it would have taken me some twenty-eight years to talk for one minute with every citizen in the state. I had four months.

The upshot was that I came close, but not close enough. Out of the seventy-two entries, I barely missed second spot which would have put me in the runoff, with John Tower, the sole Republican. Tower subsequently won over airline executive Bill Blakley who had nosed me out of the number two position. Each of these two men had spent on billboard, newspaper, and radio advertising at least three times the amount I'd been able to put together.

I planned to make the race again in 1966 when Senator Tower would be up for reelection. But, as the time drew near, the problem of money again loomed large. I could not bring myself to initiate alliances with those who could provide the wherewithal in big chunks. This is, alas, the accepted way in Texas, and probably in most states. Nor, with a son in college and two daughters almost ready to enter, could I mortgage their futures on another underfinanced race which might leave me owing $100,000 or more and out of a job.

In a last-ditch effort to find a broad base of campaign financing I bought $10,000 worth of television time for one statewide broadcast. I told the audience exactly what it costs to run a statewide campaign in Texas, and said that I would become a candidate for the Senate if 25,000 individual Texans who agreed with my views would participate to the extent of contributing $10 each.

The response was good. I received nearly seven thousand letters—a bona fide expression of grass-roots support. But contributions and precise pledges totaled only $48,828.50—far less than the $250,000 I had considered a minimum base.

I am convinced that I could have won with sufficient public exposure. But to obtain it I would have had either to make a beggar of myself in repeated telecasts, or to meet privately with affluent individuals and organized groups to discuss what I could do for them primarily rather than for the United States. I'm not temperamentally suited for the former rule nor conscientiously fitted for the latter.

So there was nothing to do but return the generous contributions and forget about running for the Senate.

MARTINIS AND LOBBYISTS

My experience is no great tragedy for America. But when the same thing happens all over the country, then the consequences are ominous.

Senator Dodd's testimonial dinners were at least supported by his own constituents. This is not true of the now-familiar Washington cocktail party which is financed by lobbyists.

The Congressional friends of the honoree are generally importuned to attend these gatherings (on free ducats), while blocks of tickets—ranging in price from $50 to $1,000—are bought by various lobbyists. Everybody stands around nibbling hors d'oeuvres and sipping martinis until a whistle blows and a few words are said in behalf of the honored guest. His campaign fund receives the proceeds. One trade-association executive was invited—in an eighteen-month period—to seventy such receptions.

Another money-raising gimmick, employed by the national party headquarters, is the fancy brochure with ads selling for $10,000 to $15,000 a page. The Democrats' latest book is called "Toward an Age of Greatness"; the Republicans' is titled "Congress—The Heartbeat of Government." Eleven of the nation's top twenty-five defense contractors have bought ads in brochures of this kind and they've deducted the price from their taxes as a "business expense."

Many advertisers have been corporations, legally prohibited from contributing to campaigns. But the proceeds go to the national campaign committees which divide them among various Congressional candidates. Other advertisers include companies whose activities are directly regulated by the government, including six airlines (American, Braniff, Continental, Eastern, Pan American, and TWA); three railroads—the Milwaukee Road, Southern Railway System, and Union Pacific; the Tennessee Gas Transmission Company; and various steamship lines. Does anyone believe that these companies—and others throughout the country who more quietly slip multi-thousand-dollar contributions into the individual campaign coffers of their favored candidates—expect no selfish return?

A more subtle lure, for Presidential campaign money, is the chance to visit socially with the President at party functions by joining the President's Club at annual dues of $1,000. Recently, plans were said to be under way to create an "elite" President's Club, with dues of $10,000, the additional bonus being an invitation to the White House. I find it embarrassing that any President should have to engage in such maneuvers. And I deplore the legal vacuum that makes them necessary.

BROADENING THE BASE

President Johnson in his draft bill last year asked Congress to require that every gift and every expenditure of $100 and more, whether taken or spent by the candidate himself or by one of his "committees," be publicly reported. He also proposed that $5,000 be established as the absolute maximum which any one individual or interest may lawfully contribute to any one campaign. (In my view, $5,000 is still too much; I think the figure should be reduced to around $1,000.) The President's main recommendation was that political contributions of up to $100 be deductible in computing one's income taxes, as are philanthropic gifts. I would like to go even further: I think we should offer a tax credit—deductible from the tax itself rather than from reportable income—of contributions up to $25.

This is the indispensable key to any really workable reform. Average Americans, with no axe to grind except good government, must be induced to take up the slack if we are to free American politics from its disgraceful dependence upon the little handful of blue-chip contributors.

To be effective, individual tax deductions and ceilings on individual contributions should be coupled with a practical and legally enforceable upper limit on allowable expenditures. Surely there should be some limit—high enough to permit each side an adequate campaign of public enlightenment but low enough to take politics out of the commercial marketplace, where today it almost can be said that public office is up for sale to the highest bidder.

I introduced in the 89th Congress and again this year a bill which would limit expenditures for House candidates to not more than $30,000 for a party primary and an additional $30,000 for a general election. (The two figures add up to precisely the amount of a Congressman's salary for a two-year term.) For Senatorial races my bill proposes a ceiling related to the population of the state. It would be calculated by multiplying $30,000 by the number of Congressmen from that state. In Texas, for example, with twenty-three members of the House, a Senate candidate could spend up to $690,000 for a primary and the same amount for a general election. In New Hampshire or New Mexico, with two House seats each, the ceiling would be $60,000. For Maryland, it would be $240,000; in New York and California, a little more than a million dollars. With all parties and all contestants honoring the same law, this would be enough.

I do not pretend to know how much should be allowed for Presidential campaigns. The present unrealistic law purports to limit a party committee to raising and spending no more than $3 million a year. However in 1964, the two major parties reported expenditures of $29 million. Nobody knows how much more went unreported.

In the closing weeks of the 89th Congress, concern over the enormous cost of Presidential campaigns resulted in a legislative surprise—a special amendment to the "Christmas Tree" tax bill.

The new law provides that any taxpayer, by simply placing a check mark in a box which will appear on future income-tax forms, may authorize $1.00 of his taxes to be placed in a Presidential Campaign Fund. He will not be able, however, to direct which party gets his dollar. Proceeds will be divided equally between the major parties. A minor party (one receiving more than five million but less than fifteen million votes in the immediately preceding Presidential election) may have a pro rata share based upon the number of votes it got. The law stipulates that the total in dollars placed in this fund may not exceed the total votes cast in the previous Presidential election for all major and minor parties. Using 1964 votes as a base, this would make the maximum more than $70 million.

This plan is at least worth a try. Its weakness, of course, is that it gives the citizen no choice as to which party shall receive his largess, and, since it applies only to Presidential campaigns, it still leaves the candidates for Congress right where they were—at the mercy of the big contributors.

In addition to legislation that would limit Congressional candidates' campaign expenditures, I think it might be worthwhile considering another requirement: that a certain minimum amount of prime TV time be made available without charge in 15-minute or 30-minute segments as a public service to all candidates for the Senate and House. This has been done abroad, notably in Great Britain, where lavish campaign spending is considered not only bad form but actually hurtful to the cause of the spenders.

In my opinion, the profligate spending and shallow sloganeering that are becoming commonplace in American politics insult the public's intelligence and do the electorate a grave disservice.

Traditionally, Americans have mistrusted the concentration of power in too few hands. We have steadily democratized the ballot. In the space of one generation, we have sounded the death knell to the "white man's primary," passed civil-rights voting laws, swept aside the rotten boroughs of maladjusted districts, and outlawed the poll tax. But of what real effect is all of this if we cannot recruit our elected officials from all levels of our society? Of what value is "one man, one vote" if the real power remains in the hands of the few who provide the money for political campaigns? What real choice does the voter have when only a limited few can afford to get their names on the ballot?

This year Congress will once again consider bills designed to restore decency and sense to political financing. Let us hope that this will be a year of action.

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Chairman, at long last we have before us an election reform measure for consideration. While imperfect, this measure will nevertheless, lay the groundwork for providing substantial changes in our election law, changes which should help to tighten the controls of campaign contributions and expenditures of candidates for Federal offices, provided that we adopt an open rule to the bill before us, H.R. 16090, the Federal Election Campaign Act Amendments.

Mr. Chairman, the American people have clearly expressed their staunch support for election reform. Having witnessed the debacle of the past 2 years, resulting in instituting proceedings for the impeachment of our President as a result of undesirable, illegal campaign practices, the American public, to whom we are all responsible, has recognized the necessity for campaign reform making its views known to each of us. We now have the responsibility of bringing about such reform of our election laws.

The committee bill we are considering offers several recommendations worthy of consideration, including: a $100 limitation on cash contributions; limiting individual contributions to $1,000 and substantially increasing the penalties for violations of election laws.

However, the committee did not go far enough with its recommendations. In the event that we are successful in adopting an open rule, I intend to support several important amendments.

In September of 1973, I joined in cosponsoring the Clean Elections Act of 1973. During consideration of the bill before us, my colleague from Illinois, Mr. ANDERSON, intends to offer an amendment which, if adopted, will add to the committee bill a major portion of the Clean Elections Act . . . a system of partial public financing of congressional campaigns by matching small contributions with funds appropriated from the "dollar check-off" fund now present in our tax return forms. This amendment will not impose any additional burden on the taxpayer, nor will it force any individual to designate a dollar of his tax monies for campaign financing. Only those funds which are specifically earmarked by individual citizens in their tax returns will be used to finance, in matching payments, congressional campaigns.

Another questionable provision in the committee bill relates to the enforcement of election laws. While the committee bill establishes a supervisory board for overseeing the enforcement of election laws, the committee proposed that the membership of this board include the Clerk of the House, the Secretary of the Senate, the Comptroller General, with additional members appointed by the House and Senate leadership. Such a proposed board is not sufficiently independent of congressional control to permit a free hand in administering and enforcing the election laws. Accordingly, I intend to support an amendment to be offered by my colleague from Minnesota, Mr. FRENZEL, which provides for a separate and totally independent supervisory board with civil enforcement powers to act as a truly responsive watchdog over election laws.

The adoption of these two amendments would bring us much closer to what is needed to insure the necessary safeguards for our electoral system.

Mr. Chairman, if ever there was a time for a stringent, strict bill regulating campaigning for all Federal elections, this is the time. By adopting a halfhearted measure we will be reneging in our constitutional responsibilities, abdicating the trust our constituencies have placed in us.

Accordingly, Mr. Chairman, I urge my colleagues not only to adopt an open rule on this measure to enable us to fully debate the amendments offered today, but also to vote in support of a strong campaign reform measure so that we can help restore the faith and confidence of the American people in our democratic form of government.

Mr. MATSUNAGA. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 16090, the proposed Federal Election Campaign Act Amendments of 1974.

There is no other measure which the American people today recognize the need for than this one, Mr. Chairman. The events of the last few days have become a discordant reprise of a sad song played secretly before, during and after the 1972 campaign. H.R. 16090 offers us the opportunity to stop the music.

By and large, Mr. Chairman, H.R. 16090 is a thoughtful and far-reaching piece of legislation, notwithstanding the fears expressed by many during the long and difficult months of committee consideration. That is not to say that the bill cannot be strengthened; it can. I intend to support several amendments I believe are crucial if the campaign finance reform bill is to be truly a reform bill. But I believe the chairman of the House Administration Committee, the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. HAYS) and the subcommittee chairman, the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. DENT), and the other committee members, deserve a great deal of credit for the legislation they are presenting to the House today.

At the risk of repeating what some of my colleagues have set forth, I would like briefly to note the major provisions of H.R 16090:

CONTRIBUTION LIMITS

Contributions by a person to a candidate for Federal office would be limited to $1,000 per election, applied separately to primary and general elections. Contributions by multi-candidate committees would be limited to $5,000 per election. Contributions by any individual in any year to all candidates for Federal office could not exceed $25,000. Contributions made in currency or cash would not be allowed in excess of $100.

EXPENDITURE LIMITS

Candidates for President would be limited to $10 million in campaign expenditures for primary elections and $20 million for general elections. Senatorial candidates could spend up to $75,000 or 5 cents per voting age population, whichever is greater, in each of the primary and the general elections. House candidates would be limited to $75,000 per election. In all instances, candidates could spend up to 25 percent over and above these limits to meet fundraising expenses. No cash expenditure could exceed $100. No candidate could spend more than $25,000 of his own money or that of his family for any election.

DISCLOSURE

A single 10-day pre-election report would be required, instead of the 15-day and 5-day reports now specified. The postelection report would be due 30 days after the election, rather than January 31 of the following year, as in present law. All receipts and expenditures would have to be reported through a central committee, to avoid fragmenting information and making public scrutiny more difficult.

INDEPENDENT ENFORCEMENT ENTITY

To supervise Federal election laws, the bill would create an independent Board of Supervisory Officers. I was greatly pleased to learn that a compromise amendment will be offered and accepted by the committee to change the composition of the Board so as to insure its independence from congressional control. Enforcement would remain with the Justice Department, but a new Assistant Attorney General would be created to deal with this area of the law.

Mr. Chairman, I am gratified to note that H.R. 16090 contains many provisions which I have been advocating for years, and have attempted to effect through legislation of my own. My most recent bill, H.R. 12268 of this Congress, calls for full public financing of Presidential elections building on the dollar check-off, a principle virtually assured by the committee bill; establishment of an independent Elections Commission to administer the law, toward which the committee bill is a good step; limits on both expenditures and contributions; prohibitions of large cash transactions of any kind; and strengthened reporting requirements.

Of course, a number of amendments are in order under the rule reported by the Rules Committee and adopted earlier this afternoon by the House. Many of the amendments are thoughtful, desirable additions to the bill, and I will support some of them. Particularly important will be the amendment offered regarding partial public financing of congressional campaigns, sponsored by a broad coalition of House Members. It conforms closely to the plan contained in H.R. 7612, the so-called Anderson-Udall bill, which I warmly endorsed at the time I introduced my own bill earlier this year.

One of the areas most fraught with difficulty, Mr. Chairman, is that of limitations on expenditures. Although care must be taken that the limit is not so high as to permit anyone to buy an election, even more care must be taken to avoid setting the limit so low that challengers cannot overcome the name identification advantage and high visibility of incumbents. I understand fully that I am addressing a Chamber full of candidates, only a handful of whom are challengers. But each House Member serves a relatively short time, as these things are measured, and I know that my colleagues will be guided as they consider this matter by their respective views of what is best for the Republic.

Mr. Chairman, a glance at the timetable facing us makes it clear why it is imperative that we act on this legislation without any delay. The awesome task of impeachment lies only days ahead in this House; it may occupy all of September or October, or both, in the other body. Other major legislation—mass transit, foreign aid, housing, veterans' benefits—all await final action. Adjournment will follow not long after, and then we must await the 94th Congress. The closer we come to a Presidential election just 2 years hence, the greater the resistance to changes that might affect one party more than the other.

So the time to act is now, Mr. Chairman. And the proper action is passage of H.R. 16090. I urge my colleagues to do just that, by an overwhelming margin.

Mr. McKAY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the legislation before us today, the Federal Election Campaign Amendments of 1974. I would like to commend the members of the Committee on House Administration for their work on this historic legislation to revise campaign laws and change practices by which candidates for Federal office obtain and expend campaign money.

The committee bill reforms present campaign law by limiting contributions that an individual or a group may make to a candidate for Federal office. It also limits the amount of money that may be spent by congressional or Presidential candidates. And, it places limits on the amount that a candidate may spend from his own pocket. The bill provides public financing from the dollar checkoff fund for Presidential general elections and primaries and for national party conventions. There are also provisions for improving reporting requirements.

Mr. Chairman, it is critical that the 93d Congress take action to reform campaign practices. I am in substantial agreement with provisions of this bill. However, I feel that in certain instances it does not go far enough in reforming campaign procedures. There are several amendments before us today which will correct inadequacies in the bill and strengthen it.

I support an amendment before us to provide some public financing of congressional races. This amendment will provide a system of financing in congressional elections that enhances the importance of the small contributor, while lessening the influence of the special interests. The amendment provides safeguards to insure that frivolous candidates do not receive public funds. I can see no justification for reforming the Presidential election process while turning our backs on congressional races.

I also support an amendment to lower the ceiling on allowable group contributions. Under the committee bill a political committee may contribute $5,000 per election, per candidate. Thus, a candidate could receive $5,000 in the primary in September from a special interest group, and another $5,000 for the general election campaign in October, from the same group. A system that allows group contributions of $10,000 to a single candidate will retain the undue influence of special interests in our political process. This ceiling is too high. I support the amendment to reduce the contribution limit for groups to $2,500 per candidate, per election.

I support an amendment to create an independent Board of Supervisory Officers. It is appropriate that the Clerk of the House, the Secretary of the Senate, and the Comptroller General, as employees of the Congress, should have advisory duties only on the Board of Supervisors. The amendment before us goes on to eliminate the veto power of the House Administration Committee and the Senate Committee on Rules and Administration. Only an independent enforcement committee can administer this law with fairness and impartiality. I urge support of this amendment.

Mr. Chairman, we have here an opportunity to give new direction and life to American politics by correcting abuses and bringing reform to the political process. I urge my colleagues to support the bill before us, with these amendments.

Mr. BROWN of California. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the general provisions and thrust of H.R. 16090, the Federal Election Campaign Act Amendments of 1974. I also wish to state that I will support two important amendments to this legislation, the first to provide for partial public financing of congressional general elections and the second to revise the Board of Supervisors provision to further insulate the regulators from the regulated.

I do not think it is necessary for me to elaborate on the provisions of this bill, or to explain my reasons for supporting particular provisions, except in a general sense. Others have done an excellent job of explaining the reasons for and the meaning of these proposals.

I would like to explain some of the background that led to my current philosophy on campaign reform. I have had the rather unique experience of conducting a statewide campaign for the U.S. Senate in the most populous State in the Union, California. I have also conducted five campaigns for the House of Representatives, and I am in the middle of my sixth campaign. Due to circumstances beyond my control, I have had to conduct two of those House campaigns as a nonincumbent. The first time was in 1962 when the total election costs were about $80,000, and the last time was in 1972 when the total election costs were about $175,000. Mr. Chairman, I submit that $175,000 is far too much money to spend on a congressional seat in the House, and while I was fortunate enough to be able to raise these large sums, I believe most candidates would not be so fortunate. During my U.S. Senate campaign I discovered just how difficult it is to reach a larger electorate, and the importance of adequate financing, even when the candidate has a large and dedicated volunteer organization. Money may not have made the difference in that campaign, but the suspicion always remains that it may have.

I speak today as both a victim and a beneficiary of the current election laws. The conclusion that I have reached from these experiences and from the general knowledge that I share with my colleagues about other elections, is that virtually no reform can be so strong that it would result in a system worse than that which we have today. When I consider all of the potential for abuses in the present system, I am amazed that we have done as well as we have with the archaic laws that govern Federal elections.

My own State of California sent shockwaves through the Nation last June when it resoundingly adopted the citizens' initiative on election reform, proposition 9. That law is stricter than H.R. 16090 in some respects, and not as thorough in other respects. This is to be expected. The House bill before us differs from the Senate bill, and each of these bills differs in some respects from what may be considered a logical approach by others interested in campaign reform. I am not discouraged by this variety of legislative remedies to the existing Federal election process. In fact, I am encouraged because the interest shown in this subject will probably result in good, solid permanent election reforms. I do not think that the bill before us today is the final word in election reform either. I would hope that the process is continually reviewed and analyzed and revised until it truly serves the public interest in the maximum. It is with this thought in mind that I support H.R. 16090.

One main provision of campaign reform must be public financing. Numerous proposals have been put forth to guarantee that public financing is fair to all parties concerned. It is a concept that must be carefully thought out. I believe the Anderson-Udall-Conable-Foley amendment to this bill is such a proposal, and I fully support it. Again, I do not believe this provision is the last word in public financing, especially since it ignores primary elections. Nevertheless it is a positive step in restoring integrity and balance to our electoral process.

In conclusion, I wish to reiterate my support for this legislation and repeat my belief that our work should not end with the legislation we begin considering today.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, since 1972, we have witnessed an acceleration corrosion of the confidence of Americans in our system of electing candidates for public office. We have witnessed an increased skepticism on the part of the American people that the independence of their elected officials has been undermined by large political contributions from either powerful individuals or special interest groups.

It is this lack of confidence and growing skepticism which have led to the legislation we are now considering. The bill before us, by placing a limit of $1,000 on individual contributions to a political candidate and a $5,000 limitation on contributions to a candidate by special interest committees, represents an import step toward reducing the influence gained by special interests through political contributions.

Unfortunately, the bill does not go far enough toward reducing the influence which special interests can have via campaign contributions. The amendment I had hoped to offer—the contributors rights amendment—sought to go one step further. It would have provided that a candidate—or a political committee acting on his behalf—could only accept contributions from individuals, with the sole exception being a contribution of a political party organization. Other organizations would have been able to act as agents of the individual contributor, but the individual would have been permitted to designate to whom the contribution would be given and the agent would have been required to identify the original donor:

It is apparent in Washington that a small number of business, labor, and professional organizations exert influence on the Federal Government far out of proportion to the constituency which they serve.

As of May 31, 1974, according to a widely published survey, political action committees representing business, agriculture, health, labor, and other interest groups held cash on hand of $14.7 million. This is in addition to $2.7 million already given on behalf of 1974 congressional races. That amounts to $40,000 per congressional district to influence political races this year. The total of $17.4 million in special interest group funds which is available for the 1974 congression races is almost twice the $9.7 million reported as available for the 1972 congressional elections. And the fund raising for this year is far from over.

The way in which these special interest groups are able to exert such a disproportionate influence is through the accumulation of relatively small and anonymous donations from their members. Then, by zeroing in with large campaign contributions on key races in the House and Senate or other marginal elections where the outcome is in doubt at the time of the donation, the power brokers who head the special interest groups are able to keep "friendly ears" in Washington and elsewhere for their special interests. While in theory there is nothing essentially wrong with the expressions of a common viewpoint through a collective campaign donation, in practice there are serious flaws.

To begin with, to say that member contributions are "collected" by these special interest groups is often the wrong characterization. "Forced" is often more correct, whether the special interest group is a labor organization, business, or professional group or "special cause" organization. Often the individual has no choice but to give, no choice as to how much he will give, and no voice in who shall receive his financial support for a political campaign. Decisions as to who receives donations and how much a candidate is to receive are usually made by the power brokers who head the committees. There is often little or no input from the individual donor whether a union member, doctor, or businessman who is the original source of the money.

In essence these people are asked to pour money into the wide mouth of a funnel without any real idea of where the spout comes out. The only thing they know is that "it will help the cause." The political action committee system is often a denial of the individual's basic right to free political self-expression.

All each of us has as a personal political right, after all, is our vote, our voice, our volunteer effort, or our individual financial contribution. Under the present system, the individual's donation is too often corrupted in ways which he would never understand or approve. It makes a mockery of the "informed electorate" concept by encouraging boss-type politics. If funds are to be aggregated for a particular use, it should be the result of a conscious decision on the part of the individual contributor and not the result of pressure tactics from special interest power brokers.

Under the bill before us, contributions which are earmarked must be disclosed. The bill, however, does not prevent an individual from channeling several thousand dollars to a special interest group without designating the recipient of his donation but knowing full well that a substantial part of his donation will end up in the hands of a particular candidate.

The amendment I suggested would have gone one step beyond the earmarking language in the bill and require that all contributions knowingly accepted by a candidate, with the exception of contributions from political parties, be fully identified as to the original individual donor source. This could close a major gap in present law by blocking individual efforts to avoid disclosure and circumvent the law.

By adopting this amendment, Congress would have met its obligation to strengthen the voice of the individual citizen in his government by protecting the sanctity and underscoring the importance of his individual financial contribution to a political candidate or campaign. The individual would have been able to control where his political donation would go and would have been able to know who would be spending it. This amendment would have served to tighten the group's accountability to its members and the politician's accountability to the individuals who are the ultimate support of his election.

Mr. VANIK. Mr. Chairman, today is a welcome day for the membership of this body. Almost 2 years after the most corrupt national political campaign in our history, we are provided the opportunity of making substantial repairs on our battered and abused electoral process. The hour is late—but we must act now to restore a measure of integrity to American politics.

The fact that we are even considering so comprehensive a measure as the Federal Election Act amendments is testimony to our neglect over the years of one of our basic freedoms—the right to vote. We have allowed our electoral process to be perverted by monied interests seeking special favors. No one needs to be reminded of the litany of sordid events which together have brought us to the brink of a wholesale subversion of the American political system. As public servants, we have no more important task to perform than to restore the basic confidence and faith of our citizens in the vitality, strength, and fairness of our political institutions.

I believe that each individual must make his or her own commitment to restore the integrity of that process. This is the opportunity that lies before us today.

Mr. Chairman, I support the thrust of this legislation. Nonetheless, gaps must be filled. Most important, is the need to establish an impartial board to supervise the administration of the Federal Elections Act. In devising a procedure for the selection of the membership of this Board, Congress must work with extreme caution. After two years of endless stories of dirty poltical deals, the American people have had their faith shattered. It will not be an easy task to rebuild this faith. For this reason, we must go out of our way to insure that the membership of the Supervisory Board is above reproach. The Supervisory Board will function as the public's eyes and ears—if we are careless in choosing its members, the credibility of our efforts here today will be destroyed.

I intend to support an amendment to strengthen the independence of the Board of Supervisors int he committee bill.

The second major area of weakness in the committee bill is the failure of the legislation to cover adequately the financing of congressional candidates in general election campaigns. This omission strikes to the heart of the integrity of our reform effort itself. If we are not willing to subject ourselves to the same constraints we establish for Presidential candidates, then we have cast a long shadow over our own intentions in drafting this legislation.

The events of the last few months have inexorably thrust the Congress into a more dominant role in the conduct of our national affairs. To assume this additional responsibility, Congress must have the faith and confidence of the electorate. Without this support, the effectiveness of our leadership will quickly erode.

We must recognize that we are entering a new era of congressional leadership. In preparation, we should take steps now to include congressional campaigns under the financing requirements of this legislation. Specifically, I will support the effort to extend matching payments from the checkoff fund for congressional candidates in general elections.

Mr. Chairman, this legislation—with the perfecting amendments I have mentioned—provides us with a good starting point for the restoration of our political system. But if there is one lesson these long months of Watergate have taught us, it is that the institutions of our government require constant vigilance and maintenance. The sustained involvement of a concerned citizenry is the only real guarantee that our Government will perform efficiently, effectively, and fairly.

Mr. CULVER. Mr. Chairman, I wish to voice my strong support for two amendments to H.R. 16090, the Federal Election Campaign Act Amendments of 1974. Though H.R. 16090 goes a long way toward improving Federal campaign practices, it falls short of ending many of the abuses that we have witnessed during the preceding 2 years. I, therefore, urge my colleagues to support two key amendments that will be introduced today, both of which I have cosponsored.

The Frenzel-Fascell amendment would insure strong and effective enforcement of our campaign laws; and the Anderson-Udall amendment would establish public financing of congressional elections by creating a matching payment system for congressional general elections which would be financed out of the "dollar checkoff" fund already provided in H.R. 16090 for Presidential elections.

Prohibitions and limitations are not sufficient by themselves to restore confidence and equity in the electoral process. We must break with the precedent of large donations, and provide incentives to encourage a resurgence of citizen participation in campaigns while at the same time reasonably equalizing the terms of competition between incumbents and challengers.

I, therefore, fully support efforts to amend H.R. 16090 to include a system of matching payments for small contributions to congressional campaigns. The thrust of such a system is not to eliminate private money from campaigns, but to shift the source of funding from the special interests and large contributors to a broad base of citizen participants. With entitlement to a $50 Federal matching payment for each equivalent contribution raised privately, candidates would have a far stronger incentive to turn to the people to finance their campaigns.

There can be no more constructive change in Federal campaign practices than to have our campaign laws aggressively and consistently policed and enforced by an agency with the proper authority. If we are going to have an equitable election law that protects the rights of the general public we must establish an independent administration and enforcement agency.

Unfortunately, H.R. 16090 leaves congressional employees—the Clerk of the House and the Secretary of the Senate—in an enforcement position, and maintains the congressional committee veto of rules and regulations. This situation gives the appearance of a conflict of interest since employees of the House and Senate are charged with identifying and reporting possible violations of the law committed by their employers. Even with the most conscientious and well-intentioned Clerk of the House and Secretary of the Senate, the public is certain to be skeptical and question the objectivity and zeal of their enforcement efforts against persons to whom they owe their jobs.

An independent commission would eliminate the present conflicts of interest, reverse the long history of nonenforcement, and achieve proper integration of the administrative and enforcement mechanisms of the law. Most importantly, a Commission would foster much needed public confidence in the effectiveness and fairness of election laws as well as in the aspirants for public office.

Finally, it must be remembered that we face a broader issue than "Watergate." The corruption that we have seen during the last 2 years is a manifestation of a more serious problem.

The U.S. Constitution lists few eligibility requirements for holding public office. However, the unwritten requirements are staggering. Under present conditions, there are clear handicaps for a person to run for public office in this country unless he or she is independently wealthy or is willing to seek the help of people or organizations of wealth. Watergate happened in part because a small group of unprincipled men had large sums of money—some of it laundered money, secreted in safes and suitcases. Nothing is more corrupting than unlimited money. If absolute power corrupts absolutely, uncontrolled money corrupts uncontrollably.

In 1972, candidates across the country spent $400 million. Significantly, incumbents were able to raise and spend twice as much as their challengers. More than two-thirds of this money was raised, not from a broad range of concerned citizens contributing small amounts of money, but from a very small number of individuals and groups.

One quality should not be pertinent to a candidate's qualification to hold public office, and yet this quality has often become the most critical to his chances of success—that is, the amount of wealth he can command. The democratic quality of choice is inherently diminished where a public election must depend in significant part upon one's ability to raise money.

There is a desperate need to equalize the political influence of all citizens in the United States. We must act to insure that the inequality in the amount of money one has or can command does not disproportionately affect the extent of their political influence.

Carefully designed public subsidization of elections constitutes an attempt to insure that the rights guaranteed by the first amendment are shared equally among the people.

Mr. HARRINGTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 10690, the Federal Election Campaign Act Amendments of 1974, as strengthened by the Anderson-Udall, Fascell-Frenzel, and Conte amendments.

By placing limits on campaign expenditures, controlling the runaway costs of elections, and making available matching public funding, this act will permit candidates without great personal wealth or wealthy friends, and without the advantages we all enjoy as incumbents, to realistically seek public office.

The "seedmoney" requirements should discourage frivilous candidates, but at the same time levels set in the legislation are sufficiently modest that no serious contender should be locked out of running an effective campaign by the monetary demands on candidates.

These provisions are central to the legislation, and have received considerable public attention. They certainly deserve the support of the Congress, but I would also argue that adequate enforcement and public disclosure are equally necessary to cleaning up our electoral process. Designation of a principal campaign committee and the institution of tighter reporting regulations will provide the public with greater access to the financial records of office-seekers. But most importantly the creation of an independent Federal Election Commission will move us closer to the goal of honest campaign financing. Without a strong regulatory agency, even the best legislation could prove worthless.

I would offer only one word of caution to my colleagues—in setting expenditure levels, they must not be set too low. A primary goal of any election should be the dissemination of information to the voters, and certainly that is necessary if a candidate is to have any realistic chance of winning. My experience in Massachusetts gives me a feeling that any ceiling whether it is $75,000 or some other number may in fact be unrealistic in many parts of the country and certainly anything much below a $75,000 figure could leave a challenger in a situation in which he would automatically be overwhelmed by the built-in advantages of an incumbent.

In closing, while the optional public financing of H.R. 10690 may not ultimately be the best approach available, particularly since the red herring issue of public versus private financing may mar future campaigns, this bill at least offer one way of removing the influence of money from our electoral system. What we want are campaigns which are informative, broadbased, and financed with money that does not carry strings or responsibilities leading public officials to violate their public trust. For only when the political arena is open to all candidates, and only then they are freed from the controlling influence of large contributions, will confidence in our electoral process be warranted.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I urge my colleagues to vote for this legislation before us today.

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Chairman, H.R. 16090, the Federal Election Act Amendments of 1974, is a measure whose time has truly come.

A scant 3 years following the enactment of the Federal Elections Campaign Act of 1971, which provided the first reform of election law since 1925, we in this country have witnesses a debacle in election funding and misuse of campaign funds that has revealed to us all too clearly the pressing need for a far more thorough overhaul of our election laws.

The abuses of Watergate are, very simply, traceable in large respect to money.

I am a cosponsor of the original Anderson-Udall bill, H.R. 7980, which first brought this issue to the House. At the time that bill was introduced, none of us could have foreseen how truly necessary it has become.

There were no spending limits at the time of Watergate. There was, as a result, no problem in establishing the slush funds that financed the break-in at the Democratic National Committee offices.

There were no contribution limits either. Thus, it was no problem for officials of the Committee to Re-Elect the President to acquire funds for their various covert and illegal activities.

The cumbersome reporting requirements which each candidate must file, under current law, were not yet in effect when Maurice Stans and other Presidential fund-raisers collected millions in cash and unreported contributions.

Even today, it would be difficult for a citizen, with all of a candidate's reports before him, to determine how much indeed had been contributed to a candidate—and from whom.

One reason for this is that there is no limitation on the number of political committees that a candidate can form—or cause to be formed in support of his candidacy.

During the 1972 Presidential campaign, there were thousands of political campaigns formed. Some of those committees—Democratic and Republican—have yet to straighten out their tangled affairs.

The prospect of a similar state of confusion is imminent with the 1974 congressional races just ahead.

Lastly, the present law does not limit the cash amount of a contribution. It ought to be painfully obvious to anyone who has kept up with the far-flung and nefarious enterprises associated with Watergate corruption that cash offers too facile a medium for unethical and illegal activities.

Its untraceability and easy transferability obviously played a great role in tempting those who originally set up the network of espionage and sabotage in the Nixon campaign apparatus.

I will not say that H.R. 16090 offers a perfect solution to the evils that have beset the campaign process despite the 1971 law. Yet, something has to be done in short order to shore up the gaps which have opened in the wall we had sought to build around the improper influences that can act on candidates and their selection.

The new law that we now consider would take several basic steps toward restraining and greatly reducing the influence of big money and special interest groups.

Five essential reforms have been proposed: Individual and organizational contribution limits, expenditure ceilings for Presidential, senatorial, and congressional races, simplified reporting and expenditures for candidates centered in a single, principal campaign committee, independent supervision of the new law by a board of election supervisors and public financing of Presidential elections.

In the area of limits for individual political contributions, maximum amounts of $1,000 per candidate are allowed for both primary and general elections. An individual aggregate in contributions to all candidates cannot exceed $25,000 per year. There is a similar $25,000 aggregate for families in each calendar year. State political party organizations and multi-candidate committees can contribute up to $5,000 to a candidate per election. The use of middlemen to disguise or evade attribution in contributing funds is also prohibited. No cash contributions in excess of $100 are to be allowed. In addition, no contributions from a foreign national can be accepted by a candidate or his committee.

Expenditure limits in Presidential races on a per candidate basis are $10 million for primary spending and $20 million for the general election. Senate candidates would be allowed to spend $75,000 per election or $.05 per State resident, whichever is greater. Congressional candidates can spend $75,000 in both the primary and general elections. In addition, up to 25 percent more of a candidate's total allowance in senatorial and congressional races can be spent in exempted fund-raising efforts. These figures may in the future be raised in concert with rises in the price index from year to year by virtue of an escalation clause in the bill.

A last limitation centers on the independent expenditure by an individual or individuals in support of a candidate.

If unconnected to campaign spending by the candidate or a political committee, these expenses can total an aggregate of $1,000 per individual.

An extremely important feature of the bill is the new recommendations it has for campaign funding disclosure. The number of reports are reduced, but most significantly, all filings must now be made by a principal campaign committee for the candidate.

This committee is responsbile for collecting and collating all the receipts and expenditures of other committees supporting the candidate. This measure not only reduces the mass of paperwork required under present law, it also makes an understandable and comprehensive picture of a candidate's campaign funding possible for the first time.

This reform, alone, is worth the long fight that has finally brought this measure to the floor.

The Board of Supervisors, which would oversee and administer the law, will consist of seven members, the three existing supervisory officers of campaign laws—the Comptroller General, Secretary of the Senate, and Clerk of the House—plus four public members appointed by the House and Senate, on the recommendations of the majority and minority leadership of those bodies.

The Board will supervise the actions of the individual supervisory officers, help insure compliance with the election laws, and formulate overall policy with respect to campaign laws.

It will also give advisory opinions, conduct investigations, and report on an annual basis to the Congress.

The Board will, in conducting its investigations, hold hearings which may result in its referring violations to the Justice Department for prosecution. It can also declare candidates who fail to file their reports ineligible to run again for the office they seek.

The final innovation of the bill before us as a revolutionary one. Public financing of Presidential elections.

Utilizing funds from the dollar check-off fund, funding in order of priority will be provided to pay: Up to $2 million in legitimate political conventions expenses for each party, the entire $20 million limit per Presidential nominee in the general election and Federal matching funds for up to one-half of the overall per candidate limit.

In the last situation, each candidate will have to raise a threshold amount of at least $100,000, of which $5,000 must come from 20 States in $250 denominations or less.

As I have said, this bill offers broad and necessary changes in our election campaign laws.

I will support it for the great strides that it takes toward the restoration of strong positive public confidence in the election process.

In particular, the use of the dollar check-off fund to finance Presidential campaigning offers us a method whereby those citizens who wish to can contribute their tax dollars—at no expense to them—to free national politics from the influence of big money and special interest.

In this vein, I also wish to go on record in wholehearted support of several amendments which will be offered to this bill.

The first and most important amendment, which I have cosponsored, will be introoduced by Representatives ANDERSON, UDALL, CONABLE, and FOLEY. It also will make use of the dollar check-off fund, but for the financing of congressional and senatorial general elections.

The method employed in providing the financing for these elections involves—like that for Presidential primaries—a mixture of public and private financing. But, unlike the Presidential financing measures, the fundings provided from the checks-off fund will match only very small private contributions, $50 or less.

In addition, no candidate would be eligible for Federal contributions in excess of one-third of the candidates spending limit.

Use of the funds is further limited to certain specified media and other uses which are best calculated to reach the broadest segment of the voters.

Frivolous candidates will be unable to profit by the provisions of the amendment because each candidate must raise at least 10 percent of his spending limit in contributions of $50 or less before he is eligible for matching Federal funds.

This amendment has the great advantage, to my mind, of costing the American public no more than they are themselves willing to contribute to Federal matching funds.

Since, in either case, citizens pay no extra or any less tax, their convictions are their guide.

At present, the dollar check-off fund is growing by large percentages each year. There will be, I am convinced, ample funds available for this matching fund program in congressional races.

It is further, a system that can not help but insure that it is the little guy who makes a matching payment possible. If we are limiting individual qualifying contributions to a $50 maximum, there can be no doubt that a great many people will have to give before any check-off funds are available to the candidate. That is a sort of populist insurance that I feel is pretty hard to beat.

In addition to this amendment, I support two others. One will reduce the per election maximum contribution any group can make to a candidate—and that to be offered by Congressmen FRENZEL and FASCELL, to beef up and fully insure the independence of the Board of Supervisors that will administer this law.

Mr. Chairman, the legislation before us today offers some unique but highly workable answers to the questions in everyone's mind that were created by Watergate. Watergate is with us still—and may be for some time to come, but the sickness from which it was spawned can be cured. People in this country want to believe in their Congressmen. I am convinced that they would welcome the return of stability and confidence in government.

H.R. 16090 presents an opportunity to give those things to them that we may not again be presented with. We have an opportunity to return election politics to the people of this country, to take it from those who would win by purchase.

Populism is a much bandied-about phrase, but it can receive more meaning from what we do here today than any other force in this country. I urge the passage of this bill and the amendments I have endorsed. That result will reap unending benefits to this Nation and to those who made it all possible. We are those people and today is the day of reckoning:

I would like to append to my remarks an editorial that I have clipped from the July 7, 1974, Springfield Republican.

It sets out, to my mind, the very considerable advantages of the Anderson-Udall-Conable-Foley amendment, which the paper so graciously commends me for supporting.

I would like, in my turn, to point out that both for myself and for many other Members of this body, much of the encouragement, the research and the inspiration for this bill and the amendments which will be offered to it are the work of Common Cause, whose dedicated staff has labored unstintingly to advance this most crucial reform.

I would like to add my thanks—and I am sure, that of many others—for their contributions.

The article referred to follows:

MATCHING FUNDS REFORM FACTOR

U.S. Rep. Edward P. Boland, D-Springfield, in taking issue with the House Administration Committee's rejection of public funding for congressional campaigns, supports a sorely needed reform.

Much to his credit, Boland parts company on the issue with those House incumbents who are reluctant to surrender what they regard as an advantage to themselves in keeping funding strictly private.

What the congressman favors, as does Common Cause, is a mixture of small private contributions with some public funds—a limited matching system, in other words.

Public funds would match the House candidates' private contributions up to $50 each—but only up to a level that would be written into the law. Unlimited public funds would not be available to any candidate.

Also, the candidate would have to show a reasonable level of public support by collecting a certain amount—such as $7500—in contributions of no more than $50 each.

Thus serious candidates would qualify, as other candidates are screened out, for the public funding. And he or she would receive matching funds for all private gifts of $50 or less—up to the maximum set by the law.

This proposal, which will be offered during House floor action on campaign law reform, would set the public funding maximum at one-third of whatever overall spending limit is finally legislated.

The matching system would broaden the base of private contributions by encouraging candidates to seek more of these. In turn it would make the candidate more representative of the people.

Conversely, it would make candidates less dependent on, and obligated to, big special-interest contributors. At present, 90 per cent of campaign giving comes from less than one per cent of the population.

Fully as important, the matching funds system would give challengers of incumbents a more equitable stake in the election. A side-effect of that could be more responsible performance in office by an incumbent.

Mrs. HOLT. Mr. Chairman, the House Administration Committee should never have brought the Federal Election Campaign Act to the floor with a modified closed rule that bars major amendments.

This subject is too important to the Nation to be treated as a routine piece of legislation to be shot through this House, and many of us have important objections to provisions of H.R. 16090. Mr. Chairman, after reviewing this bill, I have concluded that it does very little in the way of reform, but actually aggravates conditions that already plague our election system.

For example, the ceilings established for campaign expenditures by candidates for the House of Representatives are much too high. A House candidate would be allowed to spend $75,000 in a primary election and $75,000 in a general election for a total of $150,000. I know of no House election campaign in Maryland in which spending by individual candidates has reached so high. Indeed, the norm would be in the neighborhood of $100,000 for both primary and general elections.

If we are really interested in campaign reform, we will try to reduce campaign spending below the existing norm, or we will not have anything that could be called reform. As presently written, this bill is an open invitation to spend up to the excessively high limits, and to raise sufficient money from special interests to reach those limits.

The legislation also continues the unfair rule that allows labor organizations to contribute to campaigns while corporations are barred from making such contributions. We should not continue allowing the dues of union workers to be donated by union leaders to candidates who may not be supported by individual members. And we should not continue the practice of stacking the election system against business and for organized labor.

I must also vehemently protest the provisions for public financing of Presidential election campaigns. The effect of such a system is to force taxpayers to support candidates not of their choice, and I believe that would be unconstitutional.

Perhaps it is time for us to go back to some fundamental principles on the use of tax dollars. Many of us have a strong conviction that tax dollars should be used only for essential public services.

Mr. Chairman, bumper stickers, signs, balloons, advertisements, caterers for political rallies, and various gimmicks are not public services by any stretch of the wildest imagination. The provisions for public financing of Presidential campaigns are also blatantly discriminatory against any third political party, and indeed could be said to prevent the rise of any third party. I have the gravest doubts as to the constitutionality of that discrimination.

Mr. Chairman, many of us wanted to have an open rule for this bill so that it could be amended to effect a true reform without violating the constitutional rights of our citizens. The alternative is to vote against this legislation.

Mr. MURTHA. Mr. Chairman, I would like to share with my colleagues some of my thoughts, and the thoughts of my constituents, on the very important subject of televising the impeachment proceedings of the full House.

A great help to me in deciding how to vote on the resolution came from a special poll I conducted in the 12th Congressional District. The poll results gave me not only statistical evidence on public sentiment, but provided an outlet for the expression of individual opinions that helped to clarify the issues in my own mind and convince me of the proper decision.

I support the motion to televise the House debate. Before that debate actually begins, though, I believe it is important for the Representatives, the public, and television personnel to reflect on the significane of the House vote.

Impeachment represents the single most important decision this Congress was granted by the framers of the Constitution. The entire impeachment process has been compared to a trial of a public official from grand jury through verdict; and it is basically a trial. But we must remember it is not only a trial of the person charged, but also represents a test of the Congress, and of the strength of the Constitution itself.

It seems vital to me that the people be given every opportunity to judge the congressional process, the evidence presented, the full debate, and the final verdict. It seems to me the way to insure such a complete examination is to make available the entire procedure—unedited, uninterrupted, and uninterpreted—to the American people.

I have no doubt that given the full information, the intelligence and commonsense of the American people will render a proper verdict, not only on the final outcome, but on the Congress and the impeachment procedure as well.

The final decision this Congress makes will be effective only if it justifies public support. And to insure agreement and support by the public, it becomes essential that the people have access to the same complete set of facts the Congress does.

To test public sentiment on this question, Mr. Chairman, I conducted a special "Instant Poll" of a cross-section of 3,500 persons in the 12th Congressional District. I asked these people whether they favored or opposed the televising of the House impeachment procedure. The results of that poll showed:

In favor of televising; 66.7 percent.

Opposed to televising: 31.8 percent, and Undecided: 1.5 percent.

It is essential, though to examine some of the many important comments accompanying these results. Particularly, I would like to analyze some very well-considered comments by those opposing televising the procedure. These comments provide important guidelines for all of us involved.

First, many persons argued that cameras should be barred because this is a judicial procedure. Certainly the electronic media are properly excluded from regular trials. But the reasons for this normal exclusion are: First, potential disruption of the trial since most courtrooms are not equipped for television coverage; second, unfair publicity in the community at large which could prejudice future jurors in a retrial; third, possible slander of a defendant or witness; and fourth, the fact that most trials do not directly affect the well-being of the entire community.

While all these are valid concerns in a standard trial, they seem less applicable to the special procedure we face. In this situation, the community-at-large must be the ultimate judge, and we must remember this. There is much less possibility of unfair slander, but we must all remember the rules of fair and ethical judicial behavior. And in this procedure we have a chance to correct what many people believe has already been unfair publicity.

Second, many constituents fear the presence of television cameras would turn the proceedings into a "circus-like" atmosphere with the attention of the Members directed to politics rather than a serious debate of the evidence.

Let me say first that I have great respect for the seriousness of the Members of this Chamber. I do not believe the presence of cameras or TV lights will deter us from our task. I believe the House Members will carefully weigh the evidence. I do not believe we will turn aside the serious judicial nature of this procedure. I believe the dignity of the Judiciary Committee hearings illustrates the conscientiousness of the Members as we approach this debate. Moreover, as I mentioned earlier, if Congress does not conduct itself properly, then we too deserve to be judged by the people.

Third, some individuals in the poll added they were tired of the entire "Watergate" problem and did not want it spread across their televisions for the next few months. I can understand the frustration of individuals over the events of the last year in Government. I can also understand the desire for Government to get on with other critical problems such as the economy.

The fact is, though, that we have been working on many problems including the economy. Outside the glare of front-page attention in the last few weeks we have considered election reform, vital strip-mining legislation and have passed 11 of the 13 regular appropriation bills. Just this week we passed the defense appropriations bill 3½ months earlier than last year. We are all anxious to bring this impeachment inquiry to conclusion, and I am sure the House will proceed with all deliberate speed. Impeachment is only one part of our concern, though, and we have not stopped activity in other vital areas. Moreover, I believe in the long run the impeachment process—once concluded in whatever manner—will help with those problems by reuniting the country and restoring public trust in our institutions and constitutional form of government.

Also, Mr. Chairman, I would like to address a few brief remarks to the television networks. As we all know, there has been considerable private and public criticism of the news media over the past few years. I think everyone would agree that there is nothing more critical to a democracy, than a free, responsible press. The next few months provide the news media—and particularly television—with an opportunity to show their maturity, responsibility, and commitment to democracy by covering the impeachment process with the respect, decency, balance, fairness, and comprehensiveness that this most important story deserves.

A century ago Americans knew little of the daily developments in the presidential impeachment proceeding then being conducted. This year, Americans have an opportunity to look in on history. The news media faces the burden of being the people's daily eyes and ears. They must present the information in the spirit of the free flow of ideas that is fundamental to a democracy. I believe the media are capable of this task. I urge them to prove it with their coverage.

A final word: As far as my own feelings on impeachment are concerned, I enter the debate prepared to listen, and to make a final judgment based on the facts presented. I ask the people of my district—regardless of your present feelings—to join with me in this fair judgment, aided by the on-the-spot coverage of the events, so that history records our people as being willing to listen and render a fair judgment.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired.

Under the rule, the bill is considered as having been read for amendment.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Federal Election Campaign Act Amendments of 1974".

Are there any Committee on House Administration amendments to title I?

COMMITTEE AMENDMENTS

Mr. THOMPSON of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I offer three committee amendments to title I of the bill and I ask unanimous consent that they be considered en bloc.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the committee amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendments:

On page 13, beginning in line 10, strike out "(B)" and all that follows down to but not including "(C)" in line 15, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "(B) the use of real or personal property and the cost of invitations, food and beverages, voluntarily provided by an individual to a candidate in rendering voluntary personal services on the individual's residential premises for candidate-related activities."

Page 15, beginning in line 10, strike out "(D)" and all that follows down to but not including "(E)" in line 16, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "(D) the use of real or personal property and the cost of invitations, food and beverages, voluntarily provided by an individual to a candidate in rendering voluntary personal services on the individual's residential premises for candidate-related activities."

And on page 13, beginning in line 19, strike out "(D)" and all that follows down through "political committee," in line 23 and insert in lieu thereof the following: "(D) any unreimbursed payment for travel expenses made by an individual who on his own behalf volunteers his personal services to a candidate,".

Page 15, beginning in line 16, strike out "(E)" and all that follows down through "committee," in line 20, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "(E) any unreimbursed payment for travel expenses made by an individual who on his own behalf volunteers his personal services to a candidate,".

And on page 14, line 11, insert ", (C)," immediately after "(B)".

Mr. THOMPSON of New Jersey (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, these amendments being simply technical in nature and having been widely circulated among the members of the committee and unanimously agreed to, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendments be dispensed with and I shall undertake to explain them.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

Mr. THOMPSON of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, the amendments to title I, beginning at page 13 are technical amendments relating to exemptions of certain in-kind expenditures and contributions from the spending and contribution limits provided in the bill. The purpose, generally, of these amendments is to further limit the scope of these exceptions. These amendments were fully discussed by the members of our committee and were approved unanimously at our meeting this morning.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THOMPSON of New Jersey. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, these amendments were adopted in the Committee on House Administration this morning and were accepted unanimously. They relate to the loopholes to which I referred in my minority remarks in the committee report and do satisfy about 95 percent of my objections to the loopholes as they existed in the bill.

I think they really go a long way to make this bill acceptable. I would urge they be accepted and properly passed.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

I do want to say that these amendments were accepted unanimously. I think now that the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. FRENZEL) has said they satisfy 95 percent of his objections, any time we can satisfy the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. FRENZEL) 95 percent, we ought to move forward. So I propose to take no more time and urge the adoption of the amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendments offered by the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. THOMPSON).

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there further committee amendments to title I?

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. DU PONT

Mr. DU PONT. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to title I.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DU PONT: Page 2, line 16, strike "$5,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$2,500".

(Mr. DU PONT asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DU PONT. Mr. Chairman, as required by the rule adopted by the House today, my amendment was published at pages E5306 and E5307 of yesterday's RECORD.

Mr. Chairman, this is a very simple amendment. It proposes to reduce from $5,000 to $2,500 the amount of money that a special interest committee can contribute to a candidate.

It is my personal opinion that special interest committees should not be allowed to contribute anything to candidates, but very plainly that is not a viable alternative. I think the very least we can do is bring the special interest group limit somewhat more in line with the other features of the bill.

The bill as reported by the committee has a $1,000 limit, per election, on contributions by any individual person, and then it goes on to set a $5,000 limit for committees. It seems to me that these two figures are substantially out of balance; that it is the individual, who wants to be encouraged, it is the individual we ought to be looking to in order to finance our political campaigns.

I think the reason we have gotten into trouble in our election process, as we have recently seen from the Watergate problem, is that we have had special interest groups—the milk lobby, various business funds, various union groups—giving large amounts of money to political candidates. I think if we get the special interest groups out of politics, we would be a lot better off.

Therefore, I am trying to prevent the evil of large amounts of money coming in, not from people—and people are the ones who should be supporting the candidates—but from special interest groups. I think that my amendment goes a long way toward ending this evil.

Mr. THOMPSON of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DU PONT. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. THOMPSON of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, for a point of clarification, does the gentleman's amendment include the respective political party committees, or is it restricted solely to outside groups?

Mr. DU PONT. I would say to the gentleman that my amendment simply changes the figure on line 16 of page 2 from $5,000 to $2,500. Therefore, it affects all committees covered by that subsection. It is my understanding that the subsection does cover political committees.

So, let me stress again the fact that what we ought to be talking about is people, and not organizations.

It is possible to raise a substantial amount of money—more, in fact, than the $75,000 limit imposed by this bill—by using people and by using a limit of $100 per person. I know that is the fact because I have done it. In my campaign in Delaware this year, we had 5,000 contributors. We set a limit of $100, and we raised $80,000.

So, I do not believe we need the special interest groups at all to finance political campaigns. I urge adoption of my amendment.

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DU PONT. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Chairman, I have not read the text of the gentleman's amendment, but would he tell me if the Republican Congressional Campaign Committee and the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, for example, would be included as special interest groups under the terms and language of his amendment?

Mr. DU PONT. Those are not the terms of my amendment, I would say to the gentleman from Illinois. Those are the terms of the bill. My amendment simply changes the figure in the bill; but yes, they would be included. I would very much prefer that political committees, where I do not see any particular problem, were defined differently and were left alone. But, if we have to lower the limit on political committees in order to get the special interest groups out of politics, I would be in favor of it.

Mr. MICHEL. The gentleman may very well have heard my earlier remarks in which I complained about that $5,000 limitation affecting our nationally recognized political committees, so on those grounds I think I would have to oppose the amendment.

Mr. DU PONT. I am certainly sympathetic with the gentleman's problem, and I would only say that we have to attack his problem because of the way the committee has drawn the bill, and he is an unintentioned casualty of a very good amendment.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I would start out by saying to the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. MICHEL) that this does apply to the committee of which he is chairman. There is no question about that. The gentleman from Delaware was very candid, and he said it did apply.

I am not particularly surprised—well, I am a little surprised—that of all people, the gentleman from Delaware would bring up his amendment.

The gentleman from Delaware has access to funds that most other Members in this body would not have access to, and I am not very impressed by the fact that he is limiting the amount of contributions in Delaware, because if one gets anybody by the name of Du Pont or who is related to the Du Ponts contributing $100 bucks, he can raise $1 million. Therefore, this puts a limitation on us poor boys, a pretty severe restriction.

I do not think that this amendment needs much debate. The gentleman from Illinois (Mr. MICHEL) made a pretty eloquent plea about it. He thinks $5,000 is too low for the committees, and there will be an amendment offered later which will help that situation. If he sees fit to support it, that is up to him. Personally, however, I think the committees ought to have the right to contribute whatever funds they can legitimately and honestly get their hands on because I am a great believer in the two-party system.

If we continue to offer amendments and to restrict the rule of the parties and the committees, then we may well find ourselves in the same situation that some of our friends in Europe are in.

I think it is kind of significant to note that there is not a majority government in Western Europe today. The reason many of the European countries are in the trouble they are in is because of the multiparty system and the fact that every government over there is a coalition government. When the people go to vote, they do not know whom to vote against because they do not know who really in the government makes the decisions.

That is one of the strengths of our system.

I oppose the gentleman's amendment basically on the philosophical grounds that it does weaken the two-party system, and I stand for the defeat of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. DU PONT).

The amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there additional eligible amendments to title I?

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. MATHIS OF GEORGIA

Mr. MATHIS of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MATHIS of Georgia: Page 4, line 23, strike out "$75,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$42,500".

(Mr. MATHIS of Georgia asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MATHIS of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, this is a very simple amendment. It reduces the amount of money that can be spent in any primary, any primary runover, or any general election from $75,000 down to $42,500.

I offered this amendment in committee. It was defeated by the members of the committee, who felt that it was a lower figure than they were willing to accept. I said at that time that I would offer it on the floor in order that all the Members of this House would have an opportunity to express themselves on what I considered to be a very vital issue.

I might point out, as the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. BRADEMAS) said earlier in his statement, that in addition to having the $75,000 spending ceiling, we allow an additional $17,000 to be spent by a candidate or his committee under the guise of fund raising, which makes a grand total of $93,000. If we multiply that by three, which is the primary, the primary runover, and the general election that we have in most States, then we are up to about $280,000 that can be spent by a candidate or his committee in any year.

As I said earlier during general debate, I think it is a farce for us to come in and talk about campaign reform and leave that kind of expenditure ceiling in this bill.

It is a matter of record that in 1972, in all congressional elections, 57 percent of all the candidates who were running—and that was 834—spent less than $42,500, which is the amount in my amendment.

The average amount spent per candidate is, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania said earlier in the debate, $47,801. We would reduce that by $5,000 by my amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I have here a list of the top big money spenders in the 1972 election. I have laid it here on the table, and if the Members want to see some gigantic, stupendous sums that were spent in attempting to win a job that pays $42,500 a year, they can walk by this table and take a look.

For example, a fellow named Brown who ran out of Arizona as a Democrat spent $274,000 in 1972; and the list goes on and on and on.

I think it is utterly ridiculous for us to talk about campaign reform and then leave an expenditure ceiling of $280,000 in this bill.

Mr. Chairman, I urge the Members to support my amendment and let us do something that will truly restore the confidence of the people in the democratic institution of this country, and particularly in this House.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I feel duty bound to defend the committee bill, which was the consensus of a majority of the members of the committee.

I will say to the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. MATHIS) very candidly that never in the 13 times I have run for Congress have I spent $42,500 in any single primary or election. So I have some sympathy for the gentleman's point of view.

However, this matter was discussed up and down and back and forth in the committee. There were members who wanted it lower than this figure. The committee started out with a $60,000 limit. That was debated. We went back and forth and up and down the street and finally came up with the $75,000 figure. I think every Member was conscientious about it, and I have no objection obviously to every Member voting his conscience on this amendment.

Mr. Chairman, what the committee tried to do in the aggregate was to balance off the charge that the lower amount would be an incumbent's figure against an unconscionable amount of a quarter of a million dollars or $150,000, both of which I would consider unconscionable amounts of money.

So while $75,000 may not be the most ideal figure in the world, it is the one that the majority of the members of the committee supported. I feel it was the best judgment we could come up with.

Therefore, I am going to support the committee position, although, as I say, I have never spent that much money and I do not have any intention of ever spending that much money.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in support of the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from Georgia for introducing this amendment. I offered it myself and it was defeated in the committee, and now another attempt is made by the gentleman to introduce it here.

I believe any reasonable person will admit that if we establish a base of spending which is equal to our total salary for 2 years, we are spending about all we should be allowed to spend. This is the only job in the whole world where we can shamelessly face the people and say we are going to spend 2½ times our gross salary to win the office.

Somewhere there must be a question in the mind of somebody: What is the attraction in that office? What is the come-on? What is the little gift that you might receive for winning an office that costs you 2½ times more than what you are going to get paid?

I know Members of this Congress—I know them intimately and personally—who actually live on the salaries that they receive in Congress. Can we imagine that, living on the salary that we receive in Congress?

Anybody can take that person on in an election under the limitations we put in here, and defeat him, because he does not have either the money in his own right, or the kind of a district that will raise that kind of money.

I know Members in this Congress who move from a district they cannot win in into a district where this type of a candidate lives, and they have won, and are sitting in this Congress today.

I do not believe that anyone can honestly say that $85,000, twice our total salary, is too little to spend for the office that we seek.

I have an amendment that I will offer at a later time, although I doubt whether it will be allowed, but in any event I would like the opportunity at that time to explain it. That amendment will not cure everything, but I do believe that if this Congress accepts this amendment it will raise the respect that this Congress should be held in by the people of our Nation.

I have already given to the Members of this House information provided by our staff as to a sampling of the high rollers in this gamble for public office, such figures that I am sure would not be believed. One man spent $216,000, who was licked by a person who spent $215,000. One fellow spent $195,000 beating a man who spent $218,000.

We are not talking about Monte Carlo. We are talking about the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States. And here we are, and we are not talking about what Watergate taught us; we are not talking about the evils of going out and getting contributions beyond the needs of the office. No, we are talking about increasing those expenditures.

When you talk about $187,500 in my district, you are talking about a gambling game without a limit, it is a no-limit poker game in my district when you talk about this kind of dough.

I say to the Members that you are not fooling the people, although you do in this bill, because we say to the public that there is a spending limit of $75,000 on each election, because if you will go back and check you will find that we have a nice little sweetener in there.

Do you know what that nice little sweetener is—$18,750 a year that we are going to be allowed to spend over and above the $75,000 in order to be able to raise the money to get the $75,000.

I think that on page 12 we should have another amendment to allow us 10 percent on $25,000 so we could raise $25,000 so we could raise the $75,000, because I do not know how we can raise the $18,000 if we do not have any allowance to do it with.

This means that each man and woman in this room can spend $93,750 for a primary, a special runoff, and a general election.

I do not know how you fellows raise your money or where you get it; it is none of my business, but I know one thing: That in 43 years of public life I do not believe that I have spent the total that you are allowing for your next campaign for one Member of this House, and I ran for the U.S. Senate in between times. I do not understand where this money comes from.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. THOMPSON of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I regret having to oppose the amendment offered by my distinguished and good friend, the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. MATHIS) but I do so for two reasons:

In the course of the markup of this legislation we started with amounts as high as $125,000 for a primary, and another $125,000 for the general election. The concensus was rather overwhelming that that was indeed excessive. Nevertheless, outside groups were asking for sums infinitely greater than $75,000 which was the concensus of the committee.

Then $90,000 was tried, without success.

Finally it was agreed upon that, lower amounts having been defeated, that $75,000 would be adequate.

Mr. Chairman, I too have run a number of times. In fact, 10 times for Congress, to be exact, and only once did I find it necessary to raise and spend $72,000.

My average is considerably less than this. In my district, indeed in the State of New Jersey, we have no private television. New Jersey, being a very small State, is covered by the New York and Philadelphia stations. I do not find myself able, and never have found myself able, to buy television time. This does not apply, however, to a great many of my colleagues who must rely on the media and television, which in itself is a very expensive process.

I think that this sum is perfectly reasonable. I think that the individual candidate will make a judgment as to how much his constituency believes he should spend or how much he should not and will act accordingly. But at least here we have a real flexibility.

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THOMPSON of New Jersey. I yield to my friend, the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. UDALL).

Mr. UDALL. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I want to say that I commend the gentleman's committee on a very fine compromise here. They had some tough choices. In this case they made a very responsible choice.

We have had really two evils that outside groups, I think, have complained about. One was the enormous amount of money that some candidates were spending in congressional elections. The other evil was the so-called insulation of incumbents through low limits that permitted a real conscientious, sincere challenge of an incumbent. Here the gentleman has struck a balance. He has ended the outrage of a half million dollars being spent in House contests. At the same time he has given challengers and incumbents the right amount to spend, an adequate amount to make their case. I think this is a good, sound, and compromising balance, and I would hate to see it upset.

Mr. MATHIS of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THOMPSON of New Jersey. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. MATHIS of Georgia. I certainly want to thank the gentleman from Arizona for not endorsing my amendment.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in opposition to the amendment.

(Mr. FRENZEL asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. GUDE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENZEL. I yield to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. GUDE. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I rise in opposition to the amendment. I do feel this is an antichallenger amendment and we should vote it down. I believe that the committee has struck a good balance in providing a limitation which gives incumbents and challengers equal opportunities for success as far as campaign financing is concerned.

(Mr. GUDE asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. FRENZEL. I thank the gentleman for his contribution.

Mr. Chairman, the committee has done its best to find a middle ground in candidate expenditures. Like the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. MICHEL) I really think there should be a greater expenditure allowed, because I found that in the very few incumbent races in 1972 where about a dozen challengers beat incumbents, the average expenditure was about $120,000. The average expenditure of all candidates for Congress in the general elections is much less, of course—between $30 and $40,000. Most of those races are perfunctory pro forma races that do not need anything. All the action is in about 40 races. Each district is different. We need the higher limits unless we are going to be guilty of the charge that we are protecting ourselves.

If we accept he amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia, we will be guilty, in my judgment, of the very strongest kind of incumbent protection. Judged by the basis of the other democracies in the world, the United States ranks in the middle or lower third of expenditures per capita for its election processes. Its average expenses are well below those of the average parliamentary democracy.

It makes no sense to relate our expenditures to our salaries, since most of us do not contribute to our own campaigns. Anyway, under this law we are now passing, the contribution limit will be restricted to $1,000, so there will be no undue influence from any particular individual or group of individuals.

Mr. Chairman, I think it would be a dreadful mistake if we mess up the delicate balance of this bill by accepting the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENZEL. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I wish to associate myself with the remarks of the gentleman from Minnesota and point out just a couple of other things.

The reason why some candidates spend a great deal more money than the salary involved and the reason why people are willing to put that kind of money and contributions into a race is because the Congress disposes of, not just $42,500 a year per Member, but hundreds of millions of dollars per year per Member. That is why this is an important thing to a great many people who are interested in what happens to their taxes and to the affairs of this country.

We just cannot afford to put ourselves into the position of protecting the incumbent and locking out the challenger. My campaign committee spent twice $42,500 in my first race, and if they had not, I probably would not be here. It took a large amount of media coverage just to acquaint the voters with the fact that I existed and with the issues as I saw them. I was an unknown running against a 20-year incumbent whose name was a household word.

Now that I am here, I am not going to vote to make it next to impossible for other challengers to do the same sort of thing. The possibility of effective challenge helps keep the system open and keep us on our toes.

Mr. FRENZEL. I thank the gentleman. I assure him that some of my best friends are incumbents and I would even let my daughter marry one.

Basically, while the incumbents are good people and deserve to be reelected, let us not let ourselves open to criticism by making it impossible for a challenger to unseat us.

Mr. SEIBERLING. If the gentleman will yield further, I would like to point out one other thing, and a crucial thing, which is that under this bill the amount of money that can be spent by a candidate from his own pocket and the amounts that can be given by a single contributor are limited. That will keep the spending down, and avoids putting an arbitrary ceiling on total expenditures.

Mr. FRENZEL. I thank the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENZEL. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the chairman of the subcommittee (Mr. DENT).

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, all the talk I hear is of incumbents, as if spending is the answer. But our records do not show that. I invite the Members to come to my office and examine them. High spending is not the answer to elections. The key to election is the same old fundamentals, such as the character of the person running, what kind of person he is, what kind of life he lives, what kind of community spirit he exhibits. It is not the total amount of money.

Mr. FRENZEL. I thank the gentleman for his contribution. If the gentleman did support the limitation of in kind contributions I would be more sympathetic.

Mr. GAYDOS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I will not use all the time unless my good friend, the gentleman from Pennsylvania (JOHN DENT) asks me to yield, but I do want to make one point.

It has been admitted repeatedly that this is a compromise. The members of the committee compromised. What did we compromise and because of whom? We compromised because outfits such as Common Cause and, without mentioning them specifically, others pressured the committee and put forth their positions. Everybody had their input except one very vital segment of America, and that is the people of this country; the constituents of the Members and my constituents. They were not consulted.

The amendment is a reasonable amendment. The $42,500 is a good response to taxpayers who raise the question repeatedly, and this is by far the greater percentage of the criticism which has been raised. What is the outcry? Why run for a job that pays $42,500 a year?

Now, I submit for the consideration of this House that the committee has repeatedly admitted that $75,000 is a compromise. I ask the Members to use their good judgment and respond by supporting the realistic amount of $42,500 for each election.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GAYDOS. I yield to my colleague, the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. DENT. The gentleman from Ohio said that he spent twice the $42,500, if he had not, he would not be here.

I thought the gentleman had such sterling character that he would be here if he spent one-third of that amount. If he could spend $15,000 and get elected, would the gentleman say the other fellow would have to spend $175,000 to beat him?

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, I would say if a man has been in office for some time, everybody knows who he is. But if they do not know his opponent, John Smith, John Smith has to spend a certain minimum to acquaint the electorate with the simple fact that he exists.

Mr. DENT. The only problem with that is that not one Member of Congress was born an incumbent. We all had to start sometime.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to say, I am just trying to defend the committee amendment, but some of the people speaking for it are almost convincing me not to defend it any more.

Now, my dear friend, the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. SEIBERLING) said he spent that money and that is how he got here. He would have got here if he had stayed home in bed, because his incumbent opponent had ceased to serve the district, and the district knew it.

The gentleman from Ohio (Mr. SEIBERLING) had one other advantage. He had a well-known name. I remember when I was a kid in Ohio there was a sign with a little boy in pajamas holding a candle and it said, "Time to retire. Get a Seiberling."

Mr. SEIBERLING. I have to correct the gentleman. It said, "Time to retire. Get a Fisk."

Mr. HAYS. Anyway, it was a well-known name in Akron.

I might say that one time in my career I had an opponent who said he spent a quarter of a million dollars. That is the year I spent $42,000.

I am going to defend the committee amendment; but just let me say that incumbency is no sure way to stay in office, unless at the same time, unless we continue to serve the needs of our districts and if we do that, we can stay in for $3.95, and if we do not, we could not stay in for $395,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to state a problem, so that the Members will understand the dilemma of the Chair correctly.

The Chair is supposed to recognize Members, taking into account three factors: First, membership on the committee; second, alternation between the two sides of the issue; and, third, alternation between the two sides of the aisle.

The Chair, therefore, is going to inquire of each Member as he initially recognizes him, for what purpose does the gentleman rise, so that the Chair will be aided in being fair in presiding over the debate.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. GAYDOS) for approximately one-half minute.

Mr. GAYDOS. I thank the Chair.

As a concluding observation for the consideration of my colleagues, since we must have a limitation, I pose the question, what is wrong with the salary pertaining to the office?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KOCH. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, on a number of occasions in the course of this debate Members have risen to in some way or other correlate the congressional salary of $42,500 with what they think appropriate to spend in running for office, as though there were anybody in this Chamber who believed that they should run for this office and pay all the expenses of the campaign themselves. I doubt there is a single person who has done that or would advocate it. Indeed, in our legislation we limit what any one of us can pay toward his own campaign, to prevent the rich man from buying the election.

Would anyone suggest that a Member of the other body running for office, who also gets $42,500 should spend $42,500 to run for that office, or that the President who gets $200,000 should run on a campaign budget of $200,000? That simply would make no sense.

Now, what the committee tried to do was this. It sought to make it possible for someone who has not run for office to run and not feel that that person had been shut out simply by virtue of not being able to spend the reasonable sums necessary for the media, for the mailings, for the radio, or for television in that particular district necessary to acquaint voters with his or her positions on issues.

In my own district, on each occasion that I have run, my opponent spent either one and a half, twice as much, and in one case, three times that which I spent. I am proud of the fact that I won without equaling those expenditures, but that does not affect the basic issue.

The basic issue was and is this, especially in my second and third terms: The people in my district knew me. The people in my district did not have to have the mailings and radio and television that my opponents thought were necessary for them to become known. I would feel, if I deprived my opponent of spending a reasonable sum—and I am not now talking about the sums the chairman of the subcommittee referred to when he talked about $150,000, $200,000 and more, sums that are not in this bill. I am talking of a reasonable sum, which $75,000 is.

Again this bill permits $75,000 to be spent. Another non sequitur has been introduced that someone referred to $17,500 above the $75,000, was referred to. Do the Members know what that money is? Let me tell you: When a Member has a dinner and the cost of the meat and potatoes and stamps for mailing for that dinner comes to x number of dollars, a maximum of 25 percent of whatever the Member has raised may be deducted for expenses. Does that not make sense? I think it does.

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KOCH. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the gentleman yielding to me. I want to associate myself with his remarks.

As the Members know, in the committee I was the sponsor of the $75,000 amendment. I would like to point out to the members of the committee that we have 435 districts in the United States. There were many figures put forth; $100,000, $125,000, $150,000. I studied all of these figures and thought that I came out with a reasonable figure.

The size of districts are different. Some are concentrated in cities and some have 20 and 40 counties. There is nothing in this law that says a candidate must spend $75,000. If he does not need $75,000 to get elected, he may spend $50,000 or less, but let us not take this on a personal basis per district.

Each Member knows what the needs of his district are. We are trying to cover all of the districts. We are not saying that a candidate must spend $75,000, but we are trying to establish that this is not an incumbency bill, and we are saying to the people who are our opponents, that they can raise $75,000 to spend $75,000 and to run for this high office as a Member of the Congress of the United States.

So, I want to urge my colleagues to vote down the amendment and support the committee.

Mr. BRADEMAS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KOCH. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. BRADEMAS. Mr. Chairman, I cannot match the eloquence of my Mediterranean friend from Illinois, but I am delighted to associate myself with his remarks, as well as those of the gentleman from New York (Mr. KOCH), and to oppose this amendment. I see that the gavel is about to fall, and would therefore urge defeat of the amendment.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to make a unanimous-consent request, and would like to explain my reasons for it.

I made a commitment to the leadership that I would try to ask the committee to rise by 5:15 so that the leadership can bring up the television resolution—which may be a moot thing—but they want to bring it up in any case. I was wondering if we could finish debate by sometime around there.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this amendment close at 5:20.

I do not propose to use any time myself.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Members standing at the time the unanimous-consent request was made will be recognized for three-quarters of 1 minute each.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York (Mr. PIKE).

(By unanimous consent, Mrs. MINK yielded her time to Mr. PIKE.)

(Mr. PIKE asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. PIKE. Mr. Chairman, I have heard so much about the advantages to an incumbent. I want to just tell the Members of my own personal experience. I ran for office the first time, and I spent $7,000. The district happened to be Republican 3-to-1 against me, and I lost by 40,000 votes.

I ran again, and I spent $12,000, and I was elected. It was the same district. It was still 3-to-1 Republican.

People do not vote for incumbents unless they are doing a decent job. They are just as willing to vote against incumbents if they do not think they are doing a decent job.

Nobody in my district says that he voted for Richard Nixon, but says that he voted against GEORGE MCGOVERN.

Mr. Chairman, it is very rarely that I rise in support of an amendment of the gentleman from Georgia or even agree with him philosophically, but the number $42,500 is not there just because it is the salary of a Congressman. It is there because spending $75,000 is just too much money to spend on a congressional campaign.

If I do not need to spend $75,000 in my district, if I can get elected by spending $12,000, and I have never come anywhere near $75,000 in my district, for Heaven's sake, why on Earth should anybody have to spend $75,000?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Missouri (Mr. BURLISON).

(Mr. BURLISON of Missouri asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BURLISON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I would like to commend my able friend, the gentleman from Georgia, on his amendment, and I rise in support of it.

I think that the figure of $93,000 for a primary campaign and $93,000 for a general election campaign is an unconscionably high ceiling. I believe that with this type of ceiling, Mr. Chairman, we are opening the door to blatant impropriety and fraud in our elections.

I know that there will be a dramatic increase in campaign spending when we vote public financing, which, though not in this bill at the present time, will surely come. When we have public financing, you can be sure each candidate will utilize the full amount of the ceiling.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. JAMES V. STANTON).

Mr. JAMES V. STANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ran for Congress against a 28-year incumbent, and I spent $38,000, and I beat him. I got 65 percent of the vote in the primary.

If we want a lesson out of Watergate, the lesson ought to be: Cut down the amount of money you spend in a campaign.

I see the leading reformers of this House trying to urge the expenditure of $93,000 in a primary and $93,000 in a general election, and I think that is unconscionable. I do not think the American people want anything other than the reduction of money spent in elections.

Mr. Chairman, I support the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. MATHIS).

(By unanimous consent, Mr. DENHOLM yield his time to Mr. DAVIS of South Carolina.)

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. DAVIS).

Mr. DAVIS of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment.

Mr. MATHIS of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS of South Carolina. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. MATHIS of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from South Carolina, my dear friend, for yielding.

I would like to make one observation as we come to the critical moment of voting on my amendment. That is that none of my so-called liberal reform-minded friends who have risen to oppose this amendment can give me a good reason for their position. That gives me a little cause to pause and wonder about how serious they are about campaign reform.

When these Members go back to their districts and they are stumping among their people this year and they are asked what they did about campaign reform, are they going to tell their people, "I supported a bill that provided for the expenditure of $280,000 by any candidate for Congress in any election year"?

That is simply not campaign reform, I submit.

Mr. Chairman, I thank my friend, the gentleman from South Carolina, for yielding, and I again urge support for my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. BREAUX).

Mr. BREAUX. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment.

I wish to point out that although some Members think this is an incumbent provision, I think that the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. JAMES V. STANTON) is correct when he says that this is plenty of money, that this is enough money.

Mr. Chairman, I urge, again, support for the amendment.

(By unanimous consent, Messrs. HANRAHAN and ANNUNZIO yielded their time to Mr. MICHEL.)

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. MICHEL).

(Mr. MICHEL asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. MATHIS) may very well play well in Albany as it would play well in Peoria, my hometown.

However, I do not think we can take that parochial a view concerning an amendment of this kind. We must look at the affect it would have throughout the balance of the country.

Frankly, if the gentleman would couple his proposal here with one to make fully accountable and reportable every inkind contribution, then he would be making a real valuable contribution, because in four of the five special elections we held earlier this year there were over $50,000 worth of inkind unreportable, unaccountable expenditures.

A few weeks ago our friend, SAM YOUNG, who is running against our former colleague, Ab Mikva, up in the suburban district of Chicago challenged Ab to limit his campaign to $100,000. Ab turned him down. Incidentally, there was also another challenge: "Let us not take money from out of State." And Ab turned down this challenge.

The point I am making here, as my good friend, the gentleman from Illinois, has said, is this: It is different in Peoria than it is in the suburban districts of Chicago, New York, or any of the other metropolitan centers of this country.

I personally said at the outset of this debate that I was less than enthusiastic about doing anything with respect to broad, sweeping reform since it is such a difficult job to write this legislation and apply it nationally under different kinds of conditions which do exist throughout this country.

Mr. Chairman, I think the committee is to be commended for taking all of these factors into account and coming up with the figure in this bill, which I personally think is too low, even though I have never spent that much money in my own case. However, I feel I must take a national view, as I think all of us on both sides of the aisle should.

Mr. Chairman, I urge defeat of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. MATHIS of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MICHEL. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. MATHIS of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman that inkind contributions are covered in this legislation, and the gentleman from Georgia supported those amendments in committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York (Mr. BINGHAM).

(Mr. BINGHAM asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I think the point has been well made that what we are dealing with here is a national problem. Many of the Members who have spoken in favor of this amendment reflect their own personal experiences. This is natural. But there are other Members with very different personal experiences. We have to provide a ceiling that is reasonable, that allows challengers in all types of districts throughout the country to make a realistic challenge. That is why this is a national problem, and that is why the committee has proposed a higher figure than had been agreed upon by the committee when the committee considered the last campaign spending regulation bill. The figure reflects a realistic estimate under current circumstances.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York (Mr. LENT).

(Mr. LENT asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. LENT. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. MATHIAS).

In the past 2 years, we have seen how big money can corrupt our electoral process. And while some of my colleagues might feel that the spending limit proposed in this amendment is too low, I believe that strong medicine is needed to ensure that the events of the past 2 years are not repeated.

Significantly lower spending limits will have several positive effects. First, they will make candidates conduct campaigns which will put them in constant personal contact with the people. In addition, they will remove the financial barriers which currently stand in the way of the average citizen's ability to run for political office. Most importantly, they will reduce the necessity to accept or become dependent upon money from special interest groups and wealthy contributors.

The average citizen has a great deal of difficulty understanding how candidates can spend $100,000 in 3 months in quest of an office that pays a salary of $42,500 per year. Indeed, it sometimes appears that high political office is for sale, and we must prove to the American people that such is not the case. In 1972, congressional candidates on Long Island spent an average of $45,000 each. For the most part they proved that campaigns can be run on reasonable budgets, and I believe that other candidates throughout the country will find that they, too, can conduct successful campaigns given the same financial restrictions.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Nebraska (Mr. THONE).

(By unanimous consent, Mr. THONE yielded his time to Mr. FRENZEL.)

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. UDALL).

(Mr. UDALL asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Chairman, the supporters of this amendment seem to assume that we have to spend the $75,000. I have never spent much more than $40,000, nor have my opponents, but there are 435 districts in our country, and they all vary.

We have kicked around a lot of different values, some of them indefensible, some of them far too low. I heard in the cloakroom about a colleague running for a statewide office, and he was joking. He lost, and he said that his colleague had committed an unfair campaign practice. I asked him what that was, and he said that his opponent had gone all throughout the State referring to him a "Congressman So-and-So."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. BRADEMAS).

(Mr. BRADEMAS asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BRADEMAS. Mr. Chairman, there are 435 different congressional districts in the United States, and as we have already observed during the debate, the circumstances under which a campaign is conducted are different in each district.

In my own district, for example, television is very important, because we have three television stations and it is used by most candidates for the House of Representatives. In Cook County, however, it is not used because the cost is prohibitive. That is just one example.

The committee has tried to come up with a reasonable and fair amount and I hope the amendment is rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. FRENZEL).

Mr. REGULA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENZEL. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

(Mr. REGULA asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. REGULA. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the propositions that our Federal election laws are in need of strengthening and what is popularly called reform.

The other body acted early in this Congress on election reform passing a measure in November of last year.

Both that proposal and the proposal we are considering here on the floor recognize the need for reform but they answer that need by injecting the Treasury of the Federal Government into the breech, though in differing degrees.

I have no quarrel with laudable proposals which recognize that moderate Federal support in addition to contributions from the private sector can provide an important and healthy avenue for citizens to participate in the electoral process.

Indeed, a candidate's right to public funds ought to be measured by his ability to obtain grass root support—that includes support from small contributors.

In 1973, I polled the constituents of my district and 1 of the 10 questions I asked was "Should Federal tax dollars be used to finance election campaigns?"

The response that I received was 71.4 percent in the negative. Again, in June of this year, I asked the same question. The response again was overwhelmingly in the negative, 63.1 percent responding "No."

In August, 1973, I introduced my own version of election campaign reform legislation. My bill contains many of the provisions contained in this bill we are now considering. My approach to limiting contributions is, however, designed to make it more attractive to small contributors to participate in the election process. Rather than Federal subsidies, which surely must come from the taxpayer and must be distributed by an additional layer of Federal bureaucracy with all its attendant expense, I prefer amending the tax laws to increase credit and deduction allowances for limited political contributions thereby encouraging such contributions and preserving freedom of choice in making contributions.

It seems, however, that any proposal amending the tax laws as my bill would do, is inevitably lost in the morass of tax bills piled at the door of the House Ways and Means Committee.

The intent of the 1971 Federal Elections Campaign Act—accountability—is what needs strengthening in my opinion. I shall therefore support the amendments that will be offered by my colleague, Mr. FRENZEL, to establish a more independent administration and enforcement agency. Further, I will support amendments that will be offered by my distinguished colleagues, Messrs. BROWN, BUTLER, DUPONT, MICHEL, ANDERSON, and FRENZEL that would prohibit the pooling of funds and require that contributions be identified as to original donors and that would limit the proliferation of political committees which are designed to circumvent the contribution limitations contained in the bill.

I believe it should be unlawful for any person, other than a candidate, an official national party committee or any official congressional or Senate Campaign Committee to make directly or indirectly contributions or expenditures on behalf of any candidate in any calendar year. One and only one committee should be authorized by a candidate to act for him and in his behalf and that that committee should be held accountable along with the candidate to the independent administration and enforcement agency envisioned by the supporters of the amendment that will be offered.

Because we have experienced flagrant violations of the intent and even the letter of our existing election campaign laws is no reason, to change the good, our time honored system of campaigning for grassroots support, while trying to insure adherence to reasonable standards of decency and integrity. I shall therefore oppose amendments providing for Federal subsidies to congressional candidates.

I commend to my colleagues attention the editorial view of the Christian Science Monitor contained in Tuesdays edition.

One key question to be debated is that of public financing itself. Its supporters (including Common Cause) see it as an effort to reduce the pressure of the pocketbook on candidates, with all the attendant potential for abuse. Its opponents (including a majority of the Senate Watergate committee itself) argue that, in Jefferson's words, "to compel a man to furnish contributions of money for the propagation of opinions which he disbelieves and abhors, is sinful and tyrannical." They predict excessive Federal bureaucracy and control in conflict with the First Amendment right of free political expression.

This question deserves the fullest debate. If public financing is accepted, it should apply to all Federal candidates. But it should be recognized that public financing of itself does not necessarily mean political reform. In some European and Asian countries with public financing, there have been problems of unstable coalition governments and influence by special-interest groups representing religions or occupations, for example rather than money. With or without public financing, campaign reform must extend to party and electoral reform—as well as to that individual integrity without which any legislation must fall short.

(Mr. FRENZEL asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, the statement that was made by the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. ANNUNZIO) really sums up my feelings on this matter. The committee looked into high numbers and looked into low numbers. We tried to accommodate the different circumstances existing in the different districts. In one district it is better to campaign through the mails; in another through television; another in other ways; some direct; some more expensive and some cheaper.

What we tried to do was pick a figure that would not provide our opponent, our challenger, with the right to criticize us for unfairly protecting ourselves.

I think we have found a reasonable figure. In fact, I would like it higher. I think it would be a terrible mistake if we accepted the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. MATHIAS).

Do not confuse preventing your opponent from having an honest chance with reform. There is no reform in squashing your oppositon before he starts.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. HAYS) to close debate.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. MATHIS).

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

RECORDED VOTE

Mr. MATHIS of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I demand a recorded vote.

A recorded vote was ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—ayes 187, noes 223, not voting 24, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BOLLING, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H.R. 16090) to impose overall limitations on campaign expenditures and political contributions; to provide that each candidate for Federal office shall designate a principal campaign committee; to provide for a single reporting responsibility with respect to receipts and expenditures by certain political committees; to change the times for the filing of reports regarding campaign expenditures and political contributions; to provide for public financing of Presidential nominating conventions and Presidential primary elections; and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may revise and extend their remarks and include extraneous matter on the bill under discussion today (H.R. 16090).

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

DISCHARGING COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY FROM CONSIDERATION OF S. 2201 AND REFERRING SENATE BILL TO COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC WORKS

Mr. DONOHUE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from the consideration of the Senate bill (S. 2201) to provide for the settlement of damage claims arising out of certain actions by the United States in opening certain spillways to avoid flooding populated areas, and that it be rereferred to the Committee on Public Works.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

TELEVISION AND RADIO BROADCAST OF PROCEEDINGS OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up House Resolution 802 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution as follows:

H. RES. 802

Whereas clause 33 of rule XI of the Rules of the House of Representatives provides for coverage by television and radio broadcast of committee hearings which are open to the public; and

Whereas there is no provision in said rules for coverage by television and radio broadcast of proceedings in the House Chamber, except that such coverage is prohibited by the ruling of previous Speakers of the House; and

Whereas it is probable that there will be brought to the floor of the House for its consideration the question of the impeachment of the President of the United States; and

Whereas the question of the impeachment of the President is of such historic and national importance as to command the keen interest of every American throughout the Nation; and

Whereas television and radio facilities are available to broadcast throughout the Nation the historic proceedings in the Chamber of the House on the question of the impeachment of the President; and

Whereas it is in the national interest that the historic debate be broadcast by radio and television facilities throughout the Nation: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That, notwithstanding any ruling or custom to the contrary, the proceedings in the Chamber of the House of Representatives on any resolution to impeach the President of the United States may be broadcast by radio and television facilities.

SEC. 2. The Speaker of the House of Representatives is authorized to appoint a committee of five members, including the majority and minority leaders, to provide such arrangements as may be necessary in connection with such broadcast.

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out all after the resolving clause and insert:

That, notwithstanding any rule, ruling, or custom to the contrary, the proceedings in the Chamber of the House of Representatives relating to the resolution reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, recommending the impeachment of Richard M. Nixon, President of the United States, may be broadcast by radio and television and may be open to photographic coverage, subject to the provisions of section 2 of this resolution.

SEC. 2. A special committee of four members, composed of the majority and minority leaders of the House, and the majority and minority whips of the House, is hereby authorized to arrange for the coverage made in order by this resolution and to establish such regulations as they may deem necessary and appropriate with respect to such broadcast or photographic coverage: Provided, however, That any such arrangements or regulations shall be subject to the final approval of the Speaker; and if the special committee or the Speaker shall determine that the actual coverage is not in conformity with such arrangements and regulations, the Speaker is authorized and directed to terminate or limit such coverage in such manner as may protect the interests of the House of Representatives.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

(Mr. MADDEN asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, House Resolution 802 provides that the proceedings in the Chamber of the House of Representatives relating to the resolution reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, recommending the impeachment of Richard Nixon, President of the United States, may be broadcast by radio and television and may be open to photographic coverage. House Resolution 802 provides for a special committee of four Members, the majority and minority leaders of the House of Representatives and the majority and minority whips of the House of Representatives, to arrange for the radio, television, and photographic coverage. Their arrangements shall be subject to the final approval of the Speaker of the House. If the special committee or the Speaker shall determine that the actual coverage is not in conformity with the promulgated arrangements and regulations, the Speaker is authorized to terminate the coverage in a manner consistent with the interests of the House of Representatives.

On July 22 the Committee on Rules recommended and the House approved, House Resolution 1107, introduced by the gentleman from Utah (Mr. OWENS) providing for a change in the Rules of the House of Representatives to allow broadcasting of committee meetings. The Committee on the Judiciary's proceedings relating to the impeachment of President Richard Nixon were broadcast and the people of the United States were given an opportunity to view the proceedings in their entirety.

It is now appropriate that under the terms of House Resolution 802 the American people be allowed to observe the House of Representatives consideration of articles of impeachment against Richard Nixon, President of the United States. The praiseworthy manner in which the Committee on the Judiciary conducted its meetings on impeachment is one of the strongest arguments that can be advanced for broadcasting the House debate on impeachment.

The American public and the Members of this body owe a debt of gratitude to the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. YATES), the author of House Resolution 802 and who for the last 6 months has shared his views on this matter of vital importance with the Members of Congress, the media, and the public. He is to be commended for perseverance, persistence, diligence, and good judgment.

Mr. Speaker, broadcasting of the House of Representatives impeachment proceedings will present to the American people the factual charges and arguments in a more complete and totally different perspective than from the printed media. Broadcasting and photography will complement the coverage by the printed media. The electronic media are part of today's life. It must be allowed to broadcast in its entirety the most important issue of our time—the debate in the Chamber of the House of Representatives concerning the articles of impeachment against Richard Nixon, President of the United States. I respectfully urge the adoption of House Resolution 802.

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

(Mr. LATTA asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Speaker, I will inform my good friend, the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. MADDEN), that I agree with every word he said about this resolution. I support it.

Just let me commend my good friend, the gentleman from Illinois, for his foresight and his good judgment and also his perseverance in seeing to it that this resolution was brought before the Committee on Rules and now before the House for its consideration.

I would just like to mention that the resolution provides for a very good committee composed of 4 members, the majority leader, the minority leader, the majority whip, and the minority whip.

The regulations shall be subject to the final approval of the Speaker, and I am sure that the Speaker will see to it that if and when these proceedings are televised, we will have gavel-to-gavel coverage.

We will have no commentary, and we will have no commercials. I think this is most important.

I, for one, from all reports that we have had on the coverage of the Committee on the Judiciary, would like to commend the networks for their coverage of those proceedings. I think we have received nothing but praise for the way they have handled the coverage.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LATTA. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Is it clearly understood that the arrangements and the regulations promulgated by the special committee of four Members will deal exclusively and only with the television and radio coverage of the House proceedings?

Mr. LATTA. It also takes care of photographic coverage. There is some provision for still cameras, as I understand it, and that is the reason the language appears on page 2, lines 16 and 17: "and may be open to photographic coverage."

Mr. GROSS. Well, is it clearly understood that these arrangements and regulations will apply only to photographic coverage and to television and radio coverage and will not go to regulations governing the Members of the House of Representatives?

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Speaker, that is my understanding.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman.

Mr. MILFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LATTA. I am happy to yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. MILFORD. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Do I understand the gentleman to say that there will be a prohibition against commercials during the broadcasting of these proceedings?

Mr. LATTA. That is correct.

Mr. VAN DEERLIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LATTA. I will be happy to yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. VAN DEERLIN. Mr. Speaker, in addition to the ban on commercials, I understood the gentleman from Ohio to say that there would be a ban on commentaries?

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Speaker, let me say to the gentleman from California that they will follow the same procedure that they followed at the time the hearings in the Committee on the Judiciary were being televised.

I think that they restricted themselves very well. We have no complaints, or I at least have no complaints.

Mr. VAN DEERLIN. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield further, I agree that while the Committee on the Judiciary handled itself in a manner that has reflected credit on the full House, it seemed to me that the network coverage of those proceedings was also of the highest order. The gentleman has cited radio and television coverage of the Committee on the Judiciary as an example of what we seek to achieve. I judge then, that the gentleman would not seek to impose a gag rule against any explanatory efforts by network personnel, in the same manner as was done at the committee hearings.

Mr. LATTA. That is a matter that will be taken up by the committee, and will have the final approval of the Speaker. I am sure that whatever regulations they come up with will meet the approval of the House.

Mr. VAN DEERLIN. The gentleman from Ohio is the only one who said there was going to be a ban on commentaries.

Mr. LATTA. May I just suggest to the gentleman from California that I had reference to the time prior to the Committee on the Judiciary hearings being held. At that time we said we did not want somebody saying that this was Mr. Such-and-So, or this is Mr. So-and-So, and he going to say such and such, and that we rather interpret his remarks as such and such.

I think—and I am expressing my own personal opinion—that every Member of this House knows what he is attempting to say in the well of the House without somebody telling the American people what he is saying.

Mr. VAN DEERLIN. If the gentleman will yield still further, the gentleman, I am sure, can recognize that in radio coverage of the hearings, where there is no possibility for visual identification or for any announcement on the screen, it is necessary for a radio anchor man to indicate who is speaking when a Member's voice comes in.

The gentleman would not want to reduce that kind of coverage, would he?

Mr. LATTA. Absolutely not.

Mr. VAN DEERLIN. I just think it is important while we are taking this step, to make certain that we are not establishing, as the sense of Congress, that we wish to impose any restrictions over camera coverage, or voice coverage of these proceedings that were not present in the Judiciary Committee broadcasts.

Mr. LATTA. Let me just mention to the gentleman from California that there will be some restrictions on the camera coverage. As I understand, there will be only three cameras, and they will be focused on the tables here, on the well, and on the Chair.

Mr. VAN DEERLIN. Does the gentleman mean that this has been decided upon already?

Mr. LATTA. It was pointed out before the Committee on Rules that that was the understanding. They are not going to be panning the entire Chamber, and they will not be panning the galleries. They will be focused on these tables here, in the well, and on the Chair.

Mr. VAN DEERLIN. Will the gentleman yield still further?

Mr. LATTA. I will be happy to.

Mr. VAN DEERLIN. Mr. Speaker, I would say to the gentleman from Ohio that that is not set forth in the resolution.

Mr. LATTA. I am telling the gentleman what the understanding is.

Mr. VAN DEERLIN. It makes it a little difficult for some of the Members to know what is going on, inasmuch as we appear to be creating a new committee to determine these important details.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, does the gentleman know whether we will have these floodlights on, and that we will have to live with those floodlights on for some 24 hours a day?

Mr. LATTA. The question arose at the time of the hearings before the Committee on the Judiciary being televised as to whether or not the lights would be on high for them or on dim. If you want to appear in color you will have to have the bright lights.

Mr. GROSS. I do not care to appear in living color.

Mr. YATES. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LATTA. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. YATES. Mr. Speaker, with respect to the question that was raised by the gentleman from California, I spoke to the Speaker a few moments ago, and the regulations respecting the televising will be worked out between the broadcasting companies and the committee that is to be appointed under this resolution.

The primary coverage as pointed out by the gentleman from Ohio will be in the well and on the committee table. But the Speaker has indicated that will not be the total coverage; that in order to have the same kind of coverage that we had during the Committee on the Judiciary proceedings, it left the Speaker ing that Congress would have an opportunity to review this matter before the new authorization expries in 1977. By then, we will have almost 3 years of experience with the new direction being charted for OPIC and can determine whether to reaffirm or alter our judgment.

The reinsurance formula adopted by the conferees is from the House bill. It provides that private insurance companies shall accept specific portions of liability "to the maximum extent possible." The Senate formula was more rigid, in that it would have required private insurers to accept annual losses equal to 50 percent of the largest amount of insurance they had outstanding in the country with the largest exposure, before OPIC could pay any reinsurance. The fact is that OPIC is now negotiating arrangements that would reduce its own involvement below hte level sought by the Senate, but which technically would not comply with the Senate formula. The conferees agreed that the flexibility in the House language was preferable.

On other significant issues, the House conferees receded from the House provision specifically directing OPIC to serve as an active broker between the development plans of eligible countries and the investment interests of U.S. investors. This is a function which OPIC has performed and which the conferees believe should be continued. They receded only on the understanding that a specific directive was redundant with the authority already contained in section 234 (d) of the Foreign Assistance Act.

Both bills provided that OPIC could seek appropriations from Congress only when its insurance reserve falls below $25 million. At present, OPIC has reserves substantially in excess of that figure, so the House conferees receded from delaying this limitation until after the appropriations for fiscal 1975.

The House bill provided for the expansion of the agricultural credit and self-help community development program. The Senate conferees objected to giving OPIC enlarged responsibilities at a time when its role will otherwise be contracting. The House conferees agreed, and it is now contemplated that the program will be shifted to AID where there will be room for the desired expansion.

The conferees accepted the House provision barring OPIC from granting coverage to "runaway" plant—those whose establishment would significantly diminish the number of U.S. jobs provided by the investor.

The conferees also resolved conflicting guidance contained in committee reports of the two bodies with respect to future OPIC operations in Indochina. It is the declared intent of the conferees that OPIC consult with the House Foreign Affairs Committee and the Senate Foreign Relations Committee when Indochina investment plans are formulated and as those plans evolve. Further, it is our expressed view that OPIC should not insure any large U.S. private investments in Indochina unless significant private insurance participation is obtained or until specific instructions are received from both Houses of Congress. These restraints are designed to permit carefully planned operations in Indochina that will not produce added political engagement by the U.S. Government in that troubled part of the world.

Mr. Speaker, I urge adoption of the conference report.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULVER. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

(Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. Speaker, this conference report represents agreement on an extension of the statutory authority for the Overseas Private Investment Corporation.

I am pleased to express my strong support for this report which, in my opinion, represents a good compromise with the Senate position. I would like to emphasize that the House conferees sustained the House position on the major issues in conference.

On the single most important issue—the reinsurance formula—the Senate accepted the House position, which requires private insurance companies to accept specified portions of liability "to the maximum extent possible," rather than the Senate's more rigid formula.

The conference also accepted the House position on extension of authority, agreeing to the 3-year extension granted in the House bill rather than the 2-year period provided in the Senate bill.

This legislation will enable OPIC to move ahead with plans to phase out its responsibilities as a primary insurer of overseas investment risks, with this function being taken over by private insurance companies while OPIC serves as a reinsurer. The conferees agreed that OPIC's role as a primary insurer should end on December 31, 1979, for expropriation and convertibility risks. Its role as a primary insurer for war risks would end a year later. However, I would point out that since this legislation provides a 3-year authorization, the Congress will have an opportunity in 1977 to evaluate its decision regarding OPIC's future role.

Mr. Speaker, I am pleased that OPIC's directions for the next 3 years have been successfully resolved by the conference, and I urge approval of the conference report.

Mr. CULVER. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the conference report.

The previous question was ordered.

The conference report was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. CULVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the conference report just agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

APPOINTMENT OF CONFEREES ON H.R. 16027, INTERIOR DEPARTMENT AND RELATED AGENCIES APPROPRIATIONS, 1975

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill, H.R. 16027, making appropriations for the Department of the Interior and related agencies for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1975, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments thereto, disagree to the Senate amendments, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas? The Chair hears none, and appoints the following conferees: Mrs. HANSEN of Washington and Messrs. YATES, MCKAY, LONG of Maryland, EVANS of Colorado, MAHON, MCDADE, WYATT, VEYSEY, and CEDERBERG.

EIGHTEENTH ANNUAL REPORT OF PRESIDENT ON TRADE AGREEMENTS PROGRAM—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES (H. DOC. NO. 93-334)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read and, together with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Ways and means and ordered to be printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

In accordance with section 402(a) of the Trade Expansion Act of 1962 (TEA), I transmit herewith the Eighteenth Annual Report of the President on the Trade Agreements Program. This report covers developments in the year ending December 31, 1973.

Last year was a particularly important one for United States and world trade, as this report demonstrates in detail. Unquestionably the highlight occurred last September in Tokyo, when the ministers of 105 sovereign nations joined to declare their support for a new round of multilateral trade negotiations, the seventh since the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT) was signed in 1947. This round represents a major initiative of the United States, along with initiatives in the international monetary field, begun in the fall of 1971. The charter for these negotiations, as embodied in the Declaration of Tokyo, is the most ambitious yet.

The purpose of these talks is no less than to modernize a world trading system which, though it has well served the world's peoples and brought about the many benefits of a four-fold expansion of trade, is no longer capable of responding to the needs and realities of a rapidly changing and increasingly interdependent world economy.

First, these talks are aimed not only at the continuing need to facilitate trade by lowering tariffs, but at reducing today's most pervasive and restrictive export inhibitors, so-called non-tariff trade barriers (NTBs). Unless these can be effectively dealt with, no major exporting nation—especially the United States—can hope to remain competitive in today's and tomorrow's world markets. And loss of competitiveness abroad can threaten the viability of firms and lead to loss of markets at home.

Second, the inflationary pressure of increased costs has become a major international problem which must be dealt with multilaterally if we are to adequately deal with inflation domestically.

Third, the need to maintain access to vital raw materials, energy, and food requires negotiated assurances for such access to supplies as well as to markets.

Fourth, economic issues should be managed and negotiated in parallel with political and security issues, in order to make progress on all three fronts.

Finally, we must encourage sovereign governments to work within an acceptable international framework to deal with such problems as import safeguards and export subsidies. At the same time we must have the authority to defend our legitimate national interests and manage domestic concerns in the context of an up-to-date, responsive and responsible international system.

None of these objectives can be accomplished without the appropriate legislative authorization. This authority—carefully balanced with provisions for the most effective Congressional and public participation in our trade policy-making and negotiating since GATT was formed—is represented in the Trade Reform Act, which I submitted to the Congress in April of 1973. This legislation, which passed the House by a margin of nearly two-to-one last December and is now pending in the Senate, is still urgently needed.

Time is now of the essence with regard to the trade bill. Our trading partners have demonstrated their willingness to use and improve multilateral channels for trade negotiation. Just this spring, the European Community negotiated a fair and equitable accord compensating us for tariff changes resulting from the enlargement of the European Common Market. Through the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD), ministers of member countries have joined with the U.S. in renouncing trade restrictive measures as balance-of-payments correctives, at least until the basic problems caused by oil price increases can be addressed through improvements in the monetary system. Developing countries, particularly our partners in Latin America, have indicated their willingness to work with us toward trade expansion and reform. As I have noted before, our new approaches to the socialist countries, especially to the USSR and the Peoples' Republic of China, hinge in large measure upon our ability to open up peaceful avenues of trade with them. Again, I have expressed my willingness to work with the Congress to find an acceptable formulation for this authority. In Geneva, the GATT Trade Negotiations Committee has announced a program of work for the fall to further prepare for the actual bargaining.

In short, the rest of the world is waiting for us at the trade negotiating table. The alternative is an indefinite period in which nations, including ours, will be forced to deal with increasingly complex and interdependent trade problems on an ad hoc basis. Experience has shown that this could lead to a proliferation of those problems and disputes over the best ways to resolve them. The adverse fallout from the resulting uncertainties and temptations of shortsighted unilateral actions could also seriously jeopardize gains we have made in the diplomatic and security fields.

For all these reasons, I take this occasion once again to urge prompt and final action on the Trade Reform Act. It is essential that we move ahead to revitalize the global trading system through multilateral negotiations.

RICHARD NIXON.

RESOLUTION PROVIDING FOR CONTINUITY OF U.S. FOREIGN POLICY

(Mr. FASCELL asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, in view of the exceptional circumstances facing the U.S. Government at the present time, I am today introducing a House resolution expressing the determination of the House that despite domestic difficulties we are united in support of a foreign policy designed to build a structure of peace in the world.

At a time when the Presidency may appear weakened and some may be tempted to take advantage of the United States, I believe it is urgent that we make totally clear to those abroad that our governmental difficulties stop at the water's edge. On the important issues of peace, war, and the fulfillment of our international obligations there should be no doubt that the Congress and the executive branch are prepared to continue to work together.

We are indeed fortunate to have such an able Secretary of State at the present time. He enjoys virtually unparalleled support in the Congress and I believe that swift passage of a resolution of this kind will strengthen his hand just at the time when some abroad may mistake the crisis of a President for the crisis of a nation.

FEDERAL ELECTION CAMPAIGN ACT AMENDMENTS OF 1974

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H.R. 16090) to impose overall limitations on campaign expenditures and political contributions; to provide that each candidate for Federal office shall designate a principal campaign committee; to provide for a single reporting responsibility with respect to receipts and expenditures by certain political committees; to change the times for the filing of reports regarding campaign expenditures and political contributions; to provide for public financing of Presidential nominating conventions and Presidential primary elections; and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. HAYS).

The motion was agreed to.

IN THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H.R. 16090), with Mr. BOLLING in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. When the Committee rose on yesterday, it was considering eligible amendments to title I of the bill, under the provisions of the rule adopted on yesterday and under the Chairman's statement of yesterday.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. BUTLER

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BUTLER: Page 13, after line 5 insert the following:

(b) Section 591 (e)(1) of Title 18, United States Code, relating to the definition of a contribution, is amended by inserting after the word "business" the following ", which shall be considered a loan by each endorser, in that proportion of the unpaid balance thereof that each endorser bears to the total number of endorsers)".

And renumber the following sections accordingly.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, under the proposed legislation limitations are placed on the amount of contributions to political campaigns. The word, "contribution," is defined under existing law.

Under that definition a loan is considered a contribution. An exception is made for loans by banks.

The proposed amendment would make loans by banks loans by the endorsers thereof as a contribution. The amount of the endorsement is charged as a contribution, a loan or a contribution, and it would be in the proportion of the total number of the endorsers on the loan. The amount of the contribution and loan would be the unpaid balance thereof.

Mr. Chairman, I am led to believe that this has the blessing of the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. HAYS), and I will yield to him if he wishes me to.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, as I understand the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. BUTLER), this would be a loan for a political campaign purpose?

Mr. BUTLER. That is correct.

Mr. HAYS. And not a loan for a private business purpose, or anything like that?

Mr. BUTLER. That is correct.

Mr. HAYS. Under these circumstances, and with that understanding, the Chairman on behalf of this side is prepared to accept the amendment.

Mr. YOUNG of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUTLER. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. YOUNG of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, the question occurs to me, supposing a candidate takes a loan for his campaign, supposing the candidate is temporarily out of funds, and he borrows $10,000. He goes to the bank, and he signs a note and gets $10,000 and puts it into his campaign account. Then, thereafter, as the campaign progresses and more money comes into the candidate from contributions, that loan is repaid to him, and he repays the bank. Is that going to put any limitation on the fact that he cannot ask for or contribute additional moneys? In other words, I would say to the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. BUTLER) will the $10,000 bank loan that was repaid prevent the candidate from contribuing an additional $25,000? Would the loan and the repayment of the loan be counted against the $25,000? I do not believe that it should so long as he does not make over $25,000 in contributions. A loan like that, an in-and-out loan certainly should not be counted against any such limitation.

Mr. BUTLER. The gentleman from Illinois is exactly right. The unpaid balance would indicate the contribution so that at any time the contributions could not exceed the limitation.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUTLER. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, I would state to the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. BUTLER) that this side has no objection to the amendment the gentleman has offered. I would comment that the $25,000 limitation applies to the candidate and his family and, in my judgment, the $1,000 contribution limitation might more properly apply to the candidate himself.

Mr. PARRIS. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, pursuing the line of questioning for the purpose of the RECORD, that the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. YOUNG) pursued, am I correct in my understanding that in the case of a hypothetical $10,000 loan that there would have to be 10 or more endorsers in order to limit the individual contribution apportioned to each endorser to a sum less than the $1,000 statutory individual limitation.

Mr. BUTLER. That would be correct.

Mr. PARRIS. I thank the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. BUTLER).

The amendment was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. HANRAHAN

Mr. HANRAHAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HANRAHAN: Page 11, line 10, strike out "which, in the aggre-" and all that follows down through line 13, and insert in lieu thereof "for Federal office.".

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will have to inform the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. HANRAHAN) that the gentleman's amendment is offered to page 11, which is not open for amendment under the provisions of the rules which govern the consideration of this bill.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment at the desk, and I request that the Chair look into the amendment to see whether or not it is in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will examine the amendment.

Mr. DENT. I believe it is, but I will await the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that there are two amendments to title I offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. DENT. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. Both of them are not in order under the rule.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

(Mr. DENT asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I accept, of course, the decision of the Chair, although I was informed by our legal rights that it was in order.

However, it is not that important. What is important is that the record be made on this particular amendment. It is not so much whether the figures are right; it is not so much whether it is the thing that we can do today; but it is something we should be thinking about. So I offered the amendment more to get before the House the proposition that ought to be considered very seriously in the very near future.

I have taken a very long, hard look at the problems surrounding campaign financing for many, many years, locally, countywise, Statewise, and nationally. I have said here on the floor that the time has come when we must consider that we have to provide some means of providing the sufficient capital to fund a campaign, one, an amount that will not be prohibitive, that will not set aside thousands of Americans who want to run for Congress and have every right to run for Congress, but under no conditions could they raise anywhere near the amount of money that we have established as a ceiling in this particular bill and in others.

I propose that some day this Congress will have the courage, and those who monitor Congress will have the wisdom, to increase the salary of Members of Congress to a point and to a sum which will allow a reasonable, reachable limit of spending of, say, one year's salary, $42,500 a year, in an election year to be spent. That could be added to the Member's salary in a two-year period, which would give an increase of $21,250, and a Member would be allowed to deduct from his taxes, like any other business cost or promotional cost, that amount up to $21,250 that he spends for his campaign.

A challenger who has his own funds would be permitted to do the same by subtracting from his income tax an equal amount if he spends it. A challenger who has not the funds but has the capability and the desire and the right to run for office would be permitted to go out and solicit public funds. Those who contribute to that particular candidate would be able and allowed to deduct from their personal income taxes amounts up to $1,000 contributed to the limit allowed by law.

Right at this moment I know there is no climate for this. First of all, we have a group in this Congress that believes that the only essential required in a campaign in money. Character and all of the other attributes we have long held to be part of public office are no longer of consequence to many Members of this Congress.

I noted yesterday, and I will not put it in the RECORD, that the 26 top spenders in the Congress made a difference between setting a figure of $42,500 and a figure of $93,750.

I say to the Members that those who opting for high expenditures and high limits and saying that is the way to allow a challenger in are frauds because the only way to allow a challenger in is to make it possible for him to reach somewhere near the amount of money that a Congressman can reach with his ability to go out and shake the apple tree.

I am saying to the Members that until this or some future Congress recognizes the proposition in these terms and others, I am not wedded to figures; but I am wedded to the philosophy that we must make this particular job clean, above board, or we are going to lose it—not as individuals; we are going to lose it as an institution. We are not going to be able to take many more of the situations that have occurred of recent date and still not yet ended.

I say to the Members of this Congress I will not be here when it is done, but I warn the Members that either they make it so that Members of Congress will have clean hands in an election because the job will pay enough to make it possible to campaign reasonably without going out with a cup in his hand for whatever kind of favors he has to pay for to be elected.

PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRY

Mr. HANRAHAN. Mr. Chairman, may I have an explanation as to why my amendment was out of order, because it pertains to eliminating cash contributions and that is under section 101(a).

The CHAIRMAN. If the committee will permit, the Chair will reread his statement on title I:

In title I: Germane amendments to subsection 101(a) proposing solely to change the money amounts contained in said subsection, providing they have been printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at least 1 calendar day before being offered;

That follows the general statement which says:

Under the rule, the bill is considered as having been read for amendment. No amendments, including any amendment in the nature of a substitute for the bill, are in order to the bill except the following:

The language that I read previously follows that language. Section 101(a) of the bill ends after line 10 on page 7, and the gentleman's amendment is to a later provision on page 11 which is not covered by the exception.

Mr. HANRAHAN. Mr. Chairman, but would the Chair agree that this is still under section 101(a) per se under title I?

The CHAIRMAN. No, it is to a different section, to 101(f).

Mr. HANRAHAN. I thank the Chair.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. OBEY

Mr. OBEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. OBEY: Page 5, line 2, strike out "; or" and insert in lieu thereof "Except that in any state in which there is an overall spending limit (enacted after the close of December 31, 1970) lower than the $75,000 limit in this section, the spending limit imposed by state law shall apply, notwithstanding any other provision of the law; or".

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order against the amendment. I will withhold my point of order pending an explanation of the amendment by the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado reserves a point of order against the amendment.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. OBEY).

Mr. OBEY. Mr. Chairman, I hope that when the gentleman has a chance to further review this amendment he will withdraw his reservation, for this reason. First of all, let me explain what the amendment is really trying to do. All this amendment says is that the $75,000 limitation imposed upon the House races in this bill will hold except in the case of those States which after December 30, 1970, have adopted spending limitations which are lower than the $75,000 per election placed in this bill.

The reason I think this ought to be ruled germane is this. The rule provides that only amendments which solely change the dollar amounts should be allowed, but let me point out that the only effect of this amendment, the sole effect of this amendment is merely to change the dollar amounts in this case in four States as of today—which are provided for under this bill.

Why do I think we ought to allow the States to set lower limits? Let me tell the Members about my State of Wisconsin.

Incidentally I am joined in this amendment by the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. MANN), the gentleman from Kansas (Mr. SEBELIUS), the gentleman from Oregon (Mr. DELLENBACK), the gentleman from Oregon (Mr. WYATT), the gentleman fom Wisconsin (Mr. DAVIS), the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. QUIE), the gentlewoman from Colorado (Mrs. SCHROEDER), the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. MCKINNEY), the gentleman from Hawaii (Mr. MATSUNAGA), and the gentleman from California (Mr. ANDERSON).

The reason we have offered this amendment is simply this: The amount in the bill $187,000 may seem a reasonable amount to spend to get elected to Congress in some States, and I do not object to it for some States, but in the State of Wisconsin no candidate for the House of Representatives has ever spent over $80,000 in the history of the State. To us the idea that we can allow candidates to spend $75,000 in a primary and another $75,000 in the general elections plus the fund-raising exemption built into this bill is just outrageous. Our legislature has just adopted a bill which limits campaign spending to $35,000 in a primary and $50,000 in the general election.

I would like to support this bill, those of us who are from Wisconsin would, but it is very difficult for us to go home and tell our people that we support a reform bill which allows people to spend time as much as our new State law allows.

I have indicated, I want to live by the total spending limit of State law but I want every candidate in my State to live within those same limitations. I suggest that in a State like Wisconsin, which is mostly a rural State, except for the city of Milwaukee, our whole political environment is much different from metropolitan areas of the country.

I recognize that Common Cause wants spending limits of $187,000. But most of their leaders are from urban areas and do not understand the political moves of rural America. People in my area simply do not understand why candidates should spend that much to get elected and neither do I.

Mr. CLEVELAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OBEY. I yield to the gentleman from New Hampshire.

Mr. CLEVELAND. I had a similar amendment that I offered in the committee. I hope no one will object to this one on the grounds it is against the rule. It is a good amendment.

I am curious about one thing. Why do you confine this to States that enact new campaign expenditure limitations since January 1, 1971; for example in my State in 1970 they enacted a limitation that is reasonable and below what we have in the bill.

Mr. OBEY. It was tough to determine the correct date. This one was selected because it is the date the last Federal campaign law passed which preempted some items. It was necessary because some States have 50-year-old laws.

Mr. CLEVELAND. But in my case, for example, New Hampshire, they would have to reenact their law to come within the provision of your amendment.

Mr. OBEY. As I understand it, this applies at present to Iowa, Oregon, Hawaii, and Wisconsin. In the future it would apply to those States which choose to set lower limitations.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OBEY. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. DENT. As I understand, it would preempt all the States except that those that now have a dollar limit lower than $75,000. Is there anything in the amendment that would allow States to pass legislation under the preemption as of now?

Mr. OBEY. Yes.

Mr. WYATT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OBEY. I yield to the gentleman from Oregon.

Mr. WYATT. I rise in support of this amendment and I commend the gentleman for offering it, because I think we at the local level should have some right to control our own destiny and where our standards are cleaner and better, I believe, than they are in this bill, I think our standards should prevail.

POINT OF ORDER

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Colorado insist on his point of order?

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Yes, I do, Mr. Chairman. I would like to be heard briefly on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado is recognized.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. Chairman, as I am sure the Members will recall, I opposed the rule under which we are operating. I do press the point of order for two reasons. First of all, because I disagree with the substance of the amendment on its merits.

Second, I know of no better inequitable application of a rule. I know of no better way to preclude this kind of gag rule in the future than to meticuously refer to the language.

Mr. OBEY. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, is the gentleman aware I voted with him on the rule yesterday?

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I appreciate the gentleman's explanation, but I must make a point of order against it. I think it clearly is out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman specify the point of order?

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Yes, Mr. Chairman, under the language which appears on page 2 of the rule:

No amendment, including any amendment in the nature of a substitute for the bill, shall be in order to the bill except the following:

Then there are listed a number of exceptions, none of which in my judgment applies to the amendment which is proposed.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. OBEY. Yes, Mr. Chairman. I suggest the amendment is in order, because while the language of the rule specifies that amendments are in order only if they change the dollar amounts, this amendment solely changes the dollar amounts. It is just that. It contains no formula, as the committee was worried about, it contains no special formula, it contains no special arrangement. The net effect is merely to change the dollar amounts allowed to be spent under the bill.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. Chairman, it is obvious that the rule does preclude this amendment, because it offers a new regulatory scheme and gives to the States certain discretion not contemplated by the original bill. The drafters of the bill went to considerable trouble to preempt the States, and this does not simply change the dollar amount.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is prepared to rule.

The Chair is familiar with the rule, and has also examined the amendment. He finds that the effect of the amendment is, in fact, only to limit the amounts. There is no additional discretionary authority affirmatively conferred on the States by the terms of the amendment.

Therefore, it is not subject to the point of order last discussed by the gentleman from Colorado.

Therefore, the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I have discussed the amendment at some length with the gentleman from Wisconsin, and I am reluctant to oppose it, but I think if we are going to preempt State laws—and if there was any one thing that nearly every Member of this body asked us to do, that was to preempt State laws so that all candidates would know where they stood, and live under one set of reguulations and have one set of laws to go by.

I can understand the gentleman's desire to get away from preemption on this particular thing, but I am sure that if a Member offered an amendment saying that if a certain State had a higher limit than $75,000, then we would have a number of people who would be against that because that would be saying that we could buy elections, and they would be right.

So, on the subject of preemption, it seems to me that it is a little bit like pregnancy—you either are or you are not; you cannot be part way. I just think that if we are going to preempt State laws—and I think it is vital that we do, so that we have some orderly kind of procedure—that we have one set of standards for all the States all the way through for Federal elections.

What is to prevent some State legislature hereafter which wants to be mischievous about it, coming in and saying that one cannot spend more than $10,000 or $5,000 or $2,000 in a congressional election? I think we have got to have one set of standards for all 50 States.

On that basis, I am constrained to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin. There is always the possibility that if a State has lower limits, that the candidates themselves can agree to abide by them. Certainly, if I were in a State that had lower limits, I would endeavor to get my opponent to abide by them. That can be a voluntary thing.

However, my feeling is that when we start to trifle with preemption, we open the door wider than what we have now, 51 different laws—on Federal and 50 different State laws. Therefore, that is why I oppose the amendment.

Mr. CLEVELAND. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I am delighted with the Chairmans ruling; in fact, I am not only delighted with his ruling, I am pleasantly surprised by his ruling. I had a similar amendment which was printed in the RECORD. My amendment took a slightly different approach from the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin, but it was drafted to accomplish precisely the same result.

After reading the complicated rule, I took a copy of my amendment and gave it to the counsel for the minority, and who also gave it to the counsel for the majority, and I was advised that it would probably not be germane under the complicated rule.

They checked with the Parliamentarian, and my amendment did not meet his approval. So I am delighted that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin has been ruled in order by the distinguished gentleman from Missouri (Mr. BOLLING). I commend him for his ruling and for his fairness.

Mr. Chairman, why do I rise in support of this amendment? Mr. Chairman, for those of us who sat through many of the almost endless hearings of the subcommittee and again the open markup sessions conducted by the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. HAYS) of the full Committee on House Administration, there is absolutely no question that it is the sheerest folly for the U.S. Congress to attempt to set a national standard for the amount that can be spent in a congressional district.

My own State, for example, New Hampshire, has a limit of $32,500 for the primary and again the same amount for the general election, a total of $65,000. This has never been exceeded, and there has never been any need to exceed it. I have had strong opposition and well-financed opposition.

I think it is unfair to place a Congressman from a State such as New Hampshire in a position of legislating at a level of $42,500 or $60,000 or $90,000 or more as a limit.

There is an answer to this problem, and the answer to this problem is to let lower limits be set by those States that want to have the lower limits.

The chairman of the committee (Mr. HAYS) has echoed the old refrain that someone in the State capital will get mischievous and pass a much lower limit, a ridiculous one. This could happen, but there is no evidence that it will happen.

I find it very strange that reform organizations such as Common Cause and the League of Women Voters turn their backs on this type of approach. They will not even listen to us when we make this kind of proposal. They applaud campaign reform efforts by California but they come to Washington and by insisting on total Federal preemption for congressional elections, prove themselves hypocrits. How many more mistakes must we make, before the lesson is learned, that the return of some power and decisionmaking to the States is an imperative; if we are to survive as a Nation.

I find it specially strange because they keep preaching to me the importance of home rule, which is near and dear to their heart, for the District and to save a community from something like a refinery.

Why cannot the people of New Hampshire set, if they want, a limit of $32,500? Why cannot the people of Wisconsin set a lower limit than that which we could create here in Washington?

The whole question about whether it is $90,000, $60,000, or $40,000 or what some people say should be no national limit, that whole area of strife and argument reflects the impossibility of our legislating here in Washington one intelligent standard for all of the several States.

We have 50 separate States, and these 50 separate States have different requirements and different geographies. There are different types of elections which are permitted.

I submit that if we set different standards for expenditure, we may run into this problem of having amounts set such as $75,000, which is in the bill now, which some people tell me is not enough for the city, but I tell the Members that it is appalling for its size for a State like New Hampshire.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the gentleman's amendment. I thank the Chair for his ruling.

I urge that this gentleman's amendment pass.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, after the surprising ruling which made this amendment, despite its language, in order, I have to support the chairman of the committee in stating that the amendment does not fit the spirit of the bill. It comes to us in the guise of a States' rights amendment, but it is a one-way street for the States.

A State, for instance, cannot raise the amount that a person can spend, that a candidate can spend.

When the committee sat down and worked out the preemption of State law, it was considering the most important single matter that the greatest number of Members of Congress brought to our attention.

They said: "For heaven's sake, get us out of this mess of 51 laws. Get us out of all these reports that sometimes conflict with one another. Please preempt State laws."

We did that. We responded to the requests of Members of Congress in this respect. We put in a preemption section and now comes an amendment which says, "We want to have our cake and eat it too."

In effect the amendment is saying this:

"We want you to preempt all the laws a certain way, but change it only one way to satisfy my State or my condition. Do not let my State put any extra reporting requirements on me, and do not let my State allow me to spend any more money, but let my State lower my spending allowance."

Mr. Chairman, we have not decided whether we want preemption, whether the Federal Government is in charge of Federal elections or whether the States are. If we want preemption of reports, we certainly ought to have the preemption of the whole election process.

There is nothing in this bill, I can assure the maker of this amendment, that forces him to spend one dime for election. He can spend as little as he wants or, under the terms of the bill, unless it is amended, up to $75,000.

The amendment, Mr. Chairman, should be defeated.

Mr. THOMPSON of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENZEL. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. THOMPSON of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I would like to associate myself with these remarks. I do so with some regret.

The fact is that implicit in this amendment is potential disaster. For instance, we may have a legislature controlled by one party, with a majority of its delegation in the House of Representatives belonging to the other party. There may be all sorts of possibilities.

The preemption provision, as the gentleman says, is probably the most desired section of this bill, as far as our colleague is concerned.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for his contribution. I hope the amendment will be defeated.

Mr. BADILLO. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in support of the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment, and I ask my colleagues from New York and from the urban centers not only to support this amendment but to work to see to it that the limitations are lowered in every State throughout the Union if the amendment is approved.

I know that many of my colleagues voted against lowering the amounts to be spent for House races because of the support of such a position by Common Cause and the League of Women Voters and other campaign reform groups. But the fact is that we must keep in mind that the way in which people begin to run for office generally is as political unknowns and even in the urban centers those who are unknown are not able to get the kind of money that is necessary to put up a decent campaign.

I remember in my own case 13 years ago when I began in politics, I was running against then Congressman Santangelo and I could not raise $2,000 to run. I can raise money now, but that is because I have become known since that time. I remember campaigning with my colleague who spoke yesterday, the gentleman from New York (Mr. KOCH), years ago in Chelsea, when he was running for the city council, and he could not in those days raise the funds which he can raise now.

Mr. Chairman, perhaps the most dramatic example of what I mean involves what is happening today and what happened in 1972 in the 14th Congressional District of Brooklyn, the seat that is now held by the gentleman from New York (Mr. ROCNEY). When the gentleman from New York, Mr. Lowenstein, ran against the gentleman from New York (Mr. ROONEY) 2 years ago, he was able to raise $306,000, which was more than any other Congressman or congressional candidate in the country was able to raise. Maybe the people from Common Cause and the League of Women Voters have the example of Mr. Lowenstein in mind.

But the example I have in mind is what is happening today in that same district, where Cesar Perales is running and he cannot raise $4,000 to run for that office, and that is a district where the district court has said that a Puerto Rican should be running for office.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BADILLO. I would be glad to yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, I am listening to the gentleman's every word with great interest, because I just wish the gentleman had been around making this speech when Common Cause was assailing me and beating me over the head and when the editors of the New York Times, the Washington Post, and the Cleveland Plain Dealer were assailing me because I wanted lower limits. They said all I wanted to do was to freeze out everybody from running and protect the incumbent.

I was making the same argument then that the gentleman is making now, but it was a damned lonely post I was on, because nobody was saying anything to the contrary then.

I oppose it now on the preemption item alone, but I would say the gentleman had the chance yesterday. I had to defend the bill which came out of the committee. The gentleman had a chance to lower the amount.

All I am saying to the gentleman is if you are going to lower it, it should be done nationally and not piecemeal.

Mr. BADILLO. I will say to the gentleman from Ohio that I was around before, and I will be around any time that the gentleman wants me to testify before Common Cause or any other group, because we have to speak about the realities of what goes on, and on how people begin to get into political office. And this is especially true in the urban centers, which are now beginning to be centers of poverty. Those who are in a position to represent the people should get a chance to represent them, and they can only do so if the spending limits are lowered so that they can compete against incumbents and against strong political organizations.

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BADILLO. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the gentleman yielding.

I would ask the gentleman if the gentleman is aware that the Senate bill has a $90,000 limitation in it, and the House bill lowered the limitation from $90,000 to $75,000?

There was a time in the committee when we were discussing and considering a $60,000 limitation, and many members of the committee were unhappy, as I pointed out yesterday, it was our feeling that we reached a reasonable figure, and the committee feels that the $75,000 limitation is a reasonable figure.

Mr. BADILLO. I am aware and grateful that the figure has been lowered in the House bill to $75,000. I would just like to see it lowered further. I think if we can get some States to lower it, it should be done in order that people who want to get a chance to begin as unknowns in politics may be able to do so.

Mr. CONYERS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BADILLO. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CONYERS. Mr. Chairman, I think the position taken by the gentleman from New York (Mr. BADILLO) is a logical one, and I think it is in the interest of bringing more people into the body politic. I believe that the argument the gentleman has presented makes eminently good sense, and I will support the amendment.

Mr. DELLENBACK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in support of the amendment.

(Mr. DELLENBACK asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DELLENBACK. Mr. Chairman, I listened with great interest to all of the arguments which have been made on both sides of this question, and most particularly the point made by the chairman of the subcommittee, the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. HAYS) and my distinguished colleague and good friend, the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr.

FRENZEL) who talked in terms of preemption.

I think by and large there should be preemption in this Federal legislation, and the bulk of what it is that is involved in this particular area of campaign spending. I think there is nothing, however, inconsistent between saying to the Members that the bulk of the features of the bill should be standard throughout the United States, and we should preempt on those features, we set an overall limit for spending, and at the same time saying that if a given State, knowing its situation to be unique and different from other parts of the United States, feels that an additional restriction and total spending limitation should be placed on this kind of spending, that that individual State should be free to do this. That is essentially what this amendment does.

A very low limitation could treat unfairly a State in the east where the dollars that would be necessary to get a fair presentation of an issue or of a candidate would be higher than it would be in a State like mine, in Oregon.

I do not seek to move against a total spending limitation, but I think we have got to be realistic.

When we talk in terms of $75,000 as a limitation in this bill, in effect it is a $150,000 limitation on an election contest, particularly where the time between the primary and the general election is very short.

In a State like Oregon, our State legislature has said they think that is too high a figure to be permissible for this kind of spending.

All we are asking for is a declaration by the Congress today, that in a State like Oregon or Hawaii, or Iowa or Wisconsin, or Maine, and perhaps other States in the future, where there is a feeling by the local decisionmakers and State legislators, that the figure should be lower, that that should be a permissible action within that particular State.

We are not seeking to lower the figure for any other State which feels that a higher figure is necessary, but in the interest of local decisionmaking we urge that this amendment be adopted, and that States which feel there should be a lower limitation have the right to set that lower limitation.

Mr. SEBELIUS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DELLENBACK. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. SEBELIUS. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I should like to associate myself with the gentleman's remarks. I know that every State is different. We have different attitudes toward money and spending. In the State of Kansas for one contested primary and three general elections I still have not spent the limit such as in the bill. I think the State of Kansas, like the State of Oregon, should be entitled to preempt the amount of money because our rural situation is far different than that of the larger cities.

Mr. DELLENBACK. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DELLENBACK. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BIAGGI. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I rise in support of the amendment and congratulate the gentleman on his comments, and also my colleague, the gentleman from New York, but especially the lonely voice that articulated these very sentiments by the chairman of the committee today.

I voted for the reduction in the amendment yesterday except for the preemption aspect of it. The amendment is an excellent one. I do not think the Federal Government, nor the Congress, relinquishes any prerogatives by passing this amendment.

The sum total of the bill as it now exists is to preclude those from the less affluent areas in our economy, and it makes elective office once again the plaything of the wealthy.

(Mr. BIAGGI asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Chairman, this amendment would permit a State to set a spending figure at a more realistic level, one which could increase the opportunities for all Americans regardless of economic situation to seek public office.

While it is true that only five States have imposed lower spending limits since 1971, this amendment would encourage more States to join these five thus again restricting the ability of a candidate to buy his way into public office.

One of the major issues to face us in deliberations over this bill is the question of public financing. The matter has been raised because of the high costs of campaigns. I strongly oppose using tax dollars for financing of campaigns. No American should be forced to see his tax dollars go to support candidates he does not favor. A voluntary system of contributions may be acceptable, but the best method of giving every American the opportunity to run for office is to limit the amounts spent to get elected to that office—not to provide tax funds to permit him to spend, spend, spend.

There is a great need for reform in our present system of financing political campaigns. In recent years we have seen candidates for public office spend unprecedented amounts of money, through legal and illegal methods, amassing huge war chests with which to destroy the hopes of their poorer opponents.

As an individual who was born and raised in poverty, I have always considered it one of my greatest personal honors to have had the opportunity to run and be elected to the House of Representatives. Yet under today's discriminatory campaign financing practices, it would be virtually impossible for a person from poor or limited means to run for public office without incurring irrevocable financial disaster. This was not the way that our democracy was established.

Every person regardless of race, color, or economic condition has the right to the pursuit of happiness. For many, running and serving the public as an elected official represents this epitome of happiness. Let us take this opportunity to reaffirm this fundamental principle, let us again show to the American people that events such as Watergate cannot and will not happen in the future. It is in this hope that I offer my support to this amendment.

Mr. DELLENBACK. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. THOMPSON of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in opposition to the amendment.

(Mr. THOMPSON of New Jersey asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. THOMPSON of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I shall be brief. I want to reemphasize what I consider to be of the utmost importance, the retention of preemption in its entirety. The possibilities are virtually infinite were this amendment to be adopted in that States' laws would vary tremendously. There would be a continual, uncomfortable and unnecessary duplication of reports to State Governments and to the Federal Government, which are already confusing enough under existing law. Our efforts have been designed to set a reasonable figure. We have agreed upon that reasonable figure, which to some is too high and others too low. It is, nevertheless, reasonable and should be uniform throughout the States.

I simply fail to understand, with all due respect to them, the logic of my friends who urge that those from urban areas support this legislation. It is as difficult in a rural area involving many, many counties for a person to become known as it is in a highly urban area.

I happen to live in the most urban State in the Union. I suspect that with the size of my district it is easier to identify than it is for a Member from the Southwest, for instance, with 56 or 60 counties in which to be known.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THOMPSON of New Jersey. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BINGHAM. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I would like to support the committee in its position, and I do so with reluctance because I have the highest regard for the sponsors of this amendment.

I do not think it is possible to reconcile any kind of reasonable limitation on compaign spending with the capability for spending of poor candidates. We are simply not talking in terms of opportunities here; we are talking in terms of ceilings. As I said yesterday, I think the ceiling has to be a national one, taking into account the variations in districts. Moreover, it seems to me simply inappropriate for States to legislate with regard to an election to a Federal office such as the Congress.

I thank the gentleman.

Mr. THOMPSON of New Jersey. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THOMPSON of New Jersey. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. HAYS. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to see whether we can get some reasonable unanimous-consent agreement about debate on this amendment. Many Members have spoken to me about having reservations and needing to leave at a reasonable hour this afternoon. While I do not want to preclude anybody from speaking or conducting a lot of debate, I was wondering if 10 minutes from now would be a reasonable time to conclude debate on this.

If nobody feels strongly, I would ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment cease at 1:30.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from California (Mr. ANDERSON).

Mr. ANDERSON of California. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of this amendment which would permit a State to impose lower spending limits than those proposed in the bill.

Under the bill, no candidate for Congress can spend more than $60,000 toward that election, and no candidate for the Senate can spend more than 5 cents per person or $75,000 which ever is greater.

Of course, in some States this limitation is adequate. But, in others, that limitation is too high, and the State legislators have acted to impose lower spending ceilings.

For example, five States—Hawaii, Iowa, Oregon, Wisconsin, and Maine—have campaign expenditure limitations which are lower than those proposed in this bill, and I do not believe that the Federal law should preempt the State law which is more restrictive, and better suited to the situation in that particular State.

I think it is particularly unfair to require Members of Congress from those five States to vote either against their State law or against this bill.

I support this amendment, and urge my colleagues to join me in allowing a State to establish more restrictive standards than those proposed by the Federal Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from California (Mr. BROWN).

(Mr. BROWN of California asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BROWN of California. Mr. Chairman, I merely wanted to say a word about the concept of preemption. I think Federal preemption of State law have some merit in certain kinds of legislation, but not in this particular situation. We are dealing with the establishment of minimum standards of campaign practices in the conduct of Federal elections, and from that standpoint I think it is perfectly proper to allow the States, if they desire to do so, to go further than the Federal law in achieving the most desireable campaign practices. I can give positive examples of this. In my State candidates in some circumstances, are permitted to enclose biographical and related information with the sample ballot mailed at public expense to every registered voter. We would not want Federal legislation to proclude this, even though its practical effect is to provide the equivalent of several thousand dollars in free postage to the candidates. Nor would we wish to proclude State laws requiring that public agencies which own and operate television or radio stations offer free time to candidates. If State law provides methods for achieving an informed electorate without the need for massive private campaign expenditures, it should be encouraged, not prohibited. If the States wish to finance from public funds, all, or part, of campaign costs, it should be permitted, not prohibited. Our purpose should not be the preemption of State laws that improve campaign practices, but instead to provide a solid foundation on which the States can build. For this reason I support the Obey amendment, and urge its adoption.

(By unanimous consent, Messrs. STUDDS and BOLAND yielded their time to Mr. GIAIMO).

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. GIAIMO).

Mr. GIAIMO. Mr. Chairman, I rise neither in support nor in opposition to the amendment, but I am terribly concerned about it and I would like to ask some questions of the gentleman from Wisconsin, one of the principle authors.

I have no objection to having a State reduce the amount, but I come from a State, Connecticut, where we have had a difficult time because our State laws for years have disagreed with the Federal laws. One of the key things I like about this bill is that it preempts State law. Yet here I begin to see the first incursion or violation of that concept in the doctrine of preemption and it bothers me because unless we can all be treated alike and fairly under a uniform Federal code I can see where we are going to be right back where we have been for years, where one State was totally different from another, leading to chaos.

Mr. OBEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIAIMO. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. OBEY. Mr. Chairman, let me assure the gentleman if this bill is passed the States will be preempted on absolutely everything except overall spending limits.

Mr. GIAIMO. But it is the exception.

Mr. OBEY. Let me point out to the gentleman right now there is very little preemption. This bill if it is passed with my amendment will greatly broaden the preemption which exists right now. I am in the same situation the gentleman is in with regard to my several unrealistic requirements of State law. One section of the my State law contains filing requirements so complicated the gentleman would not believe them.

It makes the bill we passed here 2 years ago look simple by comparison. Let me assure the gentleman that the only item for which an exception is made to preemption is the item of total overall spending limits. In that respect States are limited only to actions which they may take to lower the total spending amounts. That is the only exception.

Mr. GIAIMO. This an exception to the reduction in amount. I would like to make it clear and hope it is the intention here that we are not going to encourage the States to make other exceptions.

Mr. OBEY. I could not agree more with the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chairman recognizes the gentleman from Washington (Mr. MCCORMACK).

(Mr. McCORMACK asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the amendment. I think one of the most important facets of this bill is the preemption section. I do not think we should be tampering with it, and taking a chance with future court decisions which may go against us if we amend it as is proposed. While preempting State law, we are now asked to resubject ourselves to the possibility of unnecessary State reporting regulations, which is one of the things we are trying to correct. I think the goal of this amendment can be achieved voluntarily by any candidate.

I think this is an invitation to malicious mischief that may occur in some State legislatures. We have seen this happen before, and I don't think we want to take a chance on having such things happen again.

I suggest that we defeat the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York (Mr. KOCH).

(Mr. KOCH asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. KOCH. Mr. Chairman, I, too, am opposed to the amendment on the ground that preemption is essential. We are all national legislators. We get the same salary. We have the same number of people on our staff. We have the same duties and obligations and the legislation we are passing today should apply equally to everyone. To do otherwise will put this legislation and the fight for reform back into the hands of 50 different State legislatures. I urge defeat of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. KASTENMEIER).

(Mr. KASTENMEIER asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Chairman, this measure becomes an anti-reform bill for those who are affected, such as those of us from Wisconsin. What it does, in effect, is to raise the spending limitations set at $85,000 in Wisconsin to $187,500, including fundraising. This, therefore, becomes antireform.

If we talk to the man in the street and we ask him, "Do you think in Wisconsin or elsewhere in this country, do you think that candidates for Congress ought to be spending more in elections for that office?" The answer will be a resounding "No!" I ask a yes vote on this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. OBEY).

Mr. OBEY. Mr. Chairman, let me make one point in closing. The only item this amendment touches is the dollar limit. The gentleman from Washington said this would open us up to different reporting requirements in different States. That is absolutely not true.

The only thing which this deals with is total spending amounts. All it does is allow States to lower the total spending amount. That is all it does.

I agree with the gentleman from Wisconsin. I will debate Common Cause in any city in my district about whether the public wants more spending or less spending in congressional campaigns. This will help us spend less in those States that chose to spend less. I urge its adoption.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. MATHIS).

(Mr. MATHIS of Georgia asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

[Mr. MATHIS of Georgia addressed the Committee. His remarks will appear hereafter in the Extensions of Remarks.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. BRADEMAS).

(Mr. BRADEMAS asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BRADEMAS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. It seems to me that it is an invitation to a crazy quilt of State laws. One can see very quickly how under this amendment, spending limits could change from one year to another year in 50 different States, depending upon the changes of political composition of the State legislatures. If one were to be fair, one would have to say, why not allow a State to assign a higher limit than the spending limit in Federal law?

But the gentleman's amendment does not do this. It runs in only one direction.

This is the opening wedge against preemption, and I hope the amendment is rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. FRENZEL).

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, I think we should be aware that the Senate bill does not have a preemption section. If we are to go with this opening wedge in preemption, where then can we compromise with the Senate? Do we then compromise by giving the States the right to control reporting again?

That is why we put in preemption. Do not push us out of that position. Vote down this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. ANNUNZIO).

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. I do not believe that at this time we should open the door.

I also want to try to correct an erroneous impression. I hear $187,000; I hear $250,000. All this bill provides is $75,000 limitation in a primary. If the candidate does not spend the $75,000 and he carries it over to the general election, all he can spend in the general election is $75,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. HAYS) to close debate on this amendment.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, all I want to say is that this debate has been very revealing. If Common Cause has anybody in the gallery, I think they ought to know how far their argument got that I was trying to break off by a low limit of $60,000, which is what I started with, any opposition to anyone who is already an incumbent.

Someone, someplace, has not been listening to Common Cause.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. OBEY).

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. OBEY. Mr. Chairman, I demand a recorded vote.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there further eligible amendments to title I?

Mr. BROYHILL of Virginia. Mr.

Chairman, I move to strike the last word, and I rise in support of the legislation.

(Mr. BROYHILL of Virginia asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BROYHILL of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, because of my deep concern over the obvious need for corrective legislation with regard to our Federal election laws, I introduced what I consider to be a strong bill to amend the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971. I am pleased that the House Administration Committee, during their deliberations and drafting of the bill before us today, H.R. 16090, included some of the same provisions contained in the legislation I introduced on this subject. I intend, Mr. Chairman, to support this committee bill.

However, in reviewing H.R. 16090, I notice several omissions which I believe are absolutely essential to strong reform in this area. First, I find no mention that organizations with tax exempt status, such as Common Cause and many others, be denied this status if political candidates are endorsed or opposed, publicly or with open or covert campaign contributions. Second, I find no provision which will make mandatory the audit of income tax returns each year for all federally elected officials. I have held strong views on these two points, and thus I have offered these specific proposals as amendments to the tax reform package before the Ways and Means Committee and they have been accepted.

Further, I am unalterably opposed to the provisions in H.R. 16090 for financing political campaigns with public money. It is the old story of trying to cure everything with public funds when the track record is long and obvious that we cure nothing by rushing to the public till at every crisis. The cure for "Fat-cat" contributions, as they are called, is not by discouraging more contributors to political campaigns, but inviting more in, by giving them an incentive to participate.

The legislation I offered does so, and in doing so, eliminates the vacuum in the process that is always willingly filled by business, labor, or organizations which have no mandate from their members to pick and choose political candidates endorsed by their leadership. To that end the legislation I proposed would limit individual campaign contributions in Federal elections to $1,000 to any individual candidate for Federal public office. However, a political action committee would be allowed to make a contribution to a specified candidate not in excess of $6,000. I sought to encourage individuals to contribute to specified candidates by allowing for an increase in deductions for political contributions from gross income from $50 to $100 on individual Federal income tax returns and from $100 to $200 on joint returns. I also foresaw the need for a firm formula of realistic expenditures, based on the voting population in a State or political district. The formula would cover both primary and general elections and if it proves inadequate after a thorough test, it can be altered.

I was encouraged to note that the provisions in my bill which retain the establishment of a seven-member Federal Election Commission to receive reports, oversee and fully investigate violations of Federal elections was also contained in H.R. 16090. I was pleased to note the committee agreed with my proposal that the Commission was not set up as a separate prosecutor to try offenders but instead the Commission is directed to present its case to the Justice Department for trial and in doing so, should the Justice Department fail to try the case, the reason for not trying violators must be reported and can be made public by the Commission.

While limiting big contributions, H.R. 16090 does not curb big labor contributions. This is accomplished in my bill by curbing the practice of contributions in kind. Mass mailings and phone banks set up by political action committees must be reported as are any other contributions and cannot exceed $1,000 to any individual candidate for Federal public office. This in no way prohibits the individual member of a labor group from making his or her individual effort or contribution to a specific candidate of his or her choice.

There are those, Mr. Chairman, who have accused us of walking away from Federal Election Campaign Reform. I submit that these allegations are the usual campaign rousting directed at seated Members, heightened by recent disclosures of abuses. Far from walking away from the issue, Mr. Chairman, I introduced an extensive campaign reform measure several months ago and I have followed the legislation introduced in the Senate and House. While I quarrel with some aspects of both measures, and do not agree with the modified closed rule limiting amendments which could strengthen this bill, I fully support what I believe is a giant step in restoring the confidence of our people in the campaign process.

I am proud that I have been at the forefront of the effort and I shall continue, Mr. Chairman, to pay particular attention to the workability of any legislation in this area which becomes law, and shall continue from time to time to make suggestions to improve the controls required, if the need arises.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

(Mr. ARMSTRONG asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. Chairman, this bill has been brought to us under the theory that "if we keep them panting long enough, for reform, they will take anything that is called reform." But this is not a reform bill.

In the very first instance, it comes to us under a gag rule, under a rule that is a throwback to the worst traditions of the House, a rule that does not permit consideration of needed amendments, a rule which does not permit the Members of this body to really legislate but only to decide within a very narrow range among choices of predigested amendments, a rule which I feel deeply is violative of the basic rights of the Members of this House and of our constituents.

But, more important than the rule, is the substance of the bill itself. And this bill does not fulfill the longing of the American people for reform. Under the guise of reform this bill reintroduces into law antifree-speech provisions, provisions which give candidates for public office veto power over other persons' rights of free speech and publication, a matter which was discussed at some length in yesterday's RECORD at pages H7799 and H7815.

Moreover, the provisions of this bill, particularly those on page 6, are vague and are going to be subject to endless litigation.

Further, this bill introduces new loopholes. It is not enough that it fails to come to grips with existing loopholes in the law; this bill creates new loopholes.

This bill ignores serious abuses which have been discovered during the Watergate investigation. It does not do anything about the Watergate type of abuses, espionage and so-called dirty tricks.

Mr. Chairman, this bill purports to cut back on contributions, but it only limits and calls for the reporting of one kind of contribution, dollar contribution. The often more important, usually decisive, contributions in kind—the donation of storefronts, of goods and services, of personnel coming in from out of State, are not curtailed in this bill.

This legislation introduces public financing of nominating conventions, a procedure which is no reform but is nothing more nor less than a raid on the public treasury.

Finally, we all know—and I think most of us know in our hearts—this is a sweetheart incumbent bill. This is a bill which is going to make it harder than ever to defeat an incumbent of either party. It sets the kind of limits that makes it almost impossible for an unknown to become known and thereby heightens existing advantages which incumbents enjoy.

In view of the overall poor record of the Congress of the United States, it seems to me the last thing we need to do is to give further advantages to the incumbent Members of Congress. Let us defeat this bill and get on to some true reform which is so badly needed.

Mr. TREEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I shall be pleased to yield to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. TREEN. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I want to commend the gentleman in the well and associate myself with his remarks, particularly his position that this bill, with the $75,000 spending limit, is an incumbent-protection bill. There has been a lot of talk on the floor today, and there was yesterday, about a Member's record and that one can win or lose on his record; but I know that in districts in Louisiana and elsewhere in this country, if one is going to defeat an incumbent, he has got to expose the incumbent's record.

That means we have got to go to massive newspaper, radio, and television coverage to talk about that record. He cannot do that on the spending limits we have in this bill. So I join with the gentleman. I am going to vote against this bill, not because I do not think we need reform—we certainly do—but this bill with its $75,000 limit is definitely a bill that is going to protect the incumbents, and I think that is wrong.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I thank the gentleman for his contribution.

(Mr. ARMSTRONG asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, there are two things we can do about a speech like we just heard, which is about 90 percent baloney. We can ignore it or we can set the RECORD straight. I do not want to take too much of the time of the committee but I think it might be well to set the RECORD straight, and if the gentleman wants to vote against this and go home and try to tell his constituents that he voted against it because it is not reform and he can sell that bill of goods, that is all right, but I do not think he can. From the reports I get from his district, I think he is going to be lucky if he can sell them anything. However, that is neither here nor there.

The gentlemen on the other side are a little bit sensitive over there. I do not know if it is the events of the last 3 or 4 days which make those Members that way or what is wrong, but I can tell the Members this.

The gentleman made a big harangue—and the Members on the other side are asking for it so I am going to give it to them. The gentleman made a big harangue about this bill did not do anything about dirty tricks. I do not want to read the rollcall to the Members, nor do they want me to, of all the people who are either in jail or who have pleaded guilty or who have been sentenced to jail or who are on the way to jail or who have served their time and are on their way out for the dirty tricks and associated events.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYS. Not right now. The gentleman had his time and I did not ask him to yield, but just sit down and get a little castor oil, it will be good for the gentleman.

I just want to tell the gentleman this is already in the law. These fellows did not go to jail—Segretti, for example—because somebody did not like the color of their hair. Segretti went to jail because he violated a law and he pleaded guilty to it.

It would be a little redundant it seems to me to put in a bill a great deal of language which is already in the law. These things are against the law. These things were perpetrated on the American people and the perpetrators have either paid or are in the process of paying or will pay the penalty.

I just want to tell the Members who get so up tight about this, that this has been no easy task for this committee to write this bill. I do not claim this bill is perfect. I am the last one to do that. I just say it is better than what we have now. The Members have had chances to raise the limit, to lower the limit, and we have had rollcalls and votes on it. We are going to have a chance to have the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. ANDERSON) or the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. UDALL) present their plan for public financing for Members of the House and the Senate, and we are going to have a rollcall on that, and they are going to get defeated on it.

We do have in here a test run for public financing for the Presidents. If the Members do not like that, they can offer an amendment to take it out. That is perfectly in order.

But the gentleman can stand up and talk about a gag rule until he is blue in the face and the only person who ultimately is going to gag is the gentleman because this is not a gag rule.

(Mr. FREY asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. FREY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, certainly when the gentleman from Ohio speaks about baloney, I know of no one in the House who is more qualified to address himself to that.

I compliment the gentleman from Colorado (Mr. ARMSTRONG) on his remarks and his sincere desire to address himself to a problem that we all are worried about. He is an outstanding Member of Congress and has been a prime mover in election reform.

I do not think, frankly, we are going to get anywhere by charges and countercharges. I think the previous remarks are a cheap shot. I do not think it is going to help this House or this country at this time to indulge in this type of debate—It is a time to heal, not divide.

This is a tough issue and there are two sides to it. Like most issues, there are honest differences of opinion. I just hope we can carry out the rest of the debate without this kind of nonsense.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New Hampshire (Mr. CLEVELAND).

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. CLEVELAND

Mr. CLEVELAND. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CLEVELAND: Page 4, line 23, strike out "$75,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$60,000".

PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRY

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, has the amendment which was read been published in the RECORD, as required by our rule?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that it has, yes.

Mr. FRENZEL. Has it been published in the form in which it is presented, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. My understanding is that it is so presented.

Mr. CLEVELAND. Mr. Chairman, this amendment did appear in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD 2 days ago in the form it has been presented. It is a very simple amendment. I am not sure it even requires 5 minutes of discussion.

My amendment reduces the expenditure level from $75,000 to $60,000. Yesterday, as we all know, we had a vote on cutting down the limit from $75,000 to $42,500. The vote was reasonably close. There was a long debate.

I think most of the arguments that were offered in support of the amendment to reduce the expenditure level to $42,500 would be relative to this amendment, which would put the amount to $60,000.

I might say that in the committee the original draft of this bill with which we are confronted arrived at $60,000 as a fair consensus. Later on there was an amendment that raised it to $75,000. I personally think $60,000 is the best mean figure, for all the States.

I strongly supported the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. OBEY) which would have given States the right to establish a lower limit and this would have removed the urgency for cutting down the expenditure to the $60,000 figure.

I keep saying $60,000, but it is $60,000 for a primary and $60,000 for a general election. That is $120,000.

Then under the other provisions of this bill there is a percentage, 25 percent I believe, that we are allowed for money-raising functions. So we are not speaking about just the $60,000. We are speaking about what in reality would be a good deal closer to $150,000.

Mrs. GREEN of Oregon. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLEVELAND. I yield to the gentlewoman from Oregon.

Mrs. GREEN of Oregon. Mr. Chairman, like the gentleman in the well, I supported the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. MATHIS) and the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. OBEY).

I would like to ask a clarifying question. I hear about the $75,000 limit in this bill. It is my understanding it would be possible under this legislation, if there were a runoff election, for a person to legally spend up to $250,000 or $275,000 in 1 election year: $75,000 for the primary, $75,000 for the general election and if there is a runoff another $75,000; that would raise it to $225,000 in an election year.

Then there is another provision, as I understand it, which allows one to spend one-fourth of the total to raise the funds of each of three possible elections; so we are talking about $225,000, plus 25 percent of a possible $225,000 so that in 1 year's time either an incumbent or a challenger, could spend up to $275,000 legally under this legislation. Is that the understanding of the gentleman?

Mr. CLEVELAND. I am not sure if the gentlewoman has her figures exactly correct. There is a possibility besides the primary and general and for the runoff, there is also a figure—I forget what that is.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, it is 25 percent of the limit.

Mr. CLEVELAND. Twenty-five percent of the limit for raising money.

Mrs. GREEN of Oregon. It could be 25 percent of the $225,000?

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. CLEVELAND. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. HAYS. The figure, I would say to the gentlewoman, would apply to each election, 25 percent of $75,000, or, if the gentleman's amendment prevailed, 25 percent of $60,000.

Mrs. GREEN of Oregon. Or 25 percent of $225,000.

Mr. HAYS. Well, the chances of a runoff are extremely remote. It might happen in one of 400 elections, but the possibility is there in those States that have a runoff.

Mrs. GREEN of Oregon. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding to me. A ceiling of $275,000 in an election year for one candidate does not seem to me much of a campaign reform. Let us, at a minimum, approve the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Hampshire and impose a ceiling on each primary—each general—each run-off election to $60,000. That still allows $225,000 in a single election year.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLEVELAND. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. I thank the gentleman for yielding and rise in support of the amendment. Mr. Chairman, if I understand the gentleman's amendment correctly, it is $60,000 per election; that is, $60,000 for the primary election and $60,000 for the general election. The gentleman is also pointing out that there would be additional amounts available to be raised as it relates to section 591 on page 16 of the bill before us, which allows for certain costs of fund raising. The total amount would be $150,000 or even possibly more of the total. Is that correct?

Mr. CLEVELAND. Under my amendment, $60,000; $60,000 plus $60,000, would be $120,000.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. But with a 25-percent clause on page 16, additional amounts of funding would be available to be added to the ceiling. Is that not correct?

Mr. CLEVELAND. Right. That would have to be expended to raise the money.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, the statement of the gentleman from New Hampshire, a member of the committee, was eminently fair and correct. He stated the position of the committee as accurately as possible, as I remember.

The question before us is very simple, and I hope not to take more than a minute or two. I am standing behind the committee bill because, as chairman of the committee, I have that obligation. We did, as I said yesterday, go up and down the road on the amounts, and we can have a lot more amendments. Some Member can offer an amendment for $30,000 or $40,000 or $41,200; any figure he picks, so long as it has not been offered before.

I thought we settled this yesterday on the basis that the committee had rejected one for consideration of $90,000, rejected another for $100,000, rejected what I started out with, $60,000, and had settled on $75,000.

We can go here all day today and all day tomorrow if we want to about what the proper figure is, and I do not know that we will ever have a meeting of the minds. So, I would just ask for an up or down vote on this.

I do support the compromise, which is $75,000.

Mr. BRADEMAS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYS. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. BRADEMAS. Mr. Chairman, I thank the chairman for yielding to me. I simply want to associate myself with his position on this matter and reiterate that there are 435 congressional districts in the United States. It is enormously difficult to develop a figure that is fair clear across the board.

The committee labored long on this matter, and the figure of $75,000, to which can be added 25 percent in order to provide for the cost of raising funds, was arrived at.

With a dinner—for example, the food—it seems to me to be the fairest position we can develop, and I hope the gentleman's amendment is rejected.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, let me just say about that 25 percent which seems to get everybody excited, that it never occurred to anyone, I think, that if I gave a dinner for which I sold tickets at $10, which some people do—in my district it is common—and I paid the PTA $5 and wound up with a $3,000 profit, that I had to list the $300 I paid for the dinner as a campaign expenditure because I did not get any money to spend and it did not go for anything except the food which the people ate that night. So the Board ruled that was an expenditure.

So, it did not occur to us that it was an expenditure, and this is simply an attempt to bring a little bit of sense into it. Whatever the limitation is, it ought to be a limit for campaign expenditures.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYS. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, as a matter of fact, on the forms we have been using the money would appear both as an increase in campaign contribution and as a campaign expenditure, and therefore it has been very misleading. It is just like the way loans have been handled. It misleads the voters into thinking that a person got more money than he did and spent more.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYS. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. The point is that under present law we still have to list that as part of the contribution. I am glad to see the 25 percent amendment in there regardless of how we finally come out on the ceiling.

We should understand that when we talk about absolute ceiling under the Cleveland amendment, it is higher than $120,000.

Mr. HAYS. That is correct.

Mr. MATHIS of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment.

I shall not take 5 minutes, but I would like, in addition to the statement made by my distinguished chairman, to point out to the Members of the House that not only can this 25 percent be applied to meat and potatoes, as we have referred to it, but it can also be applied to such campaign efforts as direct mail. Furthermore, there is nothing in this bill that prohibits erecting a billboard and at the bottom of that billboard asking for campaign contributions, even if it is one line which says at the bottom of the billboard, "Send a buck to MATHIAS," or whatever it might say.

The amendment that the gentleman from New Hampshire (Mr. CLEVELAND) has offered would, in fact, make $75,000 a real figure. For that reason, I support it. I do not think there is any need for us to carry debate out as far as we did yesterday.

I think most people's minds are set, but I do urge support of the amendment.

Mr. OBEY. Mr. Chairman will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MATHIS of Georgia. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. OBEY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to express agreement with the gentleman from Georgia. I do not know about other people, but I would prefer we keep things in this country so that we run for office, not buy the office.

The gentleman from Indiana indicated that there are 435 districts across this country, and they are all different.

I wish the gentleman had recognized that on the vote on the amendment I just offered.

There are 435 districts in the country, but in only 26 of them last year did candidates spend over $150,000. We should not make the abnormal the rule.

I think this amendment is eminently sensible. I think we ought to support it.

Some people have told me, "I could not have gotten here if I could not have spent more than what is allowed in the bill."

I am sorry. I have great respect for every Member of this House, but I do not think any man or woman here is worth $180,000 in campaign spending.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Hampshire (Mr. CLEVELAND).

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

RECORDED VOTE

Mr. CLEVELAND. Mr. Chairman, on that I demand a recorded vote.

A recorded vote was ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—ayes 240, noes 175, not voting 19, as follows:

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MS. HOLTZMAN

Ms. HOLTZMAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HOLTZMAN: Page 2, line 12, strike out "$1,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$2,500."

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to have the amendment reread.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

The Clerk reread the amendment, as follows:

Amendment offered by Ms. HOLTZMAN: Page 2, line 12, strike out "$1,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$2,500".

(Ms. HOLTZMAN asked and was given permission to revise and extend her remarks.)

Ms. HOLTZMAN. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this campaign reform bill, as I understand it, is to prevent candidates from being beholden to special interests and to allow the election of persons to the Congress and to the Presidency who will be able to represent the voters and not the special interests. I think this bill does a great deal toward cleaning up the election process and I will support it, but I am very concerned about the effect it is going to have on permitting new people—and especially ones who are not wedded to special interests—to hold Federal office.

This bill permits special interest groups to make substantial contributions of $5,000 to a candidate and allows the wealthy candidate to use $25,000 from his personal funds to finance his campaign. But what about the person who does not have $25,000 and who is either too new or too independent—or too honest—to get $5,000 from special interest groups? And what about the nonincumbent who has the foregoing disabilities and, in addition, is not sufficiently well known to pick up a significant number of small contributions.

I believe that the clear effect of these provisions in the bill is to give an unfair advantage to candidates who have an "in" with the special interest groups or the political machines, who are wealthy, or who are incumbents. In other words, I am concerned that this bill may preclude the independent newcomer from competing successfully for political office.

For that reason I suggest that increasing the individual contribution limits will go a long way toward enabling newcomers who cannot get $5,000 from political committees and who cannot make the $25,000 personal contribution to get a foothold in the electoral process.

What my amendment would do is to raise from $1,000 to $2,500 the amount an individual can contribute to a candidate. The amendment does not increase the overall limit a candidate can spend, but it does allow, it seems to me, an independent newcomer to get the "seed" money that is necessary to communicate with an electorate to whom he is unknown and to wage a serious campaign for Federal office.

I had planned to introduce an amendment that would have limited increased contributions to nonincumbents because I think they are the ones we ought to be concerned about in this respect. Since the chairman of the committee, however, advised me he was going to raise a point of order against the amendment, I did not introduce it. Instead, I would seriously urge my colleagues to consider my amendment favorably if they want to allow nonwealthy independent newcomers, to enter the political process.

It is one thing to try to clean up politics. It is another thing to freeze out people who can breathe fresh life into this Government.

I urge adoption of this amendment.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I think the gentlewoman's amendment would do just the opposite of what she thinks it would do. The argument has been made, and I have been editorialized against for a year and a half, that we are trying to keep new people from coming in by putting on low limits that incumbents can raise and nonincumbents cannot. One of the things we tried to do in the bill was to lower the amount that people could give so that the nonincumbent would have an opportunity to get to people who give smaller amounts, whereas the incumbent might have, because of his incumbency, made friends with people who could give larger sums of money.

What this boils down to is: Do the Members want the limit that people can contribute to a campaign to be $1,000 or $2,500? That is all there is to it. There is nothing earth shaking about it. It is a decision for the House.

Let my say this. The committee started on the previous amendment with $60,000. As I said several times before, we walked up and down the road.

I just want to tell the Members that when we go to conference with the Senate that I do not intend to try to compromise the $60,000 figure. I voted for the $75,000. I am on record, that the House spoke rather decisively about what they wanted in the way of limitations and I intend to support the position of the House, because I am a great believer in majority rule. I do not think the other body ought to be pushing us around on a matter that was settled by a democratic vote and by a majority of 65 votes.

I did not feel any personal pain about that amendment passing. I did defend the bill. I did think the other figure was perhaps a better figure, but the House has spoken.

I will be willing to submit this amendment to the judgment of the House. The only thing I want us all to know is that there has been an awful lot of criticism in the country about rich people pouring their money into favored candidates. I do not have a single contributor in my district who has ever given me $1,000, so whether it is $1,000 or $2,500 is not going to affect me that much; but I think we ought to stick with the limit in the bill. I think it is a reasonable limit. Since the amount has been lowered to $60,000 for everybody, if that in unfair to nonincumbents, I cannot help that; but certainly if the argument is that a nonincumbent needs more money, he ought to be able to raise $60,000 easier than he would some other figure.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in opposition to the amendment.

(Mr. STEELE asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong opposition to the amendment offered by the gentlewoman from new York, which would increase the amount an individual could contribute to a candidate for Federal office.

I oppose the amendment because I believe that the key to driving big money and special interests out of politics is to limit the amount of money an individual or organization can contribute to a candidate to the lowest practical amount.

This is precisely what I am trying to do in my own campaign for Governor in Connecticut, and I believe I am demonstrating that a political candidate can run an effective campaign and raise adequate campaign funds even on a statewide level without accepting big contributions.

Specifically, I am not accepting any contribution from any person or organization in excess of $100; I am publicly reporting and filing with the secretary of the State the names of all my contributors and the amounts of their contributions every 30 days; and I am channeling all campaign contributions through a single campaign committee.

My small-contributor fundraising drive has already topped the $80,000 mark and attracted almost 3,000 individual contributors, a large number of whom have never contributed to a political campaign before.

In essence, we are showing in Connecticut that it is possible to eliminate big money from politics and still wage an effective campaign; that large numbers of people will respond to an honest effort to drive big money and special interests out of the political system; and that it is possible to attract new workers and contributors to participate in a political campaign despite the great cynicism toward politics which exists in this Watergate year.

With the $100 limit working so well in Connecticut, there is simply no way I can accept the gentlewoman's argument that the $1,000 contribution limit contained in the committee bill is too low. If anything, it is much too high and should be reduced. Since it is clear, however, that this body is not prepared to lower the limit at this time, let us at least not weaken he bill further by increasing the limit to $2,500. Such an increase would simply allow big contributors and special interests to play that much larger a role in financing campaigns across the country. Indeed, under the amendment, a mere 24 large contributors could finance an entire Congrssional campaign. Our goal should be to increase the number of small contributors to a political campaign, not to reduce the number, as the amendment would serve to do.

In sum, the amendment would significantly weaken the basic reform we are trying to accomplish here today, and I urge the House to reject it.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in opposition to the amendment.

(Mr. FRENZEL asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, the gentlewoman has raised a very good question. What she seeks to obtain is equity between individuals and special interest groups, and that effort is, indeed, laudable.

The problem is that, with the limitation we have now set, the gentlewoman's amendment would permit 24 people to finance a total election for any one candidate. That is just too few to be allowed to get into our law.

What drives her into that problem is that individuals are allowed to contribute much less than special interest groups. A better attack on the problem would be to reduce what the special interest groups can give. But, because the committee errored in combining political parties with special interest groups, we felt compelled to hold the level at $5,000.

The whole thing tells us we would have been better off with an open rule to give the Members better flexibility on this serious problem.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentlewoman from New York (Ms. HOLTZMAN).

The amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there additional amendments to title I? The Chair hears none.

Are there eligible amendments to title II?

COMMITTEE AMENDMENTS OFFERED BY MR. THOMPSON OF NEW JERSEY

Mr. THOMPSON of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I offer three committee amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendments offered by Mr. THOMPSON of New Jersey: Page 29, beginning in line 7, strike out "(B)" and all that follows down to but not including "(C)" in line 12, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"(B) the use of real or personal property and the cost of invitations, food and beverages, voluntarily provided by an individual to a candidate in rendering voluntary personal services on the individual's residential premises for candidate-related activities.".

Page 31, beginning in line 7, strike out "(D)" and all that follows down to but not including "(E)" in line 12, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"(D) the use of real or personal property and the cost of invitations, food and beverages, voluntarily provided by an individual to a candidate in rendering voluntary personal services on the individual's residential premises for candidate-related activities,".

Page 30, line 8, insert ", (C)," immediately after "(B)".

Mr. THOMPSON of New Jersey (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, these committee amendments are simply technical and conforming in nature. I ask unanimous consent that they be considered en bloc and be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

Mr. THOMPSON of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I refer the Members to page H7844 of the RECORD of yesterday, where the committee adopted the technical committee amendments. These amendments are simply to have in title II the identical changes as appear and were accepted in title I.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THOMPSON of New Jersey. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, these are the committee amendments which yesterday we approved for the expenditure and contribution limitations. They are identical today, and we are applying them to the disclosure section of the law.

They were adopted unanimously in the committee. They tighten loopholes which previously existed, and I hope they are agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendments offered by the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. THOMPSON).

The committee amendments were agree to.

COMMITTEE AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. BRADEMAS

Mr. BRADEMAS. Mr. Chairman, I offer a committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment offered by Mr. BRADEMAS: Page 25, strike out line 14 and all that follows down through page 27, line 24, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

(b)(1) Section 308(a)(10) of the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971 (as so redesignated by subsection (a) of this section), relating to the prescription of rules and regulations, is amended by inserting before the period at the end thereof the following: ", in accordance with the provisions of subsection (b) and (c)"

(c)(1) The supervisory officer shall prescribe suitable rules and regulations to carry out the provisions of this title, including such rules and regulations as may be necessary to require that—

Mr. BRADEMAS (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the committee amendment be dispensed with and that it be printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

(Mr. BRADEMAS asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BRADEMAS. Mr. Chairman, the amendment I am here offering is a committee amendment. It was unanimously accepted in the committee. It is an amendment concerning the Board of Supervisory Officers, and I shall explain the amendment very briefly.

The amendment would provide for a six member Board composed of four public members who will be appointed, two by the Speaker of the House and two by the President of the Senate—that is to say, the Vice President—on a bipartisan basis. There will also be sitting on the Board, but on a nonvoting basis, the Clerk of the House and the Secretary of the Senate.

The amendment also modifies the "review of regulations" section in the committee bill to provide that all rules and regulations be submitted, not to the House Administration Committee and not to the Senate Rules and Administration Committee, but rather to the Senate and the House for review. Regulations regarding House elections would be submitted to the House, and regulations regarding Senate elections to the Senate, and regulations regarding presidential elections to both the Senate and the House. The appropriate body of Congress would have 30 days within which to disapprove the proposed rule or regulation. If the regulations are submitted to both Houses, as in the case of the presidential election, either would have the power to disapprove.

In addition, the amendment would vest all supervisory responsibilities of the Comptroller General in the Board of Supervisory Officers. Most of the supervisory responsibilities of the Clerk of the House and Secretary of the Senate would be vested in the Board except that the Secretary and Clerk would act as custodians for the Board with respect to reports filed by candidates to the House and Senate, and the Board would be required to make such reports and statements available for public inspection and copying.

Mr. Chairman, I would make these observations in conclusion: We have tried in this committee amendment to respond to criticism of the language in the committee bill wherein Congressional employees were seated on the Board. Moreover, the committee earlier removed a provision whereby Members of the House and Senate were sitting on the Board.

Second, under this committee amendment, the chief responsibility for supervision and enforcement of the campaign laws is placed in a Board that is clearly independent.

Finally, as I have already indicated, the amendment removes the veto power from congressional committees.

To reiterate, the amendment was agreed to unanimously.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, would the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRADEMAS. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding to me.

Mr. Chairman, this is the amendment that, at one point, the gentleman from Florida and I served notice to the House that we would put in the RECORD.

This is a variation of the original Fascell-Frenzel amendment which the committee has accepted and which now appears before us in the form of this committee amendment.

It does represent a significant compromise. It makes the Clerk and the Secretary nonvoting members of the Supervisory Board and gives the Board, in my opinion, sufficient independence and authority so that we can expect uniform fair enforcement of our election law.

We do not touch the duties or the powers of the Board of Supervisory Officers at all. Instead of a veto of regulations by the committees of the House and Senate, that veto is reserved for the whole bodies of either House.

Mr. Chairman, in my judgment, this is a fine compromise. I congratulate the Chairman for having engineered that compromise, and the gentleman from Indiana as well. Most of all I applaud the gentleman from Florida (Mr. FASCELL).

I think the bill is in a good form to provide reasonable independent supervision, and yet to keep control of the regulations so that no supervisory agent can run roughshod over the Congress.

I do intend to ask for a vote on this amendment because I think some Members of the House may be concerned that we would concede some extra powers to the Senate, and I would not want anyone to feel that way about it.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield,

Mr. BRADEMAS. I will be glad to yield to the chairman, the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman say that he is going to ask for a recorded vote because he thinks we are conceding some powers to the Senate?

Mr. FRENZEL. I say that because the Senate bill has more authority for its independent commission, I felt it wise that this body go on record indicating that these are the total powers we would like the Board to have.

Mr. BRADEMAS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to express my appreciation to the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. FRENZEL) and to the gentleman from Florida (Mr. FASCELL) for their cooperation in working this out.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRADEMAS. I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I intend to take a little bit of time in order to express my feelings on this subject.

I thank the gentleman from Indiana for his help and effort, and I would like to express particular thanks to the chairman of the full committee, the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. Hays.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

When the gentleman from Minnesota and I started working on this amendment, there was a very wide gap between our views and the committee bill as it first came out of the committee. However, with his leadership on the minority side—and I pay tribute to the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. FRENZEL) for his perseverance and dedication on this matter—it became necessary for us to discuss the matter with the chairman of the full committee and with other Members.

I must say that in the best spirit of reaching a compromise which seems to meet all or most of the objections, I found the gentleman from Ohio, the chairman of the full committee (Mr. HAYS) to be, as he is known to be, tough and articulate, but not unresponsive. He has cooperated to the extent that now the gentleman from Minnesota and I and the committee have reached a position that the committee has accepted this as a committee amendment. I am grateful for that. I think that is the spirit and the way legislation should be arrived at here in this House.

All I want to say is that despite our feelings on the subject, the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. HAYS) has been responsive to a large group of people in this House, some 60 or more, who felt that this issue was a very vital issue. He was willing to work with us in order to achieve the compromise which is before us here today as a committee amendment.

Let me also say that it has been a pleasure to work with the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. FRENZEL) on this matter on behalf of the some 60 or so cosponsors who believed the amendment of the committee was absolutely essential. This amendment gives the primary responsibility for supervision and enforcement to this of our campaign reform laws to this independent enforcement commission.

Furthermore, Mr. Chairman, under section 315 and other sections of this bill, the elections commission besides having the primary supervisory and enforcement authority, is given full independent authority to seek enforcement through civil action in court by way of injunction or other appropriate relief, without the necessity of submitting the matter to the Attorney General first. This independent enforcement capability is the heart and crux of campaign reform.

So, Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the Federal Election Campaign Act Amendments of 1974 and certain amendments. This is one of the most important pieces of legislation to be considered by the House of Representatives during this Congress. The credibility of the Congress is at stake, and it is essential that we in the House of Representatives go on record in resounding support of the strongest measure possible.

The escalating cost of Federal election campaigns in recent years, and the growing reliance by candidates on large contributions from a few sources, have made it imperative that reasonable restrictions be enacted on total expenditures by candidates and on individual contributions.

Under the present law, there is no limitation on individual contributions to candidates for Federal office. As a result, as costs for Federal election campaigns have risen unchecked from an estimated $90 million in 1952 to an estimated $400 million in 1972, the need and the inclination to solicit and accept increasingly large contributions from individual contributors has grown proportionately.

Understandably, speculation and charges of undue influence and of "buying" candidates have gone hand in hand with the growing size of individual contributions. It is indeed difficult to make a convincing case that the contributor who gave $50,000 or $100,000 or even $1 million has not or cannot wield undue influence at some point with an elected official.

And the Watergate related scandals—the milk fund contributions, sizable corporate cash contributions, the laundering of cash contributions—have substantiated the charges and convinced the American people that their suspicions were warranted.

To restore public confidence in our elected officials and in the Federal election process, and to make absolutely sure that the massive campaign financing abuses we have recently witnessed do not recur, we must enact realistic limits on total campaign expenditures, on individual contributions, on cash contributions, and on committee contributions; and we must insure that these restrictions are vigorously enforced by an independent body.

Unless we make adequate provision for the independent and vigorous enforcement of the limitations we enact, we will remain open to charges of conflict of interest and public distrust will continue. I have intended, therefore, to offer an amendment with our colleague, Congressman BILL FRENZEL, and a strong bipartisan group of more than 60 Members of the House to make changes in the composition of the Board of Supervisory Officers and to eliminate congressional committee veto of the Board's regulations so that its independence is assured. Those joining in sponsoring the amendment include:

Bella Abzug, Brock Adams, John A. Anderson, LaMar Baker, Lindy Boggs, Clarence Brown, George Brown, Jr., Jim Broyhill, Clair Burgener, M. Caldwell Butler, Thad Cochran.

Barber Conable, Silvio Conte, John Conyers, Lawrence Coughlin, John Culver, John Dellenback, Robert Drinan, Thaddeus Dulski, John Erlenborn, Marvin Esch, Frank Evans, Thomas Foley, Donald Fraser, Lou Frey, Harold Froehlich.

Gilbert Gude, Tennyson Guyer, Lee Hamilton, Jim Hastings, John Heinz, Frank Horton, Jack Kemp, William Lehman, Gillis Long, Trent Lott, Richard Mallary, Wiley Mayne.

William Sarasin, Patricia Schroeder, Dick Shoup, Pete Stark, Gerry Studds, Roy Taylor, Morris Udall, William Walsh, Lester Wolff, Antonio Won Pat, Sidney Yates, Andrew Young.

I was pleased to note that in its editorial on Monday, August 5, the Washington Post commented on our amendment stating:

If any single amendment deserves to be adopted by the House, it is this one, for there could be no more constructive change in Federal campaign practices than to have the regulatory laws—whatever they may be—aggressively and consistently policed by an agency with enough authority to do the job.

I urge our colleagues to give their support to this amendment as it is now offered as a committee amendment.

Mr. Chairman, the American public is looking to the Congress for positive action to restore confidence in our system of government which has been so badly shaken in recent months. Passage of meaningful reforms in campaign financing laws would serve notice that we are cleaning house, and we will assure acsure accountability and eliminate any possibility of financial influence peddling.

Mr. MATHIS of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

(Mr. MATHIS of Georgia asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MATHIS of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I do not take this time to ask for a vote, as the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. FRENZEL) has indicated he is going to, on this amendment.

The committee did agree to this as a compromise. I think I have somewhat of an obligation to the Members of the House to ask the hypothetical question—it may well be the real question—and that is this: Where does this amendment come from? And why do we need it?

I think the obivous truth is that it came from Common Cause.

Mr. Chairman, I have not had one constituent in my district, except a few members of Common Cause, contact me about an independent election commission. In the time I have been in Congress I have not had one constituent write me and complain about the method by which the Clerk of the House and the Secretary of the Senate have conducted themselves in enforcing this law.

The record, I think, speaks more eloquently than I can to this point. There have ben over 5,000 violations of the 1971 act referred to the Department of Justice for prosecution, and I am informed that there have been three which have been followed through on.

So where is the demand for this amendment coming from? Why are we doing this to ourselves?

In accepting this amendment, we are taking away whatever power we might have vested in the Clerk of the House and in the Secretary of the Senate to insure that they would regulate and they would police and they would monitor the activities of this House.

I think what we are going to do when we adopt this amendment—and I think it will be adopted—to create an independent election commission is this: We going to set up a bunch of headhunters down here who are going to spend their full time trying to make a name for themselves persecuting and prosecuting Members of Congress.

I will say to the Members of the House that I think if we adopt this amendment—and I think we are going to do that—each and every one of us is going to rue the day we did.

Mr. BURLISON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MATHIS of Georgia. I yield to gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. BURLISON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, is the gentleman from Georgia saying that with this amendment we are setting the stage for making it impossible for an incumbent to get a fair shake before this group.

Mr. MATHIS of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I think my friend, the gentleman from Missouri, may very well be eminently correct. I think there will be a tendency in that direction.

Of course, we do not know who is going to be on this commission; we have no idea. It might have been 2 years ago the members might have been Erlichman, Mitchell, Haldeman, and Dean.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MATHIS of Georgia. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, as the gentleman knows, I have had sympathy for his position. I opposed as vigorously as I knew how the idea of the Presidential commission.

Somebody came in with the proposal during hearings that we have a five-member commission consisting of the President and four persons appointed by him, and I resisted that. The gentleman is eminently right. It might have been those persons the gentleman named, given the situation 2 years ago or 3 years ago.

Mr. Chairman, this commission will be appointed by the Speaker and the Vice President, two by each. Of the two they appoint, one has to be of a different political party.

I think it is unlikely that the Speaker of the House and the present Vice President, who, incidentally, will obviously not be doing the appointing—some new Vice President will—are going to appoint people of the caliber the gentleman mentioned. There is this danger, I would say to the gentleman, that these people will find themselves unoccupied or not occupied enough and will try to become headhunters.

However, in Ohio, for example, we have the entire power vested in the Secretary of State, and he is of one political party. He does not have much else to do, and I am happy to say that our present Secretary of State has found other fields of recreation. He spends most of his time drinking, so, therefore, he does not bother to hunt anybody's head.

So, therefore, this town being what it is, we may find that the commission will wind up in some other recreation, like out at Burning Tree or something like that. But the House and the Senate will have oversight on this, and as long as I am chairman, I will exercise some authority.

Mr. MATHIS of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the remarks made by my distinguished chairman. I know how hard he really worked to arrive at some compromise with which we can live in this body.

But my chairman knows that there is no vote reserved for any employee or Member of the House if it were taken away from the Clerk of the House.

Mr. THOMPSON of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MATHIS of Georgia. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. THOMPSON of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I am in support of the amendment, and certainly agree with the gentleman that the Clerk of the House of Representatives and the representative of the Senate should have a vote if they are to be on the Commission, otherwise I see no useful purpose in it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

(On the request of Mr. THOMPSON of New Jersey, and by unanimous consent, Mr. MATHIS of Georgia was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. MATHIS of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. THOMPSON of New Jersey. I simply wanted to say that this is infinitely better than the Senate version, which has them appointed by the President.

Mr. MATHIS of Georgia. I agree fully with my friend, the gentleman from New Jersey, that it is in fact a better provision than exists in the Senate bill. I would certainly hold out no hope we could defeat this amendment, and I have no intention to do so. I have simply taken this time to point out to the Members of the House the dangers I see to us as sitting Members of this body, and would say that the Members had better watch their heads once the Commission is established.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, I would just say to the Members of the House that the gentleman from Florida (Mr. FASCELL) has been very kind in praising me for the ability to compromise, and I think I do have that ability. But when we go to conference this will be the board or there "ain't" going to be any bill, and I will not give in to the Senate version on this one, and I know the other conferees will not, either.

Mr. MATHIS of Georgia. I appreciate the statement and the assurances of my chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. BRADEMAS).

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

RECORDED VOTE

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, I demand a recorded vote.

A recorded vote was ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—ayes 391, noes 25, not voting 18, as follows:

So the committee amendment was agreed to.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

(Mr. BINGHAM asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, first I would like to compliment the chairmen and the committee on the fine job they have done on this difficult legislation.

I take this time to ask the chairman of the committee to clarify a matter that has to do with possible conflict between two sections of the bill. On page 7 of the bill there is a provision that limits a candidate and members of his immediate family to an expenditure of $25,000, and immediate family is defined in the law to include spouse, brother, sister, child, parent, and so forth; however, in the section we have been talking about earlier, on page 2 of the bill we have a limit on contributions to $1,000.

Is it the chairman's intention that the limit on the candidate's family expenditure of $25,000 is the controlling section as far as members of a candidate's immediate family are concerned?

Mr. HAYS. That is the intent. That is the controlling section, and if the members of the immediate family pool their resources to give $25,000, that is it. But, it does not say that any one of them can give, if there were five in a family, one can give $21,000 and the others are limited to $1,000 apiece. It is a pooling affair.

Mr. BINGHAM. I thank the chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there additional eligible amendments to title II? Are there committee amendments to title III?

Are there eligible amendments to title IV?

COMMITTEE AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. HAYS

Mr. HAYS Mr. Chairman, I offer a committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment offered by Mr. HAYS: Page 79, line 14, insert "(1)" immediately after "(b)".

(2) The amendment made by section 407 shall apply with respect to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1971.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, this is a clarifying amendment to an amendment we had in the bill on the tax return, where there is no income. All this does is make it apply to any taxable year after the calendar year 1971, which is this taxable year.

Therefore, it is just to wipe out the slate totally which we intended to wipe out.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. HAYS).

The committee amendment was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. FRENZEL

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FRENZEL: Page 58, strike line 17 and all that follows down through page 61, line 4.

Page 61, line 6, strike out "407" and insert in lieu thereof "406".

Page 61, line 15, strike out "408" and insert in lieu thereof "407".

Page 79, line 15, strike out "408, and 409" and insert in lieu thereof "and 408".

Mr. FRENZEL (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with and that it be printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is very simple in intent. It strikes from the bill the provision that provides for Federal financing of national party nominating conventions. The bill, as it is before us, provides that the party conventions will be financed out of the public Treasury in the amount of $2 million for each of the major parties. In addition, it provides that either party may spend in excess of the $2 million which they receive from the taxpayers' funds.

Mr. Chairman, it is my strongly held belief that the Federal Government has no business controlling national party nominating conventions; that it should neither tell the parties of this country how much they can spend, nor should it give them any amount of money to spend. Financing can only lead to control, and we do not need Government control of either of our two fine parties.

Mr. Chairman, this is a fundamental philosophical point. The parties belong to the people. The parties have been free of the Government. Here, unless we adopt my amendment, we are now attaching them to the bureaucracy. We would be making them a part of the official Government establishment.

We would be, in fact, nationalizing the political parties of this great country. Therefore, I believe that it is absolutely essential that this portion be stricken from the bill.

I hope the Committee will support my amendment, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BRADEMAS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, we all now know that Presidential nominating conventions, even as our Presidential primary elections, are an essential part of the process of electing an American President, as important in their own way as is the general election in the fall.

I would point out, in urging rejection of this amendment, that we already have public financing of national Presidential nominating conventions in this country because most of the money that finances these conventions comes from tax deductions for advertising, deductions that are taken by various business and labor groups for advertisements published in the convention programs that are distributed at the convention. So the present system is one whereby all of the taxpayers in the country involuntarily pay, through the tax deduction route, for the holding of conventions.

However, under the language in the committee bill, only those taxpayers who voluntarily participate in the dollar check-off participate in supporting the public financing of our two national nominating conventions.

A second point I would like to make, Mr. Chairman, is that the provision in the committee bill for the public financing of Presidential nominating conventions is the recommendation of the Bipartisan Commission on Convention Financing. This is not a partisan matter.

The third point I would like to make, Mr. Chairman, is that utilization of public financing is voluntary on the part of the political parties. A political party is not mandated to receive public funds from the dollar check-off system, and if it does not wish to do so, it can use up to $2 million in private funds to finance its convention.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that if we retain the language in the committee bill, both with respect to Presidential nominating conventions and Presidential primaries, we shall be filling out the initiative that Congress undertook in 1972 in providing that, beginning in 1976, we shall have public financing of Presidential general elections.

Surely, the events which are plaguing and afflicting all of the people of the United States now, Democrats and Republicans and Independents, in respect of the events associated with the 1972 election ought not to return to plague and afflict us once more.

Let us vote down this amendment.

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRADEMAS. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Chairman, I want to associate myself with the remarks of the gentleman from Indiana and to compliment him for the work and time and effort that he was devoted in committee on this particular public financing section of the bill.

Public financing—and we all are acquainted with the term—is an idea whose time has come. We must recognize it.

We are not spending money out of the public treasuries. As I pointed out yesterday, over $60 millions will be checked off by the American taxpayers. They are saying to the Members of the Congress, "We are checking this money off because we want you to spend this money so that we can have the type of election and the type of conventions in America that will reduce the pressure of the big-money interests in this country."

Mr. Chairman, I therefore urge the defeat of the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota, because the American people have said to us, in giving us this responsibility: "Give us public financing and give us the type of public financing that will insure elections in a free and in a democratic system."

Mr. BRADEMAS. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from Illinois for his contribution.

I will conclude by saying that, as we all know, Mr. Chairman, we are in the midst of a week which is probably historic for the future of our country in respect of the Presidency of the United States. Let us take advantage of that historic situation and make a change for the better in the financing of our Presidential elections.

Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment is rejected.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in support of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. FRENZEL).

I wish to make this brief statement: The reason I feel this amendment is most appropriate is because national political conventions have been in the past clearly outside the realm of government and should be. To believe for one moment that by this kind of public financing out of the U.S. Treasury that we are being fair to the small political party or the so-called potential poor-boy Presidential candidate, I think, is a joke. My belief is that because this is a highly discriminatory portion of the present bill H.R. 16090 in favor of the major parties of this country, this approach is wholly unfair to small minority parties. To use public funds to give total advantage to the two major parties to have convention extravaganzas is, I think, a major disgrace to the concept of civil rights.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROUSSELOT. I yield to my colleague, the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I wish to point out, in response to a previous speaker who indicated that this money was somehow blessed because it was checked off on an income tax form, that there is no money that anyone has given because of the checkoff.

The checkoff simply means that that particular person thinks that we should spend money on public financing. That person does not give $1 extra of his own money, and that person is out numbered by those people who did not check off.

There is no fund. There is simply a paper amount of money. We have not reserved anything; we have drawn funds directly from the Federal Treasury.

In effect, what someone who is participating in the checkoff is saying is: "I want to use somebody else's money to finance political conventions."

Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for his comments, and I hope my colleagues will be persuaded that this is a highly discriminatory provision in the bill. It should be stricken, as the gentleman from Minnesota is trying to do, I think, very persuasively. I urge a vote for the Frenzel amendment.

Mr. HUDNUT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROUSSELOT. I would be glad to yield to my colleague, the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HUDNUT. Mr. Chairman, I wish to associate myself with the comments of the gentleman from California.

Mr. Chairman, In connection with this debate on the wisdom of deleting section 9008 of H.R. 16090—page 53—regarding payments for Presidential nominating conventions, I am pleased to rise in support of the amendment offered by my distinguished colleague from Minnesota, and would like, in this connection, to share with my colleagues the remarks of Indiana's Republican National Committeeman, the Honorable L. Keith Bulan, made before the Republican National Committee on April 26, 1974. They are as follows:

REMARKS BY L. KEITH BULEN

If there ever was a critical time in the history of our party when the responsibilities of our party stewardship should weigh heavily upon our conscience and our deliberations, it should be here and now April 26, 1974.

For the highest elected national leadership of a party that advocates decentralization of the Federal Government, the free enterprise system, self reliance, and individual citizen responsibility; to consider turning their party conventions over to the Federal Government to finance and direct seems to me incredible.

The seriousness of the present circumstances has compelled me to say that which I should have said long ago and that which I know to be right.

In spite of the affection and high regard in which I hold each and every one of you, particularly our national chairman, George Bush, and his three predecessors under whom I have been privileged to serve. The past six years of my personal participation on the R.N.C. and the executive committee has been, in many ways, the most frustrating and depressing years of my adult life.

When I say I feel compelled to speak, I mean it in the literal sense. My self respect and individual sense of worth have been sorely tested all too long, and I need and solicit your indulgence for my own self therapy if for no mutual benefit.

I came to this committee in 1968 full of enthusiasm and energies for the task of assisting in building a strong Republican National party organization the only way I knew, precinct by precinct, ward by ward, township by township, county by county, district by district, and State by State. I felt a strong commitment to serve meaningfully in accomplishing what I prayfully hoped was our Nation's destiny which required, in my heart and mind, a strong, effective, and ongoing Republican National party in fact, rather than one of paper or fiction.

One, encompassing and embracing hundreds of thousands of selfless, well motivated Americans from all walks of life sharing the toil and unheralded self satisfaction that comes from providing good responsive Government for all citizens and to know that you have done your part in achieving such a lofty pursuit. My zeal was almost evangelic, as I had always felt that politics was the highest of callings and the vehicle by which I might be of the most service to my fellow man.

Unfortunately, my service on the committee has not fulfilled my desire to serve, and has in fact caused me considerable remorse by reason of what, in my opinion, has been a lack of effectiveness that almost approaches failure and in contravention of the trust and confidence that I felt had been reposed in me by my constituents in Indiana who deserve better treatment.

Not only have I failed by inaction and silence to be a force to strengthen my party nationally, but I despair that I have unwittingly, by such nonfeasance, been responsible for not meeting the challenge that was ours. In candor, I am uncertain but that our party is now worse off than it was, and that I will not have left it better for my endeavors, which is a self-imposed requirement necessary to justify my very existence.

At this particular juncture, which in many ways seems almost as a dream that is fastly becoming a nightmare, I now find myself participating in deliberations which can certainly be the death knell for the two party system in this country. Such an aberation is abhorrent to me.

To turn my party and its primary function over to a Democrat Congress or to any Congress for that matter is unthinkable. I know of no single issue in my political recollection about which I feel so strongly. Federal campaign financing is indeed repugnant to my sense of a free and independent elective process, but for the R.N.C. to now seriously consider Federal financing of our primary party obligation, knowing the inevitability of restrictions and directives that invariably flow therefrom, is, in my judgment, a complete repudiation of our elected responsibilities to preserve and strengthen the national party.

Certainly my State of Indiana has no stomach for such abdication of party responsibility and has unanimously, as a State central committee, adopted a resolution in complete opposition to such a fatal course of action. Indiana, as an alternative, suggests a more austere convention format that we can afford, and/or we urge a further exploration of the possibility of private foundation grants, and/or individual or business tax credit or deduction consideration for convention contributors, and/or media related facilities or expenses be borne by the media, and/or sale of reserved seating, boxes, and in any event, Indiana offers to bear its share of any convention assessment, but respectfully demands the integrity of the nomination processes of our party convention be preserved and strengthened, not diluted or obviated.

We wish no part of selling our birthright or party heritage. Our Hoosier Republican workers often virtually risk their very lives in an effort to have honest elections in some areas of our State. We members of the R.N.C. from Indiana could not return to face those brave ladies and gentlemen after having participated in demeaning their commitment to persevere in face of adversity.

This is not the time, regardless of our difficulties or embarrassment, when we should collectively seek only the more comfortable or convenient option. The ultimate stakes are too important. As a matter of fact, this is indeed precisely the time to take off our coats, roll up our sleeves, lift up our eyes, keep our cool, and proceed realistically to do the nitty gritty job of permanent party building that has too long been delayed by the R.N.C.'s preccupation with congressional, senatorial, and presidential campaigns, which at the most, have provided only incidental side benefits to actual party building and, on occasion, have done grave party harm.

It is no philosophical bent that causes me to make my remarks but from the experiences accumulated over some thirty-five years of running campaigns and from an immeasurable investment in and commitment to a free and unfettered strong two party system as the only workable underpinning for our form of Government.

(Messrs. ROUSSELOT and HUDNUT asked and were given permission to revise and extend their remarks.)

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. FRENZEL).

The question was taken; and the chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

RECORDED VOTE

Mr. ROUSSELOT. Mr. Chairman, on that I demand a recorded vote.

A recorded vote was ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—ayes 223, noes 193, not voting 18, as follows:

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. FRENZEL

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FRENZEL: Page 61, strike line 14 and all that follows down through page 78, line 3.

Page 78, line 5, strike "409" and insert in lieu thereof "408".

Page 79, line 15, strike out "408, and 409" and insert in lieu thereof "and 408".

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, by the adoption of the last amendment this House has saved the taxpayers $4 million.

This amendment which I am now proposing will enable us to save many times that sum. This amendment strikes from the bill the provisions that provide for matching public funds for Presidential primaries. That is all it does.

I think all of us know the arguments for and against public financing. I am prepared to make them more so perhaps than the rest of the Members, but I would rather concentrate on one particular aspect of this amendment.

The primaries, I believe, should be open to any candidate who wishes to become the President of the United States; but they have become, because of the concentration of media attention, the exclusive province of Members of the other body of this Congress. So every 4 years we witness the quadrennial ritual of Senators absenting themselves from their duties to campaign for 6 months for the Presidency while the Congress is in session. If we supply public funds to encourage this kind of activity, we are simply giving the Senators a paid vacation, instead of one which they have to pay for themselves.

Now, in addition to doing this for the other body, if we agree to the Presidential public financing, we are contributing to the destruction of the political parties, for with public money, who needs party money, who needs party discipline and who needs public alliance?

We will have more candidates for more dollar spending for elections, and the party system will deteriorate. At the same time, we will discourage third parties because there is a very high entry threshold. Candidates must raise a great deal of money before they can qualify for the matching fund. Therefore, a new party, or third party, is beat before it starts, and we are again left with the usual line up of candidates and who are they? Members of the other body, of course.

More than this, however, as I pointed out when the House wisely adopted the last amendment, by adopting this amendment we can bring back to the people some control over their election processes.

Every ounce of Federal financing means another step forward toward giving control of elections to the bureaucracy. Every bit of Federal financing takes the elections a little farther from the people and a little more tightly under the control of the bureaucracy.

Mr. Chairman, I do not want to belabor this point. I only want to thank the Members for their enlightened vote on the last amendment and urge a vote for this amendment, which will eliminate the matching Presidential primary raid on the public purse to support the candidacy of people seeking our Presidency in future years.

Mr. BRADEMAS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

(Mr. BRADEMAS asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BRADEMAS. Mr. Chairman, let us consider where we are this afternoon.

We are on the floor of the House of Representatives, waiting to go to our television sets a little later tonight for an event that is rumored to be one that will have great significance for the people of this country and indeed, all of the people of the world.

We are all anticipating the probable resignation of the President of the United States. And why? Because we have witnessed over the last several months, month after month, revelations of the most spectacular lawlessness and corruption in the 200 years of the history of this country.

And what have we just witnessed in respect of the second stage of an effort begun by Congress in 1972 with the adoption of legislation providing for the public financing of Presidential general elections?

What have we just witnessed in respect of an opportunity that this Congress now has to clean up the kind of Presidential election revelations about which have brought the downfall of a man who was elected overwhelmingly 2 years ago?

Mr. Chairman, I will tell you. We have just witnessed the spectacle of his party voting by 177 to 7 to keep the same old system by which we have been financing Presidential elections in this country.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that upon that party—and its Representatives in Congress—there should now be some sense of public responsibility to join with those on this side, even as some of you on that side have already joined, to help clean up Federal elections in this country.

So, Mr. Chairman, I hope that we will reject this effort to strike from the bill the provision for public financing of Presidential primary elections.

This provision does not raid the Treasury of the United States. The moneys come from the funds freely, voluntarily designated by the taxpayer to go into the dollar checkoff fund.

So, Mr. Chairman, I would suggest, in the most direct way possible, to my friends on the minority side of the aisle that if they vote on this amendment as they did on the last amendment, the American people will reject them at the polls in November even as the American people are rejecting the present President of the United States.

The time has come to reduce the influence of big money in our Presidential elections—and this means primaries and national conventions as well as the general elections.

I urge the defeat of the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. THOMPSON of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRADEMAS. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. THOMPSON of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I rather thoroughly agree with the gentleman's remarks. I might remind those who think that the taxpayer is being saved money by the passage of the last amendment are wrong. The conventions in the future, as in the past, will be financed by advertisements which are deductible, which are the people's money, in order to finance them.

I really am bitterly disappointed, and certainly hope that the current amendment will be defeated.

Mr. BRADEMAS. Mr. Chairman, I thank my colleague from New Jersey for his contribution. I hope my friends on the minority side will seize upon this amendment as an opportunity to redeem themselves from their vote on the previous amendment.

Mr. ANDERSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

(Mr. ANDERSON of Illinois asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ANDERSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I yield first to the gentleman from New York (Mr. FISH).

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I do resent the remarks of the previous speaker in the well with reference to ITT, and I think I have the standing in this House to do so.

Both our national parties will be holding conventions in 1976 and I do not expect the the Democratic Party, the gentleman's party, will be involved in any ITT business in that next general election.

I think another answer might be that we all might well consider the frivolousness, in many cases, and the large expenditures that go into national party conventions. Perhaps there is a better way of choosing our national candidates in the future.

Mr. ANDERSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, and members of the committee, I, too, join my friend, the gentleman from New York, in deeply regretting the kind of admonitory remarks the gentleman from Indiana, the distinguished deputy majority whip, has seen fit moments ago to deliver from the well of this House.

This is a sad day in the history of our country, assuming, as we all do, the events that will take place later this evening.

There is not anyone in this House, on either side of the aisle, who does not deeply deplore and regret the events that took place in the last Presidential campaign that in some respects are responsible for what we contemplate today.

However, I am not going to stand before this House and before the American people and apologize for the vote that I just made in defeating the effort to finance conventions through the checkoff, without any matching requirement.

I think that the gentleman from Indiana and many on this side of the aisle know that I have labored ceaselessly for many months now to inject a certain measure of public financing into the political process. I sought to do that along with the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. UDALL), the gentleman from Washington (Mr. FOLEY), the gentleman from New York (Mr. CONABLE) and many others, 40 in all, who have cosponsored an amendment that we hope yet to offer this afternoon that would provide, with respect to small contributions of $50 or less, that there could be a matching payment out of the Federal Treasury, out of the checkoff fund, not directly out of general funds, but out of the checkoff funds that have previously been established.

To suggest, however, that there is some shame that should be associated with our vote in saying that we did not want to inject total public financing into the financing of national conventions is to confuse the issue entirely.

I talked to the distinguished national chairman of my party, a former colleague of ours, a man of whom we are all proud, Mr. George Bush. His objection to total public financing of these national conventions was simply on the ground that he felt that it might lead to Federal regulations; if they were totally financed from Federal funds, it might lead to regulation that would extend even to the matter of delegate apportionment.

We now, of course, have a very important case that is pending in the Federal courts where we seek to adjudicate that issue. Therefore, I want to make it clear that there are some of us on my side of the aisle who in a very few minutes are going to support a matching amendment. We are all for encouraging small contributions of under $50 to eliminate big money and special-interest money from the financing of Congressional and Senatorial campaigns.

I hope the gentleman from Indiana will join me in supporting that amendment. I hope a majority of those on his side of the aisle will join us in supporting that amendment. But please do not leave the record in the shape in which it stands now, that somehow by voting against the amendment or voting for the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. FRENZEL), we have subscribed to the abuses that did mar the 1972 campaign.

Mr. BRADEMAS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON of Illinois. Since I have mentioned the gentleman's name, I will yield to him.

Mr. BRADEMAS. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman. The gentleman knows the high respect I have for him. Earlier in the debate I referred to his outstanding contributions to shaping the climate for a worthwhile campaign reform bill.

Mr. ANDERSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman.

Mr. BRADEMAS. But I want to say to my friend, the gentleman from Illinois, that I have here a letter which I did not mention in the debate on the last amendment. I do now think it appropriate, however, to mention the letter, in view of the citation by the gentleman from Illinois of the views of the distinguished Republican National Chairman, a former colleague of ours in this body, who said, in a letter of January 29, 1974:

> Bob Strauss and I appointed a bipartisan committee to look into new ways of financing the national conventions.
> One of the thoughts that came out of the first meeting was that the checkoff for political contributions should be amended so that the first $2 million go to the financing of the conventions.

Mr. Bush goes on:

> Frankly, it has an awful lot of merit to me. Much of the cost of the conventions has been financed through selling convention ads to corporations . . .

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. ANDERSON) has expired.

Mr. ANDERSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I be allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object—and I do not intend to object—there are a lot of Members who have made commitments for this evening, and I am going to object to any further extension of time after this in the interest of trying to get this finished.

Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. BRADEMAS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, before I yield, I would appreciate it if the gentleman would then leave me 1 minute, because I have something in addition to cover.

Mr. BRADEMAS. Of course.

Mr. ANDERSON of Illinois. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. BRADEMAS. Mr. Chairman, I simply want to say this—and I will spell this out further in the revision of my remarks—Chairman Bush endorsed this idea earlier. I was advised of that endorsement when I supported the amendment in good faith. I must say that for him to be turning around on a dime now and in effect leave us divided in such a partisan fashion on this campaign reform bill is not fair.

Mr. ANDERSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, let me reply to the gentleman's statement.

I do not challenge his good faith in offering the amendment, but let me make it clear that in the conversation I had with the distinguished national chairman of my party as recently as a week ago he explained to me at the time this proposition was originally offered he did not take into consideration the impact that the adoption of such an amendment might have on the court case that is now pending with respect to the apportionment of delegates during the 1976 conventions. He does not want to jeopardize the decision in that case and inject a possible Federal control of our national conventions.

That ought to be of as much concern on this side of the aisle as it is on my side of the aisle. That is the reason why we took the position we did on the Frenzel amendment, not because we were subscribing to anything in the way of illicit or unsavory practices with respect to the financing of national conventions or campaigns.

Mr. DENNIS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, we always play politics kind of rough in the State of Indiana, and I suppose it is about par for the course that my colleague, the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. BRADEMAS), succeeded in bringing this debate down from the high levels of alleged statesmanship in which it has been wandering to the ordinary partisan level which one might normally expect from the other side of the aisle.

But since he has done so, and hoping to retreat to a slightly more statesmanlike stance, let me point out a couple of things which, in my sincere opinion, are the real problems here, problems which we have not bothered to face and which, I may say to the gentlemen on the other side of the aisle, they have not had the guts to face and have not had any intention to face.

We are taking into consideration a reform bill here, as I had occasion to note yesterday, as did some other Members, under a lousy gag rule where one cannot even put in an amendment to the bill.

What amendments can we not put in? Well, we cannot put in an amendment which will reach the fact, for instance, that about half the Members over there are here thanks to involuntary union dues collected from people who have to pay them in order to work; and then they channel them into political action committees and use them to elect Members of Congress.

Where do we get around to the point in this bill of offering an amendment on that subject, I would like to ask the Members?

Mr. BRADEMAS. Mr. Chairman, will my friend, the gentleman from Indiana, yield?

Mr. DENNIS. No, Mr. Chairman, I will not yield right now. I have something else I want to say.

The trouble with this country and the reason we have special interest money running it, both from business—and we do—and from milk funds, as well as from labor and from everybody else, is that we have made the Government too big and too powerful, and every single person in this country who has two nickels, or a business, or a farm, has to come down here and beg for permission to live. And naturally they try to pay the bureaucrats and the politicians off.

Who did that? The party on the other side of the aisle, for the last 30 years, did that.

Now, the President of our party who, unfortunately, perhaps—learned your lessons too well, is about to pay for your sins. And you get up here and make fun and gloat about it in this sad hour of the Union. I am sorry to see it done.

I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I am delighted that the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. DENNIS) is able to get this debate on such a high plane, and I want to stay right on that high plane with the gentleman.

I noticed he used the word "retreat," and I would say that he has had some good experience in retreating lately. I am only sorry that he did not get to retreat on TV, like he made his defense on TV.

But, Mr. Chairman, somehow or other I have been getting the impression all day—and maybe we got a preview of it here from the gentleman from Indiana—I have been getting the impression that we are going to hear a speech at 9 o'clock tonight which is somehow or other going to be blamed on the Democrats for the predicament the President is in. And that is what the gentleman from Indiana said.

I have personally felt very sorry for Mr. Nixon, and I still do. I would not be any party to any hounding him after he retires or resigns from office. But I just hope that those folks over there do not think for one minute that we are going to let you get away with blaming us somehow for all of the people that are in the penitentiary and who are going to the penitentiary, and who will go to the penitentiary.

I have counseled with candidates for Congress on our side not to talk about Watergate because there are plenty of other issues. But if the gentleman from Indiana wants to make that the issue, well, I suppose we can rise to that high plane the gentleman is talking about and debate it with him. I would just as soon that we did not. I do not really think it has any place here.

We are going to decide whether or not we have public financing for primaries. We are going to decide whether we have public financing for the Presidential race. And the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. ANDERSON) who is against it on the one hand, is for it on the other, and we will have an amendment from him and the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. UDALL) to extend it to Members of the House and Senate. And I am going to fight them as hard as I know how.

I have abided by the will of the House, and I will stand by the will of the House in the conference.

The House decided it wanted a $60,000 limitation, and I am going to stand by that. The House decided it did not want the conventions financed, which I think was a mistake. My God, if you took a look at either one of them in November you might wish the Federal Government did regulate them. I guess the reason most people on our side voted against it was they were afraid that the same kind of people who took over the Miami convention would do it again, and they did not want to have any of their money in it. I guess that was the general motivating factor. But let us decide it, and vote our conscience, and abide by it.

I do not really mind a little rough debate now and then. And as I go back and read the debates in the time of Andrew Jackson and in the time of Thomas Jefferson, and in the time of the Adamses and then look at the statement now, I can see the difference.

If you say something if you think someone in this House is an idiot, you cannot say you think that because that is not gentlemanly conduct. They used to say a lot worse things than that about people in the old days, and the Republic has survived. I am not saying I think there is anyone who is that in the House, but there would be a way to get around it if one wanted to.

But what I am saying and what I finally want to say is, let us leave the partisanship out of it, and let us vote on the merits.

As chairman of the committee and as one of the conferees, I am going to try to uphold whatever the majority of this House wants. I hope that this experiment—and it is an experiment—in public financing and a voluntary checkoff, which is a referendum on the primary and on the Presidential election, will stand. I am not willing to go any further than that until we see how it works out in that instance.

Mr. CONLAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

(Mr. CONLAN asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. CONLAN. Mr. Chairman, I do not often speak on the floor here, but I have been listening to the comments on both sides these last few minutes and am moved to speak. I cannot help but think as a newcomer to this body that maybe the happenings of the last weeks and the last days might bring some sober reappraisal to all of us. Some of you who have been here for years know the tremendous accumulation of power that has been created in the Central Government here in Washington.

The gentleman from Indiana spoke of the special interests and the favoritism that seeks to come into campaign financing; but the other gentleman from Indiana put it very aptly when he said, "Why does that money come in?" It comes in because this Congress has created within its will and its authority, a bureaucracy that has the power to give special favors and the power to remove bureaucratic heavyhandedness, so that private individuals can have fair treatment from that bureaucracy.

I have listened to some of the older Members who have been here for years and some of you middle-aged Members, who say, "10 years ago we had time for reflection on major issues. We had time to think through issues. We could sit down, and we could read a book, and we could think about world affairs. We could have real input into decisionmaking. We could think about the foreign policy and the domestic directions of this country." But now they say in private conversations, "We have become ombudsmen; we have become paper shufflers; we are on a treadmill." You spend so much time answering your mail and seeking Federal handouts for your constituents because of the tremendous increase in power that the Federal Government has obtained over so many people's lives. People can hardly go to the toilet today without getting a Federal permit.

And so the public comes to you to interface and intercede between the bureaucracy and them. Does one wonder why the unethical money is coming in? Does one wonder why people try to buy in? Does one wonder why Congressmen are tempted and have to say no? Sometimes the temptations take hold, history has shown.

I think it is time for this body to begin thinking that maybe it has created over the years, as the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. DENNIS), has said, a situation which invites the corruption that we have seen too much of. And maybe the time is here to redress and correct that problem by redirecting power down to the States and the communities where the people can interface with a local bureaucracy, with their own resources, rather than having so much of it drained off here in Washington where the money is being dissipated through a tremendous overhead, and where the citizens get only 60 cents on the dollar back. Then to get out from under control of Federal controls and then to get a fair break, they have to try to buy in somewhere to get a fair shuffle.

That type of situation, Mr. Chairman, makes us need to rethink. I believe if the happenings of the last 18 months have brought us a better awareness of what has caused corruption and dishonesty, then we can rise above the pedestrian problems we are getting into, and be a Congress that can think through the critical areas of national concern . . . and leave some of the regulation and financing of government at the local level.

Then the public will have more respect for their institutions; they will have more respect for the Congress; the temptations here will be less for you, and the level of nobility and morality of this country might rise once again to the high level the public expects of it, and where it should be.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. I am as sorry as the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. BRADEMAS) that we adopted the most recent amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota. The committee had attempted in good faith to reduce the rather shameful reliance that both parties—both parties—have had upon a little handful of big contributors to the national campaigns, to the national conventions and to the maintenance of the national parties.

In 1967 I wrote an article for Harpers magazine, in the research for which I did a study of the financing of the national conventions of both parties in the preceding election, in the year 1964. A substantial part of the money raised for those national conventions in that year came from the publication of fancy brochures with ads selling for $10,000 to $15,000 a page. The Democrats entitled their book "Toward an Age of Greatness" and the Republicans called theirs "Congress, the Heart Beat of Government."

But now let us look at who bought those ads. Were these average citizens, were they plain-vanilla people trying to establish their rights of citizenship and have some voice in the selection of the two candidates who would be presented to the voters? No. They really were not.

Eleven of the top twenty-five contractors in the Nation purchased those ads in the books and, and they are some of the same people who were called upon as recently as 1972 to contribute money to the enormously costly job of trying to run a Presidential campaign. Many of them were corporations legally prohibited from contributing to campaigns, but they were able to buy ads in these books whose proceeds went to the same general purpose, and they deducted the payments as business expense.

Six airlines bought ads. Some were the same as have recently been found guilty of contributing illegally in the 1972 campaign. Three railroads bought ads. The Tennessee Gas Transmission Co. bought ads. Many other corporations and businesses regulated by the Government put up the money for the two parties, both of them, to conduct our national conventions through which we made our national choice of the two candidates between whom the American public would have a choice.

Now it is easy enough for the average American to say politics is corrupt and filthy and that he does not want to be partisan or be a party to it. He may even pride himself that he chooses not the party but the man. But let us look at the situation. That citizen is confronted with the choice already made for him. He just chooses between two preselected men.

And how does a candidate quality to be seriously considered by the convention? By raising enough money—much of it from huge individual contributors—to finance a series of terribly costly primary campaigns. It has become a rich man's game.

This provision in the bill is designed to encourage widespread public activity in supporting the candidates of one's own choice in the primaries. In order to qualify for this matching money from the funds created by the $1 individual checkoffs, a candidate in a Presidential primary first would have had to raise $100,000, $20,000 in each of five States, and the bill encourages relatively smaller contributions because it matches moneys contributed in individual donations of $250 and less. It is a good experiment.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WRIGHT. Of course I yield to the distinguished chairman.

Mr. HAYS. It is $5,000 in 20 States.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I am sorry I misstated it and I stand corrected. The elucidation made by the gentleman from Ohio improves the point I was trying to make.

All I am trying to say is that, gee, if we are serious about reducing the reliance upon these big contributors who more and more hold the keys to the gates of political opportunity, if we are serious in saying that a candidate for President should not have to be wealthy or a willing ward of the wealthy, then I think we ought to give a fair trial to this provision which the committee has devised.

Mr. PICKLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WRIGHT. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

(Mr. PICKLE asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. PICKLE. Mr. Chairman, I join the gentleman in opposing the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. FRENZEL). I think the time has come for us to see if we can finance Presidential elections by the public finance method.

I think we ought to give it a try and see how it works.

Now, in supporting this provision, that is, Presidential election financing, I do not oppose the amendment, but I think it is important we ought to give this a try.

I rise in opposition to the motion to strike the portions of title IV mandating a program of public financing for Presidential elections.

I realize that this is one of the more controversial sections of this long and intricate bill. I realize that public financing of elections is still a novel idea, even though it was first proposed back in 1907 by a Republican President, Theodore Roosevelt. I realize that we will be plowing new ground here, that we will be testing a new concept.

I do not favor extending public financing to congressional elections at this time. I think we need to float the boat and test the waters a bit before we involve the many hundreds of congressional races in such a new process.

Yet I think we should not be afraid now to make the first step. And I think that the Presidential election process is the place to make it. It is in the Presidenial election that millions and millions of dollars are required. It is in the Presidential election that the role of the little man is struggling the hardest, and has come under the most uncertainty.

We need to restore the role of the common man in our Presidential election process by removing the need of the candidates for this great high office to rely on huge contributions from wealthy interests of every sort. Through its reliance on the dollar-check-off and through its matching formula in the crucial primary elections, the provision for public financing for Presidential elections in this bill does right the balance again. This section clearly restores the individual to his proper role in helping to elect the person to fill the highest office in our land. At least let us try public financing for Presidential elections. Let us see how it can work.

I urge again, therefore, that the motion to strike be defeated.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WRIGHT. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. Mr. Chairman, if the gentlemen from Texas are serious about trying to experiment, that is a good idea; but under the rule we are forfeited. We do not have the opportunity to limit it to say 5 years or 10 years and just try it out, because the closed rule has prevented us from doing that.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I would say to the gentleman that Congress could repeal this law if it did not work out as we intend, at any time in the future.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. I have heard that before and the bad laws go on and on. If the gentlemen from Texas are serious about having an experiment, we should have a limitation that it automatically expires at the end of 8 years or something like that.

Mr. WRIGHT. The gentleman would be free to offer such an amendment. But first we certainly should vote down the pending amendment and give this plan a chance.

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

(Mr. ANNUNZIO asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words. I rise in opposition to the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota.

I want to join the gentlemen from Texas. When we talk about limitations, we all know the answer is fundamental, we do have an election for the President every 4 years. We are not talking about money from the general revenue fund. We are talking about voluntary contributions, the checkoff system.

The gentleman from Illinois (Mr. ANDERSON) made a statement that he favors matching funds. What we are talking about in this particular section of the bill is matching funds for Presidential primary elections.

It has been amply stated that the minimum requirements are $250 contributions, $5,000, 20 States, $100,000, in order to be eligible to participate in this fund on a matching basis.

To my good friend, the gentleman from California, who serves on Banking and Currency Committee, I have the highest regard for him. I want to point out to him that in this particular section of the bill, that if the money is in the fund it can be used; but if there is no money in the fund, then we are not able to spend any money. The chairman is correct, we are placing public financing on a trial basis.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Yes. I am happy to yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. HAYS. I am for the trial run and against the amendment. Maybe I should not say any more. I do not want to influence any votes against it; but I think we ought to know if the amendment stays in the bill and my dear friend, the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. UDALL) is a candidate for President, and I understand he has announced that, that I also will be a candidate, because I think the Democrats deserve a choice between the Postal System we have now and the one I would go back to, which was the old-fashioned Pony Express. It got the mail there faster.

Further than that, I think I can raise my money in 20 States quicker than the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. UDALL) can and I will contest him on that.

So I want all of us to know if they support this amendment and the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. UDALL) is a candidate, the country is getting me, too.

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Chairman, I urge my colleagues in the House to reject the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota and to support the committee position. It is an idea again, I emphasize, whose time has come.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. FRENZEL).

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

RECORDED VOTE

Mr. ROUSSELOT. Mr. Chairman, I demand a recorded vote.

A recorded vote was ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—ayes 163, noes 253, not voting 18, as follows:

Mr. CONYERS (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. CONYERS. Mr. Chairman and my colleagues, this is a conforming amendment which would eliminate the provision whereby minor or new political parties must receive at least 5 percent of the national or popular vote to be eligible for public funds.

What this amendment does is to go through all of the places in 15 parts of this bill, which I support, and eliminates the 5 percent requirement.

I would like to explain why I think it is eminently logical and desirable that this body go on record in correcting what perhaps might have been a poor mistake, or an issue not clearly considered by the committee.

First of all, I think we must realize that although we now have a two-party system, we should not presume that all the parties there are ever going to be here for all time.

There is a very important and I think dramatic political history of this Nation in which parties have emerged and, like people, have lived, matured and passed on.

I think that at a time when politics enjoys such little public confidence we must not be put in a position of discouraging the growth and the healthy competition that would accrue from this conforming amendment.

May I point out, under the provisions of my amendment, that all the six new or minor political parties in the 1972 election totaled only four-tenths of 1 percent of the total votes cast for the Presidency of the United States and there would have been only $70,000 expended between some six parties because minor or new parties only receive that portion of $20 million equal to their proportion of the total Presidential vote.

So it seems to me eminently sound, quite fair and democratic, that we here allow the widest and total expression of all our citizens in this country in connection with the political parties of their choice which are so important a part of the electoral process.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONYERS. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the gentleman submitting his amendment, but I would like to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that in the confusion of the debate here I find that all of the sectons to which the gentleman's amendment applies, except that part on page 51, have already been stricken out of the bill.

This is a situation that is new to me. It seems to me that the gentleman's amendment is germane down through the part that says:

(6) Section 9004(a)(3) (relating to eligibility of candidates of a minor party or a new party) is amended by striking out "5 percent or more of the total" and inserting in lieu thereof "any."

Because the rest of it has been stricken by the Frenzel amendment.

I hope that the chairman will recognize that this amendment is in no way contrary to the thrust of the bill before the membership here today. It merely insures that those who may not be in the majority position, and thus not a part of either of the two parties who now totally control this decision by our membership in both the House and the Senate, that we should not solely out of our generosity but out of our recognition that the fairest way to encourage all citizens to participate is to allow these same provisions to apply to those who may support any party as long as it conforms to the legal and statutory requirements in the jurisdiction in which it was created.

Also, it may as well be a question of constitutionality for us to have assigned so arbitrary a figure, 5 percent, in defining a political grouping eligible for Federal funds and governed by Federal regulations.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONYERS. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Is the gentleman also saying that if we are going to, under this bill, actually open up the Federal Treasury to certain groups, we ought to make it fair for all, regardless of their size? Is that true?

Mr. CONYERS. Precisely.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. I think that is a wholly reasonable and correct position and I appreciate the gentleman's explanation

Mr. CONYERS. I urge the support from the membership in behalf of this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BRADEMAS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words and I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the positive thrust behind the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan, but as I read his amendment, in effect it would say that if a handful of people decided to call themselves a political party and were to seek to make use of funds from the dollar checkoff fund in Presidential general elections, assuming that they met the other qualifications, they would be able to obtain money under the gentleman's amendment. I think that the language incorporated in the committee bill, which is language from the 1972 dollar checkoff law with respect to Presidential general elections, is sensible in that it provides that minor parties would be defined as any political party whose campaign for President or Vice President in the preceding election received at least 5 percent but less than 25 percent of the total number of popular votes cast for all candidates in such elections.

I do not want to misrepresent the gentleman's amendment. If I have, I am sure he will explain it to me. I will be glad to yield to him.

Mr. CONYERS. I appreciate the gentleman's yielding.

I should like to point out that the handful of people who may want to form a political party is the same kind of a handful of people who might form and have formed some of the great parties in the past, and specifically the two great parties that exist in this country today. There was a handful of people that formed the Whig Party that elected two Presidents. There was a handful of people that formed the party that the gentleman and I are members of, back in 1800. At the same time I think that we should not deprecate those citizens who may reserve judgment.

Mr. BRADEMAS. I appreciate the point the gentleman is making. The point I am making, however, is that were we to agree to his amendment, the effect would surely be to give encouragement to the proliferation of minor parties in the United States. We seem to be surviving, in spite of our difficulties, with two major parties, and I would hope the gentleman's amendment would be rejected.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENZEL. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment cease in 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Michigan answer a question? It looks as though the bill as amended would only admit to the first two sections of this amendment which would allow a new party or a minor party with any number of members or adherence of any number full participation in the fund. Is this correct?

Mr. CONYERS. That is correct. What we seek to do is to strike what might now be considered an arbitrary number to require the parties to reach a 5-percent growth to succeed and reach the checkoff benefit. After all, that may have been 2 percent or something else, but altogether it would have cost $70,000 among six different parties. I think the logic of fairness to all parties in arriving at this new profound law is extremely important and should be embodied in this first important piece of legislation.

Mr. FRENZEL. I thank the gentleman for his explanation. I think the gentleman is right, that we have never been able to establish a matching formula that would do justice to new parties and third parties or independent parties. This troubles me particularly and is one reason why I do not like matching or public financing of any kind.

I do however think that striking out any kind of qualification is a mistake, and, as the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. BRADEMAS) has pointed out, actually even a group of two could be a new party under the gentleman's amendment, and for that reason I am going to oppose it.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENZEL. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the gentleman yielding.

Mr. Chairman, is not the 5-percent figure, very arbitrary, and totally unnecessary to the process of getting a party started? As far as two people in a closet, starting a party, everybody realizes it takes more than that to start a viable political party. How did the committee arrive at a 5-percent figure?

Mr. FRENZEL. The committee did not arrive at a 5-percent figure.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. Where did it come from?

Mr. FRENZEL. That was in the Internal Revenue Code. That was voted long ago.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. Did the IRS determine that 5-percent formula?

Mr. FRENZEL. No. Only the Congress can write the laws. It is part of our checkoff law.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. This is going to be managed by the Treasury Department? Where did that wonderful magic term of 5 percent come from?

Mr. FRENZEL. The Congress determined that when it passed the original checkoff fund.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. I really do not know who can explain this arbitrary 5-percent formula.

Mr. BRADEMAS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENZEL. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. BRADEMAS. Mr. Chairman, this is from the 1972 act which establishes the dollar checkoff fund with respect to Presidential general elections.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. How did the Congress establish 5 percent?

Mr. BRADEMAS. It is in the act.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. That is certainly an arbitrary test?

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENZEL. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. HAYS. Of course it is an arbitrary decision, just like the $60,000 figure is arbitrary.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. This bill has many arbitrary decisions in my opinion.

Then nobody can answer that question about the 5 percent and how it was arrived at? I am therefore constrained to vote for the amendment.

Mr. FRENZEL. I suggest we vote against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. CONYERS).

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. UDALL (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arizona?

There was no objection.

(Mr. UDALL asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Chairman, we have a very good bill before us. The gentleman from Ohio has been kind enough to say good things about me and I want to compliment him and the committee for bringing to the floor a very sound and very responsible bill.

I think it really needs only one more thing to be an exceptionally outstanding bill, and that is to adopt the Anderson-Udall, Foley-Conable matching fund proposal for congressional elections.

Studies have shown that about 95 percent of the financing of congressional elections comes from the top 2 or 3 percent of the wealthiest people in this country. The little guys are left out, whether they are Democrats or Republicans.

We have been trying new concepts, new patterns lately in this country. Two years ago we established a $25 tax credit for man and wife, and $100 tax deduction. This partial public financing has worked.

Now what we are trying to do is bring into the congressional election a mass of small private donations, with a limited amount of public money.

This proposal of ours has gone through some evolutions. It has been changed a number of times. As I moved around the floor today, I found a lot of confusion about it. I hope no one will vote against past versions of this proposal. It does not apply to 1974. It applies only to 1976. It will be a trial run in 1976, along with the Presidential general election primaries we have just approved. It does not apply to congressional primaries. There was fear there would be twelve or fourteen people running in a congressional district all financed by public funds. We do not hand anybody $90,000 or any large sum simply for getting a party nomination. The most public money they can get is $20,000, and to get it they have to match it with $50 or smaller donations. Not a dime of general revenue funds will go into this. It will be financed totally by the checkoff. It will be financed by people who voluntarily want to give a dollar on their income tax for a new system of clean honest elections.

There were fears we would be financing frivolous candidates. We have a threshold. They have to raise $6,000 in $50 chunks or smaller to qualify. That is a very high threshold. Anybody that is a serious opponent against any incumbent is going to be able to raise $7,500.

There is no compulsion. No candidate has to use this system. If they like the old way, if they have some conscientious objection to using dollar checkoff funds they may reject it.

One of the other objections was made to the Senate bill and some of the other proposals, which gave public money for merely getting a major party nomination, even in a district where the race would be hopeless. A candidate could be in a one-party district, but if he gets a major party nomination under some of these proposals, he gets $90,000 or some large sum of money. In our proposal he has to match dollar for dollar. He has to get it in small contributions and, as I say, it is limited to a $20,000 total.

We have another important limitation. Fears were expressed that, "You are going to take all this Federal money. You are going to hire your brother-in-law as a consultant, or spend all this taxpayer money on similarly senseless matters.

The $20,000 that is raised has to be segregated in a separate bank account. That money has to be used, or it has to be given back. It must be used for five highly visible things: radio, televison, newspapers, billboards, telephone banks, and postage for direct mailing.

We have a fine system that ought to be tried out on a limited basis. I think it will work.

There was some talk in the cloakroom today and I want to put it to rest, regarding an earlier proposal under which there would be a flat grant of $1,000,000 to each of the national campaign committees. That is not in the bill. There is included here only voluntary amounts from the voluntary checkoff system with all the careful limitations that I have indicated.

I think the time has come when we should give this thing a trial. Surely today the American people are ready to put up a dollar or two a year to have a clean, decent, brand new system of House and Senate elections in this country. Under this carefully drawn system with these careful safeguards, we can give this a trial without running any of the risks people have feared about public financing.

This has widespread support outside the Congress. I think we make a serious mistake today if we reject this fine system. Added to the bill we have, the fine provisions in the bill we have, we will have something that in this historic day we can be very proud of.

I urge my colleagues to support this amendment.

Mr. KAZEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UDALL. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. KAZEN. I do not know how the check off system in your amendment works. I can understand on the national level in a Presidential race that the money is coming from a checkoff from throughout the country. Suppose there are no checkoffs in a particular area.

Mr. UDALL. If there is no money in the checkoff fund there will be no payments.

Mr. KAZEN. Suppose there are no checkoffs from two or three congressional areas. Is there going to be any money from the general fund coming from outside into those districts to finance those candidates?

Mr. UDALL. Yes; this is a national fund designed to help finance campaigns all over the country.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, it is getting late and a lot of Members have commitments, as I said earlier, and I was wondering if 30 minutes would be sufficient time to conclude debate on this amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto close at 5:30 p.m.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize Members standing at the time the unanimous-consent request was made for 50 seconds each.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to amend my unanimous-consent request and ask unanimous consent that all Members whose names have been read be recognized for 1 minute each.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard.

(By unanimous consent, Messrs. NEDZI, BRADEMAS, CARNEY of Ohio, DENT, MATHIS of Georgia, and GAYDOS yielded their time to Mr. HAYS.)

(By unanimous consent, Messrs. BROWN of Ohio and NELSEN yielded their time to Mr. FRENZEL.)

(By unanimous consent, Messrs. COHEN, DELLENBACK, WHALEN, and CONTE yielded their time to Mr. ANDERSON of Illinois.)

(By unanimous consent, Mr. YOUNG of Florida and Mr. BAUMAN yielded their time to Mr. ROUSSELOT.)

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. GAYDOS).

(Mr. GAYDOS asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. GAYDOS. Mr. Chairman, what is the purpose for allowing these funds for congressional races?

Obviously, based on current estimates, there is a question whether or not there will be sufficient funds available to take care of all the costs of the 1976 Presidential election and the presidential primary races.

But assuming that there are available certain funds from the dollar checkoff for use in congressional races, it would be so small that when allocated among the candidates, it would be a mere token contribution to the candidates' campaigns.

The rationale behind the push for public financing is two-pronged:

First, to eliminate the evil of private funding as reflected in the Watergate matter.

Second, the need to provide funds to challengers in order to make political campaigns more competitive.

The mere fact that the proponents of public financing accept the concept of matching funds, such as in the Presidential primary, indicates that they do not consider private funds per se evil.

However, the bill before the House does answer the allegation of the existence of evil private funds in the Presidential general election by authorizing full Federal funding for Presidential general.

But by accepting the concept of matching funds for the Presidential primary, the proponents for public financing then switch their argument from the need to eliminate private funds to the need to provide front money for candidates who do not have sufficient private funds available to launch a campaign for the Presidential nominaton. If private funds were so evil then why should they be matched by Federal funds. The answer to this question probably will be that the matching will only apply to small contributions.

However, if the committee bill passes then the strict limitations on contributions will in effect eliminate the large contributions wihch are alleged to be evil. So the only rationale for public funds in the Presidential primary is to assist candidates in launching campaign for the Presidential nomination.

However, if we should authorize Federal funds for congressional general elections, we certainly are not encouraging more individuals to seek the nomination for these seats. If that is the purpose then Federal funds should be made available to individuals to assist their campaign for nomination. Once a candidate has received the nomination, his party will then assist his campaign. Why is it necessary for Federal funds at this point, particularly when the available funds will be so small?

If the purpose of providing funds to congressional candidates is to encourage more individuals to seek public office, then the only way to accomplish this is to direct Federal funds to those individuals who are unable to raise sufficient funds to enable them to obtain the nomination of the party. Providing Federal funds to the party candidate once nominated certainly does not encourage more individuals to seek public office. It merely assists the nominees of the respective parties. In fact, if the funds available from the dollar checkoff should become substantial, then the result of Federal Funding could well mean a substitute for party funding from private sources.

PROVISIONS OF ANNUNZIO AMENDMENT

I. ELIGIBILITY

First, must certify that he is the nominee of a political party or is qualified on the ballot as a candidate for the Federal office.

Second, that he has raised at least 10 percent of the expenditure ceiling—$7,500 for a House seat—but a senatorial candidate does not have to raise more than $50,000.

Third, contributions in the form of subscriptions, loans, deposits or advances are not considered as eligible contributions in meeting the 10 percent requirement.

Fourth, only contributions of less than $50 from each person shall be considered.

Fifth, only contributions received after June 1 in the election year.

Sixth, Federal funds could not exceed 33 percent of the expenditure limitation.

Seventh, Federal funds must be kept in a separate bank account.

Eighth, can only be used for broadcasting stations, newspapers, magazines, outdoor advertising, postage for direct mailings, and telephones.

II. THE AMENDMENT ALSO PROVIDES FOR PAYMENTS OF FEDERAL FUNDS TO CONGRESSIONAL CAMPAIGN COMMITTEES OF TO $1 MILLION PER YEAR

These committees could then give any of their candidates up to $10,000 of these funds or any mixture of private and Federal funds. This would amend the provision limiting the contributions to $5,000 in the bill as far as the general election is concerned. The $5,000 limitation would still apply to the primary.

The thrust of this amendment is certainly not to encourage more individuals to seek public office. It is just the opposite in that it only supports party nominees. Furthermore, the fact that the congressional campaign committees of the major national parties could receive up to $1 million would indicate that the intent is to further strengthen the major national parties and allow them to decide which of their nominees they wish to support. Does this result in those candidates in greatest need of support receiving funds from the national committee or those candidates which the national committee looks on most favorably?

(By unanimous consent, Messrs. OBEY, BADILLO, BOLAND, and RONCALIO of Wyoming yielded their time to Mr. UDALL.)

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from California (Mr. ROUSSELOT).

(Mr. ROUSSELOT asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ROUSSELOT. Mr. Chairman, I take this time to ask my good colleague, the gentleman from Arizona, who voted against the amendment to eliminate public financing of Presidential campaigns, why he now comes before us and eliminates financing for congressional campaigns in a primary contest. I find that highly inconsistent and discriminatory to Members of Congress and the Senate.

Mr. UDALL. If the gentleman will yield, one does the best he can.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. I will be glad to yield to the gentleman from Arizona.

Mr. UDALL. I have long favored the original Anderson-Udall bill, which covered both primaries and general elections.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. Why did the gentleman eliminate that concept from this amendment?

Mr. UDALL. Because it could not pass with primaries contained in the bill.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. What we are now hearing from my good friend, the gentleman from Arizona, is that he has become very political on this issue of public funding for congressional primaries. I think that is an unfortunate discrepancy and obvious deficiency in the gentleman's amendment. The gentleman sincerely believes it should be in Presidential campaigns for both the primary and the general elections, but to garner votes here on the floor, he has come before the House and played a kind of Mickey Mouse game with his own principles. That is very similar to coming out for Federal education, for buildings, but not for teachers. I think one is either for Federal aid education or he is not.

My belief is that my good colleague, the gentleman from Arizona, once again, as he did in the case of the land use bill, when he had some 20 amendments, has come before the House today and substantially compromised his own position, in which he does not wholly believe. On that basis alone the amendment should be defeated though there are many reasons for its defeat.

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, one gets what he can and does what he can. I voted for medicare, for older citizens when I really favor national health insurance for everyone.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. I understand that a lot of people try to get what they can get out of Government and especially from the Public Treasury. What I am saying is that I think this is an impossible kind of amendment when it is in direct conflict with the rest of the bill which tolerates Federal financing of primaries.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Washington (Mr. MEEDS).

(Mr. MEEDS asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MEEDS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of this amendment. I think it is perhaps the most important amendment that we will be considering to provide us absolutely free and uninhibited funding down the line.

Mr. Chairman, if there ever was an appropriate time for the Congress to pass campaign reform legislation, that time is now.

The Watergate scandals have galvanized public attitudes toward our political system. They have compounded years of public cynicism about elected officials. Concurrently, they have caused the public to demand reform of campaign abuses.

Despite a recent upward flicker in congressional popularity, Members of Congress still rank in public esteem just ahead of skunks. And unless we enact meaningful campaign reforms, the skunks will be catching up.

As a Democrat, I have taken no partisan pleasure whatsoever in seeing my Republican colleagues shiver under a rain of Watergate indictments. All incidents of corruption, whether Republican or Democratic, reinforce the public suspicion that every politician is on the take.

Well, you and I know that most politicians are not on the take. But it is not for lack of opportunities inherent in our special interest campaign financing system. Congress in 1971 passed a disclosure law to shed some light into the dark corners of political money raising.

It was only a start. But it was a revolution ahead of the 1925 Corrupt Practices Act. Now there is at least limited disclosure in Federal political campaigns. It is weak, however, compared to the reporting law in Washington State, which was passed by the people in 1972 after a number of us signed petitions to put it on a statewide ballot.

H.R. 16090 improves some portions of the 1971 law but leaves at least two areas without effective reform: putting teeth in disclosure and working toward public financing.

Asking elected officials to regulate themselves while seeking reelection produces an inherent conflict of interest. And naming employees of these elected officials as watchdogs of disclosure strains credulity. The public is not so gullible to continue to accept this sort of cozy reporting system.

That is why I supported the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida (Mr. FASCELL) and the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. FRENZEL) to create an independent Federal Elections Commission. The Board of Supervisors set up by the committee bill would leave us in the awkward and ineffective position of judging ourselves—or not judging ourselves, as the situation is more likely to be.

H.R. 16090 also sets liimts on contributions. But disclosure and limits on contributions still beg the question of the whole system of special interest financing. Campaigning for public office is expensive. The expense is usually greater than the salary that goes with the job. So, unless you are rich, you must outstretch your palm and ask for money.

Few Americans contribute to political campaigns. Fewer still contribute just for the sake of financing good government. Behind nearly every sizable contribution is a contributor holding an ax for grinding. If you are strong, you draw a line. But the temptation is always there. Campaign financing by special interests is the most corruptive influence in the American political system.

The obvious solution is public campaign financing. It is an idea whose time is fast approaching as disgust with the existing system continues to spread. As one of the sponsors of the earlier Udall-Anderson bill, I believe we must make a start on trying the idea.

Thanks to the checkoff of income tax forms, public campaign financing may be possible in the 1976 Presidential campaign. But we could be experimenting with public financing in other campaigns as well—if we put the provisions in this bill.

I will support the amendment by the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. UDALL) and others to try a matching system of public campaign funds. There are unanswered questions about using taxpayers' money for political campaigns. Some citizens view it simply as another way for politicians to get their hands in the till. But it all comes back to one basic question: Who do you want paying your elected officials' campaign costs? Do you want continued payments attached to strings from big corporations, labor unions, trade associations, or other organized pursuers of private interest? Or do you want campaign financing by the public, which seeks only responsive government in the public interest?

It may not be possible to remedy all these problems in H.R. 16090. But the Federal Election Act amendments do improve upon the 1971 law. I will vote for the legislation on final passage.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEEDS. I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

(Mr. FOLEY asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from Washington for yielding.

I hope Members on both sides of the aisle will support this essential amendment. It is sponsored, as I think the Members know, by the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. UDALL), the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. ANDERSON), the gentleman from New York (Mr. CONABLE), and myself, and others who have joined in that sponsorship. This amendment will not apply funds to congressional races except those voluntarily contributed through the tax checkoff. It applies to general elections only and is limited to the matching of small contributions not to exceed $20,000.

The amendment can if adopted be a historic step in opening the political system to afford broadest, most objective, and most responsive decision in all Federal elections.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. MIZELL).

Mr. MIZELL. Mr. Chairman, I rise merely to voice my opposition to this amendment.

As I opposed the tax checkoff for Presidential elections, so I oppose this tax checkoff for congressional elections.

When my constituents were polled on this issue, 77.2 percent of those responding were opposed to taking tax dollars and financing Federal elections. So I say to my colleagues that you may not be reading the sentiment of the people on this particular issue, and especially when the people begin to see their dollars going to support candidates with whom they completely and totally disagree, and oppose politically.

So, Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment is rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. O'BRIEN).

(Mr. O'BRIEN asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. CULVER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'BRIEN. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

(Mr. CULVER asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. CULVER. Mr. Chairman, I wish to voice my strong support for the Anderson-Udall amendment to H.R. 16090, the Federal Election Act Amendments of 1974. This amendment would provide for a matching form of private and public financing of congressional general elections, and would be financed out of the dollar checkoff fund already provided in H.R. 16090 for Presidential elections.

This amendment will, I believe, lead to an end of the abuses we have seen during the past 2 years by fostering a broader base of citizen participation in the financing of Federal elections.

We must break with the precedent of large donations, and provide incentives to encourage a resurgence of citizen participation in campaigns, while at the same time permitting candidates without great wealth, or the advantage of incumbancy, a realistic chance in seeking public office.

I, therefore, fully support efforts to amend H.R. 16090 to include a system of matching payments for small contributions to congressional campaigns. The thrust of such a system is not eliminate private money from campaigns, but to shift the source of funding from the special interests and large contributors to a broad base of citizen participation. With entitlement to a $50 Federal matching payment for each equivalent contribution raised privately, candidates would have a far stronger incentive to turn to the people to finance their campaigns.

There is a desperate need to equalize the political influence of all citizens in the United States. We must act now to insure that the inequality in the amount of money one has or can command does not disproportionately affect the extent of their political influence.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment offered by the gentlemen from Illinois and Arizona. While I am looking forward to the passage of this vital legislation, I feel especially adamant about the necessity for this particular amendment.

In my conversations with colleagues and constituents regarding Federal matching payments, I have encountered the same objection time after time: "This proposal will force me, through my tax dollars, to support campaigns, issues, and ideologies which I find distasteful and repugnant."

I am then usually reminded that Thomas Jefferson explicitly warned that no American should ever be coerced into supporting ideas or beliefs contrary to his own. I agree 100 percent. The validity of Jefferson's proposition is unquestionable. If I thought for 1 second that this amendment would intentionally or inadvertently violate this fundamental right of every American, I would denounce it.

Gentlemen, this amendment has been carefully engineered so as to protect this right. Not 1 dime, not 1 Lincoln penny will be exacted from any taxpayer who chooses not to provide these matching payments. The whole fund will come from an optional campaign checkoff on each citizen's Federal income tax return. Each voter can decide for himself if he wants to contribute to this fund, and he can do so in the privacy of his own home.

Judging by our 2-year experience with the Presidential campaign checkoff, I feel that the public has readily accepted this concept.

Still, many would-be supporters balk at another point. They ask, What will happen if the fund is insufficient to match all the small contributions amassed by all the candidates. Again, I must emphasize that funds would not be drawn from the Treasury to make up a deficit. Instead, each candidate's maximum Federal matching payment would be reduced from its $25,000 ceiling to a percentage of that amount. The reduction would be based on the percent of shortfall of the checkoff fund. For instance, if the checkoff fund contained only 80 percent of the maximum required amount, the ceiling for each candidate would be 80 percent of $25,000 or $20,000.

Let me add that the amount each candidate will be eligible to receive will be determined far in advance of each election so that no candidate will be caught short.

Gentlemen, as I look around this country today, I see dark clouds of doubt, cynicism, and distrust hanging over our body politic. However, I firmly believe that the adoption of this amendment—and the passage of this bill—will help sweep these storm clouds from our land. Just as fresh air invigorates the body, this fresh source of campaign money will revitalize our election process.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York (Mr. PEYSER).

(Mr. PEYSER asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. PEYSER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of this amendment. I think it is one that is deperately needed if we are ever going to break the bonds that have been leaving the rich in complete power in so many cases.

I can speak with some authority in this area. In my campaign, which was one of the most heavily financed campaigns in this country, where more money was put in than probably, in any other campaign in this Congress, I recognize the power of what money can do in a campaign.

Mr. Chairman, I think we ought to get away from that. I am for the limitation of amounts that can be spent in a campaign and I am for public financing as outlined in this amendment.

Mr. PHILLIP BURTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PEYSER. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. PHILLIP BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I most strongly urge my colleagues to support this amendment. This particular amendment has been very carefully drawn. It does no more than it purports to. There are not any hooks in it. It is a clean proposal, one that is meant to take some of the burdens out of compaigns.

Hopefully, this will protect us against potentially corruptive influences.

It is a very good amendment, and it should be voted for on its merits.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New Hampshire (Mr. CLEVELAND).

(Mr. CLEVELAND asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. CLEVELAND. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the Anderson-Udall amendment. I regret the parliamentary situation only permits me 50 seconds.

I would remind some of the people who are supporting the Anderson-Udall amendment and some of the organizations who are supporting it, that this amendment has now been kicking around for more than a year. It has been changed on at least 3 or 4 times in major respects, and I believe for the better.

Some of the organizations and some of the people who are sponsoring this amendment have been highly critical of the Committee on House Administration for our delays—and there have been delays, some of them unexplained—should recognize in fairness that this period of delay has given the sponsors of the Anderson-Udall amendment a chance to make of it a better amendment. I somewhat reluctantly supported it initially. Now having been changed 3 or 4 times, for the better I can enthusiastically support it.

Mr. ANDERSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 16090, a bill designed to reform the Federal elections systems by establishing spending and contribution limits for all Federal offices, by providing for partial public financing and by creating a nonpartisan Board to enforce this act.

Under our representative system of government, the people elect fellow citizens to speak for, vote on behalf of, and represent their interests in the legislative bodies—the House and the Senate—and they elect a President to administer the laws, conduct foreign affairs, and established priorities. And, I believe this to be the best system of government devised by man.

If some people, however, are given preferential treatment because of their ability and willingness to contribute large sums toward the election of an individual, then the system breaks down. If some are "more equal" than others, then our representative system fails and the interests of all the people are aborted.

And this is a very serious threat to our democracy. It is a very serious threat if the interests of the rich and powerful are placed above the interests of the weak and the poor.

Our country was founded on the principle of equality—all are equal in the eyes of the law. But, if the rich and the powerful have a greater influence on writing and administering the laws, is not equality a sham, a farce?

And, obviously, we see that in our laws today. Who benefits from the tax loopholes? Who gains from subsidies?

It has become apparent that our Federal election laws need to be strengthened by restricting the influence of big money in political campaigns.

In 1972, over $66 million were spent on the House and Senate elections and only $1 of every $3 raised that year was collected in denominations under $100. Overall, the 1972 elections cost $100 million more than the 1968 elections.

In order to meet these rising campaign costs, candidates have become increasingly dependent on big givers. For example, the Citizens Research Foundation has found that 90 percent of candidate contributions for all elective officers come from 1 percent of the people.

CONTRIBUTION LIMITS

Under this bill, strict limits on contributions to candidates for Federal office are established by banning contributions by an individual which exceed $1,000 per election.

While present law has no limit on individual contributions, this measure states that no individual could contribute more than a total of $25,000 per year to all Federal candidates and political committees supporting Federal candidates.

SPENDING LIMITATIONS

In addition, this bill, H.R. 16090, establishes a ceiling for all campaign activities in any election for Federal office. With respect to a Presidential election, candidates would be able to spend up to $20 million, instead of amounts totaling $54 million, as in the 1972 Nixon campaign, and $28 million by the McGovern organization.

Senatorial candidates would be limited to spending 5 cents per person in the State, or $75,000, whichever is greater.

Candidates for election to the House of Representatives would be limited to spending $60,000.

PUBLIC FINANCING

And, finally, to end the reliance on the wealthy to finance Presidential campaigns, the bill permits the use of up to $20 million per major candidate from those funds designated by taxpayers on their annual tax return to be paid to the Presidential Election Campaign Fund.

As with existing law, public financing would be strictly voluntary and would come from this Fund only.

An amendment will be offered, however, by Congressman ANDERSON of Illinois, the chairman of the Republican Conference, and Congressman UDALL of Arizona, to extend public financing to congressional campaigns based on a mix of private financing and Federal matching payments for small contributors of up to $50.

As the author of a similar proposal, I support this amendment which, again, would only use those funds which were voluntarily checked-off by taxpayers on their tax returns.

Before a candidate would be eligible for any of these funds, that candidate would have to demonstrate popular support by raising 10 percent of the spending limit—$6,000—in contributions of $50 or less. And, then, the maximum a candidate could receive would be $20,000.

If adopted, this amendment, I believe, will encourage interested citizens, who may lack personal funds, to seek public office. It would permit a person who have taken a great interest in community affairs to run for office, with the knowledge that he or she would not be indebted to the special interests.

I sincerely believe that this amendment would result in better government, practiced by better people, who only have a strong desire to serve their fellow man.

CONCLUSION

Mr. Chairman, the need for reform is obvious. The words "politics" and "politicians" have become synonymous with wheeling and dealing, undercover operations, and corruption.

And yes, some politicians are "wheelers and dealers"; some operate in the shadows, and some are corrupt. Those are the ones that all of us would like to see put out of business, and they will be when the public finds out about their activities.

But, certainly, most are honest; most are here in Congress or in the Presidency trying to do their best to represent all of the people. And, most will continue to raise their funds from small contributors; will continue to spend less than the maximum amount; and will continue to run fair, decent campaigns designed to inform, not deceive.

Unfortunately, legislation such as this is needed to assure that the big monied interests are not represented in proportion to their pocketbooks.

I support this proposal and urge my colleagues to join with me in passing a meaningful campaign reform bill which would put the poor and weak on an equal footing with the rich and powerful.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. ANDERSON).

(Mr. ANDERSON of Illinois asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BIESTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON of Illinois. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

(Mr. BIESTER asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BIESTER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment introduced by Mr. ANDERSON and Mr. UDALL providing matching Federal funds in congressional campaigns.

The potential problems in raising large amounts of private money in campaigns is not limited to Presidential elections alone, and the fact that congressional public financing is not included in any form in H.R. 16090 is a glaring omission which must be corrected. For Members of Congress to exclude themselves from the same arrangement they would impose on candidates for the Presidency would create a double standard. The American public has clearly expressed its approval in nationwide polls of the public financing concept for all Federal elections. While I am personally committed to the concept of full public financing at the congressional level as well as at the Presidential and introduced legislation to that end last year, I would hope the House would at a minimum adopt the matching Federal funding plan as proposed by Mr. ANDERSON and Mr. UDALL.

The stimulus for campaign reform has emerged from the role money—big money—plays in the political process. While on paper and in principle we have gone far toward realizing our democratic tradition of one-man-one-vote as espoused in the Baker and Sims cases, we need to go a step further in removing the distorting influence of big money in elections to bring reality closer to principle. Money gives those individuals who have it to spend a special position before candidates and it holds the potential for carrying an influence that can make some individuals far more equal than others.

We know from experience that campaign contributions can lead to special preferences. Certainly, this is not always the case, but the suggestion and implication are there, nevertheless. The public, cynical about politics and its ethics, sees a relationship between money and interests and public policy whether it exists or not. It is time to sweep away any grounds for these suspicions.

The Anderson-Udall amendment can help. Under its provisions, matching Federal funds for private contributions of $50 or less for congressional candidates in general elections would be made available. Funds could not exceed one-third of the spending limit imposed in the bill and candidates would have to raise an initial amount to qualify for the matching Federal payments.

Mr. Chairman, I strongly urge my colleagues to support this critical amendment.

Mr. DU PONT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON of Illinois. I yield to the gentleman from Delaware.

(Mr. DU PONT asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DU PONT. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of the Anderson-Udall public financing amendment. I am an original cosponsor of the amendment and strongly believe that we must get big money out of politics and small money in.

The concept of matching funds makes great sense for two reasons.

First, matching funds will help equalize the opportunity for individuals to run for congressional office.

Second, matching funds will remove the need for large contributions—both special interest group and individuals—which has in the past led to problems with elections. The corrupting influence of large contributions has amply been demonstrated in the past—and this amendment will help fight those kind of problems.

These are the two most important reasons I can think of in terms of reforming our political process—two very sound reasons for adopting this amendment.

Mr. PARRIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON of Illinois. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

(Mr. PARRIS asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. PARRIS. Mr. Chairman, I have asked for this time in order to propound a question to the gentleman from Illinois, and that is whether or not this is the "nose of the camel under the tent theory" on the use of general revenue funds for political campaign financing purposes.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Illinois for the purpose of answering my question.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. ANDERSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, the amendment I have at the desk is at once both a bold departure in our approach to financing campaigns, and at the same time is firmly grounded in our deep tradition of grassroots citizen participation in the electoral process.

On the first score let me say unhesitatingly that this is a public finance amendment. It does provide for the use of taxpayer funds in congressional campaigns. And it does symbolize an intent to break sharply with our present woefully inadequate, special-interest dominated, campaign-funding system.

But let me make a second equally important point. We do not seek to enact public financing as an end in itself. We do not expect the mere input of public funds to magically cleanse or purify the election process. Nor do we seek to displace private money and private contributors entirely, as does the Senate bill. Indeed, I adamantly object to that approach, and should our amendment be enacted, I would strenuously oppose any future effort to use it as a stepping stone to full public finance in the conventional sense.

What we propose instead is a creative blend. We have attempted to harness the mechanism of public financing to the objective or goal of revitalized citizen participation and small contributor funding of congressional election campaigns.

For that reason we do not simply set tax dollars on the stump to be siphoned off by anyone who can qualify for the ballot. Rather this amendment utilizes the matching concept so that the amount of public funds any candidate receives is a direct function of the number of small contributors he can mobilize in behalf of his candidacy.

To receive just $10,000 in public funds would require 200 separate $50 contributions or 500 separate $20 contributions. A House candidate wishing to receive the maximum entitlement under this amendment—$25,000—would need to raise 1,000 contributions averaging $25 apiece in order to do so.

Thus, Mr. Chairman, in this amendment we are contemplating considerably more than merely using public money to finance the necessary expenses of campaigns. Far more importantly, we are attempting to use public funds as a lever, as an incentive, to drastically increase the participation level of the electorate.

And I will say to those of my colleagues who may be skeptical, you are not going to achieve that critical objective by mere exhortation, or stirring rhetorical calls to get the people back in the election process.

The reason is simply that it is enormously expensive to raise small money. In many instances, the net return after fund-raising costs is so low that candidates and their political committees find such efforts are just not productive—especially if large contributions from interest groups or more affluent supporters are available.

However, by doubling the rate of return on efforts to mobilize small contributors, this amendment will alter the fund-raising equation significantly. It will provide the motor force that can help transform our rhetoric about citizen participation into concrete reality.

Mr. Chairman, this amendment will serve a second equally important objective, and that is insuring that campaigns are adequately funded. I need not remind you that by enacting stringent contribution limitations, we are going to substantially reduce the amount of funding available to conduct political campaigns. You need only look at the disclosure reports from the 1972 election to see that in most Senate races and in many hotly contested House races the contribution ceilings we adopted would have the effect of reducing funding by 20, 30, and, in some cases, 50 percent.

Yet we should not be deluded into thinking that if in driving the moneychangers out of politics we also drive out the money, we will have accomplished anything very constructive or healthy.

It takes money—large amounts of it—to communicate effectively with the electorate, to adequately inform voters about the issues and to conduct vigorous, competitive campaigns. By providing for a significant input of public funds and by increasing the volume of small private contributions this amendment will go a long way toward compensating for the adverse funding impact of the very necessary contribution limitations contained in the measure before us today.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, this amendment will not only provide adequate funding, but it will also insure the right kind of funding. At an hour when the capital of this Nation fairly trembles under the weight of the crisis upon us, and when confidence in our governmental institutions has plummeted to an all-time low, there is nothing more urgent than a dramatic demonstration that our system is worthy of the electorate's trust and support.

We simply must convince a skeptical public that elections are not bought, manipulated or corrupted by the few to the detriment of the many. In my opinion, the way to achieve that crucial objective is to convince the electorate that campaigns are financed with clean money. There can be little doubt that the mixed financing system of tax dollars and small contributions envisioned by our amendment would vividly provide that kind of assurance.

Mr. Chairman, I recognize, of course, that many of my colleagues have had serious reservations and questions about any measure which involves the use of tax dollars for campaign purposes. Let me say that I share many of those concerns, and for that reason we have attempted to very carefully craft this program so as to alleviate them. Indeed, I think it can be said quite categorically that this amendment avoids every major objection that has been raised to the more conventional proposals for public financing.

First, it puts to rest completely the basic philosophical objection to forcing a taxpayer to support a candidate with whom he strongly disagrees. The congressional matching program will be funded entirely out of the check-off fund and will therefore be supported entirely by voluntary taxpayer contributions.

If some of my supporters strongly oppose the views of my cosponsor (Mr. UDALL) on the question of land use control, they will not have to contribute a cent to his campaign. And if his supporters are unalterably opposed to my views on curbing labor violence in the construction industry, not a cent of their tax money need go to my campaign. In short, our amendment fully protects that fundamental right of every American citizen, articulated by Thomas Jefferson almost two centuries ago, not to be coerced into involuntarily supporting ideas, opinions and beliefs with which he is unsympathetic.

Secondly, this amendment is not going to lead to bedsheet ballots and the proliferation of frivolous candidacies. The main problem in that regard is primaries, and we have explicitly excluded them from this proposal. In most States, independent candidates have substantial barriers to overcome in order to get on the ballot, and even if they do, they will be required to raise $7,500 before they are eligible for a penny of government funding.

Another worry that has been legitimately expressed is that candidates will use Government funds for certain frivolous purposes which will be strongly resented by the taxpayers. These might include various kinds of campaign paraphernalia, gimmicks or even exotic publicity stunts, padding the payroll with relatives and friends or the hiring of expensive consultants for slick media and advertising campaigns.

To avoid that possibility we require that matching payments be deposited in a separate bank account and that funds may be drawn from that account only for five specified purposes: first radio and TV air-time; second newspaper and magazine advertising space; third, outdoor billboard facilities; fourth, postage costs for direct mail campaigns; and fifth, telephone lease costs.

These are all high visibility expenditures and are generally accepted as necessary means for candidate communication with the electorate. At the same time, the five categories cover a broad enough range of advertising and communications techniques so that most candidates would not find them unduly restrictive.

Let me just briefly address two final objections that I have heard from some of my colleagues. I think there can be very legitimate concern that public finance will further erode the political parties at a time when we should be attempting to strengthen them, and would readily agree that this is an appropriate criticism of the kind of total public finance approach contained in the Senate bill. But our amendment contains two features which obviate that agrument entirely.

First, public funding is limited to one-third of a candidate's spending ceiling. Since the 1972 disclosure reports show that most House candidates received only about 20 percent of their funding from national, State and local party committees, it is clear that there will be more than sufficient opportunity for parties to continue and even expand their traditional funding role under our proposal.

Second, this amendment makes the campaign committees of each party eligible for matching payments to the tune of $1 million per year. So instead of undermining their role in the campaign funding process, our amendment will actually strengthen it by increasing the amount of funds they will have available for candidate support.

Finally, to those of you who are concerned about the cost and the budget impact of this amendment, let me assure you that the cost will be minimal.

Due to the one-third payment limitation, the threshold requirement and the fact that only the first $50 of a contribution will be matched, the total cost of the matching system will be quite modest. Were each House and Senate candidate to be eligible for the maximum entitlement under the amendment, the total cost would be $31 million per election. On an annualized basis that amounts to $15.5 million or 11 cents per eligible voter.

In actual practice, however, the costs are likely to be considerably less because many candidates will not meet the threshold requirement and most will not raise enough small contributions to be eligible for the full $25,000. Had the amendment been in effect for the 1972 congressional elections, the actual cost would have been only $14.4 million. I do not think that is too much to spend on clean elections.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, this is a balanced, workable amendment. It uses public funding to further the goal of renewed citizen participation and confidence in the electoral process. It contains built-in safeguards to meet all of the major difficulties of conventional public financing measures. I therefore urge you support the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will have to state there is a time certain fixed. There are a number of Members who stood at one time or another on our record but did not yield time to the principal involved. If those Members who stood desire time, I wish they would rise for recognition. If those Members do not, the Chair, with the permission of the committee, is going to arbitrarily divide the remaining time, 3 minutes to the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. UDALL) 4 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. FRENZEL) and 4 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. HAYS). That is all the time there is.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. UDALL).

(Mr. UDALL asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. PHILLIP BURTON. Is it not correct this amendment as it has been changed and refined now accepts the premise of the House Administration Bill constructed by the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. HAYS) and the others, including the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. ANNUNZIO) that no General Fund money except voluntary checkoff money can be used, and that no moneys can be used until after all of the other priorities in the bill have been fulfilled? Am I not correct in that respect?

Mr. UDALL. The gentleman is exactly correct. If there is no checkoff money, there is no matching in congressional elections. This is entirely a voluntary program; it is voluntary for the giver and the receiver. No one has to give a dollar on the tax checkoff unless he wants to. He knows what he is financing. No candidate has to use it. If one is affronted by the use of checkoff funds from little people's dollars, he need not apply. It is entirely voluntary.

I would add that public financing of elections is now used in some 20 countries. In Puerto Rico, the Commonwealth which is affiliated with us, they have had a fine experience with it. The elections down there are financed publicly. The Members ought to ask the Resident Commissioner from Puerto Rico how it works in that area.

Let me emphasize again, because there is misunderstanding, it does not apply this year, but only in 1976. It does not apply to primaries. There is a limitation on what one can get out of the fund, which is now $20,000 instead of $25,000, because we have reduced the overall spending limitation. It is totally financed by the checkoff. There is a threshold of $7,500, now $6,000, which must be raised before anyone can qualify, and anyone who is a serious opponent is going to raise $6,000 in any event, so this is not encouraging people to come into the races.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. FRENZEL).

(Mr. FRENZEL, asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, I oppose the Udall-Anderson amendment.

I have previously listed for the members of this committee some of the ill effects of public financing, but a rerun might be helpful now. Here is what we get with public financing:

First, we get weakened political parties; second, we get more candidates in every race and duller elections, and duller elections means reelection of incumbents. We get additional protection of incumbents. We get discouragement of challenges. We get discouragement of personal participation in political campaigns. We get starvation of funds for State and local candidates. We get restriction of freedom of speech. We get a compelled use of your money and my money for candidates that we may personally object to. Worse, we get an increase in the bureaucracy.

Finally, we get more spending than we have now, although the people who put up this amendment are telling us they want to cut back. The worst effect of all is the promise of clean elections cannot be fulfilled by using public money.

Public money is the same color as private money. It is green. Translated in another way, a lawbreaker can break the law with public money as well as with private money. There is no essential cleanliness in public money.

I believe the bill we are working on today provides independent, effective regulation and enforcement, and that is the best insurance for clean elections. We can achieve clean, open, honest elections, without wasting the people's money.

If public financing is an idea whose time has come, why has public support for using the taxpayers' money in elections fallen off more than 10 percent in the last 6 months? I will tell the Members why—because the public has figured out whose money it is and what kind of campaigns it is going to be used on.

Our all-pervasive Government has left very little to us the American people. Do not let the bureaucrats take over the congressional elections too. At least save the people's House for the people.

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENZEL. I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. Mr. Chairman, if there is any money left over after the campaign, does the candidate give it back to the Government or does he keep the money despite the fact that it is Government money?

Mr. UDALL. If the gentleman will yield, it goes back to the Government and it goes into the fund to pay for the overall television and billboard and other campaign expenses.

Mr. FRENZEL. I thank the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. HAYS).

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to say at the start when the gentleman was asked if this would be the nose of the camel under the tent, the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. ANDERSON) replied "No." And I agree with him, it would not be the nose of the camel, it would be the whole head and half his body. And the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. ANDERSON) and company would be back here in 2 years wanting complete public financing. They are the ones who wanted public financing which I turned down cold turkey.

Mr. ANDERSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYS. No. The gentleman got his time and he got 26 minutes of it the way it was, or the proponents of this did, and I am not going to yield at any time to anybody who is for this iniquitous amendment.

What the gentleman is really trying to do is to get his hands into the Treasury on the first go round. Sure, they wanted $90,000 first, and then they will want the whole turkey.

If we did that in Ohio we would have 1,000 candidates. All one has to do in Ohio is to give a dinner for $25 a ticket and bring in all the Hollywood stars one would want and spend that money and then you report you spent that amount and then you go to the Treasury and pick up your check.

But that is what it amounts to. I am totally opposed to it. I am asking the Members to accept a limited trial run on the Presidential campaign, where all the people have gone to jail. There have not been any charges of illicit contributions in the congressional campaigns.

They talk about reducing the big money. We have already reduced the big money by putting a ceiling on all one can spend, by putting a ceiling on what one can raise, and by putting a ceiling on what may be contributed.

Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment is defeated.

Mr. JAMES V. STANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYS. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. JAMES V. STANTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. I believe public financing in the guise that it is being presented here today is the same type of poison that was initially presented. I believe the process of developing strong political parties in this country ought to be on the basis of the parties and the philosophies themselves, and we should not enable by a method of public financing the development of new philosophies. In my judgment this is just the beginning of proliferating those philosophies and parties in this country.

Mr. HAYS. I agree with the gentleman totally. I think it is a scheme to break down the two-party system. I think it could have that effect. I think it is significant that the people who believe in the two-party system are totally opposed to this concept.

(Mr. JAMES V. STANTON asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. JAMES V. STANTON. Mr. Chairman, the Watergate crisis is generating a great deal of energy for reform of the electioneering process. Obviously, this is a good thing, but we would be making a serious mistake, Mr. Speaker, if we were to assume that any reform—just so long as it produces change—is better than no reform at all. If our responsibility as politicians, as holders of public office and as lawmakers were limited only to offering proof to the public that we care—from which it would follow that we deserve to be reelected next November—then we would be committing no crime if we were to succumb to the "do something, do anything" impulse. In fact, we could saddle some "idea whose time has come" and ride this wave of the future to still another term in public office. But, of course, our responsibility goes beyond that.

It is our duty to think, as well as to act. It is our duty to be sensible; to write into the law only those reforms that we know are going to be meaningful and that will not lead to further disillusionment; to take care that we do not casually transform and thereby undermine that larger framework of democratic government that served us well for nearly 200 years, and which, having been the target of the Watergate criminals, should not, knowingly or unknowingly, become our target as well. It is our duty, Mr. Speaker, to remember that we are politicians as well as reformers, experienced in the ways of government and elections, and possessed of that inside knowledge that comes only from being a part of these processes. It is our duty to use that knowledge to harness and correctly channel the energy for political reform.

Recent developments in the Senate suggest that we might soon be confronted in this body with one of those "ideas whose time has come." This is the proposal for public financing of campaigns for Federal office—that is, Presidential and congressional electioneering.

Besides being a proposal, it has taken on the dimensions of a moral crusade. Mr. Speaker, while I do not question the sincerity of those who advocate public finanacing, I do challenge their wisdom. I submit respectfully that their proposal—I am addressing myself, of course, to the basic concept rather than to any particular legislative formulation of it—is at best a placebo and at worst—I am using this word with forethought—a poison. It's a placebo because it will not succeed in assuring us of "unbought" politicians.

It is a poison because it might very well destroy the innards of the American system of government. One organ it would attack is the first amendment, which assures to every citizen and group of citizens not only a voice to influence their political leaders but also the absolute right to chart their own lawful strategy for maximizing that voice. Another organ that would be threatened is our traditional infrastructure of major and minor political parties. The parties might be brought to a state of atrophy by public financing, or—this is another possibility—they might become afflicted with elephantiasis. Even worse, perhaps, is the possibility that they might achieve immortality. A host of new parties might be born, never to die. In what follows, I will elaborate a great deal and become more specific about these substantive objections to public financing.

I. INEFFECTIVENESS OF PUBLIC FINANCING

A. FAILURE OF THE CORRUPT PRACTICES ACT

At this time, however, Mr. Chairman, I would like to pursue for a moment the argument that public financing would prove ineffectual. This intended reform is based on the premise that good money in politics would drive out the bad. Good money would be that money contributed generously and indiscriminately by all the taxpayers to parties and candidates who hold all sorts of views. Bad money would be that contributed selectively to certain parties or candidates by self-seeking special interests. Never mind for the moment that not all the bad money, so defined, is really bad—that much of it in fact is undoubtedly good, if we broadly construe the term "special interest," and if we believe, as we say we do, in a pluralistic body politic where every political entity has a right not only to exist but to compete—where the public is served by the clash of these so-called special interests and the synthesizing, as often occurs, of their separate points of view. Never mind, either, for the moment the consideration that evil cannot inhere in money itself. It grows only out of the spirit in which it might be given, or from the understanding with which it is received, if the spirit and the understanding are corrupt.

The point for us to consider, if we accept the premise that the presumptively bad money is bad per se, is whether it will indeed be purged from the political process by the good money that is poured in. Our historical experience, not to mention our political savvy, gives us the answer. In 1925 we gave the country the Corrupt Practices Act, and in subsequent years we enacted a number of amendments. This law said, in effect, that campaign contributions from business corporations—or, it was added later, labor unions—are bad, period. Therefore, such contributions were outlawed. But to what effect? Corporations and labor unions are still in the very center of the political arena. In the end, despite the 1925 enactment and its amendments, we got Watergate. And during the intervening years through the present time, we got this—as Marc Yacker, of the Library of Congress, wrote in a paper prepared for me:

> Many corporations find ways to circumvent the law. Two of the most common methods are the placement of salaried workers, still on the company payroll, on the campaign staff of a candidate, and the "lumping technique," that is, a corporation arranging to pay a regularly used attorney, public relations firm, etc. for debts incurred by the candidate. Other firms contribute, also in violation of the law, by awarding bonuses to their executives with the understanding that the money will be contributed to a candidate or party. Still others allow their corporate officials to be reimbursed for obviously inflated business expenses, supposedly paid for out of pocket. In reality this provides the executive with excess money, again to be contributed to a political campaign.

As we know, Mr. Chairman, public cynicism is highly injurious in a democracy; it causes people to lose interest in governing themselves, and to lose confidence in their ability to do it. Two of the prime causes of such cynicism are laws that promise more than they can achieve and laws that are supposedly tough but really are not enforced evenly, if at all. The Corrupt Practices Act was such a law; a statute providing public funds for electioneering, but introducing no further reforms, would be another such law.

Some of the public financing proposals would give us a hybrid system in which candidates could legally receive contributions both from the U.S. Treasury and from private sources. Since this kind of law would permit presumptively bad money to maintain access to the political system and to keep circulating within it, it's difficult to discern what the statute would accomplish, assuming again, as such a law would, in effect, say, that the bad money is truly bad.

Perhaps its principal achievement would be to induce some people into thinking, until they awoke later in disillusionment, that another blow had been struck for reform. Another version of the public financing plan, more forthright and obviously more consistent with its own premises, would outlaw private contributions altogether. This was the strategy of the Corrupt Practices Act, whose weak and hypocritical prohibitions against campaign contributions by corporations and labor unions survive today in our latest piece of reform legislation, the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971, Public Law 92-225. In other words, preemptive public financing unaccompanied by additional reforms would come to public attention as a dramatic change trumpeting reform but leaving us, in terms of enforcement, exactly where we are today. When the people discover that, they will be that much poorer because their tax moneys will have been used to no effect.

B. ENFORCEMENT: THE MOST NEEDED REFORM

This brings us then, Mr. Chairman, to a third and, in my opinion, the crucial reason for opposing public financing today. In addition to being a placebo and a poison—I shall presently, as I have said, say a great deal more about the poison—public financing would be a diversion. The crusade for it diverts us from giving attention to the reform we really need. What we in Congress, and earnest citizens outside of Congress, should be concentrating on is not the financing problem but the enforcement problem. We should be directing our energies toward establishing in the Government an effective institutional mechanism for enforcement of all the laws we now have, and for whatever additional laws we might yet enact, to regulate the financing of political campaigns. For even if we adopt legislation based on the premise that I challenge, namely, that campaign contributions from anyone except Uncle Sam are inherently bad, what good would such a law do if it were not enforced—if it could not keep the so-called bad money from entering campaigns in some secretive way?

Since the Corrupt Practices Act would be the spiritual progenitor of a public financing law, we ought to examine the reasons why the 1925 legislation failed. Of course, its rationale may have been faulty to begin with, in the sense that perhaps it is unrealistic to suppose that we can really prevent corporations, labor unions, and other special interest groups from somehow finding a way to use their financial muscle when their vital interests are at stake. If this is true, we are not likely to have much more success with a preemptive public financing law. However, if indeed it is an attainable goal to drive the presumptively bad money out of the political arena, then obviously a strong, continuing enforcement effort would be required. The Corrupt Practices Act did not lay the foundation for such an effort—and, in fact, the law appears to have been contrived to render such an effort unlikely, if not impossible. Enforcement was strengthened somewhat, but not very much, in the 1971 law. This is where we are today, and it is on this week reed that the advocates of public financing ask us to superimpose an elaborate new system of restraints against special interest groups.

The first policing inadequacy of the Corrupt Practices Act was that it dispersed responsibility for enforcement rather than concentrating it. It enthroned the Clerk of the House and the Secretary of the Senate as satraps who were to receive from the candidates public reports disclosing their campaign contributions and expenditures. The Clerk and the Secretary in turn were supposed to advise the Attorney General of failures to file, and it was to be his job to take it from there.

The second inadequacy of the act should already be apparent; the designated enforcement officers had authority which they could not safely exercise. The Clerk and the Secretary owed their tenure to the incumbents they were policing. And the Attorney General, of course, was an appointee of the President, whose day-to-day work enmeshed him in all sorts of entangling alliances with Members of the House and Senate. Predictably, in the decades that followed there were no prosecutions under the Corrupt Practices Act. In the 1971 updating of the law, it was broadened in scope and new enforcement obligations were spelled out. In addition, a third satrapy was created. The Comptroller General, more independent than the Clerk and the Secretary but still an agent of Congress, was given supervisory authority over the reports filed by Presidential candidates. But the two basic defects of the 1925 legislation were not corrected. We are still stuck today with a policeman on every corner, as it were, operating under no centralized command structure and each of them answerable in subtle ways to the persons they are policing.

What we obviously need, Mr. Chairman, is more self-starting, self-propelled, free-wheeling enforcement machinery operating under a grant of authority that bridges the executive and legislative branches. The machinery ought to be centralized in a new agency of Government that would need no one's permission to exercise its police powers with respect to electioneering by candidates for all the Federal elective offices. The agency would have built-in authority to compel reporting by the candidates, to require timely reporting to verify the completeness and accuracy of the reports to subpena persons and documents, to hold hearings, to publicize its findings and, when necessary, to initiate and prosecute its own cases in court. Such an agency is proposed in a number of bills pending before us, among them S. 372, which passed the Senate last year, and my own H.R. 10218. But the crusade for public financing apears to be monopolizing public attention, diverting us from the more meaningful and effective legislation that would result from a careful examination of the plans for assuring enforcement.

Mr. Chairman, I think most of us would agree that, of all the officials charged with enforcement of the present law, the Comptroller General is the most impartial. As I have indicated, he is one of three so-called supervisory officers, the two others being the Clerk of the House and the Secretary of the Senate. For some time now, he and his agents have this Congress to suggest improvements in the law. The thrust of his thinking is highlighted by these excerpts from his testimony last April 12 before the Senate Subcommittee on Privileges and Elections:

One year's experience with the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971 has convinced us of the need for more effective enforcement procedures . . . The Supervisory Officer or his equivalent should be given the power: (1) to require written reports and answers to questions; (2) to administer oaths; (3) to compel testimony and documents by subpena; and (4) to initiate court actions in his own name through his own attorneys . . . In addition, the Supervisory Officer or his equivalent should be authorized to impose civil fines on candidates and political committees or others who violate the Act in ways not appropriate for criminal prosecution, such as late filing of reports, failure to include relevant information, errors in reports, etc. In his discretion, the administrator should be able to impose a fine within statutory limits on the violator and to enforce it through distraint or through a court proceeding.

This is the real business before us, Mr. Chairman. We should get on with it. We would be misleading the people if we were to allow ourselves to become distracted by sideshows produced by outside groups that lack our firsthand knowledge of all that is involved in campaign financing. Because in this instance we are making laws to govern ourselves, no one knows better than we do which restraints on us would really prove effective.

C. DISCLOSURE AS AN ALTERNATIVE REFORM

If we conclude, Mr. Chairman, that even the strictest enforcement would fail to completely insulate campaigns from presumptively bad money, then we ought to consider also proposals to improve the disclosure mechanism in the current law our rationale being that the power of bad money diminishes as it attains visibility. Disclosure, as well as certain outright prohibitions, was a strategy adpoted in the 1925 Corrupt Practices Act. Although there was more obfuscation than disclosure in the years that followed, some important strides forward were made in this area in the 1971 legislation. With some of my colleagues, I beileve we ought to proceed still further on this road. For instance, H.R. 10218 contains a proposal for a Federal Elections Campaign Bank. The justice Department endorsed this concept in testimony last September 21 before the Senate Subcommittee on Privileges and Elections. I explained my bill in detail in a presentation to the House last September 25. It was published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD that day, starting on page H8294.

I for one am convinced that a combination of full disclosure and energetic, impartial enforcement is the prescription we need for effective reform of campaign financing. The Watergate investigations have served as, among other things, an engine for disclosure. No one will deny that these disclosures have had impact and that they are bringing results. I submit that we ought to live for a time in this atmosphere of disclosure and enforcement, and that we see what it can produce, before we veer off on the tangent of public financing—a possibly irrelevant reform that threatens, as I have said, to destroy certain vital functions of our democratic system.

II. POSITIVE ASPECTS OF PRIVATE FINANCING

Mr. Chairman, I would like to pause once more before turning to my substantive objectives against public financing. The reason I leave these objections to the last is that I prefer to address you and our colleagues in positive terms, emphasizing what we ought to be doing rather than what we ought to be avoiding. This is not a polemic in favor of the status quo. But neither is this analysis one that sees no redeeming value at all in certain aspects of the status quo. A conspicuous factor in things as they are is, of course, the system of campaign contributions from nonpublic sources. As I have said, I do not accept the argument that this money is inherently bad. As a matter of fact, I assert the opposite—that such contributions play a constructive and essential role in the unfolding of the democratic process.

I think we can see this more clearly if we describe these contributions not as private, not as nonpublic, but rather as quasi-public in nature. They are quasi-public in the sense that they are publicly disclosed and are contributed for the purpose of achieving results that affect the public—for better or for worse—by bringing influence to bear on officials who are elected by the public. This may be said even of the small sums that many citizens contribute directly on their own initiative, without consulting anyone else, to candidates and parties and politically active groups. It is true even more of the much larger sums that the pressure groups themselves contribute to campaigns. I doubt that anyone would dispute the proposition that these groups are quasi-public in nature, a fact that is implicit, for instance, in laws that in effect grant licenses to their lobbyists. Therefore, it is not valid to assume, as many advocates of public financing do, that some unholy dichotomy exists between public money and what they call private money.

In his study "Campaign Financing and Political Freedom," Ralph K. Winter, Jr. writes:

Contributing to a candidate permits individuals to pool their resources and voice their message far more effectively than if each spoke singly. This is critically important because it permits citizens to join a potent organization and propagate their views beyond their voting districts. Persons who feel strongly about appointments to the Supreme Court, for example, can demonstrate their convictions by contributing to the campaigns of sympathetic congressmen. Those who give money to Mr. John Gardner's Common Cause and conceive of that act as a form of free association and expression should not automatically deny the same status to those who give to political campaigns. . . . That a senator receives large union contributions might be perceived as the reason he often supports union causes. Is not the reverse far more commonly the case: the candidate receives contributions because he holds these convictions? . . . Common Cause, we are told, is presently engaged in an empirical study designed to show "a real correlation" between contributions and legislative decisions. . . . Some such correlation can probably be easily established, since contributions are rarely given either at random or to one's political enemies.

Winter cites more reasons why the presumptively bad money really is good:

The need for campaign money weeds out candidates who lack substantial public support. An attractive candidate with an attractive issue will draw money as well as votes.

And:

The right to give or not to give to a candidate is an aspect of political freedom. Campaign money . . . serves as a barometer of intensity of feeling over potent political issues . . .

By following this train of thought we can see that the private contribution fosters political action. It promotes a clash of ideas. When one pressure group builds a war chest and starts using it, this action makes it virtually certain that opposing interests, too, will solicit their constituencies for financial support. All this, then, helps to finance public discussion and to draw public attention to the controversies that are the sine qua non of democratic government.

OBJECTIONS TO PUBLIC FINANCING

I realize, Mr. Chairman, that nothing I have said so far necessarily rules out public financing on its own merits as at least an addition to the arsenal of reform. It could be argued, in fact, that a program for reform ought to start with the priorities I have outlined here, culminating finally in a system of public financing. This would complete the process, it might be said, of delivering to the public a package that would preclude any future Watergates. But I hope we stop short of putting together that package. Public financing, in my opinion, is not an antidote to Watergate. Instead, being carried forward mindlessly on the emotions engendered by Watergate, it could cause permanent damage to our elective processes. I submit that public financing ought to be assessed, first, in terms of its impact on our traditional political party structure; second, its impact on candidates and incumbent elective officials; and, third, its impact on public participation in elections. Then I will conclude with certain other considerations that we ought to keep in mind.

A. IMPACT ON POLITICAL PARTY STRUCTURE

The specific ways in which public financing could alter or ensconce the traditional political party structure would depend, of course, on the particular plan that is adopted. Some plans would strengthen the parties in undesirable ways; others would have the opposite—but an equally undesirable—effect. Since we do not know which plan might emerge in a viable legislative form, to be debated on the floors of the House and Senate, our safest course at this point is to consider all the contingencies, even though some of them will be seen as mutually exclusive. In other words, if we do not come to one bad result, it will be another.

1. THE MAJOR PARTIES

We ought to start with the two major parties, examining the consequences in terms of their institutional roles. As we know, Mr. Chairman, the Democratic and Republican parties do not represent a bequest made to us by the Constitution. There is no mention of parties in that document, or in any of its amendments.

Although they lack constitutional status it is true that the parties have evolved as part of our political system, and at the present time they appear to be permanent fixtures within it. Even if we assume that continuing evolution will not some day dictate a phasing out of the parties—that is, that the parties are here to stay, and should stay—where is it written that we must have the Democratic and Republican parties that we know today? Other major parties have come and gone for sound historical reasons. But if we agree to underwrite the existence of today's parties with public funds, we will never be rid of them. They will survive as institutions long after they outlive their vitality, long after their constituents abandon them. But is it right for them to live on? Is it constitutional to grant them immortality? As Justice Black has written:

> There is, of course, no reason why two parties should retain a permanent monopoly on the right to have people vote for or against them. Competition in ideas and governmental policies is at the core of our electoral process and of the first amendment freedoms.

Obviously, when we give public money to the parties, we are subsidizing the ideologies that they espouse. If we subscribe to the wisdom of Jefferson, who called for separation between church and State, we ought to carry this policy to its logical conclusion and prohibit also any conjoining of ideology and the State. I submit that we should be especially sensitive to this danger in today's world, when ideologies are proclaimed and promoted with religious fervor. To the extent that we subsidize majoritarian ideology, I question whether this is wise or constitutional. Does not this perforce discriminate against individuals and groups that hold minority viewpoints? Does not this make it more difficult for new ideologies, better attuned to a rapidly changing world, to gain a foothold? We ought to beware, Mr. Chairman, of so entrenching the party that we belong to, as well as the opposite party to which our colleagues across the aisle adhere. We should keep in mind that it is under fascism and communism that the state and ideology are entwined.

Further, when we grant to a party a continuing subsidy, we strengthen not only the party but also the leaders in control of the party at the time the subsidies start. We can imagine circumstances under which the leadership, having control of the money, could arrange things so that it would be difficult to oust them from power even after they had lost an important election, or in the face of a movement by younger leaders or reform elements to take over. In 1972, in line with this analysis, the Democratic Party could have remained under the thumb of GEORGE MCGOVERN and Jean Westwood, who had less than universal appeal among Democrats, and the Republican Party in 1964 could have become the possession of BARRY GOLDWATER and Dean Burch and the small party faction that they represented.

In the big cities, to cite another example, the machines could live on long after they had lost true popular support. So not only would public financing bring us permanently entrenched major parties but also leadership superbly equipped to assure the succession to loyalists of their own choosing—in short, a sort of monarchial system of party governance.

There is still a third way in which public funding could lock the parties into positions of power. Giving money to them would strengthen them vis-a-vis candidates carrying the party's banner. If there were a public financing scheme that forced candidates to look to the parties exclusively for financial sustenance, this would diminish the independence of those running for office, and possibly cause them to cut or ignore their ties with other interest groups. Bossism would ride again.

If, the other hand, we were to give the public subsidy to the candidates, rather than to the parties, then we would weaken the party's traditional role as a principal fundraiser, thereby depriving it of an instrument of discipline. Following inevitably, as well, would be a proliferation, if not an explosion, in the number of candidates. With aspirants for office being guaranteed funding by the Government, they would enter the primaries in herds. In large fields such as these, no candidate could hope to achieve more than a modest plurality. The winner then would enter the general election not really as the candidate of a party but merely of a small faction. The overwhelming majority of voters in the primary will have lost. This is true today, of course, in many elections, but public financing of campaigns channeled to the candidates themselves would increase the incidence of such freakish elections, and perhaps make them commonplace.

If we were to give the public money both to the parties and the candidates, as a means of achieving some balance between the alternatives I have just cited, then we could end up being saddled with undesirable aspects of both systems, with neither being able to cure the other.

2. THE MINOR PARTIES

Public financing of elections would also affect profoundly the traditional role of the minor parties in our system of government. Like the major parties, they are not rooted in the Constitution and thus there is no obligation on the part of the citizenry or the Government to perpetuate them. Nonetheless, all of us are familiar with the positive contribution that some of these parties have made throughout our history. Some of the best of them have died, but only after important parts of their platform had been absorbed by the major parties. Others have produced nothing and passed from the scene with good riddance, because their programs were offensive to citizens in a democratic country or because their proposals were foolish or inappropriate to the times. The comings and goings of the minor parties has had the net effect of providing a two-party system, which in turn accounts for the politics of consensus that has kept our country stable and united. Against this background, any tampering with the two-party system and with the means of absorption of the minor parties, or conversely an upset in the political dynamics of our Nation so as to discourage the birth of third parties, is bound to have deleterious results. Jack H. Haskell of the Library of Congress staff, in a paper last August, summed up all that would be at stake for minor parties under varying schemes of public financing. He wrote:

> It is contended by some that since third parties must garner a certain percentage of the vote before being eligible for public funding, the requirement may unfairly discourage the operation and formulation of third or new parties and so may dry up an important source of new ideas and original solutions which are often eventually adopted by the major parties.

On the other hand it has been suggested that the expectation of public funding if a certain number of votes can be polled may encourage the proliferation of minor and new parties. This is seen by some to be a serious threat to the stability of our two-party system of government since varying factions, instead of being encouraged to work for change within the structure of one of the two major parties, would now be encouraged by the expectation of free funding to form a new "splinter" party. Further objections are raised that public funding may perpetuate minor political parties which would otherwise have only short-run or temporary popularity since funding of third parties may partly be based upon performance of the party in the previous election four years before. Others question the wisdom of the government or the desire of the general public to support or perpetuate radical "fringe" parties or racist-oriented third parties which may have established a modicum of public support.

As to the litters of minor parties that might result from a system of public financing, perhaps the ultimate danger would be the formation of a religious party. Would the constitutional prohibition separating church from state then become operative, depriving such a party of the public funds that other parties are getting? If not, would not most Americans find it obnoxious—if not dangerous—to in effect be subsidizing a religious doctrine? On the other hand, if religious parties are to be barred from receiving the public funds that other parties receive, how is a religious party to be defined? It appears to me, Mr. Speaker, that nothing could save the state under these circumstances from becoming entangled with one or more of the religions.

B. IMPACT ON OFFICEHOLDERS

Apart from its impact on the parties, public financing would have a separate effect on candidates and persons already holding public office. It would come as another boon to the incumbents. Frankly, Mr. Chairman, I should think that we ought to be embarrassed about asking the taxpayers for any more favors, in view of the perquisites of office that we already hold and the fact that they have proved so useful in keeping us here. For example, the franking privilege used in certain ways gives us a leg up on our challengers, and we can see the evidence of this in the election results.

So we already have our subsidies, the one in this example being an enormous—and unlimited—allowance to pay for the mailing of letters, illustrated newsletters and all sorts of other materials to our constituents. On top of all this, we would get another handout from the Government through public financing of our campaigns. In a public funding plan that gives an equal amount to each candidate, we still would maintain the perquisite gap. In a plan that doles out money based on performance in previous elections, we would automatically get more money than the challengers. In a plan of public financing that is less than preemptive, some incumbents might twist the situation to their advantage by using the taxpayer's funds, in effect, as seed money to attract still more private contributions. Allow me to explain, Mr. Chairman. Suppose we have an incumbent who is fairly well entrenched. He is able to build only a small war chest, election after election, because his opposition is light and financial angels among his supporters see no serious threat to him. But then some public money is thrown into the campaign. As a result, attracted by the certain prospect of financial assistance, a strong challenger enters the race—or a number of challengers do. The survival of the incumbent, under these conditions, is not to be taken for granted. So he goes to his supporters and persuades them to open their wallets. This, of course, stimulates parallel activity by the opposition. But in any such fundraising contest, as studies have shown, the incumbent has important advantages that virtually assure him of outsoliciting his challengers. Surplus funds he might raise could then be put in the bank to give him a head-start 2 years later, or 4 years later, in a race for higher office. In the meantime, the challenger has found the public financing kitty to be of only passing advantage. He himself might be no worse off financially than when he started, but the taxpayer is behind and the incumbent might be ahead, because he has picked up some cash that otherwise would have been withheld from him.

Yet it is not only money that taxpayers might lose. They might also be deprived, under a scheme of public financing, of the opportunity to hear a spirited, truly informative discussion of the issues. Winter has written:

We are told that subsidies will "reduce the pressure on Congressional candidates for dependence on large campaign contributions from private sources . . ." If, however, one reduces the pressure on candidates to look to the views of contributors, to whom will the candidates look instead? The need to raise money compels candidates to address those matters about which large groups feel strongly. Candidates might well, upon receiving campaign money from the government, mute their views and become even more prepackaged. Eliminate the need for money and you eliminate much of the motive to face up to the issues. Candidates might then look more to attention-getting gimmicks than to attention-getting policy statements. A subsidy combined with spending limits might insulate incumbents both from challengers and the strongly held desires of constituents.

We should not overlook, either, Mr. Chairman, the fact that appropriations for a campaign-financing program would be controlled by persons already holding those offices that would be at stake in the next election. The implications of this are worth reflecting on, in view of what we in Congress describe as the power of the purse. At the very least, it seems to me, we would be plunging the Federal Government, which heretofore has largely been held at arm's length, into the election process. At worst, this would result in incumbent officeholders, or perhaps their agents, meddling in disputes over what did, or did not, constitute a justified use of public-supplied campaign funds. I wonder: Would we end up, for instance, with censorship of political advertising messages?

C. IMPACT ON PARTICIPATORY POLITICS

Mr. Chairman, public financing also would have an adverse impact on public participation in the election process. I question how we would enhance liberties if we clamp restraints on the citizens of any class denying them the right to contribute to a candidate who has already shown by his record that he is a champion of that group, or who has persuaded the group that he definitely will take up their cause. As Haskell has put it:

It is questioned whether it is wise to diminish the influence of groups which represent the opinion of a large segment of the electorate, such as the political arms of labor organizations or commercial groups. The objective of collective action, such as collective bargaining for instance, is to centralize, and so to increase the bargaining power of individuals to meet the legitimate demands of these persons who may not have the influence to receive consideration as individuals. It is feared that through public financing the needs of certain individuals, for example laborers, may not be met since the means through which they may exert their collective influence, through organizations such as COPE, will be substantially limited. Those who disagree with this premise contend that private interest groups may represent their members by exerting their influence through channels others than direct financial support of candidates. This contention, however, at the same time may weaken the original argument that public financing would free a candidate from the influence of special interest groups.

I would venture to say, Mr. Chairman, that the ordinary workingman has a rather keen sense of the power he is able to command through his union, and an equally accurate estimate of his helplessness if he is forced to stand alone. If he were barred by a new law, for reasons obscure to him, from giving his few dollars to the only candidate who seems interested in him, his sense of there being something foul afoot would harpen his cynicism, and he probably would turn off politically retreating to apathy. At the same time, affluent persons with more free time than the workingman would remain on the political stage, and might end up hogging a good part of it for themselves. Also remaining front and center would be the activist, highly educated persons who are able to bring to bear in a campaign more than just money—such as a knowledge of the details of many issues; an ability to articulate their points of view; and all the self-confidence that comes from these attributes. It is these same persons who frequently influence, and in some places also control, the news media. While their role in elections is just as constructive as that of the workingman, we ought not to take action that in effect gives them a greater voice than is justified by their numbers in the population. Of course, this is what we do when we brush aside the workingman.

D. OTHER CONSIDERATIONS

There are a number of other considerations, Mr. Chairman, that militate against public financing. I would like to cite just a few:

If a voter disagrees strongly with a candidate, should he be forced to help pay for his message? Winter has stated the problem this way:

What would happen if a racist ran for office and delivered radical and quasi-violent speeches? One result might be cries for even more regulation—in particular, for regulation of the content of political speech.

To the extent that the largest sums of money are contributed by those who can best afford it, and whose personal financial stake in our system is greater, is this not after all, as it should be? Does this not unofficially parallel, in a sense, the principle or progressive taxation? Somebody has to pay for political campaigns. If we take the money out of the public till, the cost of it will fall disproportionately on the low-middle and lower income groups. This is so because our Federal income tax system is not as progressive as it is supposed to be, or as we like to pretend that it is.

The cost of public financing might become burdensome, and this could take money away from vital public programs. We can assume a steady escalation of costs because, to cite one reason, for the incumbents to increase the amounts of the grants to themselves enhances their sense of power and their actual power. To political animals like us, having more money to dispense would be akin to having more patronage at our command. I doubt that we would spurn larger and larger grants even if the price for this would be to have to share the extra money with our challengers. Is there a politician among us who would deny that some of us are adept at making deals with the opposition? And who would be the beneficiaries of all this largess? Again, I would like to cite but one example, Mr. Chairman. Arlen Large wrote in the Wall Street Journal last year:

In recent years a whole industry of campaign advertising specialists has mushroomed to advise candidates on how to spend their privately collected money. With an assured supply of financing from public tax funds, the campaign consultant would become just one more parasitic operator who, like a commercial income tax preparer, thrives merely because the government exists

IV. CONCLUSION

I would like to conclude, Mr. Chairman, with an observation by Alexander Heard, an authority on campaign costs, who noted in his work "Costs of Democracy:"

It has been repeatedly demonstrated that he who pays the piper does not always call the tune, at least not in politics. Politicians prize votes more than dollars.

Let us not get carried away, then, Mr. Chairman, by getting hung up on the financial aspects of politics. Let us examine carefully the case against public funding of elections, as it has been outlined here and elsewhere. Or better yet, why not lay the question aside for the time being and get on with the reforms we truly need at this time? Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

(Mr. BOLAND asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Chairman, the amendment before us has a great deal to recommend it. It is thoroughly bipartisan. Therefore, it is particularly appropriate, in light of the amendment's broad based political support, that it offer, as it does, the chance for matching public funding of congressional races, only where there is broad based public support for candidates. The amendment provides for matching funds, only after a candidate has raised, at least 10 percent of his maximum spending limit, through private contributions of $50 or less. Accordingly, so-called frivolous candidates will find it extremely difficult to benefit under this amendment.

The other significant proposition of this measure is, that what matching funds are provided, come only from the dollar checkoff fund. If there are no funds available in the fund, then no matching funds will be paid out. Thus, only the support of the taxpaying citizens of this country will serve to finance matching funds from the checkoff fund. These people will know that their taxes will not increase or decrease because of the fund. What they will know, and what they will be able to judge for themselves, is whether we should take the move, of providing a mix of public, as well as private funding, for Federal election campaigns.

This decision Mr. Chairman, puts the average citizen of this Nation in the driver's seat as far as public funding of elections goes. It makes such concepts as populism and grassroots supports—which, as expressions of the English language, have been overused and therefore have lost much meaning—it makes them more real and more viable in political parlance. If a mixture of public and private financing for Presidential elections can help to make the little people of this Nation more of a factor in Presidential races, there is little reason to deny this privilege to congressional races. I suggest, that it will do as much as anything since universal suffrage to put individual choices and community feeling in the forefront of Federal elections. It is going to put the average citizen right up front in national decisionmaking, a position that he or she long ago lost to the big money contributors. And finally, and most importantly, such a shift in real voting power is going to bring citizens a lot closer to their government. This will mean the defeat of national cynicism about our political system that has grown so rapidly since Watergate. It is also going to produce a feeling of involvement that I am confident will lead to a reestablishment of confidence in government. After all, it stands to reason that the more involved you are in an activity, the more committed you feel to its goals, the more stout is your defense of those goals and the more cohesive and unfragmented that activity can become.

Those symptoms can be true for this country as well. I feel that real participation in congressional elections can be an essential part of that revolutionary change. I therefore urge adoption of this well balanced and broad based amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. UDALL).

The question was taken; and the Chair announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I take this time simply to advise the House that I have an amendment which, except for the rule that was adopted and which I opposed, would be in order at this point and which I would have offered at this point. My amendment would add a new title to the bill, a title that would provide for free political broadcasting.

I believe that if we could get free political broadcasting over the airways that are owned by the people and are regulated by the Government, we could eliminate one of the most expensive aspects of campaigning.

In case any Members are interested in my proposal it appears on page H7783 in the RECORD for August 6, 1974, and it also is contained in H.R. 14520.

Under the rule, as I say, which I opposed, my amendment is not in order to this bill. That is most unfortunate. Because if we are going to do a thorough job of controlling excessive campaign spending we ought to consider this matter very seriously. I hope at some future time this amendment of mine will be in order for serious and careful consideration by this House.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, I wish to propose a unanimous-consent request, and that request is as follows:

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this bill and all amendments thereto cease at 6:15 p.m.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Members standing at the time the unanimous-consent request was agreed to will be recognized for approximately 1 minute and 20 seconds each.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York (Mr. KOCH).

AMENDMENTS OFFERED BY MR. KOCH

Mr. KOCH. Mr. Chairman, I offer two amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendments offered by Mr. KOCH: Page 79, immediately after line 9, insert the following new section:

CAMPAIGN MAIL

Sec. 410. (a) Chapter 95 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to Presidential Election Campaign Fund) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"SEC. 9014. CAMPAIGN MAIL.

"(a) DEFINITIONS.—For purposes of this section—

"(1) the term 'campaign mail' means any piece of mail which does not exceed the maximum weight per piece of mail allowable if mailed at the lowest rate per piece established by the Board of Governors of the Postal Service for bulk rate mailings of circulars by qualified nonprofit organizations, and which is mailed by any candidate for the purpose of influencing the election of such candidate;

"(2) the term 'candidate' has the meaning given it by section 301(b) of the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971, except that such term does not include a candidate for the office of President or Vice President of the United States;

"(3) the term 'eligible candidate' means any candidate who is eligible under subsection (c) to receive campaign mail payments;

"(4) the term 'supervisory officer' means the Secretary of the Senate with respect to candidates for the office of Senator, and the Clerk of the House of Repersentatives with respect to candidates for the office of Representative, Delegate, or Resident Commissioner; and

"(5) the term 'State' has the meaning given it by section 301(i) of the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971.

"(b) Campaign Mail Entitlement.—Any candidate who establishes his eligibility under subsection (c) shall be entitled to receive payments for campaign mail under subsection (d).

"(c) ELIGIBILITY.—

"(1) In any general election, any candidate who—

"(A) has met the qualifications prescribed by the applicable laws to hold the Federal office for which he is a candidate, and is the candidate of a political party whose candidate in the most recent general election for the office involved received at least 15 percent of the popular votes received by all candidates in such general election; or

"(B) transmits to the Secretary of State for the State in which the election is held (or, if there is no office of Secretary of State, to the equivalent State officer), no later than 45 days before the date of the general election, a petition containing the signatures of at least 5,000 individuals registered to vote in the geographical area in which such general election is held, shall be entitled to receive campaign mail payments under subsection (d).

"(2) The Secretary of State for the State in which the election is held (or, if there is no office of Secretary of State, the equivalent State officer) shall take appropriate steps to certify signatures contained in petitions transmitted by any candidate under paragraph (1)(B). Upon completion of certification, the Secretary of State shall transmit such petitions to the appropriate supervisory officer. The supervisory officer shall not declare any candidate to be eligible to receive allotments until the supervisory officer receives such petitions from the Secretary of State. Each such certification shall be completed no later than 30 days before the date of the election involved.

"(d) PAYMENTS.—

"(1) Every eligible candidate shall be entitled to receive payments from the Secretary under paragraph (2) for the mailing of a number of pieces of campaign mail equal to the number of individuals registered to vote in the geographical area in which the general election is held.

"(2) The Secretary shall make payments to an eligible candidate for mailings under paragraph (1) upon the receipt of certification from such candidate that such payments shall be used exclusively for the mailing of campaign mail. The Secretary shall make such payments out of the Presidential Election Campaign Fund established by section 9006(a). Such payments shall be made, however, only after the Secretary determines that amounts for payments under sections 9006(c), 9007(b)(3), and 9037(b) are available in the fund for such payments.

"(3) Whenever a payment is made by the Secretary under this section with respect to campaign mail of any eligible candidate, an amount equal to the amount of such payment shall be attributed toward the expenditure limitation of such candidate under section 608(c) of title 18, United States Code."

(b) Section 9012(c) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to unlawful use of payments) is amended by inserting "or under section 9014(d)" immediately after "9006".

(c) The table of sections for chapter 95 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to the Presidential Election Campaign Fund) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new item:

"Sec. 9014. Campaign mail.".

And redesignate the following section accordingly.

Page 79, line 15, strike out "and 409" and insert in lieu therof "409, and 410".

Mr. KOCH. Mr. Chairman, one of the amendments is a perfecting amendment, the other is related to public financing, but is a different version and limited solely to a single mailing for which the checkoff system would be used to provide the funds.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will have to say that there may be a question of a point of order on these amendments.

POINT OF ORDER

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on the amendments. The gentleman from New York was kind enough to offer one of the amendments to me, the one referring to page 79, after line 9, on campaign mail. I will reserve a point of order if the gentleman from

New York wishes to use the balance of his time to explain the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio reserves a point of order.

Mr. KOCH. Mr. Chairman, I would hope that the Chair would find the amendment in order because I believe it is a different version of public financing which is in order under the bill. Of course, the amendment was published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

What it does is to provide funds out of the checkoff funds to the candidates in the general election for one mailing, so as to give to candidates an equal opportunity to present themselves to the constituency.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Does the gentleman from Ohio press his point of order?

Mr. HAYS. I am not sure I know what the second amendment is.

Mr. KOCH. It is just a perfecting amendment to locate the numbers within the bill itself. It does not change the amendment.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, I do press my point of order against the amendments. I object to the first amendment, which is obviously subject to a point of order in that it appropriates money and orders the Secretary to make payments.

The second amendment is an amendment to that amendment, or a correcting amendment, so that if the first amendment is out of order then the second one is also.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. BOLLING). The Chair is ready to rule.

The point of order raised by the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. HAYS) is well taken. The first amendment offered by the gentleman from New York (Mr. KOCH) constitutes an appropriation on a legislative bill in violation of clause 4, rule XX, and is not protected by the rule. The second amendment is not in order under House Resolution 1292. Therefore the point of order is sustained.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Florida (Mr. HALEY).

(By unanimous consent, Mr. HALEY yielded his time to Mr. HAYS.)

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. YOUNG).

(Mr. YOUNG of Illinois asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. YOUNG of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, there are many provisions in the Federal Election Campaign Act Amendments of 1974 which improve the conduct of Federal elections. Because of these positive features, I urge my colleagues to also vote for final passage of this bill, even though I have grave reservations about some of its provisions and about the failure of this bill to add other necessary provisions.

The forward-looking provisions of the bill provide for an independent administration-enforcement board for the Federal Campaign Act. There will be four citizen-members, with two Republicans and two Democrats, with civil enforcement powers, subpena powers, and the authority to regulate campaign financing laws.

There will be a limitation on contributions. The amount is $1,000, which I think is too small, but I do believe that there should be a limitation on contributions. There is also a $5,000 limitation on contributions by committees. This provision is not to my liking since it will continue to provide "special interest" financing that will dilute public confidence in public officeholders. I would have preferred eliminating all committee contributions other than contributions from the recognized Republican and Democratic Party committees.

The $100 limitation on "cash" campaign contributions is excellent. The limitation on honorariums of $1,000 per appearance and $10,000 per calendar year is another step that will create greater confidence in public officials.

I strongly support the prohibition against "laundering" campaign funds and the bad practice of earmarking contributions through committees.

I think there should be a limitation on expenditures, but I believe that the $60,000 limitation is an unrealistic one. Any such limitation should have been at least $100,000 to afford challengers a better opportunity in their contest.

The designation of a principal campaign committee with all expenditures to be made and accounted for through such campaign committee is a great step forward. The reduction of reporting requirements and the publication of lists of those who fail to file are good steps that will eliminate unnecessary paperwork and make delinquencies known.

The bill repeals media limitations since they are not necessary with the limitations on total spending. The bill permits State and local officials to participate in political campaigns, and it preempts State law where there is a conflict.

I think there are some other deficiencies that should be noted. The recognized political parties are limited to contributions of not more than $5,000. I think that this limitation should be at least $15,000. There are inadequate prohibitions and regulations pertaining to special interest groups. "Pooling" is still permitted, and "in kind" contributions may be made.

There is not a sufficient prohibition against the "dirty trick" type of campaign activity.

Unfortunately, in the determination of whether or not to vote for this bill, we must weigh the good against the bad. In this case, the good outweighs the bad, although by a slighter margin than is desirable. At any rate, we can hope that the House-Senate conference will improve the bill in the areas where it is weak.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. CARNEY of Ohio yielded his time to Mr. HAYS.)

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. ZION).

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ZION. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

(Mr. ASHBROOK asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Chairman, the revelations of the last few months have convinced me of the need for a meaningful election reform bill. Our Nation cannot afford a continuation of the massive campaign abuses that have marred our electoral process in the past.

The so-called campaign reform bill now before the House, however, is not the type of reform that we need.

First, the bill leaves open one of the largest loopholes in our current law: in-kind contributions by labor unions. Tens of millions of dollars—taken from workers as union dues—are used in behalf of selected candidates to cover the costs of printing, materials, office space, telephones, and many other campaign items. Why should these labor union contributions be treated any differently than other contributions? Unlimited in-kind contributions by any special interest group must be stopped if we are to have truly meaningful campaign reform.

Second, the bill fails to establish an independent Federal Elections Commission to enforce the law. As the Senate Watergate Committee has pointed out, enforcement is the key factor in regulating the way campaign funds are raised and spent. The so-called election reform bill turns this function over to congressional employees and appointees, who will be responsible for policing the Congress and drawing up rules and regulations on campaign practices. Two congressional committees will have the power to veto these rules and regulations. Such a conflict of interest must be eliminated and an independent commission established if we are to have an effective campaign reform measure.

Third, the bill provides for matching taxpayer financing in Presidential primaries. A candidate could receive up to $5 million in public funds. Such financing would encourage frivolous candidates without significant support to file for office in order to receive public money. There is also a serious question whether a taxpayer's money should be used to finance the campaign of a candidate with whom he completely disagrees. In addition, public financing would weaken the two-party system and party structure, as candidates would be funded directly by Government tax money. Public financing is not the magic cure-all to our Nation's electoral problems. In fact, in many ways it would make matters worse.

Fourth, the bill allows special interest groups to pool their members' contributions and then pour large amounts into selected campaigns. Pooling of funds by special interest groups should be prohibited. Contributors should be required to designate the recipient of their donations and be identified for purposes of full disclosure.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I cannot support this legislation unless the House makes substantial changes in its provision. I urge my colleagues to pass a truly meaningful campaign reform bill.

(Mr. ZION asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ZION. Mr. Chairman, we desperately need a good campaign reform bill. It is long past time that special interest groups be prevented from buying an election. Unfortunately, this act does not acomplish this purpose. This bill was authored by the chairman of the Democratic Campaign Committee, who is also chairman of the House Administration Committee having jurisdiction over the legislation. It came out of the Democratic dominated Rules Committee in a fashion that prevented Republican Members from introducing perfecting amendments.

It does nothing, for example, to prevent big unions from spending $50 million in cash and contributions in kind. It does nothing to stop the use of involuntary dues to pay union officials for campaigning purposes, or to pay printing, postage, and telephone costs for union-endorsed candidates. A recent AFL–CIO publication, mailed by a tax-supported subsidy, called for a veto-proof Congress. It does not permit a union member to determine what candidate his money is used to support, either by dues or voluntary contributions.

The Board of Supervisors is hardly impartial in that it is appointed by sitting Members of the Congress. This bill is clearly an attempt to protect sitting Democratic Members of Congress. It is one of the most serious abuses of political power I have ever seen.

Since the need for campaign reform is so obvious, and since this bill does little to provide this reform, I reaffirm my own policy and pledge in this regard:

I will accept not one dime personally in the forthcoming campaign. All contributions must be sent to my regular campaign organization.

I have instructed my campaign committee not to accept any contributions from any person over $200, nor will I accept any contribution over $1,000 from any organization, lobby, or interest group whatsoever except my own political party.

This limitation on receipts applies across the board to any group which might have a legislative ax to grind—the AMA, chamber of commerce, National Association of Manufacturers, pharmaceutical manufacturers, organized labor—any group at all who might feel entitled to special legislative considerations because of a large donation to my reelection campaign.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. TREEN).

(Mr. TREEN asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. TREEN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the bill, not because I do not think we need some election reform, because we certainly do, but I think the worst abuse is taken care of when we set a limit on the amount that any contributor can give.

That limit may still be too high. I voted against the amendment to increase. But I see no sense in setting an aggregate limit, which limit is now $60,000 after the amendment reducing it from $75,000. If a candidate can go out and raise funds exceeding that aggregate from any number of persons, in order to raise a campaign fund that is necessary to make a challenge, he should be permitted to do this. And he can't make a challenge against an incumbent for $60,000.

We incumbents have the right to send out newsletters ad infinitum, and the postage alone is worth $16,000 or $18,000 each time. When we send out a mailing, we can bring into every household our message. We can do this any number of times. But the challenger, who can only hope to win by exposing a poor voting record, is limited to $60,000 for all his campaign expenses.

This bill is unfair to challengers; it is an incumbent protection bill, and it ought to be defeated.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. BUTLER).

(Mr. BUTLER asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, in the interest of saving time, I will not introduce an amendment which appears on page H7785, having discussed the matter with the chairman.

I will take this time, if I may, to ask the chairman: The matter that concerns me is, if this legislation is held unconstitutional, or portions of it, what will be the status of the various spending limitations? I will ask the Chairman if an agreement in writing between the candidates for nomination or election to any specific Federal office, agreeing to abide by these limitations, would be valid and binding even though the legislation is held unconstitutional?

Mr. HAYS. If the gentleman will yield, in my judgment, there is no question but what such agreement would be binding and valid, and if broken, it would be subject to civil penalties and civil liabilities.

Mr. BUTLER. I thank the gentleman. Relying on that assurance, I see no necessity for this amendment. I thank the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York (Mr. MCEWEN).

(Mr. MCEWEN asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MCEWEN. Mr. Chairman, I regret that the amendment that would make an agreement between candidates to establish limitations on contributions and expenditures less than those provided in this legislation was not considered. The text of this amendment appears on page H7785 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, of August 6, 1974.

The American people are concerned about the ever-increasing cost of elections, yet in many contests the amounts now expended are substantially less than the limits imposed by this legislation. Why then should the candidates themselves not be permitted to enter into binding agreements to limit campaign expenditures to an amount less than what this bill would permit? I think they should. More importantly, I think that the people think they should.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. COLLIER).

(By unanimous consent, Mr. COLLIER yielded his time to Messrs. SHUSTER and NELSEN.)

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. SHUSTER).

(Mr. SHUSTER asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

(By unanimous consent, Mr. SHUSTER was allowed to speak out of order.)

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

Mr. SHUSTER. I was unavoidably detained in the Rayburn Office Building on a matter concerning my district and arrived in the Chamber 1 minute after the vote occurred on the Udall-Anderson amendment. Had I been here, I would have voted "nay."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. NELSEN).

(Mr. NELSEN asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. NELSEN

Mr. NELSEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. NELSEN: Page 79, immediately after line 9, insert the following new section:

"POLITICAL ACTIVITIES BY CERTAIN OFFICERS AND EMPLOYEES

"SEC. 410. Notwithstanding any other provision of law, any State or local officer or employee employed by a State or local agency whose principal employment is in connection with an activity which is financed in whole or in part by loans or grants made by the United States or a Federal agency, other than any activity which is financed in whole or in part through Federal revenue-sharing programs, shall be subject to the provisions of chapter 15 of title 5, United States Code, as such provisions existed on the day before the effective date of this Act."

And redesignate the following section accordingly.

Mr. BRADEMAS. Mr. Chairman, I reserve all points of order on the amendment.

Mr. NELSEN. Mr. Chairman, under the terms of this bill, and it has already been called to my attention this afternoon, the Hatch Act is amended in this bill, and the explanation that was given to me is that the terms under the Hatch Act, where Federal revenue-sharing funds were distributed to the States, automatically then the feeling was that the State employees who had anything to do with funds that came from the Federal Government would automatically be under the Hatch Act and restricted at State level. But under the terms of the bill, this goes beyond that. For OEO and every other Federal program that is out there, we open the door where one can get his feet in the trough and dip in.

In the District of Columbia we have 53 employees in the Executive Office, 423 in Manpower, 700 in the Mayor's Office, 1,200 in the Apprenticeship Council, 1,652 in the Department of Human Resources, for a total of 17,535 employees. These employees would be partially "unhatched" under this bill.

And again we get the spoils system on the way back.

This amendment of mine would not interfere with any State dealing with revenue-sharing funds at all. Everything would remain as it is, but in these other basically federally funded programs administered by State employees it would bar them from getting into the activity of partisan politics as would certainly happen if the restriction is lifted where the Hatch Act now applies.

I served on the Hatch Act Commission and we carefully went into this and my feeling is it would be a mistake to go that far.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to amend this bill so that the provisions of section 401, which I am not amending, but merely clarifying, so as to insure that their applicability extend only to those State and local employees financed with Federal revenue-sharing funds. The Hatch Act presently prohibits activities of State and local employees where their "principal employment is in connection with an activity that is financed in whole or in part by loans or grants made by the United States or a Federal agency."

I wish to state that I served on the Commission on Political Activity on Government Personnel, which published its report in 1967. That Commission was chaired by Arthur S. Fleming, former Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare under President Eisenhower, and the Vice Chairman was former Senator Daniel B. Brewster, from the State of Maryland. One of the principal studies of that Commission had to do with the application of the Hatch Act on Federal, State and local employees. I took the position on that Commission that the Hatch Act should not be tampered with in any way, lest we revert to the spoils system, which certainly applied to Federal employees at an early date, and which I found to be true in the Executive Department of the State of Minnesota when I first entered politics and served in the Minnesota State Senate in the mid 1930's.

There have been persistent attempts to amend the Hatch Act in one way or another. The most recent attempt was one which was made in "home rule" legislation considered by the House District Committee, and which was passed by the House and Senate in 1973. There was also language proposed in a conference on a relatively minor piece of legislation—an insurance bill—earlier this year that would have amended the Home Rule Act which would have provided the very same kind of exemption provided for in this bill. I strongly opposed the attempt in conference to grant an exemption to District employees who were in an equivalent status of State and local employees, as provided in section 401 of this bill.

I want to point out several things to the Members of the House as it relates to Hatch Act exemptions for State and local employees employed with Federal grants and funds:

First. There were no public hearings on these Hatch Act provisions that I know of.

Second. Hatch Act exemptions are totally inappropriate in a bill of this type. The fact that it is in here can only lead one to the conclusion that we are going back to the spoils system. This is a campaign finance bill, and the only conclusion I can draw is that those who favor this provision want to reach into the pockets of the State and local employees and get their contributions of money. They want to obtain the contribution of time and energy and their total commitments in the way of political activity from these State and local employees. That to me is a return to the spoils system.

Third. The Civil Service Commission, which is most knowledgeable about this matter, was never asked to give their views to the committee on this measure. Yet based on their prior statements and positions taken by the Commissioners, the following statement would apply as to the position of the Civil Service Commission.

The U.S. Civil Service Commission expresses its very strong objection to the inclusion of Section 401 in HR 16090. This provision, which has just come to their attention, would amend the Hatch Act by exempting state and local employees who work in connection with Federally funded programs from the prohibitions against partisan political management and campaigning. While such employees would still be unable to seek partisan office themselves, they would be free actively to participate in partisan politics on behalf of others.

In 1940 Congress amended the Hatch Act, which had been enacted the year before, principally in order to bring such employees within the partisan political activity ban. It was recognized then, and is now recognized as well, that the prohibition against political activity serves as a substantial employee safeguard since, among other things, it immunizes covered employees from pressures, overt or otherwise, to engage in politics against their will, and it prevents the diversion of Federal funds for political purposes at the state and local level.

At all events, what is being proposed in Section 401 is a drastic change in our laws in this area.

Plainly, a measure having such drastic consequences should not be acted upon without the same kind of extended and thoughtful deliberation that Congress brought to bear upon the matter when it first dealt with the subject in 1940. And, after more than 30 years of enforcing the Hatch Act as it applies to state and local employees who work in connection with Federally funded programs, the Civil Service Commission would certainly hope and expect that Congress would call upon them for an orderly presentation of their views before undertaking such a significant revision of the law. Finally, it is worth noting that Congress in its deliberations surrounding the recently enacted D.C. Home Rule bill, expressly declined to allow Federal and D.C. employees to participate in campaigns on behalf of partisan candidates for local office.

Fourth. There is no reason why we should treat local employees, whose employment is funded basically with Federal funds, any differently than we treat our regular Federal employees. Otherwise, in our States we will have State and local employees performing virtually the same functions and activities and perhaps working at the desk next to a Federal employee. One will be Hatched and the other will not be Hatched; and, of course, my view is that both should be Hatched. The extent of Federal grant funding in the States covering Federal and local employees is perhaps best illustrated by the number of Federal grant employees that we have here in the District of Columbia. The number of Federal grant positions as carried in the 1975 budget of Mayor Washington was 17,535.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, if we want to go back to the "spoils system," then let us do so in an enlightened manner. Let us have open hearings; let us have testimony from those in the Civil Service Commission who are most familiar with the problem; let the municipal employee unions, who are probably behind this move, come forward and identify themselves and state their case in open hearings. I am confident that if we take this route, the Hatch Act will remain intact. Meanwhile, I strongly urge each and everyone of you to support this amendment.

POINT OF ORDER

Mr. BRADEMAS. Mr. Chairman, I made the point of order on the gentleman's amendment on the ground that it was not made in order by the rule nor was it printed in the RECORD.

Mr. NELSEN. Mr. Chairman, speaking to the point of order, it is my understanding the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. HAYS) indicated he would not personally make a point of order against amendments if they were not in the RECORD if anybody could stand up and say he was aware that was one of the provisions, and that is true in this case.

The Civil Service Commission was not consulted and there were no hearings. The Civil Service came down and asked me to oppose this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. BOLLING). The Chair will hear the gentleman on the point of order only.

The Chair must sustain the point of order on the ground that it was not printed in the RECORD. The point of order is therefore sustained.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. BROWN).

(Mr. BROWN of Ohio asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I rise at this time to advise the Members that the motion to recommit the Federal Election Campaign Act Amendments of 1974 will be offered with instructions to recommit the bill to the Committee on House Administration with instructions to amend article 101(a) after line 8 on page 4 to insert the contributors' right amendments I introduced which were printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on August 5, 1974, on page E5290.

The motion to recommit will be introduced by the gentleman from Alabama (Mr. DICKINSON), the ranking minority member of the committee. A copy of the amendment was sent to all Members this morning for their information.

The amendment is aimed at making all political action committees responsible to their contributors by requiring that no candidates can knowingly accept funds from such committee unless the committee: First, is acting as an agent of the individual contributor and second, the individual contributor designates the candidate's committee which is to receive the donor's contribution and third, the identity of each individual contributor is furnished by the political action committee to the candidate or his committee. These provisions will assure that contributors will have the right to indicate who will be spending their contributions.

I can see nothing arguable about that objective.

PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRY

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of parliamentary inquiry.

This amendment if offered on the floor would have been subject to a point of order under the rule. Does that stand?

The CHAIRMAN. No amendment has been offered.

Mr. HAYS. But the gentleman says he is going to offer a motion to recommit containing an amendment printed in the RECORD which would have been subject to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not a matter for the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole to decide. It is a matter for the Speaker in the House.

Mr. HAYS. I thank the Chairman.

PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRY

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

Is the motion to recommit required to fall within the rule on this legislation?

Mr. FRENZEL. Not unless the rule so says.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chairman of the Committee of the Whole cannot interpret a motion to recommit. It is not within his jurisdiction.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I thank the Chairman. I will certainly rely on the fairness of the Speaker to properly interpret the method by which a motion to recommit can be made.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. MATHIS).

(Mr. MATHIS of Georgia asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MATHIS of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, in the brief time remaining I would like again to commend the chairman of the Committee on House Administration as well as all the Members on both sides of the aisle for the work they have done in bringing this bill to the floor.

I would like to point out for the benefit of all the Members that there was not ever at any point in our committee deliberations the kind of partisan bickering we have seen on the floor this afternoon.

There are certain things in this bill I would not agree with obviously. I think we are making a horrible mistake in adopting this so-called Independent Election Commission.

I said earlier in the debate on the amendment that we would rue the day. I rise reluctantly in support of the bill. I say there is too much common cause in it and not enough commonsense.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. BRADEMAS yielded his time to Mr. HAYS.)

(By unanimous consent, Mr. MICHEL yielded his time to Mr. FRENZEL.)

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. FRENZEL).

(Mr. FRENZEL asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, there has been plenty of talk in the last 2 days about in-kind contributions. I want this record to show that that section 205 of the 1972 act, amending chapter 610 of title 18, clearly provides in its definition of contribution that "any services, or anything of value" is a contribution and must be reported as such.

Obviously, such contributions are subject to all the requirements that any contribution is subject to.

The problem with in-kind contributions is that they have not been properly reported by either donor or recipient. With the creation of the new Board of Supervisory Officers, I believe that supervision adequate to cause reporting, disclosure, and limitations of in-kind contributions.

Mr. Chairman, the rule prevented me from making an amendment which would make dirty tricks and political espionage criminal offenses under this law. I moved the amendment in committee and it failed.

The idea for this amendment was given to me by the gentleman from California (Mr. DON H. CLAUSEN) whose work on this matter was diligent and effective.

He, in turn, was inspired by the careful and dedicated work of his administrative assistant, Mr. Bill Stodart. Mr. Stodart, recently deceased, labored long and hard for this concept, and I wish we could have done a better job of progressing the amendment for him.

Even though we could not bring this up today, Congressman CLAUSEN and I expect to continue the work of Bill Stodart, and to press for adoption of this worthwhile and needed legislation in whatever way we can.

Mr. Chairman, section 315 of H.R. 16090 authorizes the Board of Supervisory Officers to institute actions for declaratory or injunctive relief to implement or construe the campaign finance laws.

In past years the lack of enforcement of campaign finance laws has been a major problem.

As the author of this section of the bill, I want to make clear that this language grants to the Board of Supervisory Officers the power to institute civil actions in their own name against violators to enforce the campaign finance laws without having to go through the Department of Justice.

This power of civil enforcement is in addition to the Board's other powers set forth in other sections.

Mr. Chairman, we are getting down to the end of 2 long days. We have had a good deal of spirited debate in which we have all engaged with enthusiasm and some good luck, I think.

I would like to direct my remarks mainly to the Republican side of the aisle, because I think there may be many Members on that side who are tempted to vote against the bill. I will admit that there is far too much public financing in the bill to suit my taste. Nevertheless, it seems to me there are a number of very strong and positive features in this bill that will warrant close consideration and, I hope, an affirmation vote.

We do get an independent administration and enforcement mechanism, limitation on contributions, $100 limitation on cash contributions, limitation on honorariums, prohibition on laundering and secretive earmarking, limitation on expenditures, prohibition on contributions by foreign nationals, increase in the penalty features, which have not been discussed; prohibition on contributions in the name of another, the single campaign committee, the reporting requirements, the publishing of a list of those who do not file, repeal of the media limitations, the opening up of the Hatch Act, the preemption of State laws and other desirable features.

I submit that these do overcome the problems that we face in terms of our party discrimination in this bill. To be sure, there is too much public financing. There is no prohibition of dirty tricks. There is an unconstitutional disqualification of people who do not file and wish to run for office.

Our parties are discriminated against in being made the equal of special interest groups; but on balance, it is not a bad bill, and the committee does deserve praise for its diligent work, not only the standing committee, but the Committee of the Whole, which worked to improve the bill.

It is time for us to vote for the bill. It is a useful bill, despite its deficiencies. I hope it will be even more improved in conference. I hope there will be a significant number of votes for the bill on our side of the aisle.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. HAYS) to close the debate.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, as I said earlier, this is not a perfect bill. I do not think anybody will claim it is.

I want to spend a little time discussing the motion to recommit which the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. BROWN) is going to make. What Mr. BROWN wants to do, and there is no secret about it, he wants to prohibit any laboring man from making any contribution to any candidate and let the fat cats——

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYS. I am not going to yield—who contributes to his campaign to do it without very much trouble.

The amendment was out of order under the rule and the gentleman from Ohio knows it. I know exactly how his campaign has been financed in the past. I want to say—you can boo-hoo all you like—he comes from my State. His father was a friend of mine, a great friend of mine.

I want to say that what he proposes to do is to see that if any labor organization through voluntary contributions collects a half million dollars in $1 contributions, that in order for it to make a contribution, it has to have half a million pieces of paper saying that they want the dollar to go to a specific candidate.

Mr. BROWN'S $60,000 he would be allowed to spend, if this limit stands, could come from 60 wealthy contributors, so he only has to have 60 pieces of paper.

It is just that simple; that is all there is to it, and I think every Member of the House who gets his money from small contributors or from voluntary associations, whether it be Ampac, Compac, or whatever it is, that is the effect of his amendment. The more small contributions they have, the sooner they are put out of business. The more big contributions they have, the more they are in the business.

Mr. STOKES. Mr. Chairman, H.R. 16090, the Federal Election Act Amendments of 1974, is a measure whose time has truly come. Almost 2 years after the most corrupt national political campaign in our history, we are provided the opportunity of making substantial repairs on our battered and abused electoral process. The hour is late—but we must act now to restore a measure of integrity to American politics.

A scant 3 years following the enactment of the Federal Elections Campaign Act of 1971, which provided the first reform of election law since 1925, we in this country have witnessed a debacle in election funding and misuse of campaign funds that has revealed to us all too clearly the pressing need for a far more thorough overhaul of our election laws.

I do not think it is necessary for me to elaborate more on the provisions of this bill, or to explain my reasons for supporting particular provisions, except in a general sense. Others have done an excellent job of explaining the reasons for and the meaning of these proposals. The committee bill reforms present campaign law by limiting contributions that an individual or a group may make to a candidate for Federal office. It also limits the amount of money that may be spent by congressional or Presidential candidates. And, it places limits on the amount that a candidate may spend from his own pocket. The bill provides public financing from the dollar checkoff fund for Presidential general elections and primaries and for national party conventions. There are also provisions for improving reporting requirements.

I am in substantial agreement with provisions of this bill. However, I feel that in certain instances it does not go far enough in reforming campaign procedures: There are several amendments before us which will correct inadequacies in the bill and strengthen it. And, I urge my colleagues to consider these amendments and this bill with great care. The basic confidence of our citizens in our system of Government is at stake and we must not fail in this effort to restore greater integrity to our elections and our Government.

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Chairman, I shall reluctantly cast my vote in favor of the campaign finance reform bill. Although several good features of this bill persuaded me that it should be supported, I have serious reservations about the spending limitations established in the bill for candidates to the House of Representatives.

Notable among the strong features of the bill are provisions establishing stronger enforcement mechanisms than provided in current law, and the creation of a system of partial public financing of Presidential campaigns. While some may object to public financing of political campaigns, I support this move since it seems to me that it is time to try financing such campaigns through something other than special interest money.

However, the spending limit for House races of $150,000, including the costs of fund-raising—$75,000 in the primary and $75,000 in the general election—is in my view exorbitant. Such an excessive ceiling defeats one of the primary purposes of this bill which is to limit the ability of any candidate to liiterally buy an election. I would have much preferred the application of the Wisconsin campaign finance law to House races which limits spending to $35,000 for primary and $50,000 for general elections, and greatly regret that the amendment which would have permitted such stronger State laws to prevail over these Federal limitations was defeated. The limitation of $150,000 represents only a minor improvement over the $187,500 proposed in the original committee bill and still invites large contributions and the type of corrupting influences which have become so familiar in this day of Watergate.

The possibility of such influences might have been lessened had tighter restrictions been placed on contributions in this bill. But, here too, by permitting up to $10,000 in contributions to each Federal candidate by political committees and separate corporate and union committees established for political purposes, the bill fell short of the type of limitation I would have preferred.

I announced earlier this year that I would accept no contributions in excess of $500 from an organization and $250 from an individual. I believe that this limitation is more in keeping with the intent of campaign finance reform. There is no need for any candidate for the House in the State of Wisconsin to spend anything approaching $150,000. I would further argue that there is no need for any candidate from any State to spend such an exorbitant amount of money in his or her attempt to gain election to the House or Senate. This bill, unfortunately, not only permits such excessive spending, it effectively invites such spending.

Despite these reservations, I feel that, on balance, the bill is a very limited move in the right direction. A halt must be placed on the concept of "the sky's the limit" when it comes to campaign spending and contributions and this bill represents only a beginning.

Mrs. MINK. Mr. Chairman, election reform has been a major concern of the Congress long before Watergate.

Congress enacted the Federal Election Campaign Act in 1971, imposing limits on campaign communications spending and requiring disclosure of campaign receipts and expenditures in excess of $100. Prior to that, we enacted the "tax checkoff" law to enable Federal funding of Presidential election campaigns.

Not all of the crimes and misconduct captioned under the phrase "Watergate" are connected with political campaigning, but those that were, were mostly committed before the Election Reform Act took effect or were in violation of it. I believe it is important to keep this fact in mind.

I feel we should guard against undue reaction to what is called Watergate. In large measure, that disaster is due not to a failure of laws but the fallibility of humans. It is because the intent if not the letter of campaign finance laws was violated that the transgressions took place. For the most part, changes in the law cannot absolutely guard against a repeat of these kinds of violations.

Having said this, I do not mean to imply that campaign laws cannot be an effective stimulus to clean and honest politics. We need stern and effective statutes against unfair and corrupt practices.

Many of the misdeeds of "Watergate" were not connected with campaigning at all.

It is only because CREEP-hired burglars were arrested breaking into the Democratic headquarters, a dramatic act which galvanized the Nation, that there is any connection between the abuses of power and corruption in the administration and political campaigning. In truth, the fact that an elite band seized the instruments of power and perverted governmental agencies into abusers of that power, raises far larger implications for the future good of our country. To the extent we are diverted into thinking that campaign reform is the only needed response to "Watergate," we continue to permit ourselves to be deceived by the perpetrators of that sad historical episode.

It should be obvious that a break-in of Democratic headquarters was not needed to win the Presidential election. The polls showed President Nixon far ahead. The Watergate was raided because that was standard operating procedure, the same as applying the Internal Revenue Service against "enemies" or stealing the private files of a psychiatrist, or releasing false stories maligning the opposition candidates, or making mass illegal arrests of political demonstrators. The Democrats and all dissenters were simply thorns in the side that had to be destroyed by whatever governmental or other weapons were available. The Watergate incident, then, should be viewed not solely in campaign terms but in the context of an "above the law" mentality that had become a way of life in the administration. We should be seeking to deal with this problem instead of only applying patches to the cracks in the political process.

I am not willing to be swept up into the reform bandwagon cry without regard to the possible deleterious changes in the politicla structure that could occur just because somebody says it will "cure" Watergate. I hope we have not reached the stage where only this most radical step, the complete Treasury financing of all Federal campaigns, becomes the litmus test of sincerity in the quest for campaign reform.

Surely much more can and should be done to strengthen or expand our campaign laws. However, I feel we should move with caution and not take precipitous steps which could adversely change our two-party system. Let us bear in mind that hasty enactment of the Postal Reform Act gave us poorer mail service and far higher costs, and the revenue-sharing program has given the States less money than they had before. Legislation labeled as "reform" must be scrutinized in detail rather than enacted simply on a slogan basis.

I am particularly concerned with proposals for "public" Treasury financing of congressional campaigns. Those pressing for this "reform" are merely exploiting the overwhelming public desire for a cleanup of Watergate-type politics. They portray Treasury financing as the antidote for Watergate. Just remove the taint of money from politics by taking it from the Treasury, they say, and all will be purified.

While I have nothing but the highest respect for those who seek to cleanse our Nation's political process, I do differ on whether Treasury financing is a good approach to reform.

The first thing we need is diligent enforcement of existing statutes. It is terribly important that we prosecute all those who violated Federal laws in all elections. The specter of punishment and public humiliation should dissuade many from engaging in similar tactics in the future. This year's elections will be the first whose financing is totally subject to the disclosure requirements of the reform act.

The disclosure approach to campaign reform rests on the thesis that an informed public can act in its own self-interest. The disclosure act signed into law in early 1972 is designed to tell the identity of all contributors of over $100 to candidates for Federal offices of President, Congressman, and Senator. It presumes that once the voters know who financed a candidate, they can judge the candidate's leanings accordingly, or that public disclosure will deter large donors.

The Treasury financing approach to campaign reform on the other hand assumes that no amount of disclosure will provide sufficient protection to the public. It holds that voters are unable to evaluate a candidate even if they know where the funds came from. Thus, they argue only by removing all individual campaign contributions can the integrity of elections be guaranteed.

In choosing between the two approaches, tax dollar financing has a certain surface appeal because of the serious campaign abuses in the 1972 Presidential election. I do not feel we should throw out the existing campaign system and switch to a dependency on tax dollars without careful study of the consequences of such a change.

The difficulties encountered in 1972 might equally be attributed to: First, a failure to communicate to voters the financing disclosed by candidates, and second, a lack of public follow-through on the reports filed by candidates.

I believe the Nation's news media failed to adequately publish the facts on 1972 financing disclosed in official reports. Moreover, no citizens' organizations were sufficiently effective in compiling and publicizing the results of the campaign finance filings, including lack of compliance by the candidates.

These inadequacies were not exclusively the fault of the media and public interest groups. A new law was involved, and all concerned lacked experience in working with it. In addition, nobody seemed to believe the grave misdeeds which were being revealed in the activities of the Committee to Re-Elect the President.

This year, however, there should be greater understanding by all of the importance of working diligently to implement the disclosure act. By taking time to inspect and report on the official campaign reports filed by candidates, the press can make a major contribution to greater knowledge of candidates' financing. Public interest groups can devote the time and effort required to analyze these reports and make factual criticisms of candidates who fail to disclose the identity of contributors as required by the act. Campaign reports should be subjected to an independent audit and all deficiencies published. It is important to know how these funds are being spent as well as who gave them. CREEP's irresponsible spending led to much of the michief and political saboteur tactics.

I recognize that asking the press, public, and private groups to participate fully in our elective process through this demanding means of disclosure and follow-up, is asking quite a lot. It requires serious concentration and long effort. But I believe this is far preferable to enacting treasury financing as a quick panacea.

Complete treasury financing is wrong both on the merits and as a wasteful use of Federal tax dollars. I am inherently suspicious of severing the link between citizen and public official, just as I am in the case of revenue-sharing systems which cut the tie of responsibility between taxpayer and tax spender. Both may tend in the long run to reduce the amount of control the individual has over the actions of those who hold public office.

Our political parties do not exist in a vacuum. If no party is directly dependent for its finances on those who support its policies, then no party will have much reason to stand for any particular policy, other than the issues currently popular in any given election. In a sense there would be no real political parties at all, only two alternatives on the ballot, "A" and "B."

Under Public Treasury financing, both political parties and candidates could thumb their noses at the voter. The parties would not need active voter support for contributions, since these would be levied against the taxpayers regardless of their wishes. Despite a 25-percent current support rating, the President's party could get over 60 percent of the public funds for the current election solely because of the votes garnered in the last election. How is this more conducive to clean government? Isn't it better to link contributions to current performance?

According to press reports, Republican fund-raising efforts declined this year because of Watergate discontent in the ranks. I am not saying whether this is good or bad, but it does show that citizens can influence policy under the existing system. Under public financing, you receive the dollars to your campaign based upon your popularity 4 years ago for President, 6 years ago for U.S. Senator, or 2 years ago for Representative. No matter how bad a current service record you have, you could depend on tax money to refinance your campaign for reelection.

Surely our two major political parties stand for something. I believe the general ranks of Republicans feel they have a direct interest in the programs and goals of their party, and the Democrats do, too. The perceived policies may change according to the needs of the times, but the basic interest-identification remains. Our citizens can assure the continuation of their interest only through contributions to the party of their choice. If this connection is rendered impossible, the responsibility and the responsiveness of political parties to large groups of voters will be reduced.

The very role of the political party would decline under total Treasury financing, and the cult of personality would increase. I see a danger that our political system might disintegrate. Instead of a two-party system offering the voters a relatively simple and understandable choice, they would see a multitudinous array of candidates. The availability of free public funds would encourage the massive formation of minority parties unable to command broad support but capable of rallying a small band of supporters on narrow single issues such as school busing, abortion, prayer in schools, et cetera. The national unity which comes from a two-party system would be destroyed. Ours would become a politics of chaos, confusion, and discord. Less than majority candidates would win; or costly runoffs would become the standard routine.

There is also a structural problem inherent in public funding of campaigns. It does not provide the "feedback" a candidate obtains from soliciting and receiving numerous small private contributions. Over a campaign of several months, the inflow of contributions timed to the development of issues and various events can show a candidate how the public is responding to the campaign. It helps to shape the candidate's stand on new issues and improves responsiveness to the electorate. All this would be lacking under Treasury financing. There would be a void of interplay between voter and candidate until after the election when the ballots are counted. Only then would the candidate discover how the public reacted to campaign pledges. To counteract this loss of interplay, more reliance would have to be placed on public opinion polls. Treasury funds allotted to candidates would have to be spent on costly polling.

The public funding provision for congressional campaigns supported by one major public interest group—Common Cause—called for handing out $90,000 in tax funds for each House candidate in the general election. I have never spent even half that much in any of my five general elections. I am sure that this is true for others like me. With tax funds of $90,000 available, the more personal type of campaigning now used in many congressional districts will be replaced by advertising agency productions. The ready pool of tax dollars will be easy picking for these agencies to conduct "slick" advertising campaigns for a high fee. They would get most of the money with mass mailing making up the rest.

Candidates would be "sold" like soap "squeezable Charmin", or all day deodorant. Voters would be subjected to unrelenting assaults of 30-second radio and TV commercials urging them to vote on the basis of slogans and jingles. Is this the way to better inform the public? Congressional candidates ought to spend only what they can receive from small contributors, not what they can appropriate for themselves from the Treasury. I have financed my past campaigns with 3,000 supporters giving an average of $25 each. Many contribute $5 or less. Contacting this many contributors and asking for their support based on my voting record is part of the process of informing the voters on the issues. This is an arduous and unwelcome task, but without it there would be far less real communication. Under public financing, it would all but disappear.

If a voter is asked to voluntarily contribute his or her own money to a candidate, the voter has an inducement to examine closely the candidate's record and performance. By giving to the campaign, the voter feels involved in the political process, and is involved as a vital component. Public financing, on the other hand, would increase the feeling of alienation. The voter would feel powerless to add to or detract from the candidate's chances of winning except through the vote. I suspect the turnout at the polls would then decline drastically even from its current low state. Candidates, being on the Federal Government's payroll so to speak, would be further and further incubated in isolation to the ultimate detriment of the democratic process.

These are some of the basic reservations I have about public financing of U.S. House and Senate elections. An important but secondary consideration is the cost of such a program, which might well be a quarter of a billion dollars every election year. If we pay $90,000 for each candidate in 435 congressional districts and 33 Senate races, and there are 5 or 10 candidates in each election, the cost rapidly escalates. At a time when we are denying the use of scarce tax funds for meeting critical human needs in such areas as health, nutrition, education, and job-training, I do not believe this is a justifiable allocation of funds.

Who will monitor how public campaign funds are spent? Would we not need further new laws and new programs to check up on the activities of the monitors? Where will it all end. In the final sense, only participation by the people can assure integrity in the election process. If Watergate demonstrated anything, it should be that more rather than less citizen involvement is needed. Shelving off the responsibility on a Treasury financing scheme will hardly guarantee responsible government.

Personal campaigning is still possible and desirable in House and Senate elections, but admittedly it is impossible for a Presidential candidate to have close personal contact with any significant portion of the national electorate. In recognition of this, Congress has already provided for tax financing of Presidential campaigns. The tax checkoff law was enacted long before Watergate. Under this $1 can be voluntarily designated each year by each taxpayer to finance the Presidential campaign. Hopefully, this will become the exclusive means of financing Presidential elections in the near future.

While I oppose extending Treasury financing to congressional elections, I am not among those who wish to do nothing at all about the campaign finance abuses disclosed by Watergate. My own bill, H.R. 11931, the Comprehensive Campaign Financing Control Act, is as far as I know the most sweeping major campaign reform bill ever introduced in Congress. It applies rigid controls on contributions and spending, along with strict disclosure, in all major elections in the United States, including those in States and large cities. The limit on any person's total contributions to any one candidate would be $500, and it could not be in cash. There could be no splitting of contributions among various dummy committees or other subterfuges to evade the limitations. An overall limit of $50,000 should be placed on expenditures in a U.S. House race by any candidate. I believe reform along these lines offers a more meaningful prospect of achieving honest elections and the election of officials committed only to the public interest.

We should be striving not to concentrate campaign financing in one source, this time the Government, but to disperse it more widely so that as many citizens as possible participate in this vital aspect of our democratic process.

Under a system of full disclosure, combined with strict limits on individual contributions and accountability in candidate spending, I believe we could effectively curb excessive campaign costs, limit the influence of big money, encourage wider citizen participation, and prevent corruption. I believe, based on my experience to date of 20 years in elective politics, that my proposed reform will better protect our two-party system from proliferation and guarantee greater citizen participation in our democracy.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Chairman, I am thrilled to finally have the opportunity to join in debate on the pressing issue of election campaign financing. I am one of many Americans who have anxiously awaited, and insisted upon, speedy full House consideration of this legislation. We have before us H.R. 16090; a good core of legislation, despite various shortcomings. I am confident that we can now close the loopholes in this bill through the amending process and pass a sweeping and effective reform package.

The need to improve our system of financing election campaigns for Federal office has been repeatedly recognized by our Nation's leadership since the turn of the century, and particularly in the years since World War II. Recently, two developments have significantly changed the entire context in which elections are financed; the geometric multiplication of campaign costs and the increased number of business activities which have become vitally affected by Government decisions.

The Presidential Election Campaign Act of 1971 was an effort to halt the spiraling cost of campaigning and to restore public confidence in the election process. This act placed a media use spending limitation on candidates for Federal elective office and also required reporting and disclosure of campaign contributions and expenditures.

It is obvious from examining the abuse of campaign financing in the 1972 elections that the need for electoral reform has not been satisfied by the 1971 act. We are now faced with three major problems magnified by the 1972 elections and the Watergate affair: An unceasing rise in campaign costs, the misuse of expenditures, and the expanded role of influence money in election campaigns. Recognition of the potency of big money, along with the discovery that some political committees resorted to unusual methods to avoid compliance with the disclosure provisions of the 1971 Campaign Act, has led many to conclude that the act is unenforceable and necessitates immediate and substantial revision. The public remains suspicious about the integrity of the elective offices being sought and, consequently, the democratic process suffers because of voter cynicism.

All of the evidence adds up to a crucial need for new legislation to insure equal access to elective office, increased citizen participation, lower overall campaign costs—in general, a new relationship between money and politics. The present system of financing election campaigns too often leaves the electorate running a poor second behind big money and special interests. As we watch Watergate fuel pressures for legislation, the Senate three times approve broad measures, and many State governments created their own tough elections laws, the House cannot shy away from comprehensive and airtight electoral reform.

The Committee on House Administration should be commended for its thoughtful consideration of campaign finance reform. However, if passed as introduced, H.R. 16090 will not satisfy the aforementioned needs. After conducting my own extensive examination of the legislation, I have concluded that while the bill contains many sound provisions, the loopholes drastically reduce its merit. Although there are many areas which could use improvement—for example, the definition of an expenditure, the disclosure and reporting procedure, the precise placement of contributions and expenditures ceiling, the role of special interests and political parties and the problem of incumbency under our present system—two of the bill's loopholes have commanded my attention; public financing and enforcement.

Controls must be extended over the amount of money that is contributed to election campaigns. I believe that contributing to a political campaign is a means of expression, but this does not mean freedom to abuse the privilege. To protect the integrity of the elective process, it is surely justifiable to exercise reasonable control over the amount of money which is poured into an election campaign. In legislating such controls, we must make certain that competitiveness is not impeded, and equal access is insured. To combat this potential impediment, the only realistic alternative before us is public financing of election campaigns.

Support for public subsidies has been mounting steadily over the years, and was intensified by the insidious campaign practices of the past election. The impact of the private dollar on our legislative process in currently unavoidable yet, as I have implied, I believe that it is impossible to completely deny an individual the right to make a monetary political contribution. We must strike a balance between the excessive influence of "fat cats" and the need to encourage public participation.

I am, therefore, in support of the amendment offered by my distinguished colleagues, Mr. ANDERSON and Mr. UDALL, which proposes a system of matching Federal grants which would be available to all candidates, and national and congressional campaign committees, after a "threshold" amount is raised. The threshold and subsequent small contributions would be matched until a matching grant ceiling is reached. This concept has many advantages: It requires a candidate to establish a base of support before being eligible for public funds; it protects traditional political freedoms by allowing and encouraging small contributions; and it provides a means a public financing without overly strict expenditure ceilings.

The Anderson-Udall amendment provides for the extension of public financing to include campaigns for congressional offices. I believe this is essential. High campaign costs, expenditure misuse, influence money, and lack of public confidence are not problems which apply solely to Presidential campaigns; our system of financing the campaigns of House and Senate aspirants needs substantial reform as well.

The most critical fault of the committee bill is its failure to provide for the establishment of an independent, bipartisan, full-time commission which is in many ways the most important feature of any campaign reform package. Everyone must realize that any reform bill will only be as effective as the enforcement provisions it provides.

Under the 1971 act, three separate offices were responsible for receiving disclosure reports, making them available to the public, reviewing them for violations, and referring them to the Department of Justice for action. The Justice Department has rarely initiated action in this politically sensitive area for the past 50 years, and there are approximately 5,000 unenforced violations presently pending. The Committee on House Administration decided to combat this problem by recommending the institution of a board of supervisory officers, including the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House, to give advisory opinions and have civil prosecutorial powers. To keep this board in check, the committee authorized themselves and the Senate Finance Committee to review and veto or approve the regulations issued by the board.

In opening this wide loophole in the legislation, the committee has allowed for congressional domination of election supervision. How can imparitiality possibly be expected? And given the lone history of nonenforcement of election law and the impropriety of having congressional employees sit in judgment on their employers, how can we hope for a restoration of public confidence in the electoral system? Only an independent, full-time commission will provide for effective policing of reform provisions. I contend, with no hesitation, that this entire legislative package is worthless without appropriate enforcement provisions. Thus, I have enthusiastically cosponsored the fine amendment drafted by Mr. FRENZEL and Mr. FASCELL, and I urge all my colleagues to support this essential amendment.

Mr. Chairman, we cannot delay in enacting this much-needed legislation. The American political system is dependent upon active political participation and public confidence in the Government. The enactment of electoral reforms will help restore credibility in our governmental institutions and our elected officials: in these turbulent times, there can be no higher priority. We have before us a good vehicle for reform in H.R. 16090 and, with the critical changes I have already mentioned, its immediate passage will be our response to America's call for fair, open and honest campaigns for Federal office.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I rise today in strong support of the campaign reform bill, H.R. 16090, and the amendments to be offered by Congressmen ANDERSON, UDALL, FRENZEL, and FASCELL.

At a time when credibility in Government has reached a low, this measure represents a very real opportunity to control future campaign finance abuses. If we are to maintain a system of government that is representative of the people then the election process—that vital function that selects those who will represent—must be inherently credible.

For this reason, I introduced in November 1973, my own campaign reform proposal, many of the provisions of which have been included in the bill before us today.

During the past few months I have become increasingly concerned over the failure of the House to move on this bill, and particularly lamented the failure of the House Administration Committee to report a bill.

The original committee bill, I believe contained serious flaws and I am pleased that some of these have been rectified. However, it is essential that the House move to adopt the Frenzel amendment to strengthen the enforcement procedures, by establishing a truly independent Federal Elections Commission empowered to take candidates and officials suspected of wrong-doing directly to court without going through the Justice Department.

It is likewise critical that the House move to adopt the Anderson-Udall amendment to extend limitation to congressional elections and to provide matching funds for congressional races.

The unfortunate scandals surrounding Watergate was caused in some measure by our current system of campaign financing—with its heavy reliance on large contributions from powerful political interest groups. This nonsystem affects all levels, and undermines the independence of our political process. I believe the Frenzel and Anderson-Udall amendments can make the committee bill a fully effective mechanism to insure fair and honest campaigns.

Mr. BAUMAN. Mr. Chairman, the clamor for campaign reform has reached a deafening roar in recent years, and we all know that there is good reason. The misuse of campaign funds, shady methods of obtaining such funds, and downright illegal expenditure of such funds became epidemic in 1972. Naturally I am angered that these misdeeds were performed in behalf of the Presidential candidate of my party.

Today, we are considering legislation which, it is said, will solve the problem and prevent future abuses. I am afraid that in many respects this bill represents instead a "solution" which is more illusion than reality.

As my good friend, the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. CRANE) noted in his separate views in the committee report, nothing short of a congressional resolution repealing original sin will end corruption in politics. Obviously, that is not within our power. What, then, does this legislation propose to do?

First, and most significantly, the bill places severe restrictions on the amount of money which any individual or special interest committee can contribute to a candidate's campaign. This restriction may be needed but it could be faulty for two reasons: By prohibiting an individual from giving more than $1,000 to a candidate in an election campaign, it places the limit so low that it may constitute an unconstitutional restraint on his or her freedom to communicate their views or to support a candidate who represents those views. In addition, in the wild rush to limit the influence of special interest groups, this bill threatens to effect the demise of our two-party system. The limitation of $5,000 in contributions from any one committee does not exempt or make special provision for political party organizations, which often contribute substantially more money to their own candidates. This would have a disastrous effect on the role which the parties play in insuring stability and continuity in our political system, as has been stated by my distinguished colleague, the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. MICHEL).

The bill also takes yet another step in the direction of full public campaign financing. It extends the "dollar checkoff" system of financing, where a taxpayer may designate a dollar of his Federal income taxes for a public campaign fund, to Presidential primaries and party nominating conventions. Until now, this money has been reserved only for Presidential contests in the general election. By holding out the offer of lots of Federal money to primary candidates we are setting the stage for a proliferation of Presidential hopefuls which will give the entire process a circus atmosphere, and attract as many publicity seekers as serious candidates.

Financing such a wasteful exercise could quickly diminish whatever public enthusiasm now exists for earmarking that dollar on the tax form. Fortunately, the committee wisely rejected public financing of any campaigns other than presidential races. But I fear that by taking this additional step toward expanding public financing, we are merely setting the stage for an expansion of the idea, an expansion I emphatically oppose.

Finally, the most glaring weakness in this legislation involves the section regarding "in kind" contributions. We cannot ignore the fact that special interest groups, principally labor unions, contribute the equivalent of upwards of $100,000,000 a year in "inkind" gifts to candidates: mailings, get-out-the-vote drives, printing, mailing lists, equipment, transportation, storefronts, and numerous other campaign benefits which are more valuable than cash. Not only does this bill fail to deal effectively with this type of contributions, it encourage them, and fails to either limit or require disclosure of such activity. This represents a glaring loophole big enough to drive every Teamster-operated truck in the Nation through. It makes a farce of any effort to bring about campaign "reform," and instead promises to expand campaign contributions of a very substantive nature which never need be reported or kept track of. This section makes the title "campaign reform" the biggest violation of "truth in packaging" since 19th century hawkers roamed the prairie selling snake oil as a cure for cancer.

Mr. Chairman, there is unquestionably a need for further reform of laws regulating campaign activity, and in particular provisions which would require full and complete disclosure of the source of all contributions and a full accounting of all expenditures. While this measure takes a step in that direction, it is inadequate. Because it is inadequate there, and because it contains so many other features which generate the precise opposite of true, meaningful reform of the campaign laws, I must oppose it as it is written. I shall instead offer my own legislation which will constitute what I consider to be meaningful reforms.

Mr. PODELL. Mr. Chairman, Watergate and its implications have kept the country in a state of shock, outrage, and disgust for the past 2 years. We have experienced a trauma which has touched every aspect of American life. One of the most scalding aspects is the attitude of mistrust and despair of the American people toward their political institutions. Their faith in the institutions and the people who represent them has been severely curtailed. Politics, once one of man's noblest professions, is believed to be a camp of sordid details, lies, deceit, and a total lack of respect for the American people. The administration and its reluctance to be open and honest, has hurt and confused Americans from New York to Alaska.

It has become imperative that we, in the Congress, take action now to restore the confidence of the American people toward the political system.

The Federal Election Campaign Amendments of 1974 provides us an avenue to begin to free the country from the pollution that has been eroding our ability to see and breathe freely. This legislation provides means for making campaigns a place for debating the issues and nothing more. One of the highlights of this bill is the area that deals with campaign contributions and campaign spending. It enforces a limit on the amount a Federal candidate can spend on a campaign. The amount varies with the different officers, the Presidential candidates being limited to $10 million in a primary election and $20 million for a general election. This is essential, for it maintains an area that all candidates must follow, no matter what amount of money they have, and enables a campaign to direct itself to issues in comparable fashion.

Congressional campaigns have a ceiling of $75,000. It is my belief that this figure is exorbitant; there is absolutely no need for a campaign dealing with the problems and concerns of the people to spend that amount. I attempted to pass an amendment that would lower this figure, but it was the sense of the committee to maintain the $75,000 amount as a reasonable sum.

There is also one other area that I am very concerned about and that is the public financing of Federal campaigns. There is a provision for Presidential campaign financing. However, there is none for congressional races. While this condition remains, so will the evil that has been shrouding our campaigns for so long. I urge my colleagues to reconsider their position on this matter as I feel that public financing of campaigns is the essence of a corruption-free system.

There are also areas of this legislation that certainly are helpful and are directed in a useful manner. One of these is the limitations put on the amount contributors are allowed to give to a Federal campaign. This aspect of the bill is reasonable. A group is allowed $5,000 per election and an individual $1,000. This policy is excellent in that it will keep the campaign focused in the proper areas, not in the direction of special interest groups. These groups will no longer have the leverage to effectively impose their wills as they have seemingly done in the past. This puts a campaign into the perspective that is best for both the candidates and the voting public. It enables a campaign to be a forum for the candidates to exchange views on issues that concern the Nation and enables the people of this country to decide on their candidate by reviewing these issues without questioning the integrity of the political system or those who represent it. This is not and should not be a gift: It is the essence of what our country was founded upon, and a manner of behavior that the American people are entitled to expect. Any other mode of behavior by the political system or those who uphold it is unacceptable, both to the system itself and the American people.

I serve on the Committee on House Administration and support the bill that we have presented to the floor of the House. I urge my colleagues to join me in a swift passage of this legislation.

Mr. TIERNAN. Mr. Chairman, the electoral process has been suffering a most serious illness. One need not be a medical doctor to diagnose the problem. Every citizen is sadly aware of the fact that campaigns in the United States have been riddled with unethical and illegal contributions and expenditures. The treatment for this cancerlike disease is simple, yet this honorable body of Congress has done little to cure the electoral process and revitalize the voice of our democracy.

We can wait no longer. We must begin treatment immediately—not merely providing a good bedside manner with useless lip service—but a thorough and effective treatment. To insure the full recovery of our electoral process, we must enact a strong campaign reform bill.

I urge my colleagues to enact a campaign reform bill which provides for the establishment of an Independent Election Commission and a mixed public/private matching system for congressional campaign financing. We cannot substitute an aspirin for an operation. If we fail to adopt these amendments to H.R. 16090, we will be condoning the election scandals which have been strangling our Nation for the past 2 years. Moreover, we will fail to preserve the sanctity of the American Constitution, which guarantees our rights to freedom and liberty.

If we were to pass the committee bill as it now stands, not only would we fail to provide the necessary incentive to solicit small contributions from a vast base of citizen participants, but we would be boosting the power of special interest groups which now threaten to destroy the fundamental voice of the American electorate. We would also fail to establish an effective Commission to insure that the election laws were being properly enforced. We all know that without sufficient oversight, laws are useless words.

I ask the Members of Congress, can we remain idle while the future of our great Nation stands in jeopardy. To remove only a fraction of a malignant tumor is futile. We must thoroughly remove all traces of the cancer. We must stitch the loopholes in order to make campaign reform a meaningful and successful operation.

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. Chairman, Congress once again is attempting to legislate individual responsibility and ethics. This time we're looking down the barrel of a new bureaucracy charged with authority to keep political candidates clean and the voters honest. Just as gun registration failed to get at the roots of crime, campaign reform misses its point.

Mr. Chairman, Watergate did not occur solely because dishonest Government officials had dishonest friends. Failing to recognize that the problem goes much deeper than dishonesty, Congress has written legislation which applies a shiny coat of paint over a malignant illness in our political system.

Mr. Chairman, the real lesson of Watergate is that Government has become too powerful. The benefits of illegal activities have become greater than the risks. The businessman who lives day by day on the threat of Government permits, contracts and regulations is too often forced to compromise his integrity and the integrity of his friends in the bureaucracy. Excessive Government power and favor have finally authenticated that phrase, "Good guys finish last." If Government officials did not have so much to offer the private sector in the way of favorable rulings, contract awards, et cetera, then business would not have to engage in this kind of economic survival.

To ask for more laws to prevent another Watergate overlooks the fact that there were already laws prohibiting these kinds of political activities. These laws have already convicted a fistful of public officials of wrongdoing and Congress is considering impeachment of the President because of the possible violation of these laws. This is the appropriate means of handling dishonesty—not passage of more laws against dishonesty but enforcement of an already adequate criminal code and adherence to the constitutional process.

Rather than addressing the issue in its proper perspective, Congress proposed extensive campaign reform, including public financing of campaign expenditures and limitations on the rights of voters to contribute to campaign activities. Traditional concepts of political involvement and responsibilities are cast aside in this legislation. The real issues are swept under the rug. In seeking to make all candidates equal and honest, Congress is actually proposing to handicap principles of republican government established by our Constitution.

Underlying the whole issue is a burning question: "Should money play any role in politics?" If we value the freedom of expression guaranteed in the first amendment, the answer to this question has to be "yes." No one person—candidate or campaign supporter—need apologize for the role of money in the political campaign.

Mr. Chairman, all political activities make economic claims on the community. Speeches, advertisements, broadcasts, building facilities, transportation, grassroots organizations—all require money. As long as the financing of these activities is left to private contributions, the individual is free to choose his own style and his own extent of political involvement, free to defend his personal philosophy, and free to further the campaign of his preferred candidate with either his dollars or his time. In depriving the individual of his right to contribute either time or money, we impair his freedom of expression.

And so who benefits—supposedly—from public financing of campaigns?

Certainly not the candidate who seeks change. His financial needs against an incumbent, tax-supported Congressman are great.

Certainly not the citizen who holds opinions but lacks the time to work actively in a campaign. Public financing prohibits or severely limits the amount and extent of his financial support. Lacking time for various reasons and lacking the right to contribute dollars by virtue of Government decree, his political role becomes one of inaction.

Certainly the general public has little to gain through public financing. Campaign contributions are a vehicle of expression for donors who wish to persuade others on public issues. This is a vital arena of political activity often overlooked in the more obvious rhetoric of candidates. The charge that these donors represent those ominous "special interests" is exactly correct. Anyone with the slightest flicker of political interest is representing those economic and social activities which he feels to be most important. With obvious exceptions, it is a disservice to both the donor and the officeholder to impune their motives. It is not the fact, necessarily, that a Congressman receives large union contributions that leads him to support union causes. It is the reverse that is most often true—that his convictions attract large union contributions.

The taxpayer, as usual, will be footing the bill for this new legislation. His contribution checkoff takes money out of one pocket at tax time while the huge bureaucracy required to implement and sustain the program bleeds the other pocket.

Mr. Chairman, politics in general has little to gain through public financing. Campaign money is a barometer of intensity of voter feeling. It keeps issues and opponents in perspective. It weeds public support.

The winners in a publicly-financed campaign are fairly predictable. A party in control of the White House is likely to stay in control because its bureaucracy pulls the strings on candidate financing. What public financing fails to provide them can be sopped up through manipulation of Government-sponsored programs and public relations services.

By equalizing the roles of the candidates through public financing you do not really reduce the influence of the wealthy. They will always have direct access to resources easily converted to political purposes. Further, you greatly increase the influence of three distinct groups. First, the so-called pressure groups, like Common Cause and the American Medical Association which sell issues rather than candidates, second, political activities with free time, and three, the media.

There is a danger, too, that an independent candidate will be preveted from running because he fails in some way to qualify for Federal financing. It is possible that sanctions against "extremist" candidates could be incorporated into Federal financing laws. This, of course, raises the question: Who defines "extremist?" With time, these definitions and sanctions could easily be widened to prevent expression of legitimate political philosophies.

Campaign reform legislation as proposed does not bring Government closer to the people. It brings candidates closer to the Government and pushes people into the background—except at tax collecting time.

I have watched the House Administration Committee put together the jigsaw of campaign reform legislation piece by piece. They are missing the heart of the puzzle—the high sense of morality and ethics which guides most Americans in their choices of political representation.

Mr. Chairman, with the provisions of the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971 on the books, we have access to records of campaign contributions. We are able to determine to a certain extent the interests of any candidate's supporters. With vigorous enforcement of the criminal code, we are able to handle officials who betray the public trust. By reducing the power and control of the Federal Government, we would remove the temptations and rewards of influence peddling.

And that is enough. Passage of the Federal Election Campaign Act Amendments of 1974 will deny the right of expression guaranteed all Americans under the first amendment. It is in the right of free speech that the essence of Americanism is contained. Without this right to free expression, all other constitutional amendments and our basic Constitution itself falter. This is a high price to pay. To deny the right of expression to the majority because of the misdeeds of a few is a big step down the road toward totalitarian government. I urge the defeat of H.R. 16080.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, the Federal Hatch Act's extension to State and local employees contains three parts. The first prevents State and local employees from voluntarily working for candidates of their choice on their own time for any partisan public office. The second prohibits management and others from using their influence to force those who work under them to contribute to or work for a candidate out of fear for their jobs, concern for future promotions, et cetera. The third prohibits State and local public employees from using the authority of their positions to influence the outcome of an election campaign.

This section of the bill repeals only that part of the Federal Hatch Act which prohibits State and local public employees from voluntarily, on their own time, participating in partisan political activities.

It retains those parts of the Federal Hatch Act which protect State and local public employees from political coercion by their employers and those parts which prohibit State and local public employees from using their own official status to influence elections.

For too long State and local employees—just because they are State and local government employees—have been prevented from voluntarily working for candidates they may choose to support. Workers in the private sector—often with similar jobs and sometimes even supported by the Federal tax dollar—are able to participate fully as citizens in the political process. This discrimination against the voluntary political activity of millions of State and local employees is no longer justified.

When the committee unanimously adopted this section, it did so with the hope that it would encourage greater voluntary citizen participation in the political process while at the same time continuing to prevent coercion and undue influence.

However, State and local public employees would still be prevented from personally running for partisan political office unless they resign their positions.

This proposed amendment does not affect Federal employees.

Mr. ICHORD. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the Federal Election Campaign Act Amendments of 1974 and urge that this legislation be passed by the House of Representatives. It would be very misleading for me or any other Member of Congress to pretend that this bill will solve all the ills present in our election laws but it is a step in the right direction.

In the first place I am doubtful that any legislation can get rid of all loopholes in campaigns for public office. As long as human beings are sinful there will be some individuals tempted to exempt themselves from certain general standards or to find ways to circumvent election laws. The most we can do in this respect is to make every effort to remind elected officials and those aspiring to elective office that any position of public trust requires a moral commitment to their Government and their people.

In the second place I do see this bill closing certain loopholes that have been open all too long. The expenditure ceiling now $60,000 for primary elections, primary runoff elections, and general elections while still too high in my opinion is much better than no limit at all. As the Members of this body of Congress know, I supported the Mathis amendment yesterday which would have set the spending limit at $42,500 which parallels the salary paid by the job. I am sorry that this amendment failed because I do not feel that a candidate should be allowed to spend more than the salary of the office. I have personally never spent anywhere close to $42,500 for any election including my first race for Congress when I defeated an incumbent Member of the House. However, a $60,000 limitation is a great improvement over the fantastic sums of $200,000 and $300,000 spent by candidates in the past in primaries or general elections.

Over 3 years ago in testimony before the House Administration Committee I expressed my strong fear that we were rapidly reaching the point that only the very wealthy or those who sold out to special interest groups could be elected to public office if we did not take steps to control campaign spending. The American claim that only in this country could an individual rise from such humble beginnings as an Abraham Lincoln to become President of the United States has been brought into question as campaign cost for Federal office soared into six, seven, and eight figures. Therefore, I feel that the $60,000 limit is a reasonable step in the right direction.

I am also pleased that an individual limit of $1,000 or a political committee limit of $5,000 has been placed in this legislation. This will do two very constructive things: First, it will make virtually impossible attempts by individuals or groups to buy influence with public officials; and second, it will force politicians to make every effort to get more of our citizens involved in the election process through the pocketbook which is the best way to get elected officials who are responsive and responsible to the people who elected them. The individual honorarium limitation of $1,000 or a total of $10,000 in 1 year will stop Federal elected officeholders from seeking to profit financially from the job they were elected to carry out for their constituents.

Once again I would point out that this is not perfect legislation nor a definitive answer to the problems we are seeking to solve but it seriously approaches these problems and will give us a foundation on which to build for future election law reform as it is needed.

Mr. BROYHILL of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I support the committee amendment to H.R. 16090, which would revise the composition of the Board of Supervisory Officers.

I have opposed the provision in the present campaign spending law which provides for reporting to and enforcement of the act by the Clerk of the House and the Secretary of the Senate. I have felt that these officers might be less than forceful in requiring Members of Congress, to whom they owe their jobs, to abide by these reporting requirements.

I prefer, instead, a more independent body. For that reason, I cosponsored an amendment, originally intended to be offered by Congressmen FRENZEL and FASCELL, to establish an independent Federal Elections Commission to monitor the necessary campaign reporting laws.

However, I am pleased with this committee amendment, a compromise worked out by Mr. HAYS and Mr. FRENZEL. It differs from the original bill reported from the House Administration Committee, in that the Comptroller General would not be a member of the Board. The Clerk of the House and the Secretary of the Senate would be nonvoting Board members. The four public citizens, none of whom could be employed by the executive, legislative, or judicial branches of the Government, would be the only voting members. And, finally, the full Senate and the full House of Representatives would have veto power over the Board's recommendations, rather than leaving this power with the House Administration Committee and the Senate Committee on Rules and Administration.

I firmly believe that an independent commission will eliminate the possibility of conflict of interest, reverse the long history of nonenforcement, and increase coordination between the administrators and enforcers of the law. But more importantly, the creation of an independent body would help foster public confidence in the effectiveness and fairness of election laws and in public officials themselves.

Therefore, I urge my colleagues to adopt the committee amendment.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment offered by my distinguished colleagues JOHN ANDERSON and MORRIS UDALL. This amendment would encourage small contributions to congressional candidates by providing for limited Federal matching funds in the general election.

Specifically, this amendment would establish a Federal matching fund by which private contributions of $50 or less would be matched by public funds. This matching payment could not exceed one-third of the spending limit established for that office. In order to qualify for such matching payments, congressional candidates must first demonstrate their popular support by raising 10 percent of their spending limit in contributions of $50 or less.

As a cosponsor of the Anderson-Udall Clean Elections Act from which this provision is drawn, I believe that this amendment is an important step in the effort to reform the way in which we finance our elections. In my view, the way to cleanse our political process of the unhealthy influence of big money and special interests is thorough setting stringent limits on campaign contributions and through the encouragement of small contributors. This is what I have been doing in my own campaign for Governor of Connecticut and I believe that the success I have had is a telling sign that campaign reform truly works.

It is essential that we restore public confidence in our electoral system. And the way to begin is to return politics to the people. This amendment will be a major stride in encouraging the average citizen to get involved in electoral politics and in driving the corrupting influence of big money and special interests out of our campaign financing system.

I urge my colleagues to support this amendment.

Mrs. HECKLER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, today the House is about to take a major step toward restoring honesty to our electoral process. The passage of the Federal Election Campaign Act Amendments will represent our response to Watergate and the cancerous corruption of the election process which this scandal has revealed to us during the last 2 years.

By now everyone understands the harm that can arise from uncontrolled campaign fundraising. The Watergate scandals have made it clear to the American public that money has become the most important campaign resource for candidates running for Federal office and that candidates are responsive to the people who supply it.

Our current system gives special interest groups and the wealthy a disproportionate role in determining outcomes of elections and in the subsequent process of governmental policymaking.

As a member of the Republican Task Force on Election Reform and as the sponsor of campaign reform legislation, I have been an outspoken advocate of public financing of elections as the only viable way to minimize the opportunities for influence peddling and buying in politics.

The bill presently under consideration, H.R. 16090, provides for public financing of Presidential elections from tax dollars paid to a Presidential Election Campaign Fund through the voluntary dollar checkoff on all tax returns.

From this campaign fund Presidential candidates would receive up to $20 million in checkoff funds for the general election and matching payments for contributions of $250 or less for primary elections.

The maximum probable cost of public financing would amount to less than $2 per taxpayer per year. I consider this a small price to pay for the assurance of clean elections and for the revival of citizen participation and interest in congressional and Presidential elections.

Equally important for the reformation of campaign procedures are the provisions of H.R. 16090 which limit campaign contributions and candidate expenditures.

In 1972 the two major Presidential candidates spent more than $45 million in each of their campaigns. These exorbitant figures demonstrate that in the past the emphasis has been on the cost of the campaign while little attention has been given to the issues.

The Federal Election Campaign Act Amendments before us for a vote would prohibit future Presidential candidates from spending more than $20 million in the general election and $10 million in the primary. Candidates for the Senate and the House would be limited to roughly $150,000 for total expenditures in their primary and general election campaigns.

On the other side of the campaign coin, this legislation restricts contributors from investing in candidates by prohibiting individuals from giving more than $1,000 in the primary and in the general election, while a group or organization cannot give more than $5,000 in either election to any candidate for Federal office.

I urge my colleagues to support the Federal Election Campaign Act amendments, legislation which would restore integrity to all Federal elections in 1976 and rebuild the public's confidence in the elected officials of our Government. Enactment of this legislation would signify the return to the principle of "one man, one vote" in our political system.

Mr. MURPHY of New York. Mr. Chairman, as an original sponsor of the Federal Election Campign Amendments of 1974, I go on record in support of this legislation. The Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971 was a good law and a step in the right direction. Since its enactment, most campaign expenditures and contributions have been publicly disclosed. However, some large problems still exist and the purpose of these amendments is to correct these problems.

The purpose of the Federal Election Campaign Amendments of 1974 is:

First. To place limitations on campaign contributions and expenditures;

Second. To facilitate the reporting and disclosure of the sources and disposition of campaign funds by centralizing campaign committees;

Third. To establish a Board of Supervisory Officers to oversee enforcement of and compliance with Federal campaign laws; and Fourth. To strengthen the law for public financing of Presidential general elections, and to authorize the use of the dollar checkoff fund for financing Presidential nominating conventions and campaigns for nomination to the office of President.

The bill places strict limitations on contributions to candidates for Federal office. Contributions by individuals to candidates are limited in the aggregate to $1,000 per election. Further, an individual is limited to an aggregate of $25,000 in contributions within any calendar year. A major innovation of the bill will prohibit any contributions in cash in excess of $100.

In an effort to reduce the spiraling cost of campaigns, Presidential candidates will be limited to $20,000,000 for election and $10,000,000 for nomination to the office.

In the case of campaigns for nomination for election, or for election to the office of Senator, the limitation is 5 cents times the population of the State, or $75,000, whichever is greater. The expenditure limitation on campaigns for the offices of Representative, Delegate from the District of Columbia, or Resident Commissioner is $75,000. These limitations apply separately to each campaign for nomination for election, or election, to those offices.

In an effort to simplify and improve the disclosure provisions of the campaign law, this legislation would require that each candidate designate a principal campaign committee to make expenditures on behalf of the candidate and to file with the appropriate supervisory officer consolidated reports and statements which include the activities of all the committees which support the candidate.

To enforce all of the laws on elections the bill establishes a seven-member Board of Supervisory Officers composed of the Secretary of the Senate, the Clerk of the House, the Comptroller General and four public members—two appointed by the President of the Senate and two appointed by the Speaker of the House.

The bill under consideration today contains provisions for the public financing of Presidential elections. The present dollar checkoff law, now limited to the financing of Presidential general elections, would be strengthened and expanded. Dollar checkoffs would be self-appropriating. Up to $2 million of such funds could be used for nominating conventions of major parties and lesser amounts for smaller parties. All parties would be limited to $2 million from all sources for convention expenditures. Dollar checkoff funds could be used in Presidential primaries to match private contributions of $250 or less; to be eligible a Persidential primary candidate must have raised $5,000 in private contributions of $250 or less in each of 20 States; no candidate could receive more than $5 million in Federal funds and he could spend no more than $10 million from all sources; funds for Presidential primaries could become available only after obligations for Presidential general elections and nominating conventions have been met.

It is unfortunate that I will not be here to vote on this measure tonight. I have made a major political commitment to my district and it is one of long standing which cannot be broken. However, I wish to be on record in support of the strong provisions provided for in this legislation. And I wish also to state that I am on record in support of this bill as I voted for the rule and against the motion to recommit.

I have long supported congressional election reform and have testified as such in hearings. As I said before the Senate Committee on Communications:

The Federal Election Law of 1971 was designed to obviate the reprehensible act of anyone seeking to buy a federal election.

The legislation we have brought to the floor today goes a long way toward improving our Federal elections system. And I am gratified to have been a part of that movement.

The CHAIRMAN. If there are no further amendments, under the rule, the Committee rises.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BOLLING, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H.R. 16090) to impose overall limitations on campaign expenditures and political contributions; to provide that each candidate for Federal office shall designate a principal campaign committee; to provide for a single reporting responsibility with respect to receipts and expenditures by certain political committees; to change the times for the filing of reports regarding campaign expenditures and political contributions; to provide for public financing of Presidential nominating conventions and Presidential primary elections; and for other purposes, pursuant to House Resolution 1292, he reported the bill back to the House with sundry amendments adopted by the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered.

Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

Mr. BRADEMAS. Mr. Speaker, I demand a separate vote on the so-called Frenzel amendment relating to public financing of presidential nominating conventions.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any other amendment? If not, the Chair will put them en gros.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment on which a separate vote has been demanded.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment: Page 53, strike line 17, and all that follows down through page 61, line 4.

Page 61, line 6, strike out "407" and insert in lieu thereof "406".

Page 61, line 15, strike out "408" and insert in lieu thereof "407".

Page 78, line 5, strike out "409" and insert in lieu thereof "408".

Page 79, line 15, strike out "408, and 409" and insert in lieu thereof "and 408".

Mr. BRADEMAS (during the reading). Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with and that it be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is this the Frenzel amendment which deletes the use of taxpayers' money for national political Presidential nominating conventions, which the committee defeated by a substantial margin?

Mr. BRADEMAS. The gentleman's colloquy is inaccurate.

Mr. FRENZEL. If it is, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the noes appeared to have it.

RECORDED VOTE

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, I demand a recorded vote.

A recorded vote was ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—ayes 205, noes 206, not voting 24, as follows:

MOTION TO RECOMMIT OFFERED BY MR. DICKINSON

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. DICKINSON. I am, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. DICKINSON moves to recommit the bill, H.R. 16090, to the Committee on House Administration with instructions to report the same back to the House forthwith with the following amendment: Page 4, immediately after line 8, insert the following:

"(7) No candidate or any political committee acting on behalf of such candidate may knowingly accept any contribution from any political committee, other than from an individual or from a local, State, or national political party organization registered under section 303 of the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971, unless (A) such political committee making such contribution is acting as the agent of an individual contributor, (B) the individual contributor designates such candidate or any political committee acting on behalf of such candidate as the recipient of such contribution, and (C) the identity of the individual contributor is furnished by the political committee making such contribution to such candidate or the political committee acting on his behalf which receives such contribution. No undesignated contribution which a political committee receives from an individual contributor may be made by such political committee to a candidate or any political committee acting on behalf of such candidate.".

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Speaker, if I might say to my colleagues, they received through the mail a copy of the proposed amendment which was not in order, but I will explain it in layman's terms.

I offer this motion to recommit with instructions because although I believe there are a number of places I believe the bill could be improved, the most glaring of the deficiencies in the measure is the absence of sufficient restrictions on the influence of special interest groups.

I was very surprised to hear the chairman of my committee, for whom I have the highest regard, try to make this into a labor amendment or an antilabor amendment. I have here in my hand the front page of today's paper, the Washington Post. It shows a picture under the caption of "Pleads Guilty." It shows Jake Jacobsen and it says:

Jake Jacobsen, former lawyer for the largest U.S. milk cooperative, leaves court after pleading guilty to making a $10,000 payoff to former Treasury Secretary John Connally.

Then it says the further story is inside.

And I also note from the UPI News Service the following:

WASHINGTON.—Sen. Henry Jackson, D-Wash., received $225,000 in secret donations to his 1972 presidential campaign from oil millionaire Leon Hess, according to Senate Watergate Committee records.

The Washington Star-News said the records showed that Hess disguised the donations under the names of other persons. The contributions were made before the April 1972, change in the election law that required contributions be made public.

The records showed another $166,000 in secret cash contributions to Jackson, with more than half of the money coming from other oilmen, the newspaper said. The largest cash gift—$50,000—came from Walter Davis, an oil operator in Midland, Tex.

The committee's files showed that Jackson raised a total of just over $1.1 million for the 1972 race—and nearly half the money came from large donors, including Hess, who were at the same time supporting President Nixon's campaign.

Hess is Board Chairman of Amerada Hess Corp.

Mr. Speaker, if we are to have a campaign reform bill that is meaningful, if we are going to do something here today to get at the evils we are all lamenting and we are aware of, let us all get at them now.

This is not aimed at labor. This is aimed at any special interest group that goes out and skims off the top of the workingman's salary or the businessman's income and says: "We will decide for you where your money should best go and it does not have to be accounted for." They do not have to account for it. They say: "You do not have to designate where it goes. We will decide for you."

Out of all the scandals that have surfaced recently, can any Member think of anything that needs more regulation, that is more deserving of being looked at and gotten to in this legislation, in this so-called campaign reform, than this one area? I refer the Members specifically to such organizations as the AMPI, the American Milk Producers, Inc., and we can go to the labor unions too. The labor unions can take what they want through checkoff. The rank and file does not know what that money is going for, but this is not aimed just at them.

The biggest scandals have come from the areas I have described, and there it is on the front page of today's paper where big business can go in and tap this guy and this guy and this little milk producer, or whatever industry is involved, and say, "All right, you just keep the money coming in and we will sluice it where it is going to do the most good." This amendment would prohibit that. It says if one is going to contribute individually to someone acting as an agent to sluice it for one, to guide it where it is going to do the most good, you designate where it is going to do the most good because if you do not we will put it there for you. This is the evil that needs correcting. Anybody can give if he wants to.

The chairman makes a big thing that if one is going to give $1,000, is one going to have to have 1,000 pieces of paper? Well, what is wrong with that? We see 1,000 pieces of paper in our office every day. The contributor should say where the money is going to go and to whom it is going to go. What is wrong with that? Can somebody tell me what is wrong with telling where he wants his money to go? There is nothing illegal and there is nothing immoral with that. It is just commonsense in getting at the evils we are trying to get at.

This is just obfuscation and pulling the wool over the eyes in saying that this is antilabor and this is going to get at the little workingman. Little workingman, my foot. Ask about John Connally and about Jacobsen or ask about those who already have gotten the slammer closed on them. Talk about the little workingman.

So if the Members want to do something to get at the evils of directing money and collecting money and telling where it is to go, if they want to make campaigns cleaner, this is the way to do it. Vote for the motion to recommit with instructions that gets at what we are going to do when we start taking up money.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the motion.

Mr. Speaker, I have sat beside my genial friend, the gentleman from Alabama, on the House Administration Committee for a good many years. I never knew him to get so worked up about anything and I never knew before that he was such a master of obfuscation and circumlocution.

The truth of the matter is, that the piece of paper he very dramatically waved, does not have anything to do with this bill or anything in this bill. The money that Mr. Jacobsen allegedly gave to Mr. Connally was not a campaign contribution, or at least the allegation is not, because Mr. Connally was not a candidate for anything. I am not finding Mr. Connally guilty of anything, but—just sit down, Mr. BROWN. I am not going to yield to you in any way, so do not bother me anymore, just sit down. Do not be trying to disrupt my time.

Mr. Jacobsen pleaded guilty in court, as I understand it, to attempting to bribe, or bribing an official of the Government to get a favorable ruling.

Now, when the gentleman says that his amendment is not aimed at labor, he is not kidding me or anybody else. Sure, all members of a laboring union—in the first place, a labor union cannot spend checkoff funds or union dues, and if they do, they are subject to criminal penalties. The only thing they can do is collect a voluntary fund and if the workingman says, "I want to contribute $1" and there are 100,000 members and 50,000 want to contribute a dollar, they have to get 50,000 pieces of paper; but if the American Medical Association, and their average national income is around $60,000 a year these days—and they contribute $1,000 and to raise $50,000, they do not have to get 50,000 pieces of paper, just 50. That is what the amendment is all about.

I do not yield to the gentleman (Mr. BROWN). If I had a piece of tape, I would like to put it over his face. I do not see how in the world I am going to hush him up while I am talking.

Mr. Speaker, I can understand the Republican boo hoos. If I were in the situation they are and looking forward to 9 o'clock, I would be doing worse than boo hoo-hooing. I would be standing on my head.

Let us face it. This is about as partisan a motion to recommit as was ever made.

I like the gentleman from Alabama and the fact that they shifted the motion from the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. BROWN) to the gentleman from Alabama improves it only in the author of the amendment. It does not improve the amendment.

So therefore, I ask that the motion to recommit be defeated.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the previous question is ordered on the motion to recommit.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the noes appeared to have it.

RECORDED VOTE

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand a recorded vote.

A recorded vote was ordered.

"(c) No person shall be subject to civil liability to any person (other than the Commission or the United States) for disclosing information at the request of the Commission.

"(d) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the Commission shall be the primary civil and criminal enforcement agency for violations of the provisions of this Act, and of sections 602, 608, 610, 611, 612, 613, 614, 615, 616, 617, and 618 of title 18, United States Code. Each occurrence of a violation of this Act and each day of noncompliance with a disclosure requirement of this title or an order of the Commission issued under this section shall constitute a separate offense. In determining the amount of the penalty the Commission shall consider the person's history of previous violations, the appropriateness of such penalty to the financial resources of the person charged, the gravity of the violation, and the demonstrated good faith of the person charged in attempting to achieve rapid compliance after notification of a violation.

"(2) A civil penalty shall be assessed by the Commission by order only after the person charged with a violation has been given an opportunity for a hearing and the Commission has determined, by decision incorporating its findings of fact therein, that a violation did occur, and the amount of the penalty. Any hearing under this section shall be of record and shall be held in accordance with chapter 5 of title 5, United States Code.

"(3) If the person against whom a civil penalty is assessed fails to pay the penalty, the Commission shall file a petition for enforcement of its order assessing the penalty in any appropriate district court of the United States. The court shall have jurisdiction to enter a judgment enforcing, modifying, and enforcing as so modified, or setting aside in whole or in part the order and decision of the Commission or it may remand the proceedings to the Commission for such further action as it may direct. The court may determine de novo all issues of law but the Commission's findings of fact, if supported by substantial evidence, shall be conclusive.

"(f) Upon application made by any individual holding Federal office, any candidate, or any political committee, the Commission, through its General Counsel, shall provide within a reasonable period of time an advisory opinion, as to whether a specific transaction or activity may constitute a violation of any provision of this Act or of any provision of title 18, United States Code, over which the Commission has primary jurisdiction under subsection (d).

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. Mark, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House that on August 7, 1974, the President approved and signed a bill of the House of the following title:

H.R. 8217. An act to exempt from duty certain equipment and repairs for vessels operated by or for any agency of the United States where the entries were made in connection with vessels arriving before January 5, 1971, and for other purposes.

PRESS ABSENT DURING DEBATE ON ELECTION REFORM

(Mr. HAYS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Speaker, I just think it is worthy to note in the RECORD that when this bill was passed, there were more than 400 Members on the floor of the House and nobody was in the press gallery, after all the nasty things that the press has been saying about me in particular, the committee in general, and the Members of the House for not having passed campaign reform before this.

APPOINTMENT OF CONFEREES ON S. 3698, TO AMEND THE ATOMIC ENERGY ACT OF 1954

Mr. PRICE of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 3698) to enable Congress to concur in or disapprove certain international agreements for peaceful cooperation, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois? The Chair hears none and appoints the following conferees: Messrs. PRICE of Illinois, HOLIFIELD, MCCORMACK, HOSMER, and HANSEN of Idaho.

ADJOURNMENT TO 11 A.M. FRIDAY, AUGUST 9, 1974

Mr. O'NEILL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet at 11 a.m., on tomorrow.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE, ENVIRONMENTAL PROTECTION AGENCY AND CERTAIN RELATED AGENCIES APPROPRIATIONS, 1975—VETO MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES (H. DOC. NO. 93-331)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following veto message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

The pressing need to control inflation compels me today to return to the Congress without my approval H.R. 15472, an appropriations bill for the Department of Agriculture, the Environmental Protection Agency and certain related agencies and programs.

Two weeks ago, I vowed to the American people that any appropriations bill substantially above my budget for fiscal year 1975 would be vetoed because it would otherwise contribute to inflationary forces in the economy. This legislation exceeds my budgetary recommendations by such a large amount—some $540 million—that it presents a clear and distinct threat to our fight against inflation and cannot be accepted.

Under this legislation, outlays for fiscal year 1975 would exceed our recommendations by $150 million in fiscal year 1975, $300 million in fiscal year 1976, and by additional amounts in fiscal year 1977. Water and sewer grants for the Department of Agriculture would be authorized at a level of about $345 million, a level more than eight times higher than any level in the past. Funding for agricultural conservation programs would be more than doubled, completely reversing recent efforts of this Administration to reform these programs. Furthermore, this bill would increase certain loan programs operated by the Department of Agriculture by $400 million more than we recommended, an increase which would further strain already over-stressed credit markets and would add to inflationary pressures.

I also oppose a provision in this bill transferring from the Department of Housing and Urban Development to EPA a $175 million program to clean up the Great Lakes. The feasibility of this cleanup program has not yet been proven. Further study is essential if we are to avoid ineffective Federal spending for these purposes.

My original budget recommendations to the Congress laid out program priorities as we see them in the executive branch. While differences have frequently existed between the Congress and the executive branch on priorities for particular programs, I firmly believe that our current fiscal situation demands national unanimity on the issues of a larger concern: namely, that we agree to enact appropriation bills which do not fuel the fires of inflation through excessive spending.

I would welcome Congressional reconsideration of this bill and the program priorities contained therein so that a more acceptable bill can be enacted. In keeping Federal spending under control, we do not intend, of course, to single out only farm or environmental programs. Indeed, I would hope that in considering all future appropriation measures, the Congress will assiduously avoid enacting measures which pose inflationary problems similar to the bill I am returning today.

RICHARD NIXON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, August 8, 1974.

The SPEAKER. The objections of the President will be spread at large upon the Journal and the message and bill will be printed as a House document.

POSTPONING CONSIDERATION OF VETO MESSAGE UNTIL THURSDAY, AUGUST 22, 1974

Mr. O'NEILL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that further proceedings on the President's message be put over until Thursday, August 22, 1974.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. McFALL). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object—and I shall not object—did the gentleman say that there were two bills tomorrow, or are there three bills?

Mr. O'NEILL. No, there will be two bills tomorrow.

Mr. GROSS. There will be only two bills tomorrow?

Mr. O'NEILL. Only two bills on the program, yes. They are the two bills I mentioned. The third bill that would have been on the calendar is put over until next Wednesday.

Mr. GROSS. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. O'NEILL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GROSS. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. O'NEILL. Mr. Speaker, with regard to the request I have made, may I say that I am making this unanimous-consent request at the request of the chairman of the Subcommittee on Appropriations for Agriculture. This has been agreed to by his counterpart on the committee, the minority leadership on the other side of the aisle.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman have any idea when this veto message will come up?

Mr. O'NEILL. They have asked, and I am doing this, as I say, at the request of the leadership on the gentleman's side of the aisle. The chairman of the Subcommittee on Appropriations on Agriculture and his counterpart want to have an opportunity to study the whole matter. They asked for the date of Thursday, August 22. Whether it will come up at that time, or be further postponed, or whether it will be recommitted to the committee I have no knowledge at this time.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

TITLE I—CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENTS

LIMITATIONS ON CONTRIBUTIONS AND EXPENDITURES

SEC. 101. (a) Section 608 of title 18, United States Code, relating to limitations on contributions and expenditures, is amended by striking out subsections (b) and (c) and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"(b) (1) Except as otherwise provided by paragraphs (2) and (3), no person shall make contributions to any candidate with respect to any election for Federal office which, in the aggregate, exceed $1,000.

"(2) No political committee (other than a principal campaign committee) shall make contributions to any candidate with respect to any election for Federal office which, in the aggregate, exceed $5,000.

38-006 O

Contributions by the national committee of a political party serving as the principal campaign committee of a candidate for the office of President of the United States shall not exceed the limitation imposed by the preceding sentence with respect to any other candidate for Federal office. For purposes of this paragraph, the term 'political committee' means an organization registered as a political committee under section 303 of the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971 for a period of not less than 6 months which has received contributions from more than 50 persons and, except for any State political party organization, has made contributions to 5 or more candidates for Federal office.

"(3) No individual shall make contributions aggregating more than $25,000 in any calendar year. For purposes of this paragraph, any contribution made in a year other than the calendar year in which the election is held with respect to which such contribution was made, is considered to be made during the calendar year in which such election is held.

"(4) For purposes of this subsection—

"(A) contributions to a named candidate made to any political committee authorized by such candidate, in writing, to accept contributions on his behalf shall be considered to be contributions made to such candidate; and

"(B) contributions made to or for the benefit of any candidate nominated by a political party for election to the office of Vice President of the United States shall be considered to be contributions made to or for the benefit of the candidate of such party for election to the office of President of the United States.

"(5) The limitations imposed by paragraphs (1) and (2) of this subsection shall apply separately with respect to each election, except that all elections held in any calendar year for the office of President of the United States (except a general election for such office) shall be considered to be one election.

"(6) For purposes of the limitations imposed by this section all contributions made by a person, either directly or indirectly, on behalf of a particular candidate, including contributions which are in any way earmarked or otherwise directed through an intermediary or conduit to such candidate, shall be treated as contributions from such person to such candidate. The intermediary or conduit shall report the original source and the intended recipient of such contribution to the Commission and to the intended recipient.

"(c) (1) No candidate shall make expenditures in excess of—

"(A) $10,000,000, in the case of a candidate for nomination for election to the office of President of the United States, except that the aggregate of expenditures under this subparagraph in any one State shall not exceed twice the expenditure limitation applicable in such State to a candidate for nomination for election to the office of Senator, Delegate, or Resident Commissioner, as the case may be;

"(B) $20,000,000, in the case of a candidate for election to the office of President of the United States;

"(C) in the case of any campaign for nomination for election by a candidate for the office of Senator or by a candidate for the office of Representative from a State which is entitled to only one Representative, the greater of—

"(i) 8 cents multiplied by the voting age population of the State (as certified under subsection (g)); or

"(ii) $100,000;

"(D) in the case of any campaign for election by a candidate for the office of Senator or by a candidate for the office of Representative from a State which is entitled to only one Representative, the greater of—

"(i) 12 cents multiplied by the voting age population of the State (as certified under subsection (g)); or

"(ii) $150,000;

"(E) $70,000, in the case of any campaign for nomination for election, or for election, by a candidate for the office of Representative in any other State, Delegate from the District of Columbia, or Resident Commissioner; or

"(F) $15,000, in the case of any campaign for nomination for election, or for election, by a candidate for the office of Delegate from Guam or the Virgin Islands.

"(2) For purposes of this subsection—

"(A) expenditures made by or on behalf of any candidate nominated by a political party for election to the office of Vice President of the United States shall be considered to be expenditures made by or on behalf of the candidate of such party for election to the office of President of the United States; and

"(B) an expenditure is made on behalf of a candidate, including a Vice Presidential candidate, if it is made by—

"(i) an authorized committee or any other agent of the candidate for the purposes of making any expenditure; or

"(ii) any person authorized or requested by the candidate, an authorized committee of the candidate, or an agent of the candidate, to make the expenditure.

"(3) The limitations imposed by subparagraphs (C), (D), (E), and (F) of paragraph (1) of this subsection shall apply separately with respect to each election.

"(4) The Commission shall prescribe rules under which any expenditure by a candidate for Presidential nomination for use in 2 or more States shall be attributed to such candidate's expenditure limitation in each such State, based on the voting age population in such State which can reasonably be expected to be influenced by such expenditure.

"(d)(1) At the beginning of each calendar year (commencing in 1976), as there become available necessary data from the Bureau of Labor Statistics of the Department of Labor, the Secretary of Labor shall certify to the Commission and publish in the Federal Register the per centum difference between the price index for the 12 months preceding the beginning of such calendar year and the price index for the base period. "(A) 'clearly identified' means—

"(i) the candidate's name appears;

"(ii) a photograph or drawing of the candidate appears; or

"(iii) the identity of the candidate is apparent by unambiguous reference; and

"(B) 'expenditure' does not include any payment made or incurred by a corporation or a labor organization which, under the provisions of the last paragraph of section 610, would not constitute an expenditure by such corporation or labor organization.

"(f)(1) Notwithstanding any other provision of law with respect to limitations on expenditures or limitations on contributions, the national committee of a political party and a State committee of a political party, including any subordinate committee of a State committee, may make expenditures in connection with the general election campaign of candidates for Federal office, subject to the limitations contained in paragraphs (2) and (3) of this subsection.

"(2) The national committee of a political party may not make any expenditure in connection with the general election campaign of any candidate for President of the United States who is affiliated with such party which exceeds an amount equal to 2 cents multiplied by the voting age population of the United States (as certified under subsection (g)). Any expenditure under this paragraph shall be in addition to any expenditure by a national committee of a political party serving as the principal campaign committee of a candidate for the office of President of the United States.

"(3) The national committee of a political party, or a State committee of a political party, including any subordinate committee of a State committee, may not make any expenditure in connection with the general election campaign of a candidate for Federal office in a State who is affiliated with such party which exceeds—

"(A) in the case of a candidate for election to the office of Senator, or of Representative from a State which is entitled to only one Representative, the greater of—

The term 'voting age population' means resident population, 18 years of age or older.

"(h) No candidate or political committee shall knowingly accept any contribution or make any expenditure in violation of the provisions of this section. No officer or employee of a political committee shall knowingly accept a contribution made for the benefit or use of a candidate, or knowingly make any expenditure on behalf of a candidate, in violation of any limitation imposed on contributions and expenditures under this section.

"(i) Any person who violates any provision of this section shall be fined not more than $25,000 or imprisoned not more than one year, or both.".

JOINT EXPLANATORY STATEMENT OF THE COMMITTEE OF CONFERENCE

The managers on the part of the House and the Senate at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 3044) to amend the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971 to provide for public financing of primary and general election campaigns for Federal elective office, and to amend certain other provisions of law relating to the financing and conduct of such campaigns, submit the following joint statement to the House and the Senate in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the managers and recommended in the accompanying conference report:

The House amendments struck out all of the Senate bill after the enacting clause and inserted a substitute text and provided a new title for the Senate bill, and the Senate disagreed to the House amendments.

The committee of conference recommends that the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House to the text of the bill, with an amendment which is a substitute for both the text of the Senate bill and the House amendment to the text of the Senate bill, and also recede from its disagreement to the House amendment to the title of the Senate bill.

The differences between the text of the Senate bill, the House amendment thereto, and the substitute agreed to in conference are noted below, except for clerical corrections, conforming changes made necessary by reason of agreements reached by the conferees, and minor drafting and clarifying changes.

SHORT TITLE

The Senate bill, the House amendment, and the conference substitute provide that this legislation may be cited as the "Federal Election Campaign Act Amendments of 1974".

Section 101(a) of the House amendment amended section 608 of title 18, United States Code, by inserting a new subsection (b).

Subsection (b)(1) provided that, except as otherwise provided by the new subsection (b), no person may make contributions exceeding $1,000 to any candidate for Federal office in any election.

Subsection (b)(2) provided that no political committee (other than the principal campaign committee of a candidate) may make contributions exceeding $5,000 to any candidate for Federal office in any election.

Subsection (b)(2) also defined the term "political committee" to mean, for purposes of subsection (b)(2), an organization registered as a political committee under section 303 of the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971 (hereinafter in this statement referred to as the "Act") for at least 6 months which has received contributions from more than 50 persons and has made contributions to at least 5 candidates for Federal office. Subsection (b)(2) also provided that State political party organizations shall not be required to make contributions to at least 5 candidates for Federal office in order to be considered political committees for purposes of subsection (b)(2).

Subsection (b)(3) provided that no individual may make contributions exceeding $25,000 in any calendar year.

Subsection (b)(4) provided that, for purposes of subsection (b), the following rules shall apply: (1) if a contribution is made to a political committee authorized in writing by a candidate to accept contributions on his behalf, then such contribution shall be considered to be a contribution to such candidate; and (2) any contribution to the candidate of a political party for the office of Vice President shall be considered to be a contribution to the candidate of such party for the office of President.

Subsection (b)(5) provided that limitations imposed by subsection (b)(1) and subsection (b)(2) shall apply separately to each election.

Subsection (b)(6) provided that all contributions from a person to a particular candidate shall be treated as contributions from such person to such candidate, even if such contributions are made indirectly, are earmarked, or are directed through any intermediary or conduit. It should be noted that the provisions of subsection (b)(6) were not intended to apply to contributions from separate segregated funds maintained by corporations or labor organizations, because donors to such funds must relinquish control of their donation to the corporation or labor organization and such donors may not earmark or direct such donations to any specific candidate or political committee.

Subsection (b)(6) required any person acting as an intermediary or conduit to report to the supervisory officer the source of the contribution and the intended recipient of the contribution. Such person also shall report such contribution to the intended recipient.

It was the understanding of the Committee on House Administration (hereinafter in this statement referred to as the "House committee") that the following rule would apply with respect to the application of the contribution limitations established by subsection (b): if a person exercises any direct or indirect control over the making of a contribution, then such contribution shall count toward the limitation imposed with respect to such person under subsection (b), but it will not count toward such a person's contribution limitation when it is demonstrated that such person exercised no direct or indirect control over the making of the contribution involved.

A similar question was raised in the House committee regarding the possibility of circumventing the limit on contributions by political committees where a national committee of a political organization may contribute the maximum allowable amount to a candidate and a State or local sub-unit or subsidiary of that committee may also contribute to the same candidate. It was the intent of the House committee to allow the maximum contribution from each level of the organization if the decision or judgment to make such contributions is independently exercised within the separate levels of the organization. However, if the subsidiary or sub-unit organizations are under the control or direction of the parent organization with respect to their contributions to specific candidates, then the organizations acting in concert would constitute one political committee for the purpose of the contribution limits included in the House amendment bill.

Conference substitute

The conference substitute is the same as the House amendment, with the following changes:

1. With respect to the provision of the House amendment which prohibited any individual from making contributions in any calendar year exceeding $25,000, the conference substitute adopts the approach of the Senate bill which provided that any contribution to a campaign of a candidate in a year other than the calendar year in which the election to which such campaign relates is held shall be considered to be made during the calendar year in which such election is held.

2. The conference substitute adopts the provision of the Senate bill relating to the acceptance of illegal contributions by candidates and by officers or employees of political committees. Existing law prohibits a candidate or political committee from accepting an illegal contribution or authorizing an illegal expenditure. The conference substitute combines the prohibitions contained in existing law with those contained in the Senate bill and provides that no candidate or political committee may knowingly accept any contribution, or knowingly make any expenditure, in violation of the limits imposed by this legislation. The conference substitute also provides that no officer or employee of a political committee may knowingly accept a contribution made for the benefit of a candidate, or knowingly make any expenditure on behalf of the candidate, in violation of the limits imposed by this legislation.

The conferees agree with the analysis of the House report (as set forth in the statement relating to the House amendment) regarding the rule for application of contribution limitations and regarding the possibility of circumventing such limitations.

B. EXPENDITURES

Senate bill

Section 304(a) of the Senate bill amended chapter 29 of title 18, United States Code, by inserting a new section 614, relating to limitation on expenditures generally.

Section 614(a)(1) provided that no candidate may make expenditures in his campaign for nomination for election, or for election, to Federal office, which exceed the limitation established by section 504 of the Act if such candidate were receiving payments under title V of the Act.

Section 504 of the Act was added by section 101 of the Senate bill. Section 504(a)(1) provided that no candidate (other than a candidate for the office of President) who receives payments under title V with respect to his primary election campaign may make expenditures with respect to such campaign in excess of the greater of (1) 8 cents multiplied by the voting age population of the geographical area in which the election for such nomination is held; (2) $125,000, if the Federal office sought is that of Senator or Representative from a State with only one Representative; or (3) $90,000, if the Federal office sought is that of Representative from a State with more than one Representative.

Section 504(a)(2) provided that no candidate for nomination for the office of President may make expenditures in any State in which he is a candidate in a primary election which exceed 2 times the amount which a candidate for nomination for the office of Senator may spend in such State. No candidate for nomination for the office of President may make expenditures throughout the United States which exceed an amount equal to 10 cents multiplied by the voting age population of the United States.

Section 504(b) provided that no candidate who receives payments under title V with respect to his general election campaign may make expenditures with respect to such campaign in excess of the greater of (1) 12 cents multiplied by the voting age population of the geographical area in which such election is held; (2) $175,000, if the Federal office sought is that of Senator or Representative from a State with only one Representative; or (3) $90,000, if the Federal office sought is that of Representative from a State with more than one Representative.

Section 504(c) provided that no candidate who is unopposed in a general election may make expenditures with respect to his campaign which exceed 10 percent of the limitation in section 504(b).

Section 504(d) provided that the Federal Election Commission (hereinafter in this statement referred to as the "Commission") shall prescribe rules under which expenditures by a candidate for nomination for election to the office of President for use in 2 or more States shall be attributed to the expenditure limitation of such candidate in each State.

Section 504(e)(1) provided that expenditures made on behalf of a candidate shall be considered to be made by such candidate.

Section 504(e)(2) provided that expenditures made by a candidate of a political party for the office of Vice President shall be considered to be made by the candidate of such party for the office of President.

Section 504(e)(3) provided that an expenditure is made on behalf of a candidate if it is made by (1) an authorized committee or other agent of a candidate for the purposes of making expenditures; (2) any person authorized or requested to make an expenditure by a candidate, an authorized committee of a candidate, or an agent of a candidate; or (3) a national or State committee of a political party with respect to a primary or general election campaign of a candidate, if such expenditure exceeds the limitations of section 614(b) of title 18, United States Code, relating to limitation on expenditures generally. If any such expenditure does not exceed such limitations, it shall not be considered to be an expenditure made on behalf of such candidate.

Section 614(a)(2) was identical to section 504(e)(1) of the Act. Section 614(a)(3) was identical to section 504(e)(2) of the Act. Section 614(a)(4) provided that an expenditure is made on behalf of a candidate if it is made by (1) an authorized committee or other agent of a candidate for the purpose of making expenditures; or (2) any person authorized or requested to make an expenditure by a candidate, an authorized committee of a candidate, or an agent of a candidate. Section 614(a)(5) was identical to section 504(d) of the Act.

Section 614(b)(1) provided that a national committee or State committee of a political party may make expenditures with respect to general election campaigns of candidates for Federal office.

Section 614(b)(2) provided that a national committee of a political party may not make expenditures for the candidate of such party for the office of President which exceed an amount equal to 2 cents multiplied by the voting age population of the United States.

Section 614(b)(3) provided that a national committee or a State committee of a political party may not make expenditures for a candidate in a general election for Federal office which exceed (1) if the office involved is that of Senator or Representative in a State with only one Representative, the greater of (A) 2 cents multiplied by the voting age population of the State involved; or (B) $20,000; and (2) if the office involved is that of Representative in a State with more than one Representative, $10,000.

Section 614(b)(4) defined the term "voting age population" as the voting age population certified for the year involved under section 504(g) of the Act. Section 614(b)(4) also provided that the approval by a national committee of a political party of an expenditure by a candidate of such party for the office of President, as required by section 316 of the Act, shall not be considered an expenditure by such national committee.

Section 504(g) of the Act, as added by section 101 of the Senate bill, provided that, beginning in January 1975 and annually thereafter, the Secretary of Commerce shall certify to the Commission an estimate of the voting age population of the United States, of each State, and of each congressional district. The term "voting age population" was defined to mean resident population, 18 years of age or older.

Section 504(h) of the Act, as added by section 101 of the Senate bill, provided that the Commission shall, upon receiving certification from the Secretary of Commerce under section 504(g) and from the Secretary of Labor under section 504(f)(2), publish in the Federal Register the applicable expenditure limitations in effect for the calendar year for the United States, each State, and each congressional district.

Section 504(i) of the Act, as added by section 101 of the Senate bill, provided that, in the case of a House candidate from a new district or from a district with new boundaries, the Commission shall determine the amount of payments to which such candidate is entitled and shall determine whether such candidate is a major party or a minor party candidate, based upon the number of votes cast in the preceding general election for the office involved by voters residing within the area encompassed in the new or altered congressional district.

House amendment

Section 101(a) of the House amendment amended section 608 of title 18, United States Code, by inserting a new subsection (c).

The new subsection (c) established the following expenditure limitations: (1) a candidate for nomination for election to the office of President may not make expenditures exceeding $10,000,000; (2) a candidate for election to the office of President may not make expenditures exceeding $20,000,000: (3) a candidate for the office of Senator may not make expenditures which exceed the greater of (A) 5 cents multiplied by the population of the State involved; or (B) $75,000; (4) a candidate for the office of Representative, Delegate from the District of Columbia, or Resident Commissioner, may not make expenditures exceeding $60,000; and (5) a candidate for the office of Delegate from Guam or the Virgin Islands may not make expenditures exceeding $15,000.

Subsection (c) also provided that, for purposes of such subsection, the following rules shall apply: (1) any expenditure made by the candidate of a political party for the office of Vice President shall be considered to be an expenditure made by the candidate of such party for the office of President; (2) any expenditure made on behalf of a candidate by his principal campaign committee shall be deemed to have been made by such candidate; and (3) the population of a geographical area shall be the population according to the most recent decennial census.

Subsection (c) also provided that the expenditure limitations applied by subsection (c) to candidates for the office of Senator, Representative, Delegate, and Resident Commissioner, shall apply separately to each election. It also provided that, for purposes of the $10,000,000 expenditure limit on candidates for nomination to the office of President, all Presidential primary elections are considered one election.

Conference substitute

The conference substitute is the same as the House amendment, with the following changes:

1. The conference substitute increases the expenditure limitation applicable to candidates for the office of Representative, Delegate from the District of Columbia, and Resident Commissioner, from $60,000 to $70,000.

2. The conference substitute adopts the provision of the Senate bill which provided that an expenditure is made on behalf of a candidate if it is made by (A) an authorized committee or other agent of a candidate for the purpose of making expenditures; or (B) any person authorized or requested to make an expenditure by a candidate, an authorized committee of a candidate, or an agent of a candidate. This change conforms with the decision of the conferees to permit authorized committees, as well as the principal campaign committee, to make expenditures on behalf of a candidate.

3. The conference substitute adopts the approach taken by the Senate bill with respect to expenditures applicable to candidates for the office of Senator or Representative from a State with only one Representative. In a primary election, such candidates may make expenditures which do not exceed the greater of (A) 8 cents multiplied by the voting age population of the State in which the election is held; or (B) $100,000 (the conference substitute reduces the floor of $125,000 which was contained in the Senate bill).

In a general election, such candidates may make expenditures which do not exceed the greater of (A) 12 cents multiplied by the voting age population of the State in which the election is held; or (B) $150,000

(the conference substitute reduces the floor of $175,000 which was contained in the Senate bill).

4. The conference substitute adopts the provision of the Senate bill which provided that no candidate for nomination for the office of President may make expenditures in any State in which he is a candidate in a primary election which exceed 2 times the amount which a candidate for the office of Senator may make in such State.

5. The conference substitute adopts the provision of the Senate bill which provided that the Commission shall prescribe rules under which expenditures by a candidate for nomination for election to the office of President for use in 2 or more States shall be attributed to the expenditure limitation of such candidate in each State.

6. The conference substitute adopts the provision of the Senate bill which provided that national committees and State committees of political parties may make expenditures with respect to general election campaigns of candidates for Federal office. The expenditure limitations made applicable to such committees by the Senate bill are adopted by the conference substitute.

C. COST-OF-LIVING ADJUSTMENTS

Senate bill

Section 504(f) of the Act, as added by section 101 of the Senate bill, provided that at the beginning of each calendar year (commencing in 1975) the Secretary of Labor shall certify to the Commission the percentage difference between the price index for the most recent calendar year and the price index for the base period. The expenditure limitations established by section 504(a) and section 504(b) shall be changed by such percentage difference.

Section 504(f) defined the term "price index" as the average over a calendar year of the Consumer Price Index (all items—United States city average), and the term "base period" as calendar year 1973.

House amendment

Section 608(d) of title 18, United States Code, as added by section 101(a) of the House amendment, was the same as section 504(f) of the Act, as added by the Senate bill, with the following differences: (1) certification was required to be made to the Comptroller General, and not to the Commission; and (2) the percentage difference would be taken into account only if it required an increase in expenditure limitations established by section 608(c) of title 18, United States Code.

Conference substitute

The conference substitute is the same as the House amendment, except that certification is required to be made to the Commission.

D. OTHER EXPENDITURE LIMITATIONS

Senate bill

Section 614(c) of title 18, United States Code, as added by section 304(a) of the Senate bill, provided that no person may make expenditures (other than an expenditure permitted under section 614(a)(4)) advocating the election or defeat of a clearly identified candidate during a calendar year which exceed $1,000.

Section 614(c) also contained definitions of terms used in such subsection. The term "clearly identified" was defined to mean (1) the candidate's name appears; (2) a photograph or drawing of the candidate appears; or (3) the identity of the candidate is apparent by unambiguous reference. The term "person" did not include a national committee or State committee of a political party. The term "expenditure" did not include any payment made by a corporation or labor organization which, under the last paragraph of section 610 of title 18, United States Code, would not constitute an expenditure by such corporation or labor organization.

House amendment

Section 608(e) of title 18, United States Code, as added by section 101(a) of the House amendment, was the same as section 614(c), as added by section 304(a) of the Senate bill, except that the provision added by the House amendment did not define the terms "person" and "expenditure".

Conference substitute

The conference substitute is the same as the Senate bill, except that the definition of person is omitted.

E. EXPENDITURES FROM PERSONAL FUNDS

Senate bill

Section 302(a)(1) of the Senate bill amended section 608(a)(1) of title 18, United States Code, relating to limitations on contributions and expenditures, to provide that no candidate may make expenditures from his personal funds or the personal funds of his immediate family with respect to his campaigns for nomination for election, and for election, to Federal office which exceed during any calendar year (1) $50,000 in the case of a candidate for the office of President or Vice President; (2) $35,000 in the case of a candidate for the office of Senator; or (3) $25,000 in the case of a candidate for the office of Representative, Delegate, or Resident Commissioner.

Section 302(a)(2) of the Senate bill amended section 608(a) of title 18, United States Code, by adding at the end thereof a new paragraph (3) and paragraph (4). Paragraph (3) provided that no candidate or his immediate family may make loans or advances from their personal funds with respect to his campaigns for Federal office unless such loan or advance is evidenced by a written instrument disclosing the terms and conditions of such loan or advance. Paragraph (4) provided that any such loan or advance shall be included in computing expenditures under section 608(a) only to the extent of the balance of such loan or advance outstanding and unpaid.

House amendment

Section 101(b) of the House amendment amended section 608(a)(1) of title 18, United States Code, to provide that no candidate may make expenditures from his personal funds or the personal funds of his immediate family with respect to his campaign for nomination for election, or for election, to Federal office, which exceed $35,000.

Conference substitute

The conference substitute is the same as the Senate bill, except that the conference substitute permits candidates for the office of Representative from States with only one Representative to make expenditures of up to $35,000 from their personal funds or the funds of their immediate families. Under the conference substitute the limitation on the expenditure of personal funds and immediate family funds by a candidate applies to the entire campaign period during any calendar year, beginning with the primary election campaign running through any primary runoff campaign and the general election campaign. In determining the amount of such funds used in connection with the candidate's efforts to obtain election to Federal office during any calendar year all funds spent in calendar years other than the calendar year in which such campaigns are conducted are taken into account.

It is the intent of the conferees that members of the immediate family of any candidate shall be subject to the contribution limitations established by this legislation. If a candidate for the office of Senator, for example, already is in a position to exercise control over funds of a member of his immediate family before he becomes a candidate, then he could draw upon these funds up to the limit of $35,000. If, however, the candidate did not have access to or control over such funds at the time he became a candidate, the immediate family member would not be permitted to grant access or control to the candidate in amounts up to $35,000, if the immediate family member intends that such amounts are to be used in the campaign of the candidate. The immediate family member would be permitted merely to make contributions to the candidate in amounts not greater than $1,000 for each election involved.

F. DISCHARGE OF CERTAIN CAMPAIGN DEBTS

Senate bill

Section 302(d) of the Senate bill provided that, notwithstanding the provisions of section 608 of title 18, United States Code, any individual may satisfy out of his personal funds or the personal funds of his immediate family any debt or obligation outstanding on the date of the enactment of this legislation and incurred by him with respect to any campaign for election to Federal office ending before January 1, 1973. The term "immediate family" was defined by reference to the definition of such term contained in section 608.

House amendment

Section 101(c) of the House amendment was the same as section 302(d) of the Senate bill, with the following differences: (1) the House amendment, instead of making an exception to the provisions of section 608 of title 18, United States Code, generally, made the exception apply specifically to the provisions of section 608(a)(1) of title 18, United States Code, relating to limitations on expenditures from personal funds; and (2) the House amendment defined the terms "election", "Federal office", and "political committee" by reference to the definitions of such terms contained in section 591 of title 18, United States Code.

Conference substitute

The conference substitute is the same as the House amendment.

G. CONTRIBUTIONS BY FOREIGN NATIONALS

Senate bill

Section 615(b)(2) of title 18, United States Code, as added by section 304(a) of the Senate bill, provided that no candidate may knowingly solicit or accept a contribution (1) from a foreign national; or (2) which is made in violation of section 613 of title 18, United States Code, relating to contributions by agents of foreign principals. The term "foreign national" was defined to mean a foreign principal, as such term is defined by the Foreign Agents Registration Act of 1938, or an individual who is not a citizen of the United States and who is not lawfully admitted for permanent residence, as defined by the Immigration and Nationality Act.

House amendment

Section 101(d) of the House amendment amended section 613 of title 18, United States Code, relating to contributions by certain foreign agents, in order to make such section apply directly to foreign nationals instead of applying to agents of foreign principals. The term "foreign national" was defined in the same manner as in the Senate bill.

Conference substitute

The conference substitute is the same as the House amendment.

H. AMOUNT OF CRIMINAL FINES

Senate bill

Section 302(b) of the Senate bill amended section 608 of title 18, United States Code, relating to limitations on contributions and expenditures out of candidates' personal and family funds, by increasing the fine for violation of such section from a maximum of $1,000 to a maximum of $25,000, and by increasing the prison term from a maximum of one year to a maximum of 5 years.

The penalty for violation of section 614 of title 18, United States Code, as added by section 304(a) of the Senate bill, was a fine of $25,000, or imprisonment for not more than 5 years, or both. If a candidate was convicted of violating section 614 because of an expenditure made on his behalf by a political committee, then the treasurer of such political committee or any other person authorizing such expenditure was punishable by a fine of not more than $25,000, or imprisonment for not more than 5 years, or both, if such person knew or had reason to know that such expenditure was in violation of section 614.

The penalty for violation of section 615 of title 18, United States Code, as added by section 304(a) of the Senate bill, was a fine of not more than $25,000, or imprisonment for not more than 5 years, or both.

House amendment

Section 101(e)(1) of the House amendment amended section 608 of title 18, United States Code, relating to limitations on contributions and expenditures, to increase the criminal fine which may be imposed under such section from $1,000 to $25,000.

Section 101(e)(2) amended section 610 of title 18, United States Code, relating to contributions or expenditures by national banks, corporations, or labor organizations, to (1) increase the criminal fine which may be imposed under such section against corporations or labor organizations from $5,000 to $25,000; and (2) increase the criminal fine which may be imposed under such section against officers or directors committing willful violations from $10,000 to $50,000. It was the desire of the House committee that the increased penalties of section 610, together with the existing prison penalties of such section, shall be enforced rigorously against officers and directors of corporations and labor organizations to the extent such officers and directors are responsible for violations of such section.

Section 101(e)(3) amended section 611 of title 18, United States Code, relating to contributions by firms or individuals contracting with the United States, to increase the criminal fine which may be imposed under such section from $5,000 to $25,000.

Section 101(e)(4) amended section 613 of title 18, United States Code (as amended by section 101(d)), relating to contributions by foreign nationals, to increase the criminal fine which may be imposed under such section from $5,000 to $25,000.

Conference substitute

The conference substitute is the same as the House amendment.

I. PROHIBITION OF CERTAIN CONTRIBUTIONS

Senate bill

Section 211 of the Senate bill amended section 310 of the Act, relating to prohibition of contributions in the name of another, to provide that no person may knowingly permit his name to be used to effect any contribution which is prohibited by such section.

House amendment

Section 101(f)(1) of the House amendment amended chapter 29 of title 18, United States Code, by inserting a new section 614, relating to prohibition of contributions in the name of another. Section 614 was the same as section 310 of the Act (which was repealed by section 101(f)(4) of the House amendment), except that the criminal fine was increased from a maximum of $1,000 to a maximum of $25,000.

Conference substitute

The conference substitute is the same as the House amendment, except that the conference substitute adopts that portion of the Senate bill which provided that no person may knowingly permit his name to be used to effect any prohibited contribution.

J. CONTRIBUTIONS OF CURRENCY

Senate bill

Section 304(a) of the Senate bill amended chapter 29 of title 18, United States Code, by inserting a new section 616, relating to form of contributions. Section 616 prohibited contributions to any candidate or political committee in excess of $100 in a calendar year unless such contributions are made by written instrument identifying the person making such contribution. Violation of section 616 is punishable by a fine of not more than $1,000, imprisonment for not more than one year, or both.

House amendment

Section 101(f)(1) of the House amendment amended chapter 29 of title 18, United States Code, by inserting a new section 615, relating to limitation on contributions of currency. Section 615 provided that no person may make contributions of currency of the United States or currency of any foreign country exceeding $100 to any candidate for Federal office in any election. Violation of section 615 is punishable by a fine of not more than $25,000, imprisonment for not more than one year, or both.

Conference substitute

The conference substitute is the same as the House amendment.

K. CONVERSION OF CONTRIBUTIONS

Conference substitute

The conference substitute is the same as the House amendment, except that the conference substitute prohibits honorariums exceeding $15,000 in a calendar year, thus increasing by $5,000 the figure contained in the House amendment.

VOTING FRAUD

Senate bill

Section 304(a) of the Senate bill amended chapter 29 of title 18, United States Code, by inserting a new section 618, relating to voting fraud. Violation of the provisions was made punishable by a $50,000 fine or 5 years in prison, or both.

House amendment

No provision.

Conference substitute

The conference substitute is the same as the Senate bill, except that the conference substitute reduces the fine from $50,000 to $25,000 and reduces the prison term from 5 years to 1 year.

A. ELECTION

Senate bill

Section 301(a) of the Senate bill amended section 591(a) of title 18, United States Code, relating to the definition of election, to indicate that such term does not include the election of delegates to a constitutional convention for proposing amendments to the Constitution of the United States.

House amendment

No provision.

Conference substitute

The conference substitute is the same as the Senate bill.

B. POLITICAL COMMITTEE

Senate bill

Section 301(b) of the Senate bill amended section 591(d) of title 18, United States Code, relating to the definition of political committee, to read that such term means (1) any committee or other group of persons which receives contributions or makes expenditures during a calendar year exceeding $1,000; (2) any national committee, association, or organization of a political party, any State affiliate or subsidiary of a national political party, and any State committee of a political party, whether or not any such entity receives contributions or makes expenditures during a calendar year exceeding $1,000; and (3) any committee, association, or organization administering a separate segregated fund described in section 610 of title 18 United States Code, relating to contributions or expenditures by national banks, corporations, or labor organizations.

House amendment

Section 102(a) of the House amendment amended section 591(d) of title 18, United States Code, relating to the definition of political committee, to provide that such term shall be extended to include any individual, committee, association, or organization which commits any act for the purpose of influencing the outcome of any election for Federal office, except that such acts shall not include certain communications which are excluded from the definition of expenditure under section 591(f), as amended by the House amendment. Such communications include news stories and editorials distributed through the public media facilities (unless such facilities are owned or controlled by a political party or committee, or by a candidate), communications by a membership organization to its members (unless it is organized primarily for the purpose of influencing an election to Federal office), and any other communication which is not made for the purpose of influencing an election to Federal office.

Conference substitute

The conference substitute is the same as that portion of the Senate bill which provided that the term "political committee" means any committee or other group of persons which receives contributions or makes expenditures during a calendar year exceeding $1,000.

C. CONTRIBUTION

Senate bill

Section 301(c) of the Senate bill amended section 591(e) of title 18, United States Code, relating to the definition of contribution, in the following ways: (1) to indicate that the term includes assessments, fees, or membership dues, connected with subscriptions; (2) to provide that such term does not apply to any transaction in connection with the election of delegates to a constitutional convention or proposing amendments to the Constitution of the United States; (3) to provide that such term applies to financing the operations of a political committee, and to the payment of any debt or obligation of a candidate or a political committee; (4) to eliminate the applicability of such term to contracts, promises, or agreements to make a contribution; and (5) to clarify that such term includes funds received by a political committee which are transferred to such committee from another political committee.

House amendment

Section 102(b) of the House amendment amended section 591(e)(1) of title 18, United States Code, relating to the definition of contribution, to provide that a loan of money by a national or State bank shall be considered a loan by each endorser of such loan, in that proportion of the unpaid balance of such loan which each endorser bears to the total number of endorsers.

Section 102(c) of the House amendment amended section 591(e) of title 18, United States Code, relating to the definition of contribution, to provide that the following activities shall not be considered to be contributions: (1) the use of property by an individual who owns or leases such property with respect to the rendering of voluntary services by such individual on his residential premises for candidate-related activities, including the cost of invitations and food and beverages, to the extent that the cumulative value of such use does not exceed $500; (2) the sale of food or beverage by a vendor to a candidate at a reduced charge if such charge is at least equal to the cost of such food or beverage to the vendor, to the extent that such accumulated charges do not exceed $500; (3) the travel expenses of an individual rendering voluntary services to a candidate, to the extent that the cumulative total of such expenses does not exceed $500; and (4) the payment by a State or local committee of a political party of the costs of preparation or distribution of any printed slate card or other printed listing of 3 or more candidates for public office who are candidates in the State in which such committee is located, but this exclusion does not apply to payment of costs for the display of any such printed listing through public media facilities (other than newspapers) or on outdoor advertising facilities such as billboards.

Conference substitute

The conference substitute is the same as the House amendment, except that the conference substitute adopts that portion of the Senate bill which deleted from the term "contribution" any transaction in connection with the election of delegates to a constitutional convention for proposing amendments to the Constitution of the United States.

The purpose of the provision exempting slatecards is intended to allow State and local parties to educate the general public as to the identity of the candidates of the party. It is the intention of the conferees that the slatecard exemption applies only to lists containing the names of all candidates of a party within the State, displayed with equal prominence.

D. EXPENDITURE

Senate bill

Section 301(d) of the Senate bill amended section 591(f) of title 18, United States Code, relating to the definition of expenditure, to provide that such term means (1) a purchase, loan (other than a loan of money by a national or State bank), or other described payment of money or anything of value made for the purpose of (A) influencing the nomination for election, or election, of any person to Federal office; (B) influencing the result of a Presidential primary election; (C) financing a political committee; or (D) paying any debt or obligation of a candidate or a political committee; and (2) the transfer of funds by a political committee to another political committee.

The amendment made by section 301(d) of the Senate bill provided that the term "expenditure" does not include the value of services rendered by volunteer workers on behalf of a candidate.

House amendment

Section 102(d) of the House amendment amended section 591(f) of title 18, United States Code, relating to the definition of expenditure, to provide that the following activities shall not be considered to be expenditures: (1) any news story, commentary, or editorial of any broadcasting station, newspaper, or other periodical publication, unless such facilities are owned or controlled by a political party, political committee, or candidate; (2) nonpartisan get-out-the-vote activity; (3) communications by a membership organization or corporation to its members or stockholders, if such membership organization or corporation is not organized primarily to influence the outcome of elections for Federal office; (4) the use of property by an individual who owns or leases such property with respect to the rendering of voluntary services by such individual on his residential premises for candidate-related activities, including the cost of invitations and food and beverages, to the extent that the cumulative value of such use does not exceed $500; (5) the travel expenses of an individual rendering voluntary services to a candidate, to the extent that the cumulative total of such expenses does not exceed $500; (6) communications which are not made to influence the outcome of elections for Federal office; (7) the payment by a State or local committee of a political party of the costs of preparation or distribution of any printed slate card or other printed listing of 3 or more candidates for public office who are candidates in the State in which such committee is located, but this exclusion does not apply to payment of costs for the display of any such printed listing through public media facilities (other than newspapers) or on outdoor advertising facilities such as billboards; (8) the costs of a candidate (including his principal campaign committee) with respect to his solicitation of contributions, except that this exception does not apply to costs which exceed 25 percent of the expenditure limitation applicable to such candidate under section 608(c) of title 18, as added by the House amendment; and (9) any costs incurred by a multicandidate committee which has been registered under the Act as a political committee for at least 6 months, has received contributions from at least 50 persons, and (except for State political party organizations) has made contributions to at least 5 candidates, in connection with soliciting contributions to itself or to a general political fund controlled by it, but this exclusion does not exempt costs of soliciting contributions through any public media facilities.

Conference substitute

The conference substitute is the same as the House amendment, except that the 25 percent exemption for fundraising costs is reduced to 20 percent and that portion of the Senate bill is retained which deleted the reference to transactions in connection with the election of delegates to a constitutional convention for proposing amendments to the Constitution of the United States.

E. POLITICAL PARTY

Senate bill

Section 301(e) of the Senate bill amended section 591 of title 18, United States Code, by inserting a new paragraph (i), relating to the definition of political party. Such term was defined to mean any association or other organization which nominates a candidate for election to Federal office whose name appears on the election ballot as the candidate of such association or other organization.

House amendment

No provision.

Conference substitute

The conference substitute is the same as the Senate bill.

F. STATE COMMITTEE

Senate bill

Section 301(e) of the Senate bill amended section 591 of title 18, United States Code, by inserting a new paragraph (j), relating to the definition of State committee. Such term was defined to mean the organization which is responsible for the day-to-day operations of a political party at the State level, as determined by the Commission.

House amendment

No provision.

Conference substitute

The conference substitute is the same as the Senate bill.

G. NATIONAL COMMITTEE

Senate bill

Section 301(e) of the Senate bill amended section 591 of title 18, United States Code, by inserting a new paragraph (k), relating to the definition of national committee. Such term was defined to mean the organization which is responsible for the day-to-day operations of a political party at the national level, as determined by the Commission.

House amendment

No provision.

Conference substitute

The conference substitute is the same as the Senate bill.

H. PRINCIPAL CAMPAIGN COMMITTEE

Senate bill

No provision.

House amendment

Section 102(e) of the House amendment amended section 591 of title 18, United States Code, by inserting a new paragraph (i), relating to the definition of principal campaign committee. Such term was defined to mean the principal campaign committee designated by a candidate under section 302(f)(1) of the Act, as added by the House amendment.

Conference substitute

The conference substitute is the same as the House amendment.

POLITICAL FUNDS

Senate bill

Section 303 of the Senate bill amended section 611 of title 18, United States Code, relating to contributions by firms or individuals contracting with the United States, to provide that such section shall not prohibit the establishment or maintenance of a separate segregated campaign fund by a corporation or a labor organization unless such establishment or maintenance is prohibited under section 610 of title 18, relating to contributions or expenditures by national banks, corporations, or labor organizations.

House amendment

Section 103 of the House amendment was the same as section 303 of the Senate bill, except that the amendment to section 611 of title 18, United States Code, relating to contributions by firms or individuals contracting with the United States, made by the House amendment contained a definition of the term "labor organization". Such term was defined by reference to the definition of such term contained in section 610 of title 18, United States Code.

A question was raised in the House committee during the consideration of the amendment to section 611 as to whether doctors receiving payments under the so-called Medicare and Medicaid programs are prohibited from making political contributions as government contractors. The House committee was of the opinion that nothing in the existing section 611, nor in the amendment thereto included in the House amendments, would prohibit a doctor from making a political contribution solely because he was receiving payments for medical services rendered to patients under either the Medicare or Medicaid program. Under the Medicare program the basic contractual relationship is between the Federal Government and the individual receiving the medical services. The individual receiving the medical services may be reimbursed directly by the Federal Government for amounts paid for such services, or he may assign his claim against the Federal Government to the doctor who rendered the services, but in the latter case the doctor merely stands in the shoes of the claimant for payment. This relationship is not altered by the fact that a Federal agency may retain a right to audit the accounts of a medical practitioner to protect the Federal Government against fraudulent claims for medical services.

Under so-called Medicaid programs, it is true that doctors may have specific contractual agreements to render medical services, but such agreements are with State agencies and not with the Federal Government. Medicaid programs are administered by State agencies using Federal funds. The House committee did not believe that section 611 prohibiting political contributions by government contractors has any application to doctors rendering medical services pursuant to a contract with a State agency.

A separate question was raised in the House committee concerning the application of section 610 of title 18, relating to prohibitions against political contributions by corporations, banks, and labor organizations, as to whether a professional corporation composed of doctors, lawyers, architects, engineers, etc., would be prohibited from making political contributions. Whether or not a professional association is a corporation is a matter determined under State law. If, under State law, such an association is a corporation, it would be prohibited from making a political contribution as a corporation. However, nothing in existing law, nor in the amendments contained in the House amendment prohibit an individual member of any corporation from making a political contribution as an individual. Existing law also permits corporations to establish a separate segregated fund to be utilized for political purposes so long as contributions to such fund are voluntary and not secured by force or job discrimination or financial reprisals, or threat thereof, or by money obtained in any commercial transaction.

Conference substitute

The conference substitute is the same as the House amendment.

The conferees agree with the analysis of the House report (as set forth in the statement relating to the House amendment) regarding political contributions by doctors and professional corporations.

Effect on State Law

Senate bill

No provision.

House amendment

Section 104 of the House amendment provided that chapter 29 of title 18, United States Code, relating to elections and political activities, supersedes and preempts provisions of State law.

Conference substitute

The conference substitute is the same as the House amendment.

The provisions of the conference substitute make it clear that the Federal law occupies the field with respect to criminal sanctions relating to limitations on campaign expenditures, the sources of campaign funds used in Federal races, the conduct of Federal campaigns, and similar offenses, but does not affect the States' rights to prohibit false registration, voting fraud, theft of ballots, and similar offenses under State law.

AMENDMENTS TO FEDERAL ELECTION CAMPAIGN ACT OF 1971

Principal Campaign Committees

A. DESIGNATION

Senate bill

Section 207(a) of the Senate bill amended title III of the Act by inserting a new section 310, relating to central campaign committees. Section 310(a) provided that each candidate shall designate one political committee as his central campaign committee. A candidate for nomination for election, or for election, to the office of President, also may designate State campaign committees in States in which he is a candidate.

Section 310(b) provided that no political committee may be designated as the central campaign committee of more than one candidate, except that a political committee described in section 301(d)(2) of the Act, as added by the Senate bill, may be designated as the central campaign committee of more than one candidate in a general election campaign. The central campaign committee and each State campaign committee of a candidate of a political party for the office of President shall be considered the central campaign committee and the State campaign committee of the candidate of such party for the office of Vice President.

House amendment

Section 201 of the House amendment amended section 302 of the Act by striking out subsection (f), relating to notices with respect to fund solicitation and annual reports by supervisory officers, and by inserting in lieu thereof a new subsection (f), relating to principal campaign committees.

Subsection (f)(1) required that candidates for Federal office (other than candidates for the office of Vice President) designate a political committee as their principal campaign committee. No political committee which, supports more than one candidate may be designated as a principal campaign committee. Subsection (f)(1) as provided that no political committee may be designated as the principal campaign committee of more than one candidate, except that the Presidential candidate of a political party may, after he is nominated, designate the national committee of his political party as his principal campaign committee.

Conference substitute

Although the conference substitute is the same as the House amendment with respect to principal campaign committees, the conference substitute retains the provision of the Act deleted by the House amendment relating to notices with respect to fund solicitation. This provision requires political committees to have a notice on material soliciting contributions which states that copies of their reports filed under the Act are available for purchase from the Commission.

B. EXPENDITURES ON BEHALF OF CANDIDATE

Senate bill

No provision.

House amendment

Section 302(f)(2) of the Act, as added by the House amendment, provided that, except in the case of expenditures which may be made under section 608(e) of title 18, United States Code, relating to expenditures of not more than $1,000 in a calendar year made with respect to a clearly identified candidate, only the principal campaign committee of a candidate may make expenditures on behalf of such candidate.

Conference substitute

The conference substitute, like the Senate bill, permits authorized political committees other than the principal campaign committee to make expenditures on behalf of a candidate.

C. REPORTS

Senate bill

Section 310(c)(1) of the Act, as added by the Senate bill, provided that political committees, other than central campaign committees and State campaign committees, shall file required reports with the appropriate central campaign committee and not with the Commission. Any report filed with a central campaign committee shall be considered to have been filed with the Commission at the time it was filed with the central campaign committee.

Section 310(c)(2) provided that the Commission may require a political committee operating in a State on behalf of a candidate who has designated a State campaign committee for such State, to file required reports with such State campaign committee and not with the central campaign committee of such candidate.

Section 310(c)(3) provided that the Commission may require any political committee to file any report directly with the Commission.

Section 310(d) provided that each central campaign committee and State campaign committee shall consolidate reports filed with it by other political committees and furnish such reports, together with its own required reports, to the Commission.

House amendment

Section 302(f)(3) of the Act, as added by the House amendment, provided that political committees receiving contributions on behalf of a candidate shall report such contributions to the principal campaign committee of such candidate, instead of to the supervisory officer.

Subsection (f)(4) provided that the principal campaign committee shall compile and file reports which such committee receives from other political committees supporting the candidate involved, together with its own reports and statements, with the supervisory officer.

Conference substitute

The conference substitute follows the House amendment generally. Since the conference substitute permits expenditures to be made by other authorized political committees, it provides that political committees authorized to make expenditures with respect to a candidate must file reports relating to those expenditures with the principal campaign committee rather than with the Commission.

D. DEFINITION OF POLITICAL COMMITTEE

Senate bill

No provision.

House amendment

Section 302(f)(5) of the Act, as added by the House amendment, provided that, for purposes of subsection (f)(1) and subsection (f)(3), the term "political committee" does not include political committees supporting more than one candidate, except for the national committee of a political party designated by a Presidential candidate as his principal campaign committee. Therefore, a candidate may not designate a multicandidate political committee as his principal campaign committee and multicandidate political committees shall continue to report directly to the supervisory officer under applicable provisions of the Act.

Conference substitute

Because of the conference substitute provisions permitting expenditures to be made for a candidate by political committees other than his principal campaign committee, the provision of the House amendment requiring multicandidate committees to report directly to the supervisory authority rather than to the principal campaign committee is not included in the conference substitute.

Campaign Depositories

Senate bill

Section 207(a) of the Senate bill amended title III of the Act by inserting a new section 311, relating to campaign depositories.

Section 311 provided that each candidate shall designate one or more national or State banks as his campaign depositories. Contributions received by or on behalf of a candidate shall be deposited in one of his campaign depositories. Expenditures, other than petty cash expenditures, made on behalf of a candidate shall be made by check from an account at one of the campaign depositories of such candidate.

Section 311 also provided that the treasurer of each political committee (other than a political committee authorized by a candidate to receive contributions or make expenditures on his behalf) shall designate one or more national or State banks as the campaign depositories of such political committee. Contributions received by such political committee shall be deposited in one of its campaign depositories. Expenditures, other than petty cash expenditures, made by such political committee shall be made by check from an account at one of its campaign depositories.

Section 311 also provided that political committees may maintain petty cash funds from which expenditures not in excess of $100 may be made in connection with a single purchase or transaction. Records of petty cash disbursements shall be kept in accordance with requirements established by the Commission.

Section 311 also provided that a candidate for nomination for election, or for election, to the office of President may establish one campaign depository in each State. The campaign depository of a candidate of a political party for the office of President shall be considered the campaign depository of the candidate of such political party for the office of Vice President.

House amendment

No provision.

Conference substitute

The conference substitute is the same as the Senate bill.

Registration Requirements

Senate bill

Section 203(a) of the Senate bill amended section 303 of the Act (relating to registration of political committees; statements) by in-serting a new subsection (a). The new section 303(a) provided that each candidate, within 10 days after becoming a candidate, shall file with the Commission a registration statement, which shall include (1) the identification of the candidate and any person he has authorized to receive contributions or make expenditures on his behalf; (2) the identification of his campaign depositories and the identification of each individual authorized to make any expenditure or withdrawal from accounts at such depositories; and (3) such additional relevant information as the Commission may require.

Section 303(b) of the Act (as so redesignated by the Senate bill) was amended by the Senate bill in the following ways: (1) the first sentence, relating to certain reporting requirements of political committees, was struck out; and (2) a new sentence was added which provided that the treasurer of each political committee shall file with the Commission a statement of organization within 10 days after such political committee is organized.

Section 303(c) of the Act (as so redesignated by the Senate bill) was amended by the Senate bill in the following ways: (1) it was made clear by the Senate bill that statements of organization shall be in such form as the Commission shall prescribe; (2) paragraph (3) was amended to provide that the statement of organization shall include information with respect to the geographical area or political jurisdiction within which the political committee will operate, and a general description of the authority and activities of such political committee; and (3) paragraph (9) was amended to provide that the statement of organization shall include the name and address of campaign depositories used by the political committee involved, and the identification of each individual authorized to make withdrawals or payments from accounts at such depositories.

House amendment

Section 202 of the House amendment amended section 303 of the Act, relating to registration of political committees and statements, by adding at the end thereof a new subsection (e) which provided that reports and notifications of political committees (other than principal campaign committees and multicandidate political committees) required to be filed under section 303 shall be filed with the appropriate principal campaign committee.

Conference substitute

The conference substitute is the same as the House amendment, except that multicandidate committees report to the appropriate principal campaign committee.

Reports by Political Committees and Candidates

A. FILING DATES

Senate bill

Section 204(a) of the Senate bill made the following changes in section 304 of the Act, relating to reports by political committees and candidates:

1. The provisions of section 304 were clarified in order to indicate that such provisions apply to campaigns for nomination for election as well as to campaigns for election.

2. The amendment made by the Senate bill established the following reporting dates: (A) the tenth day of April, July, and October of each year; (B) the tenth day before an election; (C) the tenth day of December in the year of an election; and (D) the last day of January of each year. In years in which no election is held, candidates may file reports on the twentieth day of April, July, and August, instead of on the tenth day of each such month.

3. The requirement that contributions of $5,000 or more received after the last report before an election must be reported within 48 hours after receipt, was eliminated by the amendment made by the Senate bill.

4. If the identity of an anonymous contributor becomes known, such identity shall be reported to the Commission.

5. The Commission may, upon request by a Presidential candidate or upon its own motion, waive reporting dates (other than January 31) and require that Presidential candidates report not less frequently than monthly. If the Commission acts upon its own motion, then the Presidential candidate involved is entitled to judicial review of the decision.

House amendment

Section 203(a) of the House amendment amended section 304(a) of the Act, relating to filing dates for reports of receipts and expenditures by political committees and candidates, to provide for the following new filing requirements:

1. In a calendar year in which an individual is a candidate for Federal office and an election is held for the particular Federal office which such individual is seeking, reports of receipts and expenditures must be filed 10 days before such election. Such reports shall be complete as of the fifteenth day before such election. Reports filed by registered or certified mail must be postmarked by the twelfth day before such election. In addition, such reports must be filed 30 days after the date of such election and be complete as of the twentieth day after the date of such election.

2. In other calendar years, reports of receipts and expenditures must be filed after the close of the calendar year and no later than January 31 of the following calendar year, and must be complete as of the close of the calendar year for which filed.

3. In addition to reports required to be filed in an election year or in any other calendar year, reports of receipts and expenditures must be filed for any calendar quarter in which the candidate or committee reporting received contributions exceeding $1,000 or made expenditures exceeding $1,000. In any case in which such a quarterly report would coincide with the annual report which is required for nonelection years, the amendment made by section 203(a) provided that the quarterly report be filed in accordance with provisions governing the filing of annual reports.

The amendment made by section 203(a) also provided that when the last day for filing a quarterly report occurs within 10 days of an election, then the quarterly report requirement shall be waived and superseded by the required election report. Such amendment also provided that any contribution exceeding $1,000 which is received after the fifteenth day before an election but more than 48 hours before an election, shall be reported no later than 48 hours after its receipt.

Such amendment also provided that treasurers of political committees which are not principal campaign committees or multicandidate committees shall file reports required by section 304 of the Act with the appropriate principal campaign committee, instead of with the supervisory officer.

Conference substitute

The conference substitute follows the House amendment generally, but includes that provision of the Senate bill permitting monthly reporting in the case of presidential candidates and political committees supporting candidates in more than one State. The maximum number of reports in addition to the final report for the calendar year is increased in the conference substitute from 11 to 12 in order to permit the Commission to require such candidates and committees to file the report due 10 days before the date of the general election even if such candidates and committees are reporting on a monthly basis.

B. REPORTING OF LOANS

Senate bill

Section 204(b)(2) of the Senate bill amended section 304(b)(5) of the Act, relating to the reporting of loans, to provide that information with respect to the guarantors of loans shall be included in reports, as well as information with respect to lenders and endorsers.

House amendment

No provision.

Conference substitute

The conference substitute is the same as the Senate bill.

C. REPORTING OF DEBTS AND OBLIGATIONS

Senate bill

Section 204(c) of the Senate bill amended section 304(b)(12) of the Act, relating to the reporting of debts and obligations, to provide that reports filed with the Commission must include a statement with respect to the circumstances and conditions under which any debt or obligation is extinguished.

House amendment

No provision.

Conference substitute

The conference substitute is the same as the Senate bill. The conferees expect that this reporting requirement will eliminate the practice of reporting the expenditure of the expenditure of the proceeds of a loan as an "expenditure" two times—once when the funds are spent and again when the loan is paid off.

D. REPORTING OF EARMARKED CONTRIBUTIONS

Senate bill

Section 204(d) of the Senate bill added a new paragraph (13) to section 304(b) of the Act. Such paragraph provided that reports filed with the Commission shall contain such information as the Commission may require with respect to earmarked contributions or other special funds.

House amendment

No provision. See section 608(b)(6) of title 18, United States Code, as added by section 101(a) of the House amendment, which required the reporting of earmarked contributions.

Conference substitute

The conference substitute is the same as the House amendment.

E. CONTRIBUTION AND EXPENDITURE INFORMATION

Senate bill

No provision.

House amendment

Section 203(b) of the House amendment amended section 304(b) of the Act, relating to information required to be reported, to provide that, in addition to reporting total receipts and total expenditures, each report must show total receipts less transfers between political committees which support the same candidate and do not support any other candidate and total expenditures less such transfers. In some cases the total receipts and expenditures reported have presented a distorted picture because, under the Act, transfers of funds between committees are counted as contributions and expenditures. This amendment provided that where such transfers occur between single candidate committees supporting the same candidate the report must also show total receipts less such transfers and total expenditures less such transfers.

Conference substitute

The conference substitute is the same as the House amendment.

F. CUMULATIVE REPORTS

Senate bill

Section 204(e) of the Senate bill amended section 304(c) of the Act (1) to eliminate the option of reporting only the amounts of the previous reporting period when there has been no change in the amounts of items since the last report; and (2) to provide that the Commission may require cumulative reports with respect to periods other than the calendar year.

House amendment

No provision.

Conference substitute

The conference substitute omits the provissions of the Senate bill.

G. EXEMPTED TRANSACTIONS

Senate bill

Section 204(f) of the Senate bill amended section 304 of the Act by inserting a new subsection (d). Such subsection provided that Members of the Congress are not required to report as contributions or expenditures certain services furnished before the first day of January of the year before the year during which the term of the Member expires. Such services are (1) those furnished by the Senate Recording Studio; (2) those furnished by the House Recording Studio; (3) those furnished by employees whose pay is disbursed by the Secretary of the Senate or the Clerk of the House of Representatives; and (4) those paid for by the Republican or Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, the Democratic National Congressional Committee, or the National Republican Congressional Committee.

House amendment

No provision.

Conference substitute

The conference substitute is the same as the Senate bill, except that there the Senate bill provided that certain photographic, matting, and recording studio services, if reportable under the Act, were only reportable to the extent utilized in the calendar year before the expiration of a Member's term, the conference substitute provides only for the reporting during that year of recording studio services to the extent that they are reportable under the Act.

CAMPAIGN ADVERTISEMENTS

Senate bill

Sections 204(f) and 205 of the Senate bill amended title III of the Act by striking out section 305, relating to reports by other than political committees, and by inserting the provisions of section 305 as a new section 304(e). Section 205 of the Senate bill amended title III of the Act by inserting a new section 305, relating to requirements relating to campaign advertising.

Section 305(a) of the Act required that persons seeking to publish political advertisements must furnish to the publisher their identification and the identification of any person authorizing the political advertisement.

Section 305(b) required that each published political advertisement contain a statement of the identification of any person authorizing such political advertisement.

Section 305(c) required that publishers maintain records with respect to the publication of political advertisements. Section 304(d) provided that persons selling newspaper or magazine space to candidates may not charge rates which exceed rates for comparable space used for other purposes.

Section 305(e) required political committees to print on all literature and advertisements soliciting contributions a notice with respect to reports of such political committees filed with the Commission. Section 305(f) defined the terms "political advertisement" and "published".

House amendment

No provision.

Conference substitute

The conference substitute, like the Senate bill, continues the provision of existing law prohibiting newspapers or magazines from charging a rate for political advertising which is higher than the rate charged for any comparable use of the newspaper or magazine for other purposes.

Waiver of Reporting Requirements

Senate bill

Section 206 of the Senate bill amended section 306(c) of the Act, relating to waiver of certain reporting requirements, to provide that the Commission may relieve any category of candidates from personally complying with the filing requirements of section 304(a) through section 304(e) of the Act, and that the Commission may relieve any category of political committees from complying with such provisions if such political committees primarily support persons seeking State office and do not operate in more than one State or do not operate on a statewide basis.

House amendment

No provision.

Conference substitute

The conference substitute is the same as the Senate bill.

Determination of Date of Filing

Senate bill

No provision.

House amendment

Section 208 of the Senate bill amended section 308(a)(6) of the Act, relating to duties of the supervisory officer, to provide that it shall be a duty of the Commission to compile and maintain a cumulative index of statements and reports filed with the Commission.

House amendment

The amendment made by section 205(a)(1) of the House amendment, which amended section 308(a)(6) of the Act, was essentially the same as the amendment made by section 208 of the Senate bill, with the following differences: (1) the amendment made by the Senate bill required the index to be published monthly, whereas the amendment made by the House amendment provided for publication at regular intervals; and (2) the amendment made by the Senate bill contained detailed requirements for identification of reports by the name of the candidate or committee, the dates of the reports, and the number of pages in the reports; these requirements were not specifically contained in the amendment made by the House amendment.

Conference substitute

The conference substitute is the same as the House amendment.

B. SPECIAL REPORTS

Senate bill

No provision.

House amendment

Section 205(a)(1) of the House amendment amended section 308(a) of the Act, relating to duties of the supervisory officer, by inserting a new paragraph (7), which required the preparation of special reports listing candidates for whom reports were filed as required by title III of the Act and candidates for whom such reports were not filed as so required.

Conference substitute

The conference substitute is the same as the House amendment.

C. ELIMINATION OF CERTAIN DUTIES

Senate bill

No provision.

House amendment

Section 205(a)(1) of the House amendment amended section 308(a) of the Act in order to eliminate the following duties of the supervisory officer: (1) the duty to compile and maintain a current list of statements relating to each candidate; (2) the duty to prepare and publish an annual report regarding contributions to and expenditures by candidates and political committees; (3) the duty to prepare special reports comparing totals and categories of contributions and expenditures; (4) the duty to prepare such other reports as the supervisory officer may deem appropriate; and (5) the duty to assure wide dissemination of statistics, summaries, and reports prepared under the Act.

Conference substitute

The conference substitute is the same as the House amendment.

D. ANNUAL REPORT FOR 1973

Senate bill

No provision.

House amendment

Section 205(a)(2) of the House amendment provided that the annual report which the supervisory officer is required to file under section 308(a)(7) of the Act (which is eliminated by the amendment made by section 205(a)) shall not be filed with respect to any calendar year beginning after December 31, 1972.

Conference substitute

The conference substitute is the same as the House amendment.

E. REVIEW OF REGULATIONS

Senate bill

No provision.

House amendment

Section 205(b) of the House amendment amended section 308 of the the Act by adding a new subsection (b), which required the supervisory officer, before prescribing any rule or regulation under section 308, to transmit a statement regarding such rule or regulation to the Senate or the House of Representatives, as the case may be. The new subsection (b) provided that such statement shall explain and justify the proposed rule or regulation.

Subsection (b) also provided that if the supervisory officer proposes to prescribe any rule or regulation with respect to candidates for the office of Representative, Delegate, or Resident Commissioner, he shall transmit such statement to the House of Representatives. If the supervisory officer proposes to prescribe any rule or regulation with respect to candidates for the office of Senator, he shall transmit such statement to the Senate. If the supervisory officer proposes to prescribe any rule or regulation with respect to candidates for the office of President, he shall transmit such statement to the Senate and to the House of Representatives.

If either House which receives a statement from the supervisory officer disapproves the proposed rule or regulation within 30 legislative days after it is received, then the supervisory officer may not prescribe such rule or regulation. In the case of a proposed rule or regulation with respect to candidates for the office of President, if only one of the two Houses disapproves the proposed rule or regulation, such disapproval by one House is sufficient to prevent prescription of the rule or regulation.

Subsection (b) also defined the term "legislative days". With respect to statements transmitted to the Senate, such term does not include any calendar day on which the Senate is not in session. With respect to statements transmitted to the House, such term does not include any calendar day on which the House is not in session. With respect to statements transmitted to both Houses, such term does not include any calendar day on which both Houses of the Congress are not in session.

It should be noted that it was the intent of the members of the House committee that the Senate and the House of Representatives, in reviewing proposed rules and regulations under section 308(b) of the Act and under sections 9009(c) and 9039(c) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954, as added by the House amendment, shall strive to achieve uniformity in such rules and regulations.

Conference substitute

The conference substitute is the same as the House amendment.

F. CUSTODIAL RECEIPT OF REPORTS

Senate bill

No provision.

House amendment

Section 205(b) of the House amendment amended section 308 of the Act by inserting a new subsection (c). Such subsection provided that the supervisory officer shall prescribe rules to carry out title III of the Act, including rules to require that (1) reports required to be filed by candidates for the office of Representative, Delegate, or Resident Commissioner, shall be filed with the Clerk of the House of Representatives as custodian for the Board of Supervisory Officers (hereinafter in this statement referred to as the "Board"); (2) reports required to be filed by candidates for the office of Senator shall be filed with the Secretary of the Senate as custodian for the Board; and (3) the Clerk of the House of Representatives and the Secretary of the Senate shall be required to (A) make such reports available for public inspection; and (B) preserve such reports.

Subsection (c) also required the Clerk of the House of Representatives and the Secretary of the Senate to cooperate with the Board in carrying out its duties under the Act.

Conference substitute

The conference substitute is the same as the House amendment.

Section 205(b) of the House amendment amended section 308 of Act by striking out subsection (b), which required the supervisory officer to develop procedures in cooperation with State election officials to permit filing of Federal reports to comply with State requirements.

Conference substitute

The conference substitute is the same as the House amendment.

H. NATIONAL CLEARINGHOUSE

Senate bill

No provision.

House amendment

Section 205(b) of the House amendment amended section 308 of the Act by striking out subsection (c), which required the Comptroller General to serve as a national clearinghouse for information regarding the administration of elections.

Conference substitute

The conference substitute is the same as the Senate bill, which retained the clearinghouse function, but it is vested in the Commission.

Senate bill

House amendment

Section 206(a) of the House amendment amended section 301 of the Act, relating to definitions, to provide that definitions contained in such section applied to title IV of the Act as well as to title III of the Act.

Conference substitute

The conference substitute is the same as the House amendment.

B. ELECTION

Senate bill

Section 202(a)(1) of the Senate bill amended section 301(a) of the Act, relating to the definition of election, in the same manner that section 301(a) of the Senate bill amended section 591(a) of title 18, United States Code, relating to the definition of election. The amendment made by section 202(a)(1) provided that such term does not include the election of delegates to a constitutional convention for proposing amendments to the Constitution of the United States.

House amendment

No provision.

Conference substitute

The conference substitute is the same as the Senate bill.

C. POLITICAL COMMITTEE

Senate bill

Section 202(a)(2) of the Senate bill amended section 301(d) of the Act, relating to the definition of political committee, in the same manner that section 301(b) of the Senate bill amended section 591(d) of title 18, United States Code, relating to the definition of political committee. The amendment made by section 202(a)(2) provided that such term means (1) any committee or other group of persons which receives contributions or makes expenditures during a calendar year exceeding $1,000; (2) any national committee, association, or organization of a political party, any State affiliate or subsidiary of a national political party, and any State committee of a political party, whether or not any such entity receives contributions or makes expenditures during a calendar year exceeding $1,000; and (3) any committee, association, or organization administering a separate segregated fund described in section 610 of title 18, United States Code, relating to contributions or expenditures by national banks, corporations, or labor organizations.

House amendment

Section 206(b) of the House amendment amended section 301(d) of the Act, relating to the definition of political committee, in the same manner that section 102(a) of the House amendment amended section 591(d) of title 18, United States Code, relating to the definition of political committee. This amendment extended the definition of political committee to include any individual, committee, association, or organization which commits any act for the purpose of influencing the outcome of any election for Federal office, except that communications which are excluded from the definition of expenditure under section 301(f)(4), as added by the House amendment, are excluded. Such communications included news stories and editorials distributed through the public media facilities (unless such facilities are owned or controlled by a political party or committee, or by a candidate), communications by a membership organization to its members (unless it is organized primarily for the purpose of influencing an election to Federal office), and any other communication which is not made for the purpose of influencing an election to Federal office.

Conference substitute

The conference substitute follows the provisions of the Senate bill generally. A provision of the House amendment extended the duty to register as a political committee to any person committing any act to influence the outcome of any election. This provision is recast as a new section 308 of the Act, which will require any organization which expends any funds or commits any act directed to the public for the purpose of influencing the outcome of an election, or which publishes or broadcasts to the public material intended to influence public opinion with respect to candidates for Federal office to register with the Commission as a political committee and report the source and amount of its funds and of its expenditures. Since these organizations use their resources for political purposes, often having a direct and substantial effect on the outcome of Federal elections, it would be inappropriate to permit these organizations to conceal the interests they represent solely because the organizations are able to avoid reporting and disclosure under the technical definitions of political committee, contribution, and expenditure. The conference substitute does not apply to individuals acting on their own behalf or to news stories, commentaries, and editorials published in bona fide newspapers, magazines, or other periodical publications.

D. CONTRIBUTION

Senate bill

Section 202(a)(3) through section 202(a)(6) of the Senate bill amended section 301(e) of the Act, relating to the definition of contribution, in the same manner that section 301(c) of the Senate bill amended section 591(e) of title 18, United States Code, relating to the definition of contribution, except that the amendment made by section 202(a)(4) of the Senate bill provided that the term "contribution" shall not include payments made or obligations incurred by a corporation or labor organization which, under 610 of title 18, United States Code, would not constitute a contribution by such corporation or labor organization. The amendments made by section 202(a)(3) through section 202(a)(6) amended section 301(e) in the following ways: (1) to indicate that the term includes assessments, fees, or membership dues, connected with subscriptions; (2) to provide that such term does not apply to any transaction in connection with the election of delegates to a constitutional convention for proposing amendments to the Constitution of the United States: (3) to provide that such term applies to financing the operations of a political committee, and to the payment of any debt or obligation of a candidate or a political committee; (4) to eliminate the applicability of such term to contracts, promises, or agreements to make a contribution; and (5) to clarify that such term includes funds received by a political committee which are transferred to such committee from another political committee.

House amendment

Section 206(c) of the House amendment amended section 301(e)(5) of the Act, relating to an exception to the definition of contribution, in the same manner that section 102(b) of the House amendment amended section 591(e)(5) of title 18, United States Code, relating to an exception to the definition of contributions. Under this amendment, the following activities are not considered contributions: (1) the use of property by an individual who owns or leases such property with respect to the rendering of voluntary services by such individual on his residential premises for candidate-related activities, including the cost of invitations and food and beverages, to the extent that the cumulative value of such use does not exceed $500; (2) the sale of food or beverages by a vendor to a candidate at a reduced charge if such charge is at least equal to the cost of such food or beverage to the vendor, to the extent that such accumulated charges do not exceed $500; (3) the travel expenses of an individual rendering voluntary services to a candidate, to the extent that the cumulative total of such expenses does not exceed $500; and (4) the payment by a State or local committee of a political party of the costs of preparation or distribution of any printed slate card or other printed listing of 3 or more candidates for public office who are candidates in the State in which such committee is located, but this exclusion does not apply to payment of costs for the display of any such printed listing through public media facilities (other than newspapers) or on outdoor advertising facilities such as billboards.

Conference substitute

The conference substitute follows the provisions of the Senate bill generally except that the provisions including membership fees and payments to finance the operations of a political committee or pay the debts of a committee or candidate are omitted and the provisions of the House amendment relating to exceptions from the definition of contribution are included.

E. EXPENDITURE

Senate bill

Section 202(a)(7) of the Senate bill amended section 301(f) of the Act, relating to the definition of expenditure, in the same manner that section 301(d) of the Senate bill amended section 591(f) of title 18, United States Code, relating to the definition of expenditure, with the following differences: (1) the amendment made by section 202(a)(7) of the Senate bill did not exclude loans of money by a national or State bank from the definition of expenditure; and (2) the amendment made by section 202(a)(7) of the Senate bill did exclude from the definition of expenditure payments made or obligations incurred by a corporation or labor organization which, under section 610 of title 18, United States Code, would not constitute an expenditure by such corporation or labor organization. The amendment made by section 202(a)(7) provided that such term means (1) a purchase, loan, or other described payment of money or anything of value made for the purpose of (A) influencing the nomination for election, or election, of any person to Federal office; (B) influencing the result of a Presidential primary election; (C) financing a political committee; or (D) paying any debt or obligation of a candidate or a political committee; and (2) the transfer of funds by a political committee to another political committee.

The amendment made by section 202(a)(7) of the Senate bill provided that the term "expenditure" does not include the value of services rendered by volunteer workers on behalf of a candidate.

House amendment

Section 206(d) of the House amendment amended section 301(f) of the Act, relating to the definition of expenditure, in the same manner that section 102(c) of the House amendment amended section 591(f) of title 18, United States Code, relating to the definition of expenditure, except that the amendment made by this section did not establish an exception for costs incurred by a candidate or political committee with respect to the solicitation of contributions by the candidate or political committee. Under this amendment, the following activities are not considered expenditures: (1) any news story, commentary, or editorial distributed through the facilities of any broadcasting station, newspaper, or periodical publication (unless such facilities are owned or controlled by a political party or committee, or by a candidate); (2) nonpartisan get-out-the-vote activity; (3) communications by a membership organization to its members (unless it is organized primarily for the purpose of influencing an election to Federal office); (4) the use of property by an individual who owns or leases such property with respect to the rendering of voluntary services by such individual on his residential premises for candidate-related activities, including the cost of invitations and food and beverages, to the extent that the cumulative value of such use does not exceed $500; (5) the travel expenses of an individual rendering voluntary services to a candidate, to the extent that the cumulative total of such expenses does not exceed $500; (6) communications which are not made to influence the outcome of elections for Federal office; (7) the payment by a State or local committee of a political party of the costs of preparation or distribution of any printed slate card or other printed listing of 3 or more candidates for public office who are candidates in the State in which such committee is located, but this exclusion does not apply to payment of costs for the display of any such printed listing through public media facilities (other than newspapers) or on outdoor advertising facilities such as billboards; (8) the costs of a candidate (including his principal campaign committee) with respect to his solicitation of contributions, except that this exception does not apply to costs which exceed 25 percent of the expenditure limitation applicable to such candidate under section 608(c) of title 18, as added by the House amendment; and (9) any costs incurred by a multicandidate committee which has been registered under the Act as a political committee for at least 6 months, has received contributions from at least 50 persons, and (except for State political party organizations) has made contributions to at least 5 candidates, in connection with soliciting contributions to itself or to a general political fund controlled by it, but this exclusion does not exempt costs of soliciting contributions through any public media facilities.

Conference substitute

The conference substitute follows the provisions of the Senate bill generally except that it omits payments to finance a political committee or pay debts of a committee or candidate and includes the exemptions of the House amendment with a modification. Although the definition of expenditure contained in section 591 of title 18, United States Code, as amended by this legislation, contains an exception for certain amounts spent solely in connection with fund raising activities, that exception is not contained in the definition of expenditure which relates to reporting and disclosure. Under the conference substitute a candidate or political committee must report all expenditures to the Commission but, to the extent provided in section 591(f) of title 18, United States Code, those expenditures used in raising funds are not counted against expenditure limits contained in that title. Nothing in this provision of the conference substitute is intended to require multicandidate committees to allocate among candidates amounts spent for fund raising activities, or to relieve such committees of reporting the expenditure of such amounts.

F. IDENTIFICATION

Senate bill

Section 202(a)(10) of the Senate bill amended section 301 of the Act, relating to definitions, by inserting a new paragraph (j), relating to the definition of identification. Such term was defined to mean (1)

Section 202(b) of the Senate bill amended section 302(b) of the Act, relating to reports of contributions in excess of $10, and section 302(c) of the Act, relating to detailed accounts, by inserting the term "identification" to clarify the nature of information which must be provided under each such subsection.

Section 204(b)(1) of the Senate bill amended section 304(b)(9) and 304(b)(10) of the Act, relating to reports by political committees and candidates, by inserting the term "identification" to clarify the nature of information which must be provided under each such paragraph. Use of the new term eliminated the requirement that information with respect to occupation and principal place of business must be provided.

The conference substitute is the same as the Senate bill.

Section 206(f) of the House amendment amended section 301 of the Act, relating to definitions, by adding two new paragraphs. The new paragraph (j) defined the term "principal campaign committee" to mean the principal campaign committee designated by a candidate under section 302(f)(1) of the Act, as added by the House amendment.

The new paragraph (k) defined the term "Board" to mean the Board of Supervisory Officers established by section 308(a)(1) of the Act, as added by the House amendment.

Conference substitute

The conference substitute adds to the definitions contained in section 301 of the Act a definition of Commission, which relates to the Federal Election Commission established under the conference substitute, and the definition of principal campaign committee as in the House amendment.

Section 202(b)(3) of the Senate bill amended section 302(c) of the Act, relating to detailed accounts, to provide that if a person's contributions aggregate more than $100, then the treasurer of a political committee receiving such contributions shall furnish an account of the occupation and principal place of business of such person.

FEDERAL ELECTION COMMISSION

A. ESTABLISHMENT; COMPOSITION

Senate bill

Section 207(a) of the Senate bill amended title III of the Act by inserting a new section 308, relating to Federal Election Commission. The new section 308(a)(1) established the Federal Election Commission.

Section 308(a)(2) provided that the Commission shall be composed of 7 members appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Of the 7 members (1) 2 shall be chosen from individuals recommended by the President pro tempore of the Senate, upon recommendation of the majority leader of the Senate and the minority leader of the Senate; and (2) 2 shall be chosen from individuals recommended by the Speaker of the House of Representatives, upon recommendation of the majority leader of the House and the minority leader of the House. The individuals chosen upon recommendation of the President pro tempore shall not be affiliated with the same political party. The same rule shall apply with respect to individuals chosen upon recommendation of the Speaker of the House. Of the 3 remaining members to be appointed by the President, no more than 2 may be affiliated with the same political party. The Comptroller General shall be a member of the Commission, in addition to the 7 other members, but he shall serve without the right to vote.

Members of the Commission, other than the Comptroller General, shall serve for terms of 7 years, except that section 308(a)(3) provided for staggering the terms of the initial members appointed to the Commission. Section 308(a)(4) provided that members shall be appointed on the basis of maturity, experience, and other similar factors, and that members may be reappointed only once.

Section 308(a)(5) provided that an individual appointed to fill a vacancy shall be appointed only for the unexpired term of the member he succeeds. Vacancies shall be filled in the same manner in which the office originally was filled.

Section 308(a)(6) provided that the Commission shall elect a chairman and vice chairman.

Section 308(b) provided that a vacancy shall not impair the exercise of powers of the Commission, and that 4 members shall constitute a quorum. House amendment

Section 207(a) of the House amendment amended title III of the Act by inserting a new section 308, relating to Board of Supervisory Officers.

The new section 308(a)(1) established the Board of Supervisory Officers and provided that the Board shall be composed of (1) the Clerk of the House of Representatives, who shall serve without the right to vote; (2) the Secretary of the Senate, who shall serve without the right to vote; (3) 2 individuals appointed by the President of the Senate, upon recommendation of the majority leader of the Senate and the minority leader of the Senate; and (4) 2 individuals appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives, upon recommendation of the majority leader of the House and the minority leader of the House.

The appointed members were required to be chosen, on the basis of their maturity, experience, integrity, impartiality, and good judgment, from among individuals who are not officers or employees in the executive, legislative, or judicial branch of the Federal Government (including elected and appointed officials). They serve for terms of 4 years, except that one of the members first appointed by the President of the Senate will be appointed for a term of 1 year and one will be appointed for a term of 3 years, and one of the members first appointed by the Speaker of the House will be appointed for a term of 2 years.

Section 308 also provided that the Board shall supervise administration of, seek to obtain compliance with, and formulate overall policy concerning, title I of the Act, title III of the Act, and sections 608, 610, 611, 613, 614, 615, and 616 of title 18, United States Code. Members of the Board shall alternate in serving as chairman. Decisions of the Board shall be made by majority vote and no member of the Board may delegate to any person his vote or any decisionmaking authority or duty. Conference substitute

The conference substitute provides for the establishment of a Federal Election Commission to administer, seek to obtain compliance with, and formulate policy with respect to the Act and certain provisions of chapter 29 of title 18, United States Code, relating to offenses in connection with Federal election campaigns. The Commission is composed of the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House, both of whom serve without additional compensation and without the right to vote, and 6 other members. Of the other members, 2 are appointed by the President pro tempore of the Senate, 2 are appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and 2 are appointed by the President. All 6 are subject to confirmation by both Houses of the Congress. The appointed members serve terms of 6 years each. The terms are staggered so that one member's term expires on April 30 of each year. The 2 members appointed by each appointing officer may not be affiliated with the same political party.

The Commission elects a chairman and vice chairman from among its members for terms of 1 year each on a rotating basis. Members of the Commission must be chosen on the basis of their personal qualifications and no member may be appointed to the Commission who at the time of taking office as such a member is an elected or appointed official of any branch of the United States Government.

The Staff Director, with the approval of the Board, may appoint and fix the pay of additional personnel. At least 30 percent of such personnel shall be selected as follows: (1) one-half recommended by the minority leader of the Senate; and (2) one-half recommended by the minority leader of the House of Representatives. The Staff Director, with the approval of the Board, also may obtain temporary and intermittent services as provided by section 3109(b) of title 5, United States Code.

Section 309(a) of the Act, as added by section 207(a) of the House amendment, provided that the Board shall have the power to (1) formulate general policy regarding the administration of title I of the Act, title III of the Act, and sections 608, 610, 611, 613, 614, 615, and 616 of title 18, United States Code; (2) oversee the development of prescribed forms required under title III of the Act; (3) review rules and regulations prescribed under title I of the Act or title III of the Act, to assure that such rules and regulations are consistent with the appropriate statutory provisions and that such rules and regulations are sufficiently uniform; (4) render advisory opinions under the new section 313 of the Act, as added by section 208 of the House amendment; (5) carry out investigations and hearings, to encourage voluntary compliance with Federal election law provisions, and to report apparent violations to the appropriate law enforcement authorities; (6) administer oaths or affirmations; (7) issue subpenas, signed by the Chairman of the Board, to require the testimony of witnesses and the production of documentary evidence relevant to any investigation or hearing conducted by the Board; and (8) pay the same witness fees and mileage expenses paid by courts of the United States.

Section 309 also provided that appropriate district courts of the United States shall have the power to issue orders enforcing subpenas issued by the Board.

Conference substitute

The conference substitute generally follows the provisions of the House amendment.

Section 308(d) also provided that the Commission may make such further reports and recommendations as may appear desirable.

House amendment

Section 310 of the Act, as added by section 207(a) of the House amendment, provided that the Board shall transmit annual reports to the President and each House of the Congress, which shall describe the activities of the Board and recommend any legislative or other action the Board considers appropriate.

Conference substitute

The conference substitute is the same as the House amendment.

F. INVESTIGATIONS AND HEARINGS

Senate bill

Section 309(d) of the Act, as added by section 207(a) of the Senate bill, provided that the Commission shall be the primary civil and criminal enforcement agency for violation of the provisions of the Act and sections 602, 608, 610, 611, 612, 613, 614, 615, 616, 617, and 618 of title 18, United States Code. Violations of any such provision shall be prosecuted by the Attorney General or personnel of the Department of Justice only after the Commission is consulted and consents to such prosecution.

Section 309(e) of the Act established procedures for the imposition of civil penalties. The Commission shall have the power to assess a civil penalty of not more than $10,000 against any person who violates the Act or section 602, 608, 610, 611, 612, 613, 614, 615, 616, 617, or 618 of title 18, United States Code. Such penalty may be assessed only after the person involved is given an opportunity for a hearing and the Commission has determined, through a decision which incorporates findings of fact, that a violation did occur.

Section 309(e) also provided that, if a person fails to pay a civil penalty, the Commission shall file a petition for enforcement in any appropriate district court of the United States. The district court may determine de novo all questions of law, but the findings of fact made by the Commission shall be conclusive, to the extent they are supported by substantial evidence.

House amendment

Section 207(b)(1) of the House amendment amended section 311(c) of the Act (as so redesignated by section 207(a)(1)), relating to duties of the supervisory officer, by striking out paragraph (1) and inserting a new paragraph (1). The new paragraph (1) provided that if any person who believes a violation of title I of the Act, title III of the Act, or section 608, 610, 611, 613, 614, 615, or 616 of title 18, United States Code, has occurred may file a complaint with the Board. If the Clerk of the House of Representatives, the Secretary of the Senate, or any other person receiving reports and statements as custodian for the Board, has reason to believe that any such violation has occurred, then he shall refer such apparent violation to the Board.

Paragraph (1) also provided that if the Board receives a complaint or referral, or if the Board has reason to believe that any person has committed a violation, then the Board shall notify the person involved and shall either report the apparent violation to the Attorney General of the United States or make an investigation of the apparent violation. If the complainant involved is a candidate for Federal office, then any investigation conducted by the Board shall include an investigation of reports and statements filed by the complainant. The Board may not disclose any notification or investigation unless it receives written permission to do so by the person notified or under investigation. Such person also may request the Board to conduct a hearing regarding the apparent violation.

Paragraph (1) also provided that the Board seek to correct apparent violations through informal methods of conference, conciliation, and persuasion, and that the Board must refer apparent violations to law enforcement authorities if the Board considers it appropriate or if the Board fails to correct the violations.

Paragraph (1) also provided that if the Board concludes, after affording notice and opportunity for a hearing, that a person has committed or is about to commit any violation of title I of the Act, title III of the Act, or section 608, 610, 611, 613, 614, 615, or 616 of title 18, United States Code, then the Attorney General shall bring a civil action for relief, including a permanent or temporary injunction, restraining order, or any other appropriate order.

Conference substitute

The conference substitute generally follows the provisions of the House amendment with two modifications. First, the Commission is given power to bring civil actions in Federal district courts to enforce the provisions of the Act where its informal methods of obtaining compliance fail to correct violations. Second, the Commission is given primary jurisdiction for the enforcement of the provisions of the Act. Thus, any person must exhaust his admistrative remedies with respect to violations under this Act. The primary jurisdiction of the Commission to enforce the provisions of the Act is not intended to interfere in any way with the activities of the Attorney General or Department of Justice personnel in performing their duties under the laws of the United States.

G. REPORT BY ATTORNEY GENERAL

Senate bill

No provision.

House amendment

Section 207(b)(2) of the House amendment amended section 311 of the Act (as so redesignated by section 207(a)(1)), relating to duties of the supervisory officer, by adding a new subsection (d) which required the Attorney General to report to the Board regarding apparent violations referred to the Attorney General by the Board. The reports were required to be made no later than 2 months after referral and on a monthly basis thereafter until there is a final disposition of the apparent violation. The new subsection (d) also provided that the Board may publish reports on the status of referrals made by the Board to the Attorney General.

The conference substitute is the same as the House amendment.

Conference substitute

The conference substitute is the same as the Senate bill.

K. JUDICIAL REVIEW

Senate bill

Section 214 of the Senate bill amended title IV of the Act by inserting a new section 407, relating to judicial review. Section 407 authorized the Commission, the national committee of any political party, and any individual eligible to vote in any election for the office of President to bring any appropriate action in the appropriate district court of the United States to implement or construe any provision of the Act or of chapter 29 of title 18, United States Code. The district court was required to certify all questions of constitutionality to the United States court of appeals for the circuit involved, which was required to hear the matter sitting en banc.

Section 407 also provided that any decision on a matter certified to a circuit court shall be reviewable by appeal directly to the Supreme Court of the United States. Such appeal must be brought within 20 days after the decision of the court of appeals. The court of appeals and the Supreme Court shall advance on the docket and expedite the disposition of any matter certified to the circuit court.

House amendment

The amendment made by section 207(c) of the House amendment was the same as the amendment made by section 214 of the Senate bill, with the following differences: (1) the amendment made by the House amendment was to title III of the Act, inserting a new section 315; and (2) section 315 was made applicable to sections 608, 610, 611, 613, 614, 615, and 616 of title 18, United States Code, and not to chapter 29 of title 18, United States Code.

Conference substitute

The conference substitute generally follows the House amendment and makes it clear that these special judicial review provisions are available only for actions directed at determining the constitutionality of provisions of the Act and of provisions of title 18, United States Code, related to the activities regulated by the Act.

JUDICIAL REVIEW OF AGENCY ACTION

Senate bill

Section 209 of the Senate bill amended title III of the Act by inserting a new section 313, relating to judicial review. Section 313(a) provided that an agency action of the Commission shall be subject to review by the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia upon petition by an interested person.

Section 313(b) provided that the Commission, the national committee of any political party, and individuals eligible to vote in an election for Federal office, may institute such actions as may be appropriate to implement the provisions of the Act. No provision.

Conference substitute

The conference substitute omits the provisions of the Senate bill.

B. CERTAIN USES OF CONTRIBUTIONS

Senate bill

Section 317 of the Act, as added by section 212 of the Senate bill, provided that excess contributions received by a candidate and moneys received by an individual holding Federal office for the purpose of supporting the activities of such individual as a holder of Federal office, may be used by such candidate or individual to defray ordinary and necessary expenses incurred in connection with his duties as a holder of Federal office, or may be contributed by him to any organization described in section 170(c) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954, relating to the definition of charitable contribution, or for any other lawful purpose.

Section 317 also provided that any such contributions, amounts contributed, or expenditures shall be fully disclosed by the candidate or individual holding Federal office, in accordance with rules prescribed by the Commission.

House amendment

No provision.

Conference substitute

The conference substitute is the same as the Senate bill. The provisions of this section do not affect any rule of the Senate or of the House of Representatives limiting the use of funds received as political contributions nor do they have any effect on the Federal tax treatment of any such contributions used by a candidate for personal purposes.

C. SUSPENSION OF USE OF FRANK

Senate bill

Section 318 of the Act, as added by section 212 of the Senate bill, provided that no Senator, Representative, Delegate, or Resident Commissioner may make any mass mailing of a newsletter or mailing with a simplified form of address under the frank during the 60-day period immediately before an election in which he is a candidate.

House amendment

No provision.

Conference substitute

The conference substitute omits the provisions of the Senate bill. It is noted by the conferees that such provisions are similar to provisions in existing law.

D. PROHIBITION OF FRANKED SOLICITATIONS

Senate bill

Section 319 of the Act, as added by section 212 of the Senate bill, provided that no Senator, Representative, Delegate, or Resident Commissioner may make any solicitation of funds by a mailing under the frank.

House amendment

No provision.

Conference substitute

The conference substitute is the same as the Senate bill.

AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS

Senate bill

Section 320 of the Act, as added by section 212 of the Senate bill, authorized to be appropriated to the Commission for the purposes of carrying out its functions under title III of the Act, title V of the Act (as added by the Senate bill), and chapter 29 of title 18, United States Code, not to exceed $5,000,000 for fiscal year 1974, and not to exceed $5,000,000 for each fiscal year thereafter.

Section 321(b) provided that violation of any such provision with knowledge or reason to know that the act committed or omitted is a violation of title III of the Act is punishable by a fine of not more than $100,000, imprisonment for not more than 5 years, or both.

House amendment

No provision.

Conference substitute

The conference substitute omits the provisions of the Senate bill, but like the House amendment retains the penalty contained in existing law.

Advisory Opinions

Senate bill

Section 309(f) of the Act, as added by section 207(a) of the Senate bill, provided that, upon application by any individual holding Federal office, any candidate, or any political committee, the Commission shall provide an advisory opinion, within a reasonable time, with respect to whether a transaction or activity may constitute a violation of any provision of the Act or of title 18, United States Code, over which the Commission has primary jurisdiction.

House amendment

Section 208 of the House amendment amended title III of the Act by inserting a new section 313, relating to advisory opinions. The new section 313 provided for the rendering of advisory opinions by the Board. Section 313 provided that if an individual holding Federal office, a candidate, or a political committee, makes a written request to the Board, then the Board shall render a written advisory opinion regarding whether any activity of the individual, candidate, or political committee would constitute a violation of title I of the Act, title III of the Act, or section 608, 610, 611, 613, 614 615, or 616 of title 18, United States Code.

The new section 313 also provided that if a person acts in good faith in compliance with an advisory opinion rendered at his request, then the person shall be presumed to be in compliance with the statutory provision regarding which the advisory opinion is rendered. Section 313 also provided that any request for an advisory opinion shall be made public by the Board. The Board was required to provide interested parties with an opportunity to furnish written comments to the Board concerning any request before the Board renders an advisory opinion regarding the request.

Conference substitute

The conference substitute is the same as the House amendment, except that it is extended to Commission functions under chapters 95 and 96 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954.

GENERAL PROVISIONS

Effect on State Law

Senate bill

Section 213 of the Senate bill amended section 403 of the Act, relating to effect on State law, to provide that the provisions of the Act preempt any provision of State law with respect to campaigns for election to Federal office.

House amendment

Section 301 of the House amendment amended section 403 of the Act, relating to effect on State law, in essentially the same manner as the amendment made by section 213 of the Senate bill.

Conference substitute

The conference substitute follows the House amendment. It is clear that the Federal law occupies the field with respect to reporting and disclosure of political contributions to and expenditures by Federal candidates and political committees, but does not affect State laws as to the manner of qualifying as a candidate, or the dates and places of elections.

PERIOD OF LIMITATIONS

Senate bill

No provision.

House amendment

Section 406 of the Act, as added by section 302 of the House amendment, provided that no criminal action may be brought against a person for violation of title I of the Act, title III of the Act, or section 608, 610, 611, 613, 614, 615, or 616 of title 18, United States Code, unless such action is brought before the expiration of 3 years after the date of such violation. Under existing law the period of limitations is 5 years.

Section 406 also provided that (1) the new period of limitations shall apply to violations committed before, on, or after the effective date of such section; (2) no person shall be prosecuted, tried, or punished for any violation of title I of the Act, title III of the Act, or section 608, 610, 611, or 613 of title 18, United States Code, as in effect on the day before the effective date of this legislation, if the act or omission constituting such violation does not constitute a violation of any such provision as amended by this legislation; and (3) section 406 shall not affect any proceeding pending in any court of the United States on the effective date of section 406.

Conference substitute

The conference substitute is generally the same as the House amendment, but it provides that no criminal proceedings are to be instituted after December 31, 1974, for violations of the old law which do not constitute violations of the law as amended by the conference substitute.

ENFORCEMENT

Senate bill

No provision.

House amendment

Section 407 of the Act, as added by section 302 of the House amendment, provided that if the Board finds, after notice and opportunity for a hearing on the record, that a candidate failed to file a report required by title III of the Act, then the candidate shall be disqualified from becoming a candidate in any future Federal election for a period beginning on the date of the finding and ending one year after the expiration of the term of the Federal office for which the person was a candidate. Any such finding would be reviewable by the courts under chapter 7 of title 5, United States Code, in the same manner as in the case of any other final agency action under the administrative procedure provisions of title 5 of the United State Code.

It was the intent of the members of the House committee that the enforcement mechanism of section 407 shall not be applied in any case in which the candidate involved demonstrates that he did not receive timely notice from the Board advising him of an approaching filing date regarding reports he is required to file under title III of the Act.

Conference substitute

The conference substitute is the same as the House amendment.

AMENDMENTS TO OTHER LAWS; EFFECTIVE DATES

Political Activities by State and Local Officers and Employees

Senate bill

No provision.

House amendment

Section 401 of the House amendment amended section 1502 of title 5, United States Code (relating to influencing elections; taking part in political campaigns; prohibitions; exceptions) to provide that State and local officers and employees may take an active part in political management and in political campaigns, except that they may not be candidates for elective office.

Conference substitute

The conference substitute is the same as the House amendment.

It is the intent of the conferees that any State law regulating the political activities of State and local officers and employees is not preempted or superseded by the amendments to title 5, United States Code, made by this legislation.

Campaign Communications

A. REPEAL OF CERTAIN PROVISIONS

Senate bill

Section 201(e) of the Senate bill repealed title I of the Act relating to campaign communications.

House amendment

Section 402 of the House amendment amended title I of the Act, relating to campaign communications, by striking out section 104, relating to limitations of expenditures for use of communications media.

Under the amendment made by this section, a candidate is no longer restricted with respect to expenditures for use of communications media. The House amendment, however, established overall limitations on campaign expenditures, but left the candidate free to decide the purpose for which such expenditures will be made. The House committee also noted that, on November 14, 1973, the United States District Court for the District of Columbia decided, in the case of American Civil Liberties Union v. Jennings (366 F. 2d 1041), that the requirement of section 104(b) of the Act that a candidate certify that certain media advertising (newspapers, magazines, and billboards) did not violate the expenditure limitations repealed by this section was an unconstitutional prior restraint upon publication in violation of First Amendment rights.

Conference substitute

The conference substitute is the same as the Senate bill.

B. AVAILABILITY OF BROADCAST FACILITIES

Senate bill

Section 201(a) of the Senate bill amended section 315(a) of the Communications Act of 1934, relating to facilities for candidates for public office, by inserting a new paragraph (2) and paragraph (3).

Paragraph (2) provided that a licensee may meet the equal broadcast time requirements of section 315(a) with respect to a candidate seeking equal broadcast time if (1) the licensee makes available without charge to such candidate at least 5 minutes of broadcast time; (2) the licensee notifies such candidate of the availability of such time at least 15 days before the election involved; and (3) the broadcast will cover, in whole or in part, the geographical area in which such election is held.

Paragraph (3) provided that a candidate could not make use of broadcast time offered to him under paragraph (2) unless he notified the licensee of his acceptance within 48 hours after receipt of the offer.

House amendment

No provision.

Conference substitute

The conference substitute omits the provisions of the Senate bill.

C. CHARGES FOR USE OF FACILITIES

Senate bill

Section 201(b) of the Senate bill amended section 315(b) of the Communications Act of 1934, relating to facilities for candidates for public office, to provide that rules established by section 315(b) governing charges made by broadcasting stations shall apply whether the candidate himself uses the facilities of the station, or such facilities are used by other persons on behalf of the candidate.

House amendment

No provision.

Conference substitute

The conference substitute omits the provisions of the Senate bill.

D. EXPENDITURE CERTIFICATIONS

Senate bill

Section 201(c)(1) of the Senate bill amended section 315(c) of the Communications Act of 1934, relating to facilities for candidates for public office, to provide that the expenditure limitations applicable to such subsection shall be those in effect under section 504 of the Act, as added by the Senate bill, or under section 614 of title 18, United States Code, as added by the Senate bill.

Section 201(c)(2) of the Senate bill amended section 315(d) of such Act to provide that if a State imposes an expenditure limitation with respect to candidates for public office (other than Federal office), then a station licensee may not make a charge for the use of his facilities by or on behalf of any such candidate unless such candidate certifies to such station licensee that payment of the charge will not violate the expenditure limitation established by the State.

House amendment

Section 402(c) of the House amendment amended section 315 of the Communications Act of 1934, relating to facilities for candidates for public office, by striking out subsections (c), (d), and (e). The effect of the amendment was to eliminate the requirement that licensees of broadcasting stations obtain certification from a candidate that his purchase of air time on the station involved does not exceed his expenditure limitations under title I of the Act or under any provision of State law.

Conference substitute

The conference substitute is the same as the House amendment.

E. POLITICAL ADVERTISEMENTS ON RADIO

Senate bill

Section 201(d) of the Senate bill amended section 317 of the Communications Act of 1934, relating to announcement of payment for broadcast, to provide that (1) a political broadcast soliciting funds shall include an announcement (the time for which shall be made available without charge by the licensee) that reports of the candidate involved filed with the Commission are available from the Commission; and (2) station licensees shall maintain records of political advertisements which are broadcast by such licensees.

House amendment

No provision.

Conference substitute

The conference substitute omits the provisions of the Senate bill.

AUTOMATIC TRANSFERS TO CAMPAIGN FUND

Senate bill

No provision.

House amendment

Section 403 of the House amendment amended section 9006(a) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (hereinafter in this statement referred to as the "Code"), relating to establishment of campaign fund, to provide that the Secretary of the Treasury (hereinafter in this statement referred to as the "Secretary") shall automatically transfer to the Presidential Election Campaign Fund, out of amounts in the general fund of the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, an amount equal to amounts designated under section 6096 of the Code, relating to designation of income tax payments to the Presidential Election Campaign Fund.

Conference substitute

The conference substitute is the same as the House amendment.

The conference substitute also provides that there is appropriated to the Presidential Election Campaign Fund all amounts designated by taxpayers for payment under section 6096 of the Code, relating to designation by individuals to the Presidential Election Campaign Fund, before January 1, 1975, to the extent that such amounts are not otherwise taken into account under the provisions of section 9006 of the Code, relating to payments to eligible candidates, as amended by this legislation.

ENTITLEMENT TO PAYMENTS FROM PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION CAMPAIGN FUND

Senate bill

No provision.

House amendment

Section 404 of the House amendment amended section 9004(a)(1) of the Code, relating to entitlement of eligible candidates to payments, to provide that eligible candidates of each major party in a Presidential election shall be entitled to equal payments in an amount not to exceed $20,000,000. The amendment eliminated the formula under which candidates of a major party would receive 15 cents multiplied by the number of residents of the United States who are 18 years of age or older.

Conference substitute

The conference substitute is the same as the House amendment.

DEFINITION OF AUTHORIZED COMMITTEE

Senate bill

No provision.

House amendment

Section 404(c) of the House amendment amended section 9002(1) of the Code, relating to the definition of "authorized committee", to provide that such term means, with respect to candidates for President or Vice President, the political committee designated under section 302(f)(1) of the Act, as added by the House amendment, by the candidate for President as his principal campaign committee. Section 404(c) also contained technical conforming amendments to various sections of the Code made necessary by the change made to the definition of "authorized committee".

Conference substitute

The conference substitute omits the provisions of the House amendment. This omission conforms with the decision of the conferees to permit authorized committees, as well as the principal campaign committee, to make expenditures on behalf of a candidate.

The conference substitute also amends section 9002(3) of the Code, relating to the definition of "Comptroller General", by eliminating such definition and inserting a new definition, relating to the Federal Election Commission established by section 310(a)(1) of the Act, as amended by this legislation. The conference substitute also contains technical conforming amendments to various sections of the Code made necessary by the decision of the conferees to substitute the Commission for the Comptroller General with respect to administration of the Code political financing provisions.

The conference substitute also repeals chapter 96 of the Code, relating to Presidential Election Campaign Fund Advisory Board. It is the opinion of the conferees that the Commission will be in a position to perform those functions which were assigned to such Board under chapter 96.

CERTIFICATION FOR PAYMENT BY COMMISSION

Senate bill

No provision.

House amendment

Section 405 of the House amendment amended section 9005(a) of the Code, relating to initial certifications for eligibility for payments, to provide that, not later than 10 days after candidates of a political party have established their eligibility to receive payments, the Comptroller General shall certify to the Secretary payment in full of the candidates' entitlements. The amendment, together with the amendment made by section 406(a) of the House amendment, eliminated the procedure under which candidates were required to submit records of expenses and proposed expenses in order to obtain certification from the Comptroller General for payments. Section 406(a) of the House amendment amended chapter 95 of subtitle H of the Code, relating to the Presidential election campaign fund, by striking out section 9008, relating to information on proposed expenses.

Conference substitute

The conference substitute is the same as the House amendment, except that the conference substitute eliminates the role of the Comptroller General and substitutes the Commission.

FINANCING OF PRESIDENTIAL NOMINATING CONVENTIONS

Senate bill

No provision.

House amendment

Section 406(a) of the House amendment amended chapter 95 of subtitle H of the Code, relating to the Presidential election campaign fund, by inserting a new section 9008, relating to payments for Presidential nominating conventions.

A. Establishment of accounts.—Section 9008(a) provided that the Secretary shall maintain in the Presidential Election Campaign Fund a separate account for the national committee of a major political party or a minor political party. The Secretary shall deposit in each account each national committee's entitlement under section 9008. These deposits shall be drawn from amounts designated under section 6096 of the Code, relating to designation of income tax payments to the Presidential election campaign fund, and the deposits shall be made before any transfer of funds to the account of any eligible candidate under section 9006(a) of the Code, relating to establishment of campaign fund.

B. Entitlement to payments.—Section 9008(b) provided that the national committee of a major party is entitled to payments not to exceed $2,000,000. The national committee of a minor party is entitled to payments not to exceed an amount which bears the same ratio to the entitlement of the national committee of a major party as the number of votes received by the candidate for President of the minor party in the preceding Presidential election bears to the average number of votes received by candidates for President of the major parties in the election. The national committee of a minor party could use additional private funds in the operation of a Presidential nominating convention, but only to the extent that the total expenditure (counting both public and private funds) does not exceed $2,000,000. A major party electing to receive its $2,000,000 entitlement could not use any additional private funds. The only exception to the $2,000,000 limitation would be an instance in which the Presidential Election Campaign Advisory Board permitted the expenditure of private funds under section 9008(d).

C. Use of funds.—Section 9008(c) provided that no part of payments made under section 9008 may be used to defray expenses of any candidate or delegate participating in any Presidential nominating convention. The payments are to be used only to (1) defray expenses incurred with respect to a Presidential nominating convention (including payment of deposits) by the national committee; or (2) repay loans which were used to defray such expenses.

D. Limitation of expenditures.—Section 9008(d) provided that the national committee of a major party or a minor party may not make expenditures which exceed the amount of the entitlement of the national committee of a major party under section 9008. Notwithstanding this limitation, the national committee of a major party or minor party may make expenditures from private sources in excess of this limitation if such expenditures are authorized by the Presidential Election Campaign Advisory Board. Before making any authorization, such Board shall determine that extraordinary and unforeseen circumstances have made necessary such expenditures to assure effective operation of the Presidential nominating convention. It was the intent of the House committee that such Board shall make authorizations only in cases in which events of a catastrophic nature overwhelmingly imperil the operation of a Presidential nominating convention.

E. Other provisions.—

1. Payments to the national committee of major parties and minor parties under section 9008 may be made beginning on July 1 of the calendar year before the calendar year in which the Presidential nominating convention is held.

2. If, after each national committee has been paid the amount to which it is entitled, there are moneys remaining in national committee accounts, then such moneys shall be transferred to the Presidential Election Campaign Fund.

3. In order to qualify for payments, any major party or minor party may file a statement with the Comptroller General designating the national committee of the party. After the Comptroller General verifies the statement he shall certify to the Secretary payment in full of the entitlement of the national committee. Payments shall be subject to examination and audit, which the Comptroller General shall conduct before the close of the calendar year in which the nominating convention is held.

4. The Comptroller General may require repayments from the national committee of a major party or minor party in the same manner as he may require repayments from candidates under section 9007(b) of the Code, relating to repayments.

F. Conforming amendments.—Section 406(b) of the House amendment amended section 9009(a) of the Code, relating to reports, to require that reports of the Comptroller General include the following information: (1) expenses incurred by the national committee of a major party or minor party with respect to a Presidential nominating convention; (2) amounts certified by the Comptroller General for payment to such national committees; and (3) the amount of repayments required from such national committees, and the reason for any repayments.

Section 406(b) also amended section 9012(a)(1) of the Code, relating to excess campaign expenses, to make it unlawful for the national committee of a major party or minor party to incur convention expenses in excess of the applicable expenditure limitation, unless such expenses are authorized by the Presidential Election Campaign Fund Advisory Board.

Section 406(b) also amended section 9012(c) of the Code relating to unlawful use of payments, to make it unlawful for the national committee of a major party or minor party to use payments for any purpose which is not authorized by section 9008(c), relating to use of funds.

Section 406(b) also amended section 9012(e)(1) of the Code, relating to kickbacks and illegal payments, to make it unlawful for the national committee of a major party or minor party to give or accept any kickback or other illegal payment in connection with any convention expense incurred by such national committee.

Conference substitute

The conference substitute is the same as the House amendment, except for the following changes:

1. The conference substitute eliminates the role of the Comptroller General and the Presidential Election Advisory Board, and substitutes the Commission.

2. The conference substitute provides that the $2,000,000 payments limit and expenditure limit shall be subject to cost-of-living adjustments in the same manner as the expenditure limitations contained in title 18, United States Code, as amended by this legislation.

Participation in the convention financing program of this legislation is optional. The provisions of this legislation do not require the national committee of a major party or a minor party to seek to qualify for payments.

If the national committee of a major party chooses to participate and qualifies for payments, it will be limited to payments aggregating $2,000,000. If such national committee chooses not to participate in the financing program, it still will be subject to the $2,000,000 spending limitation.

If the national committee of a minor party chooses to participate and qualifies for payments, it will be entitled to payments in amounts based on the voting strength of the minor party. If the national committee of a minor party participates in the financing program, it still could use additional private funds in the operation of a Presidential nominating convention, but only to the extent that the total expenditure (counting both public and private funds) does not exceed $2,000,000.

If the national committee of a minor party chooses not to participate in the financing program, it still will be subject to the $2,000,000 spending limitation.

Conference substitute

The conference substitute is the same as the House amendment, with the following changes:

1. The conference substitute defines the term "authorized committee" to mean any political committee authorized in writing by candidates for the office of President or Vice President to make expenditures on behalf of such candidates. The conference substitute requires such authorization to be addressed to the chairman of such political committee, with a copy filed with the Commission. Any withdrawal of such authorization also must be in writing, addressed to the chairman, and filed with the Commission.

This change conforms with the decision of the conferees to permit authorized committees, as well as the principal campaign committee, to make expenditures on behalf of a candidate.

2. The conference substitute omits the definition of "Comptroller General" and inserts a definition of the Federal Election Commission

3. The conference substitute provides that, with respect to political parties which do not nominate their candidates for the office of President by holding national conventions, the end of the matching payment period shall be the earlier of (A) the date such parties nominate their candidate; or (B) the last day of the last nominating convention held by a major party during the calendar year of the general election for the office of President.

House amendment

Section 9033(a) of the Code, as added by section 408(c) of the House amendment, required that a candidate seeking to become eligible for payments shall in writing (1) furnish to the Comptroller General evidence of qualified campaign expenses; (2) agree to keep and furnish to the Comptroller General records, books, and other information; and (3) agree to an audit and examination by the Comptroller General, and agree to make repayments required under section 9038 of the Code, relating to examinations and audits, repayments, as added by the House amendment.

Conference substitute

The conference substitute is the same as the House amendment, except that the conference substitute eliminates the role of the Comptroller General and substitutes the Commission.

E. ENTITLEMENT TO PAYMENTS

Senate bill

Section 503(a) of the Act, relating to entitlement to payments, as added by section 101 of the Senate bill, provided that every eligible candidate is entitled to payments in connection with his primary election campaign in an amount equal to the amount of contributions received by such candidate, except that no contributions in the form of subscriptions, loans, advances, deposits, products, or services, shall be taken into account.

For purposes of section 503(a), the following rules shall apply: (1) in the case of a candidate for nomination for election to the office of President, no contributions in excess of $250 from any person shall be taken into account; and (2) in the case of any other candidate, no contributions in excess of $100 from any person shall be taken into account.

Section 503(b)(1) provided that every eligible candidate nominated by a major party is entitled to receive payments for use in connection with his general election campaign in an amount equal to the amount of expenditures such candidate may make in connection with such campaign under section 504 of the Act, relating to expenditure limitations, as added by the Senate bill.

Section 503(b)(2) provided that every eligible candidate nominated by a minor party is entitled to receive payments for use in connection with his general election campaign in an amount equal to the greater of (1) an amount having the same ratio to the amount of payments to which a major party candidate is entitled as the total number of votes received by the candidate of such minor party in the preceding general election bears to the average number of votes received by major party candidates in such election; or (2) an amount having the same ratio to the amount of payments to which a major party candidate is entitled as the total number of votes received by such eligible candidate (other than votes he received as the candidate of a major party) in the preceding general election bears to the average number of votes received by major party candidates in such election.

Section 503(b)(3) provided that candidates, other than major party or minor party candidates, eligible under section 502(d)(2) of the Act, relating to eligibility for payments, as added by the Senate bill, shall receive payments in amounts determined as follows: if any such candidate received, in the preceding general election for the Federal office involved, 5 percent or more of the total number of votes cast, he is entitled to receive payments for use in his general election campaign in an amount (not in excess of the applicable expenditure limitation under section 504 of the Act, relating to expenditure limitations, as added by the Senate bill) equal to an amount having the same ratio to the amount of payments to which a major party candidate is entitled as the total number of votes received by such eligible candidate in the preceding general election for the Federal office involved bears to the average number of votes received by major party candidates in such election. Section 503(b)(3) also provided that the foregoing formula shall not apply in determining the entitlement of any candidate who was the candidate of a major party or minor party in the preceding general election for the Federal office involved.

Section 503(b)(4) provided that an eligible candidate nominated by a minor party or whose entitlement is determined under section 502(d)(2) of the Act, relating to eligibility for payments, as added by the Senate bill, and who receives at least 5 percent of the total number of votes in the current election, is entitled to payments under section 506 of the Act, relating to payments to eligible candidates, as added by the Senate bill, for expenditures made or incurred in connection with his general election campaign in an amount (not in excess of the applicable expenditure limitation under section 504 of the Act, relating to expenditure limitations, as added by the Senate bill) equal to (1) an amount having the same ratio to the amount of payments to which a major party candidate was or would have been entitled to receive, as the total number of votes received by such eligible candidate in such election bears to the average number of votes received by major party candidates in such election, reduced by (2) any amount paid to such eligible candidate under section 506 before such election.

Section 503(b)(5) provided that, in applying the provisions of section 503 to a candidate for election to the office of President the following rules shall apply: (1) votes cast for electors affiliated with a political party shall be considered as cast for the candidate of such party for the office of President; and (2) votes cast for electors publicly pledged to cast their electoral votes for a candidate shall be considered as cast for such candidate.

Section 503(c) provided that no candidate is entitled to payments in excess of the expenditure limitation applicable to him for the election campaign involved under section 504 of the Act, relating to expenditure limitations, as added by the Senate bill.

House amendment

Section 9034(a) of the Code, as added by section 408(c) of the House amendment, provided that every eligible candidate is entitled to payments in an amount equal to contributions received by the candidate and his authorized committee on or after the beginning of the calendar year before the calendar year of the Presidential election with respect to which the candidate is seeking nomination. Contributions from any one person will qualify for matching only to the extent that such contributions do not aggregate more than $250.

For purposes of section 9033(b) of the Code (relating to expense limitation; declaration of intent; minimum contributions), as added by the House amendment, and section 9034(a), the term "contribution" was defined to mean a gift of money made by a written instrument which identifies the person making the contribution. Such term did not include a subscription, loan, advance, or deposit of money, or anything described in section 9032(4)(B), (C), or (D) of the Code, relating to the definition of contribution, as added by the House amendment.

Section 9034(b) provided that payments under section 9034(a) may not exceed 50 percent of the expenditure limitation for Presidential primaries established by section 608(c)(1)(A) of title 18, United States Code, relating to limitations on contributions and expenditures, as added by the House amendment.

Conference substitute

The conference substitute is the same as the House amendment.

With respect to candidates who elect to receive matching payments, all contributions (including those needed to meet the threshold requirements of $5,000 in each of 20 States) received on or after January 1 of the year preceding the year in which the Presidential election is held will be matched with payments from check-off funds under the financing program. A candidate may not receive matching payments for any contributions not raised on or after January 1 of the year preceding the year in which the Presidential election is held, and such contributions may not be applied by such candidate to meet threshold requirements.

F. LIMITATION ON QUALIFIED CAMPAIGN EXPENSES

Senate bill

No provision.

House amendment

Section 9035 of the Code, as added by section 408(c) of the House amendment, prohibited any candidate from incurring qualified campaign expenses in excess of the expenditure limitation for Presidential primaries established by section 608(c)(1)(A) of title 18, United States Code, relating to limitations on contributions and expenditures, as added by the House amendment.

Conference substitute

The conference substitute is the same as the House amendment.

G. CERTIFICATION PROCEDURES

Senate bill

Section 505 of the Act, as added by section 101 of the Senate bill, provided that the Commission, on the basis of records furnished by each eligible candidate and before an examination and audit conducted by the Commission, shall certify from time to time to the Secretary for payment to each candidate the amount to which such candidate is entitled.

Section 505 also provided that certifications and all determinations made by the Commission under title V of the Act shall be final, except to the extent they are subject to examination and audit by the Commission and to judicial review under section 313 of the Act, as added by the Senate bill.

House amendment

Section 9036(a) of the Code, as added by section 408(c) of the House amendment, provided that, not later than 10 days after a candidate establishes his eligibility for payments, the Comptroller General shall certify to the Secretary payment in full to the candidate of amounts to which he is entitled.

Section 9036(b) provided that such certification and all determinations of the Comptroller General under chapter 97 of the Code are final and conclusive, except to the extent they are subject to examination and audit by the Comptroller General and to judicial review.

Conference substitute

The conference substitute is the same as the House amendment, except that the conference substitute eliminates the role of the Comptroller General and substitutes the Commission.

The conference substitute provides that the Commission shall make such additional certifications as may be necessary to assure that candidates will receive payments for matchable contributions under section 9037 of the Code.

H. PAYMENTS TO ELIGIBLE CANDIDATES

Senate bill

Section 506(a) of the Act, as added by section 101 of the Senate bill, established within the Treasury of the United States a fund to be known as the Federal Election Campaign Fund. Section 506(a) also authorized the appropriation of funds in amounts equal to amounts designated under section 6096 of the Code, relating to designation by individuals of income tax payments to Presidential Election Campaign Fund, not previously taken into account for purposes of section 506 (a), together with such additional funds as may be necessary to carry out title V of the Act.

Section 506(b) provided that the Secretary shall, upon receipt of certification from the Commission, pay the amount certified to the candidate involved.

Section 506(c)(1) provided that, if the Secretary determines that amounts in such Fund are not sufficient to pay entitlements of all candidates, then he shall reduce the amount to which each candidate is entitled by a percentage equal to the percentage obtained by dividing (1) the amount of moneys in such Fund at the time of such determination by (2) the total amount which all eligible candidates are entitled to receive. The Secretary was required to make further reductions if additional candidates become eligible after such determination.

Section 506(c)(2) provided that if, as a result of reductions in the amount of entitlement, a candidate has received payments in excess of his entitlement, then such candidate is liable for repayment to such Fund of the amount of such excess.

Section 506(d) provided that no payment shall be made under title V of the Act to any candidate in connection with any election held before January 1, 1976.

House amendment

Section 9037(a) of the Code, as added by section 408(c) of the House amendment, required the Secretary to establish in the Presidential Election Campaign Fund a separate account to be known as the Presidential Primary Matching Payment Account (hereinafter in this statement referred to as the "matching payment account"). The Secretary was required to deposit into the matching payment account, for use by eligible candidates, amounts available after the Secretary determines that amounts for payments to candidates in the general election for the office of President and amounts for payments to national committees of major parties and minor parties for Presidential nominating conventions, are available for such payments.

Section 9037(b) required the Secretary to transfer certified amounts to candidates during the matching payment period. In making transfers to candidates of the same political party, the Secretary was required to seek an equitable distribution of funds, taking into account the sequence in which certifications are received. Transfers to candidates of the same political party may not exceed 45 percent of the total amount available in the matching payment account, and transfers to any candidate may not exceed 25 percent of the total amount available in the matching payment account.

Conference substitute

The conference substitute is the same as the House amendment, except that the percentage limitations on transfers to candidates and political parties are omitted.

I. EXAMINATION AND AUDITS; REPAYMENTS

Senate bill

Section 507(a) of the Act, as added by section 101 of the Senate bill, required the Commission to conduct an examination and audit of the campaign expenditures of every candidate receiving payments under title V of the Act after each Federal election.

Section 507(b)(1) provided that if the Commission determines that a candidate received payments in excess of his entitlement, then the candidate shall be required to repay the excess amount. Section 507(b)(1) also provided that if the Commission determines that payments made to a candidate were not used to make expenditures in connection with the election campaign of such candidate, such candidate shall be required to pay an amount equal to the unexpended portion of such payments to the Secretary. The Commission, in making such determination, was required to consider amounts received as contributions to have been expended before any amounts received under title V of the Act are expended.

Section 507(b)(2) provided that if the Commission determines that a candidate has used payments for any purpose other than to defray campaign expenses or to repay loans or restore funds which were used to defray campaign expenses, then the candidate shall be required to repay the amount involved.

Section 507(b)(3) provided that no payments shall be required from a candidate under section 507(b) in excess of payments received by such candidate under section 506 of the Act, relating to payments to eligible candidates, as added by the Senate bill.

Section 507(c) provided that the Commission may not make a notification of a required repayment by a candidate with respect to any election campaign more than 18 months after the day of the election involved.

Section 507(d) required the Secretary to deposit repayments received by him under section 507(b) in such Fund.

House amendment

Section 9038 of the Code, as added by section 408(c) of the House amendment, was the same as section 507 of the Act, as added by the Senate bill, with the following differences:

1. The responsibility for administering section 9038 was given to the Comptroller General, and not to the Commission.

2. The Comptroller General was required to conduct examinations and audits at the end of each matching payment period, and not after each Federal election.

3. Section 9038(a) specifically required examinations and audits of the authorized committee of each candidate, together with examinations and audits of each candidate.

4. With respect to the repayment by candidates of unexpended portions of payments, section 9038(b)(3) provided that payments to a candidate from the matching payment account may be retained to pay qualified campaign expenses for a period not exceeding 6 months after the close of the matching payment period. After a candidate has liquidated all obligations, that portion of any balance remaining in his account which bears the same ratio to the total balance as the total amount received from the matching payment account bears to the total of all deposits made into the candidate's account, shall be repaid by the candidate to the matching payment account.

5. Section 9038 did not contain a provision that no payments shall be required from a candidate in excess of payments received by such candidate.

6. Section 9038(c) provided that notifications of required repayments could not be made more than 3 years after the end of the matching payment period involved.

Conference substitute

The conference substitute is the same as the House amendment, except that the conference substitute eliminates the role of the Comptroller General and substitutes the Commission.

J. INFORMATION ON EXPENDITURES

Senate bill

Section 508(a) of the Act, as added by section 101 of the Senate bill, provided that every candidate shall, from time to time, furnish to the Commission a detailed statement of (1) campaign expenditures incurred by him and his authorized committees before the date of the statement; and (2) campaign expenditures which he and his authorized committees propose to incur on or after the date of the statement.

Section 508(b) provided that the Commission shall prepare and make available for public inspection summaries of statements received under section 508(a).

House amendment

No provision. Section 9036(a) of the Code, relating to initial certifications, as added by the House amendment, which required immediate certification of payment in full to candidates of all amounts to which they are entitled, made unnecessary any provision comparable to section 508 of the Act, as added by the Senate bill.

Conference substitute

The conference substitute omits the provisions of the Senate bill.

K. REPORTS TO THE CONGRESS

Senate bill

Section 509(a) of the Act, as added by section 101 of the Senate bill, required the Commission, after the close of each calendar year, to transmit a report to each House of the Congress setting forth (1) campaign expenses of every candidate and authorized committee; (2) the amount of payments certified by the Commission; and (3) the amount of repayments required from every candidate, and the reason for any repayments.

Section 509(b) authorized the Commission to (1) conduct examinations and audits, in addition to examinations and audits required under sections 505 and 507 of the Act, as added by the Senate bill; (2) conduct investigations; and (3) require the keeping and submission of books, records, and information.

House amendment

Section 9039(a) and section 9039(b) of the Code, as added by section 408(c) of the House amendment, were the same as section 509 of the Act, as added by the Senate bill, with the following differences:

1. Section 9039(a) placed the reporting requirements on the Comptroller General, and not on the Commission.
2. Section 9039(a) required reports after each matching payment period, and not at the close of each calendar year.
3. Section 9039(b), in addition to authority granted by section 509(b) of the Act, as added by the Senate bill, gave the Comptroller General authority to prescribe rules and regulations. It should be noted that section 309(a)(8) of the Act, as added by section 207(a) of the Senate bill, gave the Commission general authority to prescribe rules to carry out all provisions of the Act.

Conference substitute

The conference substitute is the same as the House amendment, except that the conference substitute eliminates the role of the Comptroller General and substitutes the Commission.

L. REVIEW OF REGULATIONS

If either committee does not disapprove the proposed rule or regulation no later than 30 legislative days after receipt of the proposed rule or regulation, then the Comptroller General is authorized to prescribe such rule or regulation. Section 9039(c) prohibited the prescription of any rule or regulation which is disapproved by either committee.

Section 9039(c) also provided that the term "legislative days" does not include any calendar day on which both Houses of the Congress are not in session.

Conference substitute

The conference substitute is the same as the House amendment, with the following changes:

1. The conference substitute eliminates the role of the Comptroller General and substitutes the Commission.
2. The conference substitute provides that proposed rules and regulations shall be transmitted to the Senate and to the House of Representatives, instead of to the Committee on Rules and Administration of the Senate and the Committee on House Administration of the House. This change conforms to the amendment to section 308 of the Act made by section 205(b) of the House amendment, which is adopted by the conference substitute.

M. PARTICIPATION IN JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS

Senate bill

Section 510 of the Act, as added by section 101 of the Senate bill, provided that the Commission may initiate civil proceedings in any district court of the United States to seek recovery of amounts determined to be payable to the Secretary under title V of the Act.

Section 9040(b) authorized the Comptroller General to bring actions in the district courts of the United States for recovery of repayments required as a result of examinations and audits conducted by the Comptroller General.

Section 9040(c) authorized the Comptroller General to petition the courts of the United States for injunctive relief to implement the provisions of chapter 97 of the Code, as added by the House amendment.

Section 313(b) provided that the Commission, the national committee of any political party, and individuals eligible to vote in any election for Federal office, may institute such actions as may be appropriate to implement the provisions of the Act. Section 313(c) provided that chapter 7 of title 5, United States Code, relating to judicial review, shall apply to agency action by the Commission.

House amendment

Section 9041(a) of the Code, as added by section 408(c) of the House amendment, provided that any agency action of the Comptroller General under chapter 97 of the Code, as added by the House amendment, is subject to review by the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit upon petition filed no later than 30 days after the agency action involved.

Section 9041(b) provided that chapter 7 of title 5, United States Code, relating to judicial review, shall apply to any agency action by the Comptroller General. The term "agency action" was given the same meaning given it by section 551(13) of title 5, United States Code.

Conference substitute

The conference substitute is the same as the House amendment, except that the conference substitute eliminates the role of the Comptroller General and substitutes the Commission.

O. CRIMINAL PENALTIES

House amendment

Section 9042(a) of the Code, as added by section 408(c) of the House amendment, provided that any person who incurs qualified campaign expenses in excess of the expenditure limitation for Presidential primaries established by section 608(c)(1) of title 18, United States Code, relating to limitations on contributions and expenditures, as added by the House amendment, shall be fined not more than $25,000 or imprisoned not more than 5 years, or both. Section 9042(a) also provided that any officer or member of a political committee who knowingly consents to an expenditure which violates such limitation shall be fined not more than $25,000 or imprisoned not more than 5 years, or both.

Section 9042(b) made it unlawful for any person who receives a payment from the matching payment account, or to whom a portion of such payment is transferred, to use such payment for any purpose other than to defray qualified campaign expenses or to repay loans or restore funds which were used to defray qualified campaign expenses. Any person who violates this provision shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than 5 years, or both.

Section 9042(c) made it unlawful for any person to refuse to furnish information which may be required under chapter 97 of the Code, as added by the House amendment, or to furnish false information. Any person who violates this provision shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than 5 years, or both.

Section 9042(d) made it unlawful for any person to give or accept any kickback or other illegal payment in connection with any qualified campaign expense of a candidate or authorized committee. Any person who violates this provision shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than 5 years, or both. Section 9042(d) also provided that any person who accepts any kickback or other illegal payment shall pay to the Secretary for deposit in the matching payment account an amount equal to 125 percent of the kickback or other illegal payment received.

Except as already noted with respect to State laws regulating political activities of State and local employees, all State and local laws relating to criminal offenses referred to in chapter 29 of title 18, United States Code, and to registration, reporting, and disclosure requirements for Federal elections are preempted and superseded by Federal law immediately upon enactment of this legislation.

So the bill (H.R. 12993) was passed.

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments and request a conference with the House of Representatives thereon, and that the Chair be authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to, and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. MAGNUSON, Mr. PASTORE, Mr. HARTKE, Mr. BAKER, and Mr. STEVENS conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, I want to pay a special tribute to my colleague, Mr. BAKER, who worked with me on this legislation. It was a very difficult task, I must say, because the extremes were quite pronounced.

I want to compliment Mr. Nicholas Zapple and Mr. John Hardy on the Democratic side, the Commerce Committee, and also Mr. Ward White who is the assistant to Mr. BAKER.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island for his remarks, which I will most assuredly reciprocate.

It has been a great pleasure to work with the Senator from Rhode Island on this very difficult and complex subject and with the staff, to whom I have already paid my high respect and regards.

I think we have a good bill and I am pleased it was passed.

HARPERS FERRY NATIONAL MONUMENT

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate a message from the House of Representatives on S. 605.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BARTLETT) laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 605) to amend the act of June 30, 1944, an act to provide for the establishment of the Harpers Ferry National Monument and for other purposes, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert: That the Act of June 30, 1944 (58 Stat. 645; 16 U.S.C. 450 bb), an Act "To provide for the establishment of the Harpers Ferry National Monument", is amended as follows:

(1) In section 1, the first sentence is amended to read: "That, in order to carry out the purposes of this Act, the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to acquire lands or interests in lands, by donation, purchase with donated or appropriated funds, or exchange, within the boundaries as generally depicted on the drawing entitled 'Boundary Map, Harpers Ferry National Historical Park', numbered 385-40,000D and dated April 1974, which shall be on file and available for public inspection in the offices of the National Park Service, Department of the Interior: Provided, That after advising the Committees on Interior and Insular Affairs of the Congress of the United States, in writing, the Secretary may make minor revisions in the boundary, when necessary, by publication of a revised drawing or other boundary description in the Federal Register, but the total acreage shall not exceed two thousand acres: Provided further, That nothing herein shall be deemed to authorize the acquisition, without consent of the owner, of a fee simple interest in lands within the boundaries in which a less than fee interest has previously been acquired by the Secretary of the Interior."

(2) In section 3, delete the word "and" at the end of paragraph (1); change the period at the end of paragraph (2) to a semicolon and add "and"; and add the following new paragraph:

"(3) Provide, directly or by contract, subject to the provisions of the Act of June 7, 1974 (88 Stat. 192; 16 U.S.C. 460 1-6a) an interpretative shuttle transportation service within, between, and among lands acquired for the purpose of this Act for such times and upon such terms as in his judgment will best accomplish the purposes of this Act."

(3) Revise section 4 to read as follows:

"In addition to such sums as have heretofore been appropriated, there are authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this Act, but not more than $1,300,000 for the acquisition of lands and interests in lands, and not more than $8,690,000 for development."

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, S. 605, to expand and develop the Harpers Ferry National Historical Park, as amended by the House, contains two provisions which were not in the version passed by the Senate. The House placed a limit of $8,690,000 on development funds for the Harpers Ferry National Historical Park, which would include historical restoration projects, development needed for the transportation system, expansion of the interpretive design facilities within the park, and extension of the trials system within the area.

In connection with the shuttle transportation system which is contained in both bills, the House makes reference to the act of June 7, 1974, amending the Land and Water Conservation Fund Act, suggesting a method for the disposition of any fees which might be collected in operating such a transportation system.

Mr. President, for the most part, the provisions in the House-passed measure are not substantially different from those in Senate-passed S. 605. In the two respects mentioned previously, the changes are acceptable to the Senate.

This bill, S. 605, which I introduced last year, is urgently needed in order to preserve the characteristics of the Harpers Ferry National Historical Park and to better accommodate the increasing number of tourists who visit the scenic and historic town of Harpers Ferry, located in the eastern panhandle of West Virginia. Three decades ago President Franklin Roosevelt signed the measure I sponsored in the House designating Harpers Ferry as a National Monument.

To have shared, Mr. President, in the 30-year progress of the unique Harpers Ferry Park has been rewarding.

This measure before us today is the culmination of the historic preservation and recreational and educational benefits of the park. The millions of park visitors will share a richer experience because of this measure.

Mr. President, on Monday of last week, I was privileged to join with the Harpers Ferry National Historical Park and the National Capital Parks in paying tribute to the very able chairman of the Parks and Recreation Subcommittee, my friend from Nevada, Senator ALAN BIBLE. His excellent leadership and personal commitment have brought many parks and recreation areas to the people of the United States to enjoy.

The end of this congressional session will mark 15 years during which about 100 areas have been made national parks under the leadership of Senator BIBLE. Senator BIBLE remarked on that enjoyable evening in Harpers Ferry:

> We must create, preserve, and maintain the open space, the heritage of our land, to make this land a better place to live.

The effective ranking minority member of the Subcommittee on Parks and Recreation, Senator CLIFFORD HANSEN, shares Senator BIBLE'S strong commitment in bringing parks to areas of this country which are heavily-populated. I commend Senators BIBLE and HANSEN on their leadership and support of this measure.

I think, also, the members of the Subcommittee on Parks and Recreation and the full Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs and their staffs for valuable assistance and cooperation for the progress of the Harpers Ferry legislation.

The Harpers Ferry Park is a "living park," not only because of the local interpreters dressed in midnineteenth-century-period clothing, who explain the town's heritage and contributions.

For the past two summers, the National Park Service has conducted a day camp for physically and mentally handicapped children. Also the Youth Conservation Corps is a progressive summer program for young men and women. There are many other examples of the social and educational benefits of the Harpers Ferry Park.

This park vividly tells the stories of Harpers Ferry as a center for firearms manufacturing in the mid-1800's and also John Brown's famous raid on the Federal armory.

I strongly feel that the combination of Harpers Ferry's current limited area and park layout with the increasing number of visitors confirms the additional acquisition of land and construction of development facilities such as an interpretive shuttle system, hiking trails, and picnic areas.

The costs of this bill are small in comparison to the long-range benefits and valuable preservation of Harpers Ferry. Harpers Ferry will be the first town to be restored, in large part, as it was in the Civil War period.

Traffic congestion on the narrow streets with cars and buses is not only noisy and distracting, but also dangerous to the safety of visitors. Visitation on peak days exceeds 20,000 people.

I agree with Senators BIBLE and HANSEN that we must continue to bring the parks to where the people are. The Harpers Ferry National Historical Park is within less than a 3-hour drive of 8½ million Americans. Last year 1.2 million people visited Harpers Ferry.

In my judgment, the needed improvements outlined in S. 605 must be brought into being so that Harpers Ferry can preserve its proud past as a basis for its future—to teach Americans about our heritage and also to provide a place that citizens can enjoy for posterity.

The provisions of the House-passed legislation are acceptable to me and Senator ROBERT C. BYRD, my distinguished colleague, who cosponsored S. 605, and to the members of the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

Mr. President, I move that the Senate concur in the House amendment to S. 605.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from West Virginia.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nevada.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I be permitted to yield 30 seconds to the Senator from West Virginia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

TIME LIMITATION AGREEMENT—DEEPWATER PORT ACT OF 1974

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator from Nevada (Mr. CANNON).

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that at such time as the bill (S. 4076), the deepwater ports bill, be laid before the Senate and made the pending business, there be a time limitation thereon of 2 hours to be equally divided between Mr. HOLLINGS and Mr. STEVENS, that there be a time limitation on any committee amendment of 2 hours, that there be a time limitation on any other amendments of 30 minutes, that there be a time limitation on any debatable motion or appeal of 20 minutes, and that the agreement be in the usual form.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The text of the unanimous-consent agreement is as follows:

Ordered, That, during the consideration of S. 4076, the so-called "Deepwater Port Act of 1974," debate on any committee amendment shall be limited to 2 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the mover of such and the manager of the bill; debate on any other amendment shall be limited to 30 minutes, to be equally divided and controlled by the mover of such and the manager of the bill; and debate on any debatable motion or appeal shall be limited to 20 minutes, to be equally divided and controlled by the mover of such and the manager of the bill: Provided, That in the event the manager of the bill is in favor of any such amendment or motion, the time in opposition thereto shall be controlled by the Minority Leader or his designee: Provided further, That no amendment that is not germane to the provisions of the said bill shall be received.

Ordered further, That on the question of the final passage of the said bill, debate shall be limited to 2 hours, to be equally divided and controlled, respectively, by the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. Hollings) and the Senator from Alaska (Mr. Stevens): Provided, That the said Senators, or either of them, may, from the time under their control on the passage of the said bill, allot additional time to any Senator during the consideration of any amendment, debatable motion, or appeal.

FEDERAL ELECTION CAMPAIGN ACT AMENDMENTS OF 1974—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, I submit a report of the committee of conference on S. 3044, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be stated by title.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

> The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 3044) to amend the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971 to provide for public financing of primary and general election campaigns for Federal elective office, and to amend certain other provisions of law relating to the financing and conduct of such campaigns, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses this report, signed by all the conferees.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of the conference report?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the report.

(The conference report is printed in the House proceedings of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of October 7, 1974, at pp. H10034-H10068.)

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Mr. Philip Reberger of Senator HARRY F. BYRD, JR.'s staff and Mr. James Duffy of my staff be permitted to be on the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, the conference report pending before the Senate on the Federal Election Campaign Act Amendments of 1974, S. 3044, represents many months of hearings, executive sessions, floor debate, and Senate and House conferences.

In my opinion this new law will constitute the most significant step ever taken in the area of election reform and one of the most important legislative actions taken by the Congress this year.

The Senate has been moving toward this action for many years and during each Congress since 1960 has been approving progressively stronger and more far reaching bills.

This bill, S. 3044, however, is more comprehensive than any of its predecessors. It provides for strict limits on contributions and expenditures. It provides for a Federal election commission to administer and oversee and even to enforce the various provisions of the act. It provides for the public financing of national conventions and for Presidential primary and general elections. Limitations on contributions are as follows:

Individuals cannot give to any candidate or political committee supporting that candidate more than $1,000 for each election in which the candidate participates, and no individual may give to all candidates and political committees more than $25,000 in any calendar year, and for purposes of that limitation, any contributions given in a year other than the election year shall be considered to have been given during the election year. No political committee, except a principal campaign committee may give more than $5,000 to a candidate or political committee supporting that candidate for each election in which he participates.

A principal campaign committee may contribute to the candidate up to his full spending limit. But, a principal campaign committee is one which has been designated by the candidate, in writing, to be his principal campaign committee and no other committee may be so designated.

Limitations on expenditures are also specifically set forth: A candidate for nomination to the office of President may not spend more in his entire nominating campaign than $10 million. And, he may not spend more in any given State than twice the amount which a candidate for nomination to the Senate may spend in that State. There is an exemption for the cost of fundraising equivalent to 20 percent of the overall spending limitation. In the general election a candidate for election to the office of President may not spend more than $20 million. Again there is a 20-percent exemption for the cost of fundraising.

In Presidential nominating elections, however, as well as in Presidential general elections, public financing is available. In order to become eligible for public financing during the campaign for nomination, a candidate must raise a threshold sum of $100,000. And that sum must be raised in amounts totaling $5,000 in each of 20 States. Only the first $250 of any contribution would be eligible for matching grants from the Government. Once having reached the threshold, the candidate would qualify to receive an equal amount from the Government and, thereafter, would be able to qualify for additional grants for eligible contributions received. The maximum Federal money to which a candidate would or could become eligible to receive for the nominating process would be 50 percent of the spending limit if a sufficient amount of money were designated for the dollar checkoff fund.

In the general election campaign a candidate of a major party could receive public funding up to the full $20 million limit, if there is sufficient money in the fund. If not, then the candidate would receive a reduced amount and would be allowed to solicit private contributions to make up the difference. For both nominating elections and general elections for the office of President, there would be a 20-percent exemption for the cost of fundraising only to the extent that private contributions are needed to reach threshold amounts or other qualifying amount or the difference in the general election between what is available and the spending limitation, assuming that the dollar checkoff fund might not be adequate.

A candidate for nomination or for election to the House of Representatives, except for Representative at Large, could spend $70,000 for the primary and another $70,000 for the general election. He could also spend up to 20 percent of that limit in each election for the costs of fundraising.

A candidate for nomination to the Senate or for Representative at Large could spend up to the greater of 8 cents times the voting age population of the geographic area—the State—or $100,000. And for the general election could spend the greater of 12 cents times the voting age population or $150,000. And, the 20 percent exemption for the cost of fundraising would also apply to each of those campaigns.

In order to preserve the role of the party committees the act allows the national committee of a political party to spend 2 cents times the voting age population of the United States for its candidate for election in the general election only, and 2 cents times the voting age population of a State for candidates for general election to the office of Senator or Representative at Large or $20,000, whichever is greater. Also, the national committee may spend the greater of 2 cents times the voting age population of the congressional district or $10,000 for each candidate for the House.

State committees of a political party, including all branches or subsidiaries, may spend up to 2 cents per voting age population in any given State or $20,000 for Senator or Representative at Large, whichever is greater, and 2 cents times the voting age population of the congressional district, in the case of those representatives who run in States having more than one representative, or $10,000, whichever is greater.

No person may make an independent expenditure advocating the election or defeat of a clearly identified candidate in excess of $1,000 other than those committees or agents authorized by the candidate.

Candidates must have principal campaign committee responsible for the control of receipts and expenditures and for the reports of those finances. Candidates must also designate campaign depositories where receipts and expenditures shall be accounted for.

A most important feature of the bill creates a Federal election commission having primary civil authority for violations of the act. The commission would be comprised of eight members. Two would be appointed by the Senate, two would be appointed by the House, and two would be appointed by the President. All six of these would be subject to confirmation by the Senate and the House. Not more than one of those appointed by the Senate, House, or the President would be of the same political party.

The remaining members would be the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives, but they would serve without a vote.

The commission would have the power to examine all records, conduct investigations, and issue subpenas. It could go to court to obtain injunctive relief, declartory judgments and expedient review of constitutional issues.

The commission also would have the power to attempt to resolve matters by internal administrative procedures after which further remedy could be sought in the courts.

However, the Department of Justice would not be deprived of any of its power to initiate civil or criminal actions in response to referrals by the commission or complaints from other sources. These constitute the major provisions of the act as agreed upon by the Senate and House. There are many other lesser but still important provisions all of which were discussed by both bodies of the Congress and the conferees believe that the measure as reported by the conference to each House is well designed to eliminate the practices so prevalent during the 1972 campaigns and substitute new restrictive provisions covering all facets of Federal campaigns in such a manner as to renew public confidence in the Federal Government and in the elective process.

The act would become effective on January 1, 1975, but the preemption of State law which might be in conflict with the act would take place immediately upon passage, and public finances would not become available as payments to eligible candidates before January 1, 1976.

Mr. President, there are a great number of provisions in this that will require the attention of candidates for Federal office, their committee treasurers, and agents. The intent is to preserve the integrity of the elective process by applying strict controls over the flow of money in political campaigns. I believe that this bill will serve to clear the political atmosphere and will benefit candidates by setting reasonable ceilings on contributions and expenditures.

Mr. President, I urge my colleagues in the Senate to give their approval to this very important election reform legislation.

Mr. HUGH SCOTT. Will the distinguished chairman yield?

Mr. CANNON. I am delighted to yield to my colleague.

Mr. HUGH SCOTT. I thank the chairman of the committee who has done such a magnificent job in shepherding this bill through the conference. It has been a long and hard road. I think we have achieved a reasonably good bill. We have had to make concessions that we did not want to make. I think the Members of the other body felt the same way. I am personally delighted that my own original amendment to provide for an independent Federal Election Commission has been included as part of this bill. The regret I have principally is that we did not extend Federal financing on a matching basis to congressional elections as proposed by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. KENNEDY) and myself. However, we will give the Presidential financing through matching funds a good try in the 1976 election.

I would like to pay tribute to all of the conferees: for the majority, besides the chairman, Senator PELL, Senator PASTORE, Senator LONG, Senator KENNEDY, Senator ALLEN, and Senator CLARK; and to the conferees for the minority: Senator BENNETT, Senator GRIFFIN, Senator STEVENS, and Senator MATHIAS.

I would like to ask a question as to the amount presently available, if the distinguished Senator has it, in the checkoff fund for Presidential elections where the voter can check $1 or if it is a joint return he and his wife can check off $2 to be used for this purpose.

Mr. CANNON. As of July 1 of this year, the amount was roughly $29.5 million. Of course, we would have two more taxpaying periods that would be up before the financing provision would become effective.

Mr. HUGH SCOTT. What projection do we have as to what can reasonably be anticipated as available in the 1976 election?

Mr. CANNON. I do not think we can really make a very accurate projection, but the best guesstimate that we have is roughly $75 million.

Mr. HUGH SCOTT. I thank the Senator.

I have been asked by one Senator to raise a question as regards publication of books as distinguished from magazine articles. There is a limitation here on honoraria of $1,000. I believe there is an exception that does permit Members of Congress to publish books and to receive compensation for that purpose. Is that correct?

Mr. CANNON. The intent is that the publishing of a book does not constitute an honorarium under the language used in the bill. The bill would cover magazine articles and speaking engagements, this sort of thing.

Mr. HUGH SCOTT. I also had a question as to speaking engagements. I think we ought to make some legislative history here, because we have imposed pretty severe restrictions on this matter in an effort to indicate that there is some sacrifice expected by those who enact the laws as well as others.

If a Member of Congress makes a speech before any sort of group or organization, he is restricted to the honorarium of $1,000, plus legitimate expenses. Is that correct?

Mr. CANNON. That is correct, $1,000 per occasion, plus the transportation expenses, accommodations, and meals.

Mr. HUGH SCOTT. I think it is public knowledge that heretofore honoraria have often been in the amounts of $2,000 or $3,000. I simply point that out.

If a Member of Congress makes two speeches on the same trip at different times, scheduled, programed, and published speeches, for example, to the same organization or to different organizations on the same trip, may those legitimately be considered as separate honoraria?

Mr. CANNON. If they were separate occasions, separate speaking engagements, there would be no reason to consider them other than separate engagements and the $1,000 limit would apply to each one.

I suppose if a person had gone on a particular trip where he had transportation expenses incurred, however, they would have to be prorated between the two.

Mr. HUGH SCOTT. As far as this particular Senator can recall, I do not believe I have even gone on a speechmaking tour of two, three, four, or five speeches. But I do think it is fair and proper that we should make that clear. I do not think we want to leave anything unrevealed. We do not want to mislead anybody.

I think that does clarify the concerns that have been expressed to me on that point.

I think the reporting functions of this bill have been simplified, and yet they are intended to be very tight as to requiring disclosures of all candidates, whether incumbents or not. Is that not correct?

Mr. CANNON. The Senator is correct. The details under the old law have proven to be quite onerous in that they were more than were really required.

We have tried to simplify that. Yet, the reporting is such that the public will have the full information available if they desire.

One of the ways in which we guarded that was by providing that a person can have only one principal campaign committee and that all the reports from subsidiary committees must come through that principal campaign committee, so that you have a funneling there of all the reports into one place.

Mr. HUGH SCOTT. This is designed to correct any past abuses or the potentiality of abuses.

Mr. CANNON. The Senator is correct.

Mr. HUGH SCOTT. As to the Republican and Democratic National Committees, or the national committees of the major parties, there is a provision for an allocation from the checkoff, if the funds are available, of $2 million to each political party for its quadrennial national convention. Is that correct?

Mr. CANNON. The Senator is correct. That also came out of the abuses in the past, where many charges have been made with respect to the raising of funds and the holding of conventions.

Mr. HUGH SCOTT. I want to make that clear, because there was a good deal of objection to that provision on the part of members of my party, some of them connected with the activities of the national committee and convention groups. I think it is a wise provision. It eliminates the necessity of these convention programs and $25,000 contributions from corporations, and so forth.

So I have to go against what was the view of a number of members of my own party in that regard. I think it is a very good provision.

I thank the distinguished Senator from Nevada.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CANNON. I yield.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I, too, congratulate the Senator from Nevada on the fine job he has done in chairing the Senate conferees. As contrasted with many conferences, he had a varied team of horses from several different committees, and he did a marvelous job in keeping them all driving toward the same goal.

I believe it would be valuable if both the basic purpose and the limits of section 308 of title III of the Federal Election Campaign Act, as amended, were stated for the RECORD in some detail.

Mr. CANNON. I say to my colleague that the thrust of this provision is to require organizations that communicate with the general public through advertisements, direct mailings, et cetera, in order to influence an election or to set forth a candidate's position on any public issue, his voting record, or other official acts, for the purpose of electing or defeating that candidate, to report as if that organization were a political committee.

But this section does not reach an organization that limits itself to activities along the following lines: issuing communications directed to its members, making its position known to members of the press and to public officials, or participating in conferences and meetings and other discussions devoted to public issues. In other words, section 308 will cover organizations that use their funds to propagandize the general public but does not restrict internal communications or restrict the flow of news or the discussion of public issues.

Mr. PELL. I thank the Senator.

Mr. CANNON. I thank my colleague for his kind remarks about my work.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Mr. Parker be permitted the privilege of the floor during the consideration of this matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, first, I commend the chairman of the Committee on Rules and Administration, the chairman of the Senate conferees, the distinguished Senator from Nevada (Mr. CANNON), for his explanation and his successful effort in bringing this matter back to the Senate. I also commend him for the way in which the conference was handled. He was, as always, extremely considerate of the different viewpoints that were held by the conferees. As someone who is extremely interested in this legislation, I appreciated very much the honor of being appointed a member of the conference. As one who is not a member of the Rules Committee but who had been interested in this issue, it was through the support of the distinguished Senator from Nevada that I was included, and for that I am extremely grateful.

Mr. President, it is with mixed feelings that I support the conference report on S. 3044, the Federal Election Campaign Act Amendments of 1974.

There are many eminently worthwhile provisions in this bill. Public financing for Presidential primaries is a genuine breakthrough for decent government in the post-Watergate era, as are the strict limitations set for private campaign contributions and expenditures, and the effective new Federal Election Commission established to oversee and enforce the law.

But there is also a glaring deficiency in the bill—its failure to adopt for Senate and House races the same important and basic reform it adopts for Presidential races—public financing of elections.

Abuses of campaign spending and private campaign financing do not stop at the other end of Pennsylvania Avenue. They dominate congressional elections as well. If the abuses are the same for the Presidency and Congress, the reform should also be the same. If public financing is good enough for Presidential elections, it should also be good enough for Senate and House elections, too.

The people understand the simple logic of that lesson, but the conference bill ignores it. Instead, it adopts a double standard for reform—public financing for Presidential elections, but only a patched-up version of private financing for congressional elections.

As a result, in plain view of the nation, Congress is now adopting a blatant "holier than Watergate" attitude to election reform, in spite of the common knowledge that the need for public financing is probably greater for congressional elections than it is for Presidential elections.

It is no secret that the Senate conferees, in a real bipartisan effort, worked hard to obtain a compromise acceptable to the House, a compromise that would establish at least a beachhead for public financing of congressional elections.

On every other provision in the bill, the conferees were able to hammer out a reasonable agreement on the various conflicting provisions of the bill. But on the overriding issue of public financing, the opposition of the House conferees was total and unyielding. Day after day, session after session, the Senate conferees sought progressively weaker compromises, until finally only token public financing for congressional elections was requested by the Senate.

But even this minimal compromise was refused.

In the end, to get a bill at all that the President would be obliged to sign or veto before election day, it was necessary for the Senate conferees to abandon public financing altogether for congressional elections, Reluctantly, we did so.

I like to think that, because we yielded on public financing, the Senate conferees fared better on two other very important issues in the bill—the spending limits for Senate and House races, and the enforcement powers of the new Federal Election Commission.

On the spending limits, the figures in the House bill were so low that, inevitably, the bill was widely stigmatized as an "Incumbents Protection Act." Left unchanged, it might well have prevented any challenger from making any effective race against any Senate or House incumbent.

But on this point, the House accepted a generous compromise that includes the best features from each bill. In essence, the compromise adopts the basic limits of the Senate bill for Senate races—12 cents a voter in general elections and 8 cents a voter in primaries—and it raises the limit for House races from $60,000 in the House bill to a compromise level of $70,000. In addition, a number of other significant provisions are added that affect the spending limit:

An extra 20 percent in spending is made available to offset fund-raising costs.

An extra 2 cents a voter in Senate races—or $10,000 in House races—may be spent by the national committee and also by the State committee of the candidate's party.

A cost of living escalator is included that will probably mean an extra 10 percent boost in spending for the 1976 elections, to offset the inflation likely to occur in 1975.

And, a so-called "meat and potatoes" exemption from the spending limit is also provided, allowing any individual to spend up to $500 per election for invitations, food and beverages for campaign functions at his residence. Any candidate worth his salt should be able to parlay that provision into the equivalent of $5,000 to $10,000 of additional spending for each election.

As a result of these various provisions, the spending levels in the conference bill are entirely adequate. I regard the bill as no longer vulnerable to the "incumbent's protection" label.

On the enforcement issue, the Senate obtained a significant compromise, in which a genuinely independent oversight agency, a new Federal Election Commission, will be established, with substantial civil enforcement powers of its own. This compromise ends one of the most serious loopholes in the existing election laws, the lax enforcement mechanism we have endured so long.

These two areas—the spending limits and the enforcement provisions—represent important victories for the Senate conferees. And they are not the only important provisions of the bill.

Therefore, in spite of our defeat on public financing, I give my support to the final action of the conferees, and I urge the Senate to approve the conference report.

Before closing though, I would like to return once more to the central issue of public financing.

Let there be no illusions about the half-a-loaf approach the conference bill applies to Senate and House elections. To those who say go slow, that limits on spending and private contributions are enough for now, that all we need is full reporting and disclosure, I reply that sunlight is too weak a disinfectant, that we should not be satisfied with timid steps today, when experience proves that bolder ones are clearly needed.

Already, before the ink is dry on the conferees' agreement, let alone before the bill is presented to the President for his signature, we read that big contributors and special interest groups have honed in on the contribution limits, searching for new loopholes and new ways to avoid the law.

I do not doubt they will succeed. To name but one provision, the $5,000 contribution limit for gifts to a candidate by broad-based political committees is an invitation to abuse. From one direction, special interest groups are likely to proliferate into smaller committees, to enable themselves to make multiple $5,000 contributions. From the other direction, individuals and narrow-based political committees—now limited to $1,000 contributions per candidate—are likely to take on new sources of contributions to their own warchests and new candidate beneficiaries in order to qualify for the $5,000 gifts allowed to be made by broad-based committees.

Undoubtedly, all the other restrictive provisions in the bill will receive similar microscopic scrutiny, and other "adjustments" will be made accordingly.

That is the history of the Federal election laws—the evaders are forever a step ahead of the enforcers, because the reformers are forever closing last year's loopholes. Nothing we do in this bill on congressional elections breaks that age-old cycle of corruption chasing reform chasing corruption.

The only effective way I see to break this insidious cycle is to adopt public financing for Congress, as we do today for the President.

Most, and probably all, of the things that are wrong with Congress have their roots in the way we finance campaigns for the Senate and the House. We get what we pay for. As a result, as Mark Twain liked to say, we have the best Congress that money can buy. And in this case, the "best" is obviously not good enough, if we believe in government responsive to all the people, not just the special interest groups.

For years, going back in some cases over many decades, on issue after issue of absolutely vital importance to the country, national policy has been made by Congress under the shadow of a mammoth dollar sign—a sign that is the symbol of the enormous private campaign contributions that are flooding Federal elections and corrupting American politics.

Who really owns America? Who owns Congress? Is it the people, or is it a little group of big campaign contributors and private interest groups? Take six examples that are obviously current today:

Does anyone doubt the connection between America's energy crisis and the campaign contributions of the oil industry?

Does anyone doubt the connection between America's reluctance to enforce effective price restraint and the campaign contributions of the Nation's richest corporations?

Does anyone doubt the connection between America's failure to enact decent tax reform and the campaign contributions by private interest groups who benefit from the endless loopholes in present law?

Does anyone doubt the connection between America's health crisis and the campaign contributions of the American Medical Association and the private health insurance industry?

Does anyone doubt the connection between the transportation crisis and the campaign contributions of the highway lobby?

Does anyone doubt the connection between the demoralization of the foreign service and the sale of ambassadorships for private campaign contributions?

These areas are only the beginning of the list. The problem is especially urgent and pervasive today, because of the soaring costs of running for Senator or Representative. But corruption or the appearance of corruption in campaign financing is not a new phenomenon. I would venture that for at least a generation, a few major pieces of legislation have moved through the House or Senate that do not bear the brand of large campaign contributions with an interest in the outcome.

Watergate did not cause the problem, but it offers the last clear chance to solve it. Through public financing, we can guarantee that the political influence of any citizen is measured only by his voice and vote, not by the thickness of his pocketbook.

A caveat is in order here. Public financing is not a panacea for America's every social ill. It is not a cure for corruption in public life. It is not a guarantee that those who enter public service will be any wiser in solving America's current problems.

What it does guarantee is that legislative decisions will be taken by Congress in the future by men and women beholden only to the public as a whole, free of the appearance of special influence and corruption that have done so much in recent years to bring all government to its present low estate.

Make no mistake. Those special interests will keep on corrupting decent government until we finally act.

Even now, the special interest groups are waiting in the wings. In this year of 1974, their campaign war chests are the fattest in their history—tens of millions of dollars of special interest money waiting to be spent, to buy the votes they want in Congress.

They can live with this arrangement. As the conference results make clear, Congress is also prepared to live with this arrangement—for now.

Sadly, the only ones who cannot live with this arrangement are the ones who should not have to—the ordinary people of this country, the 200 million American citizens who have a right to a Congress that represents them too, a Congress that speaks for the public interest, not just the private interest groups.

And so, this conference report turns out to be just a midway station on the climb to real reform. With this bill, we thought we would reach the top, but it turns out we were wrong. And so, as we regroup our forces, we recognize that our effort must go on in the new Congress that convenes next January.

This issue is not settled, as some would hope, until after the 1976 elections. January 1975 will bring a new Congress, and I shall do my best to insure that public financing of elections is one of our top priorities. We did not lose by much this time. Next year, we shall return, and let us hope the answer will be different.

One final word. There are many who deserve great credit for the substantial progress we have made so far in advancing the issue of public financing to its present stage. The history is worth recounting, because the issue is hardly new to the Senate. In fact, this is the 8th year in which public financing of elections has been a live issue for the Senate.

It was in 1966 that the concept of public financing was first enacted into law. Thanks to the brilliant leadership of Senator RUSSELL LONG, the father of public financing, the dollar checkoff for Presidential general elections was signed into law that year.

The year 1967 saw the act delayed and shelved, caught in the crossfire of the emerging passions of the 1968 Presidential campaign. But, in the aftermath of that defeat, the Senate Finance Committee, again under the remarkable leadership of Senator LONG, recommended a broad new version of the dollar checkoff, applicable not only to Presidential general elections, but to Senate general elections as well. No further action was taken on the Finance Committee report in that Congress, but the seed for public financing of congressional elections was clearly planted.

The year 1971 saw the 1966 act revived and again signed into law, under the leadership of Senator LONG and Senator MIKE MANSFIELD and Senator JOHN PASTORE. But, caught again in partisan crossfire, the decision was made in the Senate-House conference to defer the act past the 1972 elections, and the starting date was set at 1976. The "ifs" of history are fickle, but few would deny that there might have been no Watergate, if the decision had been made to allow public financing for the 1972 election.

Today's bill is yet another milestone on the road to full public financing of all Federal elections. In the aftermath of Watergate, it was clear that the present Congress would be an election reform Congress; the bill today is the result of our 2-year effort.

And the effort in this Congress has been genuinely bipartisan. Senator HART, MONDALE, STEVENSON, CRANSTON CLARK, PELL, and I were joined by Senators HUGH SCOTT, MATHIAS, SCHWEIKER and STAFFORD in introducing various forms of public financing legislation in this Congress and in working to keep the issue in the forefront of debate throughout both sessions.

Last November, as an amendment to the Debt Ceiling Act, we were initially successful in obtaining the approval of the Senate for public financing of Presidential primaries and congressional general elections, only to lose that victory to a Senate filibuster in the closing days of the session.

This year, under the able, leadership of Senator HOWARD CANNON, chairman of the Senate Rules Committee, the progress was even more significant. S. 3044, Senator CANNON's landmark Rules Committee bill, was approved by the Senate essentially intact. It boxed the public financing compass. It provided public financing, not only for Presidential primaries and Senate and House general elections, but also for Senate and House primaries. Most significant of all, the Senate actually broke a filibuster to get the bill to conference.

Thus, in repeated votes after full debate and committee hearings over the past 9 years, the Senate has gone on record again and again in favor of the principle of public financing for elections; specifically, in the past 2 years, it has gone on record again and again in favor of public financing for congressional elections.

By contrast, the present bill marks the first time the House has had full committee hearings and full floor debate on the issue of public financing.

So there is progress after all. The issue is still advancing, as we slowly begin to overcome the widespread reflex that asking Congressmen to accept public financing for their own elections is like asking them to walk the plank. If we did not persuade the House this time, I am confident that final victory will ultimately be achieved, and I am hopeful that "ultimately" means the next time around.

To Senator HOWARD CANNON of Nevada, I give special praise. As chairman of the Rules Committee, he skillfully guided the hearings that shaped this legislation. With equal skill, he successfully steered the bill through the Senate floor debate. Above all, in conference with the House, he led the Senate conferees with great ability and wisdom, negotiating effectively with the House where compromise was possible, and defending the cause of public financing for congressional elections until the cause was finally and clearly lost.

Senator CANNON's leadership in the conference was all the more impressive because he saw this conference through, while simultaneously shouldering the Rules Committee's enormous current responsibility in the Rockefeller confirmation hearings. Senator CANNON has done a brilliant job; he has demonstrated once again the reason for the high regard in which the Senate holds him.

In addition, I give special praise to Senator HUGH SCOTT of Pennsylvania. Without his strong cosponsorship, his distinguished leadership, and his vigorous support for public financing at every step of the debate in the present Congress, this vital election reform would probably not have succeeded in the Senate or fared as well in the House. Senator SCOTT's active and continuing participation was in the highest tradition of the bipartisan Senate at its best. He has ably performed this sort of valuable service on many other issues in the past. The fine record he has compiled over many years in other areas, especially on election reform and on civil rights, is a tribute to his wise and effective leadership. Pennsylvania has an outstanding Senator, the Senate has an outstanding minority leader, and the country is in his debt.

I also give great praise to Common Cause, the people's lobby. For the first time—at least in my service in the Senate, and perhaps for the first time in the history of Congress—a powerful and truly effective representative of the public interest has emerged to speak for the ordinary citizen in the halls of Congress. Now, on campaign financing and many other issues, there is a real countervailing force against the narrow special interest groups that have held unchallenged sway for so long. Things are changing now in Congress, and Common Cause deserves the credit. I hope they keep the pressure on.

Finally, I praise WAYNE HAYS, the chairman of the House Administration Committee and the chairman of the House conferees. In his opposition to public financing, I think he fairly reflected the position of the House of Representatives as a whole. If he was immoveable in his opposition to public financing, he was also generous in the give-and-take on all the other issues in the conference. He was an able advocate and chairman on every aspect of the bill, and I respect his great ability. The measure we approved in conference is a good bill with many good provisions, and he deserves great credit for his effort.

Mr. CLARK. Will the Senator from Nevada yield?

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, if I have the floor, I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I, too, wish to take this opportunity to express appreciation to a number of people who played important roles in the passage of this landmark legislation.

Chairman HOWARD CANNON of the Rules Committee, as leader of the Senate conferees, did a superb job of advocating the Senate bill. As the junior member of the conference committee, I am deeply grateful for the fairness that characterized his conduct of the proceedings. I particularly want to thank him for allowing me to serve on the conference, even though not a member of the Rules Committee.

Senator KENNEDY skillfully and relentlessly led the fight for congressional public financing. And while we lost this battle, I know he will be among those leading the fight in the next Congress.

This conference report could not have been pulled together without the tireless efforts of our staff, especially Jim Duffy of the Privileges and Elections Subcommittee, Lloyd Ator of the Legislative Counsel's office, and Carey Parker of Senator KENNEDY's staff.

In addition, a number of organizations provided valuable support and information, including the Center for Public Financing of Elections and especially Common Cause, whose representatives played a leading role in strengthening this legislation, as Senator KENNEDY has said.

Mr. President, it has been nearly 2½ years since five men were apprehended for breaking into the headquarters of the Democratic National Committee. That incident, and the events that followed, not only forced the first resignation of an American President—they also aroused an unparalleled outcry for overhauling the conduct and financing of American political campaigns.

The conference report on S. 3044, which we bring to the floor today, represents the major congressional response to that demand for reform. It is an historic piece of legislation—it insures that large private contributions will never again dominate Presidential politics, and that future Presidents will be free from dependence on, and obligation to, wealthy individuals and special interest groups.

Unfortunately, because of the intransigence of the other body, the legislation fails to encompass the one provision which could have cleaned up House and Senate campaigns as well—public financing of congressional elections. Our failure to take this opportunity to extend public financing to all Federal elections is a tragic shortcoming, one that will have to be corrected at the earliest possible occasion.

As I stated initially, however, there are still many positive aspects of this legislation. Building on the foundation laid by Senator RUSSELL LONG, this bill extends public financing of Presidential campaigns to cover nominating conventions and primary elections. The major political parties each will receive $2 million to operate their conventions in 1976. Candidates in the Presidential primaries, after demonstrating a broad base of support, will be able to receive Federal payments matching contributions of $250 or less. These candidates will be limited to spending $10 million in the primaries, and $20 million in the general election.

Funding for the public financing provisions will come from the dollar checkoff on Federal tax returns, and will be automatically appropriated to meet the needs of the program.

Another major accomplishment of S. 3044 is the establishment of an independent, bipartisan Federal Election Commission. This Commission, composed of appointees of the President and the congressional leadership, and confirmed by both Houses of Congress, will have broad administrative and supervisory powers. Of special significance is the Commission's civil enforcement authority, which will help insure that correction of election law violations will not depend entirely on action by a Department of Justice that has traditionally ignored such abuses.

The major changes in the conduct of congressional elections will come from the imposition of limitations on contributions and expenditures. In all Federal elections, individuals would be limited to contributions of $1,000 per candidate in each election. The so-called multicandidate committees would be restricted to contributions of $5,000. The bill also includes strict ceilings on the expenditures that can be made by or on behalf of each candidate's campaign.

These limits will help guard against some of the more flagrant abuses we have seen in the past few years. But, in and of themselves, the limitations will do little to correct the two most serious problems in elections for Congress: the tremendous influence and impact of special interest dollars and the almost complete domination of incumbent officeholders.

Let us face it—$5,000 is still a big chunk of money in most congressional campaigns, with limited applied separately for primaries, runoffs, and general elections, special interest contributions can easily climb as high as $10,000 or even $15,000. Recently, we have seen story after story in the press detailing the huge campaign coffers that these special interest groups have accumulated. With the contribution limits in this bill, there will be little change in their ability to dominate the field where congressional campaign finance is concerned.

Tightening the group contribution limit will not solve the problem—that would only serve to dry up campaign funds entirely, and guarantee incumbents a free ride. The only real solution is to replace these private funds with public financing.

The last few years have seen Members of Congress returned to office 95 percent of the time or more. The reason is simple—challengers have not been able to raise enough funds to be competitive. Incumbency domination has continued in this year's primaries. As reported on NBC News last night, of the 391 House Members in primaries, only 8 were defeated in their reelection bids. As John Chancellor put it, being a Congressman "is not only a good job, it is a job with great job security."

The expenditure limitations in S. 3044 will not solve this problem at all. In fact, by restricting what candidates can spend, the bill may well eliminate some of the effective challenges we have seen recently.

Again, the only real solution lies in guaranteeing that each serious candidate will have the funds necessary to take his case to the public—again, through public financing of elections.

As you know, the Senate version of this bill contained provisions for congressional public financing, but in the conference committee, the House was adamant—we were faced with a choice of this bill, with no public financing for Congress, or no bill at all. What we have been forced to do, in effect, is settle for a double standard in the conduct of Federal elections—public financing for the President but business as usual for ourselves.

The many important provisions of this legislation qualify S. 3044 as a major step on the road to free and open Federal elections. But further steps will be necessary, and soon. I certainly shall introduce legislation at the beginning of the next Congress to extend the excellent public financing program in S. 3044 to cover congressional elections as well.

Mr. President, will the Senator from Nevada yield for one question?

Mr. CANNON. I am delighted to yield for a question.

Mr. CLARK. This bill would impose a $5,000 limit for each election on contributions that a multicandidate political committee could make on behalf of one Federal candidate. Was it the intent of the conferees that the general administrative expenses of legitimate multicandidate committees are exempt from such limitation, so long as these expenditures are not made on behalf of a clearly identifiable Federal candidate?

Mr. CANNON. Yes. Those expenses incurred on behalf of a clearly identified candidate should be attributed to that candidate, obviously. Of course, expenses merely to defray the cost of operation, rent, equipment, clerical salaries, et cetera, should not be counted against the candidates to whom the contributions are given.

In other words, if the candidate cannot be clearly identified—this relates to the multicandidate committees to which the Senator referred—the expenses of the committees to defray the costs of their operation, their rent, their equipment, and their clerical salaries would not be charged against the candidate to whom the contributions are finally given. I do not see that there is any way one could allocate them.

Mr. CLARK. I thank the Senator.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, before I begin my remarks, I would like to ask if the distinguished Senator from Nevada would answer two or three questions that occur to me with respect to the conference report.

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator from Alabama understands that the bill would provide no subsidies to candidates except from funds going into the checkoff fund; is that correct?

Mr. CANNON. The Senator is correct. The public financing provision would go only to the extent that funds were in the pot, so to speak, from the checkoff provision under the income tax laws at the present time.

Mr. ALLEN. Then the first priority would be the Presidential election; is that correct?

Mr. CANNON. The Senator is correct. The first priority would be the Presidential election.

Mr. ALLEN. If there is not enough to go around.

Mr. CANNON. That is correct.

Mr. ALLEN. Then what would follow?

Mr. CANNON. The allocation, then, from that point on, would go to the primary elections and to the national committees on a prorata basis, because that is the lowest priority, and that is in the process of selecting the candidates for the general election.

Mr. ALLEN. And there would be no priority as between conventions and candidates? Would the convention come ahead of the candidates, the $2 million subsidies to each convention?

Mr. CANNON. I think the intent, as we have drawn it here and developed it, was that the conventions would come ahead of the primaries. The general election would come first, to the extent of the moneys available. If more than that is available, then the conventions would come next, and then, if there is more money available, the primaries would come next.

So, in the proration, the low end of the totem pole, so to speak, would be the primaries.

Mr. ALLEN. As I understand it, in the presidential primaries, the contributions, the amounts of which can be matched, must have been made in the year next preceding the year of the convention and the election; is that correct?

Mr. CANNON. That was the intent, that the matching period would be the year preceding the convention and the election for purposes of determining it.

Mr. ALLEN. Of course, taking in the election year as well.

Mr. CANNON. That is correct.

Mr. ALLEN. Then, of course, as to expenditures they are limited as well as are the contributions.

Mr. CANNON. The Senator is correct.

Mr. ALLEN. At what point do the expenditures become limited? Would they become limited as of the year next preceding the election year? In other words, looking forward to the next election, would the expenditures limit start on January 1, 1975?

Mr. CANNON. Yes. The effective date of the act for purposes of expenditures and for the purpose of contributions with the matching provisions of the contributions is January 1, 1975.

Now, the Senator went a little beyond that to speak in general terms as to when the effective date would be with respect to contributions on expenditures. That would be governed by the definition provisions under the act as to when he becomes a candidate. A person might become a candidate within the year prior to the election.

On the other hand, it is conceivable that a person might really become a candidate for Presidential office within 2 years prior to the election. So we would have to look at the definition of the candidate.

The term "candidate" means an individual who seeks nomination for election to the President of the United States. For purposes of this paragraph an individual shall be considered to seek nomination for election if he (a) takes the action necessary under the law of a State to qualify him for nomination for election.

Under that provision in all of the States that would fall in the year prior to the election.

(b) receives contributions—

Mr. ALLEN. No, that would be the year of the election, would it not, the primary?

Mr. CANNON. Excuse me, during the same year prior to the election.

Mr. ALLEN. Yes.

Mr. CANNON (continuing):

(b) receives contributions or incurs qualified campaign expenses; or (c) gives his consent for any other person to receive contributions or to incur qualified expenses on his behalf.

These conditions could exist longer than the immediate year prior to the election in the case of a Presidential campaign.

Mr. ALLEN. Yes, but he would have to be a declared candidate, would he not?

Mr. CANNON. He would have to either solicit contributions for that purpose or have made expenditures for that purpose or have declared that he was a candidate.

Mr. ALLEN. He would have to be an avowed candidate.

Mr. CANNON. Absolutely.

Mr. ALLEN. Yes.

Until that time, or until January 1 of the year preceding the election, the expenditures would not be charged against the total authorized expenditures.

Mr. CANNON. Well, if he had made expenditures for the purpose of seeking a nomination, if he had gone out and spent money for the purpose of getting the nomination as President, then it would go back to that time, except it would not go back beyond January 1, 1975, because that is the effective date of the act.

Mr. ALLEN. So then the expenditures prior to January 1, 1975, would not count.

Mr. CANNON. Those expenditures would not count.

Mr. ALLEN. I see. Very well.

I commend the distinguished Senator from Nevada, the chairman of the Rules Committee for his patience and his hard work with respect to this bill (S. 3044) and I commend him also for his hard work with respect to S. 372 which passed the Senate July 30 of last year and which had reform provisions similar to the reform provisions in this bill but did not have the public financing feature.

This bill, of course, had the House been so inclined, could have been used as the vehicle for the reform package, leaving out or adding to that bill the public financing feature. But that bill, passed long before S. 3044, expressed the will of the Senate at that time as to reform without taxpayer financing; is that not correct?

Mr. CANNON. The Senator is absolutely correct. S. 372 did go a long way down the road toward campaign reform but had no public financing features in it.

Mr. ALLEN. And during the course of consideration of that bill I believe the public financing was offered as an amendment here on the floor and was defeated. I believe that is correct, is it not?

Mr. CANNON. That is my recollection that it was.

Mr. ALLEN. That is correct. The Senator's recollection is correct on that point.

Now, Mr. President, I address my remarks to the conference report on S. 3044—and my remarks will not be overly lengthy, I might say to anyone who might be interested—the conference report on S. 3044, the public financing of elections bill, which is before the Senate and will unquestionably be approved, and probably be approved this afternoon, possibly not before recess for the President's address.

Due to a strong conviction on my part that taxpayer financing of elections is not in the public interest, I could not, in good conscience, sign the report even though I was a member of the conference on the part of the Senate. And yet the report, composing the differences between the Senate and House versions of the bill, contains much that is good, much that I support, and much that was shaped or influenced by positions that I have advocated—and other Senators on the floor have advocated—on and off the Senate floor and in committee.

There is no stronger advocate of campaign reform than I, for it is a fallacy to feel that anyone who opposes a raid on the Treasury to support political campaigns must be against campaign reform.

Public financing of elections re-forms the campaign laws, it does not reform them. True reform comes from strict limitations of the total amount of permissible campaign contributions and expenditures, full disclosure of all contributions and expenditures, limitation of the size of contributions, limitation on amount of cash contributions and expenditures; and an independent election commission—and which was, of course, the Senate's position—and many other similar reforms in the private sector.

Throughout the time that election reform bills have been before the Senate, the record will show that I have steadfastly supported all of these principles and have afforded leadership in advocacy for them. I have invariably supported the lowest proposed figure, whether it was for an overall limit on contributions or expenditures, or limit on size of contributions or amount of cash contribution or expenditure permitted. And when disclosure provisions were considered, I have always stood for the strictest possible disclosure rule.

But to use the terms "public financing" and "campaign reform" interchangeably or as synonyms is erroneous.

So the conference report is really divided into two parts—the public financing part and the campaign reform part.

I would prefer that there could be two separate votes on these issues. I would vote for campaign reform and against public financing. But that is not to be, and I must vote for or against the report. There can be no division of the question.

But why do I oppose requiring the taxpayers to pay the cost of elections? Debates as reported in the record are full of reasons that I have assigned.

First, public financing of elections is a raid on the taxpayers' pocketbooks for the benefit of politicians. Subsidizing the candidates with funds from the Treasury only adds to the escalating costs of elections when we should be limiting and reducing election costs.

Second, much of the volunteer spirit of citizen participation in elections will be lost where the public treasury is required to pay the cost; and it deprives the citizens of first amendment rights in depriving them of freedom of expression implicit in the right to contribute to the candidate or candidates of their choice.

Third, it forces a person to contribute to a candidate whose views might be violently opposed to the views of the taxpayer. This objection cannot be met by the contention that only checkoff funds are being used, for these funds belong to all taxpayers and not just to those who participated in the checkoff.

Fourth, Presidential primaries already are spectacle enough without the Federal Treasury adding from $5 to $7½ million more to each candidate's funds.

I have been told that there are some 6, 8, or 10 candidates for the Presidency right here in this Chamber, not here on this floor at this time, but they are Members of this body. I have been told there are some 6, 8, or 10 Members of the Senate who will be candidates for the Presidency.

This bill, of course, would make them a present provided they get enough popular support to get in excess of $5 million, up to as much as $6 or $7½ million, which, if true, each of the candidates from this Senate or from the House, over $5 million for their campaign chest.

Now, the time approaches for the movement of the Senate over to the House Chamber, and I would ask unanimous consent that I might yield the floor at this time, in order that the majority leader may address the motion to the Chair, with the understanding that I retain the right to the floor when we come back.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, with the proviso that the distinguished Senator from Alabama retains the floor, I shall make the following unanimous consent request.

JOINT SESSION OF THE TWO HOUSES—ADDRESS BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate stand in recess for the purpose of proceeding in a body to the Hall of the House of Representatives to hear an address by the President of the United States to a joint session of Congress.

Immediately after that address has been concluded the Senate will once again resume its deliberations and, the Senate concurring, the distinguished Senator from Alabama will have the floor at that time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senate will now stand in recess subject to the call of the Chair, for the purpose of attending a joint session with the House of Representatives to hear the address by the President of the United States.

At 3:42 p.m., the Senate took a recess subject to the call of the Chair.

Thereupon, the Senate, preceded by the Secretary of the Senate, Francis R. Valeo; the Sergeant at Arms, William H. Wannall; and the President pro tempore of the Senate (Mr. JAMES O. EASTLAND), proceeded to the Hall of the House of Representatives to hear the address by the President of the United States, Gerald R. Ford.

(The address delivered by the President of the United States to the joint session of the two Houses of Congress appears in the proceedings of the House of Representatives in today's RECORD.)

At 4:57 p.m., on the expiration of the recess, the Senate, having returned to its Chamber, reassembled, and was called to order by the Presiding Officer (Mr. BARTLETT in the chair).

QUORUM CALL

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The second assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alabama yield to me without losing his right to the floor?

Mr. ALLEN. I yield.

IMPLEMENTATION OF THE PRESIDENT'S RECOMMENDATIONS

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I would suggest that in line with the President's request this afternoon the Senate give consideration to the possibility of taking up on tomorrow, after the deepwater ports bill is disposed of, Calendar No. 1164, S. 3979, a bill to increase the availability of reasonably priced mortgage credit for home purchases.

The bill was offered by Messrs. CRANSTON and BROOKE, who were specifically singled out by the President. I believe the President indicated that he would like to have this legislation passed before the Senate recesses on Friday next, possibly.

It is my further understanding that action has been withheld on the Cranston-Brooke proposal until the President had sent up or made his recommendations. I would assume that, in part at least, he has made his recommendations this afternoon. I assure him that the joint leadership and the Senate stand ready to implement what he has said. Hopefully, if any additional information is needed from the White House, it will be forthcoming forthwith, so that we can give consideration to S. 3979, as the President specifically requested this afternoon.

I thank the distinguished Senator from Alabama for yielding to me for this purpose.

Mr. ALLEN. I am delighted to yield.

FEDERAL ELECTION CAMPAIGN ACT AMENDMENTS OF 1974—CONFERENCE REPORT

The Senate continued with the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 3044) to provide for public financing of primary and general election campaigns for Federal elective office, and to amend certain other provisions of law relating to the financing and conduct of such campaigns.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I was discussing the reason why I opposed the conference report. I was discussing the item of the financial subsidy not only for the Presidential general election, to the candidates for President of the respective parties, but also to finance the literally dozens of candidates who will seek the nomination of the major parties as well as the minor parties, to some extent.

Mr. President, this bill would provide a subsidy of between $5 million and $6 million—up to that amount—for each candidate for Presidential nomination. Literally dozens of them will be encouraged by the subsidies provided by this bill, as well as any hope of obtaining the nomination.

It has been pointed out that it is reputed that there are some 6, 8, 10, or 12 Members of Congress who will seek the Presidency, or will seek the Presidential nomination, and they will be able to receive $5 million or more each, provided they get the necessary contributions from the public generally. But far from cutting down on the spectacle of these Presidential preference primaries, this would escalate the cost by $5 million or $6 million for each candidate and would run up into astronomical terms.

In addition, it would provide $2 million each—this is something the Senate did not even think of in providing subsidies—for major parties to hold a convention. I suppose some of the conventions are worth $2 million to the public, as a show or as a spectacle. But I hate to see the taxpayer called on to pay $2 million to each party so that it can meet and hold nominating conventions. That is what this conference report would do. That is a new idea by the House, agreed to by the Senate conferees.

Mr. President, let us examine the record to see whether positions which I and many other Senators of similar views have advocated on and off the Senate floor have had an influence, with an assist from the House, in shaping the final provisions of the bill as set forth in the conference report, both on the true campaign reform and even on the public financing.

To do so it is necessary to go back to August 5, 1971, when the present campaign law—Public Law 92-225—was under consideration in the Senate as S. 372. That bill—that is, the present law—sought only to limit expenditures for media advertising, pretty skimpy proposals—TV, radio, newspapers, billboards—but placed no limit—and the present law does not— on the 101 other necessary expenditures in a campaign, expenditures for which are not covered under the present law and for which the sky is the limit: Brochures, handbills, printing, WATS lines, telephones, postage, stationery, automobiles, trucks, telegrams, campaign headquarters—State and various local ones, unlimited campaign workers, airplane rentals and tickets, buses, trains—special and regular, campaign newspapers—distinguished from the media—movie theatre film advertisements, campaign staffs, public relations firms, production expenses for broadcasts, public opinion polls, paid campaigners and poll watchers, novelties, bumper stickers, sample ballots, and many others that I did not think of. Those were not covered under the present law. Those were not covered when S. 372 was before the Senate.

It was quite obvious to me that this limitation was far from adequate and that there should be a limitation on total expenditures for all purposes. So, on that date I offered amendment No. 306, the purpose of which was to place a limitation on the total amount that could be spent by a candidate for any and all purposes. The amendment failed of passage by a vote of 31 to 60, but for the first time action had been taken on the Senate floor that would have put an effective limit on all expenditures by a candidate in an election. Embraced in the report now is the concept of limiting all expenditures, as provided in my amendment, and not limiting media advertising only. Mr. President, the concept of the amendment that was offered back in 1971 is now carried forward in the conference report, limiting the total expenditures for all purposes and not just media advertising, as the limit is now.

Next came the passage in the Senate on July 30, 1973, by a vote of 82 to 8, of S 372, which I supported in committee and on the floor. It had most of these desirable campaign reforms in it, but it did not have campaign financing. It did not have public financing. During the course of the consideration of this bill on the Senate floor, a public financing amendment was defeated. So just a little over a year ago, the Senate was voting down public financing. Mr. President, I voted for, and supported in committee and on the floor of the Senate, S. 372, which did provide true campaign reform.

Let us continue examining areas where the position of reform minded opponents of public campaign financing was upheld.

That is the category in which I put myself and those who opposed public financing. We are reform-minded opponents of public campaign financing. So let us continue examining to see where the position of reform-minded opponents of public campaign financing was upheld in the conference or where their efforts influenced the final shape of the bill.

By a vote of 39 yeas to 51 nays, the Senate rejected the Allen amendment—this is while S. 3044 was pending in the Senate—to strike the provisions for public financing of congressional elections. So the reform-minded opponents of public financing did win out.

The position of the 39 Senate opponents of congressional elections financing is now supported by the conference report in the final conference with regard to House and Senate financing and subsidizing of the campaigns of Members of the House and Senate.

I offered an amendment limiting contributions in Presidential contests to $250 and $100 in congressional contests. Of course, there is practically no limit now to the amount of contributions that can be made. There is a limit on the amount that can be contributed through one committee, but we are familiar with the practice, although the Senator from Alabama has never used it, of having multiple committees, with $5,000 payments made by each of those committees. In that way, hundreds of thousands of dollars can be contributed by one person, because the present law does not provide an effective limit on that.

Therefore, during the course of consideration of S. 3044, I offered that amendment.

The theory of that $250 in Presidential races, $100 in congressional races, would always be matched anyhow, so why authorize more? That amendment was voted down here on the Senate floor, that effort by those of us who oppose public financing but favor campaign reform to lower the amount of the permissible contributions. When that failed, I offered another amendment, thinking that surely this would satisfy the public financing supporters, which placed the figures and when this was defeated, I offered an amendment placing the figures at $2,000 for Presidential contests and $1,000 for Senate and House contests, but this also was defeated, and the Senate passed a $3,000 per election figure. However, the conference set the figure at $1,000 contribution per person per election, which is more in line with the views of the reform minded opponents of public financing.

Mr. President, those of us who have sought campaign reform and have opposed just turning the bill over to the taxpayer have had some little success in shaping the campaign reform aspects of the legislation that is now before us.

It is interesting to note that when the distinguished senior Senator from Tennessee (Mr. BAKER) offered his amendment to require candidates to disclose the size and source of all contributions and to provide that no contributions could be accepted after 10 days before the election, the reform-minded opponents of public financing supported this fine amendment that would have provided for disclosure.

By and large, whenever an opponent of public financing of taxpayer-subsidized financing, is found, one finds a person who advocates true campaign reform: cutting down the amount of authorized expenditures, cutting down on the amount of the permissible contribution, providing for more disclosure. This amendment of the distinguished Senator from Tennessee (Mr. BAKER) provided that a candidate had to disclose the size and source of all contributions and that he could not accept any contributions after 10 days before the election. During that period, he could not accept contributions.

It seems to me to be a fine disclosure provision, offered by an opponent of taxpayer-financed and subsidized elections, but a strong advocate of campaign reform.

Mr. President, while this bill S. 3044 was pending, I offered an amendment providing that no Member of the House or Senate could charge or receive any honorarium for speeches, appearances, or writings. The Senate defeated that amendment. They did not want any limitation on honoraria, the supporters of public financing, taxpayer-subsidized financing. They wanted the sky to be the limit, apparently, for contributions. So that was defeated, here, in the Senate.

However, the House grabbed hold of that idea, and provided that the honorarium limitation be $1,000 per appearance or writing or speech, with a total of $10,000 permissible. Well, the conference report comes here with $1,000 for each appearance or writing or speech, and a $15,000 limit. At any rate, there is some limit to it, rather than the sky being the limit, as at present. That is another area in which the reform-minded opponents of public financing did make their influence felt in the final conference report.

Mr. President, here, on the Senate floor, in a rare burst of economy for the taxpayer, the Senate adopted an amendment that I offered reducing by 20 percent the amount which might be spent by each candidate—that is a 20-percent reduction. It was cut from 10 cents per person of voting age to 8 cents in primaries and from 15 cents to 12 cents per person of voting age as the amount that could be spent in a primary or a general election.

Let me hasten to add that the conference provided very well to nullify that fine step toward economy, that would have saved the taxpayers millions of dollars, by allowing as an exemption from this limit 20 percent of permissible expenditures, to be used for fundraising only. The effect of that amendment is to limit the figure to a candidate for the nomination of one of the major parties for the Presidency. The limit is $10 million in the primary for each candidate, half of which can be public. They topped that off with the cream of allowing $2 million, that is not counted, to be added to that for the expense of raising money.

Mr. CANNON. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. That is not quite correct. The amount of 20 percent for fund raising purposes would be limited only to the private contribution part.

Mr. ALLEN. It would be $1 million.

Mr. CANNON. Yes, sir; $1 million would be the limit.

Mr. ALLEN. Very well. I stand corrected on that.

Instead of adding $2 million to the pot, it would add $1 million, on the theory that the $5 million coming from the government, from the taxpayers, does not have any expense. That is a reasonable provision.

The fact remains that it did add 10 percent overall, 20 percent—on the amount of the individual contributions. So it raised the amount that a candidate for the nomination for the Presidency could spend to $11 million; $5 million of which would be paid by the taxpayers.

Another amendment that the Senator from Alabama offered which remains in the conference report is this: The way the Senate bill was drafted, before a candidate for nomination for the Presidency of one of the major parties could get any matching funds, he would have to receive $250,000 in contributions of $250 or less, but he could get them all from one State. There was no prohibition against that; a popular candidate from New York, Pennsylvania, or Illinois could raise the $250,000 from one State and get all of his funds, including that $250,000 and all other contributions up to the permissible limit, matched by the taxpayers.

It did not seem right to allow that, so I offered an amendment that provided that such a candidate for the nomination would have to get at least $5,000 in matchable funds from each of 20 States, to assure that the candidate would have a nationwide following, since otherwise it would be fairly difficult, in each of 20 States, to get contributions of $5,000 in each from contributors of $250 or less.

The amendment was accepted by the manager of the bill, the Senator from Nevada (Mr. CANNON), and it is a good provision, as I believe all will concede, and would assure that the candidates would have substantial nationwide support.

Another major defect that I pointed out in the Senate debate was that there was no time set prior to which contributions to Presidential nomination candidates would be ineligible for matching. In other words, contributions now or a year ago would be eligible for matching contributions, and next year a person could set his sights on running in 1980, and be receiving contributions now for matching in 1980. There was practically no limit on how far back you could go in getting contributions, making the Government subsidy that much easier to obtain.

That was pointed out here on the Senate floor, and it was conceded by the manager of the bill—I believe at that time the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island was on the floor—that contributions to a candidate would be eligible for matching even if the candidate was running for a Presidential term several years distant. The conference report provides that contributions will be matched only if received on and after January 1 of the year preceding the year of the Presidential election involved. So, taking the next Presidential election for example, a candidate for the Presidency can start out on January 1 of next year receiving contributions. He can work all next year getting these $250 and less contributions. He could receive more, but there is no matching for the amounts over $250. He could work all year getting these matchable contributions, and then, on January 1, or 2—I imagine they would be closed down here on January 1, and he would have to wait until January 2—he could collect matching funds for all the contributions he collected in 1975, and he could match, then, everything he collected in 1976 up to the time of the convention.

Thus there would be a whole year where the candidate would be on his own. He would be eligible for matching, but it would not occur until the first of the next year. Without that provision, as I say, it would be dependent upon years in the past for matching. This would make it a little more sensible.

Strong arguments were made on the floor of the Senate against the $15,000,000 limit allowed for expenditures for Presidential nomination candidates, up to half of which could be matching funds from the Treasury. The conference report cuts this figure to $10,000,000 plus 20 percent for fundraising as to the private contributions, and provides that it must come out of the checkoff rather than out of the General Treasury. I believe that is a step in the right direction. We did not succeed in eliminating the public financing, but this is an amendment that will save many millions of dollars to the taxpayers.

So these are some of the areas in which the opponents of public financing did contribute to making this a better bill. As I say, there is much in the conference report that I favor, much that is good, much that I helped to get put into the bill. But inasmuch as the bill contains the public financing feature, I feel that I must, as a matter of principle, vote "nay" on the adoption of the conference report when it comes to a vote.

I have no intention of engaging in extended debate as to the report. I think if we are to have a taxpayer-financed procedure as to the Presidential election, the general election, it would not be so bad, but adding the cost of the dozens of candidates for the nomination for the Presidency of the two major parties, paying $2 million to each of the parties to put on a convention which is sometimes little better than a vaudeville show, I feel is a pretty high expense for the taxpayers to be called on to pay, $2 million to each party, and then to pay up to $5 million to finance these dozens of candidates who go up and down the land seeking the Presidency. So when the conference report comes up for adoption, the Senator from Alabama plans to vote "nay."

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, I wish to congratulate the Senate conferees, and particularly Senator CANNON, the chairman of the Committee on Rules, for the exemplary job done in a very difficult several weeks of trying to work out a compromise bill with the House. There are many features of the bill that I support.

Mr. President, on the first day of this month, conferees of the Senate and the House of Representatives agreed on details of a public financing campaign bill that we hope will eliminate the influence of "big money" and allied ills that characterize our present system of electing Presidents and Members of Congress.

I wish to add my "thank you" to the many others deservedly awarded this afternoon to Senator CANNON, chairman of the Rules Committee, who helped in a major way to work out a compromise between the Senate and the House-passed version.

I share the disappointment of many here in the Senate Chamber that the conference report does not include public financing of congressional primaries and generals. However, it does provide public financing for presidential contests. The bipartisan, 8-member supervisory board, established to enforce the provisions of the bill that I hope President Ford will sign into law, is a key feature of this legislation.

Our political terrain has been sadly sullied these last few years, Mr. President. Abuses have occurred that have shaken the confidence of the American people. But, Mr. President, I think that this compromise bill is a showing on the part of the Congress that it does intend to make amends, does intend to repair the damage to our campaign-financing system, hitherto privately financed.

I, for one, applaud these goals of a financially sane and stable and aboveboard system of camapign financing. In my judgment, this compromise, despite its flaws, should be a major step in that direction.

I do have reservations, just as the Senator from Alabama does, but for almost totally different reasons.

The Senator from Alabama distinguished between the aspects of the bill, which he titles "reform," and public financing which he characterizes as not being reform. I would like to speak to the reform act part which limits spending that candidates can expend in seeking Federal elective office, particularly with regard to the Senate and House races.

We have been noble in our discussions about the need to get new blood into the political process. We are told that one of the primary reasons for this campaign reform bill is to encourage new persons, women and men, to get involved in running for high public office.

Then we have gone ahead in this bill, it seems to me, Mr. President, and we have severely limited the possibilities of contenders, challengers, to unseat incumbents, which everyone recognizes is a very difficult thing to do at best.

Mr. President, I am very concerned that we not lose sight of the shortcomings of this bill. I may very well be singing a different tune 4 years from now about this bill, with some provisions that may favor incumbents, when I will be eligible for reelection. I, as an incumbent, would be very happy about the fact that a challenger is limited to the same amount of money that I am limited to expend, which is low especially for the most populous States. Yet, in addition, I have a significant weapon in incumbency with the amount that I have available for my staff paid for by the taxpayers; the franking privilege; and other benefits of being an incumbent, which translate directly into immense benefit in an election year in terms of waging a campaign.

I would hope the reformers outside of Congress, the common causes of the world, who spend a good deal of time beating their breasts about what, in fact, is in the best interests of the Nation, also not lose sight of the fact that we are, in my opinion, may be going to be locking in many of us on this floor under the terms of this bill.

This bill may perhaps have exactly the opposite effect of what it is designed to do—opening up the process to newcomers. This is because of what I consider, as opposed to the Senator from Alabama, excessively low dollar amounts that are able to be expended or contributed.

When we talk about 12 cents per voter in a general election, and 10 cents per voter in a primary, in a State like California where we have 20 million residents, I suspect unknown candidates are going to have to spend all of that money just to become known as I was when in 1972 I sought the office of U.S. Senator. At that time, I was known by less than 3 percent of the people of my State 6 months before the general election. So an unknown candidate will have to spend every cent of that public-financing money just to get his or her name known. This does not leave money to inform what positions one takes, or to know anything about him or her, but merely to get the voters of that State to identify who the candidate is and that, in fact, he or she is a challenger.

Mr. President, I still am an ardent supporter of partial public financing. I have also been a strong supporter of many other of the provisions that are contained in this bill.

But the American public should be made aware that there is a tendency in the bill to lock-in the incumbents.

For example if, in fact, I had been limited to spending the amount of money set out in this bill in the little State of Delaware for the 1972 general election when I ran, there is a possibility that I would not be standing here today taking the time of the Senate at 5:30 in the evening, when everyone is anxious for me to stop talking and to go home. This bill would have made it more difficult for me to have won that election—not impossible, but more difficult. The bill is much harder on candidates in more populous States. I see my good friend from New York (Mr. BUCKLEY) over there smiling, I am not sure why—but my good friend, the Senator from New York, if he were in the position of having an unknown challenger the next time up, I suspect it would be very difficult for a challenger to mount a campaign whereby he or she gets to the point of being able to be known by 50 percent of the voters in that State. I hope I am wrong about that, but I just want to put the Senate on notice. I have not heard much about this, that if, in fact, I am right about this, that the so-called reformers, and especially we, who call ourselves moderates and liberals, the so-called reformers, will come forward and rectify what may develop into an onerous situation. Good things can be abused as well as bad things remedied.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BIDEN. I yield.

Mr. ALLEN. Well, does this unknown challenger not benefit sometimes by how well known the incumbent is, which sometimes aids the challenger?

Mr. BIDEN. That is true, that often occurs. But the percentages do not back that up. If we look at the numbers over the 70 years of this century it shows that, as bad as some of the incumbents have been, it is easier to perpetuate a bad incumbent than elect a good unknown challenger.

There is an old saying in football: "You have to have somebody to beat somebody." I am not sure you can even convince the voters to beat somebody if that somebody does not get a chance to become known at all.

In sum, I think these spending limits in the bill are low. I think they militate and are weighted in favor of incumbents.

I hope, if I am correct, that, as I said, those who talk most about reform in this body will be prepared to come forward and, at least, recognize the fact that low limits, in the larger States—not in Delaware—have the effect of diminishing the numbers of good women and men who might want to get into the political process but are unable to do so.

However, Mr. President, I do want to insist on the assets of the bill, too, amid my criticism.

I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ABOUREZK). The Senator from New York.

Mr. BUCKLEY. Mr. President, I was smiling when the eloquent Senator from Delaware was talking about the advantages of incumbency and the stringent limits proposed by this bill because this is precisely one of my major complaints, but not the most major. I shall recite some of those later.

I addressed myself a week ago to the frustration of coming to this floor in order to debate legislation and then finding out that the report was not available.

When we began this debate at 3 o'clock the conference report was still not here. But I did, however, prepare some questions based on the earlier versions, and I would like to pose them to the distinguished sponsor of the bill so that I might have some clarification in my own mind and in the record. Perhaps these questions are not relevant to what has actually emerged from the conference and, if so, I am sure I will be so advised.

I would like to ask the distinguished sponsor whether he considers that the subsidy proposal and the limits on campaign contributions are independent proposals or are they integral parts of a comprehensive plan?

Mr. CANNON. I am sorry I was not in good enough attention so that I could hear what the Senator was saying.

May we have order, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will come to order.

Mr. BUCKLEY. Does the distinguished Senator consider that the subsidy proposal and the limits on campaign contributions are independent proposals or are they integral parts of a comprehensive plan?

Mr. CANNON. Well, no, they are certainly independent. They were arrived at in a completely independent manner.

Mr. BUCKLEY. Did the committee consider proposing these two independent parts as two independent bills?

Mr. CANNON. No. The committee made no such proposal. The bill was enacted here on the floor and contained in the Senate bill the proposal for the public financing for the Presidential elections and also for the congressional elections. In addition, the Senate wrote its will with respect to the limit on contributions and the limit on expenditures. Now, these were not parts of different bills. It was all in one bill, and it was so considered by the House and by the conferees.

It is quite a little different, I may say, as the distinguished Senator from Alabama just pointed out, than it was when it was passed by the Senate.

Mr. BUCKLEY. Do the sponsors of the conference committee bill agree that subsidies to candidates are more necessary in Presidential than in congressional elections to provide for opportunities for participation without regard to the financial resources of individual candidates?

Mr. CANNON. Well, that I assume is what they believed by signing the conference report. The distinguished Senator from Alabama did not sign it. Some who signed the conference report are not overly enthusiastic about the financing part. But it was quite evident that the public financing, at least for Presidential races, was more important than that for congressional races, else the conference would have so indicated.

Mr. BUCKLEY. Should we, therefore, conclude that, in the opinion of the conference, there is a greater need to reduce the pressure on Presidential candidates from large campaign contributions than there is to reduce such pressure on congressional candidates?

Mr. CANNON. I do not know that that would necessarily follow. But I would say that the recent experiences in Watergate certainly pointed up the dangers of large contributions, of the use of large amounts of cash, and I am sure that had it not been for Watergate, the facts of Watergate, that we would not have been able to have a public financing provision in this bill, just as the distinguished Senator from Alabama pointed out a little earlier, that when this came up in S. 372 this body defeated the public financing features, and that was just a short time ago, the year before last.

Mr. BUCKLEY. I conclude, therefore, that in the opinion of the conference, individuals running for the Senate or House are less subject to these monetary pressures than someone running for the Presidency?

Mr. CANNON. Well, I do not know that that particular issue was considered, as such.

I would just say, the conferees were up against a situation where the House was adamantly opposed to any public financing for congressional races, whatever their reasons may have been.

Among the Senate conferees, a group of us favored public financing for congressional races, but with the House remaining adamant it was not possible to carry that out.

There was no decision made that the Members of Congress were less suspect, or more suspect. That decision was simply not met.

But the Senate conferees were not unanimous in support of public financing for congressional races, that did come out of the Senate bill.

Mr. BUCKLEY. It is my understanding when the Senate originally considered the limitations that it was the conclusion that $90,000 was required to run a minimal, competent House race, yet the bill before us would limit House expenditures to $70,000.

Did the sponsors consider the effect that this $70,000 limit on candidate expenditures in the House would have on the chances of incumbents seeking reelection?

Mr. CANNON. Yes, the conferees did consider that, and the Senator is correct that when we passed the bill in the Senate, we wrote in the $90,000 figure for House Members.

We wrote it in thinking that was probably about the right amount, but, more importantly, we felt that the House itself should make that determination as to what was the approximately correct amount, and we made our own determinations as to what it should be in the Senate.

The House came back with a bill that had only $60,000, and I, for one, thought that was too low, and a number of our conferees did. We thought it was an incumbent bill as far as House Members were concerned with that kind of limit, it favored incumbents.

This was part of our trading package, as we do in conference. We finally got the House to come up by reason of some concessions we had to make to $70,000, plus the fact that one can use up to 20 percent for fundraising purposes.

That means that the total amount that the House Member could then spend is $84,000, which is not much below the $90,000.

There has been some talk about this fund raising limit that was put in that the House had, and I did not think of it here or I would have had it in myself. I do not think it is a proper figure to be included to say that if we are going out to put on a fundraising dinner and it costs $10 a person to put the dinner on and we charge $25 a person, that that $10 we have to pay for the dinner is going to be charged against the overall expenditure allowance in the campaign, because that is not what it is doing. It is helping to raise money, but it has to be shown.

If we were to go out in a mail campaign to solicit funds, as many candidates do, the cost of that mailing is rather substantial. In a Presidential race it is terrifically high, but even in a congressional race it is quite substantial. To say that is part of the expenditure limit for getting elected, I do not think is quite proper.

Therefore, I was very happy to go along with the House provision that one could spend up to 20 percent for fund raising purposes.

We do not get that exemption if we do not spend it for those purposes, and it is all fully reportable.

Mr. BUCKLEY. I thank the Senator.

Do the sponsors of the bill believe, as the Common Cause legal memorandum states, that:

> Campaign contributions are all too often only an attenuated form of bribery.

Mr. CANNON. I am not familiar with that Common Cause memorandum and if the Senator wants to pose a question to me specifically as to what I think, I can give an answer to that, but I do not want to try to second-guess what somebody else is talking about.

Mr. BUCKLEY. Do the sponsors believe that certain forms of political advertising have become too persuasive? If so, do they regard the bill as a means of limiting the persuasiveness of such advertising?

Mr. CANNON. I cannot answer that in that context.

I would assume that all political advertising has some persuasive value, else it would not be used by candidates or by organizations.

I do not remember considering that precisely in the context in which the Senator has advanced it.

Mr. BUCKLEY. But it does not limit the amount of persuasiveness one can put into the atmosphere?

Mr. CANNON. Well, certainly, the amount one can spend, certainly, is going to limit the amount of persuasiveness one can put forward to the public, the overall amount.

That was the intention of these limitations, to limit the overall amount, because we felt that there ought to be a limit beyond which one cannot go in saturating the airways, the radio, the TV, newspapers, and the personnel expenditures, the hiring of people, billboards, and so on, and that is the basic reason to try to limit the cost somewhat and not get into a bought campaign.

Mr. BUCKLEY. Do the sponsors believe that financial contributions are an inherently more dangerous form of political activity than other forms of political action such as demonstrations, rallies, pamphleteering, doorbell ringing and telephone canvassing?

Mr. CANNON. I could not guess between them, I think all of those have some effect. It depends probably on the area one is in, the type, manner in which they are put forth, and the individuals involved.

We made no comparative judgment between those facts.

Mr. BUCKLEY. Do the sponsors believe that the bill will reduce the chances for third party candidates to make effective races for the Presidency?

Mr. CANNON. No. The intent precisely was to insure that this would not reduce the effectiveness of third-party candidates, that they should have a proper opportunity.

Now, all candidates, major and minor, independent or other, are treated alike with respect to matching grants for the primaries. Each must raise his threshold of $100,000 in each of 20 States, with only the first $250 of any contribution eligible for matching grants.

Of course, in the general election, candidates are treated in a different manner, depending upon whether they are the nominated candidates of a major party or a minor party.

A major party is one whose candidate received 25 percent or more of the vote at the last general election.

A minor party is one whose candidate received less than 25 percent but at least 5 percent of the vote at the last general election.

Major party candidates could receive full public financing up to $20 million limit. And minor party candidates could receive an amount reflecting the ratio of the votes cast for the minor party candidate to the average of the votes cast for all major party candidates.

In the case of minor party candidates and new party candidates, if the vote at the current general election is in excess of 5 percent and betters the percentage of votes cast at the last general election then the minor or new party candidate would be entitled to be reimbursed for expenditures made up to the difference as determined by the improved vote.

Now, we did this, specifically, to try to protect other than the major candidate.

Mr. BUCKLEY. But the fact is that, if one is a new party, until the ballots are actually cast there is no right of reimbursement or financing, therefore, to that extent, there is not equality treatment, is that correct?

Mr. CANNON. Well, if the Senator interprets it that way, the facts are correct. They would have to demonstrate a 5-percent appeal to the voters before they would be entitled to reimbursement. They would not be able to get any money before that time.

Mr. BUCKLEY. But they would have to finance the whole campaign before any rights of reimbursement?

Mr. CANNON. Correct.

Mr. BUCKLEY. The bill, therefore, does not enhance third-party efforts.

Mr. CANNON. I do not think one could say it either enhanced or did not enhance. It does not impose any penalty on them, just makes them prove they are bona fide candidates and have some voter appeal.

I think that should be true in the case of any candidate.

Mr. BUCKLEY. What distinction do the sponsors see between endorsing a candidate for the Presidency, on the one hand, and "discussing important issues" during the campaign on the other? I believe that distinction was made, or at least it was in an earlier version of this bill. I have no idea whether it applies to this bill.

Mr. CANNON. I do not quite follow what the Senator is referring to.

Mr. BUCKLEY. My understanding is that at least one version of this legislation—and I have not studied thoroughly this version—made a distinction between expenditures endorsing a candidate versus expenditures for the discussion of important issues during the course of a Presidential or congressional campaign.

Mr. CANNON. If I am interpreting what the Senator is asking correctly, if the question is whether or not the expenditure is made on behalf of the candidate, if its is made on behalf of a particular candidate, then it is going to be chargeable to him. Or, if it endorses a candidate, it is going to be chargeable to him in his overall limit.

On the other hand, if some organization comes out and discusses issues that are not related to an identifiable candidate, that is not chargeable to a candidate.

Mr. BUCKLEY. Let us assume that we were back in the days of the Vietnam war controversy, and in a given election one particular candidate—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator suspend so that we can have order in the Chamber? It is getting difficult to hear.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield briefly?

Mr. BUCKLEY. I will.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Does the Senator intend to make a motion to recommit?

Mr. BUCKLEY. Yes.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Does the Senator intend to ask for the yeas and nays?

Mr. BUCKLEY. Yes.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask that it be in order at this time to ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask that there be a yea and nay vote on final passage of the conference report if the Buckley amendment is defeated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is understood.

Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BUCKLEY. You did not intend to suggest, I am sure, that my motion to recommit would be defeated.

[Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair takes notice of that.

Mr. BUCKLEY. I am not sure we have the answer to the question I was posing, namely the distinguished sponsor stating that expenditures on a particular candidate obviously are chargeable. But if a particular candidate is the only one in a campaign identified with a particular issue, and there is a massive expenditure of money to advance that point of view, never mentioning the candidate but just talking about the desirability in the case of withdrawing from Vietnam, that, I understand, the sponsors have unrelated to a campaign and, therefore, not chargeable

Mr. CANNON. We have not tried to infringe on first amendment rights in this. We have tried to protect first amendment rights. We have permitted an individual himself to go out and spend $1,000 on his own assuming he does not have the authority of a candidate. There is no way that I can see that we could prohibit somebody from paying money to discuss issues. However, if it is either for the benefit of an identifiable candidate, or if it is to oppose an identifiable candidate there are requirements in here that would limit them, one, to charge the amounts of the expenditures to his overall limit, if it is for him, and the other to place a limit on what people can spend in attempting to oppose him.

Mr. BUCKLEY. May I ask whether the Senator has considered the case where there are three candidates and funds are used to oppose one candidate? How does one charge that expenditure?

Mr. CANNON. If funds are used to oppose one, I guess it would have to be allocated to the one who is more nearly in tune with the thoughts being advocated. But I cannot foresee that that situation is likely to occur.

Mr. BUCKLEY. I would like to respectfully suggest that it occurred in my campaign, and in the final weeks there were full-page ads and television spots saying, "Don't vote for Buckley." There were two other candidates whose views were indistinguishable. I am not sure how we would handle that situation.

Mr. CANNON. This would be for the commission to develop in their regulations after they are appointed, to develop this sort of thinking. I am sure a complaint to the commission would put a stop to that sort of thing, if it were not in violation of the first amendment rights.

Mr. BUCKLEY. I have just a final question. Do the sponsors regard the communication by an organization to its membership with regard to a particular candidate a different form of persuasion than a similar communication to nonmembers?

Mr. CANNON. Yes, because an organization can communicate with its members. That is quite different from communicating with the general public.

There is a provision in the bill, section 308, that permits an organization to communicate with its members.

Mr. BUCKLEY. Mr. President, This morning I attempted to obtain a copy of the conference committee report on the bill we are now debating. It was unavailable so I have not had a chance to study it. I question the wisdom of voting substantially in the dark on legislation that could alter the way we select our representatives without ever having a chance to see the bill.

When we debated the Senate version of this legislation early this spring, a number of us pointed out practical and constitutional deficiencies in the bill. I said at that time that the bill might accurately be described as the Incumbent Protection Act of 1974.

To offer this bill in the name of reform is an act of unprecedened cynicism.

It is hard to imagine a measure better designed to protect incumbents running for reelection. The artificially low spending limits are demonstrably inadequate and will keep challengers from getting off the ground in House, Senate and, yes, Presidential races. The advantages of incumbency are legendary. According to Common Cause figures, successful challengers for House seats in 1972 spent, on the average, well over $100,000. Yet this bill would limit candidates for the House to $70,000, a sum grossly inadequate to conduct a campaign on a basis of parity.

When enacting legislation that deals with the political activities of American citizens, the Congress is well advised to remember the words of Mr. Justice Holmes, dissenting in Abrams against United States:

> . . . when men have realized that time has upset many fighting faiths they may come to believe even more than they believe the very foundations of their own conduct that the ultimate good desired is better reached by free trade in ideas—that the best test of truth is the power of the thought to get itself accepted in the competition of the market. . . .

The campaign reform bill, as reported by the conference committee, does much to weaken the ideals of Holmes that have now become law. In Yale Law School Professor Ralph Winter's felicitous phrase, these "price controls in the marketplace of ideas" are necessarily violative of the freedoms guaranteed to the citizens by the first amendment. That amendment has long been used to defend the rights of unpopular groups to make their positions known, but it applies with no less force when the rights of the great majority of Americans are threatened and infringed.

Limiting the amounts that candidates can spend in election campaigns offends the first amendment in several ways. As Ralph Winter put it:

> Setting a limit on candidate expenditures sets a maximum on the political activities in which American citizens can engage and is thus unconstitutional. The reasoning that speech which costs money is too persuasive cannot be contained. For one can also argue that demonstrations of more than a certain number of people, extensive voter canvassing, or too many billboards with catchy slogans also "distort" public opinion and also ought to be regulated.

It is particularly disturbing that Senators who had heretofore been considered civil libertarians have rushed to support this measure without considering alternative means, less drastic in their scope, of accomplishing their purposes. The fear of overly persuasive campaigns, particularly when expressed by incumbent members of Congress, strikes dangerously close to prohibited suppression of speech because of its content. It must certainly give the Supreme Court pause when they see officeholders with vested interests in remaining officeholders passing legislation that restricts the abiilty of potential opponents and average citizens alike to alter the political makeup of the Congress.

The Supreme Court in numerous cases has held that the first amendment includes within its ambit a freedom of association, and that such freedom is crucial to political activity. By setting limits on individual contributions, whether or not such contributions are to candidates or to independent groups, the conference committee bill directly infringes on the freedom of association. Are we really prepared to tell the American people that they may participate financially in elections only if they work through the candidates' existing organization? After learning of the activities of the Committee to Re-elect the President in 1972, this is truly an amazing "reform" to emerge from Watergate.

At the very least, Mr. President, we should seek equity between challenger and incumbent. To this end, I am moving to recommit the bill to the conference committee with instructions that I will set out. We must insure that elected officials are responsive to their constituents; incumbency—particularly as buttressed by the bill as presently written—does much to destroy responsiveness. At a time when many Americans question their basic political institutions, weakening the consent of the governed is the height of foolishness. As Prof. Alexander M. Bickel has recently noted:

> What is above all important is consent—not a presumed theoretical consent, but a continuous active one, born of continual responsiveness. There is popular sovereignty, and there are votes in which majorities prevail, but that is not nearly all. Majorities are in large part fictions. They exist only on election day and they can be registered on a very few issues. To be responsive and to enjoy consent, government must register numerous expressions of need and interest by numerous groups, and it must register relative intensities of need and interest.

As I have stated, this motion to recommit does not eliminate all of the problems inherent in the bill as written.

One of the several points I make is that there are still some very serious constitutional questions with this legislation and, secondly, with all due deference to the conferees, I believe this bill in the name of reform is an act of unprecedented cynicism.

It is hard to imagine a measure that is better designed to protect incumbents. I say this on the authority of Common Cause which presented figures showing that the only successful challenges in House races 2 years ago were those that spent in excess of $100,000 on the average, to overcome the notorious advantages of incumbency.

At least I shall try not to be negative.

Mr. President, I send to the desk a motion to recommit with instructions that are designed to inject into this some sort of equity as between incumbents and challengers.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Will the Senator yield for 1 minute?

Mr. BUCKLEY. I yield.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that while the first vote will take 15 minutes, that the second vote, which I understand may well follow, be limited to 10 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Vote.

Mr. BUCKLEY. I would like to say what this motion does, Mr. President. It would merely provide that challengers would be allowed to spend 30 percent more than the limitations that are applicable to incumbent candidates.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I wish to congratulate the Senator from Nevada (Mr. CANNON) and his associates for the very fine job that they did under the leadership of the distinguished chairman of our conferees, for their very fine work in moving forward in an attempt to assure that the person who is the President of the United States will be President because a majority of the people agree with the arguments that he has to make, and not because someone is better able to contribute to someone's campaign fund than those available to contribute to the other man.

I have been working in this area for a number of years now, Mr. President, since 1966.

I would like to discuss the background and the history of this, and the contribution made by a number of Senators.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator wish to call up his motion to recommit?

Mr. BUCKLEY. I call up my motion to recommit.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

MOTION TO RECOMMIT WITH INSTRUCTIONS

That the conference report on the bill (S. 3044) be recommitted to conference, with instructions to the Senate conferees to insert the following subsection at the appropriate place in section 608 of title 18, United States Code, as amended by the conference report:

"( )(1) The expenditure limitations under this section apply to incumbent candidates. Nonincumbent candidates are subject to an expenditure limitation of 130 percent of any limitation applicable to an incumbent candidate.

"(2) For purposes of this subsection, an incumbent candidate is a candidate who—

"(A) holds an office to which he seeks reelection, or holds public elective office for which the voting constituency is the same as, or includes, the voting constituency of the office to which he seeks election, or

"(B) has, within the 5 years preceding the election, held such an office.".

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion to recommit with instructions. The yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, I am sure that is subject to a point of order, but I am perfectly willing to have a vote on the matter, on the motion to recommit, because it does suggest matters that were not the subject of either of the bills and therefore could not be permitted for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I announce that the Senator from Texas (Mr. BENTSEN), the Senator from Nevada (Mr. BIBLE), the Senator from Idaho (Mr. CHURCH), the Senator from Alaska (Mr. GRAVEL), the Senator from Hawaii (Mr. INOUYE), the Senator from North Carolina (Mr. ERVIN), and the Senator from Alabama (Mr. SPARKMAN) are necessarily absent.

I further announce that the Senator from Indiana (Mr. HARTKE) is absent on official business.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from North Carolina (Mr. ERVIN) and the Senator from Indiana (Mr. HARTKE) would each vote "nay."

Mr. HUGH SCOTT. I announce that the Senator from Vermont (Mr. AIKEN), the Senator from Oklahoma (Mr. BELLMON), the Senator from Utah (Mr. BENNETT), the Senator from Kentucky (Mr. COOK), the Senator from Kansas (Mr. DOLE), the Senator from Colorado (Mr. DOMINICK), the Senator from Arizona (Mr. GOLDWATER), the Senator from Michigan (Mr. GRIFFIN), the Senator from Oregon (Mr. HATFIELD), the Senator from Oregon (Mr. PACKWOOD), and the Senator from North Dakota (Mr. YOUNG) are necessarily absent.

I also announce that the Senator from Hawaii (Mr. FONG), the Senator from Virginia (Mr. WILLIAM L. SCOTT), and the Senator from Vermont (Mr. STAFFORD) are absent on official business.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Kansas (Mr. DOLE) would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 17, nays 61, as follows:

So Mr. BUCKLEY's motion to recommit the conference report with instructions was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the adoption of the conference report. The yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, just 1 minute. I should like to clarify something, if I may, with the manager of the bill.

A provision of this bill amends section 1502 of title 5 relating to the activity of State or local employees in Federal campaigns. Specifically, it takes out subsection (a)(3), which prohibits a State or local officer or employee from taking an active part in political management or political campaigns, and substitutes for that a prohibition from being a candidate for Federal office.

It is my understanding, and I should like to ask the manager of the bill, my friend from Nevada (Mr. CANNON), if he agrees that this means that State laws which prohibit a State employee, or local laws which prohibit a local employee, from engaging in Federal campaign activities and Federal campaigns are still valid?

What we are doing is taking out of the Federal law the prohibition against State or local employees from taking an active part in political management or political campaign? Is that correct?

I think it is quite important, because many of our States have the so-called little Hatch Act, and it was not our intent to repeal those "little Hatch Acts," or to modify them, but to take it out of the Federal law so that Federal law does not prohibit those activities, leaving it up to the State to do so.

Mr. CANNON. The Senator is absolutely correct. Section 401 of the House amendment amended section 1502 of title 5, U.S. Code, relating to influencing elections, taking part in political campaigns, prohibitions, and exceptions, to provide that State and local officers and employees may take an active part in political management and in political campaigns, except that they may not be candidates for elective office.

The conference substitute is the same as the House amendment. It was the intent of the conferees that any State law regulating the political activity of State or local officers or employees is not preempted, but superseded. We did want to make it clear that if a State has not prohibited those kinds of activities, it would be permissible in Federal elections.

This would get away from the situation in which the Federal Government gives the State funds toward many different programs, and some of those employees have been fearful that they could not participate in Federal campaigns. This would eliminate that problem.

Mr. STEVENS. It is up to the State to determine the extent to which they may participate in Federal elections?

Mr. CANNON. The Senator is right. The States make that determination.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I believe S. 3044 represents a real step forward in campaign reform. However, I am disappointed that it does not provide public financing at the very least on a matching basis for Senate and House races. I remain convinced that this is the only way to truly reform political campaigns and I intend to work for that reform.

The bill provides limits on expenditures and on contributions which I support but I am going to work on measures to more nearly equalize incumbents and challengers than under the present bill. A most important feature of the bill is the independent Federal Elections Commission which will enforce the new law. The Commission will have the power to bring civil suits under the new law and will be a great improvement over the present weak system.

I also believe that the extension of the tax checkoff to the Presidential nominating system is useful and at least a step toward total public financing. Finally additional disclosure after an election has been added to the law and it was my amendment in the Senate which was incorporated in the final version in slightly different form.

Congress has now passed its second campaign reform bill in 3 years after no action in this area since 1925. I believe that is progress and shows that Congress is living up to its responsibilities and is trying to reform our campaign practices to avoid the tragedies of Watergate. I intend to dedicate myself to the further improvement of our political system through greater campaign financing changes in the future.

Mr. President, the concern of the legislative leaders of both parties in the State of New York that New York political campaigns be free from the "dirty tricks" and other regrettable incidents of Watergate led the legislature to appoint a Citizens Advisory Committee in 1973 to recommend a revision of the New York State campaign laws.

Among the recommendations of that committee was the enactment of a fair campaign code. Following the issuance of that report, New York State in 1974 adopted a strict new campaign law under the administration of a new State board of elections.

One of the first obligations of the State board of elections was to adopt a fair campaign code setting forth ethical standards of conduct for those engaged in election campaigns in the State. The code is subject to enforcement by the board of elections and includes civil penalties of up to $1,000 for violations of the code. I believe this code is of interest to the entire country.

The code was prepared by the new board of elections and under the chairmanship of former Supreme Court Justice Arthur Schwartz, Vice Chairman Remo J. Acito, and Commissioners Donald Rettaliata and William H. McKeon.

To insure that the proposed code had the broadest input from those best qualified to comment on these issues, the board established a special advisory committee representing a broad spectrum of experts. The advisory committee members were Congressman HERMAN BADILLO; Mrs. Myrna Baron of the New York City League of Women Voters; Ben Davidson, executive director of the liberal party; Seymour Graubard, national chairman of the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith; William Lawless, former State supreme court justice and former dean of Notre Dame School of Law; Cynthia Lefferts, New York State legislative director for Common Cause; Seraphin Maltese, executive director of the conservative party; Charles G. Moerdler, a New York City attorney; Whitney North Seymour, Jr., former U.S. attorney and president of the New York State Bar Association; Gary Sperling, executive director of the Citizens' Union; Cyrus R. Vance, former Deputy Secretary of Defense, Ambassador, and current president of the Association of the Bar of the City of New York; Charles E. Williams III, assistant counsel of NAACP Legal Defense and Educational Fund; and Judith T. Younger, dean of Syracuse University College of Law, all under the chairmanship of Robert M. Kaufman, my former legislative assistant, who is now chairman of the Special Committee on Campaign Expenditures of the New York City Bar Association.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the State of New York fair campaign code, together with a foreword and related material, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATE OF NEW YORK FAIR CAMPAIGN CODE

State board of elections: Arthur H. Schwartz, Chairman; Remo J. Acito, Vice Chairman; Donald Rettaliata, William H. McKeon.

SEPTEMBER, 1974.

FOREWORD

The State Board of Elections was changed by law with promulgating and adopting a "Fair Campaign Code" setting forth ethical standards of conduct for persons, political parties and committees engaged in election campaigns.

Publication of the Code, as set forth in this pamphlet, is the culmination of a lengthy developmental process, a process that has included: the holding of public hearings in New York City, Buffalo, and Albany, consultation with various state and national organizations interested in the area of election reform, including the Senate Select Committee on Presidential Campaign Activities, the Fair Campaign Practice Committee, both of which have had experience in the national area, the Secretary of the United States Senate, the Clerk of the United States House of Representatives and the Controller General; recent reports recommending action in the area of reforming campaign practices; examination of pertinent regulations and legislation adopted by our sister states; the aid and advice of a political science consultant of recognized experience and stature in this field; and finally, the opportunity for review and comment by a broad-based citizens' advisory panel.

This is the first Fair Campaign Code which is reinforced by regulations and compliance with which is mandated. It is one which carries with it an obligation by those involved in political campaigns to obey or else run the risk of criticism, denunciation, or a fine, in addition to other penalties, criminal and civil, which may be invoked depending upon the nature of the infraction.

A fundamental purpose of the Code is to protect the public against immoral and unethical activities, and as stated by the Legislature, "to maintain citizen confidence in and full participation in the political process of our state to the end that the government of this state be and remain ever regionable to the needs and dictates of its residents in the highest and noblest traditions of a free society."

The Board believes that this Code provides an excellent vehicle through which to achieve this purpose. We are well aware, however, that for the Code to be successful, it must receive the active support of candidates, their committees and agents, as well as that of the people of this state. To that end, the Board shall exercise its power to ensure your cooperation and full compliance with both the latter and the spirit of the Code's provisions.

FAIR CAMPAIGN CODE

In order that all political campaigns be conducted under a climate promoting discussions of the issues, presentation of the records and policies of the various candidates, stimulating just debate with respect to the views and qualifications of the candidates and without inhibiting or interfering with the right of every qualified person and political party to full and equal participation in the electoral process, the following is hereby adopted by the New York State Board of Elections pursuant to section four hundred seventy-two of the election law as the Fair Campaign Code for the State of New York.

No person, political party or committee during the course of any campaign for nomination or election to public office or party position shall, directly or indirectly, whether by means of payment of money or any other consideration, or by means of campaign literature, media advertisements or broadcasts, public speeches, press releases, writings or otherwise, engage in or commit any of the following:

1. Practices of political espionage including, but not limited to, the theft of campaign materials or assets, placing one's own employees or agent in the campaign organization of another candidate, bribery of members of another's campaign staff, electronic or other methods of eavesdropping or wiretapping.

2. Political practices involving subversion or undermining of political parties or the electoral process including, but not limited to, the preparation or distribution of any fraudulent, forged, or falsely identified writing or the use of any employees or agents who falsely represent themselves as supporters of a candidate, political party or committee.

3. Attacks on a candidate based on race, sex, religion or ethnic background.

4. Misrepresentation of any candidate's qualifications including, but not limited to, the use of personal vilification, character defamation, whispering campaigns, libel, slander, or scurrilous attacks on any candidate or his staff or his personal or family life, use of the title of an office not presently held by a candidate, use of the phrase "reelect" when, in fact, the candidate has never been elected to the office for which he is a candidate.

5. Misrepresentation of any candidate's position including, but not limited to, misrepresentation as to political issues or his voting record, use of false or misleading quotations, attributing a particular position to a candidate solely by virtue of such candidate's membership in any organization other than his political party which might have issued a statement advocating or opposing any particular position.

6. Misrepresentation of any candidate's party affiliation or party endorsement or endorsement by persons or organizations including, but not limited to, use of doctored photographs or writings or fraudulent or untrue endorsements. In any case where a person or organization endorsing the candidate has been paid by the candidate or someone on his behalf, a statement signed by the candidate and stating the consideration for the endorsement shall be filed within twenty-four hours of the endorsement in the office in which the candidate is required to file his statements under section four hundred seventy-seven of the election law.

7. Misrepresentation of the content or results of a poll relating to any candidate's election; also, failure to disclose such information relating to a poll published or otherwise publicly disclosed by a candidate, political party or committee as required to be disclosed by rule or regulation of the New York State Board of Elections.

8. Any acts intended to hinder or prevent any eligible person from registering to vote, enrolling to vote or voting.

Statutory authorization:

"The State Board of Elections, after public hearings, shall adopt a 'fair campaign code' setting forth ethical standards of conduct for persons, political parties and committees engaged in election campaigns including, but not limited to, specific prohibitions against practices of political espionage and other political practices involving subversion of the political parties and process, attacks based on racial, religious or ethnic background, and deliberate misrepresentation of a candidate's qualifications, position on a political issue, party affiliation or party endorsement."

Penalties:

"In addition to any other civil or criminal penalty which may be provided for by law, the State Board may impose a civil penalty, not to exceed one thousand dollars, upon any person found by the Board, after a hearing, to have violated any of the provisions of such code."

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, the election of 1972, and the Watergate revelations since then, have hammered an indelible impression into the mind of every American citizen about the election process and how campaigns are financed. Secret funds, illegal contributions, slush funds, and laundered millions, only begin the long list of affronts to the American people. Mr. Jeb Stuart Magruder, when asked by the Senate "Watergate" Committee what he considered to be the major impetus for his and other questionable election activities, simply replied, "Too much money."

Mr. President, today this Congress has addressed that problem directly with the most comprehensive campaign finance reform measure in the history of the United States, the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1974. Some critics will say that too much money has been compromised by the conferees on this legislation. Personally, I would have preferred the stronger Senate version of the bill. But it is now time to focus upon the progress in reform which will be made through this act. No single piece of legislation before this Congress in this session has more potential for cleaning up American politics and restoring confidence in the integrity of our political system and the individuals who work for it.

All elected public officials know that scrounging for funds to bring your case to the electorate is a demeaning experience. We all dread asking people for money to help us finance our campaigns. As one who has run for mayor, Senator and President, I can appreciate, perhaps more than some others, the importance of the changes which we are making in the campaign finance process here today.

It was out of a strong concern for reform in our campaign finance system that I supported legislation initiating the dollar checkoff and authored the amendment which put it on the front of the income tax form where people could see it and use it.

The amount of money a politician can raise is no measure of democratic responsibility by a candidate for public office. With the passage of the Federal Election Campaign Act amendments, we can help restore the faith of the people in their Government. The linkage between the electorate and elected public officials will be improved by this bill.

Mr. President, it is gratifying for one who has labored long in the vineyard of public campaign finance to see such a progressive and creative reform in our system of election campaigns. I have been a vocal advocate of expanded public financing of Federal elections for many years. I strongly support the provisions of the legislation which calls for the use of public funds for the financing of Presidential election campaigns. I fully agree with provisions setting strict limits on spending and contributions. I also have been a strong advocate of the establishment of an independent supervisory board to administer the law, which is part of this bill.

I think the Federal Election Campaign Act Amendments of 1974 does the job that needs to be done. There is room for improvement, but it permits Congress to take a big step in the right direction of campaign finance reform.

ANOTHER STEP TOWARD A REFORMED POLITICAL SYSTEM

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, I rise to support the conference bill on campaign reform reported by the conference committee on which I served.

This bill will conclude another chapter in our efforts toward a reformed political system for America. It cannot be the last chapter, unfortunately, for the bill before us is not as broad in scope as the problems which Watergate so starkly presented for all Americans.

But this bill does represent a major step forward. For the first time, we will have a strong and independent commission to oversee all Federal elections and enforce Federal laws pertaining thereto. For the first time, we will have reasonable limits on both campaign contributions and campaign spending. For the first time, we have insured that Presidential campaigns, both in the primaries and the general election, will not be dependent on huge gifts of money from special interests.

These are historic reforms. They are possible today only because thousands of Americans cared enough to devote their time and effort to the cause of bringing this bill before us today. Organizations such as Common Cause, the National Committee for an Effective Congress, the Center for Public Financing, the League of Women Voters, and business and labor organizations throughout the country, have all played a major role in giving us the opportunity to vote on this legislation today.

Nor should the earlier voices raised in this cause be forgotten. President Theodore Roosevelt called for public financing in 1907 and a generation later Senator Henry Cabot Lodge renewed the fight that is being won today.

These organizations have been joined by thousands of individual citizens, who demonstrated that they are as dedicated as were our constitutional framers, to a system of free, vigorous, fair, and meaningful elections. Without the support of these citizens, we would not have this bill before us.

In 1971 I was pleased to join many of my colleagues in working for the Federal Elections Campaign Act of 1971. That bill, which contained some 13 amendments which I offered on the Senate floor, established for the first time the principle that all large contributions should be publicly disclosed—that campaigns were public business. It was followed by the "tax checkoff" amendment to the Revenue Act of 1971 which permitted an individual American to express support for a system of public financing for Presidential campaigns by designating $1 of his or her taxes for this purpose. The response to the checkoff has been very encouraging, and it is appropriate that this bill extends the scope of the checkoff to primary campaigns, and insures that all money designated by the taxpayer will be available for candidates, if needed.

In 1972, I cochaired, with Senator STEVENSON, the Ad Hoc Committee for Congressional Reform. During the public hearings of this informal committee, we focused on the need for legislation of the type which we will vote on shortly. As a result of these hearings, and of the widespread concern evidenced throughout Maryland, I introduced a bill with Senator STEVENSON, and another with Senator HART, which together contained the major features of the legislation before us.

The public response to these initiatives was strong and positive. I testified before the Senate Rules Committee last September in favor of this legislation, and joined with the distinguished members of that committee in supporting the bill, S. 3044, which was reported to the floor.

In one major area, however, I feel that the bill before us now is insufficient. That is the area of public financing for congressional campaigns. The Senate expressed its view overwhelmingly in support of such a system when S. 3044 was before us last spring. Gallup and other nationwide polls have demonstrated that the American people support public financing for Congressional races by a majority of almost 2 to 1. And I have found very strong support for this basic reform as I have talked to citizens throughout my State.

Unfortunately, however, the House conferees were adamant that this bill contain no such provisions. As conferees for the Senate, we explored every possible alternative with the House. We offered to reduce the extent of public financing, to limit it to general election campaigns only, to postpone the effective date to 1978 or 1980, and even to limit it to Senate campaigns only. Yet the House conferees unanimously rejected each of these attempts at compromise, and it became clear that the only way to enact the major reforms which this bill contains was to recede from the Senate's position in favor of Congressional public financing. I regret the necessity for such action, but I feel confident that our position will prevail in time.

Finally, I want to thank a number of my colleagues whose support of this legislation has been of vital importance. These include the Senator from Nevada (Mr. CANNON), the Senator from Pennsylvania (Mr. HUGH SCOTT), the Senator from Louisiana (Mr. LONG), the Senators from Rhode Island (Mr. PELL and Mr. PASTORE), the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. KENNEDY), the Senator from Pennsylvania (Mr. SCHWEIKER), the Senator from Illinois (Mr. STEVENSON), the Senator from Michigan (Mr. HART), the Senator from Vermont (Mr. STAFFORD), the Senator from Iowa (Mr. CLARK), and the Senator from California (Mr. CRANSTON). Appreciation should be extended as well to the committee staff headed by Mr. James Duffy.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I am pleased to add my firm support to the conference report we are considering.

As a conferee, I had the privilege of sharing in the deliberations between Senate and House which led to the agreements we have reached.

I am disappointed that the Federal Election Campaign Act Amendments of 1974 does not contain stronger provisions for public financing. I continue to believe in this goal as a most important priority for the future.

As chairman of the Senate Subcommittee on Elections, and as the one whose legislation formed the basis for committee consideration of public financing, I worked to extend this significant concept and reform to congressional elections. I believed that the time was especially propituous for this action.

The House conferees, however, were unanimous in their opposition. To me the question was between achieving a bill with some measure of truly meaningful reform and no bill at all.

I am pleased we have achieved some notable success:

First. We have extended public financing to Presidential primaries.

Second. We have agreed to a Federal Election Commission with an ability to act independently, and with some—if not all—of the enforcement authority recommended by the Senate.

Third. We have achieved new, realistic and salutory limits to campaign spending. In so doing we have reduced the possibilities of corruption by special interests, and the possibilities of abuse of power by those subject to such corruption.

The bill may not be a giant stride forward in election reform—I believe the Senate bill could have provided such a major advance. But the legislation which has emerged from our conference, nonetheless, takes very important and history-making new steps in the right direction.

A GIANT FIRST STEP

Mr. MONDALE. Mr. President, this is an historic day for the Senate. The campaign finance reform legislation we will vote on this afternoon represents months and years of work by many dedicated people, both in and out of the Congress. It is our best and most constructive response to the terrible abuses of Watergate.

I am especially pleased that the bill incorporates the provisions for public financing of Presidential primaries sponsored by Senator SCHWEIKER and myself in the Senate, and by Congressman JOHN BRADEMAS in the House.

This blended system of public and private financing of Presidential primaries will encourage small private contributions, and lessen the dependence of candidates on wealthy and powerful special interests. Candidates will be free, as they should be, to serve only their conscience and their constituents.

While I regret that public financing was not extended to House and Senate elections, I believe the legislation we will approve today has laid the needed groundwork for public financing of all Federal elections. It is only a first step, but it is a giant one.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the following material which has been prepared by the Center for Public Financing of Elections: A summary of the campaign reform bill; an article entitled "Public Financing of the Presidential Campaign"; and a chart showing the spending limits for Senate candidates.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PRESIDENTIAL PUBLIC FINANCING (FROM DOLLAR CHECK-OFF FUND)

General election

$20 million in public funds; acceptance optional. Major party nominee automatically qualifies for full funding; minor party and independent candidate eligible to receive proportion of full funding based in past or current votes received. If candidate receives full funding, no private contributions permitted.

Conventions

$2 million; optional. Major parties automatically qualify. Minor parties eligible for lesser amount based on proportion of votes received in past or current election.

Primaries

Federal matching of private contributions up to $250, once candidate has qualified by raising $100,000 ($5,000 in each of 20 states) in matchable contributions. Only first $250 of any private contribution may be matched. The candidates of any one party together may receive no more than 45 percent of total amount available in the Fund; no single candidate may receive more than 25 percent of total available. Only private gifts raised after January 1975 qualify for matching for the 1976 election; no federal payments will be made before January 1976.

Enforcement

Creates 6-member Federal Elections Commission responsible for administering election law and public financing program, and vested with primary civil enforcement.

President, Speaker of House, and President Pro-Tem of Senate each appoint two members (of different parties), all subject to confirmation by both Houses of Congress. (Such members may not be officials or employees of any branch of government at time of appointment.)

Secretary of Senate and Clerk of House to serve as ex-officio, non-voting members of the Commission, and their officers to serve as custodian of reports for candidates for Senate and House.

Commissioners to serve full-time, six-year, staggered terms. Rotating one-year chairmanship.

Commission to receive campaign reports; make rules and regulations (subject to review by Congress within 30 days); maintain cumulative index of reports filed and not filed; make special and regular reports to Congress and President; serve as election information clearinghouse.

Commission has power to render advisory opinions; conduct audits and investigations; subpoena witnesses and information; initiate civil proceedings for relief.

Criminal violations to be referred to Justice Department for prosecution; provision for advancing cases under the Act on the court docket, and judicial review.

REPORTING AND DISCLOSURE

Candidate required to establish one central campaign committee; all contributions and expenditures on behalf of candidate must be reported through this committee. Also requires designation of specific bank depositories.

Full reports of contributions and expenditures to be filed with Commission 10 days before and 30 days after every election, and within 10 days of close of each quarter unless committee has received or expended less than $1,000 in that quarter. Year-end report due in non-election years.

Contributions of $1,000 or more received within last 15 days before election must be reported to Commission within 48 hours.

Cash contributions over $100 prohibited.

Contributions from foreign national prohibited.

Contributions in name of another prohibited.

Loans treated as contributions; must have co-signer or guarantor for each $1,000 of outstanding obligation.

Requires that any organization which spends any money or commits any act for the purpose of influencing any election (such as the publication of voting records) must report as a politcal committee. (This would require reporting by such lobbying organizations as Common Cause, Environmental Action, ACA, etc., and perhaps many other traditionally non-electoral organizations).

Every person who spends or contributes over $100, other than to or through a candidate or political committee, is required to report.

OTHER PROVISIONS

No elected or appointed official or employee of government may accept more than $1,000 in honorarium for speech or article, or $15,000 in aggregate per year.

Removes Hatch Act restrictions on voluntary activities by state and local employees in federal campaigns, if not otherwise prohibited by state law.

Corporations and labor unions which are government contractors are permitted to maintain separate, segregated voluntary political funds in accordance with 18 USC 610. (Formerly all contributions by government contractors were prohibited.)

Permits use of excess campaign funds to defray expenses of holding federal office or for other lawful purposes.

Prohibits solicitation of funds by franked mail.

Pre-empts state election laws for federal candidates. This section takes effect upon enactment.

PENALTIES

Increases existing fines to maximum of $50,000.

Candidate for federal offices who fails to file reports may be prohibited from running again for term of that office plus one year.

Effective Date: January 1, 1975 (except for immediate pre-emption of state laws).

PUBLIC FINANCING OF THE PRESIDENTIAL CAMPAIGN

Public financing of the 1976 Presidential election is provided under the new Campaign Reform Bill. Here is the way it works:

General election

Each candidate for President is limited to campaign expenditures of $20 million.

Nominees of the major parties are eligible to receive the full $20 million in public funds. Public financing is not mandatory; the candidate may solicit all donations privately. If the candidate "goes private," however, individual contributions are limited to $1,000; organization contributions, $5,000.

Candidates of minor parties (those receiving at least five percent of the vote in the preceding election) are eligible for partial funding based on the percentage of the vote received. A third party receiving at least five percent of the vote in 1976 will be eligible for partial reimbursement of their expenses.

Nominating conventions

Political parties are limited to expenditures of $2 million for their presidential nominating conventions. A major party is eligible to receive the full $2 million in public funds; however, a party may opt to fund its convention privately. The existing law permitting corporations to take a tax deduction for advertisements in conventions program books is repealed.

Presidential primaries

Each candidate for the Presidential nomination is limited to campaign expenditures of $10 million. In each state, he may spend no more than twice the amount permitted a Senate primary candidate. In other words, the candidate may spend no more than $200,000 in the New Hampshire primary; $928,000 in Florida.

To be eligible for public funds, a candidate must declare himself a candidate for his party's nomination and begin soliciting small contributions ($250 or less). When the Federal Elections Commission certifies that the candidate has received at least $5,000 from contributors in each of 20 states—for a total of $100,000 in matchable funds—the Secretary of the Treasury will authorize a matching payment of $100,000 from the Dollar Check-Off Fund. Subsequently, each eligible contribution of $250 or less will be matched from the Treasury.

While an individual may contribute $1,000 and an organization may give $5,000 during the pre-nomination period, only the first $250 will be eligible for matching. No cash contributions will be matched; all contributions must show the taxpayer's identification number.

In addition to the $10 million spending limit, the candidate is permitted to spend an additional 10 percent—$2 million—for fundraising costs.

Only contributions raised after January 1, 1975, will be eligible for matching. No public funds will be given out until January 1, 1976.

Source of public funds

The source of all public funding is the Presidential Election Campaign Fund. No additional appropriations legislation is required of Congress. The Fund was established in 1971 and is funded by taxpayers who check off Line 8 on IRS Form 1040, designating $1 of their taxes ($2 on a joint return) for this purpose.

This Dollar Check-Off Fund now contains $30.1 million. If taxpayers check off Line 8 at the same rate as last year, there will be a minimum of $64 million in the fund in time for the 1976 election, and very likely more.

Early in 1976, $44 million will be earmarked for the General Election and the Conventions. The remaining funds will be designated for the primaries. No more than 45 percent may go to candidates of any political party. No candidate is eligible to receive more than one-fourth of public funds available for primaries.

All spending limits are subject to cost-of-living increases, using 1974 as the base year.

The Fund will be under continuing review by the new Federal Election Commission to insure that eligible candidates receive equitable treatment and that adequate money is available to meet obligations required by the act.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, the significance of this Federal Elections Campaign Act will be that this act moves us one long stride forward in the area of public financing.

The act, makes the appropriations of the money checked off on individual tax returns automatic and implements the action taken already with regard to the Presidential campaign checkoff proposal of $1 optional with each taxpayer. The bill provides also that $2 million would be made available to each of the two major parties, with a formula as is spelled out elsewhere in the checkoff system for appropriate reimbursement for third parties, to provide for expenses of nominating conventions.

Now, the significant thing about this measure is that it provides that hereafter candidates seeking to be nominated for President of the United States may obtain Federal matching once they have achieved enough individual small contributions to merit the thought that they are serious candidates.

To be specific, a candidate must raise $100,000 in contributions of no more than $250, and that candidate must raise as much as $5,000 in 20 States to demonstrate, in effect, that he is a serious candidate and that he has support beyond the immediate State or region from whence he hails.

As I understand this provision, once a candidate had raised the first $100,000 as stipulated, the amount that is raised under the checkoff system and, thereafter, every small contribution of $250 or less is matched by an equal amount up to $5 million so that the candidate could raise a total of $5 million and have $5 million made available to him through Treasury financing.

Mr. President, that is an extension of what this Senator sought to initiate in 1966, almost 8 years ago now, when the then junior Senator from Louisiana brought in an amendment to a revenue bill suggesting that the general election of the President should be financed by a $1 tax checkoff-type proposal as is now the law. That proposal became law as an amendment to a major revenue measure. In time, I believe, the significance of that amendment will dwarf the bill itself and all other amendments that were on it.

I believe that was a bill which was subsequently referred to as the first Christmas tree bill because it came late in the year and it had so many amendments to it that one of the writers of the Washington Post said:

When the bill hit the floor it lit up like a Christmas tree.

There were many amendments on the bill that were wanted on behalf of many of their constituents.

In the year 1967 there were some Democrats who felt that they made a mistake in permitting the tax checkoff to finance the Presidential election to become law, and they joined forces with those Republicans who had opposed this proposal in what developed into a rather lengthy debate to prevent this new law from ever going into effect.

It was with considerable disappointment that the Senator from Louisiana saw that there were a lot of good people who should be supporting that first public campaign financing measure because of their liberal background and their political philosophy who were, for one reason or another, opposing it.

There was the then Senator from Tennessee, Mr. Gore, for example, who was one I would have thought would have favored this very strongly and who, in fact, had voted for it in the committee and then saw fit to lead the fight against the proposal.

There was the former Senator from New York, Mr. Robert Kennedy, who saw dangers that aroused his fears that this could be used in an improper manner.

There were quite a few on this side of the aisle who, at that time, had become disillusioned with the then President Lyndon Johnson, who felt that this was something that President Johnson wanted for his own advantage.

Now that, in my judgment, was not the truth. I had discussed this mater with President Johnson on occasion. He told me he thought I was right about it. He said he was capable of raising whatever campaign funds he cared to raise, but that the time would come when the Democrats would have another Harry Truman running for President of the United States. He recalled how difficult it was for President Truman, even as a dedicated President, to raise enough money to pay transportation expenses to move the Truman train around the country in order to take his message to the people in that very difficult election when he fought an underdog race and survived that race to become one of our great Presidents after his reelection.

So, Mr. President, after that long debate of about 7 weeks, the Senate finally voted for an amendment to say that this public financing proposal would not become effective until Congress has provided further guidelines.

Thereafter, President Nixon was elected President of the United States. I have oftentimes thought, had it not been for the support of a number of our liberal Democratic friends who thought this might be something that President Johnson wanted for his own advantage, and therefore voted to negate the provisions of that bill, Richard Nixon would not have been President of the United States because Senator HUMPHREY ran a very close race, very poorly financed, but very close.

Had HUBERT HUMPHREY had the funds to make an equally impressive presentation on television, as that available to his Republican opponent, it is fairly clear to all of us at this point that Hubert Humphrey then Vice President would have been elected President of the United States.

It was, in my judgment, largely because some of our good friends on the Democratic side of the aisle, and I am sure for good conscientious reasons, voted to prevent the public financing checkoff proposal from going into effect, that the Democrats lost the next Presidential election of 1968.

Now, a few years thereafter, with reference to campaign financing and reform proposals, our majority leader (Mr. MANSFIELD) proposed to some of us that we should initiate a proposal to make available equal time to the candidates for both sides running for President of the United States and that we should make some tax deductions and tax credits, to help encourage small contributions to political campaigns.

As chairman of the Committee on Finance at that time, I made it clear that I did not expect to support any proposal of that sort unless we made some forward progress toward justifying some form of public financing under the checkoff proposal, or some similar proposal, because, in my judgment, it is only when we finance campaigns in a way where the outcome of the campaign does not depend in any respect on who has the most money, or who has the greatest appeal to the vested interests, that one can feel that the voice of the public and the people are electing a man not because of the financial power behind him but because what he has to say makes the best sense and appeals most to the hearts and minds of the American people.

So I insisted that if I were to support something of that sort it ought to have at least a $1 checkoff proposal as part of the package.

So, in due course, in considering a debt limit bill, as I recall it, it was agreed that the Senator from Rhode Island (Mr. PASTORE) would offer this package of amendments which would provide a deduction and a tax credit for small contributions and would implement the tax checkoff approach which we had previously enacted and put on the statute books in 1966.

After a really heated and lengthy debate on the checkoff proposal, this provision finally passed. We were alerted at that time that the President of the United States expected to veto the debt limit bill if need be, rather than permit the tax checkoff to pay the expense of the two candidates making their campaigns and expressing their views, as they saw it, to the public in 1972.

So while the Senate had passed the measure intending that it should be effective in 1972, by threat of Presidential veto we were compelled to settle for an effective date in 1976.

Mr. President, the checkoff proposal is on the books and people are marking it in sufficient numbers to make the assurance of adequate financing for the 1976 election a certainty. So much so that we now find we can provide that more than the general election can be financed under a system whereby taxpayers mark their own tax returns that they would like to have $1 of their tax money spent in a fashion that would help to assure us a President beyond the reach of undue influence of large financial contributions.

We will have that kind of election for the first time in 1976.

Mr. President, there are some who have expressed disappointment and will continue to express disappointment that this bill did not extend the public financing concept to the election of Senators and Members of Congress. I voted for that proposal. In the long run, Mr. President, if I am around here another 6 years, I hope to be one of those who help put it on the statute books. It is just as well that it does not happen now.

I say that because these major issues should not be decided based on who is right; it should be decided because we agree on what is right.

We will best know how to implement a public financing approach when we have had experience with the checkoff in the election of a President in the year 1976.

Mr. President, the vote on this measure demonstrates the enormous forward progress as an idea becomes understood by people.

In that long 7 weeks' fight in 1967, with the President of the United States supporting the checkoff approach, most of us who were supporting it, won about half of the votes. On seven rollcall votes one side won four times and the other side won three times.

It was a matter of who had the most troops in town that decided how each vote would go, and on every second vote one group would win and on every alternate vote the other group would win.

Now we see a measure that can muster a margin of approximately 4 to 1 in the U.S. Senate. Some of that margin now represnts those who did not think it was a good idea at the time. That is a mark of tolerance and a mark of ability of people to change with changing times and to recognize with experience that there is something to be said for the other fellow's side of the argument.

Undoubtedly, the Watergate scandal contributed to this. We now see, Mr. President, that not just a matter of disclosure that is needed to give us a government of the people and by the people in this country.

The disclosure provisions really have in fact made it difficult for challengers to challenge incumbents. It was well discussed in a very thoughtful article by David Broder a few days ago.

Disclosure has created as many problems as it has solved. While incumbents have been able to raise adequate funds to finance a campaign, the disclosure provisions have made it very difficult, and far more difficult than ever before, for the challengers to raise funds to finance their part of the campaign, but the public financing features properly implemented will, I am sure, make it possible for every Member who enjoys the benefit of the public financing approach to be completely the master of his own conscience; to reject those proposals which are lacking in logic, and to support instead those things which he believes to be best for his nation.

As I say, Mr. President, I am not at all dismayed that this Congress is not at this time implementing the public financing approach to the election of Senators and Members of the House of Representatives. I am satisfied that we will learn something from experience.

The experience that we will have in electing a President of the United States by a public financing approach, where each taxpayer indicates that he wants $1 to be spent in a way where the President will be equally obligated to all citizens and especially obligated to none, will lead us to finance, in time, our congressional campaigns in a way that will have equally as much merit.

With experience, the public will understand it better. In the last analysis, Senators and Congressmen want to do what the public wants. The public will be in a better position to advise us what it thinks about this type of campaign financing when it has had experience with the outcome and with the implementation of what we start in 1976, which, in my judgment, is a very appropriate time to implement the type of suggestion that was implicit in the $1 checkoff proposal. That is that every citizen should have an equal amount of influence, and every person elected to public office should be equally obligated to all citizens; that no one should have any greater influence because of his money, and that no public servant should be in any greater measure beholden to someone because of that money.

This is a red-letter day for our democracy Mr. President, and I am very pleased to have played a part in the implementation of something that we started 8 years ago.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, I would like to express my appreciation to the conferees for the tremendous assistance they gave to all of the conference during the subject under discussion.

We have very divergent views on the conference committee, and we had those who were opposed to public financing, those who favored it, those who wanted tighter disclosure provisions, and so on. However, despite the differing views we had very cooperative people and cooperative staff, and I want to express appreciation to all of the conferees and to our fine staff people who assisted us in developing what I think is a very fine campaign reform bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ABOUREZK). The question is on agreeing to the conference report. On this question the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The second assistant legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. BUCKLEY (when his name was called). Mr. President, on this vote I have a pair with the Senator from Oregon (Mr. HATFIELD). If he were present and voting, he would vote "yea." If I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "nay." Therefore, I withhold my vote.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I announce that the Senator from Texas (Mr. BENTSEN), the Senator from Nevada (Mr. BIBLE), the Senator from Idaho (Mr. CHURCH), the Senator from North Carolina (Mr. ERVIN), the Senator from Alaska (Mr. GRAVEL), the Senator from Hawaii (Mr. INOUYE), and the Senator from Alabama (Mr. SPARKMAN) are necessarily absent.

I further announce that the Senator from Indiana (Mr. HARTKE) is absent on official business.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from North Carolina (Mr. ERVIN) and the Senator from Indiana (Mr. HARTKE) would each vote "yea."

Mr. HUGH SCOTT. I announce that the Senator from Vermont (Mr. AIKEN), the Senator from Tennessee (Mr. BAKER), the Senator from Oklahoma (Mr. BELLMON), the Senator from Utah (Mr. BENNETT), the Senator from Kentucky (Mr. COOK), the Senator from Kansas (Mr. DOLE), the Senator from Colorado (Mr. DOMINICK), the Senator from Arizona (Mr. GOLDWATER), the Senator from Michigan (Mr. GRIFFIN), the Senator from Oregon (Mr. HATFIELD), the Senator from Oregon (Mr. PACKWOOD), and the Senator from North Dakota (Mr. YOUNG) are necessarily absent.

I also announce that the Senator from Hawaii (Mr. FONG), the Senator from Virginia (Mr. WILLIAM L. SCOTT), and the Senator from Vermont (Mr. STAFFORD) are absent on official business.

I further announce, that if present and voting, the Senator from Tennessee (Mr. BAKER) and the Senator from Kansas (Mr. DOLE) would each vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 60, nays 16, as follows:

So the conference report was agreed to.

Mr. HUGH SCOTT. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to.

Mr. CANNON. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, the passage of S. 3044, the Federal Election Campaign Act amendments, represents another significant breakthrough in reforming the political processes of this Nation. So many in the Senate have been in the forefront of this great reform effort, but I wish at this time to pay tribute to those who worked so hard on this conference committee under the great leadership of the distinguished Senator from Nevada (Mr. CANNON). All members of that committee are to be commended, but Senator CANNON particularly for the broad representation he solicited even from outside his committee. The great breakthrough in public financing of Federal Presidential proceeds as well as general elections in truly the great first step toward creating a totally changed climate for future elections. The distinguished Senator from Louisiana (Mr. LONG) has been the real champion of the dollar checkoff over the past several years and played such an important role in the conference committee in retaining this provision. In future years, with his continued leadership, I am confident that this concept will be expanded to all Federal elections.

My colleague, the distinguished Republican leader (Mr. HUGH SCOTT) is to be commended for his great leadership on the bill and on the overall program of reforms of the political process. He and Senator KENNEDY have provided the leadership this Congress on public financing and their contributions have been immense. To Senators CLARK, MATHIAS, PASTORE, BYRD, GRIFFIN and STEVENS, the Senate owes its sincere thanks for the completion of this landmark legislation.

The country shall be better for the work the Senate has completed today on S. 3044.

TRANSPORTATION SAFETY ACT OF 1974

Mr. MANSFIELD. During the consideration of S. 4057 yesterday, Senator HARTKE withdrew an amendment to S. 4057. Inadvertently, the incorrect amendment was withdrawn. Thereafter, H.R. 15223 was considered by the Senate and the text of the Senate bill, as amended, was substituted for the language in the House bill. Therefore the bill as passed contains several mistakes. Section 208(d) of the bill should be deleted as should title 4 of the bill.

Therefore, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate reconsider the passage of H.R. 15223 including the third reading and that section 208(d) and all of title 4 of S. 4057 be deleted and that the bill as thus corrected be repassed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

TRAVEL EXPENSE AMENDMENTS ACT OF 1974

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate a message from the House of Representatives on S. 3341.

The Presiding Officer laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3341) to revise certain provisions of title 5, United States Code, relating to per diem and mileage expenses of employees and other individuals traveling on official business, and for other purposes, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert: That this Act may be cited as the "Travel Expense Amendments Act of 1974".

SEC. 2. Section 5701(2) of title 5, United States Code, is amended to read as follows:

(2) "'Employee' means an individual employed in or under an agency including an individual employed intermittently in the Government service as an expert or consultant and paid on a daily when-actually-employed basis and an individual serving without pay or at one dollar a year;"

SEC. 3. Section 5702 of title 5, United States Code, is amended to read as follows:

"§ 5702. Per diem; employees traveling on official business

"(a) An employee while traveling on official business away from his designated post of duty is entitled to a per diem allowance for travel inside the continental United States at a rate not to exceed $35. For travel outside the continental United States, the per diem allowance shall be established by the Administrator of General Services, or his designee, for each locality where travel is to be performed. For travel consuming less than a full day, such rates may be allocated proportionately pursuant to regulations prescribed under section 5707 of this title.

"(b) An employee who, while traveling on official business away from his designated post of duty, becomes incapacitated by illness or injury not due to his own misconduct, is entitled to the per diem allowance and appropriate transportation expenses until such time as he can again travel, and to the per diem allowance and transportation expenses during return travel to his designated post of duty.

"(c) Under regulations prescribed under section 5707 of this title, the Administrator of General Services, or his designee, may prescribe conditions under which an employee may be reimbursed for the actual and necessary expenses of official travel when the maximum per diem allowance would be less than these expenses, except that such reimbursement shall not exceed—

"(1) $50 per day for travel within the continental United States when the maximum per diem otherwise allowable is determined to be inadequate (A) due to the unusual circumstances of the travel assignment, or (B) for travel to high rate geographical areas designated as such in regulations prescribed under section 5707; or

"(2) $20 per day plus the locality per diem rate prescribed for travel outside the continental United States.

"(d) This section does not apply to a Justice or judge, except to the extent provided by section 456 of title 28.".

SEC. 4. Section 5703 of title 5, United States Code, is hereby repealed.

SEC. 5. Section 5704 of title 5, United States Code, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"§ 5704. Mileage and related allowances

"(a) Under regulations prescribed under section 5707 of this title, an employee who is engaged on official business for the Government is entitled to not in excess of—

"(1) 9 cents a mile for the use of a privately owned motorcycle; or

"(2) 18 cents a mile for the use of a privately owned automobile; or

"(3) 24 cents a mile for the use of a privately owned airplane;

instead of actual expenses of transportation when that mode of transportation is authorized or approved as more advantageous to the Government. A determination of advantage is not required when payment of a mileage basis is limited to the cost of travel by common carrier including per diem.

"(b) In addition to the mileage allowance authorized under subsection (a) of this section, the employee may be reimbursed for—

"(1) parking fees;

"(2) ferry fees;

"(3) bridge, road, and tunnel costs; and

"(4) airplane landing and tie-down fees.".

SEC. 6. Section 5707 of title 5, United States Code, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"§ 5707. Regulations and reports

"(a) The Administrator of General Services shall prescribe regulations necessary for the administration of this subchapter.

"(b) The Administrator of General Services, in consultation with the Comptroller General of the United States, the Secretary of Transportation, the Secretary of Defense, and representatives of organizations of employees of the Government, shall conduct periodic studies of the cost of travel and the operation of privately owned vehicles to employees while engaged on official business, and shall report the results of such studies to Congress at least once a year.".

SEC. 7. The seventh paragraph under the heading "Administrative Provisions" in the Senate appropriation in the Legislative Branch Appropriation Act, 1957 (2 U.S.C. 68b), is amended by striking out "$25" and "$40" and inserting in lieu thereof "$35" and "$50", respectively.

SEC. 8. Item 5707 contained in the analysis of subchapter 1 of chapter 57 of title 5 is amended to read as follows:

"5707. Regulations and reports.".

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, the Senate, after some effort, passed S. 3341 relating to per diem and mileage expenses on September 19. The House was scheduled to take up a similar bill, H.R. 15903, under suspension of the rules on Monday, October 7. Discussion with House staff indicates that the bill will pass in its present form, and it has passed in its present form.

I ask unanimous consent that the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House, and hereby request a conference on the disagreeing votes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MANSFIELD. On behalf of the Senator from Montana (Mr. METCALF) I ask unanimous consent that Mr. METCALF, the Senator from Kentucky (Mr. HUDDLESTON), and the Senator from Illinois (Mr. PERCY) be appointed as conferees.

There being no objection, the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. METCALF, Mr. HUDDLESTON, and Mr. PERCY conferees on the part of the Senate.

HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION 898—NATIONAL LEGAL SECRETARIES' COURT OBSERVANCE WEEK

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I send to the desk a joint resolution authorizing the President to proclaim the second full week in October 1974, as National Legal Secretaries' Court Observance Week, and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be read for the information of the Senate.

The joint resolution (H.J. Res. 898) was read the first time by title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President is hereby authorized and requested to issue a proclamation designating the second full week in October, 1974, as "National Legal Secretaries' Court Observance Week", and calling upon the people of the United States to observe such week with appropriate ceremonies and activities.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, yesterday the House of Representatives passed House Joint Resolution 898. It has come over to the Senate and is now pending before the Senate.

This resolution honors the secretaries of the Nation, an honor that is justly due.

I am very pleased that the House passed it, and I hope the Senate will see fit to pass it, too.

I have cleared this resolution with the majority leader, Mr. MANSFIELD, the assistant majority leader, Mr. BYRD, the minority leader, Mr. SCOTT, the assistant minority leader, Mr. GRIFFIN, the chairman of the Judiciary Committee Mr. EASTLAND, and the two members of the subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee who handle resolutions of this nature, Mr. MCCLELLAN and Mr. HRUSKA.

Mr. President, I hope that the Senate acts on it at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution is before the Senate and open to amendment. If there be no amendment to be offered, the question is on the reading and passage of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution (H.J. Res. 898) was ordered to a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

A PROGRAM TO CONTROL INFLATION IN A HEALTHY AND GROWING ECONOMY

Mr. HUGH SCOTT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a fact sheet relating to the program to control inflation in a healthy and growing economy which was referred to today in President Ford's address before the joint session of Congress.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A PROGRAM TO CONTROL INFLATION IN A HEALTHY AND GROWING ECONOMY

Although our economic system remains sound and strong, with its basic vitality intact, the economy is experiencing severe difficulties. Inflation is far too high. Too many people are having trouble finding employment. The financial markets are out of kilter. Interest rates are exorbitant. Housing is suffering badly. The productive capacity of the economy is expanding too slowly.

The origins of these problems are complex. Part of the problem grew out of several international shocks:

The disastrous world-wide drop in crop production in 1972, which sent food prices soaring.

Tow international devaluations of the dollar, which made the United States a more attractive source for other countries to buy scarce materials.

The tripling of crude oil prices, which exerted a powerful and pervasive effect on our entire price structure.

Here at home, a long period of excessively stimulative policies created inflationary pressures that gradually and inexorably mounted in intensity. With that condition prevailing, the economy could not absorb the outside shocks; rather, those have now been built into the system, deepening and extending our problem.

Twice within the past decade, in 1967 and in 1971–72, we let an opportunity to regain price stability slip through our grasp. Thus inflation has gathered momentum and has become the chronic concern of producers and consumers alike. Indeed, today inflation is the primary cause of our recession fears.

Consumer confidence has been shaken, causing most families to hold back on spending, as clearly indicated by the lack of growth in the physical volume of retail sales for the past year and a half.

An "inflation premium" has been added to "true" interest rates, so that we now have mortgages at 9–10 percent and corporate bonds at 10–12 percent. This was warped our financial markets, including the stock market, which were structured for an economy with a relatively stable price level.

Another development that has created serious economic imbalance is the fact that our civilian labor force has been expanding rapidly. For the size of our labor force, therefore, we are short on capital equipment. During this same period, the effectiveness of price controls in certain sectors—e.g., steel, paper and other basic materials—created specific bottlenecks that limited the production capacity of the entire economy. As a result unemployment was higher than it otherwise would have been. Also, the dampening impact of price controls on profits held back new capital expansion programs in some of these vital industries.

Thus, because our problems are complex, it is clear that our program to deal with them must be comprehensive. It is also clear that the solution cannot be achieved quickly. There are no simple, instantaneous cures for our difficulties. Discipline and patience are the watchwords.

We must, therefore, have a strong policy of budgetary and monetary restraint to work down the rate of inflation. At the same time we must provide the means for a healthy long-run growth in the capacity of the economy, correct the imbalances that have developed in recent years, and see to it that the burdens of this effort are shared on an equitable basis. Some further rise in unemployment appears probable, and we will take steps to deal with it. However, we can and will achieve our goals without a large increase in unemployment. There will be no economic depression in the United States.

AMENDING THE EMPLOYMENT ACT OF 1946

The Employment Act of 1946 makes it the policy of the Federal Government to "promote maximum employment, production and purchasing power." Although the words "purchasing power" have sometimes been interpreted as meaning price-level stability, it would nevertheless be helpful to clarify the term and make explicit in the Employment Act the goal of stability in the general price level. The American people have a right to receive from their government stronger assurance that policies will be followed to safeguard the purchasing power of their money in addition to policies that will provide abundant job opportunities and a rising level of living.

We, therefore, suggest that the section of the Act referred to above be amended to read as follows: ". . . for all those able, willing, and seeking to work, to promote maximum employment, maximum production, and stability of the general price level."

INTERNATIONAL COOPERATION

There is much that we and other nations can do to restore the health of the international economy. The economic problems of one nation, as well as its policies for dealing with them, affect other nations. Governments thus have the responsibility not only to maintain healthy economies but also to formulate policies in a way that complements, rather than disrupts, the constructive efforts of others.

This is particularly true for major economic powers such as the United States. Our policies to reduce inflation and restore satisfactory growth are intended to contribute to the strengthening of the international economy. We intend, further, to work with others so that:

We can ensure secure and reasonably priced goods, particularly food and fuel, for all nations.

We can minimize national policy conflicts or distortions that direct resources away from their most productive uses.

We can provide early warning of potential shifts in supply and demand so that nations can avoid potential disruptions.

We can try to harmonize national efforts in such areas as conservation, investment and balance of payments management.

A small delegation led by Ambassador Eberle departed today for Canada, Europe and Japan to discuss the policies described herein and to explore how we can better address and resolve common problems in a mutually supportive fashion.

A cornerstone of our international efforts is the multilateral trade negotiation scheduled to begin this fall. Passage of the Trade Reform Act will provide the United States with an opportunity to help improve the international trading order and to ensure that United States interests are well served therein. Without this bill, the United States will be regarded abroad as lacking the tools or the interest to build multilateral solutions to pressing economic problems. With it, the United States can play a leadership role in negotiating guidelines to reduce distortions of trade and investment that force workers or farmers in one nation to pay for the economic policies of another nation. We can also work toward a multilateral system of safeguards that provide for temporary—but only temporary—limits on imports when there is a need for certain industries to adjust smoothly to economic shifts.

FOOD AND FIBER

Food prices are of major concern in our fight against inflation. Because of weather problems and heavy demands from around the world, food prices are anticipated to increase at an annual rate of 10 percent or more over the next 18 months. Only by expanding farm production, improving productivity, and containing foreign demand can we hope to reduce the rate of increase.

Increased production offers our brightest hope for combating inflation, and we are committed to a program of all-out food production. There are presently no government restrictions on planting of wheat, feed grains, soybeans and cotton (excluding extra-long-staple cotton). To remove restrictions on rice production, we support pending legislation, but with a noninflationary target price. In addition, new legislation, which we support, has just been introduced to remove restrictions on the production of peanuts and extra-long-staple cotton.

Farmers must be assured of adequate supplies of fertilizers and fuel. The Secretary of Agriculture has been directed to work with the interagency Fertilizer Task Force to establish a reporting system. Fuel will be allocated if necessary. Authority will be sought to allocate fertilizer, if that is needed. We will work with fertilizer companies to initiate voluntary efforts to reduce nonessential uses of fertilizer.

Over the past weekend the Federal Government initiated a voluntary program to monitor grain exports. We can and shall have adequate supplies at home, and through cooperation meet the needs of our trading partners abroad. A committee of the Economic Policy Board will be responsible for determining policy under this program. In addition, in order to better allocate our supplies for export, the President has asked that a provision be added to Public Law 480, under which we ship food to needy countries, to waive certain of the restrictions on shipments under that Act on national interest or humanitarian grounds.

The U.S. Department of Agriculture and the National Commission on Productivity have been directed to help reduce the cost of food by improving efficiency in the agricultural sector. The Department and the Council on Wage and Price Stability will review marketing orders to insure that they do not reduce food supplies. Government regulations will be examined to eliminate those that interfere with productivity in the food processing and distribution industries.

HOUSE
ON
REPORT

House of Representatives

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 10, 1974

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Reverend Michael P. Regan, director of Christian education, the Cathedral Church School, Garden City, N.Y., offered the following prayer:

O God, the Lord of all kings and kingdoms, let Thy strong hand control the nations and order their doing unto the fulfillment of Thy purposes upon Earth. Strengthen, we pray Thee, those in leadership, especially in this House of Representatives, who strive after fellowship and brotherhood, and labor to establish righteousness and peace; guide the hearts and minds of rulers and statesmen, that they may seek first Thy kingdom of justice and freedom for all peoples, both great and small; for the sake of Jesus Christ our Lord. Into Thy hands, O Lord God of our fathers, we commend our Nation and people this day. Renew our hope and courage: deliver us from weakness and fear; and lift us up, a holy people, to Thy praise and honor, O God, Thou King of Earth and Heaven; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

REV. MICHAEL P. REGAN

(Mr. WYDLER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. WYDLER. Mr. Speaker and my colleagues, the prayer was offered today by the Reverend Michael P. Regan, who is the director of Christian education at the Cathedral School in Garden City, N.Y. This, of course, is the church school which is associated with the Cathedral of the Incarnation, which is not only in my congressional district, but in the village in which I live. It also happens to be my own church.

It is a particular delight to have the Reverend Michael P. Regan here today. I know how proud his mother and father are of the fact that he has offered the opening prayer to this session of Congress.

When he asked me to arrange for him to give this prayer, he stated that he hoped he could do it on the day when the new Vice President was sworn in. I told him that was somewhat uncertain as to time, and he would have to settle for another date. It was arranged for today; and, of course, this is the day before I think we are going to recess, and it is an auspicious date for the House.

I will just say this about Reverend Regan: He is in charge of the Cathedral Church School. He is loved by the children of our cathedral and our young adults as well and has the respect of the parishioners.

I include in the RECORD the outstanding background of this fine man of God:

THE REVEREND CANON MICHAEL P. REGAN

MEMORIAL SERVICES FOR THE LATE HONORABLE CLIFFORD McINTIRE

(Mr. COHEN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

Mr. COHEN. Mr. Speaker, I have been asked to announce that a memorial service will be held for former Congressman Clifford McIntire on Sunday, October 13, at 3 p.m., at the Calvary Baptist Church, 755 Eighth Street NW.

CONFERENCE REPORT ON S. 3044, FEDERAL ELECTION CAMPAIGN AMENDMENTS OF 1974

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the Senate bill (S. 3044) to amend the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971 to provide for public financing of primary and general election campaigns for Federal elective office, and to amend certain other provisions of law relating to the financing and conduct of such campaigns and ask unanimous consent that the statement of the managers be read in lieu of the report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the statement.

(For conference report and statement see proceedings of the House of October 7, 1974.)

Mr. HAYS (during the reading). Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the statement be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio (Mr. HAYS) and the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. FRENZEL) will each be recognized for 30 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. HAYS).

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 10 minutes.

Mr. Speaker, I have a brief explanation of what the conferees did if the Members are interested. If I detect they are not, I will be glad to sit down. I do not want to take up anybody's time. I know what is in the bill.

The conferees limited the contribution by any one person for a candidate for Federal office to $1,000 per election. Before somebody asks me what this "per election" means, that means a primary and a general, and if there are States that have a law and one is engaged in a runoff, it means a runoff.

No individual may contribute more than $25,000 to all Federal candidates for any election period. And an election period is 2 years. This includes contributions to party organizations.

A limit of $1,000 is also placed on independent expenditures by anyone on behalf of one candidate for Federal office for an entire campaign which includes campaigns, runoffs, special or general elections.

The conferees placed certain limits on multicandidate political committees and/or organizations making contributions.

To qualify they must be registered with the Election Commission for 6 months, receive contributions from 50 persons, and except for State party organizations make contributions to at least five candidates.

The conferees placed a $5,000 limit on the amount an organization may contribute to any candidate in any election. Here again all Presidential primaries are treated as a single election. The $5,000 limit is applicable to each primary, runoff, special or general election, as the case may be.

Candidates are limited to expenditures from their personal funds or the personal funds of their immediate families as follows:

Presidential candidate, $50,000 for an entire campaign.

Senatorial candidate, $35,000 for an entire campaign.

House candidate, $25,000 for an entire campaign.

I feel, Mr. Speaker, a little bit like the Duke of Devonshire when he was Queen Victoria's leader in the House of Lords and he was reading the budget and nobody was paying any attention and right in the middle of the speech he said, "Damn dull, isn't it?", and sat down. I have done everything but sit down and if I get too dull, I will do that in a minute or two. I thought some people might want to know what is in this before it goes into effect.

National and State party organizations are limited to $5,000 in actual contributions to Federal candidates, but may make limited contributions such as on slate cards, as follows:

The conferees limit Presidential candidates to $10 million for campaign expenditures in a primary and $20 million in a general election.

Candidates for the House are limited to $70,000 for each election, plus a 20-percent fundraising cost.

Mr. Speaker, I will yield to the gentlewoman from New York. She is making a louder speech than I am.

The conferees limit candidates for the Senate and Representatives at large to the greater of $100,000 or 8 cents times the voting age population in a primary, the greater of $150,000, or 12 cents times the voting age population in a general election.

They may also spend an additional 20 percent in fundraising expenses.

Public financing is provided for the 1976 Presidential election; in the general election each candidate is limited in campaign expenditures to $20 million and nominees of the major parties are eligible to receive the full $20 million in public funds.

Public financing is not mandatory. The candidate may solicit all donations privately. If the candidate "goes private," however, individual contributions are limited to $1,000 and organization contributions to $5,000. It seems to me under those circumstances any candidate that went public would have rocks in his head, but we have had some that I thought did have rocks in their heads.

Candidates of minor parties—those receiving at least 5 percent of the vote in the preceding election—are eligible for partial funding based on the percentage of the vote received. A third party receiving at least 5 percent of the vote in 1976 will be eligible for partial reimbursement of their expenses.

We allowed $2 million for nominating conventions and again they can take it or not as they like; however, if they decide to go public and not take the $2 million, we have repealed the increased deductions for advertisements and convention program books.

Each candidate for Presidential nomination is limited to campaign expenditures of $10 million and they have to raise matching funds by $5,000 from each of 20 States in amounts of not more than $250 before they will become eligible for matching funds. After raising the $100,000 they are eligible to have $100,000 in matching money and each amount of $250 or less will be matched up to the limit from the Treasury.

The source of the funding for the Presidential election campaign is the $1 check-off fund. There will be no money picked out of the Treasury. If the fund provides enough money, they will get it on the basis which I have outlined. If there is not enough, then they can raise privately the difference between what they receive and the $20 million limitation.

The conferees agreed upon a Federal Election Commission composed of eight members: two to be appointed by the Speaker; two by the President pro tempore of the Senate; two by the President of the United States; and two nonvoting members, the Clerk of the House and the Clerk of the Senate. All six of the voting members would have to be confirmed by both Houses.

The Commission would receive reports, make rules and regulations, and I think the Members will be interested in this: Subject to review by the Congress within 30 days, they will also maintain a cumulative index of reports filed and not filed. Such special and regular reports to Congress will be prepared as the Congress may require. They also will serve as an election information clearinghouse. The Commission also has the power to render advisory opinions. If they give a Member an advisory opinion that he can do something, he cannot later be prosecuted because they have changed their minds.

We allow them to go to court independently on civil matters such as mandamus of a candidate to cease and desist from an illegal practice, but all criminal matters must still be handled by the Justice Department.

We require a single 10-day pre-election report instead of the present 15 and 5 days reports—because the 5-day report is meaningless anyway. A 30-day post-election report will also be required. We also require quarterly reports only if a candidate spends more than $1,000 in that quarter, so that on the off-year most Members would not have to report.

Contributions of $1,000 or more received in the last 15 days before election must be reported within 48 hours. Cash contributions over $100 are prohibited. All contributions from foreign nationals are prohibited. All contributions in the name of another are prohibited.

We also have a little thing in here which I think the Members might be interested in. That is, we require any organization which spends any money or commits any act for the purpose of influencing an election, must report as a political committee, except that if it only reports to its members, it is exempt; but if it goes national and issues reports purporting to condemn somebody for voting such a way, it has to report. We have to know the source of its income. If we want to know who that is aimed at, I do not want to say out loud, but their initials are C.C.

Those are about the main points of the agreement. I want to pay tribute to my colleagues on the House side for their steadfastness in trying to uphold the provisions of the House bill. I want to pay tribute to Senator CANNON, especially, who was very fine as chairman of the Senate side, and to the Senators who in varying degrees and varying amounts of time finally saw reason and agreed.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYS. I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. Speaker, I first want to compliment the Chairman for what I think is an excellent job in a very difficult area, and I support campaign reform.

I did not hear the Chairman comment on the issue of preemption. Is there a pre-emption clause?

Mr. HAYS. There is a preemption clause. It is the only part of the bill on these sheets which I tried to leave out in order to save time.

The pre-emption clause would become effective upon signature. The rest of the bill would become effective January 1, 1975.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman.

Mr. BRADEMAS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYS. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. BRADEMAS. Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of the conference report to S. 3044, the Federal Election Campaign Act Amendments of 1974.

Mr. Speaker, I would first like to pay a word of special tribute to the distinguished Chairman of the House Administration Committee, the Honorable WAYNE L. HAYS, Democrat of Ohio, for his outstanding leadership on this important legislation, as well as to other members of the committee, particularly the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. THOMPSON) and the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. ANNUNZIO) and the chairman of the Elections Subcommittee, the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. DENT) and the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. FRENZEL).

Indeed, members of the committee on both sides of the aisle helped make possible what I believe will come to be regarded as a major accomplishment of the 93d Congress.

Many individuals and groups contributed to the shaping and passage of this legislation. In particular, I want to pay tribute to members of the majority staff of the House Administration Committee, John Walker and Bill Sudow, to Ralph Smith and Bill Loughery of the minority staff, and to our house legislative counsel, Bill Adams and John Cimko.

Although many groups who have worked on this legislation have, at times, had differing opinions regarding specific provisions of the campaign reform bill, they have all been most helpful and I would like to extend special thanks to the Center for Public Financing of Elections and Common Cause for their contributions.

Mr. Speaker, this measure is a historic advance in the reform of our campaign finance laws, one which will go a long way toward eliminating the influence of big money in our Federal elections and one which will make our system of financing campaigns for Federal office more fair and open.

Mr. Speaker, the conference report sets strict limits on campaign expenditures and contributions. To limit the influence of big money in the areas which I believe offer the greatest potential for abuse—all phases of election to the office of President—the conference report strengthens the existing dollar checkoff law with respect to presidential general elections and authorizes the use of checkoff funds for presidential nominating conventions and presidential primary elections.

To strengthen the enforcement of Federal election laws, the conference report improves the reporting requirements of the Federal Election Campaign Act, provides for principal campaign committees to centralize reporting requirements, and establishes an independent Federal Election Commission to supervise and enforce Federal election laws.

Mr Speaker, I would like briefly to summarize the major provisions of the Federal Election Campaign Act Amendments of 1974.

CONTRIBUTION LIMITS

The bill would limit contributions to candidates by persons to $1,000 per election—primary, runoff, special election and general election.

It would limit contributions to a candidate by multi-candidate committees to $5,000 per election. Multicandidate committees would be defined as committees which have: First been registered for 6 months pursuant to the Federal Election Campaign Act; Two, received contributions from more than 50 persons; and Three, contributed to at least five candidates for Federal office.

The bill would prohibit contributions by foreign nationals and would limit the aggregate of all contributions by any individual to $25,000 per year, except that, for purposes of this limit only, non-election year contributions would be counted as contributions in an election year.

EXPENDITURE LIMITS

Mr. Speaker, the report would also set strict limits on campaign spending.

Candidates for the office of President would be able to spend no more than $20 million; candidates for nomination to the office of President could spend no more than $10 million.

Candidates for the Senate and Representative-at-large would be able to spend, in primary elections, $100,000, or 8 cents times the voting age population, whichever is greater; and, in general elections, $150,000, or 12 cents times the voter population, whichever is greater.

Candidates for the House of Representatives would be able to spend $70,000 in each of the elections, primary, general, and, if any, a runoff.

In addition, the bill would allow candidates to spend up to 20 percent above these limits to meet the costs of fundraising. This provision is particularly important in view of the substantial cost of raising campaign funds through small contributions.

The bill would also allow the national party organizations and State and local party organizations to make additional expenditures, in general elections only, on behalf of candidates for Federal office.

USE OF CASH

Mr. Speaker, the Federal Election Campaign Act amendments would impose strict limits on the use of cash by requiring that all cash contributions and cash expenditures in excess of $100 be by written instrument.

PRINCIPAL CAMPAIGN COMMITTEES AND DISCLOSURE REPORTS

To simplify reporting requirements and facilitate the dissemination of campaign finance information, the bill would eliminate the 15- and 5-day preelection reports and would substitute for them the single preelection report 10 days before each election.

In addition, the bill would require a report 30 days after each election. Candidates and committees would not be required to file quarterly reports if such a report should fall within 10 days of a pre- or post-election report or if in that quarter neither contributions nor expenditures exceed $1,000.

The bill also would provide for the designation of principal campaign committees to file consolidated reports of all expenditures and contributions of committees which support the candidate.

Conferees also agreed to a new provision that would require any organization which expends any funds or commits any act directed to the public for the purpose of influencing the outcome of an election or which publishes or broadcasts to the public any material referring to a candidate advocating the election or defeat of such candidate to file reports pursuant to the Federal Election Campaign Act, just as any other political committee must file. A question has been raised whether this section requires newspapers to file reports required therein, particularly with regard to advertising they may print favoring or opposing candidates. I wish to state that it is my understanding as a member of the Conference Committee that we did not intend to require broadcast stations or bona fide newspapers, magazines, or other periodical publications, as defined in this section, to file disclosure reports, but rather we intended to require the organizations who paid for the advertising to file.

FEDERAL ELECTION COMMISSION

Mr. Speaker, to assure full compliance with and effective enforcement of the election laws, the bill would establish an independent Federal Election Commission.

The Commission would be composed of eight members—six members of the public appointed on a bipartisan basis, two each by the Speaker of the House, the President pro tempore of the Senate and the President; and two ex-officio members, the Clerk of the House and the Secretary of the Senate, both of whom are to serve without a right to vote.

Under the bill, candidates for the House and Senate would continue to file disclosure reports with the Clerk of the House and the Secretary of the Senate. Any apparent violations of election laws which the Clerk or the Secretary discovers would have to be referred immediately to the Commission.

The Commission could then refer these apparent violations to the Department of Justice for appropriate enforcement action or could investigate these and any other complaints of alleged election law violations and encourage voluntary compliance through informal means.

The Commission would have civil enforcement authority but the Department of Justice would continue to have the sole authority to prosecute apparent violations of the criminal election laws.

Mr. Speaker, it was the intent of the conferees that the Federal Election Commission have primary jurisdiction in all election law matters and that persons or individuals or organizations who may have complaints about possible violations first exhaust their administrative remedies with the Commission. It was also the view of the conferees that the Commission should seek to effect voluntary compliance through informal administrative procedures before it initiates any civil enforcement action.

To assure expeditious enforcement action by the Department of Justice, the bill requires the Attorney General to report to the Commission on the status of referrals—60 days after the referral and at the close of every 30-day period thereafter.

To assure that regulations written by the Commission conform with the election laws, the Commission would be required to submit its regulations to the House and the Senate for review and approval.

PUBLIC FINANCING OF PRESIDENTIAL ELECTIONS

And finally, Mr. Speaker, the bill would provide a full package for public financing of Presidential elections.

The bill would strengthen the existing dollar checkoff fund established by the 1972 law Congress passed to finance Presidential general elections by providing that the amount of public money available from the checkoff fund conforms to the spending limit for general elections—$20 million—and, in order to assure that the dollars checked off by individual taxpayers are actually available, by providing that the dollar checkoff fund be self-appropriating.

In addition, the bill authorizes up to $ million of dollar checkoff funds to each of the major political parties for Presidential national nominating conventions.

Public financing for the national convention would be voluntary so that any political party that chose to continue to finance its convention with private resources could continue to do so. However, overall expenditures from both public and private sources would, under ordinary circumstances, be limited to $2 million for each party convention.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, the bill would provide for limited public financing of Presidential primary elections by authorizing matching payments from the dollar checkoff fund for small contributions.

Presidential primary candidates would receive matching payments for the first $250 or less received from each contribution. The maximum amount of public money a candidate would receive would be one-half the expenditure limit for Presidential primaries. Under this bill, that would mean that each candidate could receive up to $5 million. To prevent public financing of frivolous candidates, the bill would require a candidate to accumulate at least $5,000 in matchable contribtuions—$250 or less—in each of 20 States.

Mr. Speaker, all public funds would come from the surplus in the dollar checkoff fund after funds have been set aside to meet the estimated obligations of Presidential general elections and nominating conventions. Because experts estimate that the checkoff fund will contain approximately $64 million by 1976 and that some $46 million would be used for general elections and conventions, approximately $18 million should be available for primary elections.

Mr. Speaker, I regard public financing of presidential campaigns as one of the most important features of the bill. Clearly, the potential for the abuse of big money is the greatest in the area of presidential elections, and public financing would, in my view, drastically reduce the possibilities of abuse.

Mr. Speaker, the Federal Election Campaign Act Amendments of 1974 is solid, constructive campaign reform legislation. If passed, this bill, I am confident, will prove to be a major advance in the financing of campaigns for Federal office. I urge the adoption of the conference report.

Mr. Speaker, I include in the RECORD a summary of the campaign reform bill prepared by Susan King and Neal Gregory of the Center for Public Financing of Elections:

EFFECTIVE DATE

January 1, 1975 (except for immediate preemption of state laws).

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman.

Mr. Speaker, I started to say that I wanted to pay tribute to Senator CANNON and to the other Senators. Although Senator KENNEDY argued long and hard for total public financing, he decided—I think rightly, and he was reasonable—that we ought to have a bill, and that since the House was adamant, he and his colleagues and the Senate were split on that, and decided to go along. I want to pay tribute to him.

Mr. KETCHUM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYS. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. KETCHUM. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for attempting to explain this bill under very adverse conditions.

I just have two questions. One is on the financing of the national conventions and the provisions for public financing of Presidential campaigns. If the check off of finances does not have sufficient funds, is there some sort of formula so that both of the major parties and minor parties can qualify?

Mr. HAYS. If the check off does not have sufficient funds, the money will be provided equally, according to what is there, and both parties may raise the difference publicly, subject to the limitations of the bill. In other words, the Internal Revenue says there will be plenty of money. But should there not be, and each party was to get $17 million, they could raise $3 million in the regular way.

Mr. KETCHUM. Mr. Speaker, would the gentleman yield further?

Mr. HAYS. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. KETCHUM. Mr. Speaker, did I understand correctly that deductions on the part of corporations or companies or individuals advertising in, say, a program for the convention, to either party, those will no longer be deductible?

Mr. HAYS. No longer tax deductible.

Mr. KETCHUM. One final question. Is there a provision in the bill that provides some form of restriction on in-kind contributions?

Mr. HAYS. Well, not specifically. We tried to deal with that in a general way by giving some small exemptions. I will just give the gentleman one example. If somebody sells food and beverages for a fund raiser at not less than his cost, the difference between the wholesale price and retail price is not considered to be a contribution. We tried to spell out those various gray areas as best we could.

Mr. KETCHUM. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYS. Yes, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, I certainly want to commend the chairman of the committee for the outstanding job he has done, and particularly in view of the existing pressures, for having worked out a bill that I think protects the public interest against improperly influenced elections and at the same time prevent the bill itself from being used to influence elections improperly. Particularly I am referring to the chairman's stand against a Presidentially appointed elections commission. In light of Watergate, such a commission could have opened the door to gross abuses. We all owe the gentlemen a debt of gratitude. He and the other members of the conference committee deserve our gratitude.

Mr. HAYS. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Speaker, I prefer that the other side use some of their time. I am down to very little time left. Perhaps they can answer the questions I have not. Perhaps I will get some time and yield later.

Three important aspects of the legislation should be underlined. First, the House conferees successfully insisted that the Federal Election Commission created by the act have "primary jurisdiction with respect to the civil enforcement" of the act's provisions. The current provisions of the United States Code regulating Federal elections, with one minor exception, state that violations shall be punished through the criminal law. The bill before the House while retaining and strengthening these criminal sanctions provides also for a comprehensive system of civil enforcement. In order to assure that civil suits are not misused in a partisan manner, and that the complex and sensitive rights and duties stated in the act are administered expertly and uniformly, the act provides that all civil complaints predicated upon or pertaining in any manner to titles I and III of the act or sections 608 through 617 of title 18 United States Code shall be channeled to the Commission. Under section 315 persons challenging the constitutionality of any provision of the act, retain their right to do so in court without exhausting administrative remedies to the extent the courts have jurisdiction under established principles. The delicately balanced scheme of procedures and remedies set out in the act is intended to be the exclusive means for vindicating the rights and declaring the duties stated therein. It should also be noted that while judicial review is provided by section 314(a) when the Commission "grants" certain orders, a determination that there is no probable cause to believe that a violation charged has occurred, whether made by the Commission or the Attorney General, is not reviewable.

Second, the bill reported by the conferees follows the House bill in setting out a few carefully limited exemptions to the terms "contribution" and "expenditure" as defined in sections 591 (e) and (f) of title 18, United States Code. There are certain exemptions made to one term that are not also made to the other. This is because "contribution" standing alone refers to a donation to a candidate or other person for the latter's independent use, while an "expenditure" is the use of money and other things of value by a candidate or other person in his own name. Thus, the bill exempts communications by membership organizations to their members and by corporations to their stockholders from the definition of expenditure. That exemption, of course, includes communications by a federated organization to its members on behalf of its affiliates utilizing its own or its affiliate's resources and personnel, and by a parent corporation on behalf of its subsidiaries. No such exemption is provided to the term "contribution" because such communications plainly do not fall within the meaning of that term.

Finally, the conferees, again at the insistance of the House, developed a new section 308 to be added to title III of the act. That section requires organizations that buy space or time in the mass media or utilize such means as mailings to non-members in order to influence the outcome of an election or to state a candidates position on any public issue, voting record or other official act, to report in essentially the same manner as a political committee. This section does not require an organization to report simply because it directs communications to its members even if a small number of those communications are provided to others at their request; because an official responds to requests for information by the press or participates in a conference or meeting devoted to the discussion of issues of public importance; or because, as permitted by law, the organization establishes a political committee.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. DEVINE).

(Mr. DEVINE asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DEVINE. Mr. Speaker, I rise not to discuss the technical aspects of the bill, but to speak particularly to my colleagues from this side of the aisle who have had a great deal of concern about the public financing aspects of this legislation.

I was one of about 45 Members who voted against this bill when it came through the House, on the basis of my concern on the public financing features of it, and knowing the strong position of the other body on Presidential, Vice Presidential, senatorial, and congressional public financing, I must compliment the chairman of the Committee on House Administration, who was also chairman of the conference, on the tremendous amount of work and patience he exhibited during the conference. The gentleman had some rather strong persons from the other body, such as Senator KENNEDY, Senator SCOTT, Senator GRIFFIN, Senator CANNON, and others, and they were almost adamant in their position of public financing across the board, including the House and the Senate.

Our chairman and the House conferees stood steadfast against the conferees on the other side, and it was not easy.

Our chairman, the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. HAYS), was unjustly accused by the organization he identified as "C.C." I will call it Common Cause. It was no surprise. It accused him of throwing a roadblock in this legislation.

He worked hard to get a bill out that he thought meaningful and which we all felt meaningful, to the point where I, as one of the conferees who voted against this bill when it came through, intend to vote for the conference report.

Mr. HAYS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEVINE. Yes, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. HAYS. Speaking of roadblocks, one thing that slowed the conference down is the fact that the Common Cause lobby was outside the door all the time sending messages in to staff people, which went to conferees, and that took several hours. Otherwise, we would have gotten through a lot quicker.

Mr. DEVINE. As far as the House is concerned, the House and Senate no longer are included in the public financing feature.

The limitation on the amount for primary and elections of representatives was increased from $60,000, plus 25 percent for fundraising expenses, to $70,000, plus 20 percent, which totals roughly $84,000.

If one adheres to the exact language of the bill, this, I think, is a compromise between the Senate position, where they wanted to guarantee $90,000 to every single congressional candidate who wanted to file for office and who could then qualify under the Senate version.

By and large, in my opinion, the conference report is good, and I intend to vote for it.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEVINE. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I wonder if I might get the attention of the chairman of the Committee on House Administration so that I can pursue the question I wanted to ask the chairman of the Committee on House Administration earlier.

I should like to ask about the qualification of minor parties for public financing, as provided for in this conference report.

Let us assume, if we can, that parties qualify under the laws of each State, and in one State we have a third party listed on the ballot as the American Party; in another State, the third party listed is the Independent Party; in another State, it is the American-Independent Party, each nominating the same candidate or the same candidates for President and Vice President. How is the 5 percent of the vote figured which would qualify a party or the candidate for some share of public financing?

Mr. HAYS. To answer the gentleman, the preceding election would be the qualifier. If somebody purporting to be a candidate of one party ran in different States under different labels, I do not see what we can stretch the law to prevent it. They have to get more than 5 percent and less than 15 percent of the vote to be qualified as a minor party.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Under the same party label in all States and with the same party trustees, as it were, in all States?

Mr. HAYS. The Commission can issue regulations.

It would be, I believe, the intent of the House conferees—and I am not speaking for the Senate—that they would actually vote under the same label.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. So that the same party would have to qualify in several different States in order to qualify under the 5-percent provision?

Mr. HAYS. I would think they would have to qualify in several different States in order to accumulate the 5 percent.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. DEVINE) has expired.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 additional minutes to the gentleman from California (Mr. ROUSSELOT).

Mr. ROUSSELOT. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the gentleman's yielding.

Just so the record is clear, and I am sure we all understand this, even though the so-called income tax form checkoff system, has been validated so that individuals may participate on a voluntary basis, those "checkoff" dollars still have to come out of the Treasury, and it is an add-on cost to all other appropriations that we have made; is that not true?

Mr. DEVINE. Mr. Speaker, the checkoff system is a voluntary effort on the part of the taxpayer who feels he would like to participate in public funding of a Presidential and Vice-Presidential campaign. It does not mean he is charged the dollar out of his income tax return; it means the dollar he pays into the Treasury is earmarked for the campaign, the first $2 million of which goes to each party for the convention and the balance of which, up to $20 million, goes to each major party.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. DEVINE. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. ROUSSELOT Those dollars are still add-on dollars, dollars that have to come out of the Federal Treasury?

Mr. DEVINE. They constitute a net loss to the Treasury, that is correct.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. Even though it could be considered indirect, this means that this bill establishes another way by which we will be contributing to deficit financing?

Mr. DEVINE. Yes. We are talking in the area of about $44 million each 4 years.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield further, I will ask this:

So this great belief and myth that has been promoted by several organizations that this is kind of "free money" clearly is not true?

Mr. DEVINE. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman well knows there is no such thing as free money. We in Washington are merely distributors; we are not producers. It all must come from the taxpayers.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for his response.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Colorado (Mr. ARMSTRONG).

(Mr. ARMSTRONG asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. Speaker, I am grateful to my friend, the gentleman from Minnesota, for yielding time to me. I commend the gentleman and other Members who have worked to bring this conference report before the House. I congratulate them on their effort. But I disagree with the result.

As I have told Members of the House before, I think there are many mischievous provisions in this legislation.

Mr. Speaker, there is some good in this legislation. I am particularly pleased that the conference report provides a strong independent commission to enforce provisions of this act.

But I would be remiss if I did not voice my objection to Federal financing of conventions and to the failure of this bill to adequately define and outlaw certain improper in-kind contributions, and for the fact that it is in tone and in detail a proincumbent bill. It is really a "sweetheart" bill, one that will serve primarily to reelect incumbents and make it harder than ever for challengers to unseat an entrenched incumbent.

But, Mr. Speaker, the part of this bill that make it most objectionable, the part that makes an antireform bill, is the provision that limits the right of voters to speak out on candidates who are running for public office.

It is one thing to limit candidates expenditures. But it is completely wrong to limit the rights of citizens in this regard.

Although it is probably unconstitutional to do so, it may be a good policy to restrict candidate spending.

However, when that same limitation is applied to people who are not running for office, people who are simply attempting to comment on the election process, it is a different matter. When we give to candidates for public office the veto power over other persons rights, those who wish only to comment, those who may want to support a candidate, those who may want to oppose one candidate and support another, and those who may want to take out a newspaper advertisement to say, "A pox on both candidates," then we are tinkering with a fundamental right of the American people.

We are introducing a concept that is probably unconstitutional, as indeed a 3-judge court in New York said not too long ago in the case of ACLU against Jennings. I believe the Supreme Court will affirm the lower court's ruling in that case.

But it is not my purpose to argue the narrow legal question. I am simply telling the Members it is wrong. I think in our hearts we know it is wrong; we know it is contrary to the American system and it is contrary to the spirit of the election process. I believe the day will come when we will reverse this unwise act we are about to take.

So with regret I am going to vote against this conference report. Not regret because I am taking what I know will be an unpopular position, but regret that the House has once again failed to institute true reform in legislation and has, instead, brought to us legislation that is reform in name only and which is, in fact, antireform.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 5 minutes.

(Mr. FRENZEL asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of the conference report to the bill S. 3044, the Federal Election Campaign Act Amendments of 1974.

The conferees have adopted most of the best provisions of the House and Senate bills. The final results is a bill with numerous strengths and few weaknesses. Perhaps the greatest weakness is the low spending limit which makes the bill to some extent, an "incumbent protection bill." Also, the bill does not repeal the equal time provision and fails to stringently regulate special interest giving, but it does have the following positive features:

First, and most importantly, the bill establishes an independent Federal Elections Commission with the power and authority to oversee all Federal election law. Commissioners will be full-time and serve 6-year terms. Two will be appointed by the President, two by the President pro tempore upon the recommendations of the majority and minority leaders of the Senate, and two by the Speaker upon the recommendations of the majority and minority leaders of the House. The Commission will have both subpena and civil enforcement powers. Criminal enforcement remains with the Justice Department, but the Attorney General is held accountable to the Commission for reporting on the disposition of violations referred to him. The establishment of an independent Commission is the key provision in the bill. It will assure judicious, expeditious enforcement of the law, while reversing the long history of nonenforcement.

Second, the conference report sets limitations on contributions. No individual will be allowed to give more than $1,000 per election per candidate. No political committee more than $5,000. Individuals will be limited to $25,000 in contributions to all candidates and committees every 2 years. The $25,000 provision will be the death knell of the "fat cat". It will take not 1 year, but 160 years for the Stewart Motts and Clement Stones and other big spenders to give $2 million to all Federal candidates, and 2,000 years to give $2 million to one candidate.

Third, expenditures are limited to $70,000 per House race plus 20 percent for fund raising or $84,000. In Senate races and races for Representative in States with only one Representative, a candidate can spend the greater of $100,000 or 8 cents per voter in the primary election and $150,000 or 12 cents per voter in the general election. A candidate for President can spend up to $10 million for the nomination and $20 million in the general election. Coupled with the cost of living index and the provisions which allow parties to spend independently of candidates, the bill will eliminate the worst spending abuses, while assuring that a challenger has at least some chance to defeat an incumbent.

Fourth, the bill increases the role of political parties in campaign financing. Both the national committee and the State committee of a political party will be able to make expenditures of $10,000 to candidates for the House in addition to the expenditure limitations imposed on the candidate. By contributing to a candidate, the party can increase his spending limit by $20,000. The comparable figures for Senate races and races for Representative in a State with only one Representative will be the greater of $20,000 or 2 cents per voter.

Fifth, candidates will be encouraged to raise funds from small contributors through the 20 percent allowance for fund raising.

Sixth, the bill limits cash contributions to $100.

Seventh, the bill prohibits contributions by foreign nationals.

Eighth, expenditures from the candidate's personal funds and the personal funds of his immediate family are reduced to $25,000 for the House, $35,000 for the Senate and $50,000 for the President.

Ninth, the conference agreement limits honorariums to $1,000 per appearance and $15,000 per calendar year.

Tenth, the bill makes it unlawful for a candidate or any agent or employee of a candidate to fraudulently misrepresent himself as acting for or on behalf of any candidate or political party.

Eleventh, it requires rating groups and other organizations which attempt to influence public opinion to register with the Commission as a political committee and report the source and amount of its funds and its expenditures.

Twelfth, it requires all candidates to designate a principal campaign committee and depository. All reports by committees supporting a candidate must be compiled by the principal campaign committee and all expenditures must be made by a check drawn on the depository, except for petty cash expenditures of less than $100.

Thirteenth, the bill reduces the 5- and 15-day preelection reports to one 10-day report. Also, candidates will not have to file reports in any calendar quarter in which they receive contributions or make expenditures of less than $1,000.

Fourteenth, the Commission can give candidates advisory opinions which determine whether specific transactions or activities are violations of the law. Any candidate who complies with an advisory opinion shall be presumed to be in compliance with the law.

Fifteenth, the bill provides for expeditious review of constitutional questions. Unlike at present, we will not be left in limbo for a prolonged period of time because of the failure of the courts to expeditiously review the constitutionality of election law.

Sixteenth, the bill preempts State laws. Candidates will no longer have to worry about complying with 51 different sets of standards and reporting requirements.

Seventeenth, the media expenditure limitations are repealed. Candidates will have the flexibility to spend their money as they see fit.

Eighteenth, State and local employees are allowed to participate in political campaigns.

Nineteenth, public financing is limited to Presidential races. While there is too much public financing in the bill to suit my taste, we will at least get a chance to see how it works in the 1976 elections. The conferees wisely decided that it was better to risk disaster in only one race rather than 469 races.

Twentieth, the bill becomes effective on January 1, 1975 after the campaign has ended and before special interests and other persons have time to invent schemes to use the period before the effective date to carry out activities that are legal presently, but illegal under the new act.

The House Republican Task Force on Election Reform, of which I am chairman, has enthusiastically endorsed this bill as a major step forward in the cleaning up of the electoral process. I urge Members on both sides of the aisle to give overwhelming support to final passage of this bill.

Mr. Speaker, passage of this legislation will end the American people's long wait for a positive response to the events of the past few years. No other practical concrete action can do more to restore public confidence than the passage of a meaningful campaign reform bill. By giving overwhelming support to this landmark legislation, we will send a clear message to the American people that Congress is concerned about, and responsive to the need to restore public confidence in our democratic system of government.

The conferees have agreed to a far-reaching set of reforms which will place limitations on contributions and expenditures, create an independent administration and enforcement mechanism, publicly finance presidential elections, and maintain and strengthen the disclosure provisions of the 1971 law.

While the conferees were most careful in their deliberations and spent considerable time and effort in coming to an agreement, there were some finer points that have not been covered in either the bill or the conference report. There was not sufficient time in the conference to deal with these problems. I would like to comment on them briefly today.

PROLIFERATION LANGUAGE

A major problem with the limitations on contributions is that organizations that contribute to candidates may attempt to proliferate their political committees to circumvent the limitations. Thus, an organization could subdivide into 20 committees each able to give $5,000 or a total of $100,000 to a candidate. This subterfuge would be clearly a violation of the law.

The conference accepted the House version on committee limits. The House report contained language in two places dealing with this problem. Unfortunately, due to an oversight, the conference report only included the lanugage on page 16 of the House report. It should have also included the language on page 5, which reads as follows:

A question was raised in the committee regarding possibility of circumventing the limit on contributions by political committees where a national committee of a political organization may contribute the maximum amount to a candidate and a state or local sub-unit or subsidiary of that committee may also contribute to the same candidate. It is the intent of the committee to allow the maximum contribution from each level of the organization if the decision or judgment to make such contribution is independently exercised within the separate levels of the organization. However, if the subsidiary or sub-unit organizations are under the control or direction of the parent organization with respect to their contributions to specific candidates, then the organizations acting in concert would constitute one political committee for the purpose of the contribution limits included in this bill.

In my judgment, the conferees agreed with the House analysis.

MULTICANDIDATE COMMITTEE ADMINISTRATIVE EXPENSES

A second major problem is that of the administrative expenses of multicandidate committee. The conferees generally agreed that it would be difficult, if not impossible to attempt to prorate the normal day-to-day administrative expenses of multicandidate committees to each individual candidate. Any effort to attribute these costs to the contribution and expenditure limitations of any candidate would be unfair to both the candidate and the committee. Language that would clear up this issue was inadvertently left out of the report.

However, there is general agreement among the conferees that the provisions placing limitations on contributions and expenditures should not require a multicandidate committee, a national committee of a political party, the senatorial campaign committees, the congressional campaign committees, and a State committee of a political party to credit to a candidate's limitations on expenditures and contributions or to otherwise attribute to any political candidates or his political committees a portion of their normal day-to-day expenses.

Any other interpretation would create an enormous amount of administrative busy work for all candidates and might cause wholesale violations of the law. For example, a congressional campaign committee might spend approximately $14,000 per year per Member in administrative expenses for staff and services. If these expenses were credited to each Member's contribution limitations, every Member would be in violation of the law. If they were credited to candidates' spending limitations, how would the costs be apportioned to each candidate?

If a candidate was not offered any services by the committee or did not want any staff or services credited to his campaign, how could he be forced to attribute them to his limitation? The best solution seems to be to exempt normal, administrative expenses from the limitations.

These day-to-day expenses should be defined to include such items as research, speech writing, general party organization and travel, party publications, fund raising expenses, staff at various party headquarters in the field and national convention expenditures, provided that such expenses do not contribute directly to any candidate's campaign effort.

The Federal Elections Commission will have to publish specific regulations on these and other matters that are not completely clear in either the law or the report.

NEWSLETTERS

Questions have been raised as to whether or not congressional newsletters and other similar publications would be considered expenditures under the provisions of this bill. The congressional franking law passed last spring clearly states that such newsletters and other similar publications are legitimate expenses and can be sent under the frank. In general, I believe the Commission should follow the following guideline: if any item or publication can be sent under the frank, it should not be counted as an expenditure for the purpose of influencing an election. Hence, congressional newsletters and other similar publications need not be credited to the contribution or expenditures limits of congressional candidates.

EXPENDITURES AND CONTRIBUTIONS INFLUENCING ELECTIONS

In attempting to ascertain whether or not a contribution or expenditure by a group or organization is made for the purpose of influencing an election, the Commission should take into account the nature and goals of the organization making such expenditure. For example, a party committee might stage a seminar or workshop for party workers on campaign methods or techniques. It would be difficult to compute how much such seminars or workshops aid a candidate. Even if this could be computed, it would be incidental to the primary purpose of the program, because the main goal of such party activities is to strengthen the party, not to benefit the candidate.

On the other hand, if a special interest committee were to conduct the same type of activity, especially in an area in which there are candidates which it supports, there might be a significant difference. Special interest committees often conduct such affairs for the purpose of aiding friendly candidates. The main goal of special interest political activity is usually to influence leigslators and campaigns, while that of the party is usually to build a strong party organization.

The Commission should also investigate the differences between party publications and special interest publications, and party field workers and special interest field workers. The goal of the party in each instance is generally not, like in the case of many special interest groups, directly influencing elections and legislation, but building a strong party organization.

SECTION 308

The bill inserts a new section in the Federal Election Campaign Act—section 308) which will require groups and organizations which expend any funds or commit any act directed to the public for the purpose of influencing the outcome of an election, or which publishes or broadcasts to the public material intended to influence the public opinion with respect to candidates for Federal office to register with the commission as a political committee and report the source and amount of its funds and of its expenditures.

During the Senate debate—on page S 18526 of the October 8, 1974, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, the Senator from Nevada (Mr. CANNON) is quoted as saying:

> But this section does not reach an organization that limits itself to activities along the following lines: issuing communications directed to its members, making its position known to members of the press and to public officials, or participating in conferences and meetings and other discussions devoted to public issues. In other words, section 308 will cover organizations that use their funds to propagandize the general public but does not restrict internal communications or restrict the flow of news or the discussion of public issues.

As a House conferee on this bill, I disagree with that statement. This section is clearly intended to include rating sheets, press releases, press conferences, communications to the press, seminars, and other similar activities which are directed at the public or which attempt to influence public opinion with respect to officeholders or candidates. It specifically includes publications "primarily for distribution to individuals affiliated by membership or stock ownership with the person distributing it."

The purpose of this provision is not to discourage such activity, but to insure that the public is aware of the persons who contribute to and are responsible for these activities.

The Senator's statement might exclude Common Cause, the American Conservative Union, the American Civil Liberties Union and the environmental groups which sponsor the "dirty dozen" list. No one would argue that it is the purpose of this provision to exempt these groups, nor is it intended to exempt any other particular group.

This provision is intended to apply indiscriminately and will bring under the disclosure provisions many groups, including liberal, labor, environmental, business and conservative organizations. Section 308 does not make any exceptions. While there are exemptions made to other provisions of the law—such as section 610, no exemptions are made to this provision. The Commission and the courts should not allow what is clear from the legislative language of the bill and the report of the conferees to be changed by legislative history on the floor. The language of the bill and the report must take precedence over legislative history made on the floor.

SEPARATE ELECTIONS

Under the 1971 law, considerable confusion was created by the use of the phrase "nomination for election, or election." The courts, candidates and administrators and enforcers of the law frequently made different interpretations of its meaning.

Under the new law, such confusion should be avoided. In the case of limitations on the use of a candidate's personal funds and the personal funds of his immediate family, it is clear that during the course of the entire campaign, a candidate for House may spend $25,000, a candidate for the Senate $35,000, and a candidate for President $50,000.

In the case of contribution limitations, an individual can contribute $1,000 for the primary campaign and $1,000 for the general election. If there is a primary runoff, an individual can contribute an additional $1,000. If, as may be the case in the State of Georgia, there is a runoff in the general election, an individual can contribute another $1,000. This same principle applies to multicandidate committees.

In the case of expenditure limitations, a candidate for the House may spend $70,000 for the primary campaign and $70,000 for the general election—plus fundraising and party expenditures. If the candidate is forced into a primary runoff, he can spend an additional $70,000—plus fundraising. If, as may be the case in the State of Georgia, there is a runoff in the general election, he may spend an additional $70,000—plus fundraising. Without allowance for these additional amounts, a candidate might find himself unable to spend anything in a primary or general election runoff. This would make a mockery of the election process. Instead, the candidate must be allowed to spend up to the $70,000 limit in the primary, primary runoff, the general election and the general election runoff.

In some States, the party convention is tantamount to the primary election. In some of these cases, a candidate might invest $70,000 to win the nomination at the convention. However, an opponent might receive enough of the convention votes to force a primary. If one or both of the candidates spent up to the $70,000 limits for the convention, they would be unable to spend anything for the primary. In such cases, the Commission should use its discretion to determine whether one or more candidates should be allowed to spend additional funds. These same principles should apply to Senate races and races for Representative in a State with only one Representative.

MULTICANDIDATE COMMITTEE FUNDRAISING LOOPHOLE

I believe that the conferees intended that the provision which exempts multicandidate committee fundraising costs from being credited to the candidates' spending and contribution limits—section 102(d)—should not allow five or more candidates—especially in large metropolitan areas—to join together in setting up dummy fundraising committees which would spend large sums of money allegedly raising funds for those candidates, but actually using fundraising techniques to increase the candidates' name recognition and expenditure limitation. Rather, it is intended to cover those groups which raise money genuinely independent of each candidate's campaign and which would be put at a disadvantage if the money they spend raising funds had to be prorated and added to the actual contribution given to each candidate.

SLATECARD EXEMPTION

I believe that the purpose of the provision which exempts slatecards and printed listings of three or more candidates for public office from the definitions of contribution and expenditure is not to allow candidates or political committees to circumvent the disclosure provisions and the limitations on contributions and expenditures by waging extensive campaigns using sample ballots, slatecards, and other similar devices, but rather to allow State and local parties to educate the general public.

IN-WRITING LOOPHOLE

The conference substitute states that if a contribution is given to a political committee authorized by the candidate in writing to accept contributions for that candidate, then that contribution is treated as a contribution to the candidate. This provision is not intended to allow a candidate to receive contributions in excess of the limits simply by having the contributions go to a political committee which is not authorized in writing to accept contributions for the candidate. Paragraph (6) of subsection 608(b) states that all contributions made by a person, either directly or indirectly, on behalf of a particular candidate, including contributions which are in any way earmarked or otherwise directed through an intermediary or conduit to the candidate, shall be treated as contributions from the original donor to the candidate.

HONORARIUMS

The conference substitute limits honorariums to $1,000 per appearance and a total of $15,000 per calendar year. I concur with the discussion by Senators SCOTT and CANNON on page S18526 of the October 8, 1974, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, except that I believe a candidate or Federal Government official cannot accept more than one $1,000 honorarium from the same organization in the same calendar year. I do not feel that it was the intent of the conferees to allow circumvention of the limitations on honorariums by accepting more than one honorarium from the same organization on the same trip or from the same organization during the same calendar year.

PRESIDENTIAL AND VICE-PRESIDENTIAL CAMPAIGN TRIPS

The President and Vice President often must fly an official plane to political events. The cost of such trips often runs into the tens of thousands of dollars and is sometimes paid for by the national committee of the President's party. Questions have arisen as to whether the cost of the trip should be counted as a contribution and/or expenditure. Certainly it should not. Any other interpretation would be contrary to the spirit of the law. If these costs were to count as contributions, the President and Vice President would be faced with the choice of either violating the law by exceeding the $1,000 limit on contributions by individuals to a candidate or forgoing any political activity outside the Washington area.

These costs should not count against the candidate's expenditure limitation because it would be unfair to both the President and the candidate to require the candidate to use up to $30,000 out of a $70,000 limitation just to fly with the President. The President has the same constitutional rights of free movement and free speech as other citizens. For the purposes of the limitations, the cost of such trips must be considered what it would normally cost a person to travel by commercial airline.

PREEMPTION OF STATE LAW

The conference bill specifically preempts State law. It is the intent of the conferees to preempt local laws as well. The legislative counsel informed members of the conference that to specifically mention local law in the bill would jeopardize the intent of the United States Code where reference to State law is also meant to include local law.

FULL-TIME COMMISSION

The bill provides that the Commission meets at least monthly and at the call of any Member. Fears have been expressed that the Commissioners will construe this provision to mean that, except for election time, they need only sweep into Washington once a month to meet the requirements of the job. To the contrary, the Commissioners should be continually on the job and ready to deal with the important, complex provisions of election law. The Congress intends that the Commission be genuinely full-time and that the Members meet frequently—daily or continually all year around if necessary—to oversee and supervise Federal elections.

CORPORATE CONTRIBUTIONS

Recently, several corporate consulting firms and other similar corporate entities have attempted to circumvent the prohibition on contributions by corporations by using the following device or a variation thereof. A candidate contracts with a corporate firm to have the firm perform certain services for the candidate. In turn, the contract stipulates that the candidate will reimburse the firm for its services. However, if the candidate fails to raise sufficient funds to pay for the services, the corporate firm will absorb the difference. Sometimes, by incurring the difference between the amount raised and the cost of the services provided, the corporate firm takes a large loss, even totaling in the hundreds of thousands of dollars. Since all of this exchange occurs under a contract, candidates and corporate consulting firms have even claimed that there is no debt involved and that nothing need be reported to the supervisory officer.

This is clearly a subterfuge and should be considered an illegal effort to circumvent the prohibition on corporate giving.

CONTRIBUTIONS "IN-KIND"

The definition of contribution includes the phrase "anything of value." The purpose of this phrase is to include donations that cannot be classified as deposits of money, loans, cash, and so forth, but which help influence elections. Such donations include cars, storefronts, airplanes, trucks, food and other items that are given to a candidate or committee in an effort to aid or abet his or its campaign. Clearly, all such donations and contributions must be reported and credited to a candidate's contribution and expenditure limitations. Charges have been recently made that donations of these types—contributions "in-kind"—are not and have not been reported. If the charges are true, such activities are in violation of the law.

For example, accusations have been made that individuals have been working, allegedly voluntarily, for a candidate when they are on the payroll of a political committee, group or organization which does not exclusively support the candidate. In the future, when such complaints are made, the Commission shall immediately and expeditiously make an investigation of such charges. If the Commission determines that a person is on the payroll of another organization or group, then the candidate or organization must be held responsible and liable for violation of the law and the value of his or its services must be credited to the candidate's limitation.

Similarly, if a complaint is filed that a candidate is receiving, free of charge, fleets of buses, cars or trucks or other goods and services from a committee, organization, or group that is not exclusively supporting that candidate, the Commission shall immediately and expeditiously make an investigation of such charge and make sure that any such donation is credited to the candidate's limitation and that any candidate or committee that violates this principle is held liable for his or its actions.

The Commission should also promulgate regulations requiring all contributions "in-kind" to be disclosed. Such regulations should also require that these donations be credited to the contribution and expenditure limitations of the candidate who benefits from such donations and expenses. The Commission should stipulate that any violation of these regulations will be treated as a violation of the law.

This interpretation of the phrase "contribution means anything of value" is necessary so that the letter and intent of the law will not be nullified.

Mr. Speaker, I am here urging everyone to support the conference on the bill S. 3044, the Federal Election Campaign Act Amendments of 1974 and to urge each of the Members to read the conference report and the bill itself. It is a monumental change over the way we have operated. It will change the way the Members campaign, the way they raise money, the way parties conduct themselves. It will be the greatest change in our political lifetime.

So I repeat that it is extremely important that each Member be very attentive to all of the provisions of the law.

There is, for instance, the limitation on honorariums. There is the removal of the Hatch Act restrictions for local and State employees.

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENZEL. I am happy to yield to my friend, the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. ANNUNZIO. I thank my friend, the gentleman from Minnesota.

The gentleman mentioned honorariums, and then stopped. Is the gentleman for the limitation on honorariums? I would like to know his position in explaining this particular provision of the conference report.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, the conference report provides that Members shall not accept honorariums of more than $1,000 nor more than $15,000 in a single year. I am strongly for that, although I like the House proposal of $10,000 even better. We were negotiated up to $15,000. I think all Members should be proud of that feature of the bill.

I would like to state further, Mr. Speaker, that the idea for this originated from the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. ANNUNZIO) and that gentleman deserves the plaudits of the whole House for presenting this idea, and in getting it carried through.

Mr. ANNUNZIO. If the gentleman will yield further, I am hoping that the people in the other body, who will not be earning the $80,000 to $90,000 that they had been earning previously, will now come along to acting more wisely when the measure of a pay raise comes up.

Mr. FRENZEL. I thank the gentleman for his contributions.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENZEL. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, when the previous gentleman was speaking, the question was asked about the qualifications of a national party for the 5-percent vote in the previous election. Now my question is: If a candidate runs, as happens in New York and Ohio, as a member of the Conservative Party or the Liberal Party and the Democrat or Republican Party, who would get the 5-percent credit in the next election, so far as the votes that were cast?

Mr. FRENZEL. I support the explanation which the chairman, the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. HAYS), gave, and that is that the allocation goes to the party.

Mr. BAKER. Which party?

Mr. FRENZEL. Whichever one got the 5 percent.

Mr. BAKER. But he was running as a member of the Conservative Party, and in the Democrat Party, dually.

Mr. FRENZEL. The party is not running dually; the candidate is running dually. The allocation goes to the party that got the votes. If the Conservative Party got 5 percent in the last election, their nominee, whoever he or she is in the next election, would qualify for his proportion because of that party's success in getting 5 percent.

Mr. BAKER. But if one individual is running under the dual-party label in the Conservative Party and Democrat Party, who will get credit for his votes when you calculate the 5 percent, the Conservative Party or the Democrat Party?

Mr. FRENZEL. In my judgment under this bill he would qualify for both.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, I think that we ought to make it crystal clear, at least, that my interpretation is if he is running in one State as a dual candidate, this applies only to national parties in the national election, and if a candidate is running as a liberal conservative or a Democratic liberal in New York, his vote in the conservative line and liberal line would have to equal 5 percent of the total national vote or he could not qualify.

I would like to know if the gentleman does not agree with that.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 6 additional minutes.

I do agree with the chairman's explanation.

Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENZEL. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. DERWINSKI. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

On that same question, may I say I am very concerned that we are creating a problem that will beset our two great major parties. I believe very strongly in our two-party system, but we have, as I understand it, in this bill no restriction on funding of third parties except for a 5-percent vote. There is not any minimum number of States to qualify. In other words, if "A" gets more than 5 percent of the national vote in two or three States, we would have a national party.

Mr. FRENZEL. That is correct.

Mr. DERWINSKI. So that a regional party in effect, merely by gaining 5 percent of the national vote, qualifies for funding under provisions that apply.

Mr. FRENZEL. That is correct.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENZEL. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. HAYS. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I would like to have the attention of the gentleman from Illinois. They could qualify, and if they get merely 5 percent of the vote, they would get merely 5 percent of the maximum in the next election, so they would not get the full $20 million.

Mr. FRENZEL. Correct.

Mr. STEIGER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENZEL. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. STEIGER of Wisconsin. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Under section 318 of the conference report, which is entitled "Use of Contributed Amounts for Certain Purposes," without reading all of section 318, says that:

> . . . ordinary and necessary expenses incurred by him in connection with his duties as a holder of Federal office, may be contributed by him to any organization . . . or may be used for any other lawful purpose.

My question of either the gentleman from Minnesota or the gentleman from Ohio is, What is "any other lawful purpose"? If a Member of Congress happens to have $25,000 that is not spent in excess of the full limit of $70,000, are such lawful purposes entertaining constituents in the House Restaurant; maintaining a standing supply of coffee, Cokes, and snacks in the individual Member's offices; employing extra staff, such as a personal page; or paying for a life membership in the National Democratic Club or the neighboring Capitol Hill Club?

Mr. FRENZEL. I think some of those would qualify and some would not. The reason we put "lawful purposes" in there is because there was some existing law, and some IRS regulations which does allow some expenses. Typical would be a contribution back to a political party, or a contribution to another candidate, or a contribution to charity. We did intend that the money could be used for expenses for running one's office, and I expect that that qualification might be amplified further by rule, as we could define particular kinds of office expenses that we had in mind.

Mr. STEIGER of Wisconsin. If the gentleman will yield further, could the gentleman from Ohio indicate his own view?

Mr. FRENZEL. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. HAYS. I generally tend to agree with what the gentleman said, that one could use it for necessary office expenses: A newsletter, or extra stamps, if he needs them, or an automobile, the leasing of a car for his district office. If some Members do that, it might be, in my judgment, a legitimate expense for official business. Those are the kinds of things we had in mind, things that Members in general do—buying tickets to charitable fundraisers, which takes a lot of money in the off-year from my fund. Those are things that we considered legitimate expenses.

Mr. STEIGER of Wisconsin. I thank both gentlemen for their explanations.

Mr. HAYS. If the gentleman will yield further, let me say to the gentleman from Wisconsin whatever those expenses are, one will ultimately have to disclose them. In other words, if one does not spend over $1,000 a quarter in the off year, he will not disclose it in the quarter, but at the end of the year he will have to, so that it will be the subject of public scrutiny in any case.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, I would urge all Members of this House to vote for what I think is a positive election reform bill. I believe that passage of this legislation will end the American people's long wait for a positive response to the events of the past few years. No other practical, concrete action can do more to restore public confidence than the passing of a meaningful campaign reform bill. This is a meaningful campaign reform bill. By giving overwhelming bipartisan support to this landmark legislation, we can send a clear message to the American people that Congress is concerned about and responsive to the need to restore public confidence in our democratic system of government.

Mr. Speaker, I do not see the minority leader on the floor. He indicated his willingness to speak in support of the conference report, although certainly his enthusiasm for it would be less than mine.

I would like, before yielding, to say a word about the chairman of the House Committee on Administration. As many Members know we have had strongly differing opinions about many of the features of this bill. I cannot let the occasion pass without giving him great, overwhelming credit for the production of this conference report. It is very seldom in the course of the passage of a bill that one man dominates or controls, and without whom there would be no bill. But such was the case with the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. HAYS). His defense of the House position in the conference was outstanding, and his determination and his patience to move this bill along have been equally outstanding. I congratulate him for his work on this bill and in this field. His performance occasionally has been maligned in certain quarters. I would like to say as one who has opposed him on many, if not most, of the substantive issues that I have never doubted his motivation nor his desire. He has proven to us today what they were and how important they were. So I do congratulate the gentleman for his outstanding achievement.

Mr. SANDMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENZEL. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SANDMAN. Mr. Speaker, I intend to support this bill because it has some improvements over the system we have.

One thing disturbs me about this, and this is again only for my own information, but has anybody bothered to check into the constitutionality of what we are doing? Does the gentleman believe we are meeting the requirements of the 14th amendment when we set particular standards on what a candidate has to raise before he qualifies to get so much money, because we are not giving all candidates the same amount of money?

Mr. FRENZEL. Yes; the gentleman makes a valid point.

There are many members of the conference committee, including, I believe, the chairman, who believe that this feature may be unconstitutional.

I believe within this conference report there are at least 100 items questionable from a constitutional standpoint. Any time we pass legislation in this field we are causing constitutional doubts to be raised. I have many myself. I think the gentleman has pointed out a good one. We have done the best we could to bring out a bill which we hope may pass the constitutional test. But, we do not doubt that some questions will be raised quickly.

I do call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that any individual under this bill has a direct method to raise these questions and to have those considered as quickly as possible by the Supreme Court.

Mr. SANDMAN. Is there any decision that supports what we are doing?

Mr. FRENZEL. I know of no decision that supports the raising of this amount of money.

I yield to the gentleman from Ohio for his response.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Speaker, I am not a lawyer but I rely on the best counsel we can get. Counsel says since this money is being given out of the Federal Treasury that the Congress can put any conditions or requirements on the person that Congress wants to before the person receives that gift from the Federal Treasury.

I do not know whether it is constitutional or not.

Let me say one more thing to the gentleman and that is all I have to say on the subject. I have been here 26 years and I must have heard the question of constitutionality raised on at least 2,000 bills, and I suppose if I had voted against a bill every time somebody had a question of constitutionality on it, I would have had an almost complete voting record of "No." I think we have to let the courts decide.

Mr. SANDMAN. I do intend to vote for the legislation. I think a good job has been done in producing it and it is a good improvement over what we have. However I have serious reservations as to whether what we are doing meets the provisions of the 14th amendment.

Mr. FRENZEL. I thank the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to the distinguished minority leader, the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. RHODES).

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Speaker, I thank my good friend, the gentleman from Minnesota, for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I intend to support the conference report. I congratulate the chairman and the gentleman from Minnesota and the other conferees on what I think is a really Herculean task well performed.

I do not want to leave the impression that I am completely satisfied with the bill. I still think it is a bill to preserve the Democratic majority in Congress; but I do think my good friend, the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. HAYS) did as good a job as anybody could have done in wearing the hat of the chairman of the House Administration Committee, instead of the hat of the chairman of the Democratic Campaign Committee; but I do think in the future it is going to be necessary to look at the provisions of this bill which have to do with a limitation on total spending for candidates for the House and for the Senate.

I think everybody knows it is usually the challenger who has to spend more in his campaign to be successful than an incumbent does. Since there are more Democratic incumbents than there are Republican incumbents, it is obvious that the spending limitation would work to the benefit of the Democratic majority of Congress. I can understand why that is the situation; but nevertheless, the bill is as good a bill as we can get. I suggest we adopt the conference report and then as time goes by, with legislative oversight, do whatever is necessary to make it more just.

(Mr. FRENZEL asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, as this bill passed the House, I believe there was a limitation of $5,000 on contributions by the National Republican and Democratic Committees. Is that provision changed in the conference report?

Mr. FRENZEL. They can still contribute $5,000, but they have an extra ability to spend up to $10,000.

Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. TREEN).

(Mr. TREEN asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. TREEN. Mr. Speaker, my colleagues of the House, I rise in opposition to adoption of the conference report on S. 3044. My opposition is based primarily on one significant feature of the legislation.

First, however, I want to make it clear that my criticism is not intended to suggest that the House conferees did not do a good job. Indeed, I think they did an outstanding job in having most of the important provisions in the House bill accepted by the conferees from the other body. I commend the chairman of our committee for his leadership and for standing fast against such items as public financing of congressional campaigns.

Nor do I intend to suggest, by my opposition to the bill, that the proponents of this legislation are not motivated by a sincere desire to end campaign abuse. I concur wholeheartedly with the general purpose of the bill and I find most of its provisions quite acceptable.

But I feel strongly, Mr. Speaker, that the bill contains a defect which is so substantial that it outweighs the good features of the bill. I refer to the aggregate spending limit for a congressional campaign, and particularly the limit for campaigns for House seats which the conferees have set at $70,000.

I opposed this bill in the House because of the limitation, which we established at $60,000, and I oppose final passage for the same reason.

We have heard it said in this Chamber that the spending limit for campaigns for the House should bear relationship to the salary of House Members of $42,500 per year; we have heard it argued that it is unconscionable to spend $100,000 or $150,000 in a campaign for a job that pays only $42,500.

To me these arguments are patently illogical and falacious. It is the importance of the job from the point of view of the constituents that should be the fundamental consideration. The power and responsibility that each of us has—the great magnitude of that power over the well-being of every citizen and, indeed, the very security of this Nation and the free world—suggest to me that the election of a single Member of this House cannot be valued at $70,000. Especially is this so since election to this House usually results in a Member serving several terms and not just one term.

Certainly we do not relate the amount of money to be spent in the Presidential campaign to the salary of the President. We are providing in this legislation $20 million to finance Presidential campaigns, and yet the salary of the President is $200,000.

My quarrel is not with the individual limitation of $1,000 per person and $5,000 per organization to any single campaign. In my personal opinion, few if any Members of this body are influenced in their decisions by the financial support they receive. But I recognize that the public may feel that some are so affected, and indeed, it may have some influence, in some instances, on some Members. But suppose a candidate for Congress was attractive enough, and had good enough ideas, to be able to raise $100 per person from a thousand people. This would give him a campaign fund of $100,000. His maximum contribution would be one-tenth of that which is allowed under this bill. Yet, he would be in violation because his fund would exceed by $30,000 the limitation in this bill.

I have run as a challenger several times and I know it is possible to raise $100,000 or more without receiving large contributions from any single source.

Mr. Speaker, my concern is not for incumbents but for challengers. I feel that if a challenger can raise $100,000, or $150,000, especially if he can do so without receiving large sums from any single source, he should be able to do so. I know that in many districts the amount spent is considerably less than $70,000. But in other districts this is not so. We who are incumbents have all of the advantages save one. That exception being that we have a record which always affords a basis for attack, because a Member cannot possibly vote on all the issues and please everyone.

But the incumbent has all the other advantages. Because he is in office he automatically receives coverage by the news media. If he wants to, he can be in the news regularly during his term through the introduction of bills, testifying before committees, and just by visiting his district—as we are financed to do 36 times in each Congress.

We can send out newsletters postage free every month if we desire, right up to 1 month before the election. The postage value alone of sending out a newsletter once every 3 months approximates the $70,000 which we limit a challenger to spending for his campaign.

I am not suggesting that travel to the district or the franking privilege should be eliminated. I think it is important to stay in communication with your constituents and I believe that these are legitimate ways.

What I am saying is this: let's make the system fair for the challenger. In many districts the news media does not give much play to a challenger. He must depend upon newspaper advertising, radio, and in many districts, television. All of this can be very expensive for a fairly modest advertising campaign. In order to be able to discuss the incumbent's record on a scope sufficient to really get through to a sizable portion of the constituency will require, in most instances, sums in excess of $70,000.

Mr. Speaker, in my sincere judgment the aggregate spending limit of $70,000 per House campaign is an incumbent protection provision, although it is certainly not going to guarantee continuity for all Members.

I recognize that there are abuses in campaigns; these will continue regardless of what we do here today. But I believe that we have over-reacted in this instance, and I predict that when the effect of this becomes fully known to the public, we will be back here to amend at least this particular provision of the bill before us.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 1 minute.

I would hope I can get the attention of the distinguished minority leader. I thank the gentleman for what he said.

I just want to say, since the gentleman alluded to my two hats, to say it has become unnecessary for me to put my hat on as chairman of the Democratic Campaign Committee up to now, because the other party has been doing all of the work for us.

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYS. I yield to the distinguished minority leader.

Mr. RHODES. I think what the gentleman says is an appropriate remark and I shall exert myself to make sure that it does not happen in the future; but I suggest to the gentleman that he keep out his hat. He may need it.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Speaker, I yield seven minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. DENT) who is chairman of the Election Subcommittee, and who did a lot of hard work in holding the hearings on the bill in the beginning.

(Mr. DENT asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I would like to join in commending and congratulating the Chairman of the committee and the conferees for an outstanding piece of work. I know how difficult this type of legislation is, and I think this is a far better bill than anyone would have believed possible at the beginning of the year.

Mr. DENT. I thank the gentleman very kindly. There was a lot of work done in the earlier days on the subcommittee. We held hearings, and then we came to a decision in the subcommittee that inasmuch as the full committee would have a broader view of what would be the proper view to come to the House with, we moved it up unanimously to the full committee, so that the full committee could have a broader view of the whole matter.

Mr. GUNTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. GUNTER. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yelding.

I too would like to join those many colleagues who offered congratulations for the able effort and work of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the chairman of the House Administration Committee, and all others who brought this conference report to us.

I support that report.

(Mr. GUNTER asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I wish the Members would pay some attention to what I am gong to say. I am going to talk to the Members now as Members of the Congress of the United States, not as candidates or politicians, but men and woman representing the people in all the various districts in the Nation.

Campaign reform sometimes gets into a situation where interests take it upon themselves to write what they think is the perfect law. By the manner in which they behave and treat themselves and treat the Members of this Congress, they would lead the American people to believe that we Members either do not have the necessary intelligence nor the honesty and good intentions to write a law which allows, as the Constitution prescribes, every person the right to run for public office.

No single individual in my lifetime in politics has had to take more heat, more unfair criticism, more outright lies and distortions of his actions in full paid advertisements and thousands of series of pamphlets and circulars sent out to the people of the United States and to the Congress, than the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. WAYNE HAYS.

I want to say to all the Members that the trouble with it all is that this so-called reform group has only one idea which would ever really satisfy them as to what reform would be. That would be to defeat every Member of this Congress who does not call up on the telephone and give them all the little inside things that might happen in the committee, so that they may malign and try to destroy members of committees who have to say things in the committee room which do not always mean that is where they stand ultimately.

We have to probe, and we have to fish, and we have to question, but in this particular case, because they have one issue that they have before the public, they have to try to have that particular issue determined to the letter; to the crossed "T" and to the dotted "I" exactly the way they want it.

I say to this House today that the cause of Watergate rested in the 1972 act, which was a substitute for the work of this committee, where we had worked for over 3½ years to come up with what we thought was a reasonable approach to reform.

The only thing they had in mind was spending money during the whole campaign, spending money.

Let me show the Members something here. One campaign in 1972 cost $420,000. Another one cost $472,000. The average of all of the spending in the whole country was $47,000, and yet the incumbents spending between 75 and 100,000 dollars or over were only 5 or 10 percent, and 21 percent of the challengers spent over $75,000 and up to an amount of $321,000 for one candidate, a winner; $316,000, another candidate, a loser.

Throughout this whole issue, if one takes all of those who spent over the amount that is allowed in this act, one would find, if we take them off of the top, that the average spending in this Congress of the men who were elected to office was less than $28,000 per member. I say to the Members that the advantage that the gentleman cited here a minute ago, saying we ought to give a nonincumbent more advantage to spend more money, is not what needs to be done. Spend less.

I am going to lay out to the Members what has to be done before the people will ever have confidence in this Congress, because they do not know all of the inside workings that have to be put in reform. All they know is how much money is spent.

I have here a candidate who received $163,324. He spent $163,324. Here is one who received $38,174. He spent $38,174. Is there any doubt in the Members' minds that if this one would have received $500,000 he would not have spent $500,000? And the one who received $38,000, if he would have received $60,000 is there any question that he would not have spent it?

One cannot reasonably spend more than $50,000 in a campaign without doing things that are wasteful. I repeat what I have said earlier. You cannot do it. I say to the Members that I have run for office as many times as any Member in this House, and I know something about what it takes to win elections, I believe. Some day we will receive enough salary so that we will be permitted to spend the limit and have a tax deduction for it, and we will also allow our opponents, challengers, to spend that amount of money out of their own pocket and have a tax deduction. If they do not have the money, they can solicit funds, and those who contribute to it can take it out of their tax returns. This way one cannot say the incumbent has the advantage, because if he does not waste this money, he will have a salary closer to what he needs to live on. If we do not do that, the people of America will never believe you can spend $350,000 in a primary election and $420,000 in a general election.

Mr. GUNTER. Mr. Speaker, I believe the conference report before the House on the Federal Election Campaign Act Amendments represents a solid foundation on which further needed reforms of campaign spending practices can and must be constructed in the future.

I regret that the House, and as a result of its insistence, the conference committee of the two Houses, was unwilling at this time to extend the principle of public financing provided for in presidential primary and general elections to elections for the U.S. Senate and House of Representatives as well.

When this legislation was initially before the House, I strongly supported and voted for such an extension of the public financing concept to include House and Senate races, because I believed and still believe the basic principle is valid in the case of all Federal elections, not simply those involving Presidential primary and general election contests.

The basic principle, reduced to simple terms, is that special interests ought not be allowed to pay for the election of any Federal officeholder, anymore than we would, for example, let Standard Oil or any other special interests pay the salaries of our Senators or Representatives, once in office. Once elected, we are mandated to represent all the people, and all of our constituents, of whatever party, and whether they voted for or against us as individual candidates. In recognition of this principle, the salaries of our elected Federal officials are paid for by all the people. It is well past the time, in light of the history of abuse and corruption resulting from the current system of privately financing elections, to eliminate special interest funding of House and Senate elections as well. The same principle of public funding—commensurate with the obligation to serve all the people that is rightfully expected—ought to apply.

I favor the extension of this principle, also, because I am firmly convinced that the millions in voluntary taxpayer check-off funds to be allocated for public financing must be weighed against the billions of dollars a year it now costs average taxpayers to finance special interest tax breaks voted by elected representatives under the present system in which those same special interests finance the campaigns of these same elected representatives.

A return to genuine integrity in the political process, and to genuine independence by the House and Senate in behalf of the public interest, requires as a prerequisite that we extend at the earliest possible time the concept of public financing to House and Senate elections.

With those reservations, Mr. Speaker, I am yet able to join my colleagues in praising this legislation as an historic and genuine step forward toward accomplishing meaningful reform. For the first time, the Congress today applies the concept of public financing to Presidential primary and general elections. Many predicted many months ago that this basic reform would prove to be beyond realization. I am gratified that in this legislation the Congress has met the test and acted, in my judgment, to accomplish a real reform of large proportion and far-reaching significance.

There are some other areas contained in the final conference report where we have perhaps not done all that we might have done and where the reform has not been as far reaching.

In one notable instance, the spending limitation on U.S. House races is still so low as to represent, I think, an unwarranted and unfair advantage to incumbents in confronting their challengers. At the same time, I am pleased that the conference did raise the limit from the $60,000 limit in each of the primary and general elections for the House, which was set in the House bill, to a $70,000 limit.

At the same time, the action of the conference in preserving an independent enforcement mechanism to administer the law, in the form of a Federal Elections Commission, represents in my view another important step forward and constitutes another example of genuine and meaningful reform.

On balance, I believe many of the myriad other provisions contained in this complex and extensive piece of legislation may also be fairly characterized as representing true and genuine reform.

I am therefore pleased to add my support on final passage of this historic measure and to urge my colleagues to join in voting overwhelmingly to adopt the conference report.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. ANDERSON).

(Mr. ANDERSON of Illinois asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ANDERSON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Minnesota for yielding. I would like to say that, even as the gentleman did a few moments ago when he addressed the House from the well, even though we have certain substantive differences with respect to this very important subject of campaign reform, I can certainly commend him and others who have worked hard throughout the conference to bring us a bill today. I think that if this bill had come back to us with nothing more than the independent commission that is now referred to, I believe, under the language of the bill, as the Federal Election Commission, if it had come back to us with nothing more than that feature, it would have represented some very sound progress.

At the same time, I hope that we will not conclude from what has been said that the task of reforming our present methods of financing political campaigns is completed. I believe very deeply that some matching provision should have been included to encourage the raising of small contributions in connection with congressional and senatorial campaigns.

I must express my own disappointment that that feature was not contained in the House bill, or, of course, in the final conference report.

I think it is an idea whose day will come. Perhaps as a result of the experience which this bill will give us with the matching principle as it will now be applied to the raising of campaign funds in Presidential primaries, others will come to see the virtue of extending this incentive to the raising of small contributions for congressional campaigns as well.

Nevertheless, I think we can take some comfort and some very considerable comfort from the fact that this Congress will not conclude its deliberations without marking some progress in the very important field of Federal campaign reform. Therefore, I shall support adoption of the conference report.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. MACDONALD).

Mr. MACDONALD. Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the bill sent to the conference committee which, I know, worked so hard and diligently on this bill and came out with what certainly is a good bill, covering the waterfront on campaign spending as it were, and for having done the good job that it has done.

I would especially like to thank the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. HAYS) for his fortitude with respect to the House version of this campaign spending bill, because it was just about 2 years ago that he and I sat down, along with the rest of the conferees, with some of the same obdurate Members of the other body. I know what a great strain it must have been on the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. HAYS) to have been able to resist some of the matters that were thrown at him by the other body.

I once again congratulate the subcommittee and its chairman.

Mr. BURLISON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYS. I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Missouri (Mr. BURLISON).

Mr. BURLISON of Missouri. I appreciate the chairman's yielding.

I want to join my colleagues in commending the committee for the conference report.

I would like to ask the chairman of the full committee if the conference report has encompassed within it any jurisdiction whatsoever over the correspondence of Members with their constituents, also known as the franking privilege.

Mr. HAYS. If the gentleman will yield, there is nothing in this bill or in the conference report which would give this commission any authority to fiddle around with the frank in any way, shape, or form.

As an added safeguard, any rules or regulations they may make, they have to submit to the new committee of Congress, and either House can veto any regulation they make.

They have no authority, no power whatever to do anything about the frank, I would say to the gentleman.

Mr. BURLISON of Missouri. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 2 minutes.

I would like to ask a question of the distinguished chairman of the committee.

I had a number of queries from this side of the aisle with respect to the status of their newsletters.

In the Post Office bill which we passed this year we made the spending of money for newsletters a legitimate expense out of the campaign funds. This bill does not change that law. In my opinion, if a newsletter is frankable and it is paid for out of the campaign fund, the expense for it is not to be counted as part of the spending limit during any campaign. In the gentleman's opinion; is that correct?

Mr. HAYS. If the gentleman will yield, I concur with that. If it is frankable, it is not a political expense.

Mr. FRENZEL. I would like to ask the gentleman one other question.

The committee report is silent on something we talked about a great deal, and that is the conferees' great urge to simplify the forms and the procedures. I would ask the chairman if it is not the intention of the conferees to urge the Federal Elections Commission, when appointed, to do everything in its power to consolidate and simplify the forms and procedures involved in this law.

Mr. HAYS. It certainly is. And I will say to the gentleman that if they send an unduly complicated form up here, we will have a quick committee meeting and ask the House to send it back to them. I think the House would do that.

Mr. PHILLIP BURTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENZEL. I yield to the distinguished gentleman from California, whose work has been most helpful in this field, even though he does not serve on the committee.

Mr. PHILLIP BURTON. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I would like to pursue in one particular the line of inquiry of the gentleman from Minnesota, and I would like to pose this question to the gentleman and to the chairman of the committee. That line of inquiry is simply this:

I would hope in the simplifying and consolidating of the reports that it would be our expectation that the Commission would try to further consolidate that report which the Members must now sign as a separate report and try to find some appropriate way to permit the filing of a single report.

The SPEAKER. All time of the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. FRENZEL) has expired.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. THOMPSON), a member of the committee.

(Mr. THOMPSON of New Jersey asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. THOMPSON of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I would like to join with all of those Members who have commended our committee chairman, the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. HAYS), for the tremendous amount of work he put in on this measure and for his extreme fairness to each and every member of the committee.

I would expect it is true that during the markup period, as far as the members of the committee are concerned, the average number of amendments offered by each one of us was at least 12 to 14. We were allowed free and open discussion and debate, and we arrived at the point of reporting of the bill in a most democratic fashion.

We had the same situation prevailing in the conference.

Mr. Speaker, I might say that only a Member of the stature of the gentleman from Ohio, WAYNE HAYS, would have endured the absolutely unnecessary abuse heaped upon him by certain groups and organizations, as well as individuals and newspapers throughout the United States, including magazines and journals of opinion. It is a wonder the gentleman just did not say, "I'll sit down and let the whole thing go." But he did not.

The result has been that we have here a conference report which, although it certainly is not perfect, is indeed a splendid and a fair one.

The gentleman from Indiana (Mr. BRADEMAS) and I worked for higher spending limits for House Members, but it was made very clear during the floor debate that there would not be agreement on that. So we end up with a figure which I consider to be reasonable—$70,000, plus the 20 percent allowed for the costs of raising money. It is, in my judgment, an altogether splendid effort.

Mr. Speaker, I would like also to commend the Members on the minority side for their cooperation during the markup, during the debate, and during the conference. We had virtually innumerable disagreements, and yet we all walked out of there, all of us, signing the report.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself the remainder of my time.

Mr. Speaker, I want to thank all the members of my committee. If I started naming members, I would have to name all 25 of them, besides myself, and commend them for their cooperation and patience.

As has been said, there were many deep divisions and disagreements and differences of opinion. We worked them all out in a friendly manner. I think my friend, the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. FRENZEL) had more amendments, perhaps, than anybody else, and sometimes he tried my patience a little, and sometimes I needled him a little, but he always took it with good humor, and he never failed to come up with a smile, and I appreciate that.

Mr. Speaker, I think we came out with a product, considering the diversity of opinion, that will do the job so that the Members and the aspirants to office can live with it. I do not consider this to be an incumbent's bill at all.

I have said this before: that if you are doing your job as an incumbent, it is pretty hard to beat you, but if you are not doing your job, you can be beaten with a very little bit of money.

I think that all of the Members can be pleased with the work product from the committee, from the amending process in the House, and from the diversity of opinion in the conference. It is not an easy bill, and it has not been, because every Member of the Congress is an expert on this kind of legislation, and every one has their own ideas, and every district is a little bit different.

But I believe this is a bill that will stop the suspicions of the people, because it will stop the actions that caused these suspicions. I think it is a bill that the people can live with.

Mr. Speaker, as a final reminder, I would like to say that all the corruption and allegations of corruption that we have heard about in the past 2 years were caused because there was not a limitation, and people could run all over the country, gathering up big bags of money. Also, as I have said before, if we had had such a limitation 2 years ago, Watergate would never have happened.

Mr. WYMAN. Mr. Speaker, I support the conference report on election campaign reform except for its provision for public financing. I have long maintained the likelihood that such provisions are unconstitutional diversions of taxpayers from necessary and proper expenses of Government and that the High Court will so hold when the issue comes before it.

Nevertheless, there are excellent provisions on other necessary reforms in the currently pending conference report, especially in respect to limitations on individual contributions, expenditure ceilings and overall limitations on expenditures by the various political parties. Because of these and the independent supervisory enforcement board, I shall vote for the conference report despite my continued opposition and misgivings concerning public financing.

Enforcement is the single most important aspect of controlling the raising and expenditures of campaign funds. Candidates for Federal office are required in this law to establish a central campaign committee and to treat bank loans as contributions. Disclosure is required quarterly, with a mandatory report due 10 days before an election and a wrap-up report 30 days afterward. Included in the oversight powers of the bipartisan, full-time supervisory board are civil enforcement authority and standing to invoke the injunctive process. Criminal violations would continue to be referred to the Justice Department for prosecution which is as it should be.

This bill is a meaningful response to the pubuic need to know how much, from whom and for what purposes a candidate is receiving and using contributions to his campaign. The full disclosure provisions through a single central committee and the continuing oversight function of the independent board will reduce to a minimum the opportunity for undisclosed or unreported contributions. This assures that campaign financing facts will be available to the voters before they go to the polls on election day—and they are the ultimate judge in the election process.

Mr. YOUNG of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I join with my colleagues today in hailing this landmark piece of legislation, the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1974.

The distinguished chairman, Mr. HAYS, and the members of the Committee on House Administration deserve much praise for their diligent work over so many months in producing this bill and this conference report. A special thanks is due from all of us who bear the label "Politician." It would have been a travesty for us to go home for another election without taking with us a bill to remedy some of the evils of the political system that have been uncovered during the past 2 years.

I would also like to pay tribute to those outside the Congress who contributed so much to the monumental task of educating the public and the Congress to this issue. I particularly cite the Center for Public Financing of Elections, headed by Susan King and Neal Gregory. It has been my privilege—along with my colleague from Pennsylvania (Mr. BIESTER)—to sit on the board of advisers of this bipartisan lobbying organization which was established in June 1973 to press for fundamental change in the methods of financing campaigns for the Presidency and the Congress.

The Center for Public Financing of Elections was instrumental in bringing together a broad-based coalition of some 30 organizations from labor, business, the churches, citizen-action and civil rights organizations to work for this common goal. Providing professional assistance in research and analysis and information to the press and the Congress, this coalition convinced the House and Senate that the 1976 Presidential election should be financed by public funds rather than private interests. The legislation also includes a new six-member Federal Election Commission and strict campaign contribution and spending limitations. Reporting and disclosure requirements have been strengthened and penalties for violations have been increased.

The reform coalition, under the leadership of the center, worked hard for extending the principle of public financing of congressional campaigns as well, but this concept has been rejected for the moment. It is in the arena of Presidential politics that campaign financing abuses have been most obvious and in which the public has perceived the greatest need for change, and the Congress has responded.

But, as the Center for Public Financing of Elections says:

The next Congress must continue the fight to end the unholy alliance between money and politics. Public financing of all political campaigns is an idea whose time will come.

Mr. Speaker, at this point in the RECORD I would like to insert a summary of the legislation, prepared by the Center for Public Financing of Elections, and a list of those members of the reform coalition who contributed so much to this legislation:

PUBLIC FINANCING OF THE PRESIDENTIAL CAMPAIGN

Public financing of the 1976 Presidential election is provided under the new Campaign Reform Bill. Here is the way it works:

GENERAL ELECTION

Each candidate for President is limited to campaign expenditures of $20 million.

Nominees of the major parties are eligible to receive the full $20 million in public funds. Public financing is not mandatory; the candidate may solicit all donations privately. If the candidate "goes private," however, individual contributions are limited to $1,000; organization contributions, $5,000.

Candidates of minor parties (those receiving at least five percent of the vote in the preceding election) are eligible for partial funding based on the percentage of the vote received. A third party receiving at least five percent of the vote in 1976 will be eligible for partial reimbursement of their expenses.

NOMINATING CONVENTIONS

Political parties are limited to expenditures of $2 million for their presidential nominating conventions. A major party is eligible to receive the full $2 million in public funds; however, a party may opt to fund its convention privately. The existing law permitting corporations to take a tax deduction for advertisements in conventions program books is repealed.

PRESIDENTIAL PRIMARIES

Each candidate for the Presidential nomination is limited to campaign expenditures of $10 million. In each state, he may spend no more than twice the amount permitted a Senate primary candidate. In other words, the candidate may spend no more than $200,000 in the New Hampshire primary; $928,000 in Florida.

To be eligible for public funds, a candidate must declare himself a candidate for his party's nomination and begin soliciting small contributions ($250 or less). When the Federal Elections Commission certifies that the candidate has received at least $5,000 from contributors in each of 20 states—for a total of $100,000 in matchable funds—the Secretary of the Treasury will authorize a matching payment of $100,000 from the Dollar Check-Off Fund. Subsequently, each eligible contribution of $250 or less will be matched from the Treasury.

While an individual may contribute $1,000 and an organization may give $5,000 during the pre-nomination period, only the first $250 will be eligible for matching. No cash contributions will be matched; all contributions must show the taxpayer's identification number.

In addition to the $10 million spending limit, the candidate is permitted to spend an additional 10 percent—$2 million—for fundraising costs.

Only contributions raised after January 1, 1975, will be eligible for matching. No public funds will be given out until January 1, 1976.

SOURCE OF PUBLIC FUNDS

The source of all public funding is the Presidential Election Campaign Fund. No additional appropriations legislation is required of Congress. The Fund was established in 1971 and is funded by taxpayers who check off Line 8 on IRS Form 1040, designating $1 of their taxes ($2 on a joint return) for this purpose.

This Dollar Check-Off Fund now contains $30.1 million. If taxpayers check off Line 8 at the same rate as last year, there will be a minimum of $64 million in the fund in time for the 1976 election, and very likely more.

Early in 1976, $44 million will be earmarked for the General Election and the Conventions. The remaining funds will be designated for the primaries. No more than 45 percent may go to candidates of any political party. No candidate is eligible to receive more than one-fourth of public funds available for primaries.

All spending limits are subject to cost-of-living increases, using 1974 as the base year.

The Fund will be under continuing review by the new Federal Election Commission to insure that eligible candidates receive equitable treatment and that adequate money is available to meet obligations required by the act.

Mr. BADILLO. Mr. Speaker, the Federal Election Campaign Act amendments which we are considering this afternoon close a number of important loopholes and inadequacies in current campaign financing and elections laws. Among the notable features of this legislation are the ceilings on expenditures for campaigns for all Federal offices, limits on individual contributions to any single candidate and aggregate contributions for all Federal offices in any single year and restrictions on a candidate's personal financing of his own campaign. I believe this measure represents a significant step forward in campaign reform and for this reason I shall support the conference report.

However, this legislation contains a major gap—the failure to provide for public financing—even at the very least on a matching basis—for House and Senate campaigns. As I stated when we considered the amendments in August:

I cannot understand how the committee could endorse the removal of private money from Presidential races and not concede that the public interest lies in the same treatment of congressional elections.

I cannot see why a double standard should be imposed, particularly after nationwide opinion polls have clearly demonstrated that the American people support public financing for congressional races by an almost 2-to-1 majority.

Full public financing of all Federal elections is a goal we must achieve as soon as possible if confidence in the whole electoral process is to be achieved. We must make the public financing of House and Senate races a key priority in the 94th Congress if we hope to truly reform political campaigns. I intend to continue working toward this important objective and urge our colleagues to join in this effort. The Federal Election Campaign Act amendments of 1974 mark an important advance in election reform but they must be further strengthened if we hope to remove all the grievous abuses of Federal elections which have been amply documented over the past many months.

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Speaker, I am voting for the conference report on S. 3044—Federal Elections Campaign Act amendments, but I would like to take just a moment to explain some serious reservations I have about certain of its provisions.

First, it must be conceded that the reform measure provides many changes in our campaign financing system that are urgently needed and that can reduce greatly the influence of special interests on governmental decisions. It provides for strict limits on contributions. It provides an independent enforcement commission. And it provides public financing for Presidential primary and general elections. The importance of these reforms cannot be diminished, and the respective committees handling the legislation in both the Senate and the House deserve credit for adopting them.

Despite these beneficial and needed changes, I remain adamantly opposed to campaign spending limits in the conference report which I consider to be scandalously high. When the House considered the campaign reform bill early in August, I spoke for and supported an amendment which would have allowed State spending ceilings to remain in effect when they were established at lower levels than those in the Federal law. The State of Wisconsin, for example, recently enacted a campaign reform measure which would have limited spending in House races to $35,000 for the primary and $50,000 for the general election. I greatly regret that the amendment which would have permitted such stronger State laws to prevail over Federal limitations was defeated.

While that amendment did not succeed, we were successful in reducing the committee bill's ceilings of $75,000 per House primary or general race to $60,000 per election. The amendment would have allowed a 25-percent increase in the ceiling for fund raising costs. Thus each candidate for a House seat could have spent a maximum of $150,000 on the primary and general elections.

Now we have before us a conference report which raises the already excessive spending limits in the House bill. The conference report would allow candidates for the House to spend up to $70,000 in each primary and general election, plus an additional 20 percent for raising expenditures. This means that each candidate could spend up to a maximum of $168,000 in pursuit of a House seat.

The people of Wisconsin will have a great deal of difficulty understanding how a spending limit of that altitude is going to reduce the influence of money in politics. I share their skepticism and pledge that I will work diligently to bring about future reforms that will make campaign spending limits truly limits, rather than invitations to excessive campaign expenditures and corruption.

The excessive spending ceilings coupled with another little noticed provision of the reform bill could lead to major scandals. The conference report includes language which allows a successful candidate to use leftover campaign funds to finance congressional office costs if the Congressman reports on the outlays. This is clearly a provision that strengthens the position of incumbents, and was a more legitimate target of concern for those who feared an incumbents' bill than were spending ceilings that might have been set at reasonable levels.

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of S. 3044, the conference report on the Federal Election Campaign Act Amendments of 1974. As one of the original sponsors of H.R. 16090, the House version of this measure, I feel a great sense of accomplishment in seeing campaign reform become a reality in this Congress.

The conference bill before us today retains four basic elements originally incorporated in the House measure. It places limits on the contributions that individuals, organizations and political parties can make to individual candidates and in the aggregate. It sets spending limits for candidates for the House and Senate. The bill also provides public financing of Presidential elections and conventions from the so-called dollar checkoff fund. Lastly, the conference bill sets up an enforcement body made up of members appointed by both Houses and the President which has the power to promulgate regulations, issue subpenas and investigate possible violations.

While these provisions differ in some details with H.R. 16090 as passed by this House, I feel that they represent a substantial restatement of the House bill. Indeed, one change which has been made is a decided improvement. The Board of Supervisors which will oversee compliance and enforcement of the act will now be a full time organization with adequate staff. It will be empowered to issue regulations interpreting the law, seek injunctions, subpena information, and request declaratory judgments or interpretive rulings in the courts.

The bill before us, I am pleased to note, also carries lower spending ceilings for both House and Senate races than were found in the Senate bill. I feel that the limits now contained in the conference report—$70,000 per election for House candidates, $100,000 or 8¢ per voter for Senate primaries and $150,000 or 12¢ per voter for Senate general elections—do provide the public with a modicum of protection from bought elections, yet allow enough spending to permit challengers to put their program before the electorate, to counter the natural advantages of the incumbent.

I am disappointed with one aspect of the bill before us. It no longer contains any provision for mixed public-private funding of congressional and senatorial campaigns. This was a proposal which I helped initiate. I have said before on the floor of this Chamber that such a system would truly return political decision making back to the individual taxpaying citizens of this country. Public funds would have been provided under this scheme only where a good number of small contributions from private citizens had established the broadness of a candidate's political base. Thereafter, Federal funds would have been made available on a matching basis from the dollar checkoff fund, but only after complete Presidential funding was assured. In other words, only serious candidates would have qualified for this aid. It would not have in any way diminished Presidential campaign public funding and all the money that would have been spent would have come from the conscious checkoffs of American taxpayers who believed in public assistance in financing Federal elections.

I am disappointed that the public-private mixed funding of congressional campaigns is not in the bill before us simply because if this approach can help put the little guy back in the political picture in Presidential elections, it certainly would have the same, if not greater, effect in congressional races. If big money has too important a hold in Presidential elections, how much more powerful an influence does it have in smaller, congressional races.

Mr. Speaker, I am hopeful that as the Presidential campaign financing features of this bill unfold in the 1976 elections, as they provide us with one of the most even expenditure matches in this century, that all citizens and Members of this House will come to see the necessity to extend that same coverage to include congressional elections as well. Only then can we claim complete reform of Federal elections law that this bill purports to provide.

I want to make it clear, however, that I strongly support the election reform package represented by this conference report. It constitutes the first decent legacy of the Watergate scandal. I am confident that it will go a long way indeed to prevent such abuses as occurred in connection with that tragic episode in our country's history.

I therefore urge that we adopt the conference report today. In so doing we will be doing our best to convince a skeptical public that we really want to put our house in order after Watergate, and that it is not going to be business as usual all over again. That is the message that I get from my constituents. They feel that more has got to come of this crisis we have just weathered than just rhetoric. The first test of whether that is so comes today. There will be further tests; 1976 will be one. That is because another legacy of Watergate is increased public awareness of congressional self-regulation. As proof, I would like to include in the RECORD at this point an editorial, dated October 7, 1974, from the Springfield Daily News of Springfield, Mass., which only too clearly makes this point:

CAMPAIGN REFORM

If there is any consolation emerging from the Watergate scandals, it is that they have placed renewed emphasis on the need for governmental reforms in general, and for election reforms in particular.

The Watergate conspiracy was basically an attempt to undermine an election—involving secret contributions, "dirty tricks" to discredit rival candidates, break-ins and buggings, and an abuse of power both by individual officials and government agencies.

In its final report, the Ervin Committee recommended a series of campaign reforms to Congress, and the results have been encouraging so far.

A House-Senate conference committee has agreed upon a campaign reform law that would limit spending and contributions in all federal elections and provide government subsidies for presidential candidates.

For example, Democratic and Republican nominees for President would be limited to spending $20 million each. But all of that amount would be furnished from federal funds raised by the check-off option on income tax returns.

In the presidential primaries, every candidate would be allowed to spend a maximum of $10 million—with government subsidies of up to $5 million allocated in amounts equal to what a candidate raised in private contributions.

The interesting feature is that to be eligible for matching funds, the candidate would have to collect the first $100,000 in donations of less than $250. Supposedly, this would demonstrate he had broad-based popular support and did not appeal just to the big contributors.

Congressional elections would be subject to similar ceilings. But—with this big difference from presidential balloting—there would be no public financing of congressional races.

Congressmen, with a keen eye to protecting their own power and positions on Capitol Hill, realized that public funding means they would have well-financed opponents in both primary and general elections.

Meanwhile, the prospect is that the campaign funding bill will pass—marking a major reform by Congress in the wake of Watergate.

Mr. BAUMAN. Mr. Speaker, I am compelled to vote against this conference report for a number of reasons, although I fully support the principle of true election law reform.

First and most importantly, I believe that the provisions of this bill which restrict an individual's right to contribute more than certain amounts to a candidate in a Federal election may well impose an unconstitutional restraint on his or her freedom to communicate their views, or support a candidate who represents those views. Indeed, many of my colleagues have admitted that numerous parts of this bill are of dubious constitutionality.

Equally important is the serious undermining of the two-party system which will occur once the full impact of this legislation is felt. The limitation placed on each political committee as to the amounts it may contribute to individual candidates for Federal office may seriously curtail the need for a particular party's support. Further than that, the provisions that allow Federal financing of Presidential primaries, general elections, and party conventions, in my view, subject both major parties, and any third parties that may qualify, to the strong possibility of Federal supervision and control. The Supreme Court has held many times, and it has been admitted on the floor today, that Federal financing means Federal control. I can think of nothing more destructive of the Republican or Democratic Parties' right to conduct its own affairs, than the possibilities of the Federal intervention which this bill surely will produce. I can also foresee numerous lawsuits demanding quota systems, for example, governing the makeup of State delegations to national political conventions. The possibilities are endless, and they all point to the demise of the two-party system, once the principle of Federal financing is accepted.

Using taxpayers money to finance elections is bad enough in itself, but as this conference report is written the lion's share of Federal money will go to the party which produces the most candidates in Presidential primaries. I predict with some certainty that there will be many more Presidential hopefuls coming out of the woodwork in 1976 now that the Federal Treasury and the taxpayer's pocket is to be the source of their financing.

Perhaps the most serious omission in this legislation, as I read it, is the total lack of any provision controlling the "in kind" contributions consisting of goods and services, as well as "educational" expenditures, by such groups as labor unions. Any true election reform would certainly contain restrictions on this kind of often clandestine and unreported political activity which in a close election contest can make all the difference. Yet, this serious threat to the democratic system is untouched by this bill.

Lastly, I would tend to agree with my colleague from Wisconsin (Mr. STEIGER) in his analysis that this bill is an incumbent Congressman's dream. It cuts down on the number of reports which must be filed which, while convenient for the Congressman, does nothing to enhance full disclosure of election expenditures. It also specifically permits the use of House and Senate funds for reelection purposes—something that is available only to incumbents and must come out of the taxpayers' pocket. Amazingly, this bill exempts from disclosure such expenditures. Such special expenditures for incumbent Members, together with the strict limitation on spending which will apply to challengers, will do much in my opinion to insure the re-election of incumbents for years to come, and that is certainly not election reform.

Mr. Speaker, there are many good provisions in this legislation, but the serious inadequacies which I have described force me to oppose this conference report. While it has become fashionable to support "election reform," this measure is the antithesis of election reform, and I therefore must oppose it.

Mrs. HECKLER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, it is little wonder that in the wake of the Watergate revelations and the disclosure of the "dirty tricks" of the 1972 Presidential campaign, a major outcry was heard from the American public demanding a thorough cleansing of our electoral process.

Today Congress is responding to the outrage and indignation expressed by so many voters with the Federal Election Campaign Act Amendments of 1974, the most comprehensive campaign finance reform measure in the history of our country.

No single piece of legislation before Congress in this session has more potential for ending illegal contributions, slush funds, and the other types of campaign corruption which have surfaced during the last administration and during several previous administrations.

The importance of the changes which we are making in the campaign finance process today is that these reforms will lead to the restoration of confidence in the integrity of our political process by making campaigns public business.

The historic reforms incorporated in this legislation represent a major step forward. For the first time we have insured that Presidential primaries and general election campaigns will not be dependent on large donations from special interests who expect favors in return for their money.

In 1976 the Presidential Election Campaign Fund composed of voluntary taxpayer contributions through the dollar checkoff on their individual tax returns will finance the Presidential primaries and general elections of the two major candidates.

In the future I hope to see public financing extended to all congressional races. In August when the Federal Elections Campaign Act amendments were before the House for consideration, I voted in favor of an amendment which would have provided partial public financing of House and Senate campaigns by providing for matching Federal funds to be raised from the dollar checkoff fund of individual tax contributions. This important amendment was defeated in the House and was not included in the final version of the bill agreed upon by the House and Senate conferees.

One of the most important provisions of the legislation before us is the creation of a strong and independent Federal Elections Commission which will oversee all Federal elections and be empowered to enforce the new law by subpenaing witnesses, conducting investigations of campaign abuses, and by bringing civil suits to court.

Of monumental importance in reforming the election process are the campaign spending limitations and contribution limitations included in the bill. The provisions of the Federal Election Campaign Act amendments achieve new and realistic limits to campaign spending.

Reasonable restrictions on individual and group contributions to congressional or Presidential candidates limit individual contributions to $1,000 per candidate in the primary and in the general election with an aggregate limitation of $25,000 to all candidates and political committees during a 2-year period.

An organization is prohibited from contributing more than $5,000 to any one candidate for Federal office in the primary election and also in the general election.

Congress cannot take full credit for these essential campaign reforms. Organizations such as Common Cause, the Center for Public Financing, and the National Committee for an Effective Congress were major catalysts in convincing Congress of the urgency of these measures.

The Federal Election Campaign Act amendments are designed to fortify the very roots of our democratic system—our electoral process. I hope this reform therapy will be effective.

Mr. McCLORY. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of this conference report. Through the enactment of these Federal Election Campaign Act amendments, we can help bring about fundamental improvements in the way in which America chooses its elected leadership. I especially want to commend the House conferees who did such an excellent job in representing the position of the House while working toward a strong reform bill that can become law this year.

Mr. Speaker, with respect to the issue of public financing for congressional campaigns, which constituted one of the major points of controversy between the two bodies, I want to thank our conferees for their successful advocacy of the House position. I believe it would be premature, to say the least, for the law to provide public financing for all Federal election campaigns, when we have yet had any actual experience with public financing. We at least owe the American taxpayer the consideration of evaluating the results from the public financing of Presidential campaigns, which this bill mandates, before we begin to charge him for all Federal campaign costs. This only makes sense, Mr. Speaker, and I am relieved that the House position has been retained in this very important respect. Let public financing achieve in practice the lofty goals which its advocates forecast, before extending it to all Federal campaigns.

Mr. Speaker, this legislation will give a real boost to the public's right to know in the campaign area with its admirable plugging of several old loopholes in the financial disclosure provision of the Federal Election Campaign Act. Campaign finances will be even more completely open to public inspection than at present so that the voter may examine the financial aspects of a candidate's support. The disclosure provisions of this conference report will insure that much more information than is now required will be fully available for public scrutiny and assessment.

However, the measure has two egregious defects. First, it fails to require accountability with regard to labor organizations and other political action groups regarding individual contributions—and in such cases, it does not require the identity of persons making contributions, and fails to designate the candidates whom the various contributors desire to support. It leaves those decisions up to the labor leaders—or organizations' officers.

Second, the measure fails to measure in terms of campaign contributions the extensive services provided in the form of campaign workers, and telephone teams, and such personal services as are regularly provided by labor organizations in support of their favorite candidates.

These defects should have been corrected and, in any event, should be the subject of further legislation at an early date.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the conference report.

NEEDED—CONTROL OVER FOREIGN INVESTMENT

(Mr. WYMAN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute, to revise and extend his remarks, and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. WYMAN. Mr. Speaker, I take this minute to remind my colleagues that unless and until the exorbitant prices demanded for oil by the OPEC nations are cut at least in half, the world invites both a financial crisis and a serious risk of buy-ins of American businesses and real estate by foreign money barons. With the levels presently prevailing in the stock market in this country, the opportunity to purchase controlling interests in important—as well as security-related—U.S. industries has never been more opportune.

We must act now to limit foreign investment in this country. It is to no avail to claim we might later see fit to expropriate. Two wrongs do not make a right. What is needed is constructive action to limit foreign investment in U.S. companies to something less than control. This is provided against in my bill, H.R. 16848, presently pending before the Commerce Committee.

Under the provisions of my bill, foreign investment in any American corporation cannot exceed 49 percent of controlling interests. A cabinet-styled committee is enjoined to review the situation and to make recommendations to the Congress for a lower percentage where advisable, including the power to exclude foreign investment in patently security-related companies.

Unless immediate action is taken to implement such a program, we face a literal invasion of foreign capital in which many citizens would find themselves working for foreign masters. Such a prospect is intolerable and I urge and seriously recommend immediate and favorable action on my bill, the "Foreign Investment and Control Act of 1974."

(Mr. MARTIN of North Carolina asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute, to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

[Mr. MARTIN of North Carolina addressed the House. His remarks will appear hereafter in the Extensions of Remarks.]

CONFERENCE REPORT ON H.R. 12628, VIETNAM ERA VETERANS' READJUSTMENT ASSISTANCE ACT OF 1974

Mr. DORN. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (H.R. 12628) to amend title 38, United States Code, to increase the rates of vocational rehabilitation, educational assistance, and special training allowances paid to eligible veterans and other persons; to make improvements in the educational assistance programs; and for other purposes, and ask unanimous consent that the statement of the managers be read in lieu of the report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the statement.

(For conference report and statement, see proceedings of the House of October 7, 1974.)

Mr. DORN (during the reading). Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with further reading of the statement.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. DORN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the conference report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

(Mr. DORN asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DORN. Mr. Speaker, when H.R. 12628 was originally passed by the House on February 19, 1974, its major provision was a proposal to increase by 13.6 percent all of the rates of educational allowances for veterans and their eligible dependents. For example, the present rate for a single veteran pursuing full-time training is $220 per month. The House proposed to increase this rate to $250 per month with comparable increases in cases where dependents are involved.

On June 19, 1974, the Senate took action on H.R. 12628 by substituting the full text on its version of a veterans' education bill contained in S. 2784. As thus passed by the Senate the bill increased the basic monthly rates by 18 percent, for example, $220 per month to $260 per month, and added as an integral part of the rate package a new partial tuition allowance under a formula which in the average case would provide the veteran with an additional $720 per school year. I am sure that many Members are familiar with the problems and abuses arising from the tuition payment portion of the original World War II GI bill. Following an extended inquiry by a House select committee, the Korean conflict GI bill was formulated which discarded any form of so-called tuition payment and provided a single monthly allowance directly to the veteran. This philosophy was continued in the 1966 cold-war GI bill and has been maintained as congressional policy ever since. In the light of this background, the House managers rejected any form of tuition payment, either to the institution or to the veteran, but in order to reach a compromise on this point, agreed to an increase in the basic rates of 22.7 percent, for example, $220 to $270 per month, and the Senate conferees concurred.

Each version of the bill also proposed to liberalize the eligibility requirements for vocational rehabilitation for present and future veterans with a service-connected disability. The basic objective sought in each version is now contained in the conference bill.

The original conference report, filed August 19, 1974, provided the same 22.7-percent increase to the subsistence allowance authorized for vocational rehabilitation trainees—about 2 percent of the total—as authorized for all of the other educational trainees. In this area a point of order was raised upon consideration of the conference report on August 22 that the mentioned increase in vocational rehabilitation rates exceeded the increase proposed by either the House or Senate bill. Accordingly, it was urged that the conferees exceeded their authority in this regard. When the point of order was sustained, the chairman of the House managers immediately moved that the House recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendment to the text of the bill, H.R. 12628, and agree to the same with a substitute amendment. This substitute amendment which was passed unanimously by the House returned the bill to the other body in the same form as recommended by the conferees with the following exceptions: First, the rate increase for vocational rehabilitation subsistence allowances was reduced to 18 percent, to comply with the point of order; second, the extension of maximum entitlement from the present 36 months to 45 months was deleted; and third, the veterans' education loan provisions were deleted.

Accordingly, conferees were reappointed to resolve the differences between the House substitute amendment of August 22 and the original Senate-passed bill, S. 2784.

The House and Senate conferees have been in agreement from the outset with respect to provisions dealing with certain minor liberalizations of the veterans' educational programs, as well as provisions covering job counseling, training and placement service, employment and training of disabled and Vietnam era veterans and veterans' reemployment rights. The present conference report covering these subjects contains no substantive changes and are discussed in more detail in the accompanying joint explanatory statement of the committee on conference.

Under the present law, veterans are limited to a maximum of 36 months of education and training. The House amendment contained no provision with respect to this maximum but the Senate bill proposed to increase this period from 36 months to 45 months. In conference the House managers were persuaded by certain cogent justification for an increase in entitlement in certain hardship cases and therefore concurred in a liberalization which would authorize an additional number of months, not exceeding nine, as may be utilized in pursuit of a program of education leading to a standard college degree.

The Senate substitute proposed to establish a new student loan program to be administered by the veterans administration and funded through the National Service Life Insurance trust fund. Such loans would be limited to a maximum of $2,000 and available only if the veteran is unable to receive a student loan from the Federal programs, primarily administered by HEW. The House managers were reluctant to see the VA embark on such a new type of activity but receded from its position subject to a reduction in the maximum available loan in the amount of $600 and elimination of the funding of the program through the National Service Life trust fund. Under the conference agreement, a special revolving fund would be established and funded through the usual appropriations for readjustment benefits.

As we have stressed in the managers statement, the house conferees are concerned that excessive default rates at certain institutions might jeopardize the success of the program. In this connection, recent publicity has indicated that approximately one fourth of all student loans under programs administered by HEW are in default. Accordingly, both committees will closely monitor default experience and expect the administrator not only to so monitor but take aggressive steps to pursue and effect collections wherever possible. Further, the conferees direct the administrator to utilize his new authority contained in the bill with respect to deceptive and misleading advertising, to take affirmative steps to prevent any questionable sales or enrollment practices utilizing advertising about the availability of the new loan program as a promotional technique. The conferees recognize that in meritorious cases additional loan facilities may be vital to students in pursuing their educational program but it should be made crystal clear that this is not in any way intended as a "handout" program and appropriate corrective measures will be taken in the event of abuses.

For the record, I feel that it is imperative to set clear your conferees' philosophy as to the fiscal impact of this legislation. In the first place, there is a complete unanimity of view that in the light of the spiraling cost of living the present training allowances are greatly inadequate. In recent public utterances, the President has indicated that an increase of approximately 18 or even 20 percent would be justified. This would be true from the standpoint solely of the increase in cost of living; however, testimony before both Houses has made it abundantly clear that the tuition costs in all institutions, but particularly those charged by private institutions have far outridden the cost of living as reflected by the consumers' price index and your conferees were convinced that this factor cannot be ignored. Accordingly, it seems to me that an additional 5 percent above the increase which the President suggests is fully justified. It is not at all irrelevant to take note of the alarming increase in the rate of unemployment, particularly involving those young men and women of school age. Further, your conferees have noted the significance of the President's most recent economy speech to the Congress which included a recommendation for increases in unemployment compensation benefits and the creation of a brand-new community improvement corps through short-term useful work projects, such standby program to be geared to the unemployment rate. With these factors in mind, it seems eminently desirable not only from a fiscal but also a sociological standpoint to improve the availability of greater educational benefits for our young men and women who have served in the armed services, including certain of their wives, widows, and orphan children. In this way we will provide improved opportunity for our young people to pursue further education, thus relieving, in part, the unemployment problem and lessening the necessary magnitude of the proposed new community improvement corps. The first GI bill was enacted over 30 years ago. Since that time highly reputable studies have demonstrated beyond any doubt that the original cost of these programs have been offset many times by the resulting increase in tax revenues and, more importantly, a significant raising in the educational level of our citizenry.

I sincerely feel that the provisions of the conference report now before the House for consideration are generous from the standpoint of the veterans concerned and represent an appropriate recognition by the Congress of the need to maintain a strong and viable educational assistance program for our veterans. I therefore strongly recommend approval of this report by the House.

Mr. Speaker, I insert for the record at this point a table showing the 5 year estimated cost of the conference report on H.R. 12628. It will be noted that the estimate for the first full year, including about $75 million for the loan revolving fund, will be $869.8 million.

The table follows:

PRESIDENT FORD'S REMARKS AT BILL SIGNING CEREMONY

Federal Election Campaign Act Amendments of 1974

The President's Remarks at the Bill Signing Ceremony at the White House. October 15, 1974

Distinguished Members of the Congress, and guests:

It is really a great privilege for me to have a part in what I think is historic legislation. As all of my good friends from the Congress know, a tremendous amount of work, a lot of extra labor, went into the putting together of this legislation.

Quite frankly, I had some strong reservations about one version or one provision or another of the legislation, and I suspect some of the people here on both sides of the aisle have the same.

But we got together in a spirit of cooperation, a willingness to work together, to give a little and take a little, and the net result is legislation that I think the American people want. It is legislation for the times.

I am not telling you any secrets. I have some reservations about the final version. But, in the spirit of cooperation and compromise, I think it ought to be signed and become a part of our statutory law.

I can assure you from what I have heard, from the American people in writing and other communications, they want this legislation. So, it will soon be law. I think we do recognize that this legislation seeks to eliminate to a maximum degree some of the influences that have created some of the problems in recent years. And if that is the end result, certainly it is worth all the labor and all the compromises that were necessary in the process.

Now, this is a major step in one direction. To a substantial degree, there will be a degree of public financing. As long as it stays within the checkoff system, I am willing to go along with it. And I hope that the American taxpayers, as they make out their returns in the years ahead, will be generous so that those campaigns can and will be adequately financed.

Well, what it all comes down to, in my judgment, is that between a Congress controlled by one party, a White House in the hands of another, and a working cooperation between the Senate and the House, and the hard working members of that conference—I guess you were part of that, weren't you, Wayne—[laughter]—we ended up with some legislation that I think deserves the support of the American people, and I think they will support it.

I congratulate the conferees, the House and the Senate, and the people from the outside who had a significant impact in urging the Congress and the White House to be forthcoming.

So, I think this is a good day for 213 million Americans.

Thank you very, very much.

NOTE: The President spoke at 4:20 p.m. in the East Room at the White House. As enacted, the bill (S. 3044) is Public Law 93-443, approved October 15, 1974.

Federal Election Campaign Act Amendments of 1974

Statement by the President Upon Signing the Bill Into Law, While Expressing Reservations About Certain of Its Provisions. October 15, 1974

Today I am signing into law the Federal Campaign Act Amendments of 1974.

By removing whatever influence big money and special interests may have on our Federal electoral process, this bill should stand as a landmark of campaign reform legislation.

In brief, the bill provides for reforms in five areas:

—It limits the amounts that can be contributed to any candidate in any Federal election, and it limits the amounts that those candidates can expend in their campaigns.

—It provides for matching funds for Presidential primaries and public financing for Presidential nominating conventions and Presidential elections through use of the $1 voluntary tax checkoff.

—It tightens the rules on any use of cash, it limits the amount of speaking honorariums, and it outlaws campaign dirty tricks.

—It requires strict campaign financial reporting and disclosure.

—It establishes a bipartisan six-member Federal election commission to see that the provisions of the act are followed.

Although I support the aim of this legislation, I still have some reservations about it—especially about the use of Federal funds to finance elections. I am pleased that the money used for Federal financing will come from the $1 checkoff, however, thus allowing each taxpayer to make his own decision as to whether he wants his money spent this way. I maintain my strong hope that the voluntary contribution will not become mandatory and that it will not in the future be extended to Congressional races. And although I do have reservations about the first amendment implications inherent in the limits on individual contributions and candidate expenditures, I am sure that such issues can be resolved in the courts.

I am pleased with the bipartisan spirit that has led to this legislation. Both the Republican National Committee and the Democratic National Committee have expressed their pleasure with this bill, noting that it allows them to compete fairly.

The times demand this legislation.

There are certain periods in our Nation's history when it becomes necessary to face up to certain unpleasant truths.

We have passed through one of those periods. The unpleasant truth is that big money influence has come to play an unseeming role in our electoral process. This bill will help to right that wrong.

I commend the extensive work done by my colleagues in both houses of Congress on this bill, and I am pleased to sign it today.

NOTE: As enacted, the bill (S. 3044) is Public Law 93–443, approved October 15, 1974.

Future Farmers of America

The President's Remarks to the 47th Convention of the FFA at Kansas City, Missouri. October 15, 1974

Thank you very, very much, President Mark Mayfield, the 13,000 Future Farmers of America registered for this wonderful 47th Convention, the 500,000 Future Farmers of America in every State of the Union, and your guests:

It is a great privilege and a very high honor to have an opportunity of participating in this wonderful convention, and I thank you. And I thank you on behalf of Betty because she wanted me to come, too.

One week ago I asked the Congress and the American people to help me revitalize the economy, slow inflation, and save energy. At that time I proposed specific and urgent actions.

The American people, I can report tonight, have responded magnificently. A great citizens' mobilization has begun and is beginning to roll. It is already evident here in this eager, up-beat convention of Future Farmers of America. And I thank you from the bottom of my heart.

In this last week, I have received inflation-fighter enlistments from Americans of every conceivable occupation, economic circumstances, and political persuasion. Support has been freely offered by organizations and groups representing all ages, races, religions, and reaching into every corner of our great land.

America is arousing itself, as it always does in time of great challenge, to prove that we are a people who can do anything we want to do when we really want to do it. We are going to win in America.

Now some have said that instead of asking Congress and the Nation to bite the bullet, I offered only a marshmallow. Well, I had already asked the Congress to postpone for 3 months a 5.5 percent pay increase for Federal Government employees which would have saved $700 million. Congress wouldn't even chew that marshmallow. They haven't, as yet, shown much appetite for some of the other "marshmallows" in my latest message.

But if they don't like the menu, I may be back with some tough turkey.

It is my observation and view that the American people are hungry for some tough stuff to chew on in this crisis. I don't know of any better place to look to the future of America than right here in the 13,000 faces of the Future Farmers of America.

I don't see anyone in this auditorium, not one, wearing a button that says "Lose." You want to win, and we are going to win.

When your State presidents came to Washington last July during a time of tension in our national affairs, I pointed out to them that people around the world have great faith in America. I asked Future Farmers to have confidence in themselves, in our system of Government, and in our free competitive society.

I appreciated their response and your response. I think it is well expressed in the creed of the Future Farmers. I believe with you, for example, "in the future of farming, with a faith born not of words but of deeds . . . in the promise of better days through better ways, even as the better things we now enjoy have come to us from the struggles of former years." It couldn't be expressed better.

Number one of the major points in my address to the Congress last week was food. In a war against inflation, farmers are the front line soldiers. They have done a great job in America, making our country the bread basket of the world.

To halt higher food prices, obviously we must produce more food. I called upon, in that message, every farmer to grow to full capacity, in return—and properly so—I promised every farmer the fuel and the fertilizer that he needs to do the job, plus a fair return for the crops that he produces.

It is not only the young people in this auditorium who must lend their hands and their hearts to this task. I need help from young Americans all over this great land. The creative energy and the enthusiasm of youth in my judgment is our sure guarantee of winning.

But in all honesty, youth has the most to gain. Restoring stability and strength to our economy doesn't call for sacrifices so much as for contributions to one's own future well-being.

Last Saturday 22 members of the Citizens' Action Committee to Fight Inflation met with me at the White House. It was a beautiful fall afternoon, and I am sure many would have preferred on that committee to watch their favorite football game, or play some golf, or be with their family.

But I am deeply grateful that this fine committee took the time and made the effort to join with me on a Saturday to work on our national enemy number one.

Let me stress this point, if I could: This is a volunteer working committee, a completely nonpartisan group dealing with a nonpartisan problem. It will seek to mobilize America against inflation and for energy conservation.

I told the committee that if there was a scintilla of partisanship or if the group seemed to be merely a front for the White House its efforts would be doomed to failure.

Columnist Sylvia Porter, who has agreed to serve as national chairperson of this committee, responded that if I tried to manipulate the committee or seek to influence its actions, she and the other members would not participate. We understand each other.
