OPENING STATEMENT OF HON. CLAIBORNE PELL, CHAIRMAN OF THE SUBCOMMITTEE ON PRIVILEGES AND ELECTIONS

Senator PELL. The hearing of the Subcommittee on Privileges and Elections will come to order.

Today our subcommittee will consider proposals to amend the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971, as amended in 1974, necessitated by the Supreme Court's decision of January 30, 1976, in Buckley v. Valeo.

We are dealing here with matters of vital importance to our democratic system of government. It is the responsibility of Congress to assure the American people that political campaigns for Federal elective office will be conducted honestly, openly, and in a manner that protects the constitutional rights of every citizen to participate in our Nation's political processes.

In these hearings, the subcommittee will be seeking the best way to protect the integrity and fairness of our system of political campaigns.

As we are aware, during the 92d Congress the Federal Election Campaign Act was enacted to provide sweeping and thorough control over, and public disclosure of, receipts and expenditures in both Federal primary and general elections. The Federal Election Campaign Act Amendments of 1974, during the 93d Congress, amended the 1971 act extensively. The resulting law provided for overall limitations on campaign expenditures and political contributions; extensive reporting and recordkeeping requirements of candidates and political committees, and the creation of a Federal Election Commission with extensive powers to administer and enforce the act. The law also provided for the public financing of Presidential primary and general elections and conventions.

On January 30, the Supreme Court, in Buckley v. Valeo, upheld the contribution limitations, the recordkeeping and disclosure requirements of the act and the provisions for public financing of Presidential elections and conventions. However, the Court held that the expenditure limitations of the act were an unconstitutional violation of the first amendment and that the enforcement and administrative powers delegated to the Commission were unconstitutional because of the way in which its members were appointed.

The Supreme Court accorded de facto validity to all actions of the Commission prior to the date of its decision, and granted a stay for a period not to exceed 30 days of that part of its judgment that affects the authority of the Commission to exercise the duties and powers granted to it under the act.

The Court stated:

> This limited stay will afford Congress an opportunity to reconstitute the Commission by law or to adopt other valid enforcement mechanisms without interrupting enforcement of the provisions the Court sustains, allowing the present Commission, in the interim, to function de facto in accordance with the substantive provisions of the Act.

It is very important that the Congress act within the 30-day period set by the Supreme Court, but it is equally important that Congress act in an informed and deliberate manner. The testimony and statements presented at this hearing will be of valuable assistance to the Senate. We hope today to receive the views on the bills pending before the Senate as well as on the general impact of the Court's decision.

At this time I submit the aforementioned bills for inclusion in the record of the hearing.

SEC. 3. It is the sense of Congress that the importance of the Federal Election Commission and the orderly implementation of Federal election campaign laws in this election year require that the appointments authorized by the amendments made by this Act be made as soon as possible after the enactment of this Act.

"(b) (1) Every eligible candidate for the office of Senator who is nominated by a major party is entitled to payments for use in his general election campaign in an amount which is equal to the applicable limitation for that campaign in subsection (c) of section 608 of title 18, United States Code (relating to limitations on expenditures).

"(2) Every eligible candidate for the office of Senator who is nominated by a minor party is entitled to payments for use in his general election campaign in an amount which bears the same ratio to the amount of payments to which a candidate of a major party for the same office is entitled under this subsection as the total number of popular votes received by the candidate of that minor party for that office in the preceding general election bears to the average number of popular votes received by the candidates of major parties for that office in the preceding general election.

"(3) (A) A candidate who is eligible under section 502(d) (2) to receive payments under section 505 is entitled to payments for use in his general election campaign in an amount equal to the amount determined under subparagraph (B).

"(B) If a candidate whose entitlement is determined under this paragraph received, in the preceding general election held for the office to which he seeks election, 5 per centum or more of the total number of votes cast for all candidates for that office, he is entitled to receive payments for use in his general election campaign in an amount (not in excess of the applicable limitation under subsection (c) of section 608 of title 18, United States Code) equal to an amount which bears the same ratio to the amount of payments to which a candidate of a major party for the same office is entitled under this subsection as the total number of popular votes received by the candidate for that office in the preceding general election bears to the average number of popular votes received by the candidates of major parties for that office in the preceding general election. The entitlement of a candidate who, in the preceding general election held for that office, was the candidate of a major or minor party shall not be determined under this paragraph.

"(4) An eligible candidate who is the nominee of a minor party or whose entitlement is determined under section 502(d)(2) and who receives 5 per centum or more of the total number of votes cast in the current election is entitled to payments under section 505 after the election for expenditures made or incurred in connection with his general election campaign in an amount (not in excess of the applicable amount under subsection (c) of section 608 of title 18, United States Code) equal to—

"(A) an amount which bears the same ratio to the amount of the payment under section 505 to which the nominee of a major party was or would have been entitled for use in his campaign for election to that office as the number of votes received by the candidate in that election bears to the average number of votes received by all major party candidates for that office in that election, reduced by

"(B) any amount paid to the candidate under section 505 before the election.

"(c) Notwithstanding the provisions of subsections (a) and (b), no candidate is entitled to the payment of any amount under this section which, when added to the total amount of contributions received by him and his authorized committees and any other payments made to him under this title for his primary or general election campaign, exceeds the amount of the expenditure limitation applicable to him for that campaign as specified under subsection (c) of section 608 of title 18, United States Code.

"CERTIFICATIONS BY COMMISSION

"SEC. 504. (a) On the basis of the evidence, books, records, and information furnished by each candidate eligible to receive payments under section 505, and prior to examination and audit under section 506, the Commission shall certify from time to time to the Secretary of the Treasury for payment to each candidate the amount to which that candidate is entitled.

"(b) Initial certifications by the Commission under subsection (a), and all determinations made by it under this title, shall be final and conclusive, except to the extent that they are subject to examination and audit by the Commission under section 506. Notwithstanding the preceding sentence, such certifications and determinations by the Commission are subject to judicial review in accordance with the provisions of section 9041 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954.

"PAYMENTS TO ELIGIBLE CANDIDATES; SENATE ELECTION ACCOUNT

"SEC. 505. (a) The Secretary of the Treasury shall maintain in the Presidential Election Campaign Fund established by section 9006(a) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954, in addition to any other account which he maintains under such section, a separate account to be known as the Senate Election Account. The Secretary shall deposit into the account, for use by the candidate of any political party who is eligible to receive payments under section 502 and this section, the amount available after the Secretary determines that amounts for payments for Presidential general elections, Presidential primary elections, and Presidential nominating conventions under subtitle H of such Code are available for such payments. In addition to the amounts appropriated to the fund under section 9006(a) of such Code, there are authorized to be appropriated to the fund such additional amounts as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this title and subtitle H of such Code Amounts remaining in the fund after a Presidential general election shall not be transferred to the general fund of the Treasury.

"(b) Upon receipt of a certification from the Commission under section 504, the Secretary of the Treasury shall pay the amount certified by the Commission to the candidate to whom the certification relates.

"(c) If the Secretary of the Treasury determines that the moneys in the account are not, or may not be, sufficient to pay the full amount of entitlement to all candidates eligible to receive payments, he shall reduce the amount to which each candidate is entitled in accord with the procedures established under subtitle H of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 for Presidential elections.

"EXAMINATION AND AUDITS; REPAYMENTS

"SEC. 506. (a) After each election for the office of Senator, the Commission shall conduct a thorough examination and audit of the campaign expenditures of all candidates for such office who received payments under this title for use in campaigns relating to that election.

"(b) (1) If the Commission determines that any portion of the payments made to an eligible candidate under section 505 was in excess of the aggregate amount of the payments to which the candidate was entitled, it shall so notify that candidate, and he shall pay to the Secretary of the Treasury an amount equal to the excess amount. If the Commission determines that any portion of the payments made to a candidate under section 505 for use in his primary election campaign or his general election campaign was not used to make expenditures in connection with that campaign, the Commission shall so notify the candidate and he shall pay an amount equal to the amount of the unexpended portion to the Secretary. In making its determination under the preceding sentence, the Commission shall consider all amounts received as contributions to have been expended before any amounts received under this title are expended.

"(2) If the Commission determines that any amount of any payment made to a candidate under section 505 was used for any purposes other than—

"(A) to defray campaign expenditures, or

"(B) to repay loans the proceeds of which were used, or otherwise to restore funds (other than contributions to defray campaign expenditures which were received and expended) which were used, to defray campaign expenditures, it shall notify the candidate of the amount so used, and the candidate shall pay to the Secretary of the Treasury an amount equal to such amount.

"(3) No payment shall be required from a candidate under this subsection in excess of the total amount of all payments received by the candidate under section 505 in connection with the campaign with respect to which the event occurred which caused the candidate to have to make a payment under this subsection.

"(c) No notification shall be made by the Commission under subsection (b) with respect to a campaign more than eighteen months after the day of the election to which the campaign related.

"(d) All payments received by the Secretary under subsection (b) shall be deposited by him in the fund.

"INFORMATION ON EXPENDITURES AND PROPOSED EXPENDITURES

"SEC. 507. (a) Every candidate shall, from time to time as the Commission requires, furnish to the Commission a detailed statement, in the form the Commission prescribes, of—

"(1) the campaign expenditures incurred by him and his authorized committees prior to the date of the statement (whether or not evidence of campaign expenditures has been furnished for purposes of section 504), and

"(2) the campaign expenditures which he and his authorized committees propose to incur on or after the date of the statement.

"(b) The Commission shall, as soon as possible after it receives a statement under subsection (a), prepare and make available for public inspection and copying a summary of the statement, together with any other data or information which it deems advisable.

"REPORTS TO CONGRESS

"(b) The expenditure limitation on candidates receiving funds under this chapter shall be equal to—

"(1) $10,000,000, in the case of a candidate for nomination for election to the office of President of the United States, except that the aggregate of expenditures under this paragraph in any one State shall not exceed 16 cents multiplied by the voting age population of the State or $200,000, whichever is greater.

"(2) $20,000,000, in the case of a candidate for election to the office of President of the United States.

"(c) For purposes of this section—

"(1) expenditures made by or on behalf of any candidate nominated by a political party for election to the office of Vice President of the United States shall be considered to be expenditures made by or on behalf of the candidate of such party for election to the office of President of the United States; and

"(d) The limitations imposed by this section shall apply separately with respect to each election.

"(e) The Election Law Section shall prescribe guidelines under which any expenditure by a candidate for Presidential nomination for use in two or more States shall be attributed to such candidate's expenditure limitation in each State, based on the voting age population in each State which can reasonably be expected to be influenced by such expenditure.

"(f) (1) At the beginning of each calendar year (commencing in 1976), as there become available necessary data from the Bureau of Labor Statistics of the Department of Labor, the Secretary of Labor shall certify to the Commission and the Election Law Section and publish in the Federal Register the per centum difference between the price index for the 12 months preceding the beginning of such calendar year and the price index for the base period. Each limitation established by subsection (b) and subsection (g) shall be increased by such per centum difference. Each amount so increased shall be the amount in effect for such calendar year.

"(2) For purposes of paragraph (1)—

"(A) the term 'price index' means the average over a calendar year of the Consumer Price Index (all items—United States city average) published monthly by the Bureau of Labor Statistics; and

"(B) the term 'base period' means the calendar year 1974.

"(g) Notwithstanding other provisions of this section to the contrary, the national committee of a political party and a State committee of a political party, including any subordinate committee of a State committee, may, even if authorized by the candidate to receive contributions and make expenditures on behalf of his candidacy, make expenditures in connection with the general election campaign of that candidate without reducing the amount which that candidate may spend under subsection (b): Provided, That the national committee of that political party may not make expenditures in excess of 2 cents multiplied by the voting age population of the United States.

"(h) During the first week of each calendar year, the Secretary of Commerce shall certify to the Commission and the Election Law Section and publish in the Federal Register an estimate of the voting age population of the United States, of each State, and of each congressional district as of the 1st day of July next preceding the date of certification. Senator PELL. Senator Clark?

STATEMENT OF HON. DICK CLARK, MEMBER, SUBCOMMITTEE ON PRIVILEGES AND ELECTIONS

Senator CLARK. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. As a new member of this subcommittee, I am pleased to join with you today as we begin considering legislation to amend the Federal Election Campaign Act in the aftermath of the Supreme Court's decision in the case of Buckley v. Valeo. It was in hearings before this subcommittee more than 2 years ago that the 1974 Campaign Act was born. I am hopeful that this subcommittee, under your leadership, will again play a major role in the effort to insure clean, fair, and honest elections.

As one of the authors of the 1974 Campaign Act, I am greatly encouraged by the Court's recent decision. For the Court upheld the constitutionality of what are, in my judgment, the three most critical elements of that law: Full public disclosure of campaign contributions and expenditures; limitations on the campaign contributions from individuals and organizations; and—most important of all—public financing of elections.

It is true that the Court's decision requires that some changes be made. But I believe that presents a golden opportunity to make real progress in the fight to achieve tough campaign law enforcement and further diminish the influence of the wealthy and the special interests in the political process.

That is why I will urge the subcommittee to report favorably S. 2912, which I have introduced, with a bipartisan group of our colleagues. The details of S. 2912 will be spelled out in a few minutes by Senator Kennedy and Senator Scott, who have joined with me in sponsoring this legislation, and who have been in the forefront of the campaign reform effort for many years.

But I would like to touch on two major points, Mr. Chairman, in this opening statement.

The Court's ruling against the composition of the Federal Election Commission makes it imperative that we proceed to reconstitute that body so that it can be truly independent and capable of enforcing election laws with real clout. Recent events make clear that campaign regulation cannot be left to a commission that is under the thumb of those who are to be regulated. But neither is it acceptable to return enforcement to the sole control of the Department of Justice, where violations of the Corrupt Practices Act and other past election statutes were scrupulously ignored for years.

I believe, rather, that the Federal Election Commission must be allowed to continue its work as an independent executive branch agency. The Commission has had its problems—largely because it was faced with administering a new and complex law with inadequate funding and very little support. But in my judgment the loud protests against the FEC that have been heard in these halls are ample proof that the Commission is doing its job. After all, we are the people whose activities the FEC is charged to regulate. And if every Commission action over the past months had been received in Congress with unqualified support, or even quiet acceptance, we would have known that the FEC had failed.

Mr. Chairman, as you know, the original Senate version of the 1974 Campaign Act called for a Presidentially appointed commission, subject to the advice and consent of the Senate, as required by the Constitution. The Court's ruling makes adoption of such a commission an absolute necessity.

But we cannot stop there. Just as urgent, in the wake of Buckley v. Valeo, is the need to extend public financing to campaigns for Congress.

The Supreme Court decision makes clear that only in the context of a system of public financing can any limitations be placed on campaign expenditures. Only with public financing can we place any checks on what rich candidates can spend on their own behalf.

Twice in the 93d Congress the Senate passed legislation to establish congressional public financing. If the need was great then, it is far greater today. For with public financing of the 1976 Presidential campaign, and with limits on campaign spending struck down by the Court, the 1976 congressional elections are in grave danger of literally being flooded with money from rich "fat cats" and special-interest groups.

Mr. Chairman, the Court's unequivocal ruling in favor of the constitutionality of public financing of elections should end—once and for all—the lingering doubts about our efforts to halt the treachery of the private dollar in public's business. We have a green light to proceed without delay to the adoption of public financing for congressional campaigns. Only public financing can prevent the Congress from becoming an exclusive preserve for the wealthy and those with access to wealth.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to close with a brief comment on the message on campaign legislation which Presidet Ford sent to Congress 2 days ago. The President asked, first, for action to reconstitute the FEC—and I am certainly glad, as I think most of the Members of the Congress are, to have the President's support on that issue.

But, second, the President asked—and I quote—"that we limit through the 1976 elections the application of those laws administered by the Commission."

The President, it seems, wants us simply to wipe the slate clean.

Well, Mr. Chairman, I can only wonder at whether President Ford is serious about retreating from all the progress we have made in recent years to prevent the kind of abuses which Watergate epitomized. If so, I am afraid he is totally out of tune with the Congress and, I think, with the country.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator PELL. Thank you, Senator Clark. We are privileged to have the chairman of the full committee with us, Senator Cannon, and I wonder if he has some remarks he would care to make.

Senator CANNON. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I have no remarks at this time.

Senator PELL. Thank you very much for being at the hearing.

Senator PELL. Our first witnesses today will be Senators Hugh Scott and Kennedy. If they would care to come forward. If you would care to sit up here, Senator Scott, as a member of the committee.

STATEMENT BY HON. HUGH SCOTT, A U.S. SENATOR FROM THE COMMONWEALTH OF PENNSYLVANIA, AND HON. EDWARD M. KENNEDY, A U.S. SENATOR FROM THE COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS, JOINTLY

Senator SCOTT. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, Senator Cannon, Senator Clark. It is a pleasure for Senator Kennedy and myself to appear this morning before this subcommittee, to offer our suggestions with respect to appropriate Senate action in the wake of the Supreme Court's recent decision on the Election Reform Act of 1974.

The principal action we favor is set out in S. 2912, cosponsored by Senator Kennedy and myself, with Senator Clark, now pending before the committee. And that legislation would accomplish two major goals. It would reconstitute the Federal Election Commission to meet the constitutional defect found by the Supreme Court in Buckley v. Valeo. And it would extend to Senate campaigns the provisions on public financing of elections now applicable only to Presidential elections.

The establishment of the FEC as an independent agency to enforce the Federal election laws was one of the key victories of the 1974 reforms. Fortunately, the constitutional defect found by the Supreme Court in the establishment of the Commission can be easily cured by legislation. As President Ford's statement yesterday indicates, there is broad bipartisan support for enacting such legislation as promptly as possible, so that the Commission may continue its important work and so that the 1976 Presidential and congressional elections may proceed with minimal disruption and dislocation.

Title I of the bill is intended to accomplish this result. It proposes to reconstitute the Federal Election Commission as an independent agency within the executive branch, with its six members nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate.

In the 1974 act, Congress established the Commission to administer and enforce the Federal election laws. The Supreme Court, in its decision on the Commission, found no fault with this purpose—only with the method of choosing Commission members. The Court ruled that the combined congressional-Presidential appointment method violated the separation-of-powers doctrine—specifically, the "Appointments Clause" of the Constitution, which denies Congress the power to appoint officers of the United States with executive functions. This bill, by eliminating the congressional appointment power and requiring the members of the Commission to be appointed solely by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate, will remedy the constitutional defect found by the Court and will establish the Commission on a sound constitutional basis.

And I may add that I believe it is a better bill than other bills which have been offered in that it more clearly defines the powers, functions, and duties of the Commission.

In fact, as originally approved by the Senate in 1974, the election reform law did not contain the congressional appointment power. Now, by approving the proposed change, the Senate is simply returning to the version of the Commission it initially approved.

An unsatisfactory alternative would be to return to the pre-Watergate system—with the Clerk of the House and the Secretary of the Senate administering the campaign law and the Attorney General enforcing it. We believe that would be a serious mistake. Each of these officers has other important duties to perform. Their record of implementing the election laws in the past is persuasive evidence that more vigorous administrative, investigative, and enforcement machinery is needed. In addition, a system that requires employees of Congress to implement the laws under which Members of Congress are elected, creates at least the appearance of conflict of interest. In our view, the most satisfactory way to insure that the Federal election laws are fairly and firmly implemented is to reconstitute the Federal Election Commission as the vigorous and independent enforcement agency that Congress intended in 1974.

For similar reasons, we urge the committee to resist efforts that would reconstitute the Commission but would strip it of some or all of its principal investigative and enforcement powers. The restoration of public confidence in the election process requires an active watchdog in this area, not a toothless lapdog.

We also take this opportunity to express our satisfaction with the effective and expeditious way the present Commission has carried out its complex and sometimes thankless task. Obvioulsy, there have been growing pains. Inevitably, some actions by the Commission have put it on a collision course with Congress. But we think on the whole that the frequent sounds of pain emanating from some corners of Congress over the Commission are a sign that the medicine prescribed in the 1974 reforms is working well, a sign that the abuses infecting and corrupting our election system are actually being cured, and a sign that the Federal Election Commission is the right doctor for the job.

Finally, we would make three additional points on the legislation to reconstitute the Commission:

1. In technical respects, the legislation should facilitate a smooth transition to the new Presidentially appointed Commission. The bill we have introduced deals with a number of these areas, such as the provisions for continuity of the Commission's actions and resources. and the provisions enabling the President to reappoint the current members of the new Commission. We have also included an authorization for the Commission at the $10 million annual level approved by the Senate last year but stalled awaiting conference for many months.

2. We feel it would be unwise to place any time limit on the Commission's existence or on the current election laws. Such a step would, we believe, play into the hands of those who wish to weaken the enforcement agency and destroy the 1974 reforms. And I would add parenthetically here, that the President has made clear to the leadership of both parties that his purpose in proposing a termination act was to give the Congress full leeway to proceed with new and substantive legislation. I happen to believe that that is not necessary, that our action will accomplish the purpose, and that we do need permanent legislation. The President has not taken a position against permanent legislation in any degree, but has proposed that the power remain with the Congress as, of course, it does. It is better that we have the permanent legislation now.

The act has now passed a difficult constitutional test in the Supreme Court. With the exception of the expenditure limits struck down by the Court, all of the other major provisions have survived essentially intact. If changes in the law are necessary, there will be ample opportunity to enact them next year, after the experience of the 1976 elections. But to set a firm date now for expiration of the act would, in my judgment, be unwise and unjustified.

3. One of the most immediate problems in the aftermath of the Supreme Court's decision is the danger that the Presidential primary campaigns may be disrupted, because of the expiration on February 29 of the Commission's executive powers, including the authority to certify the eligibility of Presidential primary candidates for matching public funds.

Senator Kennedy and I have suggested, as a stopgap measure, that the Comptroller General may be given authority until April 30 to carry out the functions of the Commission with respect to the public financing provisions of the law, should that become necessary. We hope, however, that Congress can enact the pending legislation in time to meet the Supreme Court's February 29 deadline. If not, it is possible that the Court may stay its order for an additional period, so that legislation may be completed without disrupting the flow of public funds to the candidates in the Presidential primaries. What is clear, however, is that the pressure of the imminent deadline should not become an excuse for compromising other important goals, such as a strong Federal Election Commission or public financing of congressional elections.

Title II of our bill would establish public financing for Senate campaigns in a manner parallel to the Presidential public financing provisions upheld by the Supreme Court in Buckley v. Valeo. Essentially all of these provisions for congressional elections were approved by the Senate in 1973. They were approved again in 1974, after the Senate broke a filibuster under the old two-thirds procedure on the Senate floor.

As adopted by the Senate in 1973 and 1974, the public financing provisions applied to both Senate and House elections. The provisions we are now proposing would apply only to Senate elections. We are hopeful that the House of Representatives will enact public financing for its own elections, but we feel it is appropriate at this time that such a measure should originate in the House rather than in the Senate. In fact, a major current effort in the House is underway. The pending House legislation already has strong bipartisan support, with cosponsorship representing more than half the Members of the House, and we look forward to its success.

In accordance with the Presidential model, the public financing of Senate elections would function as follows under the bill we have proposed:

First, full public funding would be available for candidates of major parties in general elections for the Senate. A major party is defined as a party whose candidate received 25 percent or more of the vote in the preceding election. These provisions would go into effect for the general election in 1976.

Each candidate of a major party would receive public funds equal to the amount of the spending ceiling specified under the 1974 act—generally 12 cents a voter, or $150,000, whichever is greater. No candidate would be required to accept public funds. Any candidate could choose to rely on private funds, or he could use a mix of funds, partly public and partly private. However, in accordance with the Court's ruling, any candidate using public funds would be subject to the expenditure limitations in the law.

Partial public financing would be available for minor party candidates in general elections, based on the party's showing in the preceding election. A minor party candidate would also be eligible for funding retroactively after the current election, on the basis of his showing in that election. In general, a minor party is defined as a party whose candidate received 5 percent or more, but less than 25 percent, of the vote in the preceding election or the current election.

Second, a system of matching grants of public funds would be established for Senate primary elections. Candidates who raise a threshold sum—20 percent of the spending limit for Senate races—generally 8 cents a voter or $100,000, whichever is greater—would be eligible to receive matching grants of public funds for each private contribution of $100 or less. These provisions would go into effect for the primary elections in 1978.

The cost of the title will be modest. We estimate it at $34 million for each biennial Senate election, or about $17 million a year. Probably it could be funded through the existing dollar checkoff, although the bill contains an authorization for additional appropriations, if necessary.

We know that the dollar checkoff is working well for Presidential elections. Each year, as the checkoff becomes more familiar, increasing numbers of taxpayers are using their tax forms to provide the funds for public financing.

In 1972, the first year of the checkoff, only 3 percent of the taxpayers used it, largely because the checkoff was on a separate IRS form that taxpayers overlooked. In 1973, participation jumped to 13 percent, after the IRS put the checkoff on page 1 of the tax return. In 1974, participation jumped again, to a remarkable 24 percent, as taxpayers became more familiar with the new procedure. And according to preliminary information recently available on 1975 tax returns now being received by IRS, participation is rising once again, with 26 percent of the returns filed so far using the checkoff.

The growing public acceptance of public financing of Presidential elections offers important encouragement for extending this reform to congressional elections. The Supreme Court's decision is a clear green light for Congress to adopt public financing for all elections to Federal office. To stop now, after achieving reform for Presidential elections, would leave the job half done, and perpetuate a double standard for elections that Congress should not tolerate. Now that the Supreme Court has affirmed the constitutionality of this reform, the time is ripe to take this next important step toward clean, honest, and open elections.

Since public financing is already available for Presidential elections, the need for action on congressional elections is especially urgent. Under the 1974 act, Presidential campaigns will be largely insulated from the influence of special-interest money and massive private spending. But all that private money and all that special influence are still there, looking for fresh fields to conquer.

That is why we believe public financing for congressional elections is needed now. The danger is that without reform, the 1976 congressional elections will be swamped with special-interest money, as big contributors and organized interest groups vie with one another to gain new footholds in the Senate and House, and increase their already powerful sway over Congress and its work.

Public financing guarantees a fairly financed election for every candidate to Federal office. And it guarantees that once elected, a successful candidate will take his oath of office with no strings attached. Gone will be the possibility of dubious relationships created for the benefit of those who may have an interest in his votes and his other actions once he is in Congress.

Moreover, the Supreme Court's recent action outlawing spending limits provides an additional reason and a new agency for public financing of congressional elections. The effect of the court's decision is to eliminate any spending limits, but to leave in place the $1,000 and $5,000 limits on contributions by individuals and political committees, respectively. As a result, Senate and House candidates of modest means have a new and greater vulnerability to wealthy challengers or to challengers with wealthy friends. As the court's decision makes clear, such challengers and their friends may spend unlimited resources of their own to win an election. Yet candidates of modest means will be required to raise their funds under the strict contribution limits of the act.

We believe that public financing is the best antidote to the wealthy opponent problem in Senate and House elections. With public financing, candidates of modest means would have a ready source of funds to finance their campaigns. And, as the Supreme Court's decision makes clear, spending limits can be constitutionally imposed as a condition of receiving public funds, so that the likely result of adopting public financing of congressional elections will be to achieve reasonable limits on campaign spending for all candidates, rich and poor alike.

And the cost of the reform is extremely small—$17 million a year for public financing of Senate elections. To us that is the wisest single investment the hard-pressed American taxpayer can make in the future of the country. From that reform alone can flow many benefits in every aspect of our work, as Members of Congress become more responsive to the country and its needs.

The debate is well known and familiar to us all. The issue is whether elections belong to all the people or just the wealthy and special interests. In 1974, Congress achieved a major breakthrough for reform in the financing of Presidential elections. If public financing is right for Presidential elections, it is right for Senate and House elections, too. And the sooner we accept that fact, the sooner we shall have a Congresas responsive to the people, and the healthier our democracy will be.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator KENNEDY. Mr. Chairman, the statement that Senator Scott has presented is in behalf of both of us. I would like to just very, very briefly, because I know you have a full range of witnesses this morning, mention a couple of matters which we consider to be of great urgency and importance.

But before I do, I could not let the opportunity pass without recognizing the extraordinary contributions, in terms of election reforms, that have been made by this committee. Under Senator Cannon, who has been the spearhead on this committee, and also on the floor—and, I might say, in some tough bargaining with the House of Representatives—much of what was voted on and presented by the Senate of the United States was defended and I think all of us who are interested in this issue are in his debt. We are also in your debt, Senator Pell, for chairing these hearings and for continuing to present this issue in a very important and intelligent and rational way to the American people. The work that has been done in this committee has been excellent.

My colleague, Senator Scott, who has presented our joint statement this morning, is really the father of the Federal Election Commission. He has sponsored this concept for a number of years. It can, in and of itself, provide a very important contribution to insuring the integrity of the election system. He has also been a leader on public financing, both in the Presidential election system and hopefully—if the position which he and I, and Senator Clark and others, including Senator Mathias and Senator Eagleton, have taken is accepted—in the extension of public financing to Senatorial elections and Congressional elections. And, of course, we pay tribute to the prime sponsor of S. 2912, the legislation, which we are testifying in favor of today, your junior member of this committee, Senator Clark, who has been so effective in this whole area.

So we know we are talking to members of a committee that are extremely familiar with this issue. We know these matters have been discussed within the committee and on the floor of the Senate. We urge your favorable consideration of the proposals which we put forward here today, and which have, as Senator Scott mentioned, been debated and discussed at length in this committee and on the floor of the Senate and on the floor of the House of Representatives.

As Senator Clark pointed out, the decision of the Supreme Court is encouraging. It recognized three very important points.

First of all, it recognized the constitutionality of public financing of Presidential campaigns. And, having recognized that, I think we have to ask ourselves whether we are going to let an opportunity pass to provide for the public financing of senatorial campaigns and congressional campaigns. As a matter of comity, I think we have to recognize our limitations in the Senate in adopting a proposal for the House of Representatives. But we should not let an opportunity like this go by to deal with Senate elections, after the Supreme Court of the United States has ruled, recognizing the constitutionality of public financing. After we in the Congress have looked over the whole series of Watergate scandals, we cannot say we are going to provide public financing for the Presidency, but we think our own house is in good order without that reform.

I think it is important for us to act. And I think, quite frankly, it is the wisest investment of American taxpayers' money. You and I have often heard, both on the floor of the Senate and in our committees, the criticism—why should we use the American taxpayers' funds for this? After all, it is politics. But you and I and the Members of this body understand that the special, powerful, private interests use their contributions to make their influence felt on various issues that, in effect, require the spending of billions of taxpayers' dollars.

So it is imperative, I think, that we consider public financing for the Senate.

Second, in the Supreme Court decision, we are gratified that the Court upheld the limitations on contributions although we regret that Court rejected the limitations on expenditures. The latter is an extremely complex, involved first amendment issue, but we would hope that this committee might be able to make some recommendations to close these new loopholes—and I am sure that Senator Clark and Senator Scott and I would endorse them warmly.

Finally, the Supreme Court has invited us to remedy the imperfections in the Federal Election Commission. I am completely satisfied that if the Senate-House conference had accepted what had originally been passed by the Senate, the Commission would have been upheld by the Supreme Court. And so it seems to us that going back to what was initially recommended by Senator Scott and the other Members of that bipartisan effort makes sense now, to remedy the separation-of-powers defect which was found by the Supreme Court.

So I am very hopeful, Mr. Chairman, that we can pass this legislation. It is timely legislation. It is important. It will restore the integrity of the election process for Members of the Senate and House, and make the election of Senators and Congressmen accountable to the people rather than dependent upon the large financial contributors, which have much too much influence in a democratic society.

I would also like to say how much we appreciated the representation of Mr. Archibald Cox in defending the Senate's position in the Supreme Court. We feel he did an outstanding job, and I think represented not only the positions that were taken by those that had introduced the legislation, but generally of the Senate as a whole. And we were, of course, very much honored to have his participation.

Senator PELL. Thank you very much, Senators, for presenting your views.

As we look into the legislation, there is a good deal of nitty-gritty that has to be examined, to see how it would be implemented, how it will survive, whether it will fly.

One question that comes up here is in connection with the President's proposal to take away the ex officio representation of the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House. And I was wondering if you felt that that was correct or not. I notice your bill has their representation in, the President has proposed that it be knocked out.

Do you have a view?

Senator KENNEDY. I think they should be part of the Commission, but not voting members. I think having their expertise, knowledge, and understanding is useful for the Commission. As ex officio members, they can provide their expertise and make it available to the Commission.

Senator SCOTT. I don't think they have interposed any objection to being nonvoting members. Mr. Valeo doesn't make that point in his letter to the chairman of the committee.

Senator PELL. Thank you.

Senator Griffin?

Senator GRIFFIN. I want to thank both of you for your testimony and for the leadership that you have provided in the past on this very important subject.

I would like to ask a practical question about the length of time that we have to deal with this subject. As I make the computation, it is 11 days.

Regardless of how we feel as individuals about the public financing of Senate races, I think we would have to agree that it is controversial.

Do you think it is realistic that within 11 days we can pass a bill that will not only reconstitute the Commission and provide for the Presidential appointment of the members, but also include such a controversial provision as this public financing of Senators' elections?

Senator KENNEDY. I think there are two important points, perhaps three important points, that are to be made.

First of all, the legislation which we are sponsoring is legislation which has already passed the Senate. Actually, it is legislation on which we broke a filibuster in 1974. It has passed the Senate twice. It was reported favorably by this committee. So it is not a new debate, not a new discussion, not a new issue.

Second, we have provided an option, if we are unable to act for an interim period up to April 30, so that GAO would be able to continue the process. And we feel that could be an alternative to meet the time pressures.

And, finally, I don't think it is inconceivable that we could get an additional stay by the Supreme Court. They have done that in the redistricting cases for up to a period of 2 years, I understand. Obviously the most we would ask for is perhaps a few more weeks. I don't think that that possibility ought to be discounted—I think the Court would need to be impressed by the progress on our legislation in the House and Senate, but I do think we have some flexibility on it.

I would hope that we could move expeditiously, but I think there are these options which are available to us.

Senator GRIFFIN. I thank the Senator for that response. I think it is good to have your response on the record, because I rather suspect this is a question that is on a lot of people's minds.

Thank you.

Senator PELL. Senator Clark?

Senator CLARK. Just one question, Senator Kennedy. Is it not true that the only way that we can have expenditure limitations in congressional elections is to pass legislation which would establish public financing? Without that, the lid is off and we have no limit of any kind—isn't that true?

Senator KENNEDY. The Senator is absolutely correct. It is clear, as the Supreme Court has stated.

Senator PELL. I would like to interpolate a thought here. The lid is off anyway if they don't accept it. So I think the general public should be aware of that.

Senator KENNEDY. The lid, though, rather interestingly, Mr. Chairman, is on because I think the immediate record of all the Presidential candidates who are in the race now is that they have accepted public funds. So the limits are on. And I think it would be an extraordinary Member of the Congress or Senate who would go the independent route. I think, given the climate and atmosphere of this time, woe to the candidate who says that he is not going to go the public-financing route. Even those who go the private route would probably feel bound by the limits anyway.

Senator PELL. I would agree with you, those of us who are frugal New Englanders would probably keep it under the ceiling.

Senator Cannon?

Senator CANNON. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. First, I want to thank Senator Kennedy for his very kind remarks. We spent a lot of time trying to develop the bill that we did get out. And that raises a question in my mind.

I am sure that both of you are well aware of the difficulties we encountered. Do you think realistically there is an opportunity to get a bill through in a reasonably short period of time—when I say through, through both Houses of Congress—providing for public financing of congressional elections?

Senator KENNEDY. The interesting points in the House are these. First of all, a majority of Members of the House have actually co-sponsored a bill for public financing of House elections—so this is impressive. And, second, I have also been impressed by what has been happening in the House among a number of different Members about the value of the Federal Election Commission.

Even Mr. Hays, who has been outspoken in his opposition, has been more willing recently to accept a Federal Election Commission. Obviously we have different views about what its powers should be—but I do think that in the period of the last few days, there has been some extremely interesting movement. And I am very hopeful that, with a strong position by the Senate, there would be an opportunity to meet the deadline and also to act on public financing.

Senator SCOTT. I would like us to try it. I think that public opinion is moving very strongly in favor of public financing, and I would hope we could try it.

I do want to thank the chairman and the members for the work they did on the original bill—really magnificent work was done under the chairman's leadership. And serving on the committee, I was greatly impressed at how well he guided the conferees in very difficult situations. And while we didn't get all we wanted, we did get the basic law and we got some important advances out of that bill.

Senator CANNON. I thank the Senator for his kind remarks. Let me ask this—if it came to a choice between the question of public financing of congressional races and the extension of the life of the Commission independently, what would be the position of the Senator? In other words, should we hold fast—if the Senate passes it, should we hold fast and have no bill at all, or should we try to find an intermediate ground extending the life of the Commission, and consider this as two separate issues?

Senator KENNEDY. Well, Mr. Chairman, I feel very strongly that the Members of the Senate as well as the House ought to have an opportunity to express their views on both these important issues. I think we have an important responsibility to carry this issue as far as we can in terms of advancing the public interest. Obviously, we do not want to disrupt the national Presidential campaign, in which candidates have undertaken this effort with the idea of being able to participate in public financing.

So I think that would be unfair and unwise. But I do feel that we have a very basic and fundamental and important responsibility to present this issue to our membership in the Senate and go to conference with a strong position and make every legitimate effort to work out any differences and adjustments with the House.

Senator SCOTT. The Senator has expressed my views.

Senator CANNON. Both of you have certainly pointed out the danger of unlimited spending and why it would be better to go to public financing of congressional races. However, that still leaves unanswered, as I understand it, both in your bill and, importantly, by the decision of the Supreme Court, the question of independent spending, of unlimited spending on the part of individuals or groups, either supporting or in opposition to the particular candidate.

And I wonder if you have any suggestive thoughts as to whether there is or is not any way to arrive at this one defect that would still remain in the law?

Senator SCOTT. Well, I think that it is extremely difficult to meet that. I think we should, in the committee, ask advice of counsel, possibly outside counsel as well, as to whether there is any way to cure this most unfortunate loophole which the Court has left in the bill.

I think it was by far the worst part of the Court's decision. And if there is any way by which limitations can be imposed, other than those which we do impose by virtue of accepting the matching fund.

Senator CANNON. No, I am referring to the spending by others.

Senator SCOTT. That is what I meant.

Senator CANNON. In other words, someone independent from the candidate.

Senator SCOTT. If we could impose limitations on outside spending, I would be in favor of it. I think the committee might be well advised to get advice of counsel. I do not know any way by which the Congress can overrule that part of the Supreme Court's decision other than by the matching funds provision.

It is going to be extremely difficult to change that part of the Supreme Court's ruling in view of the wording they use in the opinion. But I would like to see something tried.

Senator KENNEDY. I would just say one word on it. I am a strong supporter of imposing whatever limitations we can, Mr. Chairman. I do recognize the first amendment questions. I hope that perhaps we may be able to address the problem. It is enormously complex, although I do think there may be some opportunity to move in this area.

At least, we can require disclosure. I think we have every right to expect that, any time individuals are spending money, we are entitled to very clear notice as to who is spending, how much is being spent, and who receives the benefit.

I think there are efforts in this area which can be important in terms of public notification.

I think with regard to the proliferation of various committees, I think there are probably areas here where the committees can move. We have some ideas, perhaps some suggestions, which we could submit.

Senator CANNON. You both recall, of course, that we had the first amendment question very well in mind during our conference, and we were aware of the problems. But we did take a shot at some of the proposed limitations in the event that they would be upheld.

I have a question as to why you have the provision that the public financing is voluntary rather than mandatory, because if you still have it so that an individual can come in and not accept public financing, that individual can spend unlimited under that provision of the law. Why wouldn't you be better off to require it, make it a mandatory provision?

Senator SCOTT. I am wondering whether we wouldn't run into the Constitution on that, that is what has bothered me about it.

Senator KENNEDY. I would say that I myself would favor it. We could make it mandatory. What we were attempting to do was to track what has been recognized by the Supreme Court in terms of constitutionality.

As you know, we debated that issue at some length in the Senate in 1973 and 1974. I myself would favor making it required, but it does seem to me that we are on completely solid ground from the constitutional point of view in the way that we have proceeded.

Senator CANNON. Now, do I understand your bill—well, first let me ask about the effective date. I think our analysis here showed the effective date for the primaries, January 1977—but I notice that Senator Scott read from his statement January 1978.

Which is correct?

Senator SCOTT. It should be 1977.

Senator CANNON. And your bill would provide that for the general elections it would take effect this year.

Senator KENNEDY. Yes.

Senator CANNON. Now, do I correctly understand that the matching provision would relate only to primary elections and would be in amounts—contributions of $100 or less—that would be eligible for matching funds, and that there would be no matching fund required for the general election, but simply the maximum amount, according to the formula, would be made available; is that correct?

Senator SCOTT. That is my understanding.

Senator KENNEDY. The Senator is correct.

Senator CANNON. Now, what happens under the provisions of your bill if there are not sufficient funds earmarked through the dollar checkoff provision to take care of the Presidential races and Congressional races? Is there a pro rata between them or do you take care of the Presidential races first and then pro rate insofar as the money is available for the Congressional races?

Senator KENNEDY. Well, as you know, Senator, the first year that we had the checkoff, we had 3-percent participation. Now, in the advance payments of taxes in 1976, it is already up to 26 percent. We believe that there is an increasing appreciation of its importance, and that there will be increasing funds for it. And, as we pointed out, we are talking about $34 million for Senate elections on a biennial basis, which is a reasonable amount—$17 million a year.

We also provide an appropriation to make up any shortfall if there is one. If not, it would have to be pro rated.

Senator CANNON. But do you provide for any pro rata in——

Senator KENNEDY. I think there is a provision for pro rating, Senator.

Senator CANNON. You believe that if there isn't one in there, there should be.

Senator SCOTT. There should be if there isn't one.

Senator KENNEDY. There should be a provision in there, and it should follow after the Presidential elections. The Presidential elections come first and it should be pro rated after that.

Senator CANNON. In your proposal, you have an authorization for $10 million for the Federal Election Commission. They are operating on the basis of $5 million now, and I am wondering why you use the $10 million figure. Do you have some justification as to additional funds that may be needed? They are proceeding on the basis of $5 million now.

Senator KENNEDY. I think the figure was the one that the Senate passed before. We would be guided by this committee's judgment, but the figure was taken from the previous Senate bill.

Senator CANNON. Well, I wondered if you had any specific information, because before we were sort of shooting in the dark, we didn't know what would be required—and the rate now of spending, or at least the rate of money made available to the Commission, is at the $5 million rate at the present time. And there are some people in the Congress who feel the Commission has had too much money already, that they have gone far afield, beyond the limits that Congress originally envisioned, in developing their rules and regulations and advisory opinions, as you well know.

So that may be a controversial issue at some point in the development of this legislation.

Now, what would you envision would happen with respect to candidates who have already raised funds in this particular year, if this should pass and be made effective immediately? What happens there with respect to the candidate's funds on hand who is a candidate in the November election?

Senator KENNEDY. We are open to suggestions on it. I think it is a very fair, practical question—we would be wide open on it.

Senator CANNON. There are many congressional races who have raised funds and probably more than enough to meet the spending limit of the primary election. And I was just curious to know what would happen to those funds, those unused funds, then, if one were to go to public financing.

The committee I am sure can——

Senator KENNEDY. Give some thought to it. I would expect that most of the moneys that have been raised have been for primary races, but, of course, there are cases where that wouldn't be so—and we would be guided by both the Commission's and the committee's judgment on that.

Senator SCOTT. I would like to respectfully suggest to those Senators who may propose simply the reconstitution of the Federal Election Commission that they look at the details of our bill. We think that we have tried to be somewhat specific as to the authority and the powers, and we may have gone further than some of the other bills. We think it is desirable that we should, and we hope that those introducing other bills will give some consideration to this.

Senator CANNON. In other words—is it title I of your bill?

Senator SCOTT. Title I, yes.

Senator CANNON. You have imposed some limitations on the authority of the Commission beyond the broad limitations that they were exercising under in the previous period of time.

Senator SCOTT. Yes. We are making the authority, we think, somewhat clearer than it is made in some of the other bills offered and on which testimony will be given.

Senator CANNON. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator PELL. Thank you, Senator Cannon. There is one further question I wanted to ask both of you, your opinion on, at the suggestion of committee counsel, because it is a question presently before the Commission. When we come to the single-issue candidates, whether it is antiabortion or proabortion or gun control or SST, do you think they should be able to qualify for public matching funds, or should they demonstrate a broader spectrum of interest?

Senator SCOTT. I don't believe that you would have a right to exclude them if they come under the qualification of minor candidates, because you would be excluding them on the basis of their ideas. Because a Democrat or a Republican presumably holds certain ideas—a vegetarian's ideas may be different, but they are still ideas. I don't think we ought to get into the realm of ideas and the realm of exclusion of ideas.

Senator KENNEDY. I would agree, Mr. Chairman. I do feel that, you go back over recent times, some might say that those involved in the 1968 campaign were involved in a one-issue matter about ending the war in Southeast Asia. I would be strongly opposed toward providing any kind of limitation.

If they can qualify, no matter what their views are, then they ought to be eligible for public funds.

I would be strongly opposed to trying to exclude those we think are one-issue candidates. If they can meet the qualifications, they ought to be eligible.

Senator CANNON. If the Senator would yield, I don't think there is any way we could constitutionally pick and choose who could or could not be candidates or be eligible, beyond the constitutional limitations.

I think a limitation based on the issues would clearly fall of its own weight.

Senator SCOTT. The Constitution didn't even contemplate parties in the first place.

Senator CANNON. Incidentally, Chairman Hays' name was mentioned earlier, and I have just been notified that he is holding a press conference at 2 p.m. today on the FEC.

Senator PELL. Thank you. I would agree with both of you in connection with your response to my question regarding a one-issue candidate, which essentially was the situation in the 1968 campaign—and the 1972 campaign, too.

So I thank you very much.

Senator GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman.

Senator PELL. Senator Griffin?

Senator GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, if I could just comment. I want to indicate that I introduced the President's proposal today (S. 2987), and I want to indicate that as a result of listennig to your testimony and studying your proposal, I see at least two features in here that I want to indicate agreement with.

One is the matter of the ex officio service of the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives—this may be an unfortunate omission in the President's bill. If it is constitutional, I believe I would be in favor of that change.

And then also I notice in your bill you provide the six-member Commission—the terms of two would expire every 2 years. In other words, it would be staggered. No one President after the initial appointment would be able to appoint a whole Commission again. I think that is a desirable feature that the terms of any Commission be staggered.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator KENNEDY. Thank you very much.

Senator SCOTT. Thank you.

Senator PELL. Thank you very much indeed.

STATEMENTS OF HON. RICHARD S. SCHWEIKER, A U.S. SENATOR FROM THE COMMONWEALTH OF PENNSYLVANIA, AND HON. WALTER F. MONDALE, A U.S. SENATOR FROM THE STATE OF MINNESOTA

Senator PELL. Our next witnesses will be Senators Schweiker and Mondale who will be testifying on S. 2911. Senators, welcome, and proceed as you will.

Senator SCHWEIKER. Thank you, Mr. Chairman and members of the committee. With the committee's permission, I would like to insert my full statement into the record, in view of the schedule you have.

Senator PELL. Without objection, your written statement will be inserted in the hearing record in its entirety.

[The written statement of Senator Schweiker follows:]

STATEMENT OF HON. RICHARD S. SCHWEIKER, A U.S. SENATOR FROM THE COMMONWEALTH OF PENNSYLVANIA

Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the opportunity to appear this morning to discuss our bill, S. 2911, to reconstitute the Federal Election Commission.

We in the Congress have been handed what is really a pretty simple problem by the Supreme Court. We passed an election reform law in 1974 which contained a great many provisions. One of those said that the law would be administered by a Commission with six members, two chosen by the President, two by the House leadership, and two by the Senate leadership. This Commission would receive reports, issue rules and regulations, give advisory opinions, certify federal campaign matching funds, and investigate apparent violations of the law.

On January 30, the Supreme Court handed down its decision in Buckley v. Valeo, the major challenge to the constitutionality of the election law. Some parts of the law were upheld, and others were found to be unconstitutional.

With regard to the Federal Election Commission, the Court said that the make-up approved by Congress could not stand. The laws of our country, under the Constitution, must be administered by "Officers of the United States" appointed by the President and subject to confirmation by the Senate. Four of the six members of the FEC are presently approved by Congress, not by the President, however, and all six are subject to approval, not by the Senate alone, but by both the House and the Senate. This set-up, the Court concluded, makes the FEC in effect a Congressional body, with no more power than Congress could give to one of its Committees.

Specifically, the Court held the Commission could exercise only the informational functions granted to it under the law. It could no longer:

(a) Certify any public matching funds for the Presidential election;

(b) Issue any binding advisory opinions;

(c) Issue any binding regulations interpreting the law; or

(d) Hold any administrative hearings or exercise any civil enforcement powers.

The Court recognized the chaos that would result if the FEC were killed outright, and so it gave Congress 30 days, until the end of February, to reconstitute the Commission in a constitutionally valid fashion.

In response to this decision, I immediately introduced S. 2911 to reconstitute the Federal Election Commission. We believe this bill will promptly resolve the problem created by the Court's decision.

The bill is very simple. Let me outline its provisions. Section One recreates the Commission with six members appointed for staggered six-year terms by the President, subject to the advice and consent of the Senate, and two members, the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House, serving ex officio and without vote. No more than three members appointed by the President may be from any political party.

Section Two of our bill provides for a transition between the present Commission and the new Commission. It is our intent that the terms of the old Commissioners expire on the appointment of their successors, and that the present Commissioners be eligible for appointment to the new Commission although we take no position on whether they should be named. We believe our bill adequately provides for continuity and provides the authority required for staff and files to be carried over to a new Commission.

Finally, Section Three urges the President to act as quickly as possible to fill the positions created by our bill so that the orderly implementation of the Federal election campaign laws may be continued.

Mr. Chairman, this last point is what this controversy is all about. Despite all the other issues which have been raised since the Supreme Court's decision, the overriding, primary concern of all of us must be the assurance that the election laws are not thrown into further disarray. We must re-establish a mechanism to administer the federal campaign matching funds and, perhaps most important, to give authoritative interpretation and enforcement of the election laws by an independent body.

The simplest and most effective way to do this, particularly at this time in an election year, is to reconstitute the Federal Election Commission. The Commission has assembled a staff which has acquired expertise by administering the Federal election law for the last several months. Given the success of the first legal attack on this law, we should not overlook the fact that the Court has indicated that it approves of a Presidentially-appointed Commission. Any other proposal could bring about a new lawsuit, and the possibility of another crisis later in the election year.

Let's look briefly at some of the other alternatives which have been suggested, either before this Committee or in the press in the past few weeks. One approach has been to gut the Commission, by taking all enforcement powers for Congressional elections out of the Commission and leaving it only the job of certifying the matching funds. The law would then theoretically be enforced by the Congress.

This approach really puts election law back into a pre-Watergate posture. In the public's eye, giving the 535 Members of Congress power to enforce the election laws would be like giving enforcement of the antitrust laws over to Fortune's 500 corporations. This country would not stand for it. We decided in 1974 that an independent body must implement these laws to assure that they are enforced impartially. The Congress cannot forget that the appearance of justice is an important part of justice itself, and we should not place ourselves in the indefensible position of seeking to have our activities beyond independent review.

Another proposal has been to transfer the administration of the Presidential matching money to the General Accounting Office, either temporarily or permanently, and let the rest of the law lapse. The Comptroller General has answered this proposal very effectively by pointing out that the GAO does not have the staff or the expertise to administer this law, and that this transfer would be very disruptive. I would like to insert a copy of a letter from the Comptroller General in the record at this point. (See letter addressed to Chairman Cannon by Comptroller General Staats, which letter may be found on p. 148 of these hearings.) In addition to not maintaining smooth administration of the matching funds, this proposal would stop all new rules and regulations from being issued.

This is an important point. We have seen the law chopped in half by the Supreme Court. All the rules and regulations previously issued by the Commission should be reexamined to see if they are still valid. To take away the power to make rules and advisory opinions from the FEC will require every candidate for federal office in the country to act without guidance in this complex legal situation, not knowing whether his actions are within the law until he finds out he is under indictment by some state attorney general or the U.S. Justice Department. The orderly administration of the election laws does not simply mean handing out public funds on an expeditious basis; it includes giving candidates the guidelines needed to stay within the law.

Another proposal has been to address public financing and "loophole closing" at this time. I have favored public financing of Congressional races in the past, and I think that we should make another effort to take big money out of our political system. But these are complicated issues which cannot be dealt with properly in the short period of time remaining for us in February. We are learning a lot about public financing in its first trial run at the Presidential level, and there are some things about it which we may want to take another look at. The problem of loopholes is even more complex. There is no possibility that a comprehensive bill on this subject would move quickly enough through the Congress to meet the Court's deadline.

Further campaign reform must be addressed, but not under the deadline pressure we now face. I hope that this Committee will schedule early hearings on the questions of Congressional public financing and revisions in the substance of the campaign laws, with a view toward reporting out a bill later in the spring if possible.

Mr. Chairman, the President has asked the Congress to reconstitute the Commission, and the Comptroller General thinks it is the best way to go. The American Bar Association and Common Cause agree that this Commission must be renewed before the end of February. Our bill, which will do just that, has 13 cosponsors in the Senate, and an identical bill has 56 in the House. We ask this Committee to send S. 2911 to the floor so that the American people will know that we care about the orderly and fair administration of the election law, and also to show that Congress can indeed get a job done on time.

Thank you. I would be happy to answer any questions you might have.

Senator SCHWEIKER. I will try just to summarize, Mr. Chairman, some of the important points of the bill that we are proposing.

I think it is important, Mr. Chairman, to consider the time factor in the problem at hand. We have less than 11 days to solve a very serious problem. And having served in the House of Representatives for four terms. I am not very optimistic that they are going to pass any other part of a bill except the bill that Senator Mondale and I are proposing today.

In my judgment there is no way the House is going to accept the public financing. We battled this for many months—your committee has led the fight, you have done the work, and after months and months of work and effort, it was scratched in conference.

So I think we are somewhat deluding ourselves if we think that we can get public financing, or really anything else that might be desirable, into this bill. I happen to be a sponsor of public financing, I am all for it, I strongly support it, I will fight for it—but not at this time and place.

I think also that it is important to realize that if we lose everything, what happens? First, if the FEC goes out of commission, in addition to not having public matching funds for Presidential elections, they cannot issue any binding advisory opinions, they cannot issue any binding regulations interpreting the law, they cannot hold any administrative hearings or exercise any civil enforcement powers. In short, we have organized chaos. And the Supreme Court recognized this—that is why they gave us 30 days to get it straightened out. So I think it is important to put our priorities where they should be.

Second, as was mentioned earlier, and I would like to reemphasize it, this committee led the way in the Senate, led the way in the Congress, in 1974 when we decided that we wanted an independent body to implement these laws so that they are impartially enforced. And the Congress cannot forget that the appearance of justice is just as important as part of justice itself.

I don't believe that we should place ourselves in the indefensible position of seeking to have our activities beyond independent review. We should not look like we are having the fox guarding the chicken coop. And that is what would happen if FEC expires.

Our bill has broad support. President Ford indicated that he supports this concept, the ABA convention assembled in Philadelphia just passed a resolution endorsing this concept—and I would like to include that in the record, Mr. Chairman, if that would be all right.

Senator PELL. Without objection, it will be included.

[The resolution referred to follows:]

AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION REPORT TO THE HOUSE OF DELEGATES
SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON ELECTION REFORM

RECOMMENDATION

Resolved, that the American Bar Association urges the Congress to immediately enact legislation to reconstitute and to preserve an independent Federal Election Commission and, it is, further

Resolved, that the President of the United States and the Senate are urged, through their respective powers of appointment and confirmation, to recognize the importance of some continuity in the membership of a reconstituted Federal Election Commission and, it is, further

Resolved, that the American Bar Association urge Congress to continue its attempts to fashion a fair and equitable election law consistent with the principles adopted by the American Bar Association at its August, 1975 meeting.

Passed by the ABA House of Delegates, February 17, 1976.

REPORT

After extensive activity in the area of federal election reform in the years since its creation in 1973, the ABA Special Committee on Election Reform has withheld any major effort this year pending the decision of the United States Supreme Court in the case of Buckley v. Valeo. The Buckley case dealt with a very wide range of constitutional issues resulting from enactment of the Federal Election Campaign Act Amendments of 1974 and was before the Court on an expedited appeal.

The Buckley v. Valeo opinion, announced on January 29, 1976, held invalid the procedure for appointment of the Federal Election Commission. However, the opinion recognized the very critical work being done by the Federal Election Commission and allowed it to continue its existence until March 1, during which time Congress could consider possible alternatives for reconstituting the Commission. The necessary action itself is relatively simple, in that the appointments must be made by the President pursuant to Article II, Section 2 of the Constitution of the United States.

In August, 1975, the ABA House of Delegates took a position favoring an independent commission and the following language was included in the statement of principles concerning election reform:

> Federal election laws should be administered by a single, independent agency entrusted with effective enforcement power and the resources to discharge its responsibilities.

The ABA Special Committee on Election Reform recommends that the suggested resolutions be adopted so as to impress upon Congress and the President the importance of not disrupting in mid-campaign the Federal Election Commission machinery and staff. The committee also feels that the independence of the Commission is essential for the integrity of its operation and that this independence be viewed by Congress as primary to any other criteria it may consider in reconstituting the Commission.

Senator SCHWEIKER. Common Cause also indicates their support for this. We have some 15 Senate cosponsors, some 65 House cosponsors—and I think that this is really what we need to do to the problem at hand.

That is all I have, Mr. Chairman.

Senator PELL. Thank you.

Senator MONDALE. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman and members of the committee. I would ask that my full statement appear in the record as though read.

Senator PELL. Without objection, it will be done.

[The written statement of Senator Mondale follows:]

STATEMENT OF HON. WALTER F. MONDALE, U.S. SENATOR FROM THE STATE OF MINNESOTA

Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the opportunity to appear this morning to discuss S. 2911, our bill to reconstitute the Federal Election Commission.

I am pleased to join with Senator Schweiker in sponsoring S. 2911. As you well know, a little over two weeks ago the Supreme Court ruled that the exercise of certain executive functions by the Federal Election Commission, as presently constituted, is unconstitutional.

The Court held that unless the Commission was reconstituted with members appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate it would lose its enforcement and rulemaking authority. S. 2911 seeks to accomplish the clear mandate of that decision and reconstitute a Presidentially appointed independent Federal Election Commission.

Near the end of the Watergate era, a period in which we witnessed the resignation of both the President and his Vice President under a storm of political corruption, the Congress took a historic step in establishing an independent commission to monitor and regulate the infusion of money into the political process. The public outcry was loud and the movement toward political reform had great impetus. We ought not let this noble experiment die just because in the wake of the Supreme Court decision we have no Watergate scandal on the front pages of our newspapers and on our television screens.

Unless the Congress acts immediately to restore the Commission's regulatory authority, the upcoming Presidential primaries will be conducted without answers to at least two critically important questions.

First, "How much money can a candidate accept in contributions from a wealthy wife or husband or a wealthy family member?" The Court held that a wealthy candidate could spend as much of his own money as he chose, but left the question of contributions from family members subject to an uncertain Congressional definition.

Second, "What constitutes an 'independent' expenditures by a wealthy individual or a heavily endowed union or corporate political action committee in behalf of a candidate?" The Court struck down the $1,000 limit on such campaign expenditures, but left the definition of "independent expenditure" to be determined by another agency.

In addition to these two pressing questions, many more critical ones will surely arise as we approach the election. If the Commission's regulatory authority lapses on March 1, no other body is prepared to decide which expenditures are "independent" and which are not, and no other agency is prepared to draft guidelines to check the unlimited flow of money into political campaigns under the guise of independent activity.

Those who feel that the Supreme Court's decision is being violated could always take their case to court, but the primaries would almost certainly be over before a decision could be reached. A ruling by the Justice Department could take less time, but their legal staff does not have the expertise that the FEC's staff has gained over this nine month period.

In addition to interpreting the law, we must have an agency to ensure that our own efforts to achieve reform are being carried out. One of the most pressing reasons for reconstituting the Commission immediately is to ensure that the Presidential candidates are not left without matching funds. These candidates have run their campaigns in good faith and in reliance on the fact that these funds would be available. We must see that they get the funds they are entitled to under the law. It would be tragic not only for them but for the entire political process if Congressional delay in reconstituting the Commission prevents these candidates from receiving the matching funds to which they are entitled and perhaps thereby influence the outcome of the Presidential nominating contests. This is an urgent matter, and therefore I want to stress the need to reconstitute the Commission before the March 1 deadline.

Given the history of weak enforcement of campaign financing laws and the extensive evidence of misuse of law enforcement agencies for political purposes, it is no wonder that the public watches with some skepticism our efforts to reconstitute this Commission.

Even with the most conscientious and well-intentioned Clerk of the House and Secretary of the Senate, the public is certain to question the objectivity and zeal of their enforcement efforts involving persons to whom they owe their jobs. During the Watergate investigation, the public did not begin to have confidence that the whole truth would be unearthed until the authority was shifted from the Justice Department, whose attorney general owed his job to the President, to an independent special prosecutor. The same principle is involved here.

I have been a long-time supporter of public financing of Congressional elections. I have introduced a bill calling for public financing and am hopeful that the Rules Committee will see that this important question is dealt with during this session of Congress, even though it may not become effective until the 1978 elections.

It is my own feeling, however, that the importance of reconstituting the FEC is so great that perhaps this is not the best time to take up public financing as a provision of this legislation. I do hope, however, that there will be an opportunity later this spring to deal with Congressional public financing.

On February 24 the first Presidential primary will be held and on March 16, the first Congressional primary is scheduled. We cannot afford to wait until the extended debate these reforms deserve has run its course. We must have a commission to assist the over 1,000 Federal candidates, their staffs, and the network of volunteers all of whom need the guidance of an independent commission to understand and abide by the mandates of the sweeping and often complex reforms we have written into the campaign law.

The Commission is one of the most important and far-reaching experiments in our political history. Nine months is not an adequate trial period. While the commission is not perfect, it must be given a chance to prove that we can reform our system of campaign financing in a responsible and sensible manner.

Senator MONDALE. I am please to join with Senator Schweiker in sponsoring S. 2911 to amend and extend the FEC. I think there are two or three very crucial reasons why we must immediately amend and extend the Commission.

Mr. Dooley said around the turn of the century that it is not clear that the Constitution follows the flag, but it is clear that the Supreme Court follows the election returns. And that may be true. But I think, as good as that decision was, it is clear that none of them had ever run for public office, because they drew distinctions that may make sense in legal theory but that are just unbelievably difficult to manage and interpret in the real life of American politics. For example, they said that a candidate could spend as much as he had running for office, leaving the question open as to how much a family might contribute. And it is only through the reconstitution of this Commission that we can possibly sort out an area of what could be tremendous abuse and something that could contribute enormously to cynicism in this country.

Second, the Supreme Court said that a wealthy individual or a heavily endowed union or corporate political action committee, if it was called, quote, independent, could spend as much as it pleased on behalf of a candidate. Now, that provision, unless properly policed and interpreted, could go far toward the destruction of the fine work of this committee and the Senate to try to bottle up the compromising and corrupting influence of big money in American politics. And without the immediate re-creation of this Commission to sort out these questions and to interpret them in a way that makes sense, those two exceptions written into the Court could be mischievous to the ultimate degree.

In addition to that, there are over 1,000 candidates running for Congress, probably more committees than that, each with questions that must be answered if this law is going to make sense. And it is only the Commission that can answer those questions.

And for those reasons, I think we must immediately reconstitute the Commission on a constitutional basis.

Finally, it is only the Commission that can distribute matching funds under the public financing provisions of the law. The candidates that are now running for President, without the reconstitution of this Commission, would be left without matching funds. These candidates have run their campaigns in good faith and in reliance that these funds would be made available. And I think it would be tragic if we failed to reconstitute the institution essential to the distribution of those moneys.

Finally, may I say, I think the American people look on all of us in this whole process with a great deal of skepticism. They have seen in recent years example after example of utterly outrageous abuse of money, which compromises and occasionally corrupts the sacred process of freedom in our society.

If we fail to immediately reconstitute this Commission and correct what is really a minor but essential constitutional flaw, I think we will be contributing enormously to this sense of cynicism and despair which is found in too much abundance in American life today.

I join with Senator Schweiker in believing that we should not put the public financing provisions on this particular measure. But if we do, I hope we will proceed on the basis of a matching grant rather than a direct total Treasury contribution, as contemplated by an alternative provision.

Congressman Burton in the House, as I understand, has such a bill introduced—and now there are over 225 cosponsors. Last time when we tried the direct total Treasury contribution to candidates, we met with stonewall opposition from the House—and I would hope for many reasons—first of all, it is more hopeful in the House; second, it is through a match that we can prevent giving massive funds to frivolous candidates; and thirdly, I think people feel a lot better about these public financing provisions if, through a checkoff, and if, through a match, they have something to say about how much money a candidate is going to get.

So that I would hope that we would extend the Commission for the reasons given. I would hope that we would try to find another vehicle for public financing for congressional campaigns that I feel to be crucial, particularly in the light of the Supreme Court decision, which leaves us no other way in which to impose essential ceilings.

But if we do, I hope we do it through some kind of private matching system, rather than a direct total Treasury grant.

Senator SCHWEIKER. Mr. Chairman, I have a written statement from Senator Cranston who is tied up at another meeting, and he would like to include his statement as one of our principal cosponsors.

Senator PELL. Without objection, it will be included in the record.

[The written statement of Senator Cranston follows:]

STATEMENT OF HON. ALAN CRANSTON, A U.S. SENATOR FROM THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA

Mr. Chairman, the 1976 elections were to give us the first opportunity to test the 1974 Federal Elections Campaign Act and the effectiveness of public financing of the Presidential election in combating the insidious influence of big money in our political processes.

Instead, as a result of the Supreme Court's January 30 decision in Buckley v. Valeo, we now face the prospect of uncertainty and chaos in those same elections.

After February 29, the independent agency which was to administer and enforce the 1974 law and its public financing system—the Federal Elections Commission—will cease to exist as an enforcement and rulemaking body unless it can be re-established in accordance with the Appointments Clause of the Constitution. If no action is taken to fill the void, the FEC becomes an informational service at best. Moreover, effective enforcement and rulemaking, as well as administration of the public financing system for the 1976 elections will be nonexistent.

It must be pointed out that the Supreme Court found no problem with the FEC's purpose. Its objection was to the means of choosing the FEC's members.

If we can reconstitute the FEC, by giving the power to appoint the Commissioners to the President with the advice and consent of the Senate, we can insure an orderly federal elections process in 1976 and a fair opportunity to evaluate the public financing system.

For that reason, I urge your favorable consideration of S. 2911, which will reestablish the Federal Elections Commission and which expresses the sense of the Senate that appointments under the new procedure be made as speedily as possible to allow for "the orderly implementation of Federal election campaign laws."

As you well know, I have been a strong supporter of efforts to reform the federal elections process by placing reasonable controls over our elections processes. As a leader of the bipartisan group of Senators who spearheaded the fight for public financing in the 93d Congress, I appeared before this Subcommittee in September 1973 to enumerate certain basic principles we felt must be included in any package of public financing and election reform. Among these basic principles was: "administration of campaign financial reporting and disclosure laws and regulations by an independent elections commission with enforcement powers."

A strong enforcement agency is essential.

However, in all this discussion of the Federal Elections Commission, there is one point that we should not fail to consider: We must not allow the FEC to become a tool for harassment by future imperial Presidents who may seek to repeat the abuses of Watergate. I understand and share the great concern expressed by some of our colleagues that the FEC has such a potential for abuse in our democratic society that the President should not be given power over the Commission. That concern led to Congressional adoption of the present method of selecting Commission members. Perhaps we should consider extending the life of the FEC for only a year and a half so that the Subcommittee, in the non-election year of 1977, will be able to take another look at how the Commission has handled enforcement and whether it should be changed, particularly in the aftermath of its implementation of the law in 1976.

Senator PELL. Senator Griffin?

Senator GRIFFIN. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I must say that I think I generally agree with the approach that you are presenting. One thing that concerns me is whether and when Congress will get around to doing something about the enormous loopholes that have been left by the Supreme Court's decision. I rather agree with this statement in Buckley v. Valeo by Chief Justice Burger. He said:

By dissecting the act bit by bit and casting off vital parts, the Court fails to recognize that the whole of this act is greater than the sum of its parts. Congress intended to regulate all aspects of Federal campaign finances, but what remains after today's holding leaves no more than a shadow of what Congress contemplated. I question whether the residue leaves a workable program.

Certainly the matter of unlimited expenditures by an individual or by special interest groups and associations, as the Senator from Minnesota has pointed out, is or should be a matter of very grave concern.

Even though I voted against public financing before, I am also one of those that thinks that that subject should be reconsidered by the Congress, especially after we have the experience of public financing for Presidential candidates in this election.

I do question at this late stage, in this election year, whether we should attempt to provide for public financing in this election. I think that not only the problem that Senator Cannon has raised confronts us—the fact that some candidates have already raised money—but I think we have to take into account the fact that different States have different primary dates and filing dates.

It seems to me to change the rules at this late stage is of questionable wisdom. One might wonder whether people would have run for the office in this year if they had known there would be public financing. It might be an entirely different situation than it would be if we were to suddenly pass this bill and provide matching public funds.

All of this is leading me to this question: Could your bill carry the additional suggestion or provision of the President that would provide an expiration date following this election which would in effect compel the Congress to take a whole new look at what we have done in light of the Supreme Court's decision?

I don't know whether either of you want to comment on that or not. I think it is an interesting suggestion, one that would more or less force the legislative branch of Government to do what we hope it will do, but which it may not.

Senator MONDALE. Senator Griffin, I introduced a proposal for a commission to study the way in which we nominate the Presidents. It is one of the anomalies of our society that something as crucial as that—how we finance them, how we nominate them, State rules, party rules and the rest—have just grown up without any cohesive overall plan whatsoever. It was one of the great failures of the Founding Fathers to in anyway anticipate that problem. And now we don't have a system—we have 55 different systems.

And I understand the President responded favorably to the general notion of finally taking a fundamental look at that problem. And I think it would make sense to perhaps couple that with a similar thorough review of the whole system by which we nominate and elect other Federal officers, including the public financing provision.

Now, of course, this committee has been the key committee for many, many years, the best students of election problems are to be found right here. Whether that review should be conducted by some outside group or whether the committee would make it part of its ongoing work is really for you to decide.

Senator SCHWEIKER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to respond, too. I agree with Senator Griffin's question that we do need a prod, and I think that one way to handle this could be to take our bill and to put a July 1, 1977, expiration date on it. This would get us through this election, it would get us through the final reporting, which is the first quarter of next year, and would give an administration and a new Congress some 6 months to come up with something. I wouldn't favor a date earlier than that because we would make it hard to deal with the problem in Congress.

Now, second, I would like to respond to the first part of your question, Senator, and that is about the wreckage that the Supreme Court has left us—and I happen to think it is a serious wreckage of this law. I think that to go through this wreckage without an FEC would just be utter chaos—no one will know where to go, no one will know what they are doing, no one will know what is legal—it would be utter chaos.

So that while we have a wreckage, we have a chance to salvage a little bit of that wreckage by reconstituting the FEC. Fortunately, I am not running this year, but I don't know what somebody does as a candidate to determine what he is doing legally, if we don't have something like the FEC. I think that is very important.

Senator GRIFFIN. Thank you very much.

Senator PELL. Senator Clark?

Senator CLARK. Just one question. I appreciate your statement very much. I think we—most all of us at any rate—are in agreement that we need a reconstitution of the Commission.

I would like to ask you about the public financing provision. Both of you in the past, I know, have supported public financing—and I think your statement indicates that you think we ought to turn to that question very soon. But understandably you are reluctant to go ahead with that now, as you say, because you feel it might endanger the reconstitution of the Commission.

But it does seem to me that there is a real hope now, for the first time, that the House of Representatives will pass congressional public financing. Now, you mentioned, I think, Senator Mondale, the fact that the Burton bill now has 240 sponsors.

Supposing that before we act in the Senate, the House adopts the Burton proposal, which, as I understand it, will be attached to a reconstituted Commission. Suppose that bill comes to us with public financing in it and a full power reconstituted Commission.

Would you then support in the Senate public financing?

Senator MONDALE. I would strongly support it. I said in my statement that I think we ought to choose a different vehicle for public financing, but I also said, if there is public financing being proposed, I am going to join the fight for it and I am going to fight for a matching system.

And one of my reasons for doing so is that it is much easier, I believe, to get House support on a matching basis than on a direct Treasury grant of the kind that we adopted last time.

There is not much mystery about public financing any more, there is no need for all kinds of thorough studies. This committee has been dealing with the public financing issue. The chairman of the committee, I think, probably knows more about this issue than any man in America; he has been working with it for at least a decade and perhaps more. We have debated the dollar checkoff at least since the middle sixties. We have had an enormous amount of experience with all of these matters now.

I think if we can do both, that would be a different problem. But above all we have got to get this Commission reconstituted, because if wet let that fail I think the American public will think that we used artifice and tricks to bring that disaster about.

Senator CLARK. And, Senator Schweiker, would you, if the House were to pass public financing—let's say the Burton bill or some other—and came to us before we act, do you feel that you could support public financing and a reconstituted——

Senator SCHWEIKER. Yes, Senator Clark, I would certainly support it very strongly, because my objection is not to the principle, my objection is to the practicality of it. The answer is a strong yes.

I have to say, having served in the House, they used to have a phenomenon they called the disappearing quorum over in the House in the old days—and I sort of suspect that when that FEC vote comes up on public financing, you are going to see the disappearing quorum at work during this election year. I hope I am wrong, but that is the basis for my position now.

Senator CLARK. Thank you.

Senator PELL. Senator Cannon?

Senator CANNON. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I think there is a good possibility, in light of what has transpired, to something happening along the lines that have been suggested here, that the House may well act before we complete our action over here. And if they should act with a public financing provision in the congressional races, then, certainly, in the light of the action the Senate took before, we would have no problem getting it in.

I think, Senator Mondale, I am inclined to agree with you. I think that the general elections perhaps should also be on the matching fund basis, rather than just the primary—although I recognize the rationale for it, that the primary is where one would demonstrate adequate support to come under a matching provision in the event there were a lot of candidates in.

But I think a limit on the amount of the matching provision, such as $100 or less, to me would give it more appeal from the matching standpoint in the general elections than just this right-out grant—and as well I keep in the back of my mind the question I asked Senators Kennedy and Scott, if there is a possibility that there may not be adequate funds if this were to take effect this year, adequate funds to finance both the Presidential races and the congressional races—I would certainly prefer to see the Presidential races taken care of in light of the fact that we have gotten a start down that road.

Senator MONDALE. Senator Griffin mentioned the possibility of maybe beginning the public financing of congressional races in the next election. I think that might be a good compromise.

But if we have a chance to act this year, I very much hope we do. And the reason I come down so strongly on the matching principle—and I am glad to hear you support that—is that I think there is something very powerful to the psychology of the American public continuing to have something to say about how much money a candidate gets and of forcing a candidate to go around and plead for funds; as long as you keep the amount that any person can contribute to an amount that couldn't possibly corrupt a candidate, all you are doing is forcing him to go around and get a lot of support, as a condition for getting public support.

And I think the public senses that and feels very strongly about it. I think the key to the success of public financing is to be found to a great extent in the checkoff in the tax returns; the public likes the notion that they have something to say about how much money would be set aside and that they can exercise that option on an ongoing basis. If you just take it out of the Treasury as a direct grant, not only do you increase opposition in the House, but you also, I think, undermine that sense of public control that is so important.

Senator SCHWEIKER. I want to say that I concur with Senator Mondale on that. I think, if we go the route of public financing and had complete Treasury financing, we would really take the sense of participation out of the whole American system. And if there is one key principle that I think that has made our country strong, it is that participatory role.

And I think it is important to keep participation in the system somehow, somewhere. I think that is a very valid point and I really strongly support that point.

Senator CANNON. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator PELL. Thank you, Senator Cannon. Incidentally, I notice that on November 16, 1973, I introduced a bill, S. 2718, that was exactly like yours with the matching provisions in it up to $100, but it was lost—those provisions were lost somewhere on its way to passage.

So I support this concept.

Senator GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, if I might put in the record the last dates for filing and the date of primary elections, State by State for congressional elections for this year—I think it might be of some interest in terms of the practicality of passing a public financing bill for this year. I do have it for 1974—what I will put in will be for 1976.

[1] Last day for filing declarations or petitions of candidacy (dates may vary due to statutory changes).
[3] Filing deadline is 2 weeks after State conventions close; convention closing dates are unknown at the time of publication.

Senator GRIFFIN. I might just point out that in 1974—and I assume it would be the same—the filing date in North Carolina was February 25, the filing date in Ohio was February 6 and in a number of States it is March. Of course, it seems to me it would be very difficult to——

Senator SCHWEIKER. If the Senator would yield, the Pennsylvania deadline was yesterday. We closed out our filing for all offices.

Senator CANNON. If the Senator would yield, I think one of the first primaries is in early March, the primary itself.

Senator CLARK. Would the Senator yield for a question, I am not sure that I understand the significance of that point. The bill that Senator Kennedy and I and Senator Scott have offered would in no way apply to primary elections. It would only apply to the general election.

Senator GRIFFIN. But some of the bills would apply on a national basis to primaries——

Senator SCHWEIKER. If I might respond, I think a lawsuit could be filed on the basis that they didn't know the ground rules when the things were started. They didn't know that they were going to have public financing, so their rights were violated because they didn't have the same opportunity that now all of a sudden the others are given.

And I think someone who didn't file could ask——

Senator CLARK. You mean in the general election?

Senator SCHWEIKER. Yes, on the basis that he was not aware he could participate on the same basis others now can who will get an after-the-fact award. I think that would be grounds for some kind of a suit right there.

Senator PELL. Thank you very much indeed, Senators.

And our next witness will be Senator Buckley on S. 2980, the bill that is introduced in the House by Representative Steiger.

Senator Buckley?

STATEMENT OF HON. JAMES L. BUCKLEY, A U.S. SENATOR FROM THE STATE OF NEW YORK

Senator BUCKLEY. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I welcome the opportunity to discuss my bill, which was introduced yesterday. It is now 2½ weeks since the Supreme Court handed down its decision, and since then a number of bills have been introduced more or less as emergency measures that are intended to deal with only the most obvious of the gaps left by the decision.

None of these measures, I submit, addresses the full range of problems created by the Supreme Court decision, especially in congressional races.

We need to do substantially more than simply reconstitute the Federal Election Commission so that public subsidies may continue to flow to Presidential candidates. The Supreme Court's elimination of limits on individual spending has accentuated the inequities already ingrained in the Federal Election Campaign Act. They, too, must be addressed on an urgent basis.

Finally, there is broad agreement, based on actual experience with the act, that a number of its provisions are unwieldly and unduly burdensome. These can easily be corrected at this time if only we will take the trouble to do so.

Yesterday, Congressman William Steiger of Wisconsin and I introduced in our respective Houses a bill that will restructure the Federal Election Commission along constitutional lines, reallocate its responsibiiities in a more efficient manner, adjust some of the major inequities in the law as it has survived the Court's decision, and make certain modifications that we believe will simplify the administration of the Federal Election Campaign Act, as amended. In preparing our bill, we have consulted with our coplaintiffs in Buckley v. Valeo. Our bill represents a consensus that cuts across partisan and ideological lines. It is the only bill before this committee that attempts to address all the major problems that have been precipitated by the Supreme Court's decision.

Our bill does not seek to change features of the act, such as the public financing of Presidential campaigns, which the plaintiff's in Buckley v. Valeo found objectionable, but which the Supreme Court left standing. Rather, we seek only to make those corrections in the law that are urgently required as a result of the Supreme Court's decision, while correcting some of the widely noted defects in the law that have become apparent since its enactment.

Specifically, our bill is addressed to the following deficiencies:

1. THE INEQUITIES AMONG CANDIDATES

The Supreme Court's rejection of limitations on expenditures by candidates and independent individuals and groups has dramatically magnified the inequities that exist under the law between different classes of candidates. On the one hand, wealthy candidates or candidates having the support of well-organized, well-financed political action groups, such as the AFL–CIO's Committee on Political Education, can now spend unlimited sums in the promotion of their candidacies. On the other hand, candidates without private means or without the support of such groups are limited to contributions that may not exceed $1,000 from individuals or $5,000 from political action committees. In practice, this has provided enormous handicaps in raising the kind of seed money that is especially important in launching the campaign of a candidate who is relatively unknown.

Our bill will help redress this imbalance by raising the limitations on individual and committee contributions to the following levels: $50,000 in the case of a Presidential candidate, $25,000 in the case of senatorial candidates, and $10,000 in the case of a candidate for the House of Representatives. These limitations are high enough to enable middle- and lower-income candidates to raise the money necessary to launch successful campaigns. Any possibility of abuse will, in our opinion, be checked by the effective enforcement of the disclosure provisions.

I would at this time point out that unless we substantially raise the limits on individual contributions, candidates for Congress running this year will face the danger of losing substantial control over their own campaigns. The $1,000 and $5,000 contribution limitations will no longer keep individuals on political committees from spending as much as they want on behalf of candidates they want to support. It will merely prevent them from coordinating their expenditures with the candidate's campaign. In other words, each one of us running for office this year could see chaos in their promotion of a single cause.

2. THE FEDERAL ELECTION COMMISSION

Aside from the fact that the Supreme Court has found the method of appointing the Federal Election Commission to be unconstitutional, the Commission in practice has been found to reflect all the deficiencies that are to be found in too many other agencies that are clothed with very broad rulemaking and enforcement responsibilities. Arbitrary and at times capricious requirements impose excessive legal and bookkeeping costs on candidates without serving any apparent public service. We have also vested in the Commission extraordinarily broad powers over a most sensitive area of national life.

I suppose there is some sort of poetic justice in having Members of the Congress finally made subject to the kind of bureaucratic harassment and regulatory uncertainties and costs to which the Congress routinely has subjected so many others in American society.

Nevertheless, our bill seeks to remedy this situation by allowing the functions currently delegated to the FEC to be reallocated between a reconstituted commission and a new election law section to be established in the Department of Justice. Our bill would vest the enforcement powers for the Federal election laws not with an independent election czar, but with appointive officials within the traditional enforcement arm of the Federal Government. The election law section would be headed by a Director and Deputy Director of different political parties who would be appointed by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate. They would serve for 4-year terms and could be removed only for cause. We believe, in short, that this mechanism would insulate this section from political direction by an incumbent President.

This arrangement would leave audit, review, and certification responsibilities with the new Federal Election Commission while assigning the functions of enforcement, the issuance of advisory opinions, and the conduct of civil and criminal litigation to the new election law section of the Justice Department. This is the more normal arrangement, and we believe it represents better policy.

3. RECORDKEEPING AND DISCLOSURE

The current disclosure and bookkeeping provisions of the Federal Election Campaign Act impose costs that cannot be justified by any consideration of public policy. I speak of the current requirements that a record be kept of each contributor giving over $10 and that disclosure be made of each contribution in excess of $100.

With respect to the recordkeeping provisions, it is simply irrational to suppose that any candidate for national office will be influenced by a $100 contribution, let alone an $11 contribution. The only possible effect of the current provision is to discourage contributions by individuals reluctant to be identified with minor parties or unpopular causes. It does not in any way affect the problem of corruption in public office. Our bill would substantially lighten the current recordkeeping burden by limiting such records to contributions in excess of $100.

It is just as irrational to assume that candidates for national office could be bribed by the $101 contributions that must now be reported. The amount of money required to have a corruptive influence on a candidate for political office depends on the relative size of the contribution to the overall financial requirements of the campaign. In order to ameliorate the effect of disclosure provisions on public participation in a campaign, our bill would adopt various disclosure thresholds which would be calibrated to the office sought. Specifically, we would establish those thresholds at $1,000 in the case of a candidate for the Presidency, $500 in the case of a candidate for the Senate, and $250 in the case of a candidate for the House of Representatives. And I hope that no one suggests that any of us could be bought for lower sums.

4. MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS

The present rules appear unduly restrictive with respect to contributions to and from political parties and committees. There is also a great deal of uncertainty as to what constitutes a contribution to a particular candidate. Our bill incorporates language which will (a) remove some of the arbitrary restrictions that have been placed on the traditional role of parties and committees, thereby broadening the diversity of groups that can have an input on the electoral process, and (b) provide for necessary statutory guidelines for determining what constitutes a contribution. This will serve to remove many of the uncertainties that now exist in the law, and will facilitate the conduct of campaigns as well as the work of the election law section that would be charged under our bill with the enforcement of Federal election laws.

As I stated at the outset, the Supreme Court's decision in Buckley v. Valeo requires corrective action that is significantly broader in scope than the reconstitution of the Federal Election Commission. Inequities have been magnified which the Congress must address if we are not to establish two classes of candidates facing vastly different problems in financing and launching their political campaigns. Furthermore, the fact that some legislative action is necessary at this time provides us with a unique opportunity to correct the deficiencies that have been widely noted, deficiencies which add materially to the cost and complexity of political campaigns without serving any identifiable public purpose.

The American people have a right to expect that we will utilize this opportunity to effect something more than incremental changes intended to preserve the status quo. They have a right to expect their representatives in Congress to enact real election reform that will remove provisions whose net effect is to protect the wealthy or special-interest candidate from successful challenge, to say nothing of incumbent Members of Congress.

I thank you, Mr. Chairman. There has been distributed a synopsis of the legislation we introduced yesterday. And I would be happy to answer any questions you may have.

Senator PELL. Thank you, Senator Buckley. It is particularly appropriate that you are presenting your legislation, that you are here, since it was your suit that precipitated the Supreme Court decision.

Senator BUCKLEY. I like to think it was the first amendment that precipitated that.

Senator PELL. I have no questions.

Senator Griffin?

Senator GRIFFIN. Senator Buckley, I think your point about the effect of that part of the Supreme Court's decision which lifts and leaves without limit expenditures by an individual or a special-interest group takes away from the candidate effective control of his campaign is a very significant point, one that needs a lot of thought and study by this Congress.

As I was reading over your statement, you talk about another group that might support a candidate. I can also conceive of a special-interest group that might not support a candidate but spend all of its time and unlimited resources opposing the other candidate.

Wouldn't that be a very nice situation for the fellow who happened to be the beneficiary of that? He wouldn't have to say anything against his opponent at all perhaps—that would all be done for him, with unlimited resources, by a group that just wants to spend all of its time attacking the other party in the race.

Senator BUCKLEY. Well, this is exactly what can happen. And, as a matter of fact, I was elected in a three-cornered race and there were some people who spread all kinds of full-page ads around New York saying don't vote for Buckley and didn't express any other preference.

But this is precisely the sort of thing that we are now going to see forced by having unlimited expenditures declared constitutional by the Supreme Court while suppressing the ability of individuals, who would probably much rather send their $10,000 or $15,000 into the campaign headquarters.

Senator GRIFFIN. Thank you for the statement.

Senator PELL. Senator Clark?

Senator CLARK. Senator Buckley, just a couple of questions.

As I understand your first proposal, it would really allow what I would consider at any rate rather massive increases in the contribution limits for both individuals and groups. For example, you would raise the contribution limit for the Senate races to $25,000.

Don't you think that in fact a Senator might be very much inclined to treat constituents who give $25,000 somewhat differently than those who give a dollar, or who give nothing?

I guess what I am saying is, aren't we in a sense opening the way for the kind of influence peddling that the law was really intended to prevent?

Senator BUCKLEY. I don't think so. No. 1, I think that full disclosure is the appropriate protection—let people draw their own conclusions. No. 2, in my experience, on the basis of one campaign, I get more pressure and so forth from people who gave $5 than anyone who gave more than $5,000. I really haven't seen it.

No. 3, I would point out——

Senator CLARK. I wasn't thinking so much of the pressure on you as rather the way in which the Senator himself or herself looks upon that problem.

Senator BUCKLEY. My belief, Senator Clark, is that the corruption in this body comes not from people who have given money but from people who say we represent a bloc of 10,000 voters on this issue or another. I think you and I have seen more votes in the Senate warped by that than the fact that somebody may have given $5,000 in a past campaign.

Senator CLARK. Why have a $25,000 limit, then? Why have any?

Senator BUCKLEY. The submission we have put in represents a consensus among the plaintiffs who have different points of view. I personally would just as soon see the lid taken off, because I do believe the disclosure is the thing that alerts the public and arms the opposition.

Senator CLARK. Well, I share the view that that is the most important single factor.

Senator BUCKLEY. But I would also like to pursue one step further the suggestion that this is the only way we avoid the abuses advertised in Watergate. I think it is a curious fact, and not generally cited, that most of the members of the Watergate Committee voted against the legislation we are talking about. They didn't think it was responsive to what they saw to be the problems.

Senator CLARK. Well, let me pursue this $25,000 contribution further. You say on the top of page 9, and I think quite accurately: "The amount of money required to have a corruptive influence on a candidate for political office depends on the relative size of the contribution to the overall financial requirements of the campaign."

Now, again, I don't like to use personal examples, but in a matter of this kind you are reluctant to use someone else's campaign. In my own case, I think I spent $250,000. Now, one contribution of $25,000 would be one-tenth of the entire campaign expenditure. Or, to put it in another way, 10 people could have financed my entire campaign under the limitations that you are suggesting.

That seems to me to be pretty excessive in terms of the possibility of opening it up to real influence.

What is your response to that?

Senator BUCKLEY. I really don't think that people are subject to that kind of influence. Maybe I am naive, maybe I am thinking of my own experience—and also, I must confess, I am talking in the perspective of a $2 million campaign rather than a $250,000 campaign.

Certainly, $25,000 in the case of one of the larger populated States would not—in the case of yours, maybe it should be a percentage of the thing. But here is the problem that I see—and I felt it very strongly. I could not have launched my campaign without having received a $50,000 loan. I will say that quite simply—and the guy has never asked anything from me since then. I needed seed money. I couldn't open an office until I put down $15,000. I couldn't get the telephone company to even look in and decide how to fit the switchboard unless I put another $15,000 down. Especially if you are a political unknown, you need what is known as seed money to establish some kind of plausibility.

We have the fact that Julian Bond ought to be a Presidential candidate today. He is not a Presidential candidate for the simple reason that he could not accept money that would have been tendered to him in amounts more than $1,000.

Senator CLARK. Well, I think what you are saying points up the great differences within the country. I think it is true that I never had a contribution in excess of $3,000 and had little trouble getting started, even though being totally unknown.

But I think it is true that passing a law that fairly applies to every State in the Union and every congressional district is complicated.

Well, last—or second, I think I have three questions—another of your recommendations is to return the enforcement of the campaign law to the Justice Department, at least as I read your testimony.

Now, for more than 40 years, the Department, I think, failed miserably to enforce the old Corrupt Practices Act. And my question is, what makes you think that the Justice Department would do any better this time around?

Doesn't your proposal really return to the old system that didn't work effectively?

Senator BUCKLEY. I don't think so. First of all, I think that one of the principal problems under the old system was that this sort of case got to the bottom of the pile. We would constitute a body that had no other responsibility but to monitor, give the advisory opinions and prosecute.

No. 2, the Director and Deputy Director would not be serving at the pleasure of a President.

No. 3, there would be supervision by a politically independent director and deputy director, and those two people couldn't be from the same party.

No. 4, the Election Commission would have the authority under our bill to finger areas that they think required investigation.

In other words, there is plenty of opportunity to place the heat on the election body to see that it does its job.

But I do believe that the better practice, the more prudent practice, is to have the law enforcement agency of the Government do the enforcement of the laws.

Senator CLARK. But it is going to be exclusively under the control of the Attorney General and the administration in power.

Senator BUCKLEY. I don't believe that would be the case with two independent people of two different parties.

Senator CLARK. Well, lastly, your proposal, as I understood your testimony, sets a $500 limit on disclosure of campaign contributions in Senate elections. I agree with your first statement, at least in part, that the most important single factor in election reform is disclosure—I think that is even more important than contribution limitations, in my judgment. I believe strongly in limitations, but disclosure is the most important.

Why have such a high figure? Don't you think in fact that the public would have a very strong interest—and a right—in knowing whether, let us say, a Senate candidate received contributions from, let's say, 50 oil company executives of $450 each? Wouldn't that be an easy way to hide enormous contributions, by simply having a great number of different executives contribute slightly less than $500?

Senator BUCKLEY. Well, perhaps again it is the scale of looking at a $2 million campaign versus another. These contributions simply are not that significant. The paperwork is very significant. I thing you are going to find out, if you are talking about an industry slant or something of this sort, you have your political action committees of various industries that we will quickly identify. And also, incidentally, I happen to be among those who believe that money is given, whether it be by AFL–CIO or milk prodcers or oil executives, to candidates whom they believe to share the same points of view on public policy. So that it frankly does not disturb me that a particular Senator might receive large numbers of contributions from wheat farmers. This does not indicate a corruptive influence but, rather, reflects a confluence of points of view.

Senator CLARK. I share that view, but I think what I am really saying is that if disclosure is the key to cleaning up election problems, then why not have a little more of it? Why not put it down at least to a $100 contribution so you avoid this kind of——

Senator BUCKLEY. Well, two things. First of all, what purpose is being served, public curiosity, or are we talking about thresholds that could raise questions as to corruption? When you started talking about that $500 figure, I thought probably you were going to suggest it was much too low.

But, then, on the other side of the case, you have two considerations. No. 1, sheer paperwork and cost. I am bumping into this thing right now—the mechanical difficulties.

No. 2, there is a chilling factor, there is a chill factor in terms of contributions. There are unpopular causes. There are people who work at the Chase Manhattan Bank that may want to support the Socialist Marxist party that wants to nationalize Chase Manhattan Bank. If you have too small a threshold, you are just going to drive these people out of the political process.

Senator CLARK. Well, again, let me stop, but maybe it is a difference in size. In 1972, prior to the disclosure law, I remember filing every contribution of a dollar or more—and I had one person do it—and I just did not find it to be that kind of burden.

But, again, maybe it is a different size——

Senator BUCKLEY. It has been multiplied now. I was filing, I think, $10 or more under New York State law, but now you have to keep all kinds of different books and cross checks—and you have to find out whether that guy who gave in August had given back in April, this sort of thing.

Senator CLARK. Thank you very much.

Senator PELL. Senator Cannon?

Senator CANNON. I must say, Senator Buckley, that I agree with Senator Clark on his approach to the limitation on the senatorial candidates, or congressional candidates. I think—under the old law, the limit there was $5,000, although you could give to more than one committee. But this was the law when we determined that we needed to do something about it, to reduce the effect of big money. And therefore I think the limitation we have in there for the congressional races is much more realistic than what you suggested. However, in the Presidential race, I am curious as to why you would want to raise the limit there when the Presidential candidates are all under the public financing provision—and apparently no one has had any trouble qualifying under that provision.

So what is the purpose of going to a $50,000 limit on a contribution to a Presidential campaign?

Senator BUCKLEY. You are thinking, Senator, I think, almost exclusively in terms of Republicans and Democrats—and probably people who are pretty well known to start with. Julian Bond said he withdrew for the simple reason he couldn't raise the necessary money to get himself started. Senator Eugene McCarthy is a candidate for the President of the United States.

There are enormous institutional difficulties of getting mobilized. I believe that Senator McGovern would not have been his party's candidate for the Presidency if a few people didn't have confidence in him early and didn't give him a start.

Senator CANNON. I see. You are really talking about the seed-money problem——

Senator BUCKLEY. Exactly.

Senator CANNON. Where the Presidential candidate sends out a mailer that may cost him $50,000 to mail, and he has to go out and solicit funds with a $1,000 limit on it first, and that may create a problem.

Senator BUCKLEY. And I think the thrust of what I was trying to say earlier—and I think what this dramatizes, Senator Cannon—is that whether you like it or not, the Supreme Court has lifted the lid on individual spending by a wealthy candidate or groups interested in that candidate. This exaggerates the difficulties faced by someone without wealth or who doesn't represent such a constituency. Something has got to be done in simple justice to establish equity that will facilitate an unknown raising money.

Senator CANNON. You don't have any provision in here for financing congressional races.

Senator BUCKLEY. No, I don't.

Senator CANNON. Do you support that kind of approach? What are your views on it?

Senator BUCKLEY. I do not support it. I was interested that Senator Schweiker was saying that we want to encourage participation in the political process and that, therefore, we ought to have matching funds. Well, if that is good, why not go all the way and let part of the test of the viability of a candidate be his ability to go out and establish a sufficient interest to get support.

One of the things we need to fear, if we institute public financing, especially across the board, is you will encourage an awful lot of bland candidates. You have got to say what you believe in order to establish a reason, especially if you are an unknown, to establish a reason for somebody to support you, to have confidence in you.

There is also the fact that any system of public financing is inherently discriminatory when you get into the third-party area. I hope, incidentally, that you will ask Dr. Ralph Winter for some observations this afternoon. He has been a student of that and an effective one.

I might also like to suggest to this committee that the Supreme Court has not necessarily endorsed and found constitutional the provision for public support. I believe if you read the decision carefully you will find the suggestion an invitation for people to come back later with a factual story to tell that could demonstrate whether or not this has created unfair obstacles to a third-party candidate.

Another thing you might observe is that the Supreme Court decision dealt only with fifth amendment arguments and did not—somehow ignored or did not cope—with first amendment arguments against public financing.

And, finally, lest one go overboard, in effect utilizing public subsidies to bribe Members of the Congress to forfeit their constitutional rights of expression, as defined by the Supreme Court—one thing that the Supreme Court failed to remind itself of is a series of decisions that declared that any such attempt to bribe an individual into forfeiting constitutional rights is in itself unconstitutional. And I would cite the cases in which the Supreme Court has disallowed residency requirements——

Senator CANNON. Say that last one again there, I missed it.

Senator BUCKLEY. The Supreme Court has said in effect that it is unconstitutional to bribe somebody to forego a constitutional right.

And this doctrine was enunciated in, among other cases, the cases that threw out residency requirements for the granting of welfare.

Senator CANNON. There is one suggestion you made here I must say that I completely agree with you on, and that is where you say with respect to the recordkeeping provisions—it is certainly onerous to require that a record of a contributor giving over $10 must be maintained, even though the disclosure figure doesn't apply till you get to the $100 threshold. And I see absolutely no useful purpose, unless, as you suggest, to satisfy somebody's curiosity, as to why you have a recordkeeping provision for persons that contribute $10. Many people, through the mailer approach, send in a $10, $15, or $25 contribution—and the recordkeeping part of that alone is just horrendous when it comes to keeping those records on hand for absolutely no useful purpose.

The purpose, it seems to me, comes about in the disclosure provision, which applies at the $100 and above level. And while you suggest a higher one there, I think the figure that we have fixed for disclosure there is good, but I would certainly support a move to change that recordkeeping provision of the interim amounts of money from $10 up to the $100 level.

Senator BUCKLEY. Thank you.

Senator CANNON. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

Senator PELL. Thank you very much. I agree with Senator Cannon on that point about the recordkeeping, too. Also in connection with your thought that disclosure is the most important element here, we all are in agreement. The sad thought is we never gave just disclosure a full cycle to work because it was on April 7, 1972, that disclosure came into being, and before that there was not disclosure. So we have never had an election yet where you have had just disclosure to see what sort of break that is.

But obviously if 10 percent of your money comes from the Mafia, that will not be looked at kindly by your constituents.

Thank you.

Senator BUCKLEY. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator PELL. Our next witness is Mr. Antonin Scalia, Assistant Attorney General from the Office of Legal Counsel, Department of Justice.

In view of the time factors, I would hope that whatever portion of your testimony you would care to have inserted in the record, you would.

STATEMENT OF ANTONIN SCALIA, ASSISTANT ATTORNEY GENERAL, OFFICE OF LEGAL COUNSEL, DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, ACCOMPANIED BY JACK GOLDKLANG AND ROBERT HICKEY

Mr. SCALIA. Yes, sir, Mr. Chairman, I would ask that the entire testimony be printed, and I will try to skip over those portions that you have already been told about.

Senator PELL. Thank you very much. It will be inserted in the record.

COMMITTEE ON RULES AND ADMINISTRATION

UNITED STATES SENATE

CONCERNING

LEGISLATION TO AMEND THE FEDERAL ELECTION CAMPAIGN ACT OF 1971 AS AMENDED, 1974

February 18, 1976

Mr. Chairman and Members of the Subcommittee:

On January 30, 1976 the decision of the Supreme Court in Buckley v. Valeo, No. 75-436, cut a gaping hole in the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971 -- or, to be more faithful to the constitutional theory of what occurred, the decision found that a gaping hole already existed. The damage was so substantial that the Chief Justice, in his dissenting opinion, expressed the view that the entire Act should have been stricken down since, as altered by the Court's decision, it is "unworkable and inequitable." (Slip Opinion, Dissent, p. 18)/* In the aftermath of the Valeo case there are two sets of decisions which must be taken by the Congress, one of which is extraordinarily difficult, and the other extraordinarily urgent. The extraordinarily difficult question can be taken verbatim from Chief Justice Burger's dissent: "when central segments, key operative provisions, of this Act, are stricken, can what remains function in anything like the way Congress intended?" (Dissent, pp. 20-21) The Congress will obviously have to address this issue eventually, to determine whether the elimination of certain features that were the quids or quos in a long debated and carefully crafted legislative package, leaves a residue which is still an approximation of legislative will. I have no reason to believe -- and indeed, the press reports since the Valeo decision lead me to doubt -- that that process of reconsideration will be any less difficult or protracted than that which produced the 1974 Amendments.

There is, however, a second issue which must be resolved. It can, I think, be separated from the first, if not by logic, then at least by the genius for compromise and practicality which is the hallmark and the prerequisite of our democratic system. And approached with good will and with overriding concern for the national interest by all sides, it need not be as difficult an issue. I refer to the immediate, pressing necessity of making such minimal adjustments as are absolutely essential to prevent the enactment and subsequent partial invalidation of the 1974 Amendments from seriously distorting the 1976 election campaigns. Those campaigns are now well under way; they have at all levels -- but especially at the Presidential level -- been planned and conducted on the basis of certain assumptions which, unless the Constitution requires, it would be a public disservice to upset.

It is essentially the second of these issues which I wish to discuss today, in the context of the Administration bill, S.2987, designed to meet our immediate problems. I will also discuss, as you have requested, three other bills, S.2911, S.2912 and S.2918, which in my view -- though I hesitate to speak for their sponsors -- likewise offer no complete solution for the problems generated by the Valeo case but seek to minimize to the extent possible the distortion of the present election campaign.

Let me begin with a brief analysis of the principal effects of the Valeo decision. These may be divided into two categories, which roughly though perhaps not precisely parallel the two basic issues for your decision which I have discussed above. First, there are its effects upon what might be termed the substantive provisions of the election law. A large gap has been created in that portion of the law which previously limited campaign expenditures, both by candidates and by persons acting independently of candidates. 18 U.S.C. 608. That limitation has been held invalid except as applied to candidates who voluntarily accept Federal funding -- at the present time, only Presidential candidates. 26 U.S.C. 9004. Since there is no Federal funding for House and Senate races, no expenditure limitations are applicable to any candidates there; nor, even in the Presidential campaigns, is there any limitation upon expenditures that are not "controlled by or coordinated with the candidate and his campaign." (pp. 40-41)

The Court upheld limitations upon contributions to candidates, even those candidates who have not accepted Federal funding. Moreover, it made clear that "expenditures controlled by or coordinated with the candidate and his campaign" can be treated as contributions (pp. 40-41) though expenditures "made totally independently of the candidate and his campaign" cannot be restricted (pp. 41 ff).

The disclosure provisions of the law were upheld, with respect to all types of contributions and expenditures (pp. 69 ff).

Even in the brief time since the Valeo decision, much has been said and written concerning the likely effects of these substantive changes. By limiting contributions but not limiting expenditures on the part of candidates who have received no Federal funding, the post-Valeo law undoubtedly increases the importance of the candidate's personal wealth. By drawing a crucial line between expenditures "controlled by or coordinated with the candidate" (which can be limited) and those which are "independent"

These results may or may not be desirable; they may or may not be as severe as some predict. We will presumably know more about that after the present election campaign is completed. The point is, however, that they render a reconsideration of the Court-modified election laws essential. The total system which now exists is one which, in substantial and important respects, has been designed by no Congress and approved by no President. One of the purposes of the President's legislative proposal is to assure, insofar as possible, this needed reconsideration at a time when it can intelligently and dispassionately occur.

Turning now to the second category of effects of the Valeo decision, its effects upon the administration of the Federal Election Campaign Act: The clear holding of the Supreme Court was that the Federal Election Commission's composition violates the Appointments Clause of the Constitution as to all but its investigatory and informative powers (p. 131). As you know, a majority of its members were appointed by congressional officers. 2 U.S.C. 437c. As long as the Commissioners are not appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate, or by the President alone, in accordance with Article II, § 2, clause 2, the Commission cannot perform executive, i.e., enforcement functions. These include primary responsibility for bringing civil actions against violators, for making rules to carry out the Act, for making administrative determinations and for issuing advisory opinions (p. 131). The Court mitigated the effects of its opinion by staying its judgment "for a period not to exceed 30 days * * * insofar as it affects the authority of the Commission to exercise the duties and powers granted it under the Act" (pp. 136-37). The stay seems to mean that until 30 days from January 30, 1976, the Commission may continue to exercise all of the powers given to it by statute with respect to the substantive provisions which have been upheld, including the public financing of Federal elections (pp. 136-37). We understand from press accounts that this is in fact how the Commission has proceeded.

Beyond the 30-day period the legal situation, if Congress does not act, becomes more complicated. One safe statement is that there will be plenty of work for lawyers trying to figure out the application of Valeo to concrete situations. I will try to review some of the problem areas with you. First of all, to borrow from Mark Twain, the reports of the Commission's total demise are somewhat exaggerated. The Court said that the Commission could unquestionably continue to exercise those powers which are "essentially of an investigative and informative nature, falling in the same general category as those powers which Congress might delegate to one of its own committees" (p. 131). These powers were also described as "functions relating to the flow of necessary information -- receipt, dissemination, and investigation" (p. 131).

As to those substantive provisions of the Act which, as I have indicated above, are not invalidated by the Valeo decision, we are left in the following enforcement position. (Bear in mind that I am not trying to cover every contingency but am only sketching the general outlines that must be considered.) It is clear that the criminal provisions of the Act can still be enforced. Title 18 of the United States Code includes a number of criminal provisions of the election law which are under the jurisdiction of the Fraud Section of the Criminal Division of the Department of Justice. Section 608, dealing with limitations on contributions and expenditures has, as mentioned, been truncated by the Court's decision; but the remainder of Section 608 and other provisions over which the Commission has had concurrent enforcement jurisdiction are left unaffected. These include Sections 610, 611, and 613-617 of Title 18 which deal with contributions by banks, corporations, labor unions, government contractors and foreign nationals, anonymous contributions, cash contributions and similar matters. Complaints can be filed directly with the Department of Justice or with the Commission. As the law stands now, if the Commission receives a complaint or has information concerning an apparent criminal violation it can report the matter to the Attorney General. 2 U.S.C. 437g(a)(2) and (a)(6). This collection and referral of information seems to be covered by the Supreme Court's permission for the Commission to engage in "functions relating to the flow of necessary information" (p. 131). To use another standard suggested by the Court, it is the kind of function that might be performed by a committee of the Congress (p. 131).

The Commission can, however, no longer bring civil actions to enforce the campaign financing restrictions.

The law had previously vested in the Commission "primary jurisdiction with respect to the civil enforcement" of the election laws, 2 U.S.C. 437c(b) and 437g(a)(5), including the power to obtain injunctive relief in certain circumstances, 26 U.S.C. 9011(b)(1) and 9040(c), and to sue for return of overpayments made by the Secretary of the Treasury, 26 U.S.C. 9010(b), 9040(b). As the Court read the applicable provisions, none of these powers required the concurrence or participation of the Attorney General (p. 105); they were all held unconstitutional.

If Congress does not act, we will be faced with the question whether the Attorney General can, without further legislation, assume the civil enforcement responsibilities which the Commission has been compelled to abandon. The law contains a provision whereby the Attorney General as well as the Commission can institute civil actions with respect to certain provisions -- but he cannot do so entirely on his own. The law states (2 U.S.C. 437g(a)(7)):

> "Whenever in the judgment of the Commission, after affording due notice and an opportunity for a hearing, any person has engaged or is about to engage in any acts or practices which constitute or will constitute a violation of any provisions of this Act or of Section 608, 610, 611, 613, 614, 615, 616, or 617 of Title 18, United States Code, upon request by the Commission the Attorney General on behalf of the United States shall institute a civil action for relief * * *."

The judgment required by the Commission -- to refer a matter to the Attorney General after notice and hearing -- would seem to involve the kind of administrative determination and hearing necessary to ensure compliance with the statute that the Court said the Commission could not perform (p. 131). To be sure, congressional committees can hold investigative hearings and refer violations, if they suspect them, to the Justice Department; but such referral is not, as this provision seeks to make it, a precondition to the Executive's enforcement of the law. We must conclude that the provision for Attorney General enforcement only upon Commission referral is invalid. This leaves open the question whether -- the referral provision having been stricken -- the remainder of the provision, giving the Attorney General enforcement authority, subsists. This is, in lawyer's terms, an issue of the "severability" of the invalidated provisions, a field of inquiry in which it is fair to say there are no clear answers. The most we can say is that if the Congress does not act, the Department of Justice will seek to use the enforcement mechanisms of 2 U.S.C. 437 g(a)(7) without prerequisite Commission referral. Whether such authority will be upheld is uncertain. I may note, moreover, that this device, even if successful, would not apply to enforcement of Title 26 and the campaign financing features of the law.

It may be, however, that the Attorney General has independent, non-statutory, authority to bring civil actions. There is a line of cases holding that the Attorney General may sue without specific statutory authorization if the United States has an interest to protect or defend. E.g., Wyandotte v. United States, 389 U.S. 191, 201-202 (1967). See 28 U.S.C. 516-519. These cases deal with laws in which the Congress has been silent on the right to sue; it is not clear that they would be applicable where, as here, the power was vested elsewhere and held unconstitutional. Thus, the entire problem of civil suits after Valeo remains unclear.

Other issues involve certification of expenses, rulemaking and advisory opinions. Under Title 26 of the United States Code, the Commission was charged with the duty to receive and pass upon requests by eligible candidates for campaign money, and to certify such requests to the Secretary of the Treasury for the latter's disbursement. 26 U.S.C. 9005, 9036. The Commission was also given rulemaking authority, 2 U.S.C. 437d(a)(8), 438(a)(10);

26 U.S.C. 9009(b), 9039(b), and the power to issue advisory opinions upon which the requester was entitled to rely, 2 U.S.C. 437f. The Court held in Valeo that assignment of these powers to the Commission was inconsistent with fundamental notions of separation of powers (pp. 134-35):

> All aspects of the Act are brought within the Commission's broad administrative powers: rule-making, advisory opinions, and determinations of eligibility for funds and even for federal elective office itself. These functions, exercised free from day-to-day supervision of either Congress or the Executive Branch, are more legislative and judicial in nature than are the Commission's enforcement powers, and are of kinds usually performed by independent regulatory agencies or by some department in the Executive Branch under the direction of an Act of Congress. Congress viewed these broad powers as essential to effective and impartial administration of the entire substantive framework of the Act. Yet each of these functions also represents the performance of a significant governmental duty exercised pursuant to a public law. While the President may not insist that such functions be delegated to an appointee of his removal at will, * * * none of them operates merely in aid of congressional authority to legislate or is sufficiently removed from the administration and enforcement of public law to allow it to be performed by the present Commission. These administrative functions may therefore be exercised only by persons who are "Officers of the United States." (emphasis added.)

The result of this holding is a large gap in administration of the law. Unless the Congress acts, there will be no clear or easy method of handling certification of eligibility for funds. Treasury will of course be reluctant to disburse the significant amounts of money involved without following the statutory certification procedure, even when the claim of the candidate seems clear. No one is specifically authorized to take over the prescribing of regulations. The Department of Justice could issue advisory opinions, or at least provide some guidance as to how we intend to enforce the particular provisions that fall within our jurisdiction. (Indeed, we did that prior to the creation of the Commission.) But that would not be an adequate substitute for the kind of advice on all aspects of the law that the Commission was authorized to provide.

Based on these broad conclusions, it seems clear to us that legislation is urgently needed, and that temporary inaction--at least with respect to these administrative provisions--is not a realistic option. As I have suggested above, however, it is possible to segregate these features from the more substantive provisions calling for congressional reconsideration; and thus to facilitate the prompt legislative action which is essential. The purposes of the President's proposal are two-fold: First, to assure the smooth operation of the campaign laws during the current elections by making the minimal administrative changes necessary for that purpose. Second, to provide assurance that there will occur at a later date congressional reconsideration of the entire election law package, as substantively altered by the Supreme Court's decision. These two objectives are not unrelated. It is our hope that those in Congress who desire major substantive change can, in the interest of prompt action, be persuaded merely to defer that legislative battle, though not to abandon it entirely. As noted in his transmittal letter to the President of the Senate, in order to set an example for the suppression of those controversial issues which can be reserved for next year, the President has on his part even refrained from including in his proposal the revision of a clearly administrative feature to which he has strenuous objection, now that the Commission has been held to be performing executive functions--namely, the one-House congressional veto of Commission rules. It is hoped that all Members of Congress--who we know have strong feelings on many substantive features of this law--can likewise be induced to submerge those feelings, for the time being, in the national interest.

Let me now provide an outline of what the President's legislation would accomplish. Section 2(a) provides for the appointment of all Commission members by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. This is no more than the Constitution, as interpreted in Valeo, requires. Section 2(b) includes a number of technical conforming amendments which eliminate language relevant to the system under which Commissioners were previously appointed.

I should mention that there is one feature of Section 2 which was not directly addressed by the Supreme Court. Section 2 would eliminate the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House as non-voting, ex officio members of the Commission. We believe that the spirit of the opinion, and even the letter of the Constitution, require this result. The connection of these two officers to the legislative branch is even closer than that of the present congressionally appointed members who have the right to vote. They are not only appointed by Congress, but paid by it and removable by it. We believe that the absence of voting power is not determinative for constitutional purposes. The power to be present and to participate in discussions is the power to influence. Normally, a judge, commissioner or juror, or even a corporate director, who is disqualified for conflict of interest, is expected to recuse himself not only from voting but from deliberations as well. In Wiener v. United States, 357 U.S. 349, 355-56 (1958), the Supreme Court stressed that an independent agency should decide matters on the merits "entirely free from the control or coercive influence, direct or indirect * * * of either the Executive or the Congress." In Valeo the Court used similar words in describing the Commission's functions as "exercised free from day-to-day supervision of either Congress or the Executive Branch" (p. 134). As long as two officers of the legislative branch sit on the Commission there is thus a danger that constitutional requirements will not be met and that, at the very least, the entire law will be subject to further litigation and challenge.

Section 3 includes a number of technical provisions designed to make the new appointment provision in Section 2 dovetail with the requirements of the present law. Thus, the terms of the present commissioners are ended upon the appointment and confirmation of the new appointees. The provision forbidding present officeholders from being appointed is made inapplicable to present Commission members, so that the President would not be barred from appointing incumbents. For the purpose of setting terms on a staggered basis the new appointees would be treated as those first appointed. In addition, certain references to the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House, made obsolete by our revisions in Section 2, would be eliminated.

Section 4 provides that all actions heretofore taken by the Commission shall remain in effect until modified, superseded or repealed according to law. This reenforces the statement of the Supreme Court that past acts of the Commission and interim acts until the end of the 30-day stay are accorded de facto validity (pp. 136-37). We understand this to mean, for example, that money disbursed in good faith under the Act will be treated as legally disbursed even if the Commission that disbursed it was not appointed under the Constitution.

Section 5 provides that the laws relating to the Federal Election Commission (Title 2, Chapter 14), contribution limitations (18 U.S.C. 608) and primary and election financing (Title 26, Chapters 95 and 96) shall not apply to any election that occurs after this year except run-offs of elections held this year. The provisions of Title 18 which include basic measures dealing with such matters as contributions by corporations, unions, and government contractors, and with anonymous and cash contributions, would not be affected. In addition, the provisions for tax credits for contributions for candidates to public office (26 U.S.C. 41) and the $1.00 tax check-off system (26 U.S.C. 6096) would be retained. Thus, potential methods of financing would be available even if there were a halt in the authority to disburse funds. In addition, this provision would not terminate the Commission. It could continue to work on matters relating to the 1976 elections as long after those elections as necessary, or on matters not related to a specific election.

We hope that this cut-off provision will facilitate passage of the bill we have presented. By providing for future lapse of the now distorted 1974 substantive changes, it is intended to assure--and we believe will be successful in achieving--thorough reconsideration of these problems in 1977 when there will be time to act deliberately and on the basis of experience. There is no time to resolve fundamental differences now. Upon the expiration of the Court's 30-day stay, and until the Congress acts, we will have a legal jigsaw puzzle to contend with. We therefore urge you to pass S. 2987 as a concededly incomplete solution, a least common denominator, a prudent and temporary compromise.

I would like to comment briefly on the other bills that are before this Subcommittee. They are S. 2911, introduced by Senator Schweiker, and S. 2912 and S. 2918, introduced by Senator Kennedy.

We agree with most of the provisions of S. 2911, as far as they go. It is basically designed to provide for Presidential appointment and Senate confirmation of the Commissioners. As I indicated earlier, however, we believe that retaining the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House perpetuates a serious constitutional issue, and may produce litigation once again impeding administration of the Act. The two non-voting members, however influential, are hardly worth that cost. More importantly, however, we object to the absence from S. 2911 of any mechanism which will assure reconsideration of the election financing "package" next year. We think it is unreasonable to ask the Congress to accept in haste a new status quo which, in the absence of future congressional action, will perpetuate a system, in an extraordinarily delicate area, which the Congress has never in reality approved.

The second bill, S. 2912 presents the same issue concerning non-voting, ex officio members. Otherwise Title I of S. 2912 differs only in drafting technique from Sections 2-4 of the Administration's bill. Section 102 deals with authorizations for funding of the Commission; we are not prepared to comment on what the proper level should be. Title II of S. 2912 would create a complete new title for the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971, providing public financing of primary and general elections for the Senate. This is an idea which has had support previously, but not enough to pass both Houses. We are opposed to consideration of Title II of S. 2912 at this time. This opposition is not necessarily on the merits, but for the reasons of time that I have discussed previously.

The final bill, S. 2918, provides that the Comptroller General shall carry out the functions of the Federal Election Commission under subtitle H of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954. Subtitle H includes ~~Titles~~ Chapters 95 and 96 of Title 26, which are the Presidential Election Campaign Fund Act and the Presidential Primary Matching Payment Account Act. This bill would, by its terms, expire on April 30, 1976.

We oppose this bill for both practical and legal reasons. As we understand it, the bill would not terminate the Federal Election Commission. The Commission and other agencies would presumably continue to function as best as they can under Buckley v. Valeo in regard to the Commission's remaining powers under Title 2 and Title 18. Meanwhile, the duties of the Commission regarding matching funds for primaries would be completely shifted, in midstream, to different personnel in a different agency--with the further possibility that another shift would take place next April. (S. 2912 does not concern itself with what would happen after April 30, 1976.) The purpose of this provision is presumably to carry the funding system along while the Congress attempts to give fundamental reconsideration to the law produced by the Valeo decision. We doubt, to begin with, whether that period would be long enough--or, indeed, whether any period can produce intelligent and dispassionate reconsideration in the midst of an election year. Moreover, the temporary transfer does not make much practical sense. It is our understanding from press accounts that some of the early administrative difficulties associated with the new law are now being overcome by the Commission, and that requests for certification of matching funds are now being processed more rapidly. It hardly seems that this would be an appropriate time to give the job to someone else.

Beyond these practical considerations, significant constitutional problems would arise from this proposal, paralleling the issues raised in Valeo. Both Title 95 and 96 include administrative and enforcement powers similar to those provided under Title 2, such as the power to initiate civil actions (26 U.S.C. 9010, 9011, 9040, 9041), in addition to the power to make administrative determinations as to certification of payments from the Treasury. Assuming a willingness to litigate, we would almost be guaranteed a new challenge as to whether, in light of Valeo, the Comptroller General can assume the functions of the Commission. At the least, we would have another period of uncertainty. In my view the Comptroller General cannot assume these functions of the Commission.

The Comptroller General is appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Unquestionably, therefore, S.2918 would assure compliance with the Appointments Clause. It mistakes the Valeo decision, however, to assume that it is based exclusively upon failure to comply with that relative technicality. The Court was at pains to point out that the issue "touches upon the fundamental principles of the Government established by the Framers of the Constitution" (p. 113). The Commission's enforcement power, exemplified by its discretionary power to seek judicial relief, is authority that cannot possibly be regarded as merely in aid of the legislative function of Congress. A lawsuit is the ultimate remedy for a breach of the law, and it is to the President, and not to the Congress, that the Constitution entrusts the responsibility to "take Care that the Laws be faithfully executed." Art. II, § 3 (p. 132).

The Comptroller General is an officer of the legislative branch, removable only by the legislature (31 U.S.C. 41, 42, 43, 65(d)). See U.S. Government Manual 43 ff. (Revised May 1975). It is true that he had significant duties under the 1971 election law until it was amended in 1974 and the Commission was created. P.L. 92-225, § 308, 86 Stat. 3. These were not, however, as extensive as the powers later assigned to the Commission which would be retransferred to the Comptroller under S.2918. For example, under the 1971 Act the Comptroller could not bring civil actions. See 2 U.S.C. 438(d)(1) (Supp. III, 1973). Moreover, the Supreme Court never had the opportunity to rule on even the limited powers which the Comptroller exercised under the 1971 law. In the Valeo litigation, the Commission relied for analogous support on the duties of the Comptroller General under the 1971 Act (p. 122, note 165). In response to this contention the Court stated that "irrespective of Congress' designation [of the Comptroller General as legislative], the Comptroller General is appointed by the President in conformity with the Appointments Clause" (p. 122, note 165). If read by itself, this footnote might be taken as a suggestion that conformity with the Appointments Clause is sufficient. However, as I have indicated earlier, the basis for the Court's opinion rests on more than the Appointments Clause, and it would be foolhardy to rely upon this rejoinder to a narrow argument as indicating a narrow scope for the opinion as a whole. To the contrary, the whole thrust of the case is that the doctrine of separation of powers precludes Congress or its officers from both enacting the laws and taking care that they be faithfully executed. Art. II, § 3; pp. 113-17. By assigning the Commission's functions to the Comptroller General, S.2918 would once again violate the doctrine of separation of powers and

"engraft executive duties upon a legislative office" (p. 133). We therefore oppose this bill on constitutional as well as practical grounds.

In conclusion, may I again express the hope that this subcommittee will give prompt and favorable consideration to S. . I will be happy to respond, to the best of my ability, to any questions you may have concerning that bill or the other proposals I have briefly discussed.

(See text of S. 2987.)

Mr. SCALIA. I have with me, Mr. Chairman, Jack Goldklang a staff attorney at OLC, and Robert Hickey, Chief of the Elections Unit, Fraud Section, Criminal Division, of the Department of Justice, who will assist me in answering any questions you may have.

On January 30, 1976, the decision of the Supreme Court in Buckley v. Valeo cut a gaping hole in the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971. The damage was so substantial that Chief Justice Burger, in his dissenting opinion, expressed the view that the entire act should have been stricken down, since, as altered by the Court's decision, it was in his view "unworkable and inequitable."

In the aftermath of the Valeo case, there are two sets of decisions which must be taken by the Congress, one of which is extraordinarily difficult and the other extraordinarily urgent. The extraordinarily difficult question can be taken verbatim from Chief Justice Burger's dissent—

> When central segments, key operative provisions, of this act, are stricken, can what remains function in anything like the way Congress intended?

The Congress will obviously have to address this issue eventually, to determine whether the elimination of certain features that were the quids or quos in a long debated and carefully crafted legislative package leaves a residue which is still an approximation of legislative will. I have no reason to believe—and indeed, the press reports since the Valeo decision lead me to doubt—that that process of reconsideration will be any less difficult or protracted than that which produced the 1974 amendments. I may add that I am confirmed in that opinion by the widely divergent testimony I have heard here today. There is just a tremendous spectrum of opinion on what ought to be done with respect to the basic substantive provisions of the election campaign law.

There is, however, a second issue which must be resolved. It can, I think, be separated from the first, if not by logic, then at least by the genius for compromise and practicality which is the hallmark and the prerequisite of our democratic system. Approached with good will and with overriding concern for the national interest by all sides, it need not be as difficult as the first issue. I refer to the immediate, pressing necessity of making such minimal changes as are absolutely essential to prevent the enactment and subsequent partial invalidation of the 1974 amendments from seriously distorting the 1976 election campaigns. Those campaigns are now well underway; they have at all levels—but especially at the Presidential level—been planned and conducted on the basis of certain assumptions which, unless the Constitution requires, it would be a public disservice to upset.

It is essentially the second of these issues which I wish to discuss today, in the context of the administration bill, S. 2987, which Senator Griffin introduced this morning, designed to meet our immediate problems. I will also discuss, as you requested, three other bills—S. 2911, S. 2912, and S. 2918—which in my view, though I hesitate to speak for their sponsors, likewise offer no complete solution for the problems generated by the Valeo case but seek to minimize to the extent possible the distortion of the present election campaign.

I will skip, Mr. Chairman, that portion of my text which discusses principal effects of Valeo. Essentially they have been discussed already—the gap that has been created in expenditure limitations.

Even in the brief time since the Valeo decision, much has been said and written concerning the likely effects of the Court's opinion. By limiting contributions but not limiting expenditures on the part of candidates who have received no Federal funding, the post-Valeo law undoubtedly increases the importance of the candidate's personal wealth. By drawing a crucial line between expenditures "controlled by or coordinated with the candidates"—which can be limited—and those which are "independent"—which cannot be limited—the post-Valeo law creates a distinction that may be impossible to administer. Perhaps most important of all, by enabling contributions above the established limits to be funneled into campaigns through organizations separate from the candidate himself, the post-Valeo law may sap the strength of our political party system and foster elections whose major themes are selected by issue-oriented or narrowly factional groups, rather than by the candidate or even the candidate's political party.

These results may or may not be desirable; they may or may not be as severe as some predict. We will presumably know more about that after the present election campaign is completed. The point is, however, that they render a reconsideration of the Court-modified election laws essential. The total system which now exists is one which, in substantial and important respects, has been designed by no Congress and approved by no President. One of the purposes of the President's legislative proposal is to assure, insofar as possible, this needed reconsideration at a time when it can intelligently and dispassionately occur.

Turning now to the second category of effects of the Valeo decision, its effects upon the administration of the Federal Election Campaign Act: The clear holding of the Supreme Court was that the Federal Election Commission's composition violates the appointments clause of the Constitution as to all but its investigatory and informative powers. As you know, a majority of its members were appointed by congressional officers. As long as the Commissioners are not appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate, or by the President alone, in accordance with article II, section 2, clause 2, the Commission cannot perform, the Court said, executive, that is, enforcement functions. These include primary responsibility for bringing civil actions against violators, for making rules to carry out the act, for making administrative determinations and for issuing advisory opinions. The Court mitigated the effects of its opinion by staying its judgment for 30 days. The stay seems to mean that until 30 days from January 30, 1976, the Commission may continue to exercise all of the powers given it with respect to the substantive provisions which have been upheld, including the public financing of Federal elections. We understand from press accounts that this is in fact how the Commission has proceeded.

Beyond the 30-day period, however, the legal situation, if Congress does not act, becomes much more complicated. One safe statement is that there will be plenty of work for lawyers trying to figure out the application of Valeo to concrete situations. I will try to review some of the problem areas with you. First of all, to borrow from Mark Twain, the reports of the Commission's total demise are somewhat exaggerated. The Court said that the Commission could unquestionably continue to exercise those powers which are "essentially of an investigative and informative nature, falling in the same general category as those powers which Congress might delegate to one of its own committees." These powers were also described as "functions relating to the flow of necessary information—receipt, dissemination, and investigation."

As to those substantive provisions of the act which, as I have indicated above, are not invalidated by the Valeo decision, we are left in the following enforcement position. Bear in mind that I am not trying to cover every contingency but am only sketching the general outline. It is clear that the criminal provisions of the act can still be enforced. Title 18 of the United States Code includes a number of criminal provisions of the election law which are under the jurisdiction of the Fraud Section of the Criminal Division of the Department of Justice. Section 608, dealing with limitations on contributions and expenditures, has, as I mentioned, been truncated by the Court's decision—but the remainder of section 608 and other provisions over which the Commission has had concurrent enforcement jurisdiction are left unaffected. These include sections 610, 611, and 613–617 of title 18 which deal with contributions by banks, corporations, labor unions, Government contractors and foreign nationals, anonymous contributions, cash contributions and similar matters. Complaints can be filed directly with the Department of Justice or with the Commission. As the law stands now, if the Commission receives a complaint or has information concerning an apparent criminal violation, it can report the matter to the Attorney General. This collection and referral of information seems to be covered by the Supreme Court's permission for the Commission to engage in "functions relating to the flow of necessary information." To use another standard suggested by the Court, it is the kind of function that might be performed by a committee of the Congress, so we think this referral function of the Commission with respect to violation of the criminal laws could continue to be performed.

The Commission, can, however, no longer bring civil actions to enforce the campaign financing restrictions. The law had previously vested in the Commission primary jurisdiction with respect to the civil enforcement of the election laws, including the power to obtain injunctive relief in certain circumstances, and to sue for return of overpayments made by the Secretary of the Treasury. As the Court read the applicable provisions, none of these powers required the concurrence or participation of the Attorney General; they were all held unconstitutional.

If Congress does not act, we will be faced with the question whether the Attorney General can, without further legislation, assume the civil enforcement responsibilities which the Commission has been compelled to abandon. The law contains a provision whereby the Attorney General as well as the Commission can institute civil actions with respect to certain provisions, but he cannot do so entirely on his own. The law requires that he be requested to do so by the Commission.

The judgment required by the Commission—to refer a matter to the Attorney General after notice and hearing—would seem to involve the kind of administrative determination and hearing necessary to insure compliance with the statute that the Court said the Commission could not perform. To be sure, congressional committees can hold investigative hearings and refer violations, if they suspect them, to the Justice Department; but such referral is not, as this provision seeks to make it, a precondition to the executive's enforcement of the law. We must conclude that the provision for Attorney General enforcement only upon Commission referral is invalid. This leaves open the question whether, the referral provision having been stricken, the remainder of the provision, giving the Attorney General enforcement authority, subsists. This is, in lawyer's terms, an issue of the severability of the invalidated provisions, a field of inquiry in which it is fair to say there are no clear answers. The most we can say is that if the Congress does not act, the Department of Justice will seek to use the enforcement mechanisms of 2 U.S.C. 437g(a)(7) without prerequisite Commission referral. Whether such authority will be upheld is uncertain. I may note, however, that this device even if successful, would not apply to enforcement of title 26 and the campaign financing features of the law.

There is some argument that can be made that the Attorney General, apart from any statutory, explicit statutory, authority, has general nonstatutory power to bring civil actions whenever the interests of the United States are involved, and there is some case law which supports such a theory. However, those cases generally deal with situations in which the Congress has been entirely silent on the right to sue. And it is not at all certain whether they could be used in this situation where the Congress has said it is the Commission which will sue, but that provision has been stricken down.

It is at least doubtful whether any general civil enforcement authority of the Attorney General could be used.

Other issues involve the certification of expenses, rulemaking and advisory opinions. Under title 26 of the United States Code, the Commission was charged with the duty to receive and pass upon requests by eligible candidates for campaign money, and to certify such requests to the Secretary of the Treasury for the latter's disbursement. The Commission was also given rulemaking authority and the power to issue advisory opinions upon which the requester was entitled to rely. The Court held in Valeo that assignment of these powers to the Commission was inconsistent with fundamental notions of the separation of powers.

The result of this holding is a large gap in administration of the law. Unless the Congress acts, there will be no clear or easy method of handling certification of eligibility for funds. Treasury will, of course, be reluctant to disburse the significant amounts of money involved without following the statutory certification procedure, even when the claim of the candidate seems clear. No one is specifically authorized to take over the prescribing of regulations. The Department of Justice could issue advisory opinions, or at least provide some guidance as to how we intend to enforce the particular provisions that fall within our jurisdiction, which is not all of them. (Indeed, we did that prior to the creation of the Commission.) But that would not be an adequate substitute for the kind of advice on all aspects of the law that the Commission was authorized to provide.

Based on these broad conclusions, it seems clear to us that legislation is urgently needed, and that temporary inaction—at least with respect to these administrative provisions—is not a realistic option. As I have suggested above, however, it is possible to segregate these features from the more substantive provisions calling for congressional reconsideration; and thus to facilitate the prompt legislative action which is essential.

The purposes of the bill which the President has proposed are twofold. First, to assure the smooth operation of the campaign laws during the current elections by making the minimal administrative changes necessary for that purpose. And, second, to provide assurance that there will occur at a later date congressional reconsideration of the entire election law package, as substantively altered by the Supreme Court's decision. These two objectives are not unrelated. It is our hope that those in Congress who desire major substantive change can, in the interest of prompt action, be persuaded merely to defer that legislative battle, though not to abandon it entirely. As noted in his transmittal letter to the President of the Senate—and, incidentally, Mr. Chairman, I would ask that that be inserted in the record—in order to set an example for the suppression of those controversial issues which can be reserved for next year, the President has on his part refrained from including in his proposal the revision of a clearly administrative feature to which he has strenuous objection, now that the Commission has been held to be performing executive functions—namely, the one-House congressional veto of Commission rules. It is hoped that all Members of Congress—who we know have strong feelings on many substantive features of this law—can likewise be induced to submerge those feelings, for the time being, in the national interest.

Let me now provide an outline of S. 2987.

Senator PELL. Without objection, the letter from the President will be inserted in the record.

Mr. SCALIA. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

[The message from the President follows:]

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

TRANSMITTING A DRAFT OF PROPOSED LEGISLATION TO ESTABLISH THE OFFICES OF MEMBERS OF THE FEDERAL ELECTION COMMISSION AS OFFICERS APPOINTED BY THE PRESIDENT, BY AND WITH THE ADVICE AND CONSENT OF THE SENATE, AND FOR OTHER PURPOSES

To the Congress of the United States:

In only two weeks time, unless there is affirmative action by the Congress, the Federal Election Commission will be stripped of most of its powers.

We must not allow that to happen. The American people can and should expect that our elections in this Bicentennial year, as well as other years, will be free of abuse. And they know that the Federal Election Commission is the single most effective unit for meeting that challenge.

The Commission has become the chief instrument for achieving clean Federal elections in 1976. If it becomes an empty shell, public confidence in our political process will be further eroded and the door will be opened to possible abuses in the coming elections. There would be no one to interpret, advise or provide needed certainty to the candidates with regard to the complexities of the Federal Election law. If we maintain the Commission, we can rebuild and restore the public faith that is essential for a democracy.

The fate of the Commission has been called into question, of course, by the decision of the Supreme Court on January 30. The Court ruled that the Commission was improperly constituted. The Congress gave the Commission executive powers but then, in violation of the Constitution, the Congress reserved to itself the authority to appoint four of the six members of the Commission. The Court said that this defect could be cured by having all members of the Commission nominated by the President upon the advice and consent of the Senate. Under the Court's ruling, the Commission was given a 30-day lease on life so that the defect might be corrected.

I fully recognize that other aspects of the Court's decision and that, indeed, the original law itself have created valid concerns among Members of Congress. I share many of those concerns, and I share in a desire to reform and improve upon the current law. For instance, one section of the law provides for a one-House veto of Commission regulations, a requirement that is unconstitutional as applied to regulations of an agency performing Executive functions. I am willing to defer legislative resolution of this problem, just as I hope the members of Congress will defer adjustment of other provisions in the interest of the prompt action which is now essential.

It is clear that the 30-day period provided by the Court to reconstitute the Commission is not sufficient to undertake a comprehensive review and reform of the campaign laws. And most assuredly, this 30-day period must not become a convenient excuse to make ineffective the campaign reforms that are already on the books and have been upheld by the Court. There is a growing danger that the opponents of campaign reform will exploit this opportunity for the wrong purposes. This cannot be tolerated; there must be no retreat from our commitment to clean elections.

Therefore, I am today submitting remedial legislation to the Congress for immediate action. This legislation incorporates two recommendations that I discussed with the bipartisan leaders of the Congress shortly after the Court issued its opinion.

First, I propose that the Federal Election Commission be reconstituted so that all of its six members are nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate. This action must be taken before the February 29 deadline.

Second, to ensure that a full-scale review and reform of the election laws are ultimately undertaken, I propose that we limit through the 1976 elections the application of those laws administered by the Commission. When the elections have been completed and all of us have a better understanding of the problems in our current statutes, I will submit to the Congress a new, comprehensive election reform bill to apply to future elections. I also pledge that I will work with the Congress to enact a new law that will meet many of the objections of the current system.

I know there is widespread disagreement within the Congress on what reforms should be undertaken. That controversy is healthy; it bespeaks of a vigorous interest in our political system. But we must not allow our divergent views to disrupt the approaching elections. Our most important task now is to ensure the continued life of the Federal Election Commission, and I urge the Congress to work with me in achieving that goal.

GERALD R. FORD.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 16, 1976.

[See text of S. 2987.]

Senator GRIFFIN. Could I ask, are you skipping over now some sections, portions?

Mr. SCALIA. I skipped some earlier.

Senator GRIFFIN. Where are you now?

Mr. SCALIA. I am on page 14, Senator, the bottom of page 14, coming to a summary of S. 2987, the President's proposed bill.

Senator GRIFFIN. I see you are going to discuss something that I commented on earlier—and I am glad to see you are going to discuss it—and that is the omission of the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House.

Mr. SCALIA. Yes, sir; we will discuss it.

Section 2(a) of the bill provides for the appointment of all Commission members by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. This is no more than the Constitution, as interpreted in Valeo, requires. Section 2(b) includes a number of technical conforming amendments which eliminate language relevant to the system under which Commissioners were previously appointed.

There is one feature of section 2 which was not directly addressed by the Supreme Court. Section 2 would eliminate the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House as nonvoting ex efficio members of the Commission. We believe that the spirit of the Valeo opinion, and even the letter of the Constitution, require this result. The connection of these two officers to the legislative branch is even closer than that of the present congressionally appointed members who have the right to vote. They are not only appointed by Congress, but paid by it and removable by it. We believe that the absence of voting power is not determinative for constitutional purposes. The power to be present and to participate in discussions is the power to influence. Normally, a judge, commissioner, or juror, or even a corporate director, who is disqualified for conflict of interest, is expected to recuse himself not only from voting but from deliberations as well. In Wiener v. United States, the Supreme Court stressed that an independent agency should decide matters on the merits "entirely free from the control or coercive influence, direct or indirect * * * of either the Executive or the Congress" 357 U.S. 349, 355–56. In Valeo the Court used similar words in describing the Commission's functions as "exercised free from day-to-day supervision of either Congress or the executive branch." As long as two officers of the legislative branch sit on the Commission, there is thus a danger that constitutional requirements will not be met and that, at the very least, the entire law will be subject to further litigation and challenge.

Senator GRIFFIN. I think that is very interesting and it does raise some questions that I frankly had not thought about. It may well be that it wouldn't be a good idea. I am certainly going to take a look at it anyway.

Mr. SCALIA. Senator, it seems to me a guide to your thinking might be to ask yourself whether you think that such a provision would be constitutional or even, that aside, would be desirable with respect to the Federal Communications Commission or any one of the independent regulatory agencies. Should the Congress have two, albeit nonvoting, members serving as members of this executive agency?

I think the answer is clearly no. I think the Supreme Court would say it is no as a matter of law. In any case, it doesn't seem to me to be worth the risk to get the entire administrative structure of the act kicked over once again.

Senator CANNON. If I may, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that you have raised also another very interesting question on page 15, where you say "Normally, a judge, commissioner or juror, or even a corporate director, who is disqualified for conflict of interest, is expected to recuse himself not only from voting but from deliberations as well."

Now, that raises a question in my mind as to whether Members of Congress would be able to even enter into a discussion of this bill, if we have the campaign financing provision in there—and, if so, would they be eligible to vote on it without recusing themselves.

Mr. SCALIA. Senator, I think those provisions do not apply to the legislative process, only to the executive and judicial process.

Senator CANNON. I see.

Mr. SCALIA. You have no worry on that score. Section 3 of the bill includes a number of technical provisions designed to make the new appointment provision in section 2 dovetail with the requirements of the present law. Thus, the terms of the present commissioners are ended upon the appointment and confirmation of the new appointees. The provision forbidding present officeholders from being appointed is made inapplicable to present Commission members, so that the President would not be barred from appointing incumbents. For the purpose of setting terms on a staggered basis the new appointees would be treated as those first appointed.

Section 4 provides that all actions heretofore taken by the Commission shall remain in effect until modified, superseded or repealed according to law. This reenforces the statement of the Supreme Court that past acts of the Commission and interim acts until the end of the 30-day stay are accorded de facto validity. We understand this to mean, for example, that money disbursed in good faith under the act will be treated as legally disbursed even if the Commission that disbursed it was not appointed under the Constitution.

Section 5 provides that the laws relating to the Federal Election Commission (title 2 of chapter 14), contribution limitations (18 U.S.C. 608) and primary and election financing (title 26, chapters 95 and 96) shall not apply to any election that occurs after this year except run-offs of elections held this year. The provisions of title 18 which include basic measures dealing with such matters as contributions by corporations, unions, and Government contractors, anonymous and cash contributions, would not be affected. In addition, the provisions for tax credits for contributions for candidates to public office and the $1 tax checkoff system would be retained. Thus, potential methods of financing would be available next year even if there were a halt in the authority to disburse funds. In other words, if the Congress decided on reconsideration next year to set up the same kind of a system, the money would be there.

In addition, this provision would not terminate the Federal Election Commission. It would continue to work on matters relating to the 1976 elections as long after those elections are necessary, or on matters not related to a specific election.

We hope that this cut-off provision will facilitate passage of the bill we have presented. By providing for future lapse of the now distorted 1974 substantive changes, it is intended to assure—and we believe will be successful in assuring—thorough reconsideration of these problems in 1977 when there will be time to act deliberately and on the basis of experience. There is no time to resolve fundamental differences now. Upon the expiration of the Court's 30-day stay, and until the Congress acts, we will have a legal jigsaw puzzle to contend with. We therefore urge you to pass S. 2987 as a concededly incomplete solution, a least common denominator, a prudent and temporary compromise.

I would like, if you wish, Mr. Chairman, to comment briefly on the other bills that are before this subcommittee—S. 2911, first of all. We agree with most of the provisions of that legislation, as far as they go. It is basically designed to provide for Presidential appointment and Senate confirmation of the Commissioners. As I indicated earlier, however, we believe that retaining the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House perpetuates a serious constitutional issue and may produce litigation once again impeding administration of the act. The two nonvoting members, however influential, are hardly worth that cost. More importantly, however, we object to the absence from S. 2911 of any mechanism which will assure reconsideration of the election financing package next year. We think it is unreasonable to ask the Congress to accept in haste a new status quo which, in the absence of future congressional action, will perpetuate a system, in an extraordinarily delicate area, which the Congress has never in reality approved.

I might note that Senator Schweiker in his testimony indicated that he would favor the addition of a cut-off provision to his bill, so perhaps we are not in substantive disagreement on that point.

Senator GRIFFIN. I might just interject here a thought that the presence of the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House, in part, indicates a desire on the part of the Members of Congress to take advantage of an expertise that has been developed there in the past. It would seem that maybe that could still be done in some way that wouldn't make those people members of the Commission, or not actually participate in the deliberations—but perhaps in an advisory role, or something of that kind.

Mr. SCALIA. I think there would certainly be no problem about that. I think the only obstacle is actually making them members of what has now been found to be an executive agency.

The second bill before you, S. 2912, presents the same issue concerning the two nonvoting ex officio members. Otherwise, title I of S. 2912 differs only in drafting technique from sections 2 to 4 of the administration's bill. Section 102 deals with authorizations for funding of the Commission; we are not prepared to comment on what the proper level should be. Title II of S. 2912 would create a completely new title for the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971, providing public financing of primary and general elections for the Senate. This is an idea which has had support previously, but not enough to pass both Houses. We are opposed to consideration of title II of S. 2912 at this time. This opposition is not necessarily on the merits, but for the reasons of time that I have discussed previously.

The final bill, S. 2918, provides that the Comptroller General shall carry out the functions of the Federal Election Commission under subtitle H of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954. Subtitle H includes chapters 95 and 96 of title 26, which are the Presidential Election Campaign Fund Act and the Presidential Primary Matching Payment Account Act. This bill would, by its terms, expire on April 30, 1976.

We oppose this bill for both practical and legal reasons. As we understand it, the bill would not terminate the Federal Election Commission. The Commission and other agencies would presumably continue to function as best as they can under Buckley v. Valeo in regard to the Commission's remaining powers under title 2 and title 18. Meanwhile, the duties of the Commission regarding matching funds for primaries would be completely shifted, in midstream, to different personnel in a different agency—with the further possibility that another shift would take place next April. S. 2912 does not concern itself with what would happen after April 30, 1976. The purpose of this provision is, I suppose, to carry the funding system along while the Congress attempts to give fundamental reconsideration to the law produced by the Valeo decision. We doubt, to begin with, whether that period would be long enough—or, indeed, whether any period can produce intelligent and dispassionate reconsideration in the midst of an election year. Moreover, the temporary transfer does not make much practical sense. It is our understanding from press accounts that some of the early administrative difficulties associated with the new law are now being overcome by the Commission, and that requests for certification for matching funds are now being processed more rapidly. It hardly seems that this would be an appropriate time to give the job to someone else.

Beyond these practical considerations, significant constitutional problems would arise from this proposal, paralleling the issues raised in Valeo. Both chapter 95 and chapter 96 include administrative and enforcement powers similar to those provided under title 2, such as the power to initiate civil actions, in addition to the power to make administrative determinations as to certification of payments from the Treasury. Assuming a willingness to litigate, we would almost be guaranteed a new challenge as to whether, in light of Valeo, the Comptroller General can assume the functions of the Commission. At the least, we would have another period of uncertainty. In my view, the Comptroller General cannot assume these functions of the Commission.

The Comptroller General is appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Unquestionably, therefore, S. 2918 would assure compliance with the appointments clause. It mistakes the Valeo decision, however, to assume that it is based exclusively upon failure to comply with that relative technicality. The Court was at pains to point out that the issue "touches upon the fundamental principles of the Government established by the Framers of the Constitution." The Commission's enforcement powers, exemplified by its discretionary power to seek judicial relief, is authority that cannot possibly be regarded as merely in aid of the legislative function of Congress. A lawsuit is the ultimate remedy for a breach of the law, and it is to the President, and not to the Congress, that the Constitution entrusts the responsibility to "take care that the laws be faithfully executed," article II, section 3.

The Comptroller General is an officer of the legislative branch, removable only by the legislature. It is true that he had significant duties under the 1971 election law until it was amended. These were not, however, as extensive as the powers later assigned to the Commission which would be retransferred to the Comptroller under S. 2918. For example, under the 1971 act the Comptroller could not bring civil actions. Moreover, the Supreme Court never had the opportunity to rule on even the limited powers which the Comptroller exercised under the 1971 law. In the Valeo litigation, the Commission relied for analogous support on the duties of the Comptroller General under the 1971 act. In response to this contention the Court stated that "irrespective of Congress' designation—of the Comptroller General as legislative—the Comptroller General is appointed by the President in conformity with the appointments clause." If read by itself, this footnote might be taken as a suggestion that conformity with the appointments clause is sufficient. However, as I have indicated earlier, and as a number of excerpts from the Court's opinion indicate, the basis for the Court's opinion rests on more than the appointments clause. It would be foolhardy to rely upon this rejoinder to a narrow argument as indicating a narrow scope for the opinion as a whole. To the contrary, the whole thrust of the case is that the doctrine of separation of powers precludes Congress or its officers from both enacting the laws and taking care that they be faithfully executed. By assigning the Commission's functions to the Comptroller General, S. 2918 would once again violate the doctrine of separation of powers and "engraft executive duties upon a legislative office." We therefore oppose this bill on constitutional as well as practical grounds.

In conclusion, may I again express the hope that this subcommittee will give prompt and favorable consideration to S. 2987. I will be happy to respond, to the best of my ability, to any questions you may have concerning that bill or the other proposals I have briefly discussed.

Thank you.

Senator PELL. Thank you very much. A general question—do you believe it important that our Nation have an independent body, like the Federal Election Commission, to administer and enforce the Federal election laws, or do you believe that this is unnecessary?

Mr. SCALIA. Well, as the President's statement indicated, Mr. Chairman, we do feel that an independent commission is an important feature of the election campaign laws, and we would like to see that feature retained.

The administration bill does not abolish the Commission; although the cutoff applies to the substantive provisions of the act, the cutoff would not apply to the Commission. That demonstrates something of a bias, I suppose, that when the Congress comes to reconsider it, we hope that they will continue the Commission.

Senator PELL. There are a couple of questions, as you know, the Supreme Court left unanswered—more than a couple, I guess. But, first, do you have any views as to the standards which would be proper to employ in determining the difference between a controlled or coordinated expenditure, which the Supreme Court held would be considered a contribution subject to limitation, and an independent expenditure to expressly advocate the election or defeat of a clearly identified candidate, which may be made without limit?

Mr. SCALLA. I guess an honest answer is "No," and probably nobody does. I read it to require that control be something more than what one might call passive simultaneous action on the part of another group. I would not think that the requirement of control would be met if a group assessing a particular candidate's campaign figures out on its own what would help him the most and designs a package that will fit very nicely into that campaign. I would think that as long as it is not actively coordinated with the candidate himself or his managers, the constitutional right to engage in such activity would continue to exist.

Senator PELL. What are your views with regard to the constitutionality of the law—section 608(F), title 18—setting expenditure limitations on national and State committees of a political party?

Mr. SCALIA. I frankly have not considered the point, Senator.

Senator PELL. Because this touches on the same question that was raised by the Supreme Court decision.

Mr. SCALIA. Yes, sir.

Senator PELL. What are your views on the constitutionality of recommending the public financing of Senate elections without providing for public financing of House elections?

Mr. SCALIA. I see no reason why that would not be constitutional, any less than providing for financing of Presidential elections but not Senate elections.

Senator PELL. Thank you. Senator Griffin?

Senator GRIFFIN. I don't have any questions. I think this is a very excellent statement, and certainly indicates that the administration didn't quickly or lightly put forth the legislation which was introduced today.

I am certainly impressed—and newly interested in that one question about whether or not the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House should be members.

One suggestion that was made by Senators Kennedy and Scott in their bill, was that instead of having the Commission members—a new member appointed every year, it seems to me they were proposing that to be appointed every 2 years in the off year. And this looks beyond really, I guess, the expiration—and really looks to what we would do next year under the legislation that you are suggesting.

But I just want to indicate, I think that has some merit. It would mean that the appointment of two would be made not in the heat of the campaign year, but in an off year—and presumably the President would appoint one Democrat and one Republican at the same time. That has a little bit of appeal to me—I just want to indicate that.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator PELL. Senator Cannon?

Senator CANNON. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. The suggestion was made earlier that the House might possibly act before the Senate and might pass a provision for congressional financing. And my question to you is—you indicated in your statement that one of the reasons you were opposed to that consideration was because of the difficulty of getting it through.

If that should happen in the House, would you be opposed to the addition of that type of a provision in this act?

Mr. SCALIA. I really cannot speak as to the administration's position on the point, Senator. I have no idea.

Senator CANNON. Of course, that might conflict with your theory about this being enacted only until next year and then expiring.

Mr. SCALIA. Well, it seems to me that if you go that way, what you are saying is, we want to have fundamental reconsiderations this year. That is a fundamental change in the law. It seems to me that if you do go that way you are essentially rejecting the approach that the administration's bill proposes, which is to set aside controversy as much as we can in the interests of getting through this 1976 election with as little disruption as possible.

There is another factor, too, I suppose. One might want to see how the financing scheme works in one election at the Presidential level before one extends it still further. I mentioned at several points in my testimony the value of having some experience to go on when the Congress comes to reconsider the election law next year.

But should such a provision come here from the House, which seems to me an unlikely event, I don't know what the administration's position would be.

Senator CANNON. In light of the Supreme Court's position on the unlimited expenditure possibility of persons not associated with the candidate, either in support of or in opposition to, the suggestion has been made that it might be well to amend title 18 to provide that mass media communications would clearly and conspicuously state whether the communication was authorized by a candidate and, if not authorized the name of the person or organization who financed the expenditure.

Would you care to comment on that?

Mr. SCALIA. Just off the top of my head, without having given it any consideration, the principle seems to me a good one. Obviously one of the dangers created by the Supreme Court's decision is that a candidate's campaign can be run by somebody other than the candidate. That risk could at least be minimized if all campaign advertising that was not formally sponsored by the candidate himself or herself stated specifically who it was that was sponsoring it. It seems to me like a sensible provision.

I am told that section 612 of title 18 already has a provision that, to some extent, meets this need.

Senator CANNON. What I was suggesting was an amendment to section 612—to title 18, section 612—to make it a little more clear as to what would have to take place in that instance.

Mr. SCALIA. Maybe a specific caption that says "Not approved bv the candidate" would help.

Senator CANNON. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator PELL. Thank you.

Senator Williams?

Senator WILLIAMS. Just two questions, Mr. Scalia. Yours was a very helpful statement.

I wondered—and this might touch on something that Senator Cannon just asked—this separating the independent campaign effort from the candidate's requirement to comply with the ceiling and reporting requirements leaves us where with respect to that independent effort in terms of disclosure and limits?

Mr. SCALIA. Well, disclosure is covered. The Supreme Court did nothing with disclosure requirements as to everyone, so even if you are talking about noncandidates and people totally independent of candidates, the disclosure requirements continue to apply.

Senator WILLIAMS. Are they identical in demand on who discloses and the triggering amounts?

66-816 O - 76 - 10

Mr. SCALIA. Yes, sir, I think there is no distinction as to whether one is formally a candidate or not. I think that is correct, Senator—there is no distinction—but I will check it.

[Mr. Scalia subsequently supplied the subcommittee with the following information:]

Under Title 2, section 434(e), every person (other than a political committee or candidate) who makes contributions or expenditures, other than by a contribution to a political committee or candidate in an aggregate amount in excess of $100 within a calendar year, shall file the information required by § 434 with the Commission.

The Supreme Court construed this provision so that it "imposes independent reporting requirements on individuals and groups that are not candidates or political committees only in the following circumstances: (1) when they make contributions earmarked for political purposes or authorized or requested by a candidate or his agent, to some person other than a candidate or political committee, and (2) when they make an expenditure for a communication that expressly advocates the election or defeat of a clearly indentified candidate." Slip op. p. 74.

Speaking generally, under section 434 the reporting requirements for committees and candidates apply to amounts over $1000.

Senator WILLIAMS. How do you deal with this in your bill?

Mr. SCALIA. We try not to deal with it, Senator. That is one of the problems created by the Supreme Court decision as to which there is a multitude of opinions. The whole purpose of our bill is to submerge those issues that are controversial and to do the minimal amount necessary to enable the 1976 elections to proceed.

I am not sure too much can be done with the basic problem you are concerned about. I think the major obstacle is the Constitution. I think the Supreme Court has pretty clearly said that you cannot prohibit the making of these expenditures or the spending of his own money by the candidate himself, so long as he hasn't agreed to accept Federal funds.

That also is a problem, I suppose, with any House or Senate funding bill that you consider. A candidate who does not accept the Federal funding is now, by reason of the Valeo decision, free to spend as much as he wants of his own funds. So your funding is going to have to be high enough to make it worthwhile for a candidate of substantial means to accept the funding rather than to spend his own money beyond the funding limit.

Senator WILLIAMS. Well, I am still worried about the opportunity for an independent campaign and how that is going to be accommodated in the whole effort here to purify the electoral process through disclosure and limits. I don't know what the limits are for those independent activities, what the disclosure requirements are. And just on the question of independents, it would seem to me that the Commission, if we continue it according to the Court's opinion, should have authority to appoint hearing examiners, because this is going to have unlimited questions.

Is there any authority in the Commission to appoint hearing examiners or will every case take 8 months?

Mr. SCALIA. I do not believe they have authority to appoint—certainly not administrative law judges. I am not sure whether they would have general authority to hire lawyers called hearing examiners without the necessity for a specific provision to that effect.

Senator WILLIAMS. Well, I think we ought to get into this later on, because one case in the House took how many months?

Mr. SCALIA. Well, I think you are quite right. The issue of whether a particular organization is coordinated with a candidate, or independent from a candidate, which is now a crucial distinction, is a factual determination that is going to be very difficult to make in a lot of cases, I would think.

Senator WILLIAMS. They can be related by osmosis, not by conference and meeting. You see a poor candidate hasn't got a billboard—all you know is that guy needs a billboard.

Mr. SCALIA. He needs a billboard. And I would think there is no way you could stop that. In judging what are independent expenses, I read the Supreme Court's opinion as allowing you to exercise your own judgment about what will help the candidate. All it prohibits is actual active coordination with the candidate himself or with his campaign committee.

Senator WILLIAMS. Well, I don't want to continue any longer—just one further question. As I look at our schedule here in the next 11 days, it doesn't seem to me there is any overriding measure that is before us that would occupy our time to the exclusion of this—I don't know anything about the House.

But if there are problems, has the Department thought in terms of asking for a further stay?

Mr. SCALIA. Yes, we have considered the point, and when the time comes we will take what action is available to us. I hope the Congress won't count on that, because even if we ask for it, there is no certitude that it will be granted. As I have indicated, I think it would really be disastrous if the extension should expire. Things are in a very chaotic state at that point concerning rulemaking and advice-giving, civil enforcement and many other features of the law.

Senator WILLIAMS. Nothing further. Thank you.

Mr. PELL. Following up that thought, you said that if the Congress does not act, the Department of Justice will seek to use the enforcement mechanisms of the present law without prerequisite Commission referral.

In such an event, would Justice be able and willing to commit the necessary resources to the enforcement of those portions of the act not ruled unconstitutional, including issuing the necessary guidelines that would be requested—this is if we do not act in time?

Mr. SCALIA. Senator, we will do our best with the available funds and manpower that we have and within the limits that the courts impose upon us. As I indicated, it is not entirely clear that we will be authorized to do it in any case.

But we think there is a solid argument to be made that we can do it—and we will try.

Senator PELL. Very well. We will do our best to get it through in time, but I think as a practical matter you had better be braced for this eventuality.

Mr. SCALIA. Yes, sir, we are braced.

Senator GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, may I?

Senator PELL. Yes.

Senator GRIFFIN. I want to go back to one comment that you made, that even though the lid is off in terms of expenditures by third persons and so forth, the disclosure reporting requirements are still in place.

As I understand it, the provision, section 437(a), provides any person who expends any funds or who commits any act and so forth, supporting a candidate or working for the defeat of a candidate, is required to file a report with the Commission as if such person were a political committee. I understand from counsel that provision was stricken down as unconstitutional by the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia and was not changed upon appeal to the Supreme Court.

And if that is the case, it seems to me that your earlier statement would have to be modified a little bit.

Mr. SCALIA. No, sir, it is my understanding of the Supreme Court's opinion, my clear understanding of the Supreme Court's opinion, that all disclosure requirements remain binding. Those are not affected at all.

Senator GRIFFIN. Right behind you, Mr. Harris, who I know to be a pretty good lawyer, is shaking his head, so I just want you to know there is a question here which my counsel also——

Mr. HARRIS. Thank you, Senator. Section 437(a) was held invalid by the Court of Appeals. There was no appeal, so it was never before the Supreme Court.

Senator GRIFFIN. That is what I am told by counsel.

Mr. HARRIS. It has been treated as a nullity since the court of appeals decision. The reporting provision for independent expenditures is found on page 17, if you use this yellow book—it is 434(e)—and this provides that every person, other than a political committee or candidate, who makes contributions or expenditures other than by contribution to a political committee or a candidate in an aggregate amount in excess of $100 within a calendar year, shall file reports with the Commission as if he were a political committee.

So that actually the reporting ceiling on these independent expenditures is lower than for a committee—it is $100 instead of $1,000.

But it would require full reporting of all disbursements over $100.

Senator GRIFFIN. I see.

Mr. SCALIA. Well, I agree that the relevant provision is section 434 (e) of title II and not section 437(a), which was held unconstitutional below.

Senator GRIFFIN. I don't know that we have to decide it right now. I am just pointing up that Congress has another reason why they have got to take a real good look at the situation.

Mr. SCALIA. I think that the reporting and disclosure one is not a problem if you take the Supreme Court's opinion on its face, at least. The syllabus says the following:

> The act's disclosure and recordkeeping provisions are constitutional. The provision for disclosure by those who make independent contributions and expenditures, as narrowly construed to apply only (1) when they make contributions earmarked for political purposes, or authorized or requested by a candidate or his agent to some person other than a candidate or political committee, and (2) when they make an expenditure for a communication that expressly advocates the election or defeat of a clearly identified candidate, is not unconstitutionally vague and does not constitute a prior restraint, but is a reasonable and minimally restrictive method of furthering first amendment values by public exposure of the Federal election system.

I think the Supreme Court, in its opinion anyway, went rather out of its way to——

Senator GRIFFIN. To rule on the question.

Mr. SCALIA. Yes. You could speak to the question whether to call it a holding or not; that is another point.

Senator GRIFFIN. Thank you.

Senator PELL. The subcommittee will recess and will reconvene at 2 o'clock.

AFTERNOON SESSION

Senator PELL. The Subcommittee on Privileges and Elections will come to order.

Our next witness is Mr. Philip S. Hughes, Assistant Comptroller General and an individual who has helped this committee many times in the past.

STATEMENT OF PHILIP S. HUGHES, ASSISTANT COMPTROLLER GENERAL OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. HUGHES. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I have a very short statement which I would appreciate being able to read, if I might.

Senator PELL. Fine.

Mr. HUGHES. It is on target as well as brief.

Senator PELL. Right.

Mr. HUGHES. We do appreciate the opportunity to appear before you on this very important subject, Mr. Chairman.

You have asked that oral presentations be brief, and mine certainly is. In addition to the statement, however, I would appreciate the subcommittee including in the record our letter of February 5, 1976, to Senator Cannon as chairman of the Senate Committee on Rules and Administration.

Senator PELL. Without objection, it will be included in the hearing record.

Mr. HUGHES. Thank you.

I see no need to reiterate points made in that letter except to emphasize that it will not be possible for the Comptroller General to immediately perform the required authorizations without satisfying himself as to the validity of the audit and investigative procedures followed by the Commission.

In that regard, Mr. Chairman, I might simply mention that one of the reasons that I am here as a witness was that I was the Director of the Office of Federal Elections in the era when General Accounting had some responsibility under the 1971 act. That Office was completely abolished in May of last year, and for a period of several months before that it really was simply existing in a pro forma status, pending the arrival on the scene of the new Commission.

The staff for that function and activity has been dispersed, some of them within the General Accounting Office, to their former duties and responsibilities. Some, indeed, have gone to assist the new Commission and I am happy that one or two are serving as staff to this particular committee.

My point is that whatever our capacity at one point to perform this sort of function, we are completely out of business and would have to reconstitute some sort of an active organization to do the job.

I would like to add, moreover, that proposals to provide a temporary or interim solution for 30, 60, or 90 days to enable the Congress to deal with more fundamental legislation on the subject of campaign financing do not seem to us to offer a very practical solution to the problem. Experience with this type of legislation in the past suggests that the time for congressional action is more likely to be measured in years rather than either weeks or months.

Furthermore, whatever interim solution the Congress might provide would inevitably further weaken the position of the Commission and extend the interval during which the Commission and its staff would be handicapped in their struggle with the difficult and controversial problems confronting them.

If I could emphasize here, Mr. Chairman, also, and in light of Mr. Scalia's comments just before lunch, that our concern here is a practical and administrative concern, and we do not necessarily subscribe to the legal or constitutional theories that Mr. Scalia mentioned with regard to the propriety legally and constitutionally of the Comptroller General performing these functions.

We simply are dealing with the practical problems of assembling a staff and satisfying ourselves in administrative terms about these things.

Nothing that has occurred since our letter of February 5 has changed our view that the best and most practical course of action would be for the Congress to pass simple legislation along the lines of S. 2911, or title I of S. 2912, or, conceivably, appropriate portions of Senator Buckley's legislation. We have not examined that. We are making the general point of the desirability of reconstituting the Commission by constitutional means.

The Commission would then be able to proceed to administer the law in the manner originally contemplated by the Congress. Any alternative would inevitably disrupt the program which the Congress so recently established. If, after the experience with the 1976 elections, Congress sees the need for a major change in the Federal Election Campaign Act, this could be accomplished in an atmosphere that is not constrained by a severe time limitation within which it is required to act.

That is the end of my statement, Mr. Chairman; and I would be pleased to respond to your questions as best I can.

Senator PELL. Thank you.

I read your letter and I recall the gist was "Please do not give this to us," was it?

Mr. HUGHES. That is the essence, Mr. Chairman.

Senator PELL. What you are emphasizing here.

As you know, S. 2918 proposes to transfer the Commission's functions to the Comptroller General this year. In your own opinion, would this be a constitutional grant of power? Would you be able to constitutionally exercise the powers?

Mr. HUGHES. I am not in a position to respond definitively, Mr. Chairman, on the constitutional question, though I would think the range of authorities we had and exercised in the 1971 act, and the fact that we successfully performed those tasks, would suggest that the delegation of those authorities to the GAO would be constitutional. Our objection is, again, the practical one of reassembling a staff and satisfying ourselves on the basis for certification, coupled with the hiatus that this interim solution would create and, again, adding the fact that we think the Congress as a whole, not just the Senate, but the Congress as a whole is going to find it very difficult to deal with the many questions that are wrapped up in this legislation within necessary time limits.

Senator PELL. If you were given this responsibility, how long would it take you to insure yourself of the questions that you want?

Mr. HUGHES. I really cannot answer that, Mr. Chairman. We have designedly, I might say, stayed away from the Federal Elections Commission. That was partly on our own initiative.

It was also suggested to us rather firmly that we should get ourselves out of the business as soon as possible, and we have tried to stay away from the Commission. We are not familiar with their procedures, with the amount of work that is being done, and it would be necessary to start anew to review the situation and estimate the time; but I would think it would inevitably be a period of several months to satisfactorily satisfy ourselves as to the propriety of certifying.

Senator PELL. What in your view would be the effect if we went ahead and enacted S. 2918? Give us a sketch or view of the scenario.

Mr. HUGHES. It would seem to me if that legislation were enacted, we would need to immediately pull together, either from within GAO or outside a staff to perform the necessary functions.

We would need to establish some sort of liaison with the Commission to find out what it had done and undertake to either follow through the processes that they have undergone or supplement them if in the judgment of the Comptroller General that was necessary.

Thereupon, we would certify or attempt to certify the propriety of disbursements here and would need to maintain a rather close liaison with the Commission in order that we perform our respective functions in some sort of synchronization. It seems to me that would be a very difficult thing to do within a short span of time, given the nature of the Commission itself, the fact that there are a number of members, each of whom in a sense is equal to all other members. The difficulty of resolving problems and achieving coordination would be considerable.

Senator PELL. Thank you very much.

Senator Allen?

Senator ALLEN. Nothing.

Senator PELL. Thank you very much indeed, Mr. Hughes. You always come to us with succinct testimony—pretty clear views.

Mr. HUGHES. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

[The letter addressed to Chairman Cannon by Comptroller General Staats follows:]

COMPTROLLER GENERAL OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, D.C., February 5, 1976.

Hon. HOWARD W. CANNON,
Chairman, Committee on Rules and Administration,
U.S. Senate.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: During the past several days there have been a number of references in the Congressional Record and in the press relating to the possibility that the Congress might ask the General Accounting Office to undertake responsibility for certifying eligibility for campaign finance funds for candidates for the Presidency of the United States pending legislative action to remedy the constitutional problem set forth in the recent Supreme Court decision with respect to the Federal Election Commission.

I am much concerned about the workload impact of this possible additional responsibility on this Office burdened as we are with ever-increasing responsibilities placed upon us by the Congress. As you undoubtedly know, we have no budget to undertake this assignment. Moreover, we are not familiar with procedures of the Commission as to how it has carried out its auditing and investigations preparatory to certification. As you can well appreciate, I would not want to certify payments without first-hand knowledge on my part to assure eligibility of candidates for the funds requested.

It will of course be necessary for the Congress to enact and the President to sign legislation authorizing the performance of this function by the GAO. I note that one such bill has been introduced in the Senate but it would seem highly unlikely that legislation of this type could be enacted in time to make it possible for this Office to make adequate preparation to assume the responsibility as of the date the Supreme Court has specified.

Under the circumstances, I believe it important that the Congress act within the thirty-day period to pass simple legislation authorizing the appointment of the Commission by constitutional means. The Commission could then proceed with the administration of the law in the manner originally contemplated by the Congress. In the interim, transfer of the responsibility to this Office would be disruptive to the program to say the least and would place upon this Office a responsibility that it is inadequately prepared to take.

Sincerely,

ELMER B. STAATS,
Comptroller General of the United States.

Senator PELL. Our next witnesses will be representatives of the Federal Election Commission, Commissioners Joan Aikens and Thomas Harris.

STATEMENT OF THOMAS HARRIS AND JOAN AIKENS, COMMISSIONERS, FEDERAL ELECTIONS COMMISSION; ACCOMPANIED BY ORLANDO POTTER, STAFF DIRECTOR, AND JACK MURPHY, GENERAL COUNSEL

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Chairman and members of the subcommittee, my name is Thomas Harris. I am a member of the Federal Elections Commission. Accompanying me is Joan Aikens, who is also a commissioner; and on my right is Orlando Potter, our staff director. On the left is Jack Murphy, our general counsel. On truly difficult questions I will refer to them for answers.

I have a prepared statement with two appendices, and I ask that this be made a part of the record.

Senator PELL. Without objection, the written statement will be included in the hearing record in its entirety.

STATEMENT OF THE FEDERAL ELECTION COMMISSION, FEBRUARY 18, 1976

Mr. Chairman and Members of the Subcommittee, my name is Thomas Harris, and I am a member of the Federal Election Commission. Accompanying me today is Commissioner Joan Aikens. We are pleased to have this opportunity to appear before your Committee on behalf of the Federal Election Commission to offer testimony with respect to S. 2911, S. 2912 and S. 2913.

These bills are addressed to problems which arise, of course, out of the Supreme Court's January 30, 1976 decision in Buckley v. Valeo. In that case the Supreme Court upheld certain provisions of the Federal Election Campaign Act and struck down others as unconstitutional. Attached to our statement today is a short summary of the Court's decision which we would like to make part of the record.

The key issue before this Committee today arises from the Court's holding that some of the Federal Election Commission's powers may only be exercised by Officers of the United States appointed in conformity with Article II, Section 2, Clause 2 of the Constitution, and that the present membership of the Commission was not so appointed.

The Court did uphold the disclosure and reporting requirements of Title 2 of the Act and stated that the Commission retained such powers as were necessary to implement those requirements. The Court accorded "de facto validity" to all past acts of the Commission, and further ordered a 30-day stay of judgment in order to give Congress the opportunity, if it were so inclined, to reconstitute the Commission in accordance with the Appointments Clause of Article II of the Constitution, or to provide such other remedy as is deemed appropriate. In granting the 30-day stay, the Court was clearly mindful of the drastic disruption of the political process which would occur with an abrupt termination of the Commission's functions. As the Court stated:

> This limited stay will afford Congress an opportunity to reconstitute the Commission by law or to adopt other valid enforcement mechanisms without interrupting enforcement of the provisions the Court sustains, allowing the present Commission in the interim to function de facto in accordance with the substantive provisions of the Act. (Slip Op. p. 136.)

The powers of the Commission which will lapse if the Commission is not re-established include the responsibilities for:

1. Certifying matching funds for presidential elections and convention financing,
2. Writing regulations subject to Congressional review,
3. Giving Advisory Opinions,
4. Investigating Complaints, and
5. Initiating civil suits in appropriate cases.

While it is the Commission's authority to certify presidential matching funds which has received widest notice in the press, we submit that the Commission's interpretative, informational and other functions are of equal, if not greater importance. Thousands of persons throughout the Nation rely upon the Commission's regulations and Advisory Opinions for guidance with respect to complying with this complicated election law. We are daily in communication with national, state and local parties, hundreds of multi-candidate committees, and thousands of candidates and their authorized committees. But the Court said that these important responsibilities—"Functions with respect to the Commission's task of fleshing out the Statute—Rulemaking and Advisory Opinions; and functions necessary to insure compliance with the Statute and rules—informal procedures, administrative determinations and hearings, and civil suits" (Slip Op. p. 131) are improperly reposed with the Commission as presently constituted.

The Commission's activities to date illustrate why the Congress saw the need for such an agency. The Commission has received almost 300 Advisory Opinion requests and thousands of additional requests for clarification of the law. Approximately 200 formal opinions have been issued by the Commission thus far and they have been widely disseminated through a variety of outlets. Further, the Commission has transmitted to Congress for approval six separate sets of regulations to clarify the responsibilities of those subject to the Act. In the area of reporting and disclosure, the Commission has attempted, wherever possible, to ease the reporting burdens of the candidates and committees without compro-

To date, the Commission has certified for disbursement to the national parties $1.2 million in convention financing funds. Under an audit and review procedure painstakingly established over the last eight months, the Commission has certified 12 presidential candidates as eligible for presidential matching funds. One additional presidential candidate may be certified today and another in the near future. Since January 1, the FEC has certified Treasury disbursement of over $7 million in matching funds to these candidates. An appendix describing in more detail the Commission's presidential primary matching procedures and activities is attached for inclusion in the record.

The Commission is continuing to review and certify requests for matching funds during the month of February on an expedited basis. We are continuing to respond to the many requests for clarification of the meaning of the law and for guidance as how best to comply with it. We are reviewing all previously issued opinions in light of the Supreme Court decision and are in the process of notifying persons who received these opinions of any revisions occasioned by the Court's conclusions. Similarly, we are redrafting our proposed regulations in order to bring them into conformity with the Supreme Court's determination.

Two of the three bills presently being considered by this Committee, namely S. 2911 and S. 2912, would provide for a Presidentially appointed Commission to fulfill the responsibilities which Congress originally conferred upon this Commission. These two bills would re-establish the Commission with six voting members appointed by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate. No more than three members could be appointed from any one party. The Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House would serve as ex officio members, as they do now.

If the Congress wishes to preserve the reforms embodied in the 1971 and 1974 Campaign Acts, an independent agency is necessary for their proper implementation. These two bills would achieve this end. We note the particular importance of provisions contained in S. 2912 which would assure an orderly transition should the Commission be re-established.

In addition, S. 2912 provides for both primary and general election public financing for Senatorial candidates. The Commission takes no position on the merits of this public financing proposal. We would note, however, that this proposed expansion of the public financing function would require substantial increases in the Commission's staff and budget.

The third bill before your Committee is S. 2918. It amends Subchapter H of Title 26, United States Code, to transfer the administration of public financing from the Federal Election Commission to the General Accounting Office until April 30, 1976. We respectfully submit that this bill is not a viable alternative to the two bills we have already discussed. The suggested transfer of authority would create numerous special problems which we should like to mention briefly. If this bill is enacted, the General Accounting Office would be immediately responsible for:

1. Verifying the eligibility of candidates attempting to qualify for matching funds by establishing that the candidates have met the initial 20 state $5,000 matchable contribution requirement as specified under the Act;

2. Creating a mechanism for reviewing all of the submissions which the candidates would make for matching fund certification. To give you an idea of what this entails, one of the presidential aspirants has submitted a request for certification of 150,682 contributions based on 95,390 contributor record entries and a computer print-out which is 11,925 pages long. The contributions and contributor record entries must be cross-checked against one another and against the computer print-out in order to make sure that the candidate has not received "bogus" or "illegal" contributions, or contributions which otherwise may not be matched;

3. Establishing a procedure for reviewing and auditing the monthly reports of candidates;

4. Establishing a continuing audit function to effectively ensure that the repayment provisions of the Act are promptly and accurately carried out; and

5. In addition to all of the above, the GAO would have to establish procedures for certifying major party convention financing.

We respectfully suggest that in the time it might take the GAO to establish these procedures, its authority to administer them would expire under this bill. Also, S. 2918, confined as it is to a transfer of public financing functions, does not address the numerous additional needs of the political process which the Commission is presently meeting and can continue to meet if re-established.

We hope that these comments will prove useful to the Committee in its deliberations. We thank the Committee for this opportunity to appear.

APPENDIX A

SUMMARY OF SUPREME COURT DECISION IN BUCKLEY V. VALEO

The following provisions of the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971, as amended (the Act), were found to be constitutional (reference to the slip opinion is by page number only):

1. The limitations on contributions to candidates for Federal office (6–2 vote; Burger, Blackmun, dissenting; pp. 7–33). Specifically, the Court upheld:

(a) the $1,000 limit on contributions by any person to a Federal candidate in any election [18 U.S.C. § 608(b)(1)] (pp. 17–29);

(b) the $5,000 limit on contributions by a multicandidate political committee to a Federal candidate in any election [18 U.S.C. § 608(b)(2)] (pp. 29–31);

(c) the $25,000 limitation on total individual contributions during any calendar year [18 U.S.C. § 608(b)(3)] (pp. 32–33).

2. The disclosure and recordkeeping provisions requiring reporting by candidates, political committees, and individuals or groups which receive contributions and make certain kinds of expenditures (6–2 vote; Burger, Blackmun, dissenting; pp. 54–79). Specifically, the Court upheld:

(a) the $10 and $100 thresholds for disclosure and recordkeeping requirements in 2 U.S.C. §§ 432, 434 (pp. 76–79);

(b) the reporting requirement of 2 U.S.C. § 434(e) for any person (other than a political committee or candidate) who makes (1) contributions to influence a Federal election or (2) expenditures for communications which expressly advocate the election or defeat of a clearly identified Federal candidate, other than to a political committee or candidate, in an amount greater than $100 in a calendar year.

3. Public financing of presidential elections through (a) the presidential primary matching fund, (b) the presidential general election campaign fund, (c) the national nominating convention fund (7–1 vote; Burger, dissenting; pp. 79–103).

Where a presidential candidate has accepted public funding of campaign efforts in an election, the candidate and his/her campaign committees are subject to the national and state expenditure limits applicable to that election [18 U.S.C. § 608(c)(1)(A)] (pp. 102–103).

The following provisions of the Act were found to be unconstitutional:

1. The limitations on expenditures (pp. 7–17, 35–52). Specifically, the Court invalidated:

(a) the limitations in 18 U.S.C. § 608(a) on expenditures by candidates from personal or family funds [5–3 vote; White, Marshall, Rheinquist, dissenting] (pp. 45–48);

(b) the overall limitations in 18 U.S.C. § 608(c) on campaign expenditures by Federal candidates in any election [7–1 vote; White, dissenting] (pp. 48–52). Note the exception above for presidential candidates who accept public funding in any election.

(c) The $1,000 limitation of 18 U.S.C. § 608(e) on independent expenditures [7–1 vote; White dissenting] (pp. 33–45).

2. The composition of the Federal Election Commission as to all but its informational and certain investigatory powers [8–0 vote] (pp. 103–107).

The Court accorded "de facto validity" to past acts of the Commission, and provided for a 30 day stay of judgment, during which the Commission may validly exercise all the duties and powers which it previously possessed, in order to permit Congress to reconstitute the Commission in conformity with the Appointments Clause of Article II of the Constitution (pp. 136–137).

APPENDIX B

PRESIDENTIAL PRIMARY MATCHING FUND ACTIVITY

I. INTRODUCTION

To date the Federal Election Commission has certified that 12 presidential candidates have met the threshold requirements which qualify them to receive matching funds under the provisions of Chapter 95 of the Internal Revenue Code.

In addi' n, it appears that two more candidates have met or will soon meet the threshold requirements.

Since August, 1975, the FEC has conducted 14 field audits and reviewed over 300,000 transactions. More than $7 million in contributions received by the candidates has been certified to be matched by Federal funds. In addition, $1.2 million has been paid to national committees who will hold presidential nominating conventions.

II. THE CERTIFICATION PROCESS—INITIAL FIELD AUDIT

When it is apparent from disclosure reports submitted by a presidential candidate, or other direct communication with the candidate, that the candidate has received contributions necessary to qualify for matching funds, audit teams are dispatched by the Commission to review his or her campaign committee's records. The purpose of these audits is threefold:

1. To determine whether the candidate has received eligible contributions of $5,000 in each of twenty states.
2. To acquaint campaign committee officials with the provisions of the Act and regulations applicable to matching fund procedures.
3. To assist committee officials in maintaining their bookkeeping and accounting systems in the correct manner to make orderly submissions for matching funds.

Field audit teams have consisted of three auditors who spend approximately two weeks at each audit site. To date, this has required a total of approximately 420 man-days of field work.

III. THE CERTIFICATION PROCESS—REVIEW

Considerable care must be taken at all times to ensure that all matching payment requests are carefully examined and certified. Since August 21, 1975, presidential candidates' committees have been required to retain photocopies of contributor checks which serve as documentation of the date, amount of contribution and identity of the contributor. The Commission has determined that this is the most efficient and least expensive way to obtain independent confirmation that the contributions had in fact been made by the individuals recorded in committee records.

The Commission developed Interim Guidelines for federal matching and provided all presidential candidates and committees detailed description of suggested methods of preparing their requests for matching funds.

1. Manpower needs

The initial submissions and many subsequent submissions have required 100 percent item-by-item review. Between December 3, 1975 and February 12, 1976, a staff of 28 was fully occupied in the certification process. This involved 1,120 man-days of staff time during normal working hours and 1,650 hours of night and weekend work to meet the 15-day certification deadline adopted by the Commission. With one exception, all deadlines have been met. The exception involved a submission of some 100,000 entries and 40,000 photocopied documents, which, because of its considerable deficiencies, had to be subjected to an item-by-item review.

2. Use of other personnel

In the certification process, the Commission has relied on its auditing staff, other agency personnel, 6 employees of the General Accounting Office detailed to the FEC by the Comptroller General, and an average of 8 temporary employees. A total of approximately 1,700 man-days have been devoted to the certification process.

IV. PRESENT PROCEDURES

With the evolution of final FEC certification review procedures, and with developing ability of campaign committees to prepare orderly matching requests, certification now involves three steps:

1. FEC review of supporting documentation

Every photocopied check or signed contributor card is reviewed to ensure that it is matchable. Contributions are excluded if they are:

A. Nonmatchable items:
(1) Submitted by corporate check;
(2) Submitted by labor union treasury check;
(3) Represent a contribution of another political committee;
(4) Are not contributions of money (i.e., in-kind contributions).

In these cases, the photocopies are returned to the committee with a notification that they are not matchable. In the case of corporate and union checks, of course, the committee will have to present sufficient documentation and information to establish that unlawful contributions have not been made.

B. Supported by insufficient documentation:
(1) Lack of documentation for listed item (no photocopy, etc.);
(2) Contributor's name omitted;
(3) Mailing address omitted;
(4) Contributor's signature omitted;
(5) Cash contribution of $100 or less not supported by signed contributor card;
(6) Need for additional documentation to prove contribution was made with personal funds.

Since these are possibly otherwise matchable contributions, such items are returned to the committee with a request for further information.

2. Review of candidate's master list

A complete review is also made of the alphabetical list submitted by the candidate's committee. The same criteria are applied to the master list as are applied to the supporting documentation. In addition, the list is examined to insure that the computer program permits the proper aggregation of multiple contributions made by an individual.

3. Correlation

A. Use of sampling

Sampling procedures have been used to assure that each item on the master list is backed up by an appropriate document verifying the information on the alphabetical list. Any presentation which shows an excessive error rate (over 3%) is returned to the committee for further preparation.

B. Reductions in payment

If the error rate is found not to be excessive, a calculation of the dollar range of probable error in the candidate's total request is made. That amount is then deducted from the final amount payable to the committee. The committee is given the choice of accepting the reduced amount without recourse, or withdrawing the entire presentation for later resubmission. (This percentage reduction takes place after any non-matchable payments have been deducted.)

V. PRESENT STATUS

The Commission believes that it has developed and implemented certification processing techniques which provide a practical method of making an accurate calculation of the amounts of matching funds due presidential candidates. These techniques, developed during a six-month dialogue between the candidates, their committees, and the Commission, represent a body of new knowledge in this first application of federal matching fund payments to federal candidates.

Mr. HARRIS. I think in my oral presentation, I can skip a good deal of it inasmuch as the ground was covered this morning.

Picking up my statement on the bottom of page 2, I state:

The powers of the Commission which will lapse if the Commission is not reestablished include the responsibilities for (1) certifying matching funds for Presidential elections and convention financing; (2) writing regulations subject to congressional review; (3) giving advisory opinions; (4) investigating complaints—and I would like to stop there and make a correction.

That investigative responsibility would not lapse entirely. Mr. Scalia was correct. I think that the Commission would continue to have the investigative function of the sort that the prior supervisory officials had, plus perhaps the power of subpena, but at some point the investigation would have to culminate either in our closing a file or referring it to Justice. I think we could not take any action ourselves unless reestablished as a consequence of the investigation.

The present statute puts considerable emphasis on voluntary compliance even in the case of compliance actions and on some conciliation and the Commission is to refer the matter to Justice or bring a civil suit only if it is able to obtain satisfactory voluntary compliance or conciliation. That role would terminate, I think, if the decision—if the Commission is not reconstituted.

And certainly, item 5, initiating civil suits in appropriate cases.

While it is the Commission's authority to certify Presidential matching funds which have received widest notice in the press, we submit that the Commission's interpretive informational and other functions, are of equal if not greater importance.

Thousands of persons throughout the Nation rely upon the Commission's regulations and advisory opinions for guidance with respect to complying with the complicated election law.

We are daily in communication with national, State and local parties, hundreds of multi-candidate committees, and thousands of candidates and their authorized committees. But the Court said that these important responsibilities—it said:

> Functions with respect to the Commission's task of fleshing out the statute—rulemaking and advisory opinions; and functions necessary to insure compliance with the statute and rules—informal procedures, administrative determinations and hearings and civil suits,

All of these the Court said are:

> Improperly reposed with the Commission as presently constituted.

The Commission's activities to date illustrate why the Congress saw the need for such an agency. The Commission has received almost 300 advisory opinion requests and thousands of additional requests for clarification of the law. Approximately 200 formal opinions have been issued by the Commission thus far and they have been widely disseminated through a variety of outlets.

Further, the Commission has transmitted to Congress for approval six separate sets of regulations to clarify the responsibilities of those subject to the act. In the area of reporting and disclosure, the Commission has attempted, wherever possible, to ease the reporting burdens of the candidates and committees without compromising public interest in the fullest possible disclosure of relevant campaign financing data.

To date, the Commission has certified for disbursement to the national parties $1,200,000 in convention financing funds. Under an audit and review procedure painstakingly established over the last 8 months, the Commission has certified 12 Presidential candidates as eligible for Presidential matching funds.

One additional Presidential candidate may be certified today and another in the near future.

Senator PELL. Who would be the one tomorrow? Who will be the one tomorrow?

Mr. HARRIS. Mrs. McCormack is before the Commission tomorrow I believe.

Senator PELL. Thank you.

Mr. HARRIS. I think Senator Clark is the one down the road—Church, not Clark but Church.

Since January 1, the Commission has certified Treasury disbursement of over $7 million in matching funds to these candidates. The second of the two appendixes attached to the statement sets out in detail the functions the Commission has to discharge and in discharging this matching procedure and establishing the initial eligibility and thereafter the check—the funds for eligibility for matching. That appendix was put in of course to give the committee a basis for judging the feasibility of transfering that operation elsewhere on a temporary basis.

We agree with Mr. Hughes that that is not at all a viable alternative. It would of course be possible to put it in some other agency permanently but I think examination of the procedures and volume of work involved will convince you that it really is not feasible to transfer it elsewhere just as a temporary emergency measure.

The Commission is continuing to review and certify requests for matching funds during the month of February on an expedited basis. We are continuing to respond to many requests for clarification of the meaning of the law and guidance as how best to comply with it. We are reviewing all previously issued opinions in light of the Supreme Court decision and are in the process of notifying persons who received these opinions of any revisions occasioned by the Court's conclusions.

Similarly, we are redrafting our proposed regulations in order to bring them in conformity with the Supreme Court's determination.

If the Commission is reestablished it would be the disposition of its present Commissioners to resubmit these regulations in revised form. We also had in process a regulation dealing with compliance procedures and we contemplate overhauling that very completely and conducting public hearings on the whole subject before going forward with it.

Two of the three bills presently being considered by this committee; namely, S. 2911 and S. 2912 would provide for a Presidentially appointed Commission to fulfill the responsibilities which Congress originally conferred upon this Commission.

These two bills would reestablish the Commission with six voting members appointed by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate. No more than three members could be appointed from any one party. The Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House would serve as ex officio members, as they do now.

This morning strong exception to this appointment as ex officio members was taken by Mr. Scalia. I would like to comment on the validity of his legal objections. The court did not really deal with them at all. I will say though that I think that we have found the representation of the Senate and the House with respect to the Secretary and the Clerk to be helpful. They have served in consultative functions, a liaison function and I am sure that all of the Commissioners would agree with me that we have found their service helpful rather than otherwise.

If the Congress wishes to preserve the reforms embodied in the 1974 Campaign Act we believe an independent agency is necessary for their proper implementation. Both of these two bills would achieve this end. We note the particular importance of provisions contained in S. 2912 which would assure an orderly transition should the Commission be reestablished.

In addition to that bill, S. 2912 provides for both primary and general election public financing for senatorial candidates. The Commission takes no position on the merits of the public financing proposal. We would note, however, that this proposed expansion of the public financing function would require substantial increases in the Commission's staff and budget. And, of course, if it were extended to cover the House races I would think that a general appropriation would be necessary to meet that additional expense.

The third bill before your committee is S. 2918. It amends subchapter (h) of title 26, United States Code to transfer the administration of public financing from the Federal Election Commission to the General Accounting Office until April 30, 1976.

In our prepared statement we have spelled out a number of reasons why we think that this is not a viable alternative. Since that information is detailed there and in the appendix and since that grant has been covered by Mr. Hughes I would—we will skip that unless the committee has some questions about it.

Apart from the problems and the length of time it might take the Accounting Office to establish matching fund procedures, we would also call attention to the fact that that bill would not take care of the numerous additional needs of the political process which the Commission is now hopefully discharging, the problem of having a Commission so deeply immersed in the process available on a day-to-day basis to give advice to the many people who ask for it. We hope these comments will prove useful to the committee.

We thank you for this opportunity to appear and we will be glad to undertake any questions.

Senator PELL. Thank you.

We will get started with the questioning and then we have to recess and go over and vote and come back, but a critical matter before Congress is the need to provide for the ongoing certification of public matching funds for Presidential primaries occurring today, and I was wondering if you would give us a short explanation of how your certification process will work between now and February 29.

Mr. HARRIS. We are going ahead to certify on an expedited basis and the staff has been working day and night to check the submissions and to prepare the documents for submission to the Commission. We have been certifying weekly since the court decision instead of the former two weekly basis. We will try to clear as much out of the pipeline as we could before the 29th. We have in fact been contemplating meeting on the 28th and 29th which is Saturday or Sunday. We do not know how that would sit with the Treasury but we do intend to try to clear up as much backlog as possible. We have some $2.5 million pending submissions and how much of that we can clear before the end of the month I do not know but we will do our best.

Senator PELL. If most of the matching funds were certified by February 29 would there be any great disruption if Congress were not able to act until the middle of March?

Mr. HARRIS. Well, I think you are probably as well able to answer that Senator, as I am. Some of the candidates apparently are pretty short and they are proceeding on a day-to-day basis. Some of them in particular apparently have regarded it even a few days delay as presenting them with some problems.

Senator PELL. But the Commission in any case would not be sent out by the Treasury until later in March, is that correct?

Mr. HARRIS. Perhaps—Mr. Potter, how long does it take them?

Mr. POTTER. Checks are sent out in a matter of 24 hours, I believe, from our certification.

I think the point should be made that the submissions now before us—$2.5 million are but one small increment in the process. Some of the candidates are in the process of making their fifth submission to us. Others are only on their second. They keep coming in and they collect money for matching and they keep presenting it to us, so we have no way of knowing that they are in fact going ahead. We surmise there is a good deal left to come.

Senator PELL. In other words, all of the funds you have certified as of February 29 would probably be distributed within a couple of days—mailed within a couple of days?

Mr. POTTER. Yes.

Senator PELL. Can you see the Commission making a request to the court for an extended stay of its order?

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Scalia was asked that this morning and he indicated that they probably would do so if it appeared the Congress was moving and that there was a reasonable basis for applying to the court. The Commission would certainly be disposed to do so but we would enjoy being joined by the Attorney General. I have no doubt it would be more persuasive.

Senator PELL. The subcommittee will recess for a few minutes while the Members go over and vote and be back in about 10 minutes.

[Brief recess.]

Senator PELL. The subcommittee will come to order.

Mr. Harris and Ms. Aikens, if the Commission were not reconstituted what would be the extent of its power after February 29? In other words, could you make audits, field investigations——

Mr. HARRIS. Well, that question is addressed by the Supreme Court on page 131 of its opinion. It divided the functions of the Commission into three parts and specified which could be exercised and which could not. The three categories, the first function is relating to the flow of necessary information, receipt of, dissemination and investigation. That is the filing and disclosure and publicity function which they say the Commission could continue to carry on. Functions with respect to the Commission's task fleshing out the statute, rulemaking and advisory opinions. Those as they say the Commission could not carry on. The function necessary to insure compliance with the statute and rules, informal procedures, administration determination and hearings on civil suits. Those they say cannot be carried on unless the Commission were reconstituted.

In addition to those functions there is one—the clearinghouse function established in 438(a) of the act to which the Court does not refer but which seems clearly constitutional, that is 438(b). That is the function of serving as a national clearinghouse for information in respect to the administration of elections, letting out contracts, and conducting studies and research on various matters relating to the elections. That was formerly done by the General Acounting Office and I guess——

Senator PELL. In other words, could your General Counsel continue to issue informal opinions?

Mr. HARRIS. Well, I think we could carry on what they call our informational functions, that is we could answer inquiries of a nontechnical nature that do not really involve any complicated construction of the statute but I take it that our advisory opinion function would be out and the opinion of the counsel function would be out. Anything beyond informational, I think we could not do after the 29th.

Senator PELL. How many requests for advisory opinions have you received, roughly?

Mr. HARRIS. Jack, could you——

Mr. MURPHY. Approximately 300.

Senator PELL. How many have you answered?

Mr. MURPHY. We have answered approximately 100 advisory opinion forms. Many of those advisory opinion requests however have been changed in designation to either opinion of counsel or to a simple request to which an informational response can be given by another section of the Commission.

The total output of the Commission in terms of opinions in which we look at some of the tougher issues arising under the act is approaching 200 and we are, in my judgment, rapidly eliminating the backlog of inquiries requiring very careful analysis, and, of course, as you well know, this act left many questions unanswered and we sought to supply those answers where we could.

With the advent of the election year, of course the questions continue to come in at an accelerated rate but our opinion production has also accelerated and I am confident we can meet the needs of the inquiring parties.

Senator PELL. I would mention here in a personal vein I asked for an advisory opinion in connection with charitable gifts on October 22, 1975, and have yet to receive an opinion or reaction on it.

Mr. MURPHY. I will check on that.

Senator PELL. Presumably this is not unique but that is October, November, December, January, February—about 4 months and with the staff of lawyers and the regulations that have been interpreted I would think that greater attention should have been given so that we could get our advisory opinions more quickly. The staff, as you know, as has been pointed out to the Congress, is substantial and I think a 4-month delay for an individual Senator to get a reply back is too long.

Mr. MURPHY. I will assure the Senator that I will check on that the first thing when I return to my office this afternoon.

If the question had to do with the tax issue, it is highly possible that that matter was referred to IRS.

Senator PELL. Nothing to do with taxes. It had to do with charitable gifts and whether they should be included in the amount of funds that will be counted against your total.

Mr. MURPHY. We have a number of questions which are even more senior than that one and I think I speak for the Commission when I say we regret the delays but the Senator will understand that some of these issues are extraordinarily sensitive and the Commission has cautioned me to proceed with great care lest we issue views that prove to be ill-advised. I will certainly check on this inquiry personally but, in general, delays have been occasioned by the vast work effort we have been under and I regret to note a number of inquiries have gone unanswered for protracted periods and, as I say, we are eliminating that backlog but it is a backlog which we have to live with.

Senator PELL. What would you think is the average delay? Mine is 4 months. What would be the average?

Mr. MURPHY. It is very difficult to say because we had so many when we started. There were approximately 100 inquiries when I was appointed on May 1 and we have answered many of those; and, of course, although there are a few that may go back as early as June which pose questions of such difficulty or involve such policy determinations that the Commission has been unable to resolve them to this date and there is no way of averaging because we are looking at a startup period during which we faced a backlog—at the outset of which we faced a backlog.

We expect, I should tell you, to have an average turnaround time on opinions of 4 to 5 weeks and I hope that process will be in place within the next 6 weeks.

Senator PELL. Provided you are in place.

Mr. MURPHY. Yes, sir.

Senator PELL. Does the Commission provide legal advice to those people who do not have legal standing to request advisory opinions?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes, sir, we have. We have supplied opinions of counsel to persons other than the candidates, committees or incumbents who are given standing for advisory opinions under 437(f) of the title.

The opinion of counsel has been a handy vehicle for supplying persons with information that they might not otherwise receive. We also have of course an even more informal information function through the circulation of brochures and through seminars and a lot of telephonic communication.

Mr. HARRIS. The statute provides for advisory opinion only by an individual holding Federal office, a candidate for a Federal office or a political committee. It seemed to us that anyone who was covered by this statute might be in violation should have the same standing. The statute does not read that way so all we can do is give them an opinion of counsel.

Senator PELL. What forms of advice does the Commission offer—what other forms of written opinions, verbal opinions, or informal opinions?

Mr. HARRIS. We will not give a verbal opinion except on something very simple and clearcut like—what form do we fill out or when is the next filing date or something like that. Apart from that the most formal would be an advisory opinion, then an opinion of counsel, then we have a lot of routine letters that simply go out of the information section.

We also put out a good many publications. We have a simplified version of the statute. We put out a weekly publication. We have a lot of general informational stuff, thus far.

Senator PELL. Do you believe that it is important that we have a separate Federal Election Commission this way? Do you believe that the function could be carried on by the Department of Justice and General Accounting Office?

Mr. HARRIS. Well, I think we reason that the Commission was created at the time it was dissatisfaction with enforcement by the Department of Justice over the years. The Department was probably faced with the problem that it would have to proceed with indictments, criminal prosecution, or else do nothing. I think that some kind of civil enforcement, particularly in the case of the innumerable inadvertent filing violations is desirable. There needs to be some agency that can oversee compliance with the filing requirements and with the complexities of the law and bring some corrective to bear short of a criminal prosecution.

If you look at the annotation to the United States Code under the provisions of the Election Act which the Department of Justice has been administering, it is evident that they have been very few and far between and since there was no civil enforcement agency this means not much enforcement.

I do think that is a sound idea, to have an independent Commission that would be on this civil enforcement function.

Senator PELL. Has the Commission determined which of its advisory opinions are no longer valid because of the Supreme Court's opinion? Have you been able to go through the opinions you have made to determine which ones of them have been invalidated by the Supreme Court decision?

Mr. HARRIS. Yes.

Mr. MURPHY. That was done immediately, Mr. Chairman, and we have communicated or are in the process of communicating with all persons who have received those opinions to indicate where modification of the Commission's views is occasioned by the Court's holding. Once that is done we plan to publish in the Federal Register and otherwise distribute a general statement reviewing the modifications of all of the opinions issued heretofore so that in one place any person who has been reading the opinions will have the amendments set forth and can read the previous opinions in light of those amendments.

Senator PELL. Will this be done in the next week or so?

Mr. MURPHY. I am not certain it will be done in the next week, but it will be done by the end of the month.

Senator PELL. So then a list of the opinions that have been invalidated will be made available to the public at one place?

Mr. MURPHY. That is correct.

Senator PELL. Thank you.

Senator Griffin?

Senator GRIFFIN. If you had a request for an advisory opinion that started out: "We request you provide us with an opinion of whether or not the contributions hereafter described will be charged to campaign limitation" in light of the Supreme Court decision, that would be pretty easy to answer now, would it not?

Mr. MURPHY. The question involved contribution limitations which will remain in force.

Senator GRIFFIN. I see, but isn't this an expenditure?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes.

Senator GRIFFIN. The question does relate actually to charged to campaign expenditure limitations. That is whether or not certain charitable contributions would be charged against the expenditure limitation of the candidate. I understand in the Supreme Court decision there would not be any question about that.

Mr. MURPHY. Except for publicly financed campaigns. Of course, there is no expenditure limitation.

Senator GRIFFIN. That would be a Presidential campaign?

Mr. MURPHY. That would be correct.

We have identified—we immediately identified six pending advisory opinion requests which were utterly obviated by the Supreme Court opinion; but the typical request involved several issues, not just one, and will have to be therefore partially answered by analysis by the Commission and partially answered by a statement that the Court's opinion——

Senator GRIFFIN. Are you continuing to issue advisory opinions even though the Supreme Court says you are not constitutionally able to do that?

Mr. MURPHY. The Commission decided to suspend its advisory opinion function pending a determination by Congress as to what its status should be. I am, however, continuing to issue opinions of counsel.

Senator GRIFFIN. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator PELL. Senator Cannon.

Senator CANNON. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Have you had the opportunity to analyze the proposal that was made by Congressman Hayes today?

Mr. HARRIS. I read it about 2 minutes ago, Senator.

Senator CANNON. I note you have a press release there. I will skim through some of it briefly.

Among other things he, of course, proposes the continuance of the Commission to provide for Presidential appointments, and that all matters arising out of or relating to the regulation of political campaigns shall be within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Commission.

I presume that you would not argue with that.

Another one would prohibit the Commission from making investigations on the basis of anonymous complaints, and would require the Commission to attempt to reach a conciliation agreement before civil or criminal proceeding may be initiated.

He has also suggested that the Commission propose advisory opinions of general applicability as rules; and a majority vote of all members before authorizing investigations, civil proceedings, or referrals to the Justice Department.

He would propose putting a yearly limit of $1,000 on individual contributions to a political committee; and limiting contributions by political committees to contributions of $5,000 annually to other political committees.

He suggests full reports and disclosure of independent expenditures, including clear statements on communication of the name of the person who made or financed such an expenditure.

He also has proposed that corporations and political committees be prohibited from soliciting employees who are union members, and that an employee be permitted to make a voluntary checkoff in favor of a union political committee, if a corporation provides such a system for its political committee. That is sort of a rough sketch of what Congressman Hayes has proposed, and a number of these items are items that I know have been under discussion at the Commission and in the Senate.

I wonder if therefore you would want to comment or feel you are able to comment on any of these at the present time.

Mr. HARRIS. What we have here is simply a press release. I would think that it would be inappropriate for the Commission or the individual Commissioners to comment in the substantive proposal, in any event. It would, of course, be proper for us to comment, I think, on those that go to the administration of the act, but the Commission obviously has not seen those or taken any position on them.

I could give you a personal reaction to some of them and perhaps Commissioner Aikens could, too.

For example, the provision that a major vote of the entire Commission would be necessary to authorize investigations. That prevails now under the procedures which we have adopted. That is our internal rules—rules of internal procedure which are required before starting an investigation.

Senator CANNON. Has that been in effect for some time?

Mr. HARRIS. Yes; it has been in effect at all times—since August, at least. The anonymous complaints, I know, is a touchy issue. It is my personal feeling that an agency which has investigative authority must be able at least to look at anonymous complaints and, if they seem detailed with circumstances and something that can be easily checked out that they ought to take a look.

Certainly they better find something before going very far with such an investigation; but it is my personal view that they should not be ruled out entirely as a basis of proceeding. Maybe some of the other Commissioners do not agree with that.

I think an awful lot of wrongdoing has been encouraged where the investigation started simply on the basis of an anonymous complaint and the distinction should be drawn between starting an investigation and how far you go with it on that basis.

Senator CANNON. Well, you are, of course, aware of the case that this comes out of? Let me ask, what was the outcome? Did the Commission get its fingers burnt on that?

Mr. HARRIS. I do not think that the investigation has ever been finally concluded. I think very likely that it will turn out that there was nothing to the charge but it was exceedingly specific, naming people that this item or that could be checked with, banks that this item or that could be checked with. It was not just some kind of general shotgun allegation.

Senator CANNON. I missed your opening testimony and I do not know whether you commented on the issue.

Mr. HARRIS. Senator, if I might, could I hand you a letter which Chairman Curtis sent to Mr. Hayes which in effect dealt with the matter about which you were just inquiring?

Senator CANNON. Thank you.

In your testimony you discuss the question of the possibility of financing congressional races.

Mr. HARRIS. No. I simply state that the Commission took no position on public financing. Obviously, we would need some more staff if we had to get into a particular matching fund operation which is very—which does take a lot of staff.

Senator CANNON. Incidentally, what is the situation now with respect to all of the Presidential candidates? Have all the known candidates qualified so far?

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Potter, do you want to address that? I think we have two candidates who generally are considered to be in the field but not yet qualified, Mrs. McCormack and Senator Church. I think we are expecting a submission with regard to Mrs. McCormack tomorrow. I do not know where Senator Church stands.

Mr. POTTER. We have qualified 12 candidates already and funds totaling $7.7 million have been certified to those 12 candidates.

Senator CANNON. What is the current status of the fund? How much money is there now pending?

Mr. MURPHY. There was $62 million back in December. That is my recollection, Senator. They anticipate another $1 million in January, $2 million in February, $7 million in March and $20 or $22 million in April. That was a conservative estimate from the Department of the Treasury.

We hear this morning that the early returns suggest that the percentage of people checking off has increased by 2 percent over the last year, which would suggest the amount in the Treasury would far exceed the estimate that I have just given you.

At this time, we do not anticipate any problem with the adequacy of the funds available for primary matching. There is a question of which you may be aware as to whether or not, if the primary funds which come out of one of the three funds were exhausted, whether Treasury could dip into the general election fund or into the congressional financing convention fund to borrow money pending the arrival of the April returns to assure there was adequate money for continued primary financing.

There was a division of opinion within Treasury about this.

We have argued that they should consider borrowing if that becomes a necessity but we do not think the reality will arise. Our assessment of the financial situation is that sufficient money is available to meet the needs of the candidates on an ongoing basis without any fiddling with funds within the Department of the Treasury.

Senator CANNON. Do you have any estimate now as to the total amount of the funds that will be used in the primary and matching formula, and also, the total amount of the general fund?

Mr. MURPHY. No, sir.

Of course, with 12 candidates qualified, the potential there for disbursements of $60 million, since each candidate would have theoretically a right of up to $5 million, and to date we have disbursed $7.7 million or whatever, something in that range; two candidates have dropped out as the Commissioner has pointed out. There simply is no way of projecting what the demand will be because obviously with the primary process, there will be some candidacies rising and some falling, and that, of course, will have an effect on their contributions and the amount of money they can put in for matching.

Senator GRIFFIN. What happens when a candidate drops out as far as the money is concerned that has already been provided to him?

Mr. MURPHY. We have provided in the regulations, pursuant to title 26, that the money which is given to candidates on a matching basis may be used only for what are called qualified campaign expenses. That is a phrase of art which appears in the statute.

It is my view that money expended to date for such expenditures was properly expended, and the candidate who drops, for whatever reason would be under no obligation to repay. He has under the statute a right to retain an unexpended disbursement for a period of up to 6 months after the election to wind up his costs. We have not reached any analysis as to whether or not an early termination date should apply where a candidate has dropped out far ahead of the terminal point of the primary process, but in any event, the act provides for repayment provisions by an equitable formula.

You take the amount of funds contributed on a private basis and the amount of moneys disbursed by the Treasury and see what ratio they bear to one another.

You will see then what, at the end of the campaign and windup stage, the candidate has in his account at that time; and you apply the ratio to that balance, and repayment is occasioned pursuant to the ratio. That is an awkward way of putting what the act puts more elegantly.

Senator GRIFFIN. Is there a requirement for repayment?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes, sir.

Senator GRIFFIN. Do you suggest any need for revision or change in that as long as we are now looking at the act again?

Mr. MURPHY. I am unprepared——

Senator GRIFFIN. It might be something that you would want to give some thought to, to make a submission.

Mr. MURPHY. Yes, sir.

Senator GRIFFEN. Thank you. I am sorry.

Senator CANNON. So that in any event, then, there is no possibility of a candidate not being liable for repayment of all unused funds that he got through the Government source as a matching source.

Mr. MURPHY. I think that is a proper statement, Senator. Repayment of all of the moneys left over. I think that is a correct way of characterizing it.

Senator CANNON. I wish you would check that and see, because if there is not that obligation, I think we would want to make absolutely sure that it does exist—a candidate could not retain matching funds that he received from the Government, and simply because he had not used all of that amount.

Mr. MURPHY. Yes, sir. That was the clear thrust of the statutory language.

Senator CANNON. That was our intent, I know, when we drafted it; but if there is any loophole in it, I think we ought to know so we can correct it; and if you feel from the legal standpoint that under any circumstances that a candidate could conceivably not be required to repay some of that money that he did not use, then we would like to know about it at this time and do something.

Mr. MURPHY. I want to make sure that the record is clear that that is not my view. I hesitated in responding to you because I though you might be suggesting repayment of all moneys therefore paid out and not repayment of just the moneys left over. Obviously there is a repayment necessitated with respect to moneys left over.

Senator CANNON. Thank you.

Mr. HARRIS. I think both of the candidates who have gone on inactive status so far have leaned over backward to avoid any problem of that sort. In neither case did they totally withdraw; but I know that Governor Sanford called up and asked us to stop payment immediately; and I believe that Senator Bentsen did the same.

Senator PELL. Senator Clark has an amendment on the floor and asked me to ask you these questions in his behalf.

There being some controversy over FEC actions undertaken on the basis of unassigned complaints, does the FEC now have the authority, and should it have the authority, if it does not, to undertake investigation under its own initiative? And would not any enforcement agency that did not have this authority be hopelessly handicapped?

Mr. HARRIS. To some extent I have answered that already. The statute is certainly clear that the Commission is to proceed on any of three bases:

One, upon receiving a complaint. Now, there our procedures do require a notarized written complaint. Second, on the basis of any referral from the Clerk of the House to the Secretary of the Senate; or, third, if it has reason to believe.

Now, under that last category, I would think we would justify instituting an inquiry even upon the basis of a newspaper story if we read in the newspaper that someone has confessed to a criminal violation within the last 3 years. I would think that under that alone, it would be enough for us to take a look, and we have proceeded on that basis.

Senator PELL. Based upon your experience, what kind of shape would the various Senate or House campaigns be in if you lose your authority on February 29; and more importantly, what would be the condition of those campaigns next April or May if there is no one around to issue regulations or advisory opinions?

Mr. HARRIS. I think the candidates and their committees have openly welcomed the opportunity to get a day-by-day advisory on the meaning of the act, on how to comply with the filing requirements. There has been a very steady flow of requests for information. I think they would be seriously inconvenienced and perhaps even put in jeopardy without that.

The candidates and their committees, I may say, have been very cooperative and anxious to avoid a violation insofar as our experience has gone. We have found that all of the Presidential candidates are extremely cooperative and meticulous as to how their books should be kept; as to what kind of reports should be filed; that sort of thing.

Senator PELL. Thank you. Any other questions?

[No response.]

Senator PELL. Thank you very much indeed for being with us and for your presentation, and we hope to get legislation out in time to be of help to you, and we will do our best.

Ms. AIKENS. Thank you, sir.

Senator PELL. Our next witness is Mr. Fred Wertheimer of Common Cause.

STATEMENT OF FRED WERTHEIMER, VICE PRESIDENT OF OPERATIONS, COMMON CAUSE, ACCOMPANIED BY JACK MOSKOWITZ, LOBBYIST

Mr. WERTHEIMER. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I am accompanied by Mr. Jack Moskowitz, a lobbyist with Common Cause.

I have a prepared statement that I would like to submit for the record and deliver a brief portion of it now.

Senator PELL. Without objection, your statement will be inserted in the record. You may proceed.

[The written statement of Mr. Wertheimer follows:]

STATEMENT OF FRED WERTHEIMER, VICE PRESIDENT OF OPERATIONS, COMMON CAUSE

Mr. Chairman, I want to thank you and the other members of this committee for the opportunity to testify today. Common Cause believes that Congress must act promptly to reconstitute the Federal Election Commission. We believe that any temporary half measures are unnecessary and unacceptable to the goal of effective administration and enforcement of campaign finance laws. We strongly oppose any efforts to put a short term limit on the life of the Commission, which has only been in operation since April 1975.

We also strongly oppose the President's recommendation to Congress on Monday that all of the federal campaign finance laws in this country be terminated following the 1976 elections, to ensure their full scale review. We do not believe this represents a constructive proposal designed to assure meaningful review of campaign finance laws in the next Congress. Rather we believe it sets the stage for killing vital legislation which in many respects has not yet even had the opportunity to be tested in one national election. Termination is totally unnecessary. Congress always has the right to modify and review this legislation.

The Supreme Court's opinion in Buckley v. Valeo made it clear that there is no constitutional problem with a Federal Election Commission whose members are appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate in accord with the Appointments clause of the Constitution. The Supreme Court practically invited Congress to enact a statute to re-create the FEC in this manner. In granting a 30-day stay of its judgment with regard to the FEC, the Supreme Court explained: "This limited stay will afford Congress an opportunity to reconstitute the Commission by law or to adopt other valid enforcement mechanisms without interrupting enforcement of the provisions the Court sustains (slip opinion at 136).

As suggested by the Court, the constitutional deficiencies of the Federal Election Commission are easily rectified. Common Cause urges Congress to enact a bill to provide for appointment of the six members of the FEC by the President subject to Senate confirmation. The President has said that he supports such a legislative approach.

This concept is not new. In both 1973 and 1974, the Senate passed campaign reform bills that established independent election commissions with all of their members appointed by the President.

The Supreme Court has made it clear that there is no need to return to the old, corrupt system of campaign financing that was dominated by abuses of big money and excessive secrecy. The Court upheld the essentials of campaign finance reform—disclosure, contribution limits, and public financing—and established a foundation on which to build a constitutional Federal Election Commission. But the FEC is essential. This country's previous experience with campaign financing legislation demonstrates that without enforcement these laws become meaningless shells.

Much of what has been done to clean up our election process will ultimately be undone if the Federal Election Commission is not re-created. Failure to re-create the FEC will be an invitation to return to the corruption of the Watergate days and before.

An overwhelming number of members of Congress voted for the Federal Election Commission in 1974. If Congress fails to re-create the FEC, the public will have to read its failure to act in only one way—that Congress is not serious about ridding our electoral system of corruption. The crisis of confidence in government sparked by Vietnam and Watergate has continued to grow in the post-Watergate years. Our system of representative government should not be asked to bear the burden of another demonstration of unwillingness or inability to act on the nation's problems. Millions of citizens have demonstrated their commitment to a new way of financing elections in America by providing $1 each for the Presidential Election Campaign Fund. It would be inexcusable to fail to establish a mechanism adequate to oversee the first Presidential election paid for by their tax dollars.

Prompt re-creation of the Federal Election Commission will serve three important national interests:

(1) It will demonstrate that Congress recognizes that public confidence and meaningful enforcement depend on independent enforcement of campaign finance laws.

(2) It will prevent any interruption in disbursal of public matching funds to Presidential candidates.

(3) It will insure a continuity in the enforcement of the law and guard against arbitrary and selective enforcement.

The Need for Independent Enforcement

Common Cause has repeatedly stated that an independent federal election commission is absolutely essential to any effective system of campaign financing legislation. The long history of almost total non-enforcement of campaign financing laws in this country is well known and well documented. This abysmal record of non-enforcement was a major underlying cause of the Watergate and other campaign financing scandals that have shaken this nation in recent years. It is hardly surprising to find candidates and their agents ignoring or circumventing the law when history would give them every assurance that their violations would go unpunished. It is hardly surprising to find that citizens have become gravely disillusioned by such a process.

The highlights of the record on non-enforcement are as powerful today as they were in 1974 when Congress first created the Federal Election Commission. The first campaign financing legislation enacted in this country was the Tillman Act of 1907, which prohibited national banks and corporations from making any expenditure in connection with any election to public office (34 Stat. 814). In 1911, the Tillman Act was amended to require Senators and Representatives and political committees to file reports of receipts and expenditures before and after elections (37 Stat. 25). The first prosecution was not brought until nine years after passage of the original Act.

The Federal Corrupt Practices Act of 1925 required candidates for federal office and political committees to file contribution and expenditure reports with the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House (43 Stat. 1070). A person who failed to comply was subject to criminal sanctions. In its 47 years of existence, almost no prosecutions were brought under the 1925 Act. Responsible officials shirked their duties. In 1954, Attorney General Herbert Brownell issued an order addressed to U.S. Attorneys that took the position that the Department of Justice would not act in the absence of a request from the Clerk of the House or the Secretary of the Senate. During this period, the Clerk took the position that his duty was to receive the reports but not to make referrals to the Department of Justice.

In Buckley v. Valeo, the U.S. District Court found, "The Secretary of the Senate, the Clerk of the House and the Department of Justice have largely failed to enforce prior campaign financing practices legislation." Buckley v. Valeo, Jt. Appendix (Vol. II—part A), Dist. Court Finding 139.

No one seriously questions the fact that the history of campaign finance laws in this country is a history of non-enforcement. It is equally clear that absent effective oversight and enforcement, campaign finance laws will not work.

The Federal Election Commission was created to fill a 70-year vacuum. Its reconstitution with strong enforcement powers is essential to making our new campaign financing laws a reality and not an illusion. Any retreat from independent enforcement can only serve to further erode public confidence.

The Need for Disbursal of Public Funds to Presidential Candidates

In upholding the public financing provisions of the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971 as amended in 1974, the Supreme Court found: "Congress was legislating for the 'General welfare'—to reduce the deleterious influence of large contributions on our political process, to facilitate communication by candidates with the electorate, and to free candidates from the rigors of fundraising (slip opinion, at 85)."

The Federal Election Commission has established and implemented a system of certification of Presidential candidates and disbursement of public matching funds. These candidates have based their campaigns on the availability of public financing. Their ability to communicate with the voters and the other values noted by the Court is at stake.

It is essential that the system of disbursement that is now in place not be replaced or interrupted. By the same token, the need for action on the certification powers cannot be allowed to serve as a convenient excuse for gutting the Federal Election Commission. Common Cause strongly opposes any effort—whether temporary or permanent—to replace the existing certification mechanism. The "take-the-money-and-run" proposal to give the General Accounting Office "temporary" responsibility is unworkable and unacceptable. It would also set the stage for a refusal to deal with the issue of reconstituting the Commission with enforcement powers. The Comptroller General has opposed this shortsighted scheme in a letter to the Democratic and Republican leadership in both Houses.

The Comptroller General has pointed out: ". . . we have no budget to undertake this assignment. Moreover, we are not familiar with the procedures of the Commission as to how it has carried out its auditing and investigations preparatory to certification. As you can well appreciate, I would not want to certify payments without firsthand knowledge on my part to assure eligibility of candidates for the funds requested . . . transfer of the responsibility to this Office would be disruptive to the program to say the least and would place upon this Office a responsibility that it is inadequately prepared to take (emphasis added)."

There is no conceivable justification for Congress to make a sudden shift of this $100 million program from an agency that is prepared to handle it to one that is not.

The Need to Insure a Continuity of Enforcement

Holding the 1976 federal elections without the Federal Election Commission is like playing baseball without an umpire or football without a referee. It is an invitation for chaos. The interests of all participants in the upcoming federal elections are best served by uniform, rather than ad hoc administration. The Supreme Court granted its 30-day stay of its judgment with regard to the FEC because of the obvious public interest in not interrupting the continuity of enforcement.

The Commission to date furthermore has been forced to operate on inadequate interim funding. Its initial authorization expired in June 1975 and has never been renewed. Despite the fact that both the House and Senate passed 18-month authorization bills in June, 1975, no conference has ever been held during the last eight months to work out the differences between the two bills and enact the Commission's authorization into law.

The Commission has recently stated that based on its operating experience it would need approximately $9 million for the 18-month period ending on December 31, 1976. This is a small price to pay for honest national elections.

We urge that in reconstituting the Commission, Congress also provide an adequate authorization to assure that the Commission has the funds needed to carry out its responsibilities.

* * * * * * *

It is time for Congress to do what the Senate has already done on several occasions—to pass a bill creating a properly constituted Federal Election Commission. Nothing less will solve the problem. Attempts to delay or switch authority temporarily will invite chaos, confusion, and corruption. We do not believe that the public will accept this. Nor will they fail to understand how easily it could have been avoided.

Mr. WERTHEIMER. Mr. Chairman, we want to thank you and the other members of this committee for the opportunity to testify today. We believe that Congress must act promptly to reconstitute the Federal Election Commission. We believe that any temporary half measures are unnecessary and unacceptable to the goals of effective administration and enforcement of campaign finance laws.

We strongly oppose any efforts to put a short-term limit on the life of the Commission, which has only been in operation since April 1975.

We also strongly oppose the President's recommendation to Congress on Monday that all of the Federal campaign finance laws in this country be terminated following the 1976 elections, to insure their full-scale review.

We do not believe this approach is necessary or appropriate here. We think that review should take place without such a provision.

The Supreme Court's opinion in Buckley v. Valeo made it clear in our view that there is no constitutional problem with a Federal Election Commission whose members are appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate in accord with the appointments clause of the Constitution.

We believe the Supreme Court practically invited Congress to enact a statute to re-create the FEC in this manner.

In granting a 30-day stay of its judgment, the court explained, and I quote, "This limited stay will afford Congress an opportunity to reconstitute the Commission by law or to adopt other valid enforcement mechanisms without interrupting enforcement of the provisions the court sustains."

As suggested by the Court, the constitutional deficiencies of the Commission are easily rectified.

Now, we urge Congress to enact a bill to provide for appointment of the six members of the Federal Election Commission by the President, subject to Senate confirmation. This concept is not new, particularly not new to the Senate and in both 1973 and 1974, the Senate passed campaign reform bills that established independent election commissions with all of their members appointed by the President.

Much of what has been done to clean up our election process will ultimately be undone if the Federal Election Commission is not re-created. Failure to re-create the FEC will be an invitation to return to the corruption of the Watergate days and before.

Prompt re-creation of the Federal Election Commission will serve three important national interests.

It will demonstrate that Congress recognizes that public confidence and meaningful enforcement depend on independent enforcement of campaign finance laws.

It will prevent any interruption in dispersal of public matching funds to Presidential candidates.

It will insure a continuity in the enforcement of the law and guard against arbitrary and selective enforcement.

We have repeatedly urged that an independent Federal Election Commission is essential to any effective system of campaign finance legislation. A long history of almost total non-enforcement of campaign financing laws in this country is well known and well documented.

In Buckley v. Valeo, U.S. District Court found, "The Secretary of the Senate, the Clerk of the House, and the Department of Justice have largely failed to enforce prior campaign financing practices legislation."

I do not think anyone seriously questions the fact that the history of campaign finance laws in this country is a history of nonenforcement. And it is equally clear that, absent effective oversight and enforcement, campaign finance laws simply will not work.

We are also opposed and think it would be a serious error to replace the existing certification mechanism for public financing on an either temporary or permanent basis. That has been discussed here by the Comptroller General's representative and others. We do not think it would work. We do not think it would be effective, and it certainly could become a basis for failing to act to reconstitute the Commission.

I would just like one last point, Mr. Chairman.

The Commission to date has been forced to operate on inadequate interim funding. Its initial authorization expired in June 1975 and has never been renewed. Despite the fact both the House and Senate passed 18-month authorization bills in June 1975, no conference has ever been held during the last 8 months to work out the differences between the two bills and enact the Commission's authorization into law.

The Commission has recently stated that based on its operating expense, it would need approximately $9 million for the 18-month period ending on December 31, 1976. We think that is a small price to pay, and we urge that in reconstituting the Commission Congress also provide an adequate authorization to insure that the Commission has the funds it needs to carry out its job.

Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. We would be happy to answer any questions.

Senator PELL. Basically, the legislation before us you would support is S. 2912; correct?

M. WERTHEIMER. We would support that or any other bill which moves to reconstitute the Commission with enforcement powers.

Senator PELL. And also which includes public financing.

What, in your view, would be the cost of public financing for the Senate and House elections if they were added in a Presidential year?

Mr. WERTHEIMER. I think that really depends on what kind of provision the Congress passes. If it passes a full grant system, the cost would be substantially higher than if it passes a matching system. I think any proposal, any specific proposal, could be costed out if you assumed you were going to limit the amount of public funds that can be made available; and I would imagine that any proposal that does would have to come foward with and should come forward with the figures.

Senator PELL. Senator Griffin.

Senator GRIFFIN. I am not sure I understand. You favor what Senator Kennedy and Senator Scott are proposing, and that is to include in legislation that we are going to pass within the next 11 days, presumably, provision for public financing of Senate-House campaigns?

Mr. WERTHEIMER. Senator Griffin, we have always been on record in favor of congressional financing, and we continue to be in favor of such legislation.

Senator GRIFFIN. Do you think we should do that at this time for this election?

Mr. WERTHEIMER. We think if the Congress is capable of acting in this period of time that it should be done.

Senator GRIFFIN. For the 1976 elections?

Mr. WERTHEIMER. We think that could be done. I would think that there are clear cost limitations that apply if you are going to take the funding out of the dollar checkoff which might limit the amount of money one made available to congressional elections in this year, and that might be one form of limitation that would apply. We do not think that congressional financing should be enacted with respect to the primary elections in 1976.

Senator GRIFFIN. Does it not concern you that public financing in 1976 could be a windfall for those who have filed within the filing dates and that others who may have run on their own, had they known there was public financing available, did not so file?

Mr. WERTHEIMER. Well, I think a large part of that problem is dealt with really if you are just focusing on the general election. I would add that one of the reasons we have overwhelmingly supported congressional public financing is that we feel that it would be very helpful in increasing competition in the political system and I think that would certainly be the case in the congressional public financing passed here.

Senator GRIFFIN. I do not think you addressed yourself to one of the major concerns that has been expressed here about the Supreme Court decision. That is, the lifting of any limit whatsoever of what individuals or special-interest organizations or associations, like Common Cause, could spend in a campaign.

Do you want to comment on that?

Mr. WERTHEIMER. Yes; we are very concerned about that. We do not spend money in support of or in opposition to candidates. That question has been raised by a U.S. Senator.

Senator GRIFFIN. You do distribute educational information, though, about people, do you not?

Mr. WERTHEIMER. Yes. That question was raised when Chairman Hayes directed the GAO to do an investigation and audit of us in 1972, which they did over a 3-month period and issued a report and reached the conclusion that in fact we were not spending money in support of or in opposition to candidates. We think there are a variety of ways of attempting to deal with this problem of independent expenditures. It is a problem.

Senator GRIFFIN. Are you willing to put that over until next year? You did not address yourself to that.

Mr. WERTHEIMER. No. In my testimony, Senator, I addressed myself to the election commission only.

Senator GRIFFIN. That is what I thought.

Mr. WERTHEIMER. No; I think that Senator Cannon, for example, mentioned some provision that Chairman Hayes might have had that dealt with the truth in advertisement to make clear that where independent expenditures were coming from, whether they were authorized or not, whether on their face they explained that they were unauthorized and whether or not they were made in consultation with the candidate in conjunction with the standards set forth by the Supreme Court, and we think that kind of activity should be looked at and be acted upon and we would be happy to look at any language on any provision like that.

We do think it is a problem that should be dealt with.

Senator PELL. Senator Cannon.

Senator CANNON. Thank you.

You stated that you do not take positions in support of or in opposition to candidates. But how do you arrive at positions on legislation? Is your membership consulted about positions on legislation?

Mr. WERTHEIMER. Yes. We poll our membership annually. We have a 60-member elected board of directors, which is elected by the membership at large. All policy decisions, the major policy decisions of the organization are voted upon and under the ultimate control of the board of directors.

Senator CANNON. So that if you poll your membership annually you do not necessarily include a poll on all of the matters?

Mr. WERTHEIMER. Not every detail, Senator; no.

Senator CANNON. As a matter of fact, this issue here, when it arose a short time ago, was that decided by the board of directors, or was that decided by you, or by who?

Mr. WERTHEIMER. That was decided by our staff with information going to the board of directors.

The position we have taken here is simply the position we have taken for some time now; that there should be an independent Federal Election Commission and we have testified on that on numerous occasions in the past and we have also testified on numerous occasions in support of congressional public finance.

Senator CANNON. I am aware of that.

What I was trying to get at was the point here of the precise problem before us and the time frame. I am wondering how you make those decisions and who makes them, which has the priority.

Is it principally the extension of the Federal Election Commission, or should that be tied together with the congressional financing?

Mr. WERTHEIMER. To us the first priority is the Federal Election Commission. That is the first priority.

Senator CANNON. Has that been determined by your board of directors?

Mr. WERTHEIMER. That has been determined by the chairman of our board, the president of our organization, in conjunction with the staff.

Senator CANNON. With the staff? Not with the board of directors?

Mr. WERTHEIMER. Not that specific one.

The board of directors, every member of the board of directors, was notified about this policy.

Senator CANNON. How many staff do you maintain?

Mr. WERTHEIMER. I think we have approximately—I could get you the exact figures—I think we have about 80 or 85 paid staff and then we have a couple of hundred volunteers who come in the Washington area on a weekly basis; and then we have many, many volunteer citizens around the country who are not paid, but volunteer at the local level.

Senator CANNON. Is the organization itself registered as a lobbyist?

Mr. WERTHEIMER. We are registered as a lobbyist and our lobbyists are registered as lobbyists.

Senator CANNON. How many registered lobbyists do you have?

Mr. WERTHEIMER. We have—again I would like to get to the exact figures—I think we probably have about 14 or 15 people registered as lobbyists. Sir, I would have to get you the exact figures on that, Senator.

Senator CANNON. Incidentally, on page 7 of your statement you refer to the money the Commission would need. You said they need approximately $19 million here.

Mr. WERTHEIMER. No.

Senator CANNON. That was your testimony, but your printed statement says $9 million. Which is it?

Mr. WERTHEIMER. It is $9 million. I am sorry, $9 million was the figure they used. I think they have submitted it to this committee.

Senator CANNON. In the event that the House should act first, should vote and include congressional elections, then you would see no problem with us taking that up and making it an issue on the floor here?

Mr. WERTHEIMER. No, Senator.

Senator CANNON. Did you hear my reasoning before?

Mr. WERTHEIMER. I was in the back, but I heard general reasoning.

Senator CANNON. Do you find any problem with any of that?

Mr. WERTHEIMER. I think our view on those would really depend on what the specific provision said; that is, of course, what we would do immediately after the chairman, at whatever point he introduced the bill, we would intend to review the bill. We would be willing to comment at that point.

Senator CANNON. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator PELL. Thank you.

Thank you, very much.

Mr. WERTHEIMER. Thank you.

Senator PELL. Our next witness is Mr. George Agree, director, Committee for Democratic Process.

STATEMENT OF GEORGE AGREE, DIRECTOR, COMMITTEE FOR DEMOCRATIC PROCESS

Mr. AGREE. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I have a short statement.

This is an awkward moment for everyone interested in this subject. The action of the Supreme Court on January 30 confronts us with a completely new situation.

On the one hand, the Court radically undermined the entire conceptual framework of the reforms that had been developed over the past several years.

It would seem to me, in listening to some of the testimony here today, that either this point is not understood or is not agreed to; but it looks to me, Mr. Chairman, as though in many respects we are in the situation of crazy cats still running after we have left the cliff. We do not yet know that some of the ground is out from under us.

This suggests to me a need for long and careful deliberation about the future structure of American campaign finance legislation.

On the other hand, by depriving the Federal Election Commission of its power to disburse public subsidies as of February 29, the Court has created a need for swift and effective action.

It seems to me that we must do immediately what needs to be done to continue the certification and disbursement of Federal campaign funds, and that we should do a little more than that as possible until there has been much more time to think.

I do not like the idea of a Presidential Commission. I fear it. Apparently, in 1974, the Congress feared it. The danger of its membership and staff being stacked by a two-term President, especially one with a Senate controlled by his own party, is very real. And a Chief Executive could use the powers this would give him to discipline members of his own party as well as to harass the opposition.

But an independent agency of some kind has long been needed merely to provide effective administration and enforcement of disclosure laws. And one is now also needed for the 1976 elections to go forward.

On balance, I favor reconstitution of the Commission with Presidential appointments. Also on balance, because I think again the question has to be looked at in the long-range perspective somewhere along the line, I think the life of the Commission should be limited to the purposes of this election. And I would feel safer if its powers could also be limited to the minimum necessary for the distribution of subsidies and the implementation of the disclosure provisions.

Specifically, I think it would be useful to deprive such a temporary commission of any powers relating to the remaining expenditure ceilings—those that a candidate must accept as a condition of receiving Federal funds, first, because I think these ceilings are now meaningless because they will be vitiated by the formation of independent, unauthorized committees.

I would interject that requiring such committees to identify their statements would likely have no effect at all on public reception of their messages.

Second, because the enforcement of expenditure ceilings is a swamp from which, once entered, there is no way out. It requires investigation of everything—and beyond. The mere need to define what fell within the limits was the source of most of the Commission's troubles with the Congress, and its dogged pursuit of precise categories in the swirling waters of American politics impaired its credibility elsewhere as well.

Mr. Chairman, since the Court's decision will have effects beyond the immediate problem of the Commission, I ask your indulgence to mention a few items the committee might wish to consider in its future deliberations.

First, we are thrown off balance by the fact that efforts to achieve public financing in our country were promoted as a means of replacing, rather than supplementing, private funding; and of putting a lid on, rather than helping to meet, the rising costs of political communication.

Now, the invalidation of individual, group, and candidate expenditure limits shatters these pretensions. Every precedent in the history of campaign finance regulation supports the expectation that unchecked streams of big money will flow again, albeit somewhat indirectly through the independent committees.

And I expect that the transparency of any evasion that may be involved will be no more barred through its prompt acceptance as political convention than the earlier $3 million limit on Presidential committees prevented the spending of 10 and ultimately 20 times that amount. Whatever the law permits will be done.

Those familiar with foreign experience with public financing and with American literature on the subject will be neither surprised nor dismayed by this new situation. In all democracies other than ours, the principal reason for introduction of political subsidies was to supplement, not curb, the existing supply of private money because of the latter being insufficient to meet the rising costs of legitimate campaigning, and I stress the word "legitimate." This is, and has been, the case in the United States also; and we should be grateful to the Court for compelling us to face up to it.

Hopefully, renewed perception of these realities will incline us to think again of Government funding as a way to erect financial floors under candidates, rather than of lowering ceilings over them.

Next, Mr. Chairman, I want to make a few observations about the possibility of matching grants for Senate and House campaigns. I believe that they would be preferable to flat grants precisely because of the vitiation of even voluntarily accepted expenditure limits.

If independent commissions are going to be able to operate on behalf of candidates, then the flat grants, with no ceilings, do not make much sense.

But they may create a problem which I suspect the Congress will wish to avoid; under the $25,000 limit on aggregate contributions, it could be possible to give each of 100 candidates a $250 contribution and to have them, all of them, matched. This would mean $25,000 in taxpayer subsidies for the electoral choices of a single donor, and it would represent an automatic doubling of the cloud of any lobbyist seeking to assure his ability to get past the receptionists in offices on Capitol Hill.

The problem could be avoided by providing that contributions would be matched only when received from persons residing in the district or State of the candidate. This would not permit interdistrict or interstate flow of contributions—nor should it, but it would confine the power to double one's influence to the candidate's own constituents.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, all public financing systems pose problems of fiscal control. When public funds are given to private persons or organizations for their own use, safeguards are necessary to insure that they confine the use of this money to the purposes for which it was given—that they not line their own pockets or floors with it, and that the manner of its deployment in the political wars is not inimical to the public interest.

The possibility of effective safeguards has a direct relationship to whether there is full or partial public funding of candidates. It would be difficult in the extreme for any agency to monitor and evaluate every expenditure made in the course of a single campaign, and impossible in a national election involving hundreds of campaigns.

Even to make the effort could have disasterously chilling effects on political behavior. Yet such an effort would be required in a system of full public funding, in which not to make it would open a wide door to misappropriation and abuse—and finally to scandals that would undermine the system itself.

On the other hand, partial public funding makes it possible to segregate subsides from other moneys, and to require that they be used only for easily verifiable kinds of expenses such as metered postage, broadcasting time, billboards, and telephone charges.

At the same time, salaries, personal expenses, petty cash, and other difficult to trace disbursements could be excluded from payment with tax money. In such a system, it would even be feasible not to give candidates the subsidy funds at all, but to have them submit certified bills for approved expenses which the Government then would pay directly, as is now done in Puerto Rico.

At issue is whether the administering agency will be compelled to give detailed scrutiny to every action taken in a campaign, or only to those involving use of taxpayer funds—whether, in effect, it will have an impossible assignment involving serious danger of stifling the political process, or will work toward the attainable objective of underwriting robust competition and enhancing the openness of our democracy.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I would be happy to answer any questions.

Senator PELL. Thank you, Mr. Agree; an old friend of this committee and the chairman. I am very grateful for your thoughts. You certainly are very informed and qualified to speak on this subject.

The legislation in front of us, the bills, which one would you favor; the simple extension?

Mr. AGREE. The simple extension would be one clear limit. I believe Senator Schweiker accepted such an amendment.

Senator PELL. Do you agree that the one offered by Senators Scott and Kennedy would be a little too complicated?

Mr. AGREE. I would suggest that the Senate and the Congress do the least necessary at this time until there has been time to think through all of the implications of the Court's decision.

Senator PELL. Senator Cannon?

Senator CANNON. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

You raised some certainly very interesting and very serious questions, I am wondering do you have any possible solution to the very big loophole that you pointed out, and that is the independent expenditure?

Mr. AGREE. Senator, I am not a lawyer, but as I have read the Court's decision—and I have read it several times—I do not think that loophole can be closed. My own impression is that we are just going to have to adjust to the fact. It seems to me that what the Court has said, in effect, because it based its opposing of contribution limits on the corruption element, it seems to me what the Court has said, in effect, is that if the Members of Congress feel that politicians may be corrected by contributions, they may limit what contributions candidates can receive, but they may not limit anything else that other people may do.

What this does, it seems to me, is set up a situation in which other people will do things. I could go out tomorrow and organize a national committee for independent action and I believe raise unlimited sums which could then be spent in Nevada campaigns or Rhode Island campaigns or anywhere, just so they were not coordinated with the candidate. I do not think that this can be limited and I think it may be unwise to try. It might just provoke other litigation.

Now, if I may, I will make one more point on that.

This puts candidates in a very difficult position with respect to the contribution limits. Many candidates over past years have been worried about millionaires coming in and blitzing them, spending a lot of money on media. In the past it has been possible for a candidate to go to his millionaire friends and say, I am in trouble, help me. After this decision, it seems to me that he has to wait for them to perceive that he is in trouble and to decide to help him out. It is not a very good situation.

Senator CANNON. I must say that I agree with you there. I think it poses a very difficult problem.

You, for example, could only contribute to me $1,000 per election, and yet you could go out on your own and spend $100,000 on my behalf if you wanted to do it. That is kind of a distinction without a difference, it seems to me.

Mr. AGREE. Senator, the question to me seems to be are you going to somehow try to find loopholes in the Court's decision and try to plug up this business, despite the rather emphatic statements the Court has made and the overwhelming vote in favor of that part of the decision, or are you going to say, well, okay, big money is in, but let us see to it that there is a lot of other money so that big money would not have such a deleterious effect.

I would much prefer that second approach. It is the approach the politicians have followed in other countries. It is the approach that most American political scientists who have written on the subject suggest.

If you are asking me do I see any way to stop that big money, my answer is, I do not. Maybe there is, but I suspect there is not, and I think it is hardly worth the effort.

Senator CANNON. Of course, under the Court's decision if we went to the public financing aspect, then we could get back to the limitation on expenditures, but it would go only by the candidate itself and still would not apply to the independent person or to the committee.

Mr. AGREE. Senator, I have an opinion on what I am about to put to you, but I would be interested in yours.

Suppose this law had been in effect in 1972, this Court decision, in effect in 1972. President Nixon had accepted the $20 million and the limit.

Would that have barred Governor Connally or others from going out and raising millions in addition for the Democrats for Nixon or some other committee and spending it?

I do not believe it would have.

Senator CANNON. As long as it was not in collusion with the campaign committee.

Mr. AGREE. And it would not have to be.

Senator CANNON. Well, I think it poses a very serious problem, but I do not know whether I go along with you on the idea that we ought to stop and think about it because it seems to me that there is not too much thinking left to be done. The choices are relatively clear: you are either going to have to go down this road as the Supreme Court has outlined or we are going to have to go to the public financing where we can limit the amount that an individual can spend; and if we go that route, then I do favor your suggestion.

It ought to be on a matching basis rather than an outright grant.

Mr. AGREE. Actually, I would prefer the vouchers, but I think it is a little premature to consider it.

Senator CANNON. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator PELL. Thank you very much, Mr. Agree. You have been very helpful to us.

Mr. AGREE. Thank you.

Senator PELL. Our next witness is Mr. Herbert E. Alexander, director, Citizens' Research Foundation.

STATEMENT OF HERBERT E. ALEXANDER, DIRECTOR, CITIZENS' RESEARCH FOUNDATION

Mr. ALEXANDER. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

If my full statement could go into the record, I would just skip through here.

Senator PELL. Thank you very much.

The full statement will be inserted into the record as if read.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Thank you.

[The written statement of Mr. Alexander follows:]

STATEMENT OF HERBERT E. ALEXANDER, DIRECTOR, CITIZENS' RESEARCH FOUNDATION

I am happy to respond to the invitation of Senator Pell dated February 11, 1976, to testify. My statement is my own and does not necessarily reflect the views of members of the Board of Trustees of the Citizens' Research Foundation, which as an organization does not take positions on public policy.

In its decision in Buckley et al. v. Valeo et al. the Supreme Court has done much to relax some of the rigidities that the Federal Election Campaign Act Amendments of 1974 imposed upon the electoral process. The decision preserved the most desirable features of the law—public disclosure of campaigns for Federal office and public funding of Presidential campaigns—while saving the political system from its most questionable features—the limitations on candidates' campaign expenditures and the ceilings on spending by individuals and by groups independent of the candidate. The decision followed closely the recommendations of the American Bar Association, and adhered to the findings expressed in the political science literature over the years, that expenditure limits would have serious consequences for the political system in terms of their impact upon the relationships between all the actors and institutions—candidates, campaign committees, political parties, interest groups, and volunteers—active in elections.

The decision reopens some lingering questions about how far election reform should go, and what its effects are upon the political process. The 1974 law attempted to do too much, affecting every aspect of political campaigns, their organizational and financial structure. The law was so complex that the Federal Election Commission was inundated with requests for advisory opinions, questions asked by numerous Members of Congress among others, who for fear of violating the law, asked for an interpretation before taking action. This fear threatened to reduce some spontaneity in the political system and in filtering down to state and local party and other committees would have lessened the enthusiasm of citizens to volunteer their services.

In part, the FEC was not at fault; it was implementing a badly-drawn law which left too much unclear and too much open to interpretation. On the other hand, too many FEC advisory opinions were too narrow and too legalistic, without consideration of their impact on the system. In retrospect, the FEC would have done better to defer so many ad hoc AO's which did not cohere to any controlling goals, and to have spent its first months writing the essential regulations that still do not exist after nine months of operation. What both the 1974 Amendments and the FEC lacked was a philosophy about regulation that was both constitutional and designed to keep the process open and flexible rather than rigid and exclusionary. I hope the Supreme Court decision revitalizes our perceptions about what democracy and pluralism are all about. I hope it leads us to understand that floors, not ceilings, are what are needed; that not too much but possibly too little money is spent to achieve a competitive politics in this country; that there is no value more important than citizen participation, including financial participation, in politics; and that citizen participation is often achieved most effectively through group activity—whether groups represent corporations, labor unions, trade or professional associations, or issues—that should be encouraged, not discouraged, from participating in the politics of our democracy.

Because money has always been a scarce resource in politics, parties and campaigns are dependent upon volunteers to provide free services. A harsh price must be paid for regulation in an activity such as politics, because politics so depends upon citizen volunteers. Candidates and parties cannot as readily pay salaries to workers to ensure compliance, as can corporations and labor unions and others regulated by government. Thus, government regulation of politics, while essential, must be calibrated to achieve the fine balance between keeping politics fair and law-abiding, and overburdening or stifling it. This subtlety was never understood by many advocates of reform, and the Court decision should lead to more balanced perspectives on the potentially serious side-effects of over-regulation. The government's role should be to regulate, not to dominate the electoral processes as the FEC came to do by building an administrative law the average citizen could not cope with. The goals in a democracy should be to encourage political dialogue and citizen participation; at times it is unavoidable that this gives certain advantages to wealthy individuals or special interests. Only those with too little faith fear the full play of ideas and of competition. Unfortunately, many of the far-reaching reforms that were enacted in 1974 tried to restrict and limit certain forms of electoral participation rather than to enlarge it. Some of the reforms became part of a politics of exclusion that should not be acceptable to a democratic society. To help overcome the advantages of wealth, the Supreme Court properly saw that limited government funding of politics should be available to assist candidates and political parties to meet the costs necessary in a system of free elections.

The findings that both the structure and enforcement powers of the FEC are unconstitutional gives Congress the opportunity not only to reconstitute the Commission but also to modify remaining sections of the law. Clearly there is continuing need for a government agency with statutory authority to regulate disclosure and public funding, and to initiate enforcement by referring cases to the Justice Department.

I assume that an independent FEC appointed wholly by the President, making rules affecting campaigns for Congress, would not be acceptable to many. Hence I would suggest a return to something like the 1971 FECA permitted, but with a reconstituted FEC, reduced in staff size and authority, as the single unified agency receiving disclosure reports for campaigns for the President, for Senate and House. I would not return to the tripartite arrangement in which the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House also have some responsibilities. Not a single state among the 49 with disclosure laws requires legislative agents to receive disclosure reports. Neither would I permit Congressional veto of regulations and opinions, nor require Congressional approval of them. Rather, I would write a law with clear Congressional intent and less discretionary power for the FEC.

It is true that the Constitution requires that each House be the judge of its own members. A FEC need not interfere with the right of each House to judge its members; the data submitted to it would be readily available to the appropriate elections committees and to the membership of each House.

The achitects of the 1974 law based their arguments for government funding of political campaigns on two interrelated theories. One was that government funds should be provided within the framework of campaign expenditure limits, so that tax dollars were simply not being added to whatever private funds could be raised, thus enabling candidates to spend unlimited amounts and escalating campaign costs uncontrollably. The second theory was that government funds should be enacted to provide a necessary alternative source of funds to make up for the reduction in funding caused by the imposing of contribution limits. By declaring expenditure limits unconstitutional, the Court knocked away the first prop, sustaining the argument for government funds, but by retaining the contribution limits, the Court added a strong prop to the second theory.

The Supreme Court tempered its findings by holding that candidates who accept government funds still will be bound by limits. The matching grants plan, currently operative in Presidential campaigns, whereby the government matches contributions up to a maximum of $250, fortunately was accepted by the Court decision. This should encourage candidates to continue to seek to broaden their financial base of support by attracting smaller contributors.

Those who do not accept government funds can spend as much as they can raise, perhaps more if they are permitted to go into debt. A Presidential candidate who chooses government funding in the general election next fall will be limited to about $22 million in spending, all of it received from the tax checkoff funds, whereas a candidate going the private route could spend $30 or $40 million or more. This built-in disparity makes the private route more attractive but only for candidates with high confidence in their fund-raising appeal, or for wealthy candidates spending their own funds. The private option would be risky for candidates without a proven track-record in raising big money in small sums. Once nominated in 1972, George McGovern raised about $16 million in small contributions, but at a cost of $3.5 million in mail costs, $1 million in newspaper ads, and more in appeals for funds tagged on at the end of paid broadcasts. A candidate would need to expect even better gross and net returns than McGovern achieved to risk taking the private route—unless he felt he could get advantage from claiming that his campaign was funded by popular support, whereas his opponents were funded from the public trough.

Serious consideration should be given to raising the Presidential election spending limit for the general election period, extending the matching fund formula now in use, so at no extra tax dollars, private citizens will be able to contribute to the Presidential nominees. I deem the right of citizens to give some money to Presidential candidates in the general election period so important that I would change the law to permit it. Moreover, some $30 million were spent in Senator McGovern's 1972 campaign after he was nominated, not to mention more than that spent for President Nixon's campaign. Given the inflation factor since 1972, I think the $22 million permitted is insufficient to mount a national campaign, and the continuance of that limit will invite substantial spending by individuals and groups independent of the candidates. To head that off, I would frame the law to channel most spending within the candidates' control. To achieve that, I would suggest a $40 million limit with a matching formula for contributions of up to $250 each with an upper matching amount of $20 million—money that will be available in the Presidential Election Campaign Fund. The eligibility requirements might be somewhat different than the 20-state formula used in Presidential pre-nomination campaigns, in order to deal fairly with minor parties. This change might preclude litigation during the Presidential election if a serious third-party movement is mounted. The provisions in the law now for minor party Presidential candidates are still unfair—despite the Court decision—and are further litigable if damage can be shown. Such litigation in the midst of a Presidential campaign should be avoided if possible, and this is a desirable way to do so.

If free speech in politics means the right to speak effectively as the Supreme Court said, the decision is further justification for the use of tax dollars for campaign purposes, to help enable candidates and political parties to reach the electorate effectively. This strengthens the argument consistently suggested in the literature, that floors, not ceilings, should be enacted. Floors mean the provision of government funds to ensure minimal access of the candidate to the electorate. Beyond that level, candidates can spend as much private money as they can raise. This concept also is accepted in mature democracies around the world, from the Scandanavian countries to Israel, although in these countries money is provided to political parties and not to candidates as it is in our candidate-centered culture characterized by weak political parties.

This concept should help to disengage us permanently from the illusory notion that too much money is spent in politics. The United States devotes a miniscule portion of its resources to politics. In 1972, we spent $425 million on our elective and party politics at all levels, Federal, state, and local, which is less than the advertising budgets of our two largest corporate advertisers. The goal of achieving more competition in elections means we may have to spend more, not less, on politics.

The remaining problem in seeking bigger money in smaller sums is the cost of raising it. For this purpose, provision for seed money is necessary. In this connection, the Supreme Court decision left one major inequity. By declaring unconstitutional the limitation on candidates' spending on their own behalf, the decision opened the way for the return of millionaire candidates who at once provide the funding for their own campaigns and raise the ante for their opponents. Candidates without personal wealth will be disadvantaged unless Congress increases the amounts individuals can contribute to their campaigns.

While the Supreme Court sanctioned the current $1,000 limit on contributions, for purposes of equity this should be raised by Congress to $3,000 or $5,000, or eliminated entirely. And the overall limit a person can contribute to Federal candidates in a calendar year, now $25,000 should be raised to at least $100,000. Raising these limits also would help provide seed-money for candidates who are not well known, who represent unpopular viewpoints, who come from a poor constituency, or who need substantial funds to initiate their direct mail drives for funds in smaller amounts.

While the thrust of the 1974 Amendments was in the direction of restricting large contributions and special interests, the Supreme Court's thrust was to reopen channels for significant big money to reenter politics. It is desirable to channel such money into the candidate's campaign rather than for it to be spent independently in ways that may be wasteful and counter-productive.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I am happy to respond to your invitation to testify. My statement is my own and does not necessarily reflect the views of members of the board of trustees of the Citizens' Research Foundation, which as an organization does not take positions on public policy.

In its decision in Buckley et al. v. Valeo, the Supreme Court has done much to relax some of the rigidities that the Federal Election Act Amendments of 1974 imposed upon the electoral process.

The decision reopens some lingering questions about how far election reform should go, and what its effects are upon the political process.

The 1974 law attempted to do too much, affecting every aspect of political campaigns, their organizational and financial procedures. The law was so complex that the Federal Election Commission was inundated with requests for advisory opinions, questions asked by numerous Members of Congress, among others, who for fear of violating the law, asked for an interpretation before taking action.

This fear threatened to reduce some spontaneity in the political system and in filtering down to State and local party and other committees would have lessened the enthusiasm of citizens to volunteer their services.

In part, the Federal Election Commission was not at fault; it was implementing a badly drawn law which left too much unclear and too much open to interpretation. On the other hand, too many Federal Election Commission advisory opinions were too narrow and to legalistic, without consideration of their impact on the system.

In retrospect, the FEC would have done better to defer so many ad hoc AO's which did not cohere to any controlling goals, and to have spent its first months writing the essential regulations that still do not exist after 9 months of operation.

What both the 1974 amendments and the FEC lack was a philosophy about regulation that was both constitutional and designed to keep the process open and flexible rather than rigid and exclusionary. I hope it leads us to understand that floors, not ceilings, are what are needed; that not too much but possibly too little money is spent to achieve a competitive politics in this country; that there is no value more important than citizen participation, including financial participation, in politics; and that citizen participation is often achieved most effectively through group activity—whether groups represent corporations, labor unions, trade or professional associations, or issues—that should be encouraged, not discouraged, from participating in the politics of our democracy.

Because money has always been a scarce resource in politics, parties and campaigns are dependent upon volunteers to provide free service. A harsh price must be paid for regulation in an activity such as politics, because politics so depends upon citizen volunteers.

Candidates and parties cannot as readily pay salaries to workers to assure compliance, as can corporations and labor unions and others regulated by Government.

Thus, Government regulation of politics, while essential, must be calibrated to achieve the fine balance between keeping politics fair and law abiding, and overburdening or stifling it.

This subtlety was never understood by many advocates of reform, and the Court decsion should lead to more balanced perspectives on the potentially serious side effects of overregulation.

The Government's role should be to regulate, not to dominate the electoral processes as the FEC came to do by building an administrative law the average citizen could not cope with.

The findings that both the structure and enforcement powers of the FEC are unconstitutional gives Congress the opportunity not only to reconstitute the Commission but also to modify remaining sections of the law. Clearly, there is continuing need for a Government agency with statutory authority to regulate disclosure and public funding, and to intiate enforcement by referring cases to the Justice Department.

I am going to skip the whole next page and move on to page 4, the first paragraph.

Serious consideration should be given to raising the Presidential election spending limit for the general election period, extending the matching fund formula now in use, so at no extra tax dollars, private citizens will be able to contribute to the Presidential nominees.

I deem the right of the citizens to give some money to Presidential candidates in the general election period so important that I would change the law to permit it.

Moreover, some $30 million were spent in Senator McGovern's 1972 campaign after he was nominated, not to mention more than that spent for President Nixon's campaign.

Given the inflation factor since 1972, I think the $22 million permitted is insufficient to mount a national campaign, and the continuance of that limit will invite substantial spending by individuals and groups independent of the candidates.

To head that off, I would frame the law to channel most spending within the candidates' control. To achieve that, I would suggest a $40 million limit with a matching formula for contributions of up to $250 each with an upper matching amount of $20 million per candidate.

The eligibility requirements might be somewhat different than the 20-State formula used in Presidential prenomination campaigns, in order to deal fairly with minor parties. This change might preclude litigation during the Presidential election if a serious third-party movement is mounted.

The provisions in the law now for minor party Presidential candidates are still unfair—despite the Court decision—and are further litigatable if damage can be shown. Such litigation in the midst of a Presidential campaign should be avoided if possible, and this is a desirable way to do so.

Now, on page 5.

Hopefully, some of the concepts in the Supreme Court decision should help to disengage us permanently from the illusory notion that too much money is spent in politics. The United States devotes a minuscule portion of its resources to politics. In 1972, we spent $425 million on our elective and party politics at all levels, Federal, State, and local, which is less than the advertising budgets of our two largest corporate advertisers.

Senator PELL. I would like to point out though that comes out to be about $2 a head for every man, woman, and child.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Right. That is right, Senator.

The remaining problem in seeking bigger money in smaller sums is the cost of raising it. For this purpose, provision for seed money is necessary and that was discussed some this morning.

In this connection, the Supreme Court decision left one major inequity.

By declaring unconstitutional the limitation on candidates' spending on their own behalf, the decision opened the funding for their own campaigns and raised the ante for their opponents. Candidates without personal wealth will be disadvantaged unless Congress increases the amounts individuals can contribute to their campaigns.

While the Supreme Court sanctioned the current $1,000 limit on contributions, for purposes of equity this should be raised by Congress to $3,000 or $5,000, or eliminated entirely.

And the overall limit a person can contribute to Federal candidates in a calendar year, now $25,000, should be raised to at least $100,000.

Raising these limits also would help provide seed money for candidates who are less well known, or who represent unpopular viewpoints, who come from a poor constituency, or who need substantial funds to initiate their direct mail drives for funds in smaller sums.

While the thrust of the 1974 amendments was in the direction of restricting large contributions and special interests, the Supreme Court's thrust was to reopen channels for significant big money to re-enter politics. It is desirable to channel such money into the candidate's campaign rather than for it to be sent independently in ways that may be wasteful and counterproductive.

Thank you.

Senator PELL. Thank you very much.

Senator Cannon, do you have any questions?

Senator CANNON. Thank you.

You certainly point out some very interesting problems here in connection with this.

I note that you have some support among some of the earlier witnesses today with respect to the limits, the contribution limits.

I have listened to you with a great deal of interest. I want to thank you for being here.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Thank you.

Senator PELL. Thank you very much, Mr. Alexander.

Our next witness is Ms. Ruth Clusen, president of the League of Women Voters.

Welcome, Ms. Clusen. I have a tremendous regard for the good work of your membership, and I know our own Rhode Island League of Women Voters are seemingly well informed and I think always are in the right direction.

STATEMENT OF MS. RUTH CLUSEN, PRESIDENT, LEAGUE OF WOMEN VOTERS OF THE UNITED STATES

Ms. CLUSEN. Thank you, Senator.

I appreciate the opportunity to appear today.

As you know, I represent the constituency and I do know what they think because we have asked them about campaign financing from the time in 1973 when we first embarked on a broad study of it. So I assure you that the views I speak to today do represent our 1,350 leagues, with some 140,000 members.

We are limiting our comments today to what we consider the basic issue at hand, which is the state of the Federal Election Commission, although we do have positions on a great many things in regard to campaign funding.

Essentially I am here today to urge you and indeed the entire Congress to act speedily to pass legislation that would reconstitute an independent Federal Election Commission, a Commission appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate.

I would like to say in some respects I share the opinions expressed by Fred Wertheimer of Common Cause, who urged adequate funding. I cannot speak to the exact level, but I do think that operating on the basis of interim funding is not really a viable basis and while you are at reconstituting it, perhaps we can do something about more permanent funding as well.

The campaign finance issue, and particularly this now concerned with the constituency of the Commission seems to us to be filled with rhetoric and emotionalism and we hope that the congressional debate on this will not take on this kind of pitch; that it will focus on the necessities of the situation within the next 11 days; and that the Congress will put aside any emotion or self-interest which they feel about it as a result of any of the activities of the Commission during the time it has been in operation.

We have felt from the very beginning that an independent Commission with broad enforcement powers is keyed to a viable law in this field.

We think the most important contribution we can make right now is to try to steer discussion back to what seems to us to be the real issue involved, which is the vigorous enforcement of the campaign law in an effort to restore public confidence in Government.

In our own study of campaign financing we had overwhelming agreement that an independent body was essential to campaign reform and indeed from the very beginning we saw some deficiencies in the law in regard to the way it set up the Commission.

In fact, we said in the beginning that an independent body, as we saw it, referred to an elections commission which would centralize reporting, oversee campaign receipts and expenditures, and enforce the campaign financing laws and that the Commission must be adequately funded instead with the powers to investigate, to subpena, to initiate court action against violators and to have strong penalties against violators.

Throughout the debate on the passage of the 1974 amendments, we repeatedly stressed the need for this; and I think this is even more apparent in the year that has passed since that time. In fact, because of our strong commitment to this we intervened, along with the Center for the Public Finance of Elections and Common Cause to defend the law in the case of Buckley v. Valeo.

As you know, the Supreme Court upheld the major provisions, but we think this would be a hollow victory, if indeed it was one, if the law which we defended were not enforced.

I urge you to consider the kind of situation which would exist if Congress does not reconstitute an independent commission.

Without it, there will be no place for the hundreds of candidates and politically active persons to turn for authoritative answers and interpretations of the complex law. Certainly candidates are already confused enough and, I might say that we are ourselves in somewhat of that bind because we are doing a series of Presidential candidates and our baseline are those that qualify for public financing.

We are awaiting our decision right now two that are pending. We think the vast majority of candidates really want to comply. They do not want to obscure or avoid the law, but they will have no one to turn to for guidance if Congress does not act in the next few days.

I heard the testimony of the Commission that they have received around 300 requests, as we understand it, including requests for opinions of counsel. Actually, there are some 500 advisory opinions requested and pending. It seems to us that neither the Justice Department nor the General Accounting Office nor the Clerk of the House and the Secretary of the Senate are really a feasible alternative to an independent commission and that to go that route would put us back where we were in 1972.

The chief problem, of course, with the previous law was enforcement. Its penalties were too low. Its apparatus was inefficient. Its enforcement authority was fragmented. It amounted to a slap on the wrist. There has been a lack of uniformity in handling and reporting complaints, a lack of central control.

So essentially what we are saying is, let us not turn back the clock. The most important drawback in the past was the monitoring bodies lacked the power of subpena. They had to look to the Justice Department for full enforcement.

Of the thousands of reported violations transmitted to Justice, action was taken in only a few cases. If campaign reform is to have real meaning, effective enforcement is a must.

We think the need for the mechanism is not confined to the issue of campaign financing. In fact, the current call for lobby registration reform is again a response to the recognition that laws in the books are meaningless without enforcement.

The one thing we seem to have to learn over and over again is the passage of law is not enough; it has no effect without the power of enforcement. In this case, we see an independent commission with full regulatory powers is essential.

We urge the Senate and indeed every Member of Congress to put aside any of the hostilities which have arisen in the past year and to make clear the issue, which is that of an independent commission.

Without an independent commission, the campaign finance laws will be meaningless. We think the people will not be satisfied with less than reconstitution of an independent commission; and we think it might indeed interpret the failure of Congress to act as an attempt to renege on its promises to the public.

The mood of the public in this election year is not easy to guess, but if we had to guess, we would say that the public will not easily forget nor will it forgive either the lack of action on the part of the Congress or reluctance or lip service on this issue as a result of the traumatic times we have all been through.

I would be glad to answer any questions.

Senator PELL. Thank you very much indeed, Ms. Clusen. I appreciate your testimony.

Senator Cannon?

Senator CANNON. You do not take any position on this, on the question of public financing?

Ms. CLUSEN. We have, and, as I said, we have positions throughout this whole field. I think I would have to say honestly that our fear is that it could get so tied up in this that what we think is most essential to accomplish would not happen.

We do support a combination of public and private financing. We do support extension of public financing to candidates for Congress. Certainly we would be glad to see these things happen, but pragmatically speaking, I guess given the passage of legislation in the Congress, we do not think it can take place in 11 days, and this is more important to us.

Senator CANNON. Thank you very much.

Senator PELL. Thank you very much.

Our next witness is Mr. Ira Glasser, president of the New York Civil Liberties Union.

STATEMENT OF IRA GLASSER, DIRECTOR, NEW YORK CIVIL LIBERTIES UNION, ACCOMPANIED BY PROF. RALPH WINTER, YALE LAW SCHOOL

Mr. GLASSER. Thank you.

I am Ira Glasser, director of the New York Civil Liberties Union. With me today is Prof. Ralph Winter of Yale Law School.

As you probably know, the New York Civil Liberties Union was a plaintiff in Buckley v. Valeo, and Professor Winter was counsel in that case for plaintiff Senator Buckley.

We appear here today jointly on behalf of the American Civil Liberties Union. We would like the opportunity to submit written testimony to you within a couple of days.

We thought now we would simply like to comment informally and briefly on a variety of the issues that face you.

It is our view that taken as a whole the Congress enacted with insufficient scrutiny the first time the Federal Election Campaign Act Amendments of 1974, and its predecessor act of 1971, as well.

We believe that in addressing yourselves to the constitutional questions involved in achieving the ends of the bill, you listened to the wrong advice, and paid insufficient attention to the constitutional limits. As a result we and others started that litigation which ended in the Supreme Court decision last January, and as a result we now all have to function within the first amendment limits that the Court set down.

What is left of the bill can fairly be called a wreckage, I think, and I think it would be a mistake to automatically defend that wreckage as if it were an original bill.

I think it is fair to say that if what is left now of the law were submitted initially as a proposed bill nobody would have supported it. It would be much better, I think, to begin from scratch, to take the court decision as a signal to go back and do it right this time, and to separately address each of the problems which the legislation sought to address the first time, but this time within the limits set by the Court.

Professor Winter will comment first on our view on the Federal Election Commission, and also on limits on contributions, and I will comment afterward on disclosure of public financing and the voluntary funds that are available to corporations and unions.

Mr. WINTER. Thank you.

We favor the reconstituting of the Federal Election Commission with only the power to administer the reporting and disclosure provisions, and the power to supply candidates for Federal funding in Presidential elections.

We would leave enforcement and the rest of the statute to the ordinary law enforcement agencies. We think that a commission with broad law enforcement powers carries with it many dangers, some of a philosophical nature, some more of a pragmatic nature. The existence of the commission really calls for law enforcement, and really calls for the constant monitoring of political activities, much of the same kind that was criticized in the case of the FBI.

Whereas it may have been unauthorized there, nevertheless the danger is the same.

Secondly, we feel that a commission will constantly expand its powers and be constantly rewriting the law without regard to the intent of Congress.

We think to some extent the Commission has publicized intervention in the Morton case, which was an instance of its undertaking without extended hearings and interpretation of the law that was hardly clear.

Finally, as a practical matter, I would like to disagree with some of the people who testified earlier as to what a great thing it is to have a commission that hands out advisory opinions.

No candidate can, without risking loss at an election, disobey, or go against an opinion issued by this Commission. Yet there is also no time to have a full hearing on the merits, or a full hearing before courts.

We very often have an ad hoc decision by a commission that does not even have the lifetime status of an article 3 court, and we find that to be very dangerous.

In the case of Rogers Morton, for example, the chairman of the Commission apparently just went to the newspapers and declared his view that something illegal had gone on. This itself is politically damaging.

The White House, although they continue to say they thought they were right on the law, felt compelled nevertheless to accede to this exercise of power by the Commission, which, so far as I know, did not follow any notice right to a hearing, or any other due process procedure.

Mr. Glasser can testify to an example in New York where the State election commission did a similar thing, and the opponent candidate immediately began to print leaflets stating that the State election commission stated that someone had violated the law.

I think if the Senators would take into account what happened to them with the Commission really, not subject to judicial review handing down ad hoc decisions in public during a campaign, they might be less anxious to reconstitute such a power.

As to contributions, I would raise only two points, going to the unfairness that has now worked as a result of the Supreme Court decision.

The first is that candidates will have lost control of a large part of their campaign.

Mr. Agree has stated it better than I think I can. It is just as to how money will flow into campaigns, and candidates will see their positions perhaps stated wrongly, perhaps either opponents attacked in ways that would create sympathy for their opponents, and the other things that happen that, in effect, they are unable to control.

That seems to me to be unfortunate, and it seems to me to be unfair to candidates.

The second point is a point about wealthy candidates. I really am amazed. I have been following the passage of the 1974 act, and that act was rarely mentioned without the statement that it will drive the wealthy from politics, and we will no longer have a situation where the wealthy have an advantage of gaining public office.

I am amazed to sit here today and hear advocates of the statute say, gee, the major provisions were upheld, that everything we wanted we got. There have not been that many changes. All we need now is a new Federal Election Commission.

Well, of course, the truth is otherwise. There has been a lot of speculation as to the effect of the statute, but we do not have to speculate very hard as to one effect of this court decision if Congress does not list the contribution limits.

More wealthy people will run for office, and more wealthy people will win office, and there really cannot be just any doubt about that.

Mr. GLASSER. As to the disclosure provisions, I think it is important to read the Court's decision very carefully. We have no quarrel with the Court's criteria, which sets down after a long recitation of the line of cases, beginning with NAACP against Alabama, in protecting the parties who may say harassment.

We think Congress need go no further than trying to paraphrase that in statutory language.

We are happy with the Court's criteria, and think it adequately protects the interest of associations in that respect. We do think that it must be listed according to the criteria the Court sets down.

The Court, after all, said that the only thing that one had to balance on the other side was the possibility of corruption, or the appearance of corruption, the possibility, put colloquially, of buying a candidate.

We submit that the present threshold levels which require candidates and parties to keep records of $10 contributions subject to audit by the Commission, and require automatic disclosure of $100 or more is far too low to be even reasonably expected for any candidate.

The Court agreed with us quite explicitly, but referred it to Congress in setting that limit higher, and we think Congress should accept that deferral, and go ahead and raise the threshold.

We would recommend that the recordkeeping threshold be limited to $100 contributions, and that there be a sliding scale upward for disclosure for office. The exact figure, obviously, is open to debate, but we would suggest something like $250 for Congress, $500 for the Senate, and $1,000 for the Presidency.

We think that it is patently absurd to suggest that contributions smaller than those for those offices could be set to buy a candidate, and, if they cannot buy a candidate, we think that the right of association privacy should win out.

We would also suggest that the burden of keeping those records is substantial, particularly on small, underfinanced campaigns. The burden of just keeping the records so that they will have it if the Federal Election Commission decides to audit, is a tremendous burden, and should not be undertaken when you are dealing with a level under $10.

We would also suggest that parties and candidates which expend a small amount of money in pursuit of an office be entirely exempt from disclosure, no matter what the size contribution is.

We believe that that is important for this reason: If the candidate or party is so small as not to be serious, one might set that level at different amounts, depending on how you decided what was serious and what was not, but it would seem to me that they ought to be exempt from the burden entirely, a burden which is substantial in terms of small parties.

It will be argued that disclosure is important, even for trivial candidacies, in order to prevent stalking horses. My response would be that a stalking horse cannot stalk very far if it is not spending too much money.

I would not presume to suggest what level that ought to be. I do think the Congress ought to do now what it did not do before, and that is pay attention to the level that is really important for the people to know. That is a clear mandate of the court.

Apart from that, we are happy with the disclosure remedy. We think, of course, it is the preferred remedy.

We think limits on contributions and expenditures, and having the public know who was beholden to who is the ultimate sanction.

After all, remember, we have never functioned in this country with a full disclosure provision before. Whatever ills may have existed prior to this act, they did not exist in an atmosphere in which full disclosure of admittedly large contributions to major party candidates was mandated.

The evil that was involved when people set out to cast their ballot was not that large amounts of money was going to candidates, but more that nobody knew about, and not knowing about it, the voters were not able to apply their sanction.

The ultimate sanction on large contributors is the vote, not a regulatory system, not a system of criminal laws, not a system of prohibitions or certifications and monitoring political activity, but the sanction is the vote, and the reason why that sanction never was before was because the voters never knew before.

We think at the very least that a less drastic alternative ought to be tried before you start monkeying around with the first amendment.

As to segregated funds, this act continued to permit, in some ways expand, and the Court decision expands still further, the power of special interest by corporations and unions.

We think if you are interested in equity, if you are interested in putting candidates on a more equal financial footing, if you are interested in opening up elections to the small people, that the small contributors, that the most significant thing you can do is not focus upon the few rich maverick individuals, but rather upon the real exercise of financial power involved in politics in this country, and that is the enormous concentrations of money and wealth that is implicit, namely, in corporations and unions.

This bill allowed them more power than they had ever been allowed before. It created the situation where they could proliferate their commissioners, and where they can raise virtually an unlimited amount of money, spend an unlimited amount of money, and now the act makes it worse by placing an individual limit on contributions, by allowing that to stand while it allows unions and corporations to go their merry way.

I think it is not an exaggeration to say that to a large extent these special interests now have the capacity to capture the dominant influence in both major parties, and insofar as the public financing provisions, the major effect is to fund the two major parties, and taken together you have a kind of political religion in this country.

There are two political links, to be exact, Democrats and Republicans, each with its own special interest, and it is fair to say that most political funding has to go through each of those special interests, and each of those political links in order to be accepted. Everything else is relegated to the wayside.

We think that the present prohibitions on direct contributions of money by corporations and unions, two candidates ought not to have the present exemptions.

To facilitate voluntary funds is not construed as contribution, and hence is permitted. We think that you ought to construe it as a prohibition, and we think you ought to prohibit it.

We think if you do that, what will happen is that you will eliminate the major source of institutional financial inequity in this country.

As to public financing, we would agree with a good deal of what has been said before about the present scheme, and also the inherent discretion.

Tomorrow Ellen McCormack is going before the Federal Election Commission to get her fund certified. I understand that a rival group is also going to file a complaint saying that she is not bonafide, that she had misrepresented her position, she has misrepresented her candidacy, and she should not be certified, for example, she should not get the funds.

The first amendment does not include that kind of adjudication by a Government agency. We do not want to see a situation where somebody runs for office, and somebody else is opposed to their substantive position, and goes in and makes complaints, and the Government gets involved in adjudicating who is right and who is wrong, and who is misrepresenting, and who gets the money.

We say this even though our position on the question of abortion could not be further removed from Ellen McCormack's.

We would also suggest one small revision which we think is directed by fairness in your current scheme. We think that the entire Federal Election Campaign Act and its amendments, with the possible exception of the discharge provisions, ought not to apply at all to any candidates or parties who are not eligible for public funding.

We say this for one reason, if they are not eligible for public funding, it is because you have made your judgment that their candidacy is sufficiently small as to not be paid attention to.

The probability of success is so low that you do not have to give it public funding.

If its probability of success is so low, then it seems to me, the appearance of a corporation, the quid pro quo, the buying of a candidate, is equally low.

If a candidate or a party cannot be strong enough to qualify for public funding, it cannot be strong enough to qualify for limits on contributions.

So at the very least I think the public financing ought to be amended in that fashion.

I think we will now be prepared to submit to any questions you might have.

I would also like to submit a small booklet that we have prepared, which sets forth more fully our positions on all these matters for the record.

Senator PELL. It will be kept in the subcommittee files.

Then, in essence, with the various legislation and bills, you would support the Kennedy-Scott bill, title 1 of the Kennedy-Scott; is that correct?

Mr. WINTER. We have not seen those bills, Mr. Chairman.

From the description I have heard, I suspect the bill we would be most likely to support, the one that would come the closest, but we do not think goes far enough, is the one introduced by Senator Buckley.

We do not want law enforcement policy in the Commission.

Senator PELL. Thank you.

Mr. GLASSER. I would say that like other speakers it is kind of difficult to deal with the exact provisions of language of a bill that you have not seen or just recently seen. The only bill I have seen at all, the only bill I have touched at all, is the Buckley bill and that not more than 10 minutes ago when someone handed it to me. I think we will be prepared to say more explicitly later, but I think at this point we should set forth the criteria and have you evaluate the rules by our criteria.

Senator PELL. Thank you. Senator Cannon.

Senator CANNON. Is there any question about the constitutionality of Congress giving the enforcement power to the Federal Election Commission?

Mr. WINTER. I think there still is a question of constitutionality left in that there are many decisions of the Supreme Court saying you cannot delegate excessive discretion in the first amendment area to an administrative body. These are all cases with State legislation, but we made the argument in the Supreme Court.

Senator CANNON. I am glad to know that we are in accord on the recordkeeping of the $10 contribution. It seems to me that serves no useful purpose, and certainly until you get to the point that it has to be disclosed, unless you are going to assume that the Commission might want to come back and audit all of your less than $100 contributions, I do not think it serves any useful purpose.

You suggested that we ought to go to a higher limit on the disclosure.

What do you have in mind there?

Mr. GLASSER. Well, I think that the actual numbers could bear some discussion, but I would suggest to begin with that the following criteria be developed:

The Court made it clear, and I think you would agree that if there is a purpose to disclose contributions it is to disclose those contributions where the people contributing might be expected to have more influence than your average $20, $30, $40 contribution. I think that is something that the public has a right to know about before it casts its ballot.

The question is what level would that be before one can reasonably expect to exercise that kind of influence. I think immediately it becomes apparent that that is different in different offices. Whatever the size contribution will get you in the front office to a Congressman's office, it would not get you into the front door of the White House, and I would expect the Senate is somewhere in between.

We would suggest a sliding scale and for purposes of suggestion we would like to begin with about $250 for the House, $500 for the Senate, and $1,000 for the Presidency in terms of automatic disclosure with recordkeeping being mandated down to $100 so if there is any reason to believe that there is a manipulation going on by busting up large contributions into small contributions, they could still be audited with some kind of recordkeeping mandated at $100 or above and we think the automatic disclosure can be moved up by small amounts.

You pointed out some of the problems in connection with the advisory opinion subject and were critical of them.

Do you not think it is better to have someone giving guidelines in the nature of an advisory opinion or in some form on which a candidate can rely rather than have the candidate in a position that he just has to go ahead and take a chance? Here at least he has a prima facie compliance with the law if he abides by the decision.

Mr. WINTER. Well, he may not.

I forget the exact statutory language, but you are not totally protected against criminal prosecution. The problem is the criminal prosecution is in the Justice Department whereas the advisory opinion is in the Commission.

Senator CANNON. You would admit there would be a strong presumption in his favor if he followed the opinion?

Mr. WINTER. Probably. The problem is there will also be a strong presumption against him.

The point I was raising, and I think it is a very valid point, is that you candidates will never really get a full hearing on those rules. You know, you do not really get to argue it or anything else and you are really stuck with it. You cannot start disobeying that in front of your constituency.

Senator CANNON. I agree. You have no chance to contest it on the rulemaking.

I think it is a very valid point you raise, but I am also concerned about the fact that a candidate needs to have some place he can go and get some kind of guidance.

Mr. GLASSER. Not if you accept all of our proposals. If you would accept all of our proposals, the scheme would be so simplified that that apparatus would not be required.

We, after all, believe and to a large extent the Court has agreed by now, that disclosure was the main remedy. That is a rather simple remedy. We believe in the first amendment area you do take your chances, you do say what you want and spend what you want, and you do not want a Government agency getting involved saying it was lawful or unlawful, certified or not certified, when you have not had a chance to deal with that presumption of legitimacy which the public has a right to read into.

The incident that Professor Winter referred to in New York involved the State election commission there certifying as having violated the law particular leaflet of a candidate. We eventually represented that candidate and got a first amendment decision reversing that, but by then the election was over and the candidate's opponent had printed up his own leaflet and taken out ads in the newspaper saying the State election certified my opponent as a lawbreaker. One was free speech and the other was not.

I think that that kind of thing is implicit when you have the intervention of the Government agency deciding what is permissible speech and what is not, that which is not contemplated by the first amendment.

We think if you go to a simpler scheme that relies primarily on the disclosure, which has never been tried in this country, and let the voters apply the sanction, let the voters give the advisory opinion on election day, I think we at least have the obligation to try that before we rush off into these other schemes whose results we can barely contemplate.

Senator CANNON. Of course, that is what we had in mind in the previous law; trying to go to the full disclosure provision and see if that would not take care of the problem.

Mr. GLASSER. Well, that was a full disclosure provision which was not narrowly enough drafted to avoid the infirmities that the Court pointed out. I think it is possible to draw a provision which does not suffer from the effects of predecessor law, does not spill over to political groups, like the Common Cause, like that, but which does deal with disclosing large contributions to major party candidates. That merely is where the abuse is, after all. Nobody is interested in who contributes $50,000 to Norman Thomas' campaign. That is not what this law is supposed to be directed at. What we are really interested in and what this law is really directed at extensively is to let the people know what big money is behind the major Democratic and Republican candidates and once you draw the lines carefully on that I still submit that is a technique which has never been tried and is at least a drastic alternative that ought to be tried.

Senator CANNON. What is your suggestion for the problem of the independent spender or independent committee?

Mr. WINTER. We think you ought to raise the contribution limits so more money can flow to the candidates and they can control their campaigns.

There is nothing in the Court's decision you can do about it.

You are either going to be faced with an enormous ludicrous situation where you spend your time denying what all these people are saying or defending charges that you have coordinated with them.

I think you ought to raise the contribution limits.

Mr. GLASSER. We, in our position, do not face that problem, but the Court has left us with making that somewhat bizarre distinction that one kind of expenditure is OK and the other is not and it is OK if it is independent, which means you are going to expect conspiracy investigations as to who is saying what to whom and under what circumstances. Given that situation, the Court has said it is all right to maintain the contribution limits, but I think you ought to use your discretion to at least raise them to avoid the anomaly that the Court decision has left us with.

Senator CANNON. Thank you very much.

Senator PELL. Thank you very much indeed, gentlemen.

Mr. GLASSER. Thank you.

Senator PELL. There is going to be a rollcall vote, two of them, which should pretty well wind up the afternoon.

Mr. Brice Clagett, Covington & Burling, is the next witness and then Ms. Cynthia Burke, Secretary, Committee for Democratic Election Laws.

Mr. Clagett, you can come forward first and if the bell starts to ring I will have to ask you to submit the rest of your testimony and I will give the remaining 4 or 5 minute to Ms. Burke.

STATEMENT OF BRICE CLAGETT, MEMBER, LAW FIRM OF COVINGTON & BURLING, WASHINGTON, D.C.

Mr. CLAGETT. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

My name is Brice Clagett. I am a member of the law firm of Covington & Burling. I was one of the lawyers for the plaintiffs in the case of Buckley v. Valeo, some of the consequences of which you are considering today. I do not appear here as a representative of those plaintiffs or anyone else, but simply as a citizen who over the past year has had occasion to do a good deal of thinking about the election laws.

I will just hit the high spots and give my statement to the reporter.

The Supreme Court has now clearly recognized that any regulation of campaign expenditures and contributions operates in a critically sensitive area of constitutional concern.

Moreover, the election law is both highly complex and in many respects, perhaps unavoidably, vague.

In these circumstances, the power to interpret the law is largely the power to make new law. A Commission with that kind of power has vast influence over the political process.

My testimony then concerns two adjustments that, in my view, need to be made to the committee's powers if your decision is to reconstitute it to say that from being held unconstitutional all over again.

It is highly inappropriate, and perhaps unconstitutional, for any agency in effect to make law in an area trenching so sharply on so basic a constitutional right as freedom of speech. The fact is that, when either a candidate or an ordinary citizen is told by the Commission that certain political activity would violate the law, he will in the overwhelming majority of cases refrain from engaging in that activity although he is convinced the Commission's interpretation is wrong. He will thus be chilled from exercising what a court might well ultimately hold were his rights under both the Constitution and the statute. He will in effect be subjected to a prior restraint on the exercise of his first amendment rights by action of the Commission.

It may well be that this chilling effect or prior restraint resulting from Commission pronouncements would itself be held to violate the Constitution. In my opinion, it would be. The Court had no occasion to decide that issue in Buckley v. Valeo, because the Court held the Commission's powers unconstitutional on other grounds.

So if the Commission is reconstituted without any changes to address the problem, I suggest there will still be a heavy constitutional cloud over the Commission and the removal of that cloud will necessarily await further litigation.

Now, Professor Winter a moment ago addressed himself to some extent to the same problem under the name of unconstitutional discretion in the Commission in the first amendment area and he suggested that one solution was not to give the Commission any rulemaking or advisory opinion power. That is one solution, but I see myself very strongly the force of Senator Cannon's observation that some guidance is needed for candidates and others so that citizens can get help in deciding what they can safely do.

So, I would suggest another solution to you. The Commission should not have rulemaking power. It should have the power if it has enforcement power to grant advisory opinions and issue guidelines, but there should be a very explicit provision to the effect that such pronouncements do not have the force of law, are valid only to the extent they conform to the statute, may not be used to create any presumption of violation or criminal intent in an action against a candidate or other citizen who has chosen to disregard them, and they are inadmissible as evidence against the citizen in such an action.

Such a provision is incorporated in Senator Buckley's bill, or that it could well stand being made more detailed and more explicit.

Only by such a solution, I submit, can the Congress prevent the Commission from operating as a czar over the entire political process whose every view has the force of law for most practical purposes. Only thus can citizens be permitted their constitutional right to disagree with the Commission, to act on that disagreement, and to take their chances with the statute as the Congress wrote it and enacted it without any presumption, in fact, or law that they are in violation merely because of what the Commission has said. That kind of presumption, it seems to me, would follow some agency expertise or from the binding effect of regulations or however you characterize it, it is clearly unconstitutional when applied in the first amendment area.

My second point is this.

The 1974 act did impose one very substantial restraint on the Commission: the power of either House of Congress to veto the Commission's regulations. I submit that the legislative veto is an inappropriate and very probable unconstitutional restraint and should be excluded from any new legislation if the Commission is to be given rulemaking power at all.

If the rulemaking function is an Executive function, as the Court very strongly suggested, then the veto is an impermissible intrusion on Executive authority.

I note from the President's statement of February 16 and Mr. Scalia's testimony this morning that the President shares the view that the legislative veto is constitutional. Yet, he proposes that you reenact it, which strikes me as in the extreme. It is the responsibility of the Congress and the President no less than of the Supreme Court to judge proposed legislation against the Constitution and if it deems it unconstitutional it should not enact it.

The Court found it unnecessary to pass on the legislative veto issue as such in the Buckley case since it held the Commission's rulemaking power unconstitutional because of the appointment method.

Senator PELL. Excuse me for interrupting, but I want to give Ms. Burke a chance here.

Would you put the rest of your testimony in the record?

Mr. CLAGETT. I could indeed, sir.

Senator PELL. Your statement will be made a part of the record.

[The statement referred to follows:]

STATEMENT BY BRICE M. CLAGETT, MEMBER, LAW FIRM OF COVINGTON & BURLING, WASHINGTON, D. C.

Mr. Chairman, members of the Subcommittee: My name is Brice M. Clagett, and I am a member of the law firm of Covington & Burling, in Washington. I was one of the lawyers for the plaintiffs in the case of Buckley v. Valeo, some of the consequences of which you are considering today. I do not appear here as a representative of those plaintiffs or anyone else, but simply as a citizen who over the past year has had occasion to do a good deal of thinking about the election laws.

I am not here to take any position on whether the Federal Election Commission should be re-created on the basis of a constitutionally permissible method of appointment or whether, rather, its powers should be transferred to some other agency or agencies. I wish to make only two limited points with regard to S. 2911:

(1) If the Commission is re-created with its prior enforcement powers, it should not be given rulemaking authority; it should be given power to issue guidelines and advisory opinions, but the status of those pronouncements should be qualified so as to protect the constitutional rights of citizens which the Supreme Court has recognized.

(2) If, contrary to my first point, a new Commission is given rulemaking power, its rules should not be made subject to a legislative veto.

I. The Supreme Court has clearly recognized that any regulation of campaign expenditures and contributions operates in a critically sensitive area of constitutional concern. The Court left no doubt that such regulation inevitably encroaches on free speech and makes inevitable a balancing process between compelling governmental needs and first amendment freedoms. When activity by citizens in this most sensitive area is subjected to regulation, especially with criminal sanctions, the inhibiting effect on political expression is acute.

Moreover, the election law is both highly complex and in many respects, perhaps unavoidably, vague—as was fully recognized in the Senate debate last fall on the Commission's office-account regulations (121 Cong. Rec. S. 17873–89, daily ed., Oct. 8, 1975).

In these circumstances, the power to interpret the law is largely the power to make new law. A commission with that kind of power has vast influence over the political process, not necessarily excluding the power to determine the result of particular elections.

The existing Commission has used these powers with a vengeance. In many respects its pronouncements made new law—sometimes where the statute as enacted by the Congress was silent; sometimes in rather striking disregard of what the statute did say. Attached as an appendix to this statement is a list of just a few of the more conspicuous lawmaking pronouncements the Commission issued in only 4 months of operation.

I don't mean to be too hard on the Commission. Given the exceptional complexity and vagueness of the statute, possibly no interpreting and enforcing agency could have avoided making itself subject to the same criticism.

It is highly inappropriate, and perhaps unconstitutional, for any agency in effect to make law in an area trenching so sharply on so basic a constitutional right as freedom of speech, and on a subject so crucial to our survival as a free democratic country as the electoral process itself. The fact is that, when either a candidate or an ordinary citizen is told by the Commission that certain political activity which he wishes to undertake would violate the law, he will in the overwhelming majority of cases refrain from engaging in that activity although he is convinced the Commission's interpretation is wrong. Even if he is otherwise disposed to litigate the issue, if he is well advised by counsel he will be aware (1) that a court probably will enforce a Commission rule as having the force of law, at least unless it flatly and unquestionably is contrary to the words of the statute, and (2) that a court will give great weight to any Commission pronouncement, because of alleged agency expertise, in deciding on the proper interpretation of the statute. He will thus be chilled from exercising what a court might well ultimately hold were his rights under both the Constitution and the statute. He will in effect be subjected to a prior restraint on the exercise of his first amendment rights.

It may well be that this chilling effect or prior restraint resulting from Commission pronouncements would itself be held to violate the Constitution.[1] The Court had no occasion to decide that issue in Buckley v. Valeo, although the plaintiffs raised it, because the Court held the Commission's powers unconstitutional on other grounds. So if the Commission is re-created without any changes to address the problem I have outlined, there will still be a heavy constitutional cloud over the statute and the Commission, and the removal of the cloud will necessarily await still further litigation.

[1] See, e.g., Speiser v. Randall, 357 U.S. 513 (1958), where the Court held that tax-assessment procedures which shift the burden of proof to the taxpayers are not adequate where First Amendment issues are at stake. See also, e.g., Bantam Books, Inc., v. Sullivan, 372 U.S. 58 (1963); Freedman v. Maryland, 380 U.S. 51 (1965); Southeastern Promotions, Ltd. v. Conrad, 43 L. Ed. 2d 448, 460 (1975); Saia v. New York, 334 U.S. 558 (1948); Keyishian v. Board of Regents, 385 U.S. 589, 604 (1967); Lamont v. Postmaster General 381 U.S. 301 (1965).

I suggest that the proper solution is that a re-created Commission should not be given rule-making power, except perhaps with respect to the federal-subsidy provisions. If it is given enforcement responsibilities, it should have the power to issue guidelines and advisory opinions—those are necessary so that citizens can get help in deciding what they can safely do—but there should be a provision to the effect that such pronouncements do not have the force of law, are valid only to the extent they conform to the statute, may not be used to create any presumption of violation or criminal intent in an action against a candidate or other citizen who has chosen to disregard them, and are inadmissible as evidence against the citizen in such an action.

The present statute has a provision (section 437f) that protects a citizen who acts in accordance with a Commission advisory opinion. That is a good provision and should be retained. What I suggest is a further provision to protect a citizen who, because he disagrees with a Commission pronouncement, chooses to act in disregard of it and finds himself the object of proceedings. Such a person of course must take his chances that a court will decide independently that his actions violated the statute. But he should not be made worse off, and in effect forced to bow to whatever restrictions the Commission chooses to place upon him, because of the danger that a court will be influenced by the position the Commission has taken.

Only by such a solution, I submit, can the Congress prevent the Commission from operating as it has, perhaps unavoidably, in the past: as a czar over the entire political process whose every view has the force of law for most practical purposes. Only thus can citizens be permitted their constitutional right to disagree with the Commission, to act on that disagreement, and to take their chances with the statute as the Congress wrote it and enacted it.

II. The 1974 Act did impose one very substantial restraint on the Commission: the power of either house of Congress to veto the Commission's regulations. I submit that, while the restraints I have suggested are appropriate if not necessary for constitutionality, the legislative veto is an inappropriate and very probably unconstitutional restraint, and should be excluded from any new legislation if the Commission is to be given rule-making power at all.

The plaintiffs in the Buckley case challenged the legislative veto as an unconstitutional infringement of separation-of-powers principles. If Commission rules subject to the veto are regarded as legislative in nature, then the veto results in what is in effect legislation by Congress without the President's having his constitutionally required opportunity to participate in the legislative process. If, on the other hand, the rule-making function is executive—as the Court strongly suggested in its discussion of the method of appointing the commissioners—then the veto is an impermissible intrusion on executive authority. And the Act's provision for a veto by either House acting alone is even more questionable than the more usual device of a concurrent resolution. The Federalist, No. 51 (Madison), Cooke ed. 1961, p. 350.

The Court found it unnecessary to pass on the legislative-veto issue as such, since it held the Commission's rule-making power unconstitutional because of the appointment method. The Court's opinion contains a lengthy footnote (slip opinion page 134, n. 176) which carefully outlined the legislative-veto question and expressly left it open. In that footnote the Court cited two law review articles which argued that the legislative veto is unconstitutional.[2]

There are other strong intimations in the Court's opinion in Buckley that the legislative-veto provision of this statute will be held unconstitutional when the question comes before the Court. The Court recognized that the Commission, viewed as a legislative agency because of the appointment method, could properly exercise any powers which Congress could exercise directly or through one of its committees. But the Court squarely held that rule-making is not such a power. That being the case—it having been held that Congress cannot make campaign rules through the instrument of a legislative agency—I find it hard to see how the Court could avoid holding that direct participation by Congress in the rule-making process through the legislative veto is likewise unconstitutional.[3]

The legislative veto is particularly inappropriate where, as here, it creates a sharp conflict of interest. Members of the Congress, of course, are candidates for office, and as such they are intimately affected by the Commission's regulations. If, as has been repeated endlessly, a primary purpose of campaign reform is to avoid even the appearance of impropriety, that end is hardly served by constant and detailed embroilment of the Congress in interpreting and fleshing out the campaign restrictions under which they—and their challengers—operate. Of course implementation of the campaign law contains a host of opportunities for tilt in favor of incumbents, and repeated congressional involvement will continually feed the suspicion that the Act is an incumbent's protection law. Far better to let the rule-making process be carried on, under proper safeguards, by a genuinely independent and impartial agency rather than one under incumbent domination. I should think that the Congress would welcome the opportunity to avoid future public spectacles of the sort that occurred over the rejection of the office-account regulations last fall.

Finally, if the legislative veto is resurrected there will be ample room for an argument that, even if such veto provisions in other contexts may not be unconstitutional, its presence in this highly charged political context makes the Commission an arm of Congress, even absent congressional appointment of the commissioners, and thus constitutionally invalidates the rule-making power. It could also be argued that the resulting incumbent domination violates the constitutional rights of challengers.

I am personally persuaded that the legislative veto in the 1974 Act is unconstitutional and that the Supreme Court will, if necessary, so hold. To resurrect it in a new statute would leave the Commission and its rules under a constitutional cloud which only new litigation could—eventually—resolve.

Thank you.

Mr. CLAGETT. I would like to add two very brief points, extremely brief, that are not in my written testimony.

Senator PELL. Certainly.

[3] The brief submitted by the Justice Department in Buckley for the Attorney General as appellee and for the United States as amicus curiae argued that the legislative veto could be justified only if the Commission was a legislative agency, which of course the Court has now held it cannot be (pp. 111–12). The brief correctly described the Watson law-review article, one of those cited by the Court in its opinion, as "the most recent and thorough study [which] concludes that [congressional control] devices are often an unconstitutional intrusion into executive authority" (p. 111, n. 70). Congressional power to veto regulations of executive or independent agencies is a device expressly found constitutionally "unacceptable" and "invalid" by Watson (op. cit. at 1082).

Mr. CLAGETT. This is in response to comments that were made this morning. One was about public financing.

It has been widely assumed, both in testimony here today and elsewhere, that expenditure limits can, in effect, be restored through Federal subsidies. While it is quite true that the Supreme Court did not hold expenditure limits unconstitutional as applied to recipients of Federal subsidies, in my opinion, that issue remains wide open. The Court had no occasion to consider a claim by a candidate eligible for Federal subsidies; but to subject him to the expenditure limits in return for subsidies is to impose an unconstitutional condition on the offering of Federal benefits.

I think on the basis of the Court's precedence a strong case can be made that that is unconstitutional, and I would strongly recommend you lift the expenditure limits for candidates as well as for those whom the Court has listed that are nonaccepted.

Finally, I must also take issue with Senator Kennedy's answer to Senator Cannon's question this morning. Clearly, you could not make subsidies mandatory and attach expenditure limits to them. That would be precisely the imposition of general compulsory expenditure limits, which the court flatly held was unconstitutional.

Senator PELL. Thank you very much.

Senator Cannon.

Senator CANNON. Thank you very much.

Senator PELL. Our next witness is Ms. Cynthia Burke, Secretary, Committee for Democratic Election Laws.

Thank you for being so patient.

STATEMENT OF MS. CYNTHIA BURKE, NATIONAL SECRETARY, COMMITTEE FOR DEMOCRATIC ELECTION LAWS

Ms. BURKE. I will submit the full text of my statement for the record and just highlight a few points here.

The purpose of my testimony is to propose that the Federal Elections Commission, or whatever body is charged with administrating the FECA be empowered to grant exemptions from the requirements to report if evidence can be shown that such disclosure would subject candidates and their supporters to government harassment and economic reprisals.

Now, this proposal that the Committee on Election Law has to make is based on the precedents of the laws in Minnesota, Washington State, and Washington, D.C., all of which are similar to the Federal Election Commission.

It is also based on some language in the Supreme Court opinions on disclosure as it relates to minor parties and on page 3 of my statement, toward the middle, you will see that we point out that the Court describes what sort of evidence of harassment would be required to support a candidate's request for exemption from the requirements to report the identities of campaign contributors.

The Court said: "The evidence offered need show only a reasonable probability that the compelled disclosure of a party's contributors' names will subject them to threats, harassment or reprisals from either government officials or private parties.

"The proof may include, for example, specific evidence of past or present harassment of members due to their associational ties."

Now, the Committee which I represent is currently organizing support for a suit filed by the Socialist Workers campaign committee.

The suit was filed by the American Civil Liberties Union on behalf of the committee. I believe this committee has demonstrated government interference with the rights of supporters. I think that that case is a good one to demonstrate why such an exemption mechanism is needed for whatever body ends up charged with administering this law.

Now, just last October, a three-judge panel here in Washington, D.C., ordered the Washington, D.C., Board of Elections and Ethics to provide a hearing for the local Socialist Workers campaign committee.

The Court declared that it is within the powers of the Board to rule that the contributor-disclosure provisions of the law are constitutionally inapplicable to the Socialist Workers campaign committee if the evidence produced supports the plaintiffs' claim.

My Committee's proposal would put the Commission in accord with the spirit of the Supreme Court's opinion on this matter, which I urge the Senators to read carefully. It is simply not adequate to direct such parties to the courts for resolution of their concerns because this can be a very lengthy and extremely expensive process. I think that these parties and candidates are entitled to an inexpensive and speedy disposition of their problem and I think the proposal that we make today would be a step, positive step, in the direction of opening up the political system to all points of view.

Thank you.

Senator PELL. Thank you very much, Ms. Burke.

Senator Cannon?

Senator CANNON. No questions.

[The written statement of Ms. Burke follows:]

STATEMENT OF CYNTHIA BURKE, NATIONAL SECRETARY, COMMITTEE FOR DEMOCRATIC ELECTION LAWS

My name is Cynthia Burke and I am the national secretary of the Committee for Democratic Election Laws. The Committee is a non-partisan civil liberties organization which initiates and supports legal challenges to laws which restrict or deny ballot access or voting rights to any individual or political party.

The Committee submitted a friend of the court brief in the challenge to the Federal Election Campaign Act brought by former Senator Eugene McCarthy, Senator James Buckley, and the New York Civil Liberties Union. Our brief demonstrated how the Act, in its entirety, discriminates against third party and independent candidates and their supporters.

The Act's requirement that the identities of campaign contributors be disclosed to the government inhibits and deters supporters of parties and candidates with dissenting points of view from exercising constitutionally protected rights.

We were one of the first organizations to oppose this law as an unconstitutional interference by the government into the electoral arena for the purpose of propping up the Democratic and Republican parties and weakening their opposition from movements outside those two parties.

The Committee for Democratic Elections Laws is currently organizing support for a suit filed by the American Civil Liberties Union in September, 1974, on behalf of the Socialist Workers campaign committees. This suit contends that forced disclosure of the identities of socialist campaign supporters would subject them to harassment and persecution from government agencies like the CIA and FBI. Documentation of illegal surveillance of members and supporters of the SWP has come from the FBI itself which has been compelled under court order to release over 4,000 pages of formerly secret files in the course of another suit filed in 1973 by the Socialist Workers party seeking to bring an end to this illegal activity.

The Socialist Workers case demonstrates the need for a mechanism whereby this party, and other similarly affected, can gain relief from the contributor-disclosure requirements of the Act. My purpose in coming before you today is to propose that the Federal Election Commission be empowered to grant such exemptions. I will now motivate that proposal.

The recent Supreme Court decision on the McCarthy/Buckley suit was, overall, cotemptuous of the rights of supporters of third party and independent candidates and upheld most of the unconstitutional provisions of the Act. However, the Court's opinion on disclosure as it relates to third parties concurred with some of the observations made by the plaintiffs and friends of the court about the threat posed by forced disclosure of the identities of supporters of third party and independent political movements.

While upholding disclosure in general the Court said:

"It is undoubtedly true that public disclosure of contributions to candidates and political parties will deter some individuals who otherwise might contribute. In some instances, disclosure may even expose contributors to harassment or retaliation. These are not insignificant burdens on individual rights, and they must be weighed carefully against the interests which Congress has sought to promote by this legislation."

The Court went on to say:

"We are not unmindful that the damage done by disclosure to the associational interests of the minor parties and their members and to supporters of independents could be significant. These movements are less likely to have a sound financial base and thus are more vulnerable to falloffs in contributions. In some instances fear of reprisals may deter contributions to the point where the movement cannot survive. The public interest also suffers if that result comes to pass, for there is a consequent reduction in the free circulation of ideas both within and without the political arena."

The Court then described what sort of evidence of harassment would be required to support a request for exemption.

"The evidence offered need show only a reasonable probability that the compelled disclosure of a party's contributor's names will subject them to threats, harassment or reprisals from either government officials or private parties. The proof may include, for example, specific evidence of past or present harassment of members due to their associational ties."

The Socialist Workers Campaign Committee has demonstrated such a pattern of government interference with the rights of supporters. The seemingly never-ending revelations of government persecution of dissident organizations show that other parties and movements have been and will be subjected to the same treatment in the future.

That is why CoDEL proposes that the Federal Election Commission be empowered to conduct hearings and issue exemptions.

There is precedent for this in the laws of Minnesota, Washington state, and Washington, D.C., all of which are administered by commissions similar in function to the Federal Election Commission. In 1974 the Minnesota Ethics Commission exempted the Socialist Workers campaign committee from the requirements of that state's law for precisely the reasons that I have just gone into—incontrovertible evidence of government persecution of this legal American political party.

Just last October a three-judge panel here in Washington, D.C., ordered the Washington, D.C., Board of Elections and Ethics to provide a hearing for the local Socialist Workers campaign committee. The Court declared that it is within the powers of the Board to rule that the contributor-disclosure provisions of the law are constitutionally inapplicable to the Socialist Workers campaign committee if the evidence produced supports the plaintiff's claim.

My Committee's proposal would put the Commission in accord with the spirit of the Supreme Court's opinion on this matter. It is simply not adequate to direct such parties to the courts for resolution of their concerns. Going through the courts can be a lengthy and extremely expensive process. These parties and candidates are entitled to an inexpensive and speedy disposition of their problem.

I urge serious consideration of this proposal. The American electoral process, under the present circumstances, is not accessible to all. The proposal that I have made would be a positive step in the direction of opening up the political system to all points of view.

Thank you.

FACT SHEET ON SOCIALIST WORKERS CHALLENGE TO FEDERAL ELECTION CAMPAIGN ACT OF 1971

(Socialist Workers 1974 National Campaign Committee, et al., versus Hon. W. Pat Jennings, et al.)

1. The suit was filed in September, 1974, by attorneys Joel Gora, staff counsel of the American Civil Liberties Union, and Paul Chevigny of the New York Civil Liberties Union.

2. The suit, filed in federal court, asks that provisions of the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971 be declared unconstitutional on their face and as applied to the Socialist Workers campaign committees. The ACLU suit maintains that the law violates the First, Fourth and Ninth amendment rights of the plaintiffs and cites government-admitted programs of surveillance and attempted disruption of the Socialist Workers party as the basis for requesting that the campaign committees not be forced to turn over the names of contributors and vendors to the government. The case is now in pre-trial discovery. Common Cause requested and was granted the status of co-defendant with the government.

3. FBI and CIA harassment directed against the Socialist Workers party is documented in the party's suit against the federal government seeking an end to this illegal activity (Socialist Workers Party, et al, versus Attorney General of the United States, et al.) Attorneys for that suit are Leonard Boudin and Herbert Jordan. Support and fundraising for the costs of this case is coordinated by the Political Rights Defense Fund.

4. Eleven local challenges have been filed against the application of state and municipal disclosure laws to the Socialist Workers campaign committees. Many of these are being handled by the American Civil Liberties Union.

5. In September, 1974, the Minnesota Ethics Commission voted to exempt the Minnesota Socialist Workers Campaign Committee from disclosure on the basis of government harassment.

6. In October, 1975, a three judge panel in Washington, D.C., ordered the D.C. Board of Elections and Ethics to provide a hearing wherein the local Socialist Workers campaign committee can present evidence of government harassment pursuant to a request for exemption from the disclosure provisions of the local ordinance. This case (Doe v. Martin) was cited in the Supreme Court ruling on the Buckley/McCarthy challenge to the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1974.

Senator PELL. Thank you very much for being with us and for your patience in sticking through all this. I apologize for moving ahead as we did.

This winds up these hearings.

At this point in the hearing record, I submit written statements or letters of additional interested persons who were not able to appear here today to testify.

[The material referred to follows:]

STATEMENT BY HON. BILL FRENZEL, A U.S. REPRESENTATIVE FROM THE STATE OF MINNESOTA

Mr. Chairman, I regret that I was unable to appear before the Subcommittee this morning. My Ways and Means Committee is marking up the Debt Ceiling Bill, so I could not be present here.

I urge your Subcommittee to promptly pass a bill to reconstitute the Federal Elections Commission. The bill should provide for the normal Presidential appointment and Senate confirmation of the six-person Commission on a staggered term basis, as provided in either the Schweiker bill or the Scott-Kennedy Bill.

My first preference is to pass a reconstitution bill with no frills. I have a great fear that the addition of extra baggage to a reconstitution bill could imperil the passage or signing of that bill especially if the extra baggage is controversial.

Nevertheless, I realize that some amendments will be added. My feelings on the principal proposals to date are as follows:

1. I think the Congress should exercise self-restraint and not add a congressional public financing provision. Not only would it be more appropriate to consider congressional public financing after we had a chance to evaluate the experience of Presidential public financing, but also no feature presents a greater risk in getting a reconstitution bill signed than public financing.

2. I do not think that it is reasonable at this time to accept the Buckley-Steiger proposal to raise contribution limits. I am sympahetic with that concept, but since the current election process is already in midstream, this is no time to change horses. Again, it would be better to review this matter after the election in light of the 1976 experience.

3. The proposals for an independent prosecutor should be reviewed. The present Commission is based on the concept of compliance rather than prosecution. We would hope that prosecution would be limited and that our election laws would be structured to encourage people to take part in the political process rather than to scare them out of it.

4. I would urge that Congress not be given a veto over advisory opinions. The Congress so far has vetoed each set of regulations to come before it. No set of regulations has become effective yet. Candidates must have some basis on which to act. Right now the only basis we have is advisory opinions. Further, I believe the veto of advisory opinions gives Congress too much control over the Commission.

5. There have been suggestions to emphasize further the compliance aspects of the law over the prosecution aspects. In particular a 30 day compliance period has been suggested. I support this idea and hope the Senate will consider it.

6. There are also proposals to ensure disclosure of independent expenditures and disclaimers on independent media expenditures. Since the court decision has apparently opened a large loophole in this area, I think its proposals are worthwhile and hope the Senate will agree to them.

7. Perhaps the most controversial suggestion is one which either negates the advisory opinion 23, the SUNPAC case, or use the roundabout approach to do the same things by requiring that advisory opinions be put into regulation from within a time certain or expire. This controversial proposal carries with it the element of risk about the final enactment of this legislation. I hope Congress can resist the temptation to mess around in this area.

Thank you for the opportunity to present this testimony to your Committee.

STATEMENT BY ROBERT S. STRAUSS, CHAIRMAN, DEMOCRATIC NATIONAL COMMITTEE

Mr. Chairman. I wish to take this opportunity to express my concern as Chairman of the Democratic National Committee, for the interests of my Party, our presidential candidates, and the Federal Election Campaign Act in light of the recent Supreme Court ruling on Buckley v. Valeo.

First let me say that in my judgment, the Court's opinion was a substantive victory for those of us who have felt so strongly about the need for reform and regulation on campaign financing.

I need not chronicle for you the activity of the Democratic Party in seeking a legislative response to the faults in our political system that became manifest during the Watergate tragedy. We were the propelling force in the enactment of the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1974. We knew then, and we know even better now, that the reform act was not perfect, but that it did substantively address many of the major abuses that have plagued American federal campaigns for many years. I want to make it very clear that I have no intention of retreating from my support, nor our Party's support, of the major tenents of this legisaltive act. We support the Law, and the enforcement and strengthening of its provisions. In light of the Supreme Court decision, I have concerns about the ability of candidates to function on a day-to-day basis.

We have to be fully cognizant of political reality, and determine a course of action that will provide immediate stability and continuity and preserve as much as possible of the original design. This can only be accomplished by a realistic timetable of legislative and executive action.

This is not the time to chronicle the record of the Federal Election Commission—it has both advocates and detractors. Generally, I believe the FEC to have done an admirable job in very fresh terrain, under tense and difficult circumstances. It is a source of stability and a resource of technical assistance. We must strive to insure that a sense of continuity be maintained for the 1976 election process, and the public's funds carefully disbursed throughout this critical political year.

It is very clear that continuity at this point has indeed been disrupted by the Supreme Court decision. Questions have been raised and remain unanswered. Indeed, our legal staff has prepared a detailed official complaint against the President and the President Ford Committee, documenting substantive and serious violations of the Federal Election Campaign Act with respect to President Ford's 1975 travels. Yet our complaint remains unfiled. We do not know who or what to file it with. No one knows what the state of reform will be on March 1, 1976. This instability and vagueness are dangerous and unconscionable, as well as unfair to candidates of both parties. We must restore structure and order to the process without delay.

I do not seek to make a normative evaluation of the many proposals that are now before you. But I do want to make a realistic presentation of political reality in light of the very short timetable that we are presented with.

I do not wish to prejudge the possible legislative outcome or merit of any of the proposals that have been introduced to amend the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1974. Indeed, I would hope that my comments help to create a climate in which these proposals can be given full and responsible debate and resolution. But we have an immediate problem, and in light of this urgency, I urge you to consider and adopt emergency legislation which will give an appropriate institution the power to issue certifications, advisory opinions and interpretive rulings forthwith. Obviously, I would be positively disposed to legislation providing for public financing of congressional elections, as in S. 2919. However, time is so critical and so short that I urge you to tackle immediate problems before commencing activities in still newer and fresher areas of political reform.

We are all well aware of the broad range of thought, and the intensity of feeling, which exist on the subject of reform of the financing of American politics. A parallel continuum exists with respect to the performance and propriety of the Federal Election Commission. Yet, this is not my most pressing concern. My responsibilities as Chairman of the Democratic National Committee, make me focus on the incalcuable problems faced by my presidential candidates as long as the status of the FEC remains in question. Most of our candidates cannot sustain even a lapse of a few days in the payment of federal matching funds. Many of our compaigns are operating on a day-to-day cash flow. A time lapse in the certification and distribution of federal funds could be so disruptive to the political process that it could have a dangerous impact on the outcome of both the Democratic and Republican presidential nominating systems. This must be avoided.

You on this Committee, and in Congress can avoid such a course of events by prompt remedial action. It is my first preference that you act favorably on S. 2911 so that the current structures and procedures of the Federal Election Commission proceed uninterrupted and unchanged, subject to the appropriate Executive appointment which would bring the Commission into compliance with the Court's ruling, If, however, passage of S. 2911 cannot be accomplished prior to March 1, 1976, I am prepared to ask the Supreme Court for a 30 day extension of the Commission's mandated responsibility. As we in the political processes proceed via the appropriate judicial route, I would hope that Congress too would proceed expeditiously at the very least to enact S. 2918 which would prevent any disruption in the payments of funds to our presidential candidates and political parties.

Obviously, I believe it crucial that you act quickly to avoid continuing disruption. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the opportunity to present my views on behalf of the National Democratic Party, and commend you for your diligent attention to these problems so very decisive to the 1976 political process. Thank you.

U.S. SENATE,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D.C., February 16, 1976.

HON. CLAIBORNE PELL,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Privileges and Elections, Committee on Rules and Administration, U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR PELL: I am taking the liberty of presenting two suggestions for the Subcommittee's consideration in connection with hearings and proposals modifying the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971, as amended, in the aftermath of Buckley v. Valeo. These suggestions grow out of my experiences as an ex officio member of the Commission.

The first suggestion concerns the continued presence of ex officio members on a presidentially appointed Federal Election Commission as is provided in S. 2911 introduced by Senators Schweiker and Cranston and S. 2912 offered by Senators Kennedy and Scott (Pa.). A second suggestion relates to the availability to the Senate of information on alternatives such as that provided in S. 2918, also introduced by Senators Kennedy and Scott (Pa), a bill which proposes, at least, on a temporary basis, to turn over the certification function with regard to presidential funding to the Comptroller-General.

The position of the voting members of the Federal Election Commission on these various proposals is one which will be presented by Commissioners Thompson and Aikens at your hearing on February 18. The suggestions contained in this letter do not reflect on their position but rather relate to matters of peculiar interest to the Senate as I see the situation.

As an ex officio member of the Commission, it has been my intention that the office of the Secretary of the Senate represent the Senate as an institution of government with a vital interest in the successful functioning of the Federal electoral process. My office has endeavored therefore to exercise our best judgment in this connection on various subjects and issues before the Commission which would be reflective of the public interest as well as in accordance with the law. In that perspective, it seems to me that the Senate's ex officio member also serves as a focal point for exchange of information leading to a better understanding of problems of Senate candidates and campaigns as distinct from problems associated with House and presidential candidates and campaigns. Similarly, it is my hope that this office will be able to provide insight into the problems of candidates for the Senate as they relate to the Commission's decisions and rules. It also seems to me valid for the Senate's ex officio to make recommendations to the Senate Rules Committee with a view to adjustments to the law which may be revealed by experience to be desirable.

Other responsibilities prevent me from spending a great deal of time at the Commission. In order, however, to insure a full participation on the part of the Senate, I have, with the concurrence of the Majority and Minority Leaders, designated a Special Deputy of the Secretary of the Senate, (Ms. Harriet Robnett, J.D.) who is assigned exclusively to work in connection with the Commission.

At the inception of the present Commission, I held the view and other members concurred that ex officio members should have all rights and privileges and responsibilities of the other Commissioners, except the right to vote. From time to time, we have experienced some reluctance to observe that understanding on the part of the voting-members of the Commission and its staff.

The need and value of an ex officio member is, of course, a matter primarily for determination by the Senate and the Congress. The Subcommittee may wish to discuss the role or define it differently than I have herein described. I have no wish to intrude on the decision of the Subcommittee in this regard but I do wish to suggest that the role of the ex officio be discussed at your hearing and be considered by the Subcommittee with reference to any proposal it may recommend to the full Committee.

In the event the Subcommittee favorably reports at this time a bill providing for changes in the Commission to comply with the Court's decision and includes therein provision for the continued participation of the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives as ex officio members, I believe that an amendment should be added expressly noting that ex officio members have all rights, privileges and responsibilities of voting members of the Commission except for the right to vote. Additionally, I hope the Subcommittee will consider the need to assure that the ex officio officer, as a matter of right, shall be empowered to participate fully, except for the vote, in meetings of the Commission and that an ex officio member may be represented by a formally designated special deputy acting on his behalf and in his absence. An amendment to accomplish such a result would provide for the addition of the word "voting" in the second sentence of section 437c(c) of Title 2, U.S.C. so that the sentence as amended would read: "A voting member of the Commission may not delegate to any person his vote or any decisionmaking authority or duty vested in the Commission by the provisions of this title."

Turning now to a second suggestion for your consideration. I know you recognize that what remains of the thirty day stay of judgment granted by the Supreme Court as it affects the powers and duties of the Federal Election Commission is brief indeed. The time frame could be actually inadequate to complete Senate and House consideration, action and agreement on any legislation including proposals to reconstitute the Commission. I believe, therefore, that it would be particularly helpful to the deliberations of the Senate to have available for members as much accurate information as possible concerning alternative methods for handling presidential campaign financing duties now carried out by the Commission.

It is with that in mind that I would suggest that Treasury be invited to present oral or written testimony concerning what action, if any, it could take concerning payment of Presidential campaign funds should Congress and the President not agree on legislation during the thirty day stay period. I also believe Treasury's comments should be sought on whether the Treasury itself, if authorized by law to do so, could take over the functions of certification possibly under arrangements utilizing the Federal Election Commission including their staff and procedures.

The above suggestion is of particular pertinence in view of the letter of February 5 to the Majority Leader from the Comptroller General wherein the latter describes the prospect of a possible transfer of the certification function as disruptive and one that his office is inadequately prepared to take.

The determination of legislation affecting the Commission and certification, of course, will lie with the House as well as the Senate. However, whatever decision is reached, I believe would be improved by assuring so far as possible at all stages of the legislative process the availability of accurate information on the scope of alternatives open for Congressional action.

In closing, allow me to express again my hope that the Subcommittee will consider, discuss and determine the merits of continuing the presence of the Secretary of the Senate as an ex officio member on a new Commission under the pending legislative proposals. The inclusion of this letter in the printing record of your hearings would be appreciated.

Sincerely,

FRANCIS R. VALEO,
Secretary of the Senate.

Senator PELL. Thank you all for the interest you have displayed in this very important matter.

The Subcommittee on Privileges and Elections appreciates having the benefit of your views and studies.

The meeting is adjourned.

[Whereupon, at 4:55 p.m., the hearing in the above-entitled matter was adjourned.]

The court before which such suit, action, or other proceeding is pending may, on motion or supplemental petition filed at any time within twelve months after the date of enactment of this Act, allow such suit, action, or other proceeding to be maintained against the Federal Election Commission if the party making the motion or filing the petition shows a necessity for the survival of the suit, action, or other proceeding to obtain a settlement of the question involved.

(6) Any reference in any other Federal law to the Federal Election Commission, or to any member or employee thereof, as such Commission existed under the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971 before its amendment by this Act shall be held and considered to refer to the Federal Election Commission, or the members or employees thereof, as such Commission exists under the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971 as amended by this Act.

"ENFORCEMENT

"SEC. 313. (a)(1) Any person who believes a violation of this Act or of chapter 95 or chapter 96 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954, has occurred may file a complaint with the Commission. Such complaint shall be in writing, shall be signed and sworn to by the person filing such complaint, and shall be notarized. Any person filing such a complaint shall be subject to the provisions of section 1001 of title 18, United States Code. The Commission may not conduct any investigation under this section, or take any other action under this section, solely on the basis of a complaint of a person whose identity is not disclosed to the Commission.

"(2) The Commission, upon receiving a complaint under paragraph (1), or if it has reason to believe that any person has committed a violation of this Act or of chapter 95 or chapter 96 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954, shall notify the person involved of such alleged violation and shall make an investigation of such alleged violation in accordance with the provisions of this section.

"(3) Any investigation under paragraph (2) shall be conducted expeditiously and shall include an investigation, conducted in accordance with the provisions of this section, of reports and statements filed by any complainant under this title, if such complainant is a candidate. Any notification or investigation made under paragraph (2) shall not be made public by the Commission or by any other person without the written consent of the person receiving such notification or the person with respect to whom such investigation is made.

"(4) The Commission shall afford any person who receives notice of an alleged violation under paragraph (2) a reasonable opportunity to demonstrate that no action should be taken against such person by the Commission under this Act.

"(5) (A) If the Commission determines that there is reason to believe that any person has committed or is about to commit a violation of this Act or of chapter 95 or chapter 96 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954, the Commission shall make every endeavor to correct or prevent such violation by informal methods of conference, conciliation, and persuasion, and to enter into a conciliation agreement with the person involved. A conciliation agreement, unless violated, shall constitute an absolute bar to any further action by the Commission, including bringing a civil proceeding under paragraph (B) of this section.

"(B) If the Commission is unable to correct or prevent any such violation by such informal methods, the Commission may, if the Commission determines there is probable cause to believe that a violation has occurred or is about to occur, institute a civil action for relief, including a permanent or temporary injunction, restraining order, or any other appropriate order in the district court of the United States for the district in which the person against whom such action is found, resides, or transacts business.

"(C) In any civil action instituted by the Commission under paragraph (B), the court shall grant a permanent or temporary injunction, restraining order, or other order upon a proper showing that the person involved has engaged or is about to engage in a violation of this Act or of chapter 95 or chapter 96 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954.

"(D) If the Commission determines that there is probable cause to believe that a knowing and willful violation under section 329(a), or a knowing and willful violation of a provision of chapter 95 or 96 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954, has occurred or is about to occur, it may refer such apparent violation to the Attorney General of the United States without regard to the limitations set forth in subparagraph (A) of this paragraph.

"(6) If the Commission believes that there is clear and convincing proof that a knowing and willful violation of the Act or chapter 95 or 96 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 has been committed, any conciliation agreement entered into by the Commission under paragraph (5)(A) may include a requirement that the person involved in such conciliation agreement shall pay a civil penalty which does not exceed the greater of (A) $10,000; or (B) an amount equal to 300 percent of the amount of any contribution or expenditure involved in such violation. The Commission shall make available to the public the results of any conciliation attempt including any conciliation agreement entered into by the Commission and any determination by the Commission that no violation of the Act or chapter 95 or 96 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 has occurred.

"(7) In any civil action for relief instituted by the Commission under paragraph (5), if the court determines that the Commission has established through clear and convincing proof that the person involved in such civil action has committed a knowing and willful violation of this Act or of chapter 95 or 96 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954, the court may impose a civil penalty of not more than the greater of (A) $10,000; or (B) an amount equal to 300 percent of the contribution or expenditure involved in such violation. In any case in which such person has entered into a conciliation agreement with the Commission under paragraph (5) (A), the Commission may institute a civil action for relief under paragraph (5) if it believes that such person has violated any provision of such conciliation agreement. In order for the Commission to obtain relief in any such civil action, it shall be sufficient for the Commission to establish that such person has violated, in whole or in part, any requirement of such conciliation agreement.

"(8) In any action brought under paragraph (5) or paragraph (7) of this subsection, subpenas for witnesses who are required to attend a United States district court may run into any other district.

"(9) (A) Any party aggrieved by an order of the Commission dismissing a complaint filed by such party under paragraph (1), or by a failure on the part of the Commission to act on such complaint in accordance with the provisions of this section within ninety days after the filing of such complaint, may file a petition with the United States District Court for the District of Columbia.

"(B) The filing of any action under subparagraph (A) shall be made—

"(i) in the case of the dismissal of a complaint by the Commission, no later than sixty days after such dismissal; or

"(ii) in the case of a failure on the part of the Commission to act on such complaint, no later than sixty days after the ninety-day period specified in subparagraph (A).

"(C) In such proceeding the court may declare that the dismissal of the complaint or the action, or the failure to act, is contrary to law and may direct the Commission to proceed in conformity with that declaration within thirty days, failing which the complainant may bring in his own name a civil action to remedy the violation complained of.

"(10) The judgment of the district court may be appealed to the court of appeals and the judgment of the court of appeals affirming or settling aside, in whole or in part, any such order of the district court shall be final, subject to review by the Supreme Court of the United States upon certiorari or certification as provided in section 1254 of title 28, United States Code.

"(11) Any action brought under this subsection shall be advanced on the docket of the court in which filed, and put ahead of all other actions (other than other actions brought under this subsection or under section 314).

"(12) If the Commission determines after an investigation that any person has violated an order of the court entered in a proceeding brought under paragraph (5), it may petition the court for an order to adjudicate that person in civil contempt, or, if it believes the violation to be knowing and willful, it may instead petition the court for an order to adjudicate that person in criminal contempt.

"(b) In any case in which the Commission refers an apparent violation to the Attorney General, the Attorney General shall respond by report to the Commission with respect to any action taken by the Attorney General regarding such apparent violation. Each report shall be transmitted no later than sixty days after the date the Commission refers any apparent violation, and at the close of every thirty-day period thereafter until there is final disposition of such apparent violation. The Commission may from time to time prepare and publish reports on the status of such referrals.".

For purposes of this paragraph, the term 'political committee' means an organization registered as a political committee under section 303 for a period of not less than six months which has received contributions from more than fifty persons and, except for any State political party organization, has made contributions to five or more candidates for Federal office. "(3) No individual shall make contributions aggregating more than $25,000 in any calendar year. For purposes of this paragraph, any contribution made to a candidate in a year other than the calendar year in which the election is held with respect to which such contribution was made, is considered to be made during the calendar year in which such election is held.

"(4) For purposes of this subsection—

"(A) contributions to a named candidate made to any political committee authorized by such candidate to accept contributions on his behalf shall be considered to be contributions made to such candidate;

"(B) (i) expenditures made by any person in cooperation, consultation, or concert, with, or at the request or suggestion of, a candidate, his authorized political committees, or their agents, shall be considered to be a contribution to such candidate;

"(ii) the financing by any person of the dissemination, distribution, or republication, in whole or in part, of any broadcast or any written, graphic, or other form of campaign materials prepared by the candidate, his campaign committees, or their authorized agents shall be considered to be an expenditure for purposes of this paragraph; and

"(C) contributions made to or for the benefit of any candidate nominated by a political party for election to the office of Vice President of the United States shall be considered to be contributions made to or for the benefit of the candidate of such party for election to the office of President of the United States.

"(6) For purposes of the limitations imposed by this section, all contributions made by a person, either directly or indirectly, on behalf of a particular candidate, including contributions which are in any way earmarked or otherwise directed through an intermediary or conduit to such candidate, shall be treated as contributions from such person to such candidate. The intermediary or conduit shall report the original source and the intended recipient of such contribution to the Commission and to the intended recipient.

"(b) No candidate for the office of President of the United States who is eligible under section 9003 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to condition for eligibility for payments) or under section 9033 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to eligibility for payments) to receive payments from the Secretary of the Treasury may make expenditures in excess of—

"(A) $10,000,000, in the case of a campaign for nomination for election to such office, except the aggregate of expenditures under this subparagraph in any one State shall not exceed the greater of 16 cents multiplied by the voting age population of the State (as certified under subsection (e)), or $200,000; or

"(B) $20,000,000 in the case of a campaign for election to such office.

"(2) For purposes of this subsection—

"(A) expenditures made by or on behalf of any candidate nominated by a political party for election to the office of Vice President of the United States shall be considered to be expenditures made by or on behalf of the candidate of such party for election to the office of President of the United States; and

"(2) The national committee of a political party may not make any expenditure in connection with the general election campaign of any candidate for President of the United States who is affiliated with such party which exceeds an amount equal to 2 cents multiplied by the voting age population of the United States (as certified under subsection (e)). Any expenditure under this paragraph shall be in addition to any expenditure by a national committee of a political party serving as the principal campaign committee of a candidate for the office of the President of the United States.

"(3) The national committee of a political party, or a State committee of a political party, including any subordinate committee of a State committee, may not make any expenditure in connection with the general election campaign of a candidate for Federal office in a State who is affiliated with such party which exceeds—

"(A) in the case of a candidate for election to the office of Senator, or of Representative from a State which is entitled to only one Representative the greater of—

"(i) 2 cents multiplied by the voting age population of the State (as certified under subsection (e)); or

"(ii) $20,000; and

"(B) in the case of a candidate for election to the office of Representative, Delegate, or Resident Commissioner in any other State, $10,000.

"(e) During the first week of January, 1975, and every subsequent year, the Secretary of Commerce shall certify to the Commission and publish in the Federal Register an estimate of the voting age population of the United States, of each State, and of each congressional district as of the first day of July next preceding the date of certification. The term 'voting age population' means resident population, eighteen years of age or older.

"(f) No candidate or political committee shall know-

"(g) The Commission shall prescribe rules under which any expenditure by a candidate for Presidential nomination for use in two or more States shall be attributed to such candidate's expenditure limitation in each such State, based on the voting age population in such State which can reasonably be expected to be influenced by such expenditure.

"FRAUDULENT MISREPRESENTATION OF CAMPAIGN AUTHORITY

"SEC. 328. No person who is a candidate for Federal office or an employee or agent of such a candidate shall—

"PENALTY FOR VIOLATIONS

"SEC. 329. FEDERAL ELECTION CAMPAIGN ACT AMENDMENTS OF 1976

Mr. CANNON, from the Committee on Rules and Administration, submitted the following together with

REPORT

MINORITY VIEWS

[To accompany S. 3065]

The Committee on Rules and Administration, having considered an original bill to amend the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971, as amended in 1974, to provide for its administration by a Federal Election Commission appointed in accordance with the requirements of the Constitution, and to amend certain other provisions of law relating to the financing and conduct of such campaigns, reports favorably thereon, and recommends that the bill do pass.

PURPOSE OF THE BILL

This recommended legislation is a measure designed to reconstitute the Federal Election Commission as an independent executive branch agency, having six commissioners appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and to make certain other amendments of law necessary and desirable in light of the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in Buckley v. Valeo (Nos. 75-436, 75-437, decided January 30, 1976).

During the 92d Congress (1971–1972) the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971 (P.L. 92–225) was enacted to provide sweeping and thorough control over and public disclosure of receipts and expenditures in both Federal primary and general elections. The Federal Election Campaign Act Amendments of 1974, enacted during the 93d Congress (P.L. 93–443), amended the 1971 Act extensively. The resulting law provided for overall limitations on campaign expenditures and political contributions, extensive reporting and recordkeeping requirements for candidates and political committees, and the establishment of a Federal Election Commission with extensive powers to administer and enforce the Act. The law also provided for the public financing of Presidential primary and general elections and conventions.

On January 30, 1976, the Supreme Court of the United States, in Buckley v. Valeo, upheld the contribution limitations, the recordkeeping and disclosure requirements of the Act and the provisions for public financing of Presidential elections and conventions. However, the Court held that certain expenditure limitations under the Act were in violation of the First Amendment and that the exercise of administrative and enforcement powers delegated to the Commission was unconstitutional because of the way in which its members were appointed.

Public hearings were held by the Subcommittee on Privileges and Elections, chaired by Senator Claiborne Pell, on February 18, 1976. Witnesses appeared to testify and submit written statements on the impact of the Supreme Court's decision and on the many bills which had been introduced in response to that decision: S. 2911, Amendment No. 1396 to S. 2911, S. 2912, S. 2918, S. 2953, S. 2980, and S. 2987.

On February 20, 1976, the Subcommittee on Privileges and Elections referred an original bill to the Committee on Rules and Administration, without recommendation, to be used as a working draft by the Committee in its consideration of legislation. The Subcommittee also unanimously adopted a resolution recommending that the Committee on Rules and Administration report legislation to amend the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971, as amended—

(a) to reconstitute the Federal Election Commission as an independent executive branch agency, having six commissioners to be appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate; and

(b) to make such other changes in the Act as may be necessary and desirable in light of the Supreme Court decision in the case of Buckley v. Valeo.

The Committee on Rules and Administration held mark-up sessions on February 25 and 26, and March 1, 1976, and on March 4, 1976, ordered an original bill reported to the Senate.

This bill as reported to the Senate provides for a Federal Election Commission appointed in accordance with the requirements of the Constitution. The bill also gives the Commission exclusive and primary jurisdiction for the civil enforcement of the Act and of the public financing of presidential campaigns and transfers many of the criminal code provisions relating to Federal election campaigns from Title 18, U.S.C., to the 1971 Act. Additional civil enforcement powers are given to the Commission and procedures are established for the investigation of violations of the Act in order to expand the powers of the Commission in this respect and provide greater public disclosure of Commission enforcement activities. The penalty provisions of the law are restructured to provide criminal penalties for substantial violations and civil penalties and disclosure for less substantial violations, as well as protection for persons who enter into and adhere to conciliation agreements with the Commission. The bill also proposes a number of changes in the law relating to campaign contributions and expenditures to reflect the decision of the Supreme Court in Buckley v. Valeo, and to restrict, within the constitutional limitations set by the Supreme Court, the flow of excessive sums of money into political campaigns. In doing so, the bill reflects in many ways the intent of the Congress in passing the Federal Election Campaign Act Amedments of 1974 (P.L. 93–433).

Section-by-Section Analysis

SHORT TITLE

Section 1 provides that the Act may be cited as the "Federal Election Campaign Act Amendments of 1976."

FEDERAL ELECTION COMMISSION MEMBERSHIP

Section 101 provides that the Commission is to consist of the Secretary of the Senate, the Clerk of the House, both ex officio and without the right to vote, and 6 members appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Of the members appointed by the President no more than 3 at any time may be affiliated with the same political party.

The bill provides for six-year terms for members with the terms of two members, not affiliated with the same political party, expiring every two years, beginning in 1977, so that members are not reappointed in an election year. Vacancies are filled only for the remainder of the term during which the vacancy occurred. Reappointment is to be made in the same manner as the appointment.

Section 101(c)(1) prohibits Commissioners from engaging in any outside business or professional activity while holding office. This section will not become effective until two years after the date this bill becomes law.

Section 101(c)(2) provides that the Commission has exclusive and primary jurisdiction with respect to the civil enforcement of the Federal Election Campaign Act and of the provisions of the Internal Reserve Code of 1954 relating to the public financing of Presidential elections. This section also recites a reservation of congressional prerogatives reserved to the Congress under the Constitution.

Section 101(c)(3) provides that the Commission may not establish guidelines, initiate civil actions, render advisory opinions, make regulations, conduct investigations, or report apparent violations of law without an affirmative vote of 4 members of the Commission, no less than two of whom are affiliated with the same political party.

Section 101(d) of the bill exempts Commission staff appointments from the provisions of Title 5, United States Code, relating to the competitive service, classification, and General Schedule pay rates. This provision maintains the present exempt status of Commission appointments.

Section 101(e) relates to the appointment of new members. It urges the expeditious appointment of new members, provides that the first appointments to the new Commission are not appointments to fill unexpired terms, provides that the terms of all the present Commissioners end when a majority of the new Commissioners are appointed and qualified, and gives statutory recognition to the limited power of the reconstituted Commission under the decision of the Supreme Court in Buckley v. Valeo (Nos. 75–436, 75–437, January 30, 1976).

Section 101(f) permits the present Commissioners to be appointed to the new Commission by waiving the prohibition against the appointment of individuals to the Commission presently holding Federal office.

Transfer and continuity provisions

Section 101(g) of the bill facilitates the transition between the Commission as presently constituted and the Commission as reconstituted by this Act by providing for the transfer of personnel, liabilities, contracts, property, and records employed, held, or used primarily in connection with the functions of the Commission as presently constituted. It provides that the transfer of personnel under this section shall be without reduction in classification or compensation for one year after such transfer. Thus, no person's salary or position shall be reduced solely because of the transfer. This provision does not bar a dismissal or reduction in salary by the Commission for reasons other than the transfer. This section also preserves all actions, suits, and other proceedings commenced by or against the Commission or any officer or employee thereof acting in his official capacity. It also preserves all orders, determinations, rules, advisory opinions, and opinions of counsel made, issued, or granted by the Commission before its reconstitution.

DEFINITIONAL CHANGES

Several provisions of Title 18 of the criminal code relating to limitations on contributions, to contributions by foreign principals, to limitations on honoraria, etc., are transferred by the bill to the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971. The amendments to the definitions contained in Section 102 of the bill thus will apply both to reporting and disclosure, and to the provisions containing these limitations.

Section 102(a) amends the definition of "election" in Section 301(a)(2) of the Act (2 U.S.C. 431(a)(2)), nominating conventions and caucuses, by changing "held to nominate a candidate" in present law to "which has authority to nominate a candidate."

Section 102(b) amends the definition of "contribution" in Section 301(e)(2) of the Act (2 U.S.C. 431(e)(2)) where it says "contribution means a contract, promise, or agreement, expressed or implied, whether or not legally enforceable, to make a contribution" by inserting the word "written" before the word "contract."

Section 102(c) amends the definition of "contribution" to exclude legal and accounting services rendered to or on behalf of the national committee of a political party which don't directly further the candidacy of a particular candidate and for such services rendered to or on behalf of any candidate or political committee for the purpose of complying with the requirements of the Act and chapters 95 and 96 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954. The amendment requires these payments to be reported and disclosed but permits them to be ignored in determining contribution and expenditure limitations.

Section 102(d) amends the definition of "expenditure" to exclude certain fund-raising costs and payments for legal and accounting services (under the circumstances discussed above). The exclusion of some fund-raising costs for purposes of the limits on expenditures by publicly-financed presidential candidates conforms to present law and was made necessary by the tranfer of the provisions setting forth those limits to the 1971 Act.

Section 102(e) adds the word "Act" to the list of terms defined in the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971, and defines "independent expenditure" to reflect the definition of that term in the Supreme Court's decision in Buckley v. Valeo.

ORGANIZATION OF POLITICAL COMMITTEES

Identification of contributors

Subsections (a) and (b) of Section 103 of the bill amend Section 302 of the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971 (2 U.S.C. 432 (b)) to reduce the accounting and recordkeeping burdens for political committees by requiring that records be kept only on contributions in excess of $100, instead of in excess of $10. The bill also states that a contributor's occupation does not include the name of the employer, firm, business associates, customers, or clients, for record keeping purposes.

Section 103(c) would strike out Section 302(e) of the Act (2 U.S.C. 432(e)) which requires that notice of unauthorized activities by political committees be disclosed on the literature and advertisements circulated by those committees. The subject is covered by Section 111 of the bill which sets forth a new Section 323 of the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971.

REPORTS BY POLITICAL COMMITTEES AND CANDIDATES

Section 104(a) amends the reporting and disclosure provisions of Section 304(a)(1) of the Act (2 U.S.C. 434(a)(1)) to provide that, in a non-election year, a candidate and his authorized committees must file quarterly reports only for quarters in which more than $5,000 is received or spent. If amounts in excess of $5,000 are not received in any quarter, the candidate and his committees must still file the annual report.

Section 104(b) amends Section 304(a)(2) of the Act (2 U.S.C. 434(a)(2)) to require that only political committees authorized by a candidate file reports with a candidate's principal campaign committee. This clarifies an anomaly in present law under which all multicandidate committees are obligated to file reports with the principal campaign committees of various candidates.

Section 104(c) of the bill changes present contributor identification requirements by making it clear that the term "occupation" does not mean employer, firm, business associates, customers, or clients, and by adding a provision requiring disclosure of a contributor's place of employment. It also provides that reports filed with the Commission need not contain the name of a contributor's or lender's employer, firm, business associates, customers, or clients.

Section 104(c) of the bill also adds a new reporting requirement for political committees which are not authorized candidates' committees. Any such committee which spends more than $100 expressly advocating the election or defeat of a clearly identified candidate is required to identify the expenditure as being in support of, or in opposition to a candidate, and requires a certification with respect to whether the expenditure was made in cooperation with the campaign of any candidate. Section 104(d) of the bill imposes a similar reporting requirement on any person, other than a political committee or a candidate, who makes contributions or expenditures expressly advocating the election or defeat of a clearly identified candidate in excess of $100 within a calendar year. This section also requires the Commission to prepare an index setting forth, on a candidate-by-candidate basis, all campaign expenditures relating to a candidate and issue the indices on a timely pre-election basis. Sections 104(c) and 104(d) of the bill require disclosure of those expenditures that expressly advocate a particular election result, a disclosure requirement explicitly held to be constitutional by the Supreme Court in Buckley v. Valeo.

REPORTS BY CERTAIN PERSONS

Section 105 repeals Section 308 of the Act (2 U.S.C. 438(a)), held unconstitutional by the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia circuit in Buckley v. Valeo. That portion of the Court's decision was not appealed to the Supreme Court.

POWERS OF COMMISSION

Section 106 amends Section 310 of the Act (2 U.S.C. 437c(a)) and adds to the Commission's powers of authority to formulate general policy, prescribe forms and regulations, the power to bring civil actions to enforce the provisions of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 relating to public financing of Presidential elections. This section also provides that, with the exception of actions brought by an individual aggrieved by an action by the Commission, the power of the Commission to initiate civil actions is the exclusive civil remedy for the enforcement of the provisions of the Act.

ADVISORY OPINIONS

Section 107(a) of the bill amends Section 312(a) of the Act (2 U.S.C. 437f(a)) to broaden the class of persons who are authorized to request advisory opinions to include the Democratic caucus and the Republican conference of each House of the Congress.

Section 107(b) of the bill amends Section 312(b) of the Act (2 U.S.C. 437f(b)) to provide the following rules for advisory opinions:

(1) An advisory opinion applies only to the person who requested the opinion and to a person involved in the transaction or activity to which the opinion relates.

(2) An advisory opinion which sets forth a rule or general applicability must be prescribed as a rule or regulation within 30 days after being issued, unless the Commission determines that the transaction or activity to which the advisory opinion relates is already subject to an existing rule or regulation.

(3) The Commission is prohibited from rendering more than one advisory opinion with respect to a particular transaction or activity.

(4) Rules and regulations prescribed under the new provisions from advisory opinions, are subject to the provisions of the law relating to congressional disapproval of proposed rules and regulations.

Under Section 107(d) of the bill the amendment made by subsection (a) (which broadens the class of individuals who may request an advisory opinion) is applicable "to any advisory opinion rendered by the Federal Election Commission after October 15, 1974."

ENFORCEMENT

Section 108 amends the enforcement provisions of Section 313 of the Act (2 U.S.C. 437g).

Existing law

Under existing law the Commission may refer apparent violations to the Attorney General or investigate them itself. Where the Commission determines a violation has occurred it may try to correct the violation by informal methods or bring a civil action to enforce the Act. The Commission is required to refer the violation to the Attorney General if a violation of a provision of title 18, United States Code, is involved. The Commission is authorized to refer non-title 18 violations to the Attorney General if it is unable to correct the violation by informal methods or if it determines that referral is appropriate. Under existing law the Attorney General may bring civil actions to enforce the statute when requested to do so by the Commission. The proposed changes would give the Commission exclusive civil enforcement authority.

Proposed changes of existing law

Under the amendments made by Section 108 of the bill the Commission can investigate a complaint only if the complaint is signed and sworn to by the person filing the complaint and the complaint it notorized. The Commission may not conduct any investigation solely on the basis of an anonymous complaint. The Commission must conduct all investigations expeditiously and afford the person who receives notice of the investigation a reasonable opportunity to show that no action should be taken against such person by the Commission.

If, after investigation, the Commission determines that there is reason to believe a violation of the Act or of the public financing provisions of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 has been committed, or is about to be committed, it is required to make every endeavor to correct or prevent the violation by informal methods prior to instituting any civil action. However, the Commission would have discretion to take immediate action to invoke the civil relief provisions of this Section in the event that it determines there is probable cause to believe that a violation has occurred or is about to occur which is of such a magnitude in nature that the interests of the public would compel immediate resort to the courts for judicial relief. If such a situation does not occur the Commission is expected to pursue with diligence, for a reasonable period of time, an attempt to correct or prevent all violations by informal methods, except as otherwise provided in the bill.

If the Commission enters into a conciliation agreement with a person, it is prohibited from bringing a civil action or recommending prosecution to the Justice Department with respect to that violation as long as the conciliation agreement is not violated. If the Commission is unable to correct the violation informally, it is authorized to bring a civil action. The Commission may refer a violation directly to the Attorney General without going through the voluntary compliance procedure if it determines there is probable cause to believe that a knowing and willful violation involving the making, receiving, or reporting of any contribution or expenditure having a value in the aggregate of $1,000 or more in any calendar year has occurred or that a knowing and willful violation of the public financing provisions of the Internal Revenue Code has occurred.

The Commission is authorized, as part of a conciliation agreement, to require that a person pay a civil penalty of $10,000 or 3 times the amount involved, whichever is greater, when it believes there is clear and convincing proof that a knowing and willful violation has occurred.

The Commission is required to make public the results of any conciliation attempt as well as the provisions of any conciliation agreement.

In any civil action brought by the Commission where the Commission establishes through clear and convincing proof that the person involved in the action committed a knowing and willful violation of law, the Court is authorized to impose a civil penalty of $10,000 or 3 times the amount of the contribution or expenditure involved, whichever is greater. The Commission may institute a civil action if it believes there has been a violation of any provision of a conciliation agreement.

A person aggrieved by the Commission's dismissal of his complaint, or by the Commission's failure to act on the complaint within 90 days after it was filed, may petition the United States District Court for the District of Columbia for relief. The petition must be filed with the court within 60 days after the dismissal of the complaint or within 60 days after the end of the 90-day period during which no action was taken. The court may direct the Commission to proceed on the complaint within 30 days after the court's decision. If the Commission fails to take action within that period, the complainant may bring an action to remedy the violation complained of.

DUTIES OF THE COMMISSION

Section 109(a) of the bill requires the Commission to maintain a separate cumulative index of multicandidate political committee reports and statements to enable the public to determine which political committees are qualified to make $5,000 contributions to candidates or their authorized committees.

Section 109(b) amends present law to provide for a 15 legislative day or 30 calendar day period, whichever is later, during which a proposed rule or regulation must be disapproved, as set forth in 2 U.S.C. 438(c)(2). With respect to a proposed rule or regulation transmitted to the Senate under 2 U.S.C. 438(c), receipt of such transmittal by the Senate shall have occurred upon entry in the Permanent Journal of the Senate.

ADDITIONAL ENFORCEMENT AUTHORITY

Section 110 would repeal Section 407 of the Act (2 U.S.C. 456) which gives the Commission power to disqualify a person from becoming a candidate in a future election for Federal office for a specified period of time.

Section 111 of the bill transfers a number of sections of Title 18 into the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971.

CONTRIBUTION AND EXPENDITURE LIMITATIONS

Section 111 of the bill adds a new section 320 to the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971 relating to limitations on contributions and expenditures. The text of this section is substantially similar to the matters presently contained in section 608 of Title 18 which is transferred to the Act under this section, with some changes in the law to provide additional limitations on certain contributions of political committees.

(1) A person (as defined in the Act) or a political committee which does not qualify for the $5,000 contribution limit, may not contribute more than $1,000 per election to any candidate for Federal office. As under present law, earmarked contributions, and contributions made to a candidate's authorized political committees, are considered to be contributions to that candidate rather than contributions to that committee. This restates present law.

or to national, state, district, or local committees of political parties. The above rule, which is intended to curtail the vertical proliferation of political committee contributions, would not preclude, however, a political committee of a national organization from contributing to a candidate or committee merely because of its affiliation with a national multicandidate political committee which has made the maximum contribution it is permitted to make to a candidate or a committee.

(4) As in existing law, an individual may not make contributions totaling more than $25,000 during any calendar year.

This section establishes rules for determining when a contribution made to a political committee is considered to be a contribution to a candidate, and when certain expenditures shall be considered to be contributions to a candidate, and subject to the limitations of the Act.

The remaining provisions of this section transfer into the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971 those provisions of 18 U.S.C. 608 which imposed expenditure limitations on presidential candidates, conditioning their application, in accordance with the Supreme Court's decision in Buckley v. Valeo, upon the acceptance of public financing.

CONTRIBUTIONS BY CORPORATIONS AND LABOR UNIONS

Section 610 of Title 18 prohibiting contributions by corporations and labor organizations, is taken out of Title 18 and transferred to the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971 as new section 321 of that Act. The following changes from existing law are noted:

(1) The penalty provisions are removed from the section and replaced by a general penalty provision contained in a new section 329 of the Act. Violations of this section would also be subject to the civil enforcement powers of the Commission under this bill.

(2) Corporations are prohibited from soliciting contributions from persons who are not stockbrokers, executive or administrative personnel, or the families of such persons, and labor organizations are prohibited from soliciting contributions from persons other than members of the organization and their families. The term "executive or administrative personnel" is defined as individuals who are paid by salary rather than on an hourly basis, and who have policy making or supervisory responsibilities. The term "stockholder" is defined to include any individual who has a legal, vested, or beneficial interest in stock, including, but not limited to, employees of a corporation who participate in a stock bonus, stock option, or employee stock ownership plan.

(3) Any method of soliciting voluntary contributions or of facilitating the making of voluntary contributions to a separate segregated fund permitted to corporations shall also be permitted to labor organizations.

(4) A corporation which uses any particular method for soliciting or facilitating the making of voluntary contributions to a separate segregated fund is required to make that method available to a labor organization representing employees of that corporation upon written request.

CONTRIBUTIONS BY GOVERNMENT CONTRACTORS

The prohibitions against contributions by government contractors contained in 18 U.S.C. 611 are transferred to the Act as new Section 322, absent the existing penalty provisions, which are replaced by the penalty and enforcement provisions under new Sections 313 and 329 of the Act.

PUBLICATION OR DISTRIBUTION OF POLITICAL STATEMENTS

New Section 323 of the Act is a substantial revision of 18 U.S.C. 612 and requires that any printed or broadcast communication which expressly advocates the election or defeat of a clearly identified candidate and which is disseminated to the public, must contain a clear and conspicuous notice that it is authorized by a candidate or that it is not authorized by any candidate. In the latter case the communication must contain the name of the person who made or financed the communication, including, in the case of a political committee, the name of any affiliated or connected organization. This section would be subject to the penalty and enforcement provisions under new Sections 313 and 329 of the Act.

CONTRIBUTIONS BY FOREIGN NATIONALS

New Section 324 of the Act incorporates the provisions of 18 U.S.C. 613, replacing the criminal penalties presently contained in such section with the penalty and enforcement provision under new Sections 313 and 329 of the Act.

PROHIBITION OF CONTRIBUTIONS IN NAME OF ANOTHER

New Section 325 of the Act incorporates the provisions of 18 U.S.C. 614, replacing the criminal penalties presently contained in such section with the penalty and enforcement provisions under new Sections 313 and 329 of the Act.

LIMITATION OF CONTRIBUTIONS OF CURRENCY

New Section 326 of the Act incorporates the provisions of 18 U.S.C. 615, replacing the criminal penalties contained in such section with the penalty and enforcement provisions under new Section 313 and 329 of the Act.

ACCEPTANCE OF EXCESSIVE HONORARIUMS

New Section 327 of the Act incorporates the provisions of 18. U.S.C. 616, increasing the limitation on honorariums from $1,000 to $2,000 for any appearance, speech, or article, and the aggregate calendar year limitation from $15,000 to $24,000. Amounts accepted for the actual travel and subsistence expenses of a recipient of an honorarium, and a member of the recipient's immediate family or an aide are intended to be excluded from the honorarium limitations of this section. The existing criminal penalties under 18 U.S.C. 616 are replaced by the penalty and enforcement provisions under the new Sections 313 and 329 of the Act.

FRAUDULENT MISREPRESENTATION OF CAMPAIGN AUTHORITY

New Section 328 of the Act incorporates the provisions of 18 U.S.C. 617, replacing the criminal penalties contained in such section with the penalty and enforcement provisions under the new Sections 313 and 329 of the Act.

PENALTY FOR VIOLATIONS

Section 329 of the Act provides that, upon enactment of the bill, a knowing and willful violation of the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971, as amended, which involves the making, receiving or reporting of any contribution or expenditure having a value in the aggregate of $1,000 or more in any calendar year is punishable by a fine not in excess of $25,000 or three times the amount involved, whichever is greater, and imprisonment for not more than 1 year, or both the fine and imprisonment.

New Section 329(b) provides in any criminal action brought for a violation of a provision of the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971, as amended, or of the public financing provision of the Internal Revenue Code that the defendant may assert as a complete defense the fact that a conciliation agreement has been entered into with the Commission and is still in effect and being complied with.

AUTHORIZATION

Section 112 of the bill provides an authorization of $8,000,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1976, $2,000,000 for the period beginning July 1, 1976, and ending September 30, 1976, and $8,000,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1977.

SAVINGS PROVISION

Section 113 of the bill provides that the repeal by this bill of any section or penalty does not release or extinguish any penalty forfeiture or liability incurred under such penalty or section.

TECHNICAL AND CONFORMING AMENDMENTS

Section 114 of the bill makes a series of four technical amendments (basically cross references) in various provisions of law necessary to reflect changes made by other sections of the bill.

REPEAL OF CERTAIN CRIMINAL CODE PROVISIONS

Section 201 of the bill amends title 18, United States Code, to repeal those provisions contained in the criminal code which are transferred by the bill to the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971.

ENTITLEMENT OF ELIGIBLE PRESIDENTIAL CANDIDATES FOR PUBLIC FINANCING

Section 301 of the bill amends the public financing provisions of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 by prohibiting a Presidential candidate who accepts public funds from expending more than $50,000 from his own personal funds or the funds of his immediate family in connection with his campaign.

PAYMENTS TO ELIGIBLE CANDIDATES

Section 302 of the bill would repeal that provision of section 9006 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 which provides for the Secretary of the Treasury to transfer excess amounts in the Presidential Election Campaign Fund back to the general fund of the Treasury, thus permitting such funds to accumulate for later use.

REVIEW OF REGULATIONS

Section 303 of the bill amends the public financing provisions of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 relating to Congressional review of regulations promulgated under such provisions, to provide for a 15-legislative day or 30-calendar day period, whichever is later, during which a proposed rule or regulation can be disapproved, to conform with the same change made by section 109(b) of the bill.

ELIGIBILITY FOR PAYMENTS

Section 304 of the bill makes a clerical change in a provision of the Internal Revenue Code which refers to limitations modified by this Act.

QUALIFIED CAMPAIGN EXPENSE LIMITATION

Section 305 of the bill adds the limitation on the expenditure of personal funds to the General Provision relating to expenditure limitations in the public financing provisions of the Internal Revenue Code.

TECHNICAL AND CONFORMING AMENDMENTS

Section 306 of the bill makes a number of changes correcting cross references of the Internal Revenue Code to provisions of title 18 which, under the bill, are transferred to the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971. Section 306 of the bill also amends Section 9008(d) of Title 26 of the Internal Revenue Code to provide that the payment of legal and accounting services rendered to or on behalf of a national committee of a political party shall not be treated as an expenditure made by or on behalf of such committee with respect to its limitations on Presidential nominating convention expenses.

CHANGES IN EXISTING LAW

FEDERAL ELECTION CAMPAIGN ACT OF 1971

§ 432. Organization of political committees

(a) Chairman; treasurer; vacancies; official authorizations. Every political committee shall have a chairman and a treasurer. No contribution and no expenditure shall be accepted or made by or on behalf of a political committee at a time when there is a vacancy in the office of chairman or treasurer thereof. No expenditure shall be made for or on behalf of a political committee without the authorization of its chairman or treasurer, or their designated agents.

(b) Account of contributions; segregated funds. Every person who receives a contribution in excess of [$10] $100 for a political committee shall, on demand of the treasurer, and in any event within 5 days after receipt of such contribution, render to the treasurer a detailed account thereof, including the amount of the contribution and the identification of the person making such contribution, and the date on which received. All funds of a political committee shall be segregated from, and may not be commingled with, any personal funds of officers, members, or associates of such committee.

(c) Recordkeeping. It shall be the duty of the treasurer of a political committee to keep a detailed and exact account of—

(1) all contributions made to or for such committee;

(2) the identification, the occupation (but not the name of such person's employer, firm, business associates, customers, or clients), and the principal place of business or employment (if any) of every person making a contribution in excess of $100, and the date and the amount of such contribution;

(3) all expenditures made by or on behalf of such committee; and

(d) Receipts; preservation. It shall be the duty of the treasurer to obtain and keep a receipted bill, stating the particulars, for every expenditure made by or on behalf of a political committee in excess of $100 in amount, and for any such expenditure in a lesser amount, if the aggregate amount of such expenditures to the same person during a calendar year exceeds $100. The treasurer shall preserve all receipted bills and accounts required to be kept by this section for periods of time to be determined by the Commission.

[(e) Unauthorized activities; notice. Any political committee which solicits or receives contributions or makes expenditures on behalf of any candidate that is not authorized in writing by such candidate to do so shall include a notice on the face or front page of all literature and advertisements published in connection with such candidate's campaign by such committee or on its behalf stating that the committee is not authorized by such candidate and that such candidate is not responsible for the activities of such committee.]

(1) Each individual who is a candidate for Federal office (other than the office of Vice President of the United States) shall designate a political committee to serve as his principal campaign committee. No political committee may be designated as the principal campaign committee of more than one candidate, except that the candidate for the office of President of the United States nominated by a political party may designate the national committee of such political party as his principal campaign committee. Except as provided in the preceding sentence, no political committee which supports more than one candidate may be designated as a principal campaign committee.

(3) It shall be the duty of each principal campaign committee to receive all reports and statements required to be filed with it under paragraph (2) of this subsection and to compile and file such reports and statements, together with its own reports and statements, with the Commission in accordance with the provisions of this title.

* * * * * * *

§ 434. Reports

(a) Receipts and expenditures; completion date, exception.

(1) Except as provided by paragraph 2, each treasurer of a political committee supporting a candidate or candidates for election to Federal office, and each candidate for election to such office, shall file with the Commission reports of receipts and expenditures on forms to be prescribed or approved by it.

The reports referred to in the preceding sentence shall be filed as follows:

(A) (i) In any calendar year in which an individual is a candidate for Federal office and an election for such Federal office is held in such year, such reports shall be filed not later than the 10th day before the date on which such election is held and shall be complete as of the 15th day before the date of such election; except that any such report filed by registered or certified mail must be postmarked not later than the close of the 12th day before the date of such election;

(ii) such reports shall be filed not later than the 30th day after the date of such election and shall be complete as of the 20th day after the date of such election.

(B) In any other calendar year in which an individual is a candidate for Federal office, such reports shall be filed after December 31 of such calendar year, but not later than January 31 of the following calendar year and shall be complete as of the close of the calendar year with respect to which the report is filed.

Any person filing such a complaint shall be subject to the provisions of section 1001 of title 18, United States Code. The Commission may not conduct any investigation under this section, or take any other action under this section, solely on the basis of a complaint of a person whose identity is not disclosed to the Commission.

(2) The Commission, upon receiving a complaint under paragraph (1), or if it has reason to believe that any person has committed a violation of this chapter or of chapter 95 or chapter 96 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954, shall notify the person involved of such alleged violation and shall make an investigation of such alleged violation in accordance with the provisions of this section.

(3) Any investigation under paragraph (2) shall be conducted expeditiously and shall include an investigation, conducted in accordance with the provisions of this section, of reports and statements filed by any complainant under this chapter, if such complainant is a candidate.

Any notification or investigation made under paragraph (2) shall not be made public by the Commission or by any other person without the written consent of the person receiving such notification or the person with respect to whom such investigation is made.

(4) The Commission shall afford any person who receives notice of an alleged violation under paragraph (2) a reasonable opportunity to demonstrate that no action should be taken against such person by the Commission under this chapter.

(5)(A) If the Commission determines that there is reason to believe that any person has committed or is about to commit a violation of this chapter or of chapter 95 or chapter 96 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954, the Commission shall make every endeavor to correct or prevent such violation by informal methods of conference, conciliation, and persuasion, and to enter into a conciliation agreement with the person involved. A conciliation agreement, unless violated, shall constitute an absolute bar to any further action by the Commission, including bringing a civil proceeding under paragraph (B) of this section.

(B) If the Commission is unable to correct or prevent any such violation by such informal methods, the Commission may, if the Commission determines there is probable cause to believe that a violation has occurred or is about to occur, institute a civil action for relief, including a permanent or temporary injunction, restraining order, or any other appropriate order in the district court of the United States for the district in which the person against whom such action is found, resides, or transacts business.

(C) In any civil action instituted by the Commission under paragraph (B), the court shall grant a permanent or temporary injunction, restraining order, or other order upon a proper showing that the person involved has engaged or is about to engage in a violation of this chapter or of chapter 95 or chapter 96 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954.

(D) If the Commission determines that there is probable cause to believe that a knowing and willful violation under section 329(a), or a knowing and willful violation of a provision of chapter 95 or 96 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954, has occurred or is about to occur, it may refer such apparent violation to the Attorney General of the United States without regard to the limitations set forth in paragraph (A) of this section.

(6) If the Commission believes that there is clear and convincing proof that a knowing and willful violation of this chapter or chapter 95 or 96 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 has been committed, any conciliation agreement entered into by the Commission under paragraph (5)(A) may include a requirement that the person involved in such conciliation agreement shall pay a civil penalty which does not exceed the greater of (A) $10,000; or (B) an amount equal to 300 percent of the amount of any contribution or expenditure involved in such violation. The Commission shall make available to the public the results of any conciliation attempt including any conciliation agreement entered into by the Commission and any determination by the Commission that no violation of this chapter or chapter 95 or 96 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 has occurred.

(7) In any civil action for relief instituted by the Commission under paragraph (5), if the court determines that the Commission has established through clear and convincing proof that the person involved in such civil action has committed a knowing and willful violation of this chapter or of chapter 95 or 96 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954, the court may impose a civil penalty of not more than the greater (A) $10,000; or (B) an amount equal to 300 percent of the contribution or expenditure involved in such violation. In any case in which such person has entered into a conciliation agreement with the Commission under paragraph (5)(A), the Commission may institute a civil action for relief under paragraph (5) if he believes that such person has violated any provision of such conciliation agreement. In order for the Commission to obtain relief in any such civil action, it shall be sufficient for the Commission to establish that such person has violated, in whole or in part, any requirement of such conciliation agreement.

(8) In any action brought under paragraph (5) or paragraph (7) of this subsection, subpenas for witnesses who are required to attend a United States district court may run into any other district.

(9)(A) Any party aggrieved by an order of the Commission dismissing a complaint filed by such party under paragraph (1), or by a failure on the part of the Commission to act on such complaint in accordance with the provisions of this section within ninety days after the filing of such complaint, may file a petition with the United States District Court for the District of Columbia.

(B) The filing of any action under subparagraph (A) shall be made—

(i) in the case of the dismissal of a complaint by the Commission, no later than sixty days after such dismissal; or

(ii) in the case of a failure on the part of the Commission to act on such complaint, no later than sixty days after the ninety-day period specified in subparagraph (A).

(C) In such proceeding the court may declare that the dismissal of the complaint or the action, or the failure to act, is contrary to law and may direct the Commission to proceed in conformity with that declaration within thirty days, failing which the complainant may bring in his own name a civil action to remedy the violation complained of.

(10) The judgment of the district court may be appealed to the court of appeals and the judgment of the court of appeals affirming or setting aside, in whole or in part, any such order of the district court shall be final, subject to review by the Supreme Court of the United States upon certiorari or certfication as provided in section 1254 of title 28, United States Code.

(11) Any action brought under this subsection shall be advanced on the docket of the court in which filed, and put ahead of all other actions (other than other actions brought under this subsection or under section 437h).

(12) If the Commission determines after an investigation that any person has violated an order of the court entered in a proceeding brought under paragraph (5) it may petition the court for an order to adjudicate that person in civil contempt, except that if it believes the violation to be knowing and willful it may instead petition the court for an order to adjudicate that person in criminal contempt.

(b) In any case in which the Commission refers an apparent violation to the Attorney General, the Attorney General shall respond by report to the Commission with respect to any action taken by the Attorney General regarding such apparent violation. Each report shall be transmitted no later than sixty days after the date the Commission refers any apparent violation, and at the close of every thirty-day period thereafter until there is final disposition of such apparent violation. The Commission may from time to time prepare and publish reports on the status of such referrals.

The motion is highly privileged and is not debatable. An amendment to the motion is not in order, and it is not in order to move to reconsider the vote by which the motion is agreed to or disagreed to.* The Commission may not prescribe any rule or regulation which is disapproved under this paragraph.

(3) If the Commission proposes to prescribe any rule or regulation dealing with reports or statements required to be filed under this title by a candidate for the office of Senator, and by political committees supporting such candidate, it shall transmit such statement to the Senate. (2) No political committee (other than a principal campaign committee) shall make contributions to (A) any candidate with respect to any election for Federal office which, in the aggregate, exceed $5,000; or (B) to any political committee (other than a political committee authorized by a candidate to receive contributions on his behalf which contributions are, under paragraph (4), treated as contributions to that candidate) in any calendar year which, in the aggregate, exceed $25,000. Contributions by the national committee of a political party serving as the principal campaign committee of a candidate for the office of President of the United States shall not exceed the limitation imposed by the preceding sentence with respect to any other candidate for Federal office. For purposes of this paragraph, the term "political committee" means an organization registered as a political committee under section 303 for a period of not less than six months which has received contributions from more than fifty persons and, except for any State political party organization, has made contributions to five or more candidates for Federal office. For purposes of the limitations provided by paragraph (1) and this paragraph, all contributions made by political committees established, financed, maintained, or controlled by any person or persons, including any parent, subsidy, branch, division, department, affiliate, or local unit of such person, or by any group of persons, shall be considered to have been made by a single political committee, except that (A) nothing in this sentence shall limit transfers between political committees of funds raised through joint fund-raising efforts; (B) this sentence shall not apply to a political committee established, financed, or maintained by the national committee, or to a political committee established, financed, or maintained by the State, district, or local committee of a political party; and (C) a political committee of a national organiza-

(3) No individual shall make contributions aggregating more than $25,000 in any calendar year. For purposes of this paragraph, any contribution made to a candidate in a year other than the calendar year in which the election is held with respect to which such contribution was made, is considered to be made during the calendar year in which such election is held.

(4) For purposes of this subsection—

(A) contributions to a named candidate made to any political committee authorized by such candidate to accept contributions on his behalf shall be considered to be contributions made to such candidate;

(B)(i) expenditures made by any person in cooperation, consultation, or concert, with, or at the request or suggestion of, a candidate, his authorized political committees, or their agents, shall be considered to be a contribution to such candidate.

(ii) the financing by any person of the dissemination, distribution, or republication, in whole or in part, of any broadcast or any written, graphic, or other form of campaign materials prepared by the candidate, his campaign committees, or their authorized agents shall be considered to be an expenditure for purposes of this paragraph; and

(C) contributions made to or for the benefit of any candidate nominated by a political party for election to the office of Vice President of the United States shall be considered to be contributions made to or for the benefit of the candidate of such party for election to the office of President of the United States.

(5) The limitations imposed by paragraphs (1) and (2) of this subsection (other than the annual limitation on contributions to a political committee under paragraph (2)(B)) shall apply separately with respect to each election, except that all elections held in any calendar year for the office of President of the United States (except a general election for such office) shall be considered to be one election.

(6) For purposes of the limitations imposed by this section, all contributions made by a person, either directly or indirectly, on behalf of a particular candidate, including contributions which are in any way earmarked or otherwise directed through an intermediary or conduit to such candidate, shall be treated as contributions from such person to such candidate. The intermediary or conduit shall report the original source and the intended recipient of such contribution to the Commission and to the intended recipient.

(b) No candidate for the office of President of the United States who is eligible under section 9003 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to condition for eligibility for payments) or under section 9033 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to eligibility for payments) to receive payments from the Secretary of the Treasury may make expenditures in excess of—

(A) $10,000,000, in the case of a campaign for nomination for election to such office, except the aggregate of expenditures under this subparagraph in any one State shall not exceed the greater

of 16 cents multiplied by the voting age population of the State (as certified under subsection (e)), or $200,000; or

(B) $20,000,000 in the case of a campaign for election to such office.

(2) For purposes of this subsection—

(A) expenditures made by or on behalf of any candidate nominated by a political party for election to the office of Vice President of the United States shall be considered to be expenditures made or on behalf of the candidate of such party for election to the office of President of the United States; and

(B) an expenditure is made on behalf of a candidate, including a Vice Presidential candidate, if it is made by—

(i) an authorized committee or any other agent of the candidate for the purposes of making any expenditure; or

(ii) any person authorized or requested by the candidate, an authorized committee of the candidate, or an agent of the candidate, to make the expenditure.

(c) (1) At the beginning of each calendar year (commencing in 1976), as there become available necessary data from the Bureau of Labor Statistics of the Department of Labor, the Secretary of Labor shall certify to the Commission and publish in the Federal Register the percent difference between the price index for the twelve months preceding the beginning of such calendar year and the price index for the base period. Each limitation established by subsection (b) and subsection (d) shall be increased by such percent difference. Each amount so increased shall be the amount in effect for such calendar year.

(2) For the purposes of paragraph (1)—

(2) The national committee of a political party may not make any expenditure in connection with the general election campaign of any candidate for President of the United States who is affiliated with such party which exceeds an amount equal to 2 cents multiplied by the voting age population of the United States (as certified under subsection (e)). Any expenditure under this paragraph shall be in addition to any expenditure by a national committee of a political party serving as the principal campaign committee of a candidate for the office of the President of the United States.

(3) The national committee of a political party, or a State committee of a political party, including any subordinate committee of a State committee, may not make any expenditure in connection with the general election campaign of a candidate for Federal office in a State who is affiliated with such party which exceeds—

(A) in the case of a candidate for election to the office of Senator, or of Representative from a State which is entitled to only one Representative, the greater of—

(i) 2 cents multiplied by the voting age population of the State (as certified under subsection (e)); or

(ii) $20,000; and

(B) in the case of a candidate for election to the office of Representative, Delegate, or Resident Commissioner in any other State, $10,000.

(e) During the first week of January 1975, and every subsequent year, the Secretary of Commerce shall certify to the Commission and publish in the Federal Register an estimate of the voting age population of the United States, of each State, and of each congressional district as of the first day of July next preceding the date of certification. The term "voting age population" means resident population, eighteen years of age or older.

(f) No candidate or political committee shall knowingly accept any contribution or make any expenditure in violation of the provisions of this section. No officer or employee of a political committee shall knowingly accept a contribution made for the benefit or use of a candidate, or knowingly make any expenditure on behalf of a candidate, in violation of any limitation imposed on contributions and expenditures under this section.

(g) The Commission shall prescribe rules under which any expenditure by a candidate for Presidential nomination for use in two or more States shall be attributed to such candidate's expenditure limitation in each such State, based on the voting age population in such State which can reasonably be expected to be influenced by such expenditure.

§ 439e. Contributions or expenditures by national banks, corporations, or labor organizations

(a) It is unlawful for any national bank, or any corporation organized by authority of any law of Congress, to make a contribution or expenditure in connection with any election to any political office, or in connection with any primary election or political convention or caucus held to select candidates for any political office, or for any corporation whatever, or any labor organization to make a contribution or expenditure in connection with any election at which Presidential and Vice Presidential electors or a Senator or Representative in, or a Delegate or Resident Commissioner to, Congress are to be voted for, or in connection with any primary election or political convention, or caucus held to select candidates for any of the foregoing offices, or for any candidate, political committee, or other person to accept or receive any contribution prohibited by this section, or for any officer or any director or any corporation or any national bank or any officer of any labor organization to consent to any contribution or expenditure by the corporation, national bank, or labor organization, as the case may be, prohibited by this section.

(d) EXPENDITURES FROM PERSONAL FUNDS.—In order to be eligible to receive any payment under section 9006, the candidate of a major, minor, or new party in a Presidential election shall certify to the Commission, under penalty of perjury, that such candidate shall not knowingly make expenditures from his personal funds, or the personal funds of his immediate family, in connection with his campaign for election to the office of President in excess of, in the aggregate, $50,000.

(e) DEFINITION OF IMMEDIATE FAMILY.—For purposes of subsection (d), the term "immediate family" means a candidate's spouse, and any child, parent, grandparent, brother, half-brother, sister, or half-sister of the candidate, and the spouses of such persons.

[(b) Transfer to the general fund. If, after a Presidential election and after all eligible candidates have been paid the amount which they are entitled to receive under this chapter, there are moneys remaining in the fund, the Secretary shall transfer the moneys so remaining to the general fund of the Treasury.]

[(c)] (b) Payments from the fund. Upon receipt of a certification from the Commission under section 9005 for payment to the eligible candidates of a political party, the Secretary shall pay to such candidates out of the fund the amount certified by the Commission. If at the time of a certification by the Commission under section 9005 for payment to the eligible candidates of a political party, the Secretary or his delegate determines that the moneys in the fund are not, or may not be, sufficient to satisfy the full entitlements of the eligible candidates of all political parties, he shall withhold from such payment such amount as he determines to be necessary to assure that the eligible candidates of each political party will receive their pro rata share of their full entitlement. Amounts withheld by reason of the preceding sentence shall be paid when the Secretary or his delegate determines that there are sufficient moneys in the fund to pay such amounts, or portions thereof, to all eligible candidates from whom amounts have been withheld, but, if there are not sufficient moneys in the fund to satisfy the full entitlement of the eligible candidates of all political parties, the amounts so withheld shall be paid in such manner that the eligible candidates of each political party receive their pro rata share of their full entitlement.

(3) Payments. Upon receipt of certification from the Commission under subsection (g), the Secretary shall make payments from the appropriate account maintained under subsection (a) to the national committee of a major party or minor party which elects to receive its entitlement under this subsection. Such payments shall be available for use by such committee in accordance with the provisions of subsection (c).

(4) Limitations. Payments to the national committee of a major party or minor party under this subsection from the account designated for such committee shall be limited to the amounts in such account at the time of payment.

The motion is highly privileged and is not debatable. An amendment to the motion is not in order, and it is not in order to move to reconsider the vote by which the motion is agreed to or disagreed to.* The Commission may not prescribe any rule or regulation which is disapproved by either such House under this paragraph.

(1) The Commission, before prescribing any rule or regulation under subsection (b), shall transmit a statement with respect to such rule or regulation to the Senate and to the House of Representatives, in accordance with the provisions of this subsection. Such statement shall set forth the proposed rule or regulation and shall contain a detailed explanation and justification of such rule or regulation.

(2) If either such House does not, through appropriate action, disapprove the proposed rule or regulation set forth in such statement no later than [30 legislative days] 30 calendar days or 15 legislative days, whichever is later, after receipt of such statement, then the Commission may prescribe such rule or regulation. Whenever a committee of the House of Representatives reports any resolution relating to any such rule or regulation, it is at any time thereafter in order (even though a previous motion to the same effect has been disagreed to) to move to proceed to the consideration of the resolution. The motion is highly privileged and is not debatable. An amendment to the motion is not in order, and it is not in order to move to reconsider the vote by which the motion is agreed to or disagreed to. The Commission may not prescribe any rule or regulation which is disapproved by either such House under this paragraph.

(3) For purposes of this subsection, the term "legislative days" does not include any calendar day on which both Houses of the Congress are not in session.

MINORITY VIEWS OF MR. HATFIELD, MR. HUGH SCOTT, AND MR. GRIFFIN

There is no doubt that Congress is faced with a crisis created by the Supreme Court decision in the case of Buckley v. Valeo. At first, the Court gave the Congress a period of 30 days in which to correct Constitutional errors found by the Court in the Federal Election Campaign act. Thereafter, the time was extended another 20 days.

The Subcommittee on Privileges and Elections held one-day hearings on five bills to reconstitute the Federal Election Commission; bills that bear almost no resemblance to the measure now being reported. After the hearings were over, the members of the Rules Committee saw, for the first time, a comprehensive revision of the campaign laws in the form of a bill introduced in the House by Representative Hays. Most of the important features of the Hays bill were not mentioned or commented upon in the brief hearings because no one who appeared had any reason to suspect that the Senate would be considering such provisions.

When the full Committee met, a bill which had been introduced by Senator Pell and reported by the Subcommittee on Privileges and Elections was summarily laid aside and ignored. Instead Chairman Cannon produced the Hays bill and insisted that the Committee proceed to mark it up.

As reported, S. 3065 is the Hays bill (H.R. 12015) with a number of modifications adopted by the Rules Committee during the course of its deliberations. The measure reported is a hodge-podge of unrelated proposals to change—and in almost every case, to weaken—the laws which now apply to campaign financing. In light of the often expressed criticism that Congress was too hasty in enacting the Reform Act of 1974, it seems incredible that the Senate should be confronted now with a sweeping, comprehensive measure such as this, which has had so little consideration and scrutiny.

This measure, and the procedures which produced it, speak eloquently for support of President Ford's recommended course of action: to pass a simple bill re-establishing the FEC and holding off on reform measures until next year.

The undersigned members of the Rules Committee voted against reporting this bill. Among the reasons for doing so, are the following:

The proposed bill will weaken the Federal Election Commission as an independent enforcement agency. It prevents the effective use of the advisory opinion as a method of statutory interpretation by requiring those of "general applicability" to be made into a Rule or Regulation within 30 days and thus become subject to Congressional Veto. They also are limited to one advisory opinion for any transaction or activity (see page 18, line 21). The requirement (page 4, line 20) of two Commission members from a particular party to agree to action, unduly polarizes the Commission and hobbles its activities. The enforcement provisions that take up 8 pages will serve to prevent the flexibility needed to cope with the many varied problems of enforcement of this complex law (pages 19–27). The use of so-called "civil enforcement" is of questionable constitutionality (p. 39, line 17) and the reduction of criminal penalties ignore the recommendations of the Watergate Prosecution Force (Report October 1975, p. 147).

This bill favors incumbent officeholders by allowing them a veto over opinions they dislike, while challengers would have no such power. The law is now even more complex than before and incumbents have staff available to advise them, while challengers (far from Washington) will be unable to avail themselves of expert assistance; some of the challengers are already filed and campaigning and will be disadvantaged to have to stop and reconsider new legal pitfalls.

The bill by limiting transfers between political party committees will have the effect of weakening the two-party system that serves this Nation well. Weak State party organizations could not be shored up beyond the amount of $25,000 (the cost of about one good staff assistant). The Bill provides a loop-hole apparently designed to accommodate the Democrats and their fund raising by "telethon" (page 28, line 2 to 21).

The limitation on employees who may contribute to a separate segregated fund is an obvious attempt toward partisan advantage.

In addition, the Committee's bill fails to address two areas of doubt raised by the Buckley opinion, viz, Legislative officers serving on an Executive Commission, and the Legislative Veto.

It is for these reasons that the minority object to S. 3065. We do believe it is important to reconstitute the Federal Election Commission as suggested by the Supreme Court but the many technical changes should not be legislated at this time. After the 1976 elections are over and experience accumulated in that election, we should make a comprehensive restudy of the Election laws and at that time make any desirable changes that may be dictated by that experience.

politics to try to keep the government propped up a little longer. Now the Trade Commission urges tariffs that would give a drastic jolt to the fragile Italian economy. Italians, watching the performance, sometimes murmur that the United States does not seem to know exactly what it is trying to accomplish. They have a point.

The Italian footwear coming into this country is not cheap. But it sells well because the Italian manufacturers have been highly responsive to rapid changes in styles here. The American shoemakers have not kept up, and now they want the U.S. government to protect them from the results of their own inability to stay in style. If the President were misguided enough to accept the Tariff Commission's recommendations, who would get hurt? First of all, the consumers who would suddenly find the imports costing vastly more. Next, the American retailers would suffer, as prices rose and sales dropped. Frank H. Rich, who has been selling shoes to Washingtonians for a good many years, makes that point in a letter on this page today. The tariffs that are supposed to preserve jobs in American factories may cost other Americans their jobs in the stores. Finally, the tariffs would eventually hurt people who make other American products for sale in Italy—since Italy would surely retaliate.

There are certain foreign industries that would doubtless welcome an American swing to protectionism. The specialty steel case illustrates the point. In many parts of the world steelmakers regard a cartel as the normal and orderly way of conducting business. The European Coal and Steel Community was built on the foundations of the prewar German cartels. The Europeans have now imposed quotas on Japanese steel shipped to Europe. The specialty steel makers want a similar arrangement for the United States. People on both sides of the case see it as a precedent for the entire steel industry.

The recent troubles of the steelmakers are the result of the recession, in which worldwide steel consumption fell drastically. It is the custom of the American steel industry, in recessions, to maintain prices and cut production. Most foreign steelmakers do the opposite, cutting prices and maintaining production. As a result, during the trough of the recession, they sharply increased their share of the American market. Some of them got subsidies, in one degree or another, from their home governments to help keep employment up. The remedies to this abuse are enforcement of the present anti-dumping laws and international negotiations on subsidies. A great variety of the goods in international trade is now subsidized—including, of course, many American exports—and there is urgent need for agreement on these subsidies. No country is entitled to a free hand in pumping up its own employment levels at its neighbors' expense. If the industrial nations cannot get the subsidies under control, the drift toward quotas and cartels may become irresistible.

American trade quotas would impose a heavy burden, in the end, upon Americans. Last week, for example, at a press conference that the steelworkers called, the president of the United Steelworkers of America, I. W. Abel, angrily said that Americans "let steel come in so that we can sell soybeans someplace." Exactly. If this country cuts the Japanese sales of stainless steel here, the Japanese will have fewer dollars to buy American foodstuffs. That's fine with Mr. Abel, but the soybean producers will doubtless take a different view.

At the same press conference, someone put a question about prices to Richard P. Simmons, president of the Allegheny Ludlum Steel Corporation: If the President imposes quotas to protect his industry from foreign competition, would Mr. Simmons support wage and price controls to protect the consumers from his industry? Mr. Simmons replied that he opposes wage and price controls. He puts his faith in the free market, he said. But a country under import quotas is not everybody's idea of a free market.

SENATOR HARTKE CONDEMNS ISRAELI BOYCOTT

Mr. HARTKE. Mr. President, I am pleased and proud to join with Senator RIBICOFF and my other distinguished and concerned senatorial colleagues in sponsoring legislation fashioned to curb one of the most insidious and fundamentally obnoxious practices of contemporary commercial life—the racially inspired economic boycott.

Arabs and Israelis have for almost three decades observed a semistate of war, punctuated all too frequently by actual physical combat. The roots of their conflict run deep—deep into their history, deep into their national psychology, and deep into their present values, political and social. That conflict is tragic and it has become practically the centerpiece of contemporary history.

Like a disease, it has infested the international political system, poisoning relations and escalating the probabilities of warfare involving non-Middle East powers. Because of the tactics pursued by some Arab nations, the disease is spreading to the internal value structure of the United States.

Recent shifts in the relative balance of trade and payments between the Arab nations and the West resulted from the OPEC cartel have placed huge financial resources in Arab hands. Tragically, they have used this windfall to foster a new form of racism within the international community by adopting a boycott policy not only toward Israel but toward all Jewish citizens.

For American as well as other foreign companies, the Middle East has become a new frontier for investment and sales. But the bright facade that beckons hides a seamy and, in my view, an immoral reality. The quid pro quo extracted by Arab nations for the privilege of sharing in their new bonanza is the renunciation of fundamental human values in favor of the odious practice of racism.

Were it in my power to do so, I would provide much harsher penalties than those associated with this bill. It is unfortunate that the administration, after much public display of shock and indignation, has done so little to effectively end Arab imposed discrimination against Israel and, indirectly, Jewish citizens of all nations. We are left, therefore, with other remedies.

The bill I am cosponsoring today deprives American corporations of certain tax advantages presently provided for under law if a finding that the corporation participated in an Israeli boycott is made.

I wish to make it clear, however, that my support of this bill in no way implies an acceptance of the legitimacy of either the foreign tax credit or the tax deferral in nonboycott nondiscriminating situations. My colleagues are well aware of my consistent opposition to these tax provisions because of their effect on the domestic economy. My reasons for opposing the foreign tax credit and the deferral are detailed elsewhere, and I shall not abuse this occasion with a restatement of these arguments.

It is incumbent upon the Congress to enact legislation that will exact penalties from those American corporations who are unable to exercise the proper moral self-restraint to avoid supporting policies of blatant racism.

CONCLUSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there further morning business?

If not, morning business is closed.

FEDERAL ELECTIONS CAMPAIGN ACT AMENDMENTS OF 1976

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 647, S. 3065, and that it be laid before the Senate and made the pending business.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be stated by title.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 3065) to amend the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971 to provide for its administration by a Federal Election Commission appointed in accordance with the requirement of the Constitution, and for other purposes.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, there will be no action taken on the pending business today, but it will be the first order of business tomorrow at the conclusion of morning business and the morning hour.

PROGRAM

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, there will be no further business today. Our legislation, due to conditions over which the leadership has no control, is brought up to date, and some of the bills we expected to bring up this afternoon will not come up because of a situation which I will explain.

Calendar No. 647, S. 3065, a bill to amend the Federal Election Campaign Act, will be the pending business tomorrow.

For the information of the Senate, later this week it is hoped that the Senate will take up Calendar No. 613, S. 3015, a bill to provide for the continued expansion and improvement of the Nation's airport and airway system, on which there is a time limitation; Calendar No. 644, H.R. 9721, an act to provide for increased participation by the United States in the Inter-American Development Bank, and so forth; Calendar No. 650, S. 2484, a bill to amend Public Law 566, the Watershed Protection and Flood Prevention Act; and Calendar No. 655, S. 641, a bill to regulate commerce and protect consumers from adulterated food, and so forth, which the leadership anticipated would have been brought up this afternoon, but because of the fact that our distinguished colleague from Maine (Mr. HATHAWAY) is in the hospital because of the flu, that will come, hopefully, somctime later in the week.

Then there will be Calendar No. 659, S. 3052, a bill to amend section 602 of the Agricultural Act of 1954; and Calendar No. 662, H.R. 71, a bill to amend title 38, United States Code, to provide hospital and medical care to certain members of the armed forces of nations allied or associated with the United States in World War I and World War II, and so forth.

Then, there will be Calendar No. 665, S. 3136, a bill to reform the Food Stamp Act of 1964 by improving the provisions relating to eligibility, simplifying administration, and tightening accountability, and for other purposes.

This by no means means that we will dispose of all that legislation this week, but at least it gives us something to look forward to as to what can be contemplated, in the best judgment of the joint leadership as to what legislation will be confronting us.

Then, of course, we hope it will be possible some time to get to Calendar No. 379, S. 287, a bill to provide for the appointment of additional district court judges and for other purposes, provided we can get some sort of a time limitation, and hopefully if we can keep that particular bill clean, so that the matter can be addressed as expeditiously as possible; and then Calendar No. 276, S. 354, a bill to regulate commerce by establishing a nationwide system to restore motor vehicle accident victims and by requiring no-fault motor vehicle insurance as a condition precedent to using a motor vehicle on public roadways.

That bill will take a little time, as will the food stamp bill; but beginning tomorrow, our main effort will be concentrated on the bill to amend the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971.

ADJOURNMENT TO 10:15 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, if there be no further business to come before the Senate at this time, I move that the Senate stand in adjournment until the hour of 10:15 a.m. tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and at 12:40 p.m. the Senate adjourned until tomorrow, Tuesday, March 16, 1976, at 10:15 a.m.

NOMINATIONS

Executive nomination received by the Senate March 15, 1976:

IN THE ARMY

The following-named officer to be placed on the retired list in grade indicated under the provisions of Title 10, United States Code, Section 3962:

To be lieutenant general

Lt. Gen. Harold Arthur Kissinger, 388-14-3938, Army of the United States (major general, U.S. Army).

SENATE FLOOR DEBATES ON S. 3065 MARCH 16, 1976

hearing in Los Angeles, posed this basic question to witnesses:

Should the bulge be considered an indicator of an impending large earthquake such that prudent people should begin to take precautions?

And time and time again, the witnesses would answer: We don't honestly know.

"There's really not much new to report about the bulge since our first announcement in mid February," said Dr. Robert Wallace of the U.S. Geological Survey (USGS) in Menlo Park. "It is not a prediction, at least not now; it's simply an anomaly that we really don't understand."

The bulge developed during the early 1960s, but went unnoticed until last year, when a team of USGS scientists searched through back records of local elevations above sea level filed by surveyors.

The USGS comparison of the pre-1960 elevations revealed that a crustal blister had built up along a 100-mile stretch of the San Andreas fault between Ft. Tejon on the northwest and the Cajon Pass on the southeast.

The swelling is greatest around Palmdale, measuring some 25 centimeters (a little under 10 inches) there, and least along the western face of the San Gabriel Mountains, where it was 5 centimeters (just under 2 inches) or less. All told, the uplifted area covers more than 4,500 square miles.

Both then and now, scientists warned the public not to jump to any conclusions that a major earthquake was imminent.

There have been instances they said, in which a sudden uplift of land has preceded a large and destructive earthquake and other instances where the land has bulged and no tremors, major or minor, have followed.

Wallace tried to walk a very narrow line between overestimating and underestimating the seismic significance of the uplifted land.

At one point he described the bulge as "only a fire drill, not a fire" but he also agreed that if the crustal deformation is related to a buildup of stress along the San Andreas, then its wide extent could foreshadow a very powerful temblor.

Wallace noted that all available seismological evidence suggests that the bigger an earthquake, the longer the precursory events leading up to it. A giant earthquake of the size that devastated San Francisco in 1906 may take years or even decades to develop, giving off clues of its development all the while.

A larger temblor, registering 8 or more on the Richter scale of intensity, would do quite a bit of damage to Los Angeles and could take a potentially heavy toll of human life, Robert J. Williams, the general manager of the city's Department of Building and Safety, told the hearing.

There are approximately 14,000 unreinforced masonry buildings presently standing within the city limits, he said, and these structures do not meet present seismic safety codes.

Between 75,000 and 100,000 Los Angeles citizens live in these unsafe residential buildings, and Williams characterized them as being, for the most part, "the poor, the elderly, the disabled and the disadvantaged."

Of those 14,000 buildings, Williams said that there are about 300 which might be termed "public assemblies"—private schools, churches, movie theaters, restaurants and the like, which might easily collapse during a moderate earthquake and kill or seriously injure a great many people.

"The San Fernando quake lasted only 11½ seconds," he told reporters later, "and if it had lasted just another 5 seconds or so, a lot of these old unreinforced buildings here in the downtown area would have come down."

The 1971 San Fernando earthquake registered only 6.4 on the Richter scale. A tremor of magnitude 8 on the San Andreas would produce heavy ground shaking for 30 seconds or more, Williams said, and almost certainly would bring down every unsafe structure in the city.

In an attempt to reduce this hazard, Williams said a proposed ordinance is now being considered by his department that would require owners of unsafe structures to strengthen the buildings or demolish them.

"We anticipate a lot of opposition to this ordinance (when it finally comes before the Los Angeles City Council, probably in two or three months," he said, "because it's more economical for an owner to hire a lawyer than an architect."

Charles Manfred the director of the state's Office of Emergency Services, reviewed for the commission the procedures that his office has adopted to handle predictions of impending earthquakes.

Manfred also disclosed that Dr. Vincent E. McKelvey, the director of the U.S. Geological Survey, had requested a meeting with Gov. Brown next week to brief him and other officials on the "Palmdale Bubble" as Manfred termed it.

Whatever their public stance, many of the seismologists and earth scientists privately confess to being a little worried by the huge blister.

They note that the uplifted area is approximately the same region where the last large earthquake struck Southern California; that was in 1857.

Since then, the San Andreas Fault has been locked and accumulating stress as the Pacific Plate, which includes everything west of the San Andreas, tries to slide past the North American Plate, which includes everything east of the fault line.

For all the concern engendered by the huge crustal swelling, the seismologists have also been quick to point out that there are no other signs of change occuring beneath the bubble.

All of the presumed tipoffs to an impending tremor now under study at seismological laboratories around the world—changes in the velocities of sound waves; changes in the electrical resistivity of subterranean rock layers; fluctuations in the content of a certain radioactive gas in underground water tables—appear normal right now.

Only one witness—Ralph H. Turner, chairman of UCLA's sociology department—responded to Steinbrugge's repeated pleas for recommendations.

Turner suggested that businesses and industries within the uplifted area begin now to consider what steps they would take if the bulge should eventually become the basis for a prediction of a large earthquake.

Secondly, Turner urged that federal disaster agencies start now to determine what resources would be called upon if a prediction is issued.

And finaly, he urged that a public education program be initiated immediately that would instruct people on what to do and not to do when an earthquake happens.

(d) Section 310(a)(4) of the Act (2 U.S.C. 437c(a)(4)) is amended by striking out "(other than the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives)".

(e) Section 310(a)(5) of the Act (2 U.S.C. 473c(a)(5)) is amended by striking out "(other than the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives)".

(f)(1) All personnel, liabilities, contracts, property, and records determined by the Director of the Office of Management and Budget to be employed, held, or used primarily in connection with the functions of the Federal Election Commission under title III of the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971 as such title existed on January 1, 1976, or under any other provision of law are transferred to the Federal Election Commission as constituted under the amendments made by this Act to the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971.

(2)(A) Except as provided in subparagraph (B) of this paragraph, personnel engaged in functions transferred under paragraph (1) shall be transferred in accordance with applicable laws and regulations relating to the transfer of functions.

(B) The transfer of personnel pursuant to paragraph (1) shall be without reduction in classification or compensation for one year after such transfer.

(3) All laws relating to the functions transferred under this Act shall, insofar as such laws are applicable and not amended by this Act, remain in full force and effect. All orders, determinations, rules, advisory opinions, and opinions of counsel made, issued, or granted by the Federal Election Commission before its reconstitution under the amendments made by this Act which are in effect at the time of the transfer provided by paragraph (1) shall continue in effect to the same extent as if such transfer had not occurred.

(4) The provisions of this Act shall not affect any proceeding pending before the Federal Election Commission at the time this section takes effect.

(5) No suit, action, or other proceeding commenced by or against the Federal Election Commission or any officer or employee thereof acting in his official capacity shall abate by reason of the transfer made under paragraph (1). The court before which such suit, action, or other proceeding is pending may, on motion or supplemental petition filed at any time within twelve months after the date of enactment of this Act, allow such suit, action, or other proceeding to be maintained against the Federal Election Commission if the party making the motion or filing the petition shows a necessity for the survival of the suit, action, or other proceeding to obain a settlement of the question involved.

(6) Any reference in any other Federal law to the Federal Election Commission, or to any member or employee thereof, as such Commission existed under the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971 before its amendment by this Act shall be held and considered to refer to the Federal Election Commission, or the members or employees thereof, as such Commission exists under the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971 as amended by this Act.

SEC. 2. All actions heretofore taken by the Commission shall remain in effect until modified, superseded, or repealed according to law.

SEC. 3. The provisions of titles III and IV of the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971 of section 608 of title 18, United States Code, and of chapters 95 and 96 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 shall not apply to any election, as defined in section 301 of the Act (2 U.S.C. 431(a)), that occurs after December 31, 1976, except runoff elections relating to elections occurring before such date.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, I will say only a few words at this point, and then turn the floor over to the distinguished ranking minority member of the Committee on Rules and Administration, the Senator from Oregon (Mr. HATFIELD).

I have offered a complete substitute for the pending bill. This substitute measure would merely reconstitute the Federal Election Commission along lines to meet the constitutional requirements indicated by the Supreme Court. The substitute includes certain provisions having to do with the transition of personnel, which are purely routine.

The substitute does not include that part of the President's recommendation which would have the present law expire next year. While such a termination date may be a good idea, there is considerable controversy regarding it. Of course, it goes without saying that Congress, at any time, is always able to undertake a complete revision and reform of the act, and that should be done next year whether or not a termination date is included in this legislation.

What I seek to do is give the Senate a clear choice—a choice between this 51-page monstrosity reported by the Rules Committee, 90 percent of which is controversial and which has been adopted without adequate hearings. This substitute gives the Senate an opportunity to do what is the commonsense thing to do—that is, to simply reestablish the Federal Election Commission in a constitutional manner so that it may continue to function in a way that complies with the Supreme Court decision.

I am glad to indicate to the majority leadership and to the floor managers of the bill that, as far as we are concerned, we are ready to vote on this substitute at any time. We are ready to vote on it later this afternoon, if possible, or some time tomorrow.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I yield.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. How about a vote at 3 o'clock this afternoon on the proposed substitute?

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I would be willing to agree to a time limit on the bill itself and all amendments, or anything to try to expedite it.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, I would respond by saying that this Senator would be willing to try to work out such an agreement, but I have to say that there are other Senators who are not ready at this point to agree to such an overall time limit.

Mr. BROCK. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I think it might depend in some degree on the reaction to this proposed substitute. This is a very simple substitute the Senator from Michigan and I are offering, which does nothing but extend the present law in accommodation with the Supreme Court decision.

Personally, I think we could complete action on the whole bill today. I see very little to add to the bill.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, I apologize for not stating, as I should have, that the Senator from Tennessee (Mr. BROCK) is the cosponsor of this amendment.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Then, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a vote occur on the substitute today at 3 p.m.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hearing no objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank all the Senators.

PRIVILEGE OF THE FLOOR

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that whenever consideration of S. 3065 is before the Senate, the following staff members of the Committee on Rules and Administration be granted the privileges of the floor:

William M. Cochrane, Edwin K. Hall, James F. Schoener, Peggy L. Parrish, Mary G. Daly, Dolores Eaton, Barbara Conroy, Gary Lawson, a GAO employee on detail to the Committee on Rules and Administration, Lloyd Ator, legislative counsel, and Nick Edes, staff of Senator WILLIAMS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, S. 3065 is an original bill amending the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971, as amended in 1974, to provide for the act's administration by a Federal Election Commission having six commissioners appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. This bill also amends certain other provisions of the law relating to the financing and conduct of Federal campaigns which the committee found necessary and desirable in light of the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in Buckley against Valeo, decided January 30, 1976.

Mr. President, I would like to review briefly the events of the recent past to help cast this proposed legislation in a proper historical perspective.

During the 92d Congress—1971–72—the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971 (Public Law 92–225) was enacted to provide sweeping and thorough control over and public disclosure of receipts and expenditures in both Federal primary and general elections. The Federal Election Campaign Act amendments of 1974, enacted during the 93d Congress (Public Law 93–443), amended the 1971 act extensively. The resulting law provided for overall limitations on campaign expenditures and political contributions, extensive reporting and recordkeeping requirements for candidates and political committees, and the establishment of a Federal Election Commission with extensive powers to administer and enforce the act. The law also provided for the public financing of Presidential primary and general elections and conventions.

On January 30, 1976, the Supreme Court of the United States, in Buckley against Valeo, upheld the contribution limitations, the recordkeeping and disclosure requirements of the act and the provisions for public financing of Presidential elections and conventions. However, the Court held that certain expenditure limitations under the act were in violation of the first amendment and that the exercise of administrative and enforcement powers delegated to the Commission was unconstitutional, because of the way in which its members were appointed.

Public hearings were held by the Subcommittee on Privileges and Elections, chaired by Senator CLAIBORNE PELL, on February 18, 1976. Witnesses appeared to testify and submit written statements on the impact of the Supreme Court's decision and on the many bills which had been introduced in response to that decision.

The Committee on Rules and Administration met on February 25 and 26 and on March 1, 1976, to consider legislation, and on March 1, ordered this original bill, S. 3065, reported. The report of the committee was submitted to the Senate on March 4, 1976.

Mr. President, the Senate is faced with a deadline of March 22, imposed by the Supreme Court, during which the Congress should act in order to assure the continuity of such important powers of the Federal Election Commission as the certification of public matching funds to Presidential candidates.

Mr. President, although the provisions of S. 3065 are summarized at length in the report of the committee, I would like to review certain of the proposed changes at this time.

The bill provides that the Commission is to consist of the Secretary of the Senate, the Clerk of the House, both ex officio and without the right to vote, and six members appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. As so constituted, the constitutional requirements set forth in Buckley against Valeo will have been met, in the opinion of this Senator.

As with the existing Commission, no more than three members may be affiliated with the same political party. The bill furthermore contains some new provisions to help assure that the Commission might function in as nonpartisan a manner as possible. First of all, Commissioners may be appointed to fill expired terms only in an off-election year. Second, the bill provides that the Commission may not establish guidelines, initiate civil actions, render advisory opinions, prescribe rules and regulations, conduct investigations, or report apparent violations except by an affirmative vote of four members of the Commission, no less than two of whom are affiliated with the same political party. This provision will prevent three members of one party and only one of another from constituting a majority, and is intended as a safeguard to keep politics, or the appearance of politics, out of the actions of the Commission.

The bill gives the Commission exclusive and primary jurisdiction for the civil enforcement of the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971, as amended, and of the public financing of Presidential campaigns. It should be noted that this would also encompass exclusive jurisdiction for the civil enforcement of many of the existing criminal code provisions of title 18 relating to Federal election campaigns, which are transferred by this bill into the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971.

In addition to exclusive civil enforcement authority, the bill gives the Commission a more varied assortment of enforcement powers and provides for greater public disclosure of Commission enforcement activities. These are set forth in the bill and described at pages 7 and 8 of the committee's report.

It is important to note here, however, that the bill changes present law by providing criminal penalties for more substantial violations and a combination of formal conciliation actions, disclosure, civil enforcement and civil fines for less substantial violations of the law. For example, if a person—as defined under the act—unknowingly failed to report a $200 expenditure which advocated the election or defeat of a clearly identified candidate that person would be required to correct the error in response to the Commission's conciliatory efforts or in response to a court order obtained at the request of the Commission. The Commission would be required to make public the results of any such conciliatory efforts. However, a person who willfully and knowingly fails to report an expenditure in excess of $1,000 which expressly advocated the election or defeat of a clearly identified candidate would be subject to the civil fines and criminal penalties set forth in the bill in addition to the above enforcement actions.

The detailed enforcement procedures which are set forth on pages 19 to 27 of the bill will give the Commission a greater number of alternatives in enforcing the law, and at the same time afford a person who makes a good-faith attempt at compliance with the complex requirements of the act a greater degree of protection than presently available. Finally, and of perhaps greatest importance as an effective deterrent against abuses, the bill requires a greater degree of public disclosure of the Commission's success or failure at obtaining compliance with the campaign financing laws.

Mr. President, S. 3065 also proposes a revision in the Commission's procedures for issuing advisory opinions. The bill clarifies that an advisory opinion shall apply only to the person requesting such an advisory opinion and to any other person directly involved in the specific transaction or activity as to which the advisory opinion is rendered. It further requires the Commission, no later than 30 days after rendering an advisory opinion which sets forth a rule of general applicability, to prescribe rules or regulations relating to the transaction or activity involved, assuming it is not already subject to an existing rule or regulation.

Since its inception the Commission has issued well over 100 advisory opinions, giving each widespread publication in the Federal Register and elsewhere. This widespread dissemination of numerous advisory opinions has, of course, given the public and candidates an opportunity to learn the Commission's interpretation of the campaign finance laws. However, in many instances these opinions have related to transactions or activities of general applicability which would more properly have been the subject of proposed rules or regulations. The proposed legislation is intended to require the Commission to prescribe rules and regulations with respect to transactions or activities which would have general applicability to all candidates or political committees. However, in instances where a request for an advisory opinion is a matter of peculiar interest to a particular candidate or committee covering an individual problem, it would not be necessary for the advisory opinion to be prescribed as a rule or regulation.

Mr. President, S. 3065 also proposes a number of changes in the law relating to campaign contributions and expenditures to reflect the decision of the Supreme Court in Buckley against Valeo, and to restrict within the constitutional limitations set by the Supreme Court the flow of excessive sums of money into political campaigns.

A number of changes merely reflect the Supreme Court's decision upholding the constitutionality of requiring public disclosure of expenditures which expressly advocate a particular election result, and are summarized in the committee report.

Under present law any political committee, whether it is a multicandidate political committee which is qualified to make $5,000 contributions per election to a candidate, or any other political committee as defined in the act is permitted to make a contribution in an unlimited amount to any other political committee so long as the latter is not a candidate's authorized committee or the funds are not earmarked for a particular candidate.

Consequently, in the aftermath of Buckley against Valeo unlimited sums of money can be directed to a few select political committees to then be injected into a campaign without limitation as an independent expenditure in support of or in opposition to an expressly identified candidate.

In order to curb such an unintended abuse of the campaign finance laws the bill proposes that contributions by a political committee to another political committee—where the latter is not a candidate's authorized committee and the funds are not earmarked for a particular candidate—shall be limited to an aggregate sum of $25,000 in any one calendar year.

I note here that the Supreme Court in Buckley against Valeo expressly upheld the constitutionality of limitations on contributions, which included the present $25,000 calendar year aggregate limitation on contributions by individuals, whether the recipient be a number of candidates or a political committee such as the national committee of a political party. In other words, that was an overall limitation of $25,000 to the donor for all purposes for which he might have intended to give. The Court stated at pages 32 to 33 of the slip opinion as follows:

The overall $25,000 ceiling does impose an ultimate restriction upon the number of candidates and committees with which an individual may associate himself by means of financial support. But this quite modest restraint upon protected political activity serves to prevent evasion of the $1,000 contribution limitation by a person who might otherwise contribute massive amounts of money to a particular candidate through the use of unearmarked contributions to political committees likely to contribute to that candidate, or huge contributions to the candidate's political party. The limited, additional restriction on associational freedom imposed by the overall ceiling is thus no more than a corollary of the basic individual contribution limitation that we have found to be constitutionally valid.

Mr. President, I submit that the proposed $25,000 aggregate calendar year limitation on political committee contributions to other political committees is similarly no more than a corollary of the basic limitation on political committee contributions and is thus constitutionally valid.

S. 3065 also contains a provision intended to curtail the vertical proliferation of political committee contributions. As set forth on page 28 beginning at line 15 of the bill, for purposes of the contribution limitations:

All contributions made by political committees established, financed, maintained, or controlled by any person or persons including any parent, subsidiary, branch, division, department, affiliate, or local unit of such person or by any group of persons shall be considered to have been made by a single political committee.

There are three exceptions to this rule:

First. This antiproliferation rule would not apply to limit transfers between political committees of funds raised through joint fundraising efforts.

Second. This rule shall not apply to a political committee established, financed, or maintained by the national committee or the State, district, or local committee of a political party.

Third. This rule intended to curtail the vertical proliferation of political committee contributions would not preclude a political committee of a national organization from contributing to a candidate or committee merely because of its affiliation with a national multicandidate political committee which has made the maximum contribution it is permitted to make to a candidate or political committee.

I would like to illustrate this third exception by using an example which was referred to us during our committee deliberations. The proposed rule to curtail the vertical proliferation of political committee contributions would not preclude a national union through its political committee, such as for example, the boilermakers, from making a maximum contribution to a candidate through its national political committee in the event that COPE, the political committee of the AFL–CIO, with which the boilermakers are affiliated, has already made its maximum contribution to that candidate. On the other hand, the proposed rule would prevent the various local unions of the boilermakers from making a similar maximum contribution through their local political committees when such a maximum contribution has already been made from the national political committee of the boilermakers.

To use another example, if the national political committee of the National Association of Manufacturers had made its maximum contribution to a candidate, the political committee of a national corporation which is affiliated with NAM would not be precluded from making a maximum contribution to that candidate. However, the subsidiaries, divisions, or departments, et cetera, of that national corporation would be precluded from making a similar maximum contribution through their local political committees when such a maximum contribution has already been made by the national corporation's political committee to a candidate.

Mr. President, the bill retains the existing expenditure limitations on Presidential candidates, conditioning their application upon the acceptance of public financing. The bill also retains the existing expenditure limitations imposed upon the national and State committees of political parties.

Finally, Mr. President, the bill proposes a number of changes in existing section 610 of title 18, United States Code, which prohibits contribution or expenditures by corporations and labor organizations. First of all, the provisions of section 610, like a number of other title 18 provisions related to the financing of campaigns, are transferred to the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971 as amended, and made subject to the proposed new enforcement and penalty provisions of the bill.

A second change relates to the provisions which permit a corporation to communicate with its stockholders and their families on any subject. This has been expanded to permit corporations to communicate with executive or administrative personnel and their families on any subject as well.

A third change would similarly expand those to whom a corporation can aim nonpartisan registration and get-out-the-vote campaigns to include executive or administrative personnel of a corporation and their families, as well as stockholders and their families.

A fourth change would make it unlawful for a corporation or a segregated fund of a corporation to solicit contributions from any person other than its stockholders, executive, or administrative personnel, and their families, or for a labor organization or a segregated fund created by a labor organization to solicit contributions from any person other than its members and their families.

This fourth change alters existing law as interpreted by the Federal Election Commission in its Sun PAC Advisory Opinion 1975–23, wherein the Commission interpreted section 610 to permit a corporation to solicit all its employees. It is felt that such an interpretation creates extraordinary pressure and undue potential for coercion, which was even acknowledged by the Commission in its advisory opinion, in a situation where management of a corporation is permitted to solicit political contributions from all its employees.

As evidenced by the dissent of Commissioners Harris and Tiernan, there is an extremely strong case to be made that the original intent of section 610 was to deny corporations the right to solicit contributions from anyone except stockholders and their families. Certainly, as the dissent in the Sun PAC opinion also pointed out, there are definite inequities involved when a corporation is permitted to solicit all employees:

On a national scale, the majority ruling grants corporations as a group an unfair advantage over labor unions in the solicitation of political contributions. It is estimated that over 30,900,000 individuals own shares of stock in American corporations. 1975 World Almanac 94. But, out of the nation's total workforce of 84,000,000 workers, only 18,000,000 of them (or about 21%) are members of labor unions including AFL–CIO, independent, CNTU and CLC unions, 1975 World Almanac 103. Had corporations been restricted to soliciting only their stockholders, they could have solicited almost twice as many individuals as labor unions. Under the majority's ruling, however, corporations now have the potential of soliciting the entire workforce of the nation. Congress certainly did not intend to create such a gross disparity in the solicitation power of corporations and unions, by enacting the segregated fund exception to section 610, as the majority of the Commission now permits in its interpretation of the Statute. Federal Register, Vol. 40, No. 233—Wednesday, December 3, 1975, p. 56587.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the entire advisory opinion 1975–23 and dissent related to the Sun PAC matter I have referred to, be printed in its entirety after the conclusion of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit 1.)

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, the changes proposed by S. 3065 will create a better balance in the equities between corporations and labor unions and reduce measurably the potential for coercion inherent in the employment relationship by limiting those whom corporations can solicit, other than stockholders and their families, to executive or administrative personnel, who are defined in the bill as "individuals employed by a corporation who are paid on a salary, rather than hourly, basis and who have policymaking or supervisory responsibilities."

Mr. President, there are a number of other provisions in the bill which I will certainly be willing to discuss as questions may arise. At this point I would like to yield to other members of the Senate who may wish to speak on this proposed legislation.

EXHIBIT 1

FEDERAL ELECTION COMMISSION

[Notice 1975–83]

ADVISORY OPINION

(Establishment of Political Action Committee and Employee Political Giving Program by Corporation.)

The Federal Election Commission announces the publication today of Advisory Opinion 1975–23. The Commission's opinion is in response to questions raised by individuals holding Federal office, candidates for Federal office and political committees, with respect to whether any specific transaction or activity by such individual, candidate, or po-political committee would constitute a violation of the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971, as amended, of Chapter 95 or 96 of Title 26 United States Code, or of Sections 608, 610, 611, 613, 614, 615, 616, or 617 of Title 18 United States Code.

The Commission points out that this advisory opinion should be regarded as an interim ruling which is subject to modification by future Commission regulations of general applicability. In the event that a holding in the opinion is altered by the Commission's regulations, the person to whom the opinion is issued will be notified.

ADVISORY OPINION 1975–23

ESTABLISHMENT OF POLITICAL ACTION COMMITTEE AND EMPLOYEE POLITICAL GIVING PROGRAM BY CORPORATION

In this advisory opinion, rendered pursuant to 2 U.S.C. 437f, the Commission responds to a request for an advisory opinion submitted by the Sun Oil Company and published as AOR 1975–23 in the FEDERAL REGISTER on July 29, 1975 (40 FR 31879). Interested persons were invited to submit written comments with respect to this request. A number of such comments were received and considered by the Commission before this opinion was issued.

A. Introduction

Sun Oil proposed to sponsor a bifurcated responsible citizenship program for political activities. One part of this program will involve the expenditure of general corporate treasury funds to establish, administer, and solicit voluntary contributions to a political action committee. This committee (hereinafter SUN PAC) will be maintained as a separate segregated fund and used by Sun Oil for political purposes under the provisions of 18 U.S.C. 610. The other part of this program will involve the expenditure of treasury funds to establish and administer a "trustee" plan. Under the plan (hereinafter SUN EPA) Sun Oil will open separate bank accounts for participating employees in order to channel their contributions to candidates for political office. The activities of SUN EPA will be separate and apart from those of SUN PAC.

The Commission has been asked to evaluate SUN PAC and SUN EPA with respect to the requirements of the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971, as amended (hereinafter the "FECA" or the "Act") and the proscriptions of 18 U.S.C. § 610. In the following opinion, the Commission will discuss various legal aspects of corporate segregated funds and trustee plans.

B. Applicable Law

Section 610 of Title 18 of the United States Code provides, in pertinent part, as follows:

CONTRIBUTIONS OR EXPENDITURES BY NATIONAL BANKS, CORPORATIONS OR LABOR ORGANIZATIONS

"It is unlawful for any national bank, or any corporation organized by authority of any law of Congress, to make a contribution or expenditure in connection with any election to any political office, or in connection with any primary election or political convention or caucus held to select candidates for any political office, or for any corporation whatever, or any labor organization to make a contribution or expenditure in connection with any election at which presidential and vice presidential electors or [officials] to Congress are to be voted for, or in connection with any primary election or political convention or caucus held to select candidates for any of the foregoing offices, or for any * * * political committee * * * to accept or accept or receive any contribution prohibited by this section.

"As used in this section, the phrase 'contribution or expenditure' shall include any direct or indirect payment, distribution, loan, advance, deposit, or gift of money, or any services, or anything of value * * * to any candidate, campaign committee, or political party or organization in connection with any election to any of the offices referred to in this section; but shall not include * * * the establishment, administration, and solicitation of contributions to a separate segregated fund to be utilized for political purposes by a corporation or local organization * * *: Provided, That it shall be unlawful for such a fund to make a contribution or expenditure by utilizing money or anything of value secured by physical force, job discrimination, financial reprisals, or the threat of force, job discrimination, or financial reprisal; or by dues, fees, or other monies required as a condition of membership in a labor organization or as a condition of employment, or by monies obtained in any commercial transaction."

The history of section 610, prior to its amendment by section 205 of the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971, was set forth in United States v. UAW, 352 U.S. 567 at 570–90 (1957). Moreover, the history of the 1971 amendment, which permits corporations to establish, administer and solicit contributions to separate segregated funds, was discussed in some detail in Pipefitters Local 562 v. United States, 407 U.S. 385 at 409–13, 421–27, 429–32 (1972). See also, United States v. CIO, 335 U.S. 106 (1948). There is no need, therefore, to trace that history here in any detail. However, some general conclusions can be made in light of legislative history about the application of section 610 to the corporate political activities proposed by Sun Oil.

C. Conclusions

(1) First, it is lawful for Sun Oil to expend general treasury funds to defray expenses incurred in establishing, administering, and soliciting contributions to SUN PAC so long as it is maintained as a separate segregated fund. The language of section 610 and the supporting legislative history of the 1971 Amendment to the statute plainly permits such expenditures. See, Pipefitters, supra, at 429–33. SUN PAC must register and file reports just as any other political committee is required to do under the FECA.

(2) Secondly, it is lawful for Sun Oil to make any political contributions and expenditures it sees fit in connection with any Federal election so long as the monies used for such purposes are expended from SUN PAC and the fund consists of voluntary contributions.

In situations where SUN PAC makes contributions or expenditures in connection with Federal and non-Federal elections, it may establish and maintain a separate account for use in Federal elections Thereafter, monies to be expended in non-Federal elections should not be commingled with monies to be expended in Federal elections. SUN PAC should designate the bank in which it maintains any such account for Federal elections as the campaign depository of the fund. 2 U.S.C. 437b. All contributions received or expenditures made in connection with Federal elections should be deposited in or drawn from this account. If SUN PAC so decides to maintain a separate account for use in Federal elections, it may file reports pertaining only to the separate Federal account. However, if SUN PAC fails to segregate the accounts and monies to be used in connection with both Federal and non-Federal elections, then SUN PAC will be required to report all contrbutions and expenditures regardless of whether they are made for non-Federal purposes.

Any political contributions or expenditures made by SUN PAC are subject to the applicable reporting requirements of the FECA and the limitations of 18 U.S.C. 608. Moreover, since individual contributions made to SUN PAC are also contributions within the meaning of 18 U.S.C. § 591(e), such contributions are also subject to the limitations of 18 U.S.C. § 608.

(3) Thirdly, it is lawful for Sun Oil to control and direct the disbursement of contributions and expenditures from SUN PAC. When the issue of the control of segregated funds was presented to the Supreme Court in the Pipefitters case, (which involved a section 610 criminal prosecution against a labor union) the Court held that "such a fund must be separate from the sponsoring union only in the sense that there must be a strict segregation of its monies from union dues and assessments." Id. at 414. After an exhaustive review of legislative history, the Court concluded that (Id. at 415–417):

"Nowhere, however, has Congress required that the political organization [i.e., the fund] be formally or functionally independent of union control or that union officials be * * * precluded from determining how the monies raised will be spent. * * * Senator Taft adamantly maintained that labor organizations were not prohibited from expending those monies [from the fund] in connection with Federal elections. * * * Neither the absence of even a formally separate organization, * * *, nor the method for choosing the candidate to be supported was mentioned as being material. Similarly, the only requirements for permissible political organizations were that they be funded through separate contributions [which were voluntary]." (Emphasis added.)

The Court also concluded from the legislative history that (Id. at 426):

"[T]he term 'separate' * * * is synonymous with 'segregated.' Nothing in the legislative history indicates that the word is to be understood in any other way. * * * It is difficult to concsive how a valid political fund can be meaningfully 'separate' from the sponsoring union in any way other than 'segregated.'"

Since corporations and labor unions are subject to the same restrictions under section 610, it is clear that under the language of the Pipefitters case, Sun Oil can exercise control over the operations and activities of SUN PAC.

There is much concern in the business community about the proper class of persons who may be solicited by a corporation with its treasury money for contributions to a political fund. Sun Oil advised in its request for an opinion that "[t]o achieve its purpose, SUN PAC will solicit and accept contributions from individuals and from other political committees." Sun Oil now advises, through counsel, that its solicitation efforts will not be as broad as the language of its request suggested. The Commission is now advised that Sun Oil "will not solicit contributions from members of the general public who are neither Sun employees nor shareholders" but that "Sun does intend to use corporate funds to solicit contributions to SUN PAC from its employees."

(4) It is the opinion of the Commission that Sun Oil may spend general treasury funds for the solicitation of contributions to SUN PAC from stockholders and employees of the corporation. The Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971 amended section 610 by defining contribution and expenditure and setting forth exemptions to that definition. The first two exceptions permit the use of corporate treasury funds for activities aimed only at stockholders and their families. The third exception places no limitation on the categories of persons who may be solicited for voluntary contributions to a separate segregated fund. However, the legislative history of the 1971 Act clearly states that general treasury money may not be used to solicit the general public. 117 Cong. Rec. 43380–81. The absence of a limitation in the third exception similar to that contained in the first two exceptions, indicates that it was Congress' intent not to limit the use of corporate funds for solicitation of contributions to separate segregated funds only to stockholders. Furthermore, corporations have traditionally solicited their employees for both political and non-political purposes. Absent any express language in the statute or the legislative history prohibiting such solicitations, it would be illogical to conclude that corporations could solicit only their stockholders and not their employees. Finally, section 610 provides that contributions to a separate segregated fund may not be secured by "job discrimination" or "financial reprisals", actions which an employer may take against an employee.

The Commission recognizes, however, that there is in the best-intentioned plans a potential for coercion which is inherent in the employment relationship and which may be triggered by solicitation of employees by or on behalf of an employer. Section 610 forbids coercion or reprisal of any kind in the solicitation of contributions to separate segregated funds. To minimize the appearance or perception of coercion, the Commission recommends the following guidelines on solicitation of political contributions by employees to such funds. First, no superior should solicit a subordinate. Second, the solicitor should inform the solicited employee of the political purpose of the fund for which the contribution is solicited. Third, the solicitor should inform the employees of the employee's right to refuse to contribute without reprisal of any kind.

(5) An issue related to that of soliciting contributions is that of SUN PAC accepting contributions from any donor willing to make them. It is the opinion of the Commission that SUN PAC generally can accept any contributions from many donors, whether or not it is lawful for Sun Oil to solicit a contribution from that donor. However, section 610 would prohibit SUN PAC from accepting any political contribution which would be an unlawful contribution by the donor under that statute.

Although Sun Oil cannot spend treasury funds to solicit contributions from political committees, SUN PAC could solicit such contributions with expenditures from its fund of voluntary contributions. Accordingly, SUN PAC may accept contributions from political committees which it solicited and contributions which were not so solicited but freely donated by political committees.

(6) Finally, Sun Oil has proposed a detailed organizational plan for SUN PAC. Essentially, SUN PAC will be a voluntary, non-profit, unincorporated, political membership association open to certain employees of Sun Oil and its subsidiaries. Several employees will be appointed by Sun Oil to create SUN PAC. In addition, Sun Oil will appoint the administrative officers of SUN PAC. A contribution committee will manage the overall financial operations of SUN PAC and will designate the donees of contributions. The committee may delegate all of its powers to the Chairman of SUN PAC who is a Sun Oil appointee.

Section 610 does not mandate any formal organizational structure for corporate political committees. However, under 2 U.S.C. 432, SUN PAC, just as any other political committee, would be required to have a chairman and treasurer in order to accept or make any political contributions. Beyond these requirements, there are no other formal organizational requirements applicable to SUN PAC under Federal law.

Sun Oil also proposed to spend general treasury funds to establish a political giving program for its employees called SUN EPA. SUN EPA is what is commonly called a "trustee" plan. This plan was described in some detail in Sun Oil's request for an advisory opinion and briefly in the introductory paragraphs to this opinion. One commentator has described the concept of SUN EPA as follows:

"* * * SUN EPA conceptually serves a purpose not unlike a Christmas Club—i.e., systematic 'saving' toward a set goal (in this case, in order to provide a source of individual contributions at campaign time, rather than a fund for Christmas gifts)."

Sun Oil conceded that SUN EPA would not be a segregated fund under the only applicable exception of section 610, and that it would not be a political committee subject to the registration and reporting requirements of the Act. Sun Oil stressed the fact that it will not exercise any control over the affairs of SUN EPA and that employees who participate in the plan will exercise complete control and discretion over the disbursement of their political contributions.

(7) It is the opinion of the Commission that the expenditure of general treasury funds by Sun Oil for the ordinary and necessary administrative costs of implementing SUN EPA is not prohibited by section 610. The assumption of these costs would not represent any direct or indirect payment by Sun Oil to any candidate, campaign committee, or political party or organization, within the meaning of section 610, so long as Sun Oil will exercise no control over the program nor will attempt to influence employee contributions.

The legislative history of the 1974 Amendments to the Federal Election Campaign Act clearly states that if a person exercises any direction and control over the making of a contribution then that contribution shall count as a contribution with respect to that person. Thus, in order to avoid making a contribution under section 610, Sun Oil and its management may not make any effort, either orally or in writing, to direct contributions by participants in SUN EPA to any candidate, group of candidates, political party or other person. Participants in SUN EPA must exercise independent judgment when making contributions.

The Commission notes that the Justice Department, which has criminal prosecution powers with respect to section 610, would not regard the use of corporate funds to administer such plans as being within the prohibitions of section 610:

"[P]rovided that the corporation in no manner suggests to the contributing employee the identity of certain candidates or committees which should be the beneficiaries of such personal contributions, provided that absolutely no pressure of any kind is applied to induce participation in the program, and provided corporate funds are not indirectly contributed to the ultimate recipients through such means as artificially inflating employees' salaries * * *." (Letter to John G. Murphy, General Counsel, Federal Election Commission, November 3, 1975.)

Sun Oil states that:

"[T]he bank, on a quarterly basis, will inform SUN of the total amounts of contributions under SUN EPA for the quarter to specific candidates, committees, or political parties receiving them, so it may be published for those participating in the plan."

The receipt and publication of any report on the source or recipient of any contribution(s) or donation(s) into or out of any SUN EPA account(s) may constitute the exercise of direction and control over future contributions. The Commission would not object to Sun Oil's receiving reports setting forth the total number of employees in the plan, the total amount of funds in all the accounts and the total amount of contributions made to all candidates and committees.

The Commission further notes that the possibility of exercising direction and control may be inherently present when an employee trustee plan and a political action committee are administered simultaneously by the same corporation. This, of course, will be a factual determination. However, under section 610, a violation need not be willful.

This advisory opinion is issued on an interim basis only, pending the promulgation by the Commission of rules and regulations or policy statements of general applicability.

NOTE: The foregoing opinion was adopted by the Commission by a 4 to 2 vote with Commissioners Harris and Tiernan voting against adoption. The dissenting opinion of Commissioners Harris and Tiernan is published as follows.

Dated: November 24, 1975.

THOMAS B. CURTIS,
Chairman for the Federal Election Commission.

COMMISSIONER HARRIS AND COMMISSIONER TIERNAN, DISSENTING

A. SUN-PAC: Solicitation of contributions

We do not think that the statute permits Sun Oil to use its general funds to solicit donations to its political fund from persons other than Sun Oil's stockholders. This conclusion is based on the language and overall objective of § 610, the legislative history of the Hansen Amendment, and the Supreme Court's opinion in Pipefitters Local 562 v. United States, 407 U.S. 385 (1972). [Also, the effect of the Commission's decision appears to be to give corporations greater leeway than unions as respect solicitation for their political funds—a result surely astounding to both supporters and opponents of the Hansen Amendment.]

1. The language added to Section 610 in 1972 by the Hansen Amendment creates three exceptions to the section's general ban on the expenditure of corporate or union funds in connection with any election to federal office. They are (a) "communications by a corporation to its stockholders and their families or by a labor organization to its members and their families on any subject;" (b) "nonpartisan registration and get-out-the-vote campaigns by a corporation aimed at its stockholders and their families, or by a labor organization aimed at its members and their families;" and (c) "solicitation of contributions to a separate segregated fund to be utilized for political purposes by a corporation or labor organization." The first of these exceptions, i.e., as to communications, is paralleled in the definition of "expenditure" [2 U.S.C. 431 (f) (4) (c) and 18 U.S.C. 591 (f) (4) (c)], which excludes from "expenditure" "any communication by any membership organization or corporation to its members or stockholders * * *" (Emphasis added).

The first two Hansen Amendment exceptions are restricted in terms to stockholders in the case of a corporation and members in the case of a union, while the third exception has no restriction. Thus, read literally, the third exception would permit a corporation or union to solicit not only stockholders or members, but the general public, that is, anybody and everybody. Such a construction of the third exception would however go far to destroy the general ban of Section 610 on the expenditure of corporate or union funds in connection with a federal election; and it would likewise undercut the provision in the first exception that corporations may communicate with stockholders and union with members and the parallel provision in the statutory definition of "expenditure". This is so because the "solicitation" of contributions to a political fund necessarily includes representations as to what sort of causes and candidates the fund will support, and as to why those solicited should contribute to it. If corporations and unions are free to use their general funds to solicit the public at large, they may legally carry on extensive political campaigns in support of particular candidates or type of candidates as a part of their solicitation efforts.

A more rational construction of the statute is that the first and third Hansen Amendment exceptions are to be read together. Individuals cannot be solicited to make a voluntary contribution except by communicating with them. As § 610 states and as its legislative history makes emphatic, Congress intended to assure that corporate communications on political subjects financed by treasury money would be directed only at stockholders and their families and that such union communications would be to members and their families. It creates an inexplicable exception to that intent to read the permission to solicit contributions as separate from the permission to communicate with stockholders and members rather than reading these two clauses of the same sentence together. And, since there is in fact no dividing line between communication and solicitation, if such an exception were to be made there would soon be little if anything left of the rule. A corporation could then legally take out a full-page advertisement in the New York Times soliciting for contributions by stating who those contributions would be used to support and why. Except for the top and bottom line, such an advertisement would be no different than one communicating the corporation's views on those candidates to the general public through the expenditure of treasury money. That, of course, is precisely what § 610 prohibits.

Since a construction which permitted corporations and unions to solicit the general public would go far to undercut § 610, no one has urged it. Sun Oil has, subsequent to its initial presentation, disclaimed any purpose to solicit the general public. However, as far as a simple reading of the statute goes, there is no basis for drawing any distinction between the use of corporate funds to solicit the general public and their use to solicit employees of the corporation.

2. Since the statute is thus ambiguous and not to be read literally, it is of course appropriate to examine the legislative history of the Hansen Amendment. Pipefitters Local 552 v. United States, supra. That history confirms that the first and third exceptions are to be read togeteher, and that the Hansen Amendment was intended to sanction the use of corporate or union funds only to communicate with and/or solicit stockholders or members.

In explaining his Amendment to the House, Representative Hansen stated:

Next, the amendment, in further defining the phrase "contribution or expenditure", draws a distinction between activities directed at the general public, which are prohibited, and communications by a corporation to its stockholders and their families and by a labor organization to its members and their families, on any subject, which the courts have held is permitted.

The amendment set forth the limited circumstances where such communications are permitted in connection with an election. These include:

(1) non-partisan registration and get-out-the-vote campaigns by a corporation aimed at its stockholders and their families, or by a labor organization aimed at its members and their families.

(2) the establishment, administration and solicitation of contributions to a separate segregated fund to be utilized for political purposes by a corporation or labor organization. (Emphasis added). (117 Cong. Rec. 43379)

Representative Hansen reiterated this distinction, between corporate political activity directed at stockholders (and union political activity directed at members) and political activity financed by treasury money directed at the general public, in three separate passages in his explanatory floor statement:

Section 610 strikes a balance between organizational rights and the rights of those who wish to retain their shareholding interest or membership status but who disagree with the majority's political views. The balance presently obtaining provides, in my judgment, an optimum solution to the complex problem of accommodating these conflicting interests. This solution is sound in theory as I shall show, has proved workable in practice, and has generated a broad bi-partisan consensus in favor of continuation of the present rules. For this reason my amendment, with one exception, follows the present law.

Thus, Section 610 as it stands, and under my proposal, represents a complete victory for those who believe that corporations and unions have no moral right to utilize their organizations' general funds for active public partisan politicking. It totally subordinates organizational interest to individual interests. (Emphasis added) (117 Cong. Reg. 43380)

* * * * *

Recognizing that group interests must be given some play and that the interest of the minority is weakest when corporations and unions confine their activities to their own stockholders and members, the beneficial owners of these organizations, the second subdivision of the amendment sets out three precisely defined and limited permissions for corporate and union activity related to the political process.

The courts, as well as other independent students of section 610 and its legislative history, have concluded that the 1947 Congress did not intend to prohibit corporations or unions from communicating freely with their members and stockholders—see U.S. v. CIO, 335 U.S. 106—from conducting nonpartisan regulation and get-out-the-vote campaigns, or from securing voluntary contributions made directly to the support of a labor or management political organization—93 Congressional Record 6440, remarks of Senator Taft." (Emphasis added). (117 Cong. Rec. 43380).

* * * * *

At the present time there is broad agreement as to the essence of the proper balance in regulating corporate and union political activity required by sound policy and the Constitution. It consists of a strong prohibition on the use of corporate and union treasury funds to reach the general public in support of, or opposition to, Federal candidates, and a limited permission to corporations and unions, allowing them to communicate freely with members and stockholders on any subject, to attempt to convince members and stockholders to register and vote, and to make political contributions, and expenditures financed by voluntary donations which have been kept in a separate segregated fund. This amendment writes that balance into clear and unequivocal statutory language. (Emphasis added). (117 Con. Rec. 43381).

* * * * *

Representative Hansen further emphasized this distinction by quoting Senator Taft's explanation of section 610 as it was enacted in 1947:

The dividing line established by 610 is between political activity directed at the general public in connection with Federal elections which must be financed out of political donations and activities directed at members or stockholders which may be financed by general funds * *

Finally, there can be no doubt that union members or stockholders should have the right to set up special political action funds supported by voluntary donations from which political "contributions and expenditures" can lawfully be made. As Senator Taft stated in his floor explanation of section 610:

If [union members or stockholders] are asked to contribute directly * * * to the support of a labor [or management] political organization, they know what their money is to be used for and presumably approve it. From such contribution the organization can spend all the money it wants to with respect to such matters. But the prohibition is against labor unions using their members' dues for political purposes, which is exactly the same as the prohibition against a corporation using its stockholders' money for political purposes, and perhaps in violation of the wishes of many of its stockholders. 93 Cong. Rec. 6440 (Emphasis added). (117 Cong. Rec. 43381).

Earlier in the debate the following colloquy occurred among Rep. Hansen and Reps. Dellenback and Hays:

May I ask as a general question, Mr. Hansen, is it your intent by the way you have drafted the amendment to propose that corporations and unions be treated absolutely equally?

Mr. HANSEN of Idaho. That is correct.

Mr. DELLENBACK. And, further, if a situation is proper for a corporation, it is also proper for a union and if it is proper for a union, then it is also proper for a corporation.

I think it is extremely important that what you have here proposed is an amendment that seeks to bring about equity. I think it is important that a union be able to communicate with its members and do what the law already permits it to do, and likewise I feel it is important that a corporation be able to do that same thing with its stockholders.

Mr. HAYS. I join in support of this particular amendment. It seems to me that it does work equity in what has been a very troublesome situation in the past. (Emphasis added). (117 Cong. Rec. 43380).

This statement of Congressional intent, involving as it does the author of the amendment (Rep. Hansen) and the Chairman of the House Committee (Rep. Hays) is enttiled to special weight.

3. In line with this legislative history, the Supreme Court stated in the Pipefitters case that the first and third exceptions of the Hansen Amendment are integrally related and similarly limited to stockholders and members:

With the exemption for communications to stockholders or union members and their families apparently in mind, Hansen stated, for example, 117 Cong. Rec. H11478:

"[E]very organization should be allowed to take the steps necessary for its growth and survival. There is, of course, no need to belabor the point that Government policies profoundly affect both business and labor * * * If an organization, whether it be the NAM, the AMA or the AFL–CIO, believes that certain candidates pose a threat to its well-being or the well-being of its members or stockholders, it should be able to get its views to those members or stockholders. As fiduciaries for their members and stockholders the officers of these institutions have a duty to share their informed insights on all issues affecting their institution with their constituents. Both union members and stockholders have the right to expect this expert guidance.

This reasoning, of course, applies as well to solicitations for contributions to voluntary political funds." (Emphasis added). (Pipefitters, supra at 431 no. 42).

4. The interpretation given § 610 by the majority of the Commission seems to me to be slanted in favor of corporate political fund solicitations, as compared with union. Congress means to hold the balance even.

In introducing his Amendment, Rep. Hansen stated:

The net effect of the amendment, therefore, is to tighten and clarify the provisions of section 610 of title 18 United States Code, and to codify the case law. It spells out more clearly the rules governing election activities that apply equally to labor unions and corporations. While prohibiting abuses that involve activities directed at the general public, the amendment recognizes that the constitutional guarantee of free speech protects the right of labor organizations and corporations to communicate with their own members or stockholders. (Emphasis added). (117 Cong. Rec. 43379).

The Commission's ruling destroys that balance. Unions are presumably limited to communicating with and soliciting their members, while corporations may solicit not only their stockholders, but all employees, whether union members or not. This is a curious result to flow from the union-supported and corporation opposed Hansen Amendment.

The imbalance resulting from the majority's ruling can readily be discerned by reference to statistical data. The Sun Oil Co.,[1] which had gross earnings in excess of 3.7 billion dollars at the end of 1974, has almost five times as many stockholders as it does employees. As of December 31, 1974, the company had 126,555 stockholders holding 57,301,668 shares of preferred and common stock in the company. At the end of the same period, the company had only 27,707 employees. Under the majority's ruling, Sun Oil is now permitted to solicit partisan political contributions from well over 127,000 individuals including employees who are not also stockholders. On the other hand, the labor union affiliated with Sun Oil is restricted in its solicitation to the small percentage of the 27,000 employee workforce which holds membership in the union. The union presumably cannot even solicit employees who must go through its hiring halls for employment with Sun Oil if those employees are not also union members. On a national scale, the majority ruling grants corporations as a group an unfair advantage over labor unions in the solicitation of political contributions. It is estimated that over 30,900,000 individuals own shares of stock in American corporations. 1975 World Almanac 94. But, out of the nation's total workforce of 84,000,000 workers, only 18,000,000 of them (or about 21%) are members of labor unions including AFL–CIO, independent, CNTU, and CLC unions. 1975 World Almanac 108. Had corporations been restricted to soliciting only their stockholders, they could have solicited almost twice as many individuals as labor unions. Under the majority's ruling, however, corporations now have the potential of soliciting almost the entire workforce of the nation. Congress certainly did not intend to create such a gross disparity in the solicitation power of corporations and unions, by enacting the segregated fund exception to § 610, as the majority of the Commission now permits in its interpretation of the statute.

5. Finally, the majority ruling is inconsistent with scholarly writings dealing specifically with the solicitation question. These writings demonstrate in clear terms that a reasonable interpretation of § 610 would restrict corporations to soliciting only their stockholders.

For instance, corporations have been advised in the Business Lawyer, a regular journal of the American Bar Association's Section of Corporation, Banking and Business Law, to direct solicitations of partisan political money to their stockholders. R. Garrett, "Corporate Contributions for Political Purposes," 14 Bus. Law. 365 (1959). Mr. Garrett closely examined § 610 and cases construing the statute including United States v. CIO, 335 U.S. 106 (1948) and United States v. UAW, 352 U.S. 567 (1957). On the basis of these and other Federal court decisions and labor union practices, particularly in operating COPE, Mr. Garrett reached the following conclusions:

Since Section 610 in terms applies equally to labor organizations and to corporations, certain conclusions relative to corporations under that section may be derived from the labor cases and the known practices of the unions:

* * * * *

(3) Corporations may use corporate facilities for soliciting voluntary contributions from stockholders to a fund to be donated or used for political purposes. (Emphasis added). Garrett, supra, at 375–76.

Mr. Garrett explained further that:

Corporate management eager to do something, but unwilling to put its neck in the noose for the purpose of making some law at the risk of heroic sacrifice, might well be advised to use the corporate facilities to arouse stockholders to voluntary contributions and political awareness. The New York Stock Exchange has estimated that there are over 8½ million holders of stock in American corporations. They constitute a group who might be aroused to contribute and work for political purposes with possibly great effect[2] Where corporate soliciting of contributions from stockholders is bipartisan, as, for example, where stockholders are invited to contribute a very small percentage of a dividend to the party which they designate individually, there would seem to be little real danger of prosecution.(Emphasis added). Id. at 377.

Another writer, the General counsel of the United States Chamber of Commerce, reached similar conclusions. Speaking in the American Bar Association Journal, the General Counsel said, after a thorough and careful analysis of Section 610 and Federal court decisions, that:

As for the Federal Corrupt Practices Act, the corporation can play safe in its partisan political activity only if it limits its appeals, whether written or oral, so as to avoid the general public and communicate rather to its stockholders. On principle it seems a corporation should be allowed to appeal also to its employees, along with its stockholders, although there is no decision which settles this point. (Emphasis added). W. Barton, "Corporation in Politics: How Far Can They Go Under the Law," 50 ABA Journal 228, 231 (1964).

There have been no court decisions which have held that under § 610 corporations are authorized to solicit contributions from employees.

We see no warrant for the construction of § 610 adopted by the majority.

B. The establishment of SUN-EPA

We also dissent from the majority's ruling monies to establish a "trustee" plan contribution program for its employees.

1. As previously noted, the intent of the Hansen Amendment was to set forth in "clear and unequivical statutory language" the "limited circumstances" under which corporations could spend treasury money in connection with federal elections. Those "limited circumstances" included the establishment of segregated funds. They did not include any other types of political contributions or expenditures form general corporate funds. The majority ruling, permitting corporations to subsidize "trustee" plans with treasury funds, simply does violence to the plan language of § 610 which authorizes only three types of activities which are supportable with corporate or union treasury money.

2. The meanings of the terms "expenditure" and "in connection with a federal election," as used in § 610, are broad enough to embrace the "trustee" plan proposed by Sun Oil. Certainly, the expenditure of treasury funds for SUN-EPA is intended to be "in connection with a federal election" inasmuch as Sun Oil has admitted that as a result of these expenditures, its employees will have a facility through which they can make contributions to candidates for federal office. The Justice Department made a similar observation in its comments when it said that the general objective of the program is certainly 'political' in that it encourages employees to participate voluntarily in politics through personal contributions."

This conclusion is consistent with judicial interpretations of the terms "expenditure" and "in connection with." As noted by the D.C. Circuit United States Court of Appeals in Buckley v. Valeo, 519 F. 2d 821, 852–53 (D.C. Cir. Aug. 29, 1975):

An expenditure may obviously inure to the benefit of a candidate even though the expenditure was not directed by the candidate and the candidate was not in control of the expenditures or of the goods or services purchased.

Similarly, Mr. Justice Rutledge, concurring in United States v. CIO, supra, characterized the broad reach of the terms "expenditure" and "in connection with" as used in section 610. (Id. at 133):

The crucial words are "expenditure" and "in connection with." Literally they cover any expenditure whatever relating at any date to a pending election, and possibly to prospective elections or elections already held. The broad dictionary meaning of "expenditure" takes added color from its context with "contribution." The legislative history is clear that it was added by the 1947 amendment expressly to cover situations not previously included within the legislative interpretation of "contribution." The coloration added is therefore not restrictive, it is expansive. * * * (Emphasis added).

Mr. Justice Frankfurter applied these same principles, regarding the breadth of the term expenditures," in upholding an indictment prosecuted under section 610. See, United States v. UAW, supra, at 585.

It matters not that Sun Oil will exercise no control over the operations of SUN-EPA or the activities of employees participating in the program. The law prohibits expenditures in connection with Federal elections—it does not go behind those expenditures to determine whether they will be made with a benevolent or patriotic intent. By facilitating employee contributions, through its subsidization of SUN-EPA, Sun Oil is necessarily using treasury funds in connection with Federal elections.

3. The majority concluded that expenditures of SUN-EPA were not prohibited by § 610 because they would not represent "any direct or indirect payment by Sun Oil to any candidate, campaign committee, or political party or organization." (Emphasis added). This conclusion apparently relies on the definition of the terms "contribution" and "expenditure" added to § 610 by the 1971 Amendment. But, that definition says that these terms "shall include" certain transactions. Since this is not language of limitation, it is clear that the majority's interpretation of these terms is too narrow. Mr. Justice Rutledge's broad interpretation of these terms in the CIO case has still survived the 1971 Amendment and is controlling. Accordingly, the majority should have restricted its focus to the broader concept of an expenditure "in connection with a federal election" which would have made expenditures for SUN-EPA unlawful. The Justice Department recently prosecuted a § 610 case against a labor union official where it expressed its views on the meaning of "contribution" and "expenditure" prior to the 1971 Amendment. In United States v. Boyle, 482 F. 2d 755 (D.C. Cir.), cert. denied —— U.S. ——, 94 S. Ct. 593 (1973), the Justice Department advised the trial court that:

It is important to note that Section 610 itself does not speak in terms of contributions to candidates for office but rather in terms of "in connection with any election." (Emphasis added).

Trial Brief for Department of Justice at 11, United States v. Boyle, No. 1741–71 (D. D.C.)

The trial court sustained this view of the law in rejecting the defendant's motion to dismiss the indictment on the grounds that Section 610 was unconstitutional or vague. United States v. Boyle, 338 F. Supp. 1028, 1031–32 (D. D.C., 1972). This case shows that what makes an expenditure of treasury funds unlawful is simply the fact that it is "in connection with" an election.

4. The majority's narrow interpretation of § 610, to permit expenditures for SUN-EPA, has the effect of overruling by implication practically all of the advisory opinions which have dealt with indirect contributions or expenditures. Three opinions which immediately come to mind are (1) AO 1975–4, 40 Fed. Reg. 29793) (July 15, 1975), in which the Commission held that the guarantee of a loan made to the Democratic National Committee, to the extent that the loan was not repaid, was a contribution even though the loan itself was not; (2) AO 1975–14, 40 Fed. Reg. 34084 (Aug. 13, 1975), in which the Commission held that the donation by a corporation of a computer, to analyze the results of a non-partisan public issue opinion poll issued by a Congressman, was a violation of Section 610; and (3) AO 1975–27, 40 Fed. Reg. 51351 (Nov. 4, 1975), in which the Commission held that expenses incurred by a candidate for legal and accounting fees for the purpose of complying with the election laws were expenditures.

For these reasons, we see no merit in the majority view that expenditures for SUN-EPA are lawful under § 610.

Sun Oil has not asked and the Commission has not ruled whether the two plans are permissible under § 611, assuming that Sun Oil is a government contractor. It should be noted, however, that the language of § 611 is even broader than that of § 610. It provides severe criminal penalties for any government contractor-who "directly or indirectly makes any contribution of money or other thing of value * * * to any person for any political purpose or use." And while § 611 contains a special proviso, added by the 1974 Act, validating a "separate segregated funds" which meets the requirements of § 610, it contains no exception in favor of a trustee plan, such as SUN-EPA.

THOMAS E. HARRIS,
Commissioner for the Federal Election Commission.
ROBERT O. TIERNAN,
Commissioner for the Federal Election Commission.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, while the Senate is considering S. 3065, the House of Representatives is considering similar legislation. On Thursday, March 11, the Committee on House Administration reported out H.R. 12406. There are many similarities between S. 3065 and H.R. 12406, and as it is necessary for the two Houses of Congress to come to eventual agreement on the form of this important legislation, I have asked that a copy of H.R. 12406 be made available to each of my colleagues for their information as we consider S. 3065. Although the two bills are virtually identical in structure and contain many provisions which are almost identical in substance as well, there are substantive differences in various sections of the bill which would be helpful for us to be aware of. Accordingly, I ask unanimous consent that a summary of the key differences between S. 3065 and H.R. 12406 be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the summary was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SUMMARY OF THE KEY DIFFERENCES BETWEEN S. 3065 AND H.R. 12406

Whereas both bills would reconstitute the Federal Election Commission in an identical manner, H.R. 12406 would have the terms of one member of the Commission expire each year, providing that the terms of a member representing one political party shall expire on alternate years. S. 3065, on the other hand, provides that the terms of two members not affiliated with the same party expire every two years so that members are not reappointed in an election year.

H.R. 12406 requires, as does S. 3065, the affirmative vote of four members of the Commission in order to establish guidelines, initiate civil actions, render advisory opinions, make regulations, conduct investigations, or report apparent violations of law. However, S. 3065 contains an additional provision that no less than two of the four members voting in favor of such actions shall be affiliated with the same political party.

H.R. 12406 provides that the terms of all the present Commissioners, expire when all the new Commissioners are appointed and qualified, whereas in S. 3065, at pp. 5 and 6 of the bill, the existing Commissioners' terms would expire when a majority of the new Commissioners are appointed and qualified. The S. 3065 provision is intended to permit the new Commission to begin operations at an earlier date, in the event a delay occurs in the appointment or qualification of one or two Commissioners.

H.R. 12406 has an identical provision to S. 3065 prohibiting Commissioners from engaging in any outside business or professional activity while holding office. However, under Section 101(c)(1) on page 4 of S. 3065 this prohibition would not become effective until two years after the date the bill becomes law.

S. 3065, at Sections 101(d) and 101(g) contains certain transfer and continuity provisions which are not in H.R. 12406. These are summarized on pages 3 and 4 of the Committee's report on S. 3065.

Both bills contain certain changes, many of which are similar, in the definitional sections of the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971 and are located at pages 8–11 of S. 3065 and 6–10 of H.R. 12406.

Subsections (a) and (b) of Section 103 of S. 3065 contain provisions to reduce the accounting and recordkeeping burdens for political committees by requiring that records be kept only on contributions in excess of $100 instead of in excess of $10. S. 3065 also has a provision which states that a contributor's occupation does not have to include the name of the employer, firm, business associate, customers or clients for recordkeeping or reporting purposes. These are set forth at pages 11, 12, and 13 of S. 3065. H.R. 12406 does not contain any provisions with respect to this subject matter.

Section 104(a) of S. 3065, at page 12 of the bill, provides that in a non-election year, a candidate and his authorized committees must file quarterly reports only for quarters in which more than $5,000 in contributions have been received, or more than $5,000 in expenditures have been made. Section 104(a) of H.R. 12406 has a similar provision but would exempt quarterly reporting in non-election years wherein a candidate and his authorized committees had received contributions or made expenditures in any calendar quarter totalling in excess of $10,000.

Section 106 of H.R. 12406 contains a provision amending 2 USC 437b(a)(1) to provide that the principal campaign committee of a candidate or any other authorized political committee which receives or makes contributions on a candidate's behalf shall maintain one or more checking accounts, at the discretion of any such committee, at a depository designated by the candidate. Existing law merely requires the keeping of "a checking account." S. 3065 does not contain a provision with respect to this subject.

H.R. 12406 revises the advisory opinion provisions of 2 USC 437(f) to provide that all advisory opinions, the transaction or activity with respect to which is not subject to an existing rule or regulation, shall be transmitted to the Congress as a proposed rule or regulation. S. 3065, however, would require only those advisory opinions which set forth a rule of general applicability to be transmitted to the Congress as a proposed rule or regulation.

H.R. 12406, at Section 108(d) has the effect of requiring the Commission to transmit all its outstanding advisory opinions, which are not the subject of an existing rule or regulation, to the Congress for review. Section 107 of S. 3065 (pp. 17–19 of the bill) and Section 108 of H.R. 12406 (pp. 15–17 of the bill) contain the respective provisions which would amend the advisory opinion provisions of existing law.

The enforcement provisions of the two bills provide for similar conciliation and civil enforcement procedures. H.R. 12406, however, does provide for a civil penalty not exceeding the greater of $5,000 or an amount equal to the amount of any contribution or expenditure involved in a violation where such violation is not a knowing and willful one. E. 3065 does not have such a provision. The House bill also provides a civil penalty, where a violation is knowing and willful, to be the greater of $10,000 or an amount equal to 200 per cent of the amount of any contribution or expenditure involved in such violation, whereas S. 3065 would provide a civil penalty for a knowing and willful violation of the greater of $10,000 or an amount equal to 300 per cent of the amount of any contribution or expenditure involved in the violation.

H.R. 12406 requires the Commission to make every endeavor, for a period of not less than 30 days, to correct or prevent a violation by informal methods of conciliation, except under certain specified circumstances just prior to an election which are set forth on page 20 of that bill. The Senate bill, S. 3065, would not bind the Commission to 30 days of conciliation efforts, so that it would have some discretion to take immediate action to invoke the civil relief provisions of the law in the event that it determined that there was probable cause to believe that a violation had occurred, or was about to occur, of such magnitude and nature that the interests of the public would compel immediate resort to the courts for judicial relief. As stated on page 8 of the Committee report on S. 3065, "If such a situation does not occur, the Commission is expected to pursue with diligence, for a reasonable period of time, an attempt to correct or prevent all violations by informal methods, except as otherwise provided in the bill."

There are two additional provisions in the enforcement portion of H.R. 12406 which are not contained in S. 3065. The first is on page 18 of that bill, and states as follows:

"Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act, the Commission shall not have the authority to inquire into or investigate the utilization or activities of any staff employee of any person holding Federal office without first consulting with such person holding Federal office. An affidavit given by the person holding Federal office that such staff employee is performing his regularly assigned duties shall be a complete bar to any further inquiry or investigation of the matter involved."

The second provision in the enforcement portion of H.R. 12406, not contained in S. 3065, is on page 26 of that bill, and provides that any member of the Commission, any employee of the Commission or any other person who makes public any notification or investigation under new Section 313(a)(2), without the written consent of the person receiving such notification or the person with respect to whom the investigation is made, shall be fined not more than $2,000. If it is a knowing and willful violation, the fine would be $5,000.

The other differences in the enforcement provisions of the two bills can be found in Section 108, pages 19–27 of S. 3065, and Section 109, pages 18–26 of H.R. 12406.

Section 110(a)(2) of H.R. 12406 requires the Commission to give priority to auditing and field investigating the verification for, and the receipt and use of, any payments received by a candidate under the public financing provisions of the Internal Revenue Code. S. 3065 does not contain such a provision.

Section 110(b) of H.R. 12406 contains a provision which would permit the Congress to disapprove a part of a regulation submitted by the Commission, rather than have to take disapproval action with existing law. S. 3065 does not contain such a provision.

Section 110(c) of H.R. 12406 contains a provision at pp. 27–28 of the bill not in S. 3065, that in any proceeding, including any civil or criminal enforcement proceeding against any person charged with a violation of the Act or the public financing provisions of the Internal Revenue Code, no rule, regulation, guideline, advisory opinion, opinion of counsel, or any other pronouncement by the Commission or by any of its members, officers or employees, (other than any rule or regulation of the Commission which has become effective) shall be used against any person, either as having the force of law, as creating any presumption of violation or criminal intent, or as admissable in evidence against such person or in any manner whatsoever.

S. 3065 would repeal Section 456 of Title 2, United States Code, which gives the Commission power to disqualify candidates in future elections. Section 111 of H.R. 12406 would retain this section and provide 30 days prior to the Commission's being able to exercise its disqualification powers.

Section 112 of H.R. 12406 contains a provision which would repeal existing Section 2 USC 43 requiring copies of all reports to be filed with appropriate state officers, S. 3065 does not contain such a provision.

With respect to the provisions limiting contributions and expenditures, the essential difference between the two bills would be that H.R. 12406 would limit contributions by persons to political committees in any calender year to an aggregate of $1,000. This is not in S. 3065, and, under present law, for example, an individual could make up to a $25,000 contribution in a calendar year to a political committee which is not authorized to receive funds on behalf of a particular candidate or where the funds are not earmarked for a particular candidate—assuming that the individual has not made any other contributions in that year.

S. 3065 has a provision limiting contributions one political committee can make to another political committee, (other than to a political committee authorized to receive funds on behalf of a particular candidate) to an aggregate of $25,000 in a calendar year. Under present law, such contributions are unlimited. H.R. 12406 would limit that amount to $5,000 in a calendar year. Both bills contain similar, though not identical language directed at curtailing the vertical proliferation of contributions by political committees. See pages 29–31 of H.R. 12406 and pages 27–29 of S. 3065 for a comparison of those provisions.

S. 3065 and H.R. 12406 both propose a revision of existing Section 610 of Title 18 related to limitations on contributions and expenditures by corporations and labor organizations. The changes proposed by both bills are similar with the following key exceptions. First, S. 3065 contains language at page 30 of that bill, which would treat public utility holding companies the same as other corporations for purposes of the limitations on contributions and expenditures set forth in the section. Second, H.R. 12406 contains language at page 40 of that bill which provides that an incorporated trade association or a separate segregated fund established by an incorporated trade association would be permitted to solicit contributions from the stockholders and executive officers of the member corporations of such trade association and the families of such stockholders and executive officers. This could be done to the extent that any such solicitation of such stockholders and executive officers and their families had been separately and specifically approved by the member corporation involved, and such member corporation had not approved any such solicitation by more than one such trade association in any calendar year. Third, S. 3065 contains a definition of stockholder not in H.R. 12406.

H.R. 12406 at page 44 of the bill, raises the limitation on contributions of currency from $100, which is in existing law and in S. 3065, to $250. It also sets a specific criminal penalty, not in S. 3065, for any person who knowingly and willfully violates the $250 prohibition.

H.R. 12406 restates existing Section 6[illegible] related to honorariums, whereas S. 3065 would increase the amount of individual honorariums from $1,000 to $2,000, and the aggregate calendar year amount which may be received as an honorarium from $15,000 to $24,000.

H.R. 12406 at page 45 of that bill, contains criminal penalties which would be applicable for any person who knowingly and willfully commits a violation of the Act involving the making, receiving, or reporting of any contribution or expenditure having a value in an aggregate of $5,000 or more during a calendar year, whereas S. 3065 would provide for criminal penalties where such aggregate amount is $1,000 or more. Also, with respect to the imposition of criminal penalties, S. 3065, at page 44 of the bill, provides that a conciliation agreement under certain circumstances would be a complete defense to criminal prosecution. H.R. 12406 does not have such a provision.

Section 115 of H.R. 12406, at page 47 of that bill, contains a provision providing for the termination of the authority of the Commission on March 31, 1977, if either House of the Congress, by appropriate action determines that such determination shall take effect. This provision requires the appropriate committee of each House of the Congress, commencing January 3, 1977, to conduct a review of the elections of candidates for Federal office conducted in 1976, the operation of the public financing provisions of the Internal Revenue Code with respect to such elections, and the activities of the Commission, and for these committees to report to their respective Houses not later than March 1, 1977, with a recommendation as to whether the authority of the Commission shall be terminated on March 31, 1977.

Although there are other less substantive differences between the two bills, as well as some drafting differences, the final major difference is the provision in H.R. 12406 which S. 3065 does not have, providing that an individual who has ceased actively to seek election to the office of President or Vice President, to cease receiving public funds and return those funds received for that candidate which are not used to defray qualified campaign expenses. These provisions relating to both matching funds and direct grant payments are set forth at pages 55–57 of H.R. 12406.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. HATFIELD. In the unanimous-consent agreement that was offered by the distinguished assistant majority leader, Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD, a short time ago, and which was agreed to, I believe no time agreement was involved. Is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There was no provision for time. However, the vote will take place, under the unanimous-consent agreement, at 3 o'clock.

Mr. HATFIELD. How is the time to be controlled?

Mr. ALLEN. There is no control of time. The Senator may make a request as to control of time.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the time be equally allocated between the chairman of the Committee on Rules and Administration and the designated minority Member on this side of the aisle.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr HATFIELD. Mr. President, in order to define that unanimous-consent agreement further, I ask unanimous consent that that time begin following my opening remarks, so as to correlate to the opening remarks period of the Senator from Nevada.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr HATFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the following staff members of the Committee on Rules and Administration be granted the privilege of the floor during the consideration of and rollcall votes on the Federal Election Commission measure: James Schoener, Andrew Gleason, Larry Smith, Barbara Conroy, and Karleen Millnick.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, the Senate's consideration of S. 3065, in the middle of an election year, is most untimely. It is untimely because many candidates for Federal office have already established their respective campaign committees under the guidelines of the 1974 Election Act. While it was the Supreme Court which thrust this uncertainty upon us, the real uncertainty had already been cast in 1974 when the Congress passed the Federal Election Campaign Act Amendments of 1974. The responsibility for the confusion over the law which we have here today must lie directly with the Congress. Let me remind my colleagues that we will also be bearing the responsibility for the changes we make in the election laws this year.

Mr. President, we are debating this bill today because of the past desire of the Congress, and particularly the House of Representatives, to interfere and usurp the duties and functions of the President of the United States by appointing four members to the Federal Election Commission. The Constitution of the United States clearly provides in article II, section 2, that the President "shall nominate and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States, whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law."

Mr. President, I find nothing in the Constitution which gives the Congress the power to nominate and appoint offices of the Federal Government. I find nothing in the Constitution which gives the House of Representatives the authority to provide "advice and consent" on the confirmation of Presidential appointments.

Mr. President, we must not ignore the Constitution in 1976 as we did in 1974. If we do, we will soon find ourselves back in this Chamber debating our national election laws.

I am concerned, Mr. President, that the Congress may once again be careless in the review and consideration of our election laws. I am fearful that we will load this bill up with so many items, resulting in major changes in the current law, that no one will know what types of reforms we have made, if any at all. Unless we are careful, we may be adding to the confusion which now exists, instead of clarifying matters, as we are supposed to do. Unless we are careful, we may find ourselves with another Supreme Court decision mandating more changes in our election laws, just as the Court has seen fit to do in this case.

If Congress is truly interested in reforming our election laws, then let us make sure that such reform is done in an atmosphere of calm, and without the time pressures we currently have. If Congress is really serious about the need to reform our election laws, then let us wait until after the 1976 elections to institute such changes. To make any substantial changes now, other than those suggested by the President and the Supreme Court, would only muddy up the electoral process, instead of clarifying the political waters.

I believe many of us can remember the last time we debated an election bill in 1974. There were so many amendments, so many changes, that no one really knew what we had in the end product. Our distinguished senior Senator from Rhode Island (Mr. PASTORE) summed up the situation in 1974 very well when he said on the Senate floor in October of 1975:

Mr. President, maybe this group would like to hear from someone who is not a candidate.

I quite agree. The law is absurd. We created a monster. It is our own fault. I said in the beginning that all we needed was to set a limit on spending; to have a full disclosure as to where one gets the money and how we spends the money. That would have been a two-page law that everybody would have understood.

We have a law now that even the people who wrote it do not understand.

I remember, I went to that conference and we were there for days and days and days and nobody understood what was in that bill. But at that we were running like scared rats for some reason. I do not know why. We were runing like scared rats. We thought the stronger we make it, the tougher we make it, the more people would believe us. I do not think they believe us any more today than they did before we passed the law.

That is what we have.

I think if we want to resolve this problem, what we ought to do is change the law, simplify the law. Just say how much an individual can spend, have him disclose where he gets the money, and have him itemize every nickel that he spends, Have him do it 60 days before the election so that the people know, and prohibit him from collecting any money after that. If we do that, we have solved this problem. Maybe I simplified it, but after all, simplicity in this body. I dare not say it.

Mr. President, the potential is here for us to do the very same thing we did in 1974. However, the situation could be even more disastrous, because we have so little time to accomplish the task the Supreme Court has said we must do—that being the reconstitution of the Federal Election Commission.

President Ford has suggested a very easy method by which we can accomplish this task. All we have to do is reconstitute the Commission as it is presently structured, calling for the President to nominate the commissioners with the advice and consent of the Senate. Then, after the 1976 elections, the new Congress can take a long hard look at our election laws and make the determination, based upon the experiences of the 1976 elections, which sections of the law need to be changed or reformed. The very law we are about to begin debating, the very law which is about to be substantially changed by some, has yet to be tested in an election. Why waste the Senate's time in rewriting this measure, when we will probably have to rewrite some sections of the amended law as a result of the 1976 elections? Why spend time changing our election laws to mollify certain interest groups, when the same could be done and should be done 10 months later?

Mr. President, if I may, I should like to make a few comments regarding S. 3065, the election law bill, as reported out of the Senate Rules Committee. While I differ with our distinguished chairman as to the contents of this bill, it needs to be made clear that we both share a common purpose—that purpose being the passage of a comprehensive and a fair election law measure. It should be noted that our chairman was extremely fair during the course of the markup sessions and permitted every member of the committee, no matter what his position may have been, to participate and discuss fully all aspects of the measure.

S. 3065, as reported out of the Committee on Rules, does trouble me. It troubles me because I feel it threatens the lifeline of the very Commission it purports to extend or to protect. If S. 3065 is adopted as written, the Congress in effect will be stripping the Federal Election Commission of its independence. How anyone can argue that the Commission will not be hamstrung, when in fact we are requiring it to issue regulations within 30 days of every advisory opinion which sets forth a rule of general applicability, is beyond comprehension.

Mr. President, if I may, I should like to read a portion of the proposed bill to my colleagues. Section 107(B)(1) reads as follows:

The Commission shall, no later than 30 days after rendering an advisory opinion with respect to a request received under subsection (A) which sets forth a rule of general applicability, prescribe rules or regulations relating to the transaction or activity involved if the Commission determines that such transaction or activity is not subject to any existing rule or regulation prescribed by the Commission.

It has taken the Senate over 40 days even to get to the point of considering this legislation in response to the Supreme Court decision of January 30. How can we expect another body to perform, when we fail in discharging our responsibilities in a matter as simple as reconstituting the Federal Election Commission?

Here we sit as Members of Congress, able to reject, totally out of hand, regulations promulgated by the Commission, when our challengers, the nonincumbents, have no way of rejecting undesirable regulations. I have been one of those most critical of the Federal Election Commission and its large bureaucratic staff. I believe some of its regulations have been very unrealistic and lack any basic understanding of the demands placed upon Federal officeholders. But, even though I have felt that the FEC has overstepped its boundaries on occasion, I am not in favor of tying the Commission's hands.

Mr. President, if I may, I would like to read another portion of S. 3065 to my colleagues. Title I, section 101, subsection "C" (c)(1) read as follows:

Members of the Commission shall not engage in any other business, vocation, or employment. Any individual who is engaging in any other business, vocation, or employment at the time such individual begins to serve as a member of the Commission shall terminate or liquidate such activity not later than one year after beginning to serve as such a member.

The question I have to ask of my colleagues is this: "Would we, as Members of Congress, accept or permit such a limitation on our outside activities?" Would we be willing to sell our family farms, our businesses, leave our law offices, or would we choose not to serve in the Congress? I believe for many the answer would be to leave the Senate. Are we asking the members of the Federal Election Commission to adhere to a code of ethics we are unable or unwilling to meet? I would suggest to my colleagues that we give serious thought to either removing this section from the bill or be prepared to vote on an amendment to include Members of Congress in this section.

Mr. President, I could go on as to the other inequities which can be found in this bill. I will not, however, discuss them at this time, because I am confident these inequities will be raised during the course of the debate.

Mr. President, I believe there is another course of action which can be taken by the Congress, and a responsible one at that.

Mr. President, I suggest to my colleagues that we vote in favor of the simple extension of the Federal Election Commission, as outlined in Senator GRIFFIN's bill. To do otherwise this late into the election year is purely irresponsible legislating. As one Senator, I want no part in politicizing the Commission. As one Senator, I want no part in stripping the FEC of its power and its independence. I want no part in giving one interest group an unfair advantage over another interest group. I want no part in an effort to make this measure an incumbent's bill. S. 3065 would accomplish these things. I urge my colleagues to vote against it and vote in favor of the simple reconstitution of the Commission. However, if the Senate should adopt S. 3065 as reported out of the Committee on Rules, I would hope that the President of the United States will see fit to veto the measure. To do otherwise, to subject the Federal Election Commission to such restraints, would be a disservice to the American people.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quarum, and I ask unanimous consent that it be charged equally to both sides.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. The clerk will please call the roll.

The second assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Andrew Loewi from my staff be allowed the privileges of the floor during the consideration of this measure.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The request for the quorum call will be charged equally against both sides.

Mr. CLARK. That is correct.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. The clerk will please call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, on behalf of Mr. Cannon, I yield myself 1 minute. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that during the consideration of S. 3065, the Federal Election Campaign Act Amendments of 1976, Mr. Roy Greenway, and Jan Mueller of Senator CRANSTON'S staff be given the privileges of the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

RECESS UNTIL 2 P.M.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that, with the understanding that at 2 o'clock when the Senate would come back in following a recess, the time between the hour of 2 o'clock and 3 o'clock today be equally divided between Mr. HATFIELD and Mr. CANNON, and that the Senate stand in recess until the hour of 2 p.m. today.

There being no objection, the Senate at 1 p.m., recessed until 2 p.m.; whereupon the Senate reassembled when called to order by the Presiding Officer (Mr. STAFFORD).

FEDERAL ELECTION CAMPAIGN ACT AMENDMENTS OF 1976

The Senate continued with the consideration of the bill (S. 3065) to amend the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971 to provide for its administration by a Federal Election Commission appointed in accordance with the requirements of the Constitution, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is the understanding of the Chair that the pending amendment is the Griffin amendment to S. 3065. Who yields time?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, I yield myself 10 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, for all the reasons set forth in the Washington Post editorial of this morning entitled "Changing the Campaign Law," the substitute which I have offered should be adopted by the Senate. There are other reasons in addition to those set forth in the Washington Post editorial. I ask unanimous consent that this editorial and another one that appeared in today's Washington Star be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post, Mar. 16, 1976]

CHANGING THE CAMPAIGN LAW

When we last looked in on the question of amending the campaign laws, Rep. Wayne L. Hays (D-Ohio) and some allies were busy cementing a deal. Under this plan, the Federal Elections Commission would be reconstituted as mandated by the Supreme Court, but the commission's independence would be limited—and Congress would also take the opportunity to write new rules for political action committees, giving business groups less money-raising range and labor groups a little more.

Well, a familiar thing happened on the way to the floor. Members of both the House Administration Committee and the Senate Rules Committee had some further thoughts, primarily on ways to make compliance with the law less of a bother and investigations less of a threat. As a result, the bills now before the Senate and awaiting House debate are bulky, odd-shaped packages that contain some useful provisions, some undesirable ones and some that are downright mischievous.

To start with, many legislators are worried that the FEC and its staff could become too free-wheeling or too strict, so that candidates might face criminal prosecution for minor mistakes, or be hurt by endless investigation of a frivolous or malicious complaint. Thus the pending bills would remove criminal sanctions for minor violations, emphasize conciliation and civil penalties, and require complaints to be signed and sworn. Moreover, any official action—an investigation, rule-making or even the design of a form—would have to be approved by 4 of the 6 commissioners. These changes are generally constructive. However, it is too restrictive to require, as the Senate bill does, that two commissioners from each party must agree to anything.

The bills also invite trouble by cloaking crucial parts of the regulatory process in secrecy. This would be done by imposing criminal penalties on any FEC official who discloses any information about any pending case without the consent of the candidate involved. Meanwhile the candidate would be free to say anything he likes about the case or the FEC. Surely some less heavy-handed and more even-handed way can be found to enforce discipline and inspire some sense of responsibility on the part of FEC officials.

From there, the bills go rapidly downhill. Congressional influence over the commission would be intensified. Public disclosure of campaign finances in candidates' home states would be curtailed. Under the Senate bill, contributors would no longer have to identify their business affiliations, thus making it harder to find out who has given how much to whom. The House measure, meanwhile, would raise the ceiling on cash contributions from $100 to $250; that is a blatant invitation to abuse. Finally, the House committee, which is quite shameless where the interests of incumbents are concerned, even adopted an amendment that would block the FEC from looking into the activities of any Congressman's staff—as long as the legislator says that his aides are doing official business.

Such provisions are so cynical that it is hard to believe they may survive. Yet most members of Congress seem preoccupied with other aspects of the bills. The most intricate bickering has been over what political committees, especially business groups, may and may not do. Some Republicans are suggesting, for instance, that President Ford may veto the bill if it bars corporate political action groups from soliciting funds from middle-level nonunion employees as well as stockholders and executives. Such intense interest in the flow of money may be inevitable in an election year. In the current political climate, however, maneuvers that obviously favor any special-interest group could cost a candidate a large amount of general public regard.

It is also untimely, in our view, for the self-styled champions of "campaign reform" to make a major push for public financing of congressional campaigns. Regardless of the appeal of such a plan, consideration of it ought to be deferred until the impact of contribution limits and public funding of presidential campaigns can be evaluated properly next year. For now, those legislators who do want serious, effective regulation of campaigns have quite enough to do in terms of cleaning up the measures that the two committees have devised.

[From the Washington Star, Mar. 16, 1976]

WHAT IS MR. HAYS UP TO?

It's hard to tell whether Rep. Wayne Hays is working for or against legislation to keep the Federal Election Commission in business.

You will recall that Mr. Hays had wanted to kill the commission but was turned around by George Meany of the AFL-CIO and House leaders who wanted the commission kept alive.

Mr. Hays's House Administration Committee has completed work on legislation ostensibly aimed at saving the Election Commission from legal infirmities found by the Supreme Court. But while fixing the flaws, the Administration Committee has added several appendages, at least one of which is highly controversial and might result in a presidential veto.

The Administration Committee has decreed that corporations that have organized political action committees to collect funds for candidates cannot solicit donations from employes; they could solicit only stockholders and management officials. No similar restriction was put on political action committees of labor organizations.

It is a blatant attempt by Mr. Hays & Co. to give labor an upper hand over management in raising political funds and electing candidates. A Republican member of the Administration Committee argued, to no avail, that limiting the right of solicitation to a certain class of individuals may be unconstitutional.

The White House has indicated that President Ford may veto the bill if it contains the restrictive provision when it reaches his desk. Mr. Hays, with his usual swagger, threatened to block requested appropriations for the U.S. Information Service unless Mr. Ford signs the bill—which smacks of political blackmail.

But wait. There may be more to all this than meets the eye. Perhaps the foxy Mr. Hays is trying to pull a fast one on his colleagues who want to keep the Election Commission in business. Could he be deliberately courting a presidential veto, hoping that the Election Commission will die of it?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, this clearly is not the appropriate time to pass the bill that has been reported from the Committee on Rules and Administration. Under the circumstances existing at this time it would not be the right thing to do.

The proposal the Senator from Tennessee and I have offered as a substitute would simply, cleanly, and clearly reestablish the Federal Election Commission in a constitutional way and allow it to continue its functions.

The kind of proposal we have offered, and which will be voted on at 3 o'clock, can become law. There is no question but that the President would sign it. Everyone knows there is serious doubt as to whether the President would sign the kind of bill that has been reported from the Committee on Rules and Administration and is before the Senate or the kind of bill that has been reported in the House.

It is imperative that the Federal Election Commission be allowed to continue in existence, and that we meet our responsibilities to continue its life before the deadline set by the Supreme Court.

It is imperative and necessary so that those candidates in the Presidential election, not President Ford, incidentally, but the other candidates, will receive the funds to which they are entitled under the existing law.

It would put the President in a very awkward situation, of course, to place on his desk a monstrosity of this nature and, in effect, require him to veto it.

I can hear the charges now: "Well, he does not want the other candidates to receive Federal funds." I want to reject that kind of charge right now, and label it for what it is, because this Senate does have another choice. It has a responsible choice, and that is to pass a simple bill extending the life of the Federal Election Commission as separate legislation, and then deal later with these other so-called reforms, which are not reforms at all but which, in effect, seriously weaken the powers of the Federal Election Commission. The Senate can let those issues be submitted to the President on their own merits and in a separate bill.

This is no time to be tampering with the rest of the law. This is not the time to change the rules in the middle of the game, and we are in the middle of an election contest. The candidates have announced and are running on the basis of certain rules, and now the Committee on Rules and Administration comes along and wants to make major changes in those rules.

I do not argue that the present rules are perfect or that the present rules do not need changing, but I do say that this is not the time to change them. The time for changing the rules will be next year, after the election and after we have had the experience of this election. Then Congress, in a deliberative way and in an atmosphere free from the pressures of the election, should address itself again to the matter of the election financing laws and how to improve them. Without a doubt, there are many ways in which the existing laws can be improved.

I think one of the most interesting questions of the day is, why do we not hear the voice of John Gardner and Common Cause saying something about the bill that is before us, which cripples and weakens the independence of the Federal Election Commission? Why are we not hearing the voice of John Gardner and Common Cause in support of what the President is trying to do, and which is embodied in the substitute that is at the desk. The substitute extends the life of the Federal Election Commission, with all its authority and powers undiminished, and reestablishes it in a way that will be constitutional under the Supreme Court decision?

Perhaps we will hear from John Gardner and Common Cause and, perhaps, we will know they do support this approach. But so far they have been strangely silent.

I am not surprised, of course, that the heads of the big labor organizations are in favor of this bill. It is pretty clear what this bill seeks to do in terms of giving them even more power than they have now. But I am disappointed in the silence of some others who claim to be, and ought to be, nonpartisan and who claim to be, and ought to be, working for the public interest and not for special interests.

So, Mr. President, I hope at 3 o'clock the Senate will have the wisdom to put this subject in a posture that will, I think, be applauded by the American people.

I believe that most Americans believe that a simple extension of the Federal Election Commission would be the right thing to do at this time. We will see where the votes are, where the lines are drawn, and we will proceed from there.

I yield to the Senator——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee such time as he may require, the distinguished cosponsor of the pending amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee is recognized.

Mr. BROCK. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Michigan.

I am privileged to coauthor this amendment with him, and I appreciate his leadership in the matter.

I hope in the next 50 minutes we will keep our eyes focused on the basic issue. The issue is the continuation of an independent election commission to insure that the elections in the United States are conducted without fraud, bias or some governmental impediment to equity to all parties concerned.

We have operated under a different law for these 200 years. In the last 50 years we operated under the Corrupt Practices Act, which has worked to the advantage of the incumbent in a fairly obvious fashion since no person has been indicted under this Act, to the best of my knowledge, where the Clerk of the Senate and the Clerk of the House were hired by the incumbents and then were in charge of enforcing the campaign statutes.

That is a nice cozy arrangement and it meant that incumbents simply did not have to abide by the same rules as everyone else. So when we got into a debate about reform, I think almost everybody in this body, Democrat, Republican, so-called liberals, so-called conservatives—if those words mean anything, and I do not know whether they do or not any more—everybody seemed to agree that the essential ingredient of a reform would be an independent commission to oversee the electoral process in these United States to insure equity for the American people in the process of acquiring representation.

The Supreme Court found our efforts wanting in certain areas and declared certain parts of that reform effort unconstitutional—and I think they probably were right.

They left us with a problem, what do we do now to see that the elections are run in an unbiased fashion.

The challenger and incumbent alike have equal protection under the law so that the American people may have equal protection under the law, and they left us with the responsibility of recreating the independent commission or not.

The bill that has been brought to us by the Rules Committee is a charade. It is not an independent election commission. The bill that is being proposed in the House is a charade. It is not an independent election commission.

Every dot and title of every decision they make would be resubmitted to the Congress so we know whether or not it would help our candidacy, incumbent or not, and the challengers have no rights whatsoever.

The bill is an effort to enlarge the rights of certain vested interests in the population and to diminish the rights of others.

Ultimately, the diminishment would apply to most people in this country.

So the Senator from Michigan and I offer a substitute which says with as much clarity and as much simplicity as we are capable of commanding, "Let's extend the existence of this commission as it was originally intended in an independent status, let's do it simply and straightforwardly, let's do it honestly, let's don't try to con anybody, let's don't build anybody's castle and let's don't try to tear anybody's castle down, let's simply extend the commission so that we can have an independent body to oversee the elections of these United States is a fair and unbiased fashion and nothing else."

It is straightforward. It avoids any complex, new problem. It assumes no additional constitutional question. As a matter of fact, it allows none because the court has already acted on the other parts of the bill and asked us to act on this section. It does not attempt to judge the merits of the arguments which can be taken up on other areas, such as the rights of labor to solicit nonunion members, the rights of management to solicit union members.

That is not the question before us. The question is not whether we are going to have an election supervisor, but an independent body under no one's control. That is the issue. Are we gong to have a strong, independent election commission, or are we not?

Mr. CANNON. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. BROCK. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. I do not quite follow the Senator when he says the Commission would not be an independent election commission under the act that is proposed. Will he spell out precisely what he is talking about?

It seems to me we made the commission if anything, more independent. We even require with respect to decision, that it takes at least two of the same political party to constitute a majority in making their decision.

I do not know how more independent he can have it.

Mr. BROCK. The Senator knows as well as I do that will tie them up in courts. The Senator also knows, when we say, in effect, they cannot issue an opinion on a specific case and create, in effect, case law without turning it into a regulation in a stated period of time, that that will inhibit the decision process.

The Senator knows full well if they hand down a regulation, which they are then required to do, and that has to come back to Congress for approval, that they are independent to the extent we do not tell them different, that is just not independent as I determine it.

Mr. CANNON. The situation is exactly the same now. If they initiate a proposed regulation, it comes up here to Congress, and Congress can overrule or approve it and let it go by.

That is exactly the same situation in the new proposed bill.

The only thing we did is say that they should only issue the regulations when it was of general applicability, so it applies to everybody. We are really trying to simplify their process.

Mr. BROCK. Oh, no, no. I wish that were so.

Mr. CANNON. Let me suggest to the Senator that he read page 18 of the bill.

Mr. BROCK. It may be what the Senator intended, but it is what our bill does, not what the Senator's bill does. The Senator's bill has got this thing so bollixed up there is not any way in the world they can operate with independence.

How about the advisory opinions, can they do that? Not without a 30-day consideration.

Mr. CANNON. Advisory opinion?

Show me where it says that in the bill, read it to me, please.

Mr. BROCK. All right.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Take a look at page 18.

Mr. BROCK. By the way, will the chairman use some of his time?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

I will read it to the Senator, I will read it to him on my time:

"(B) (1) The Commission shall, no later than thirty days after rendering an advisory opinion with respect to a request received under subsection (a)

And listen to this:

which sets forth a rule of general applicability, prescribe rules or regulations relating to the transaction or activity involved if the Commission determines that such transaction or activity is not subject to any existing rule or regulation prescribed by the Commission.

Mr. GRIFFIN. The Senator has restricted them if we pass this because they do not have to do that now.

Mr. BROCK. This is a new requirement.

Mr. CANNON. What they have to do now, they can issue an advisory opinion.

Mr. BROCK. That is right.

Mr. CANNON. And we are saying here, if it has general applicability, then they have to send it up within a 30-day period to become a rule.

Mr. BROCK. There is nothing they can rule on that does not have general applicability except divorce proceedings.

Mr. CANNON. I have not heard them rule on any divorce proceedings, but they have surely ruled on a lot of things down there that do not have general applicability.

Mr. BROCK. That is how the courts build up case law, and that is how this Commission will, on which we will make our decision, and the Senator knows full well what he is doing. I do not have to tell him.

Mr. CANNON. Why does the Senator not just say flat out he just does not like this proposal?

Mr. BROCK. I do not like the proposal.

Mr. CANNON. And not try to say that it is because we have tried to restrict or limit the Federal Election Commission.

We have made them as nonpartisan and as nonpolitical as we can possibly do.

Mr. BROCK. The Senator has made them as noncompetent as he could.

They are not going to be independent. Everything they do will come back up to us so we can say, "Well, let's look at it and is it going to help the incumbent or not." And if it does we will approve it. If not, too late.

That has been happening already. The chairman knows this has been happening already, and this makes it worse.

Mr. CANNON. I was not aware of that. Give me an example of what has happened so far, one case to support the Senator's position as to what has happened already.

Mr. BROCK. I will have to get the House votes on rejection of the proposals the Election Commission has already made. The Senator knows as well as I do, they have not accepted those proposals.

Mr. CANNON. Who is "they"?

I thought the Senator was talking about us.

Mr. BROCK. We are Members of the same Congress.

Mr. CANNON. Give me one example in the Senate, please.

Mr. BROCK. We are all part of the same Congress. I say, either body can disapprove. That is an incumbent definition. There are reelection possibilities. The House Members are up this year. A third of the Senate is up this year. When we are required to vote on these decisions every time they come up, if the Senator thinks we can be so far above the battle to make every judgment on the basis of merits, fine. Then we do not need an elections commission.

I think we do. I think that is why we set it up. In the first place, that is what it is all about, and that is all the Griffin-Brock proposal does. It sets it up, puts it out there, lets it be independent, and lets it operate in the interest of the American people.

Mr. CANNON. Let us be honest about it. The Senator says that is all the Griffin-Brock proposal does. That is absolutely absurd. There is even a self-destruct provision in there.

Mr. BROCK. No, sir.

Mr. CANNON. The Senator is saying he does not want this to apply after December of this year, the end of December.

Mr. BROCK. There is no self-destruct as part of my proposal.

Mr. CANNON. Let me read it:

The provisions of titles 3 and 4 of the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971—

That is the one we are talking about—

of section 608 of title 18, United States Code—

That is what we are talking about—and of chapters 95 and 96 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954—

Those are the provisions for the financing of the Presidential election—shall not apply to any election as defined in section 301 of the Act (2 U.S.C. 431(a)), that occurred after December 31, 1976, except runoff elections relating to elections occurring before such date.

Mr. President, let us be honest about this. The Senator says he wants this great Federal Election Commission that is nonpartisan and nonpolitical, that he wants it to go on forever, and in his own proposal he has a self-destruction provision to destruct the end of this year.

All he is saying, Mr. President, is that he wants this to continue through this Presidential election so that his Presidential candidate can continue to get funds up through the election.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, who has the floor?

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, I reserve the remainder of my time. That was on my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan has the floor and has recognized the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Will the Senator from Tennessee let me have the floor?

Mr. President, the Senator from Nevada is correct in one respect. This substitute was drafted in two versions, one with the expiration provision and one without it. I am sorry that the version submitted does have the expiration provision in it.

I ask a parliamentary inquiry: Is it in order for me to modify my amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is advised it would take unanimous consent to modify the amendment.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I ask unanimous consent that section 3 of the substitute amendment as proposed be amended.

Mr. CANNON. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

Mr. GRIFFIN. This is very interesting because, of course, it will only necessitate the Senator from Michigan then offering another substitute after 3 o'clock and we will vote again on another substitute without this provision in it. If the Senator from Nevada wants to take that kind of an attitude, I suppose it is all right and it is his privilege.

Mr. BROCK. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, what the Senator from Tennessee was trying to do with the Senator from Michigan is to have at least one honest election this year. That is all. The fact that this amendment contains a section that—frankly, I thought we had stricken it, but, if we did not, fine. That does not change the fact that we still deserve an honest election in 1976. That does not change the merit of the argument. That should not change a single vote. Let us do these things one at a time. If we cannot have it for the next 5 years let us at least do it for 1 year. Let us have an independent commission that will oversee these elections in a totally unbiased, nonpartisan fashion to be sure that the American people have representation. For gosh sakes, just one time let us try and see if it will work. We have been 50 years with the other way and it sure has not protected the American people. Let us try it 1 year, just once, and see if we cannot get an independent election commission that will do a decent job.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, a further parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Would it be in order at 3 o'clock, under the agreement, that I could move to amend the substitute by striking section 3 thereof?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is advised the amendment would be in order at 3 o'clock and not debatable.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Then we could have a vote first on an amendment striking out the expiration provisions contained in section 3, which I am sure the Senator from Nevada will support, and then if that amendment did prevail we would proceed to vote on the remainder. I wonder if the Senator from Nevada might reconsider his objection.

Mr. BROCK. I might object now, Mr. President. I would like to think about it a little bit.

Mr. CANNON. Is the Senator referring now to the provision that the Senator from Tennessee said was not in the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. GRIFFIN. He has indicated he was mistaken. This was drafted in two ways. It was drafted with the expiration provision in one instance and drafted in another version without it. By mistake, the wrong one was submitted in terms of the explanation. We concede that. Now we want to be sure that the measure before the Senate is the one that we have described and the one that we are having our debate about.

Mr. CANNON. I think a number of Senators have already discussed this provision with me and I have told them what it contains, as I understand it. Sometimes Senators arrive in the chamber and vote right at the last minute. I think we ought to really vote on the proposal that is here.

Mr. GRIFFIN. First we will vote, then, on a motion to strike out the provision.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time

Mr. MANSFIELD addressed the Chair.

Mr. CANNON. I yield such time as the Senator requires.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana is recognized.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, even with the best of intentions and efforts to avoid ambiguities, they creep into legislation and often lead to misunderstanding and difficult administration of laws. To avoid conflicts and confusion, it would be in the interest of the Congress and the future Commission to know the intention of the Senate and ultimately the Congress with regard to the roles of ex officio members, that is, the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House.

S. 3065, the Federal Election Campaign Act Amendments of 1976, now before the Senate, is a legislative response to the Supreme Court decision in Buckley against Valeo that the Federal Election Commission may not constitutionally exercise all the powers which the Congress conferred in 1974 unless the voting members are appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate. The Court did not include the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk in this dictum.

As reported in the form of an original bill by the Senate Rules Committee, S. 3065 remedies this constitutional problem by providing for a Federal Election Commission composed of the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives, ex officio and without the right to vote, and six members appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate.

As I understand it, during the committee consideration of the bill, two rollcall votes were taken with regard to the presence and participation of the ex officio members. Approval was given to a motion that the composition of the Commission include the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives ex officio and without the right to vote. Rejected on an earlier vote was an amendment which would have provided for the Clerk and the Secretary to serve only in an advisory capacity and that they not be made ex officio members.

These votes indicate, apparently, that it was intended by the committee for the ex officio members to continue their present participation in the Commission. Nevertheless, it seems to me, it would be desirable for the chairman of the committee to comment on the presence of the ex officio members and to discuss the degree of participation expected of them.

It might be noted that the Secretary of the Senate, Frank Valeo, described a view of the Secretary's role in a letter to Senator PELL, part of which follows:

As an ex officio member of the Commission, it has been my intention that the office of the Secretary of the Senate represent the Senate as an institution of government with a vital interest in the successful functioning of the Federal electoral process. My office has endeavored therefore to exercise our best judgment in this connection on various subjects and issues before the Commission which would be reflective of the public interest as well as in accordance with the law. In that perspective, it seems to me that the Senate's ex officio member also serves as a focal point for exchange of information leading to a better understanding of problems of Senate candidates and campaigns as distinct from problems associated with House and presidential candidates and campaigns. Similarly, it is my hope that this office will be able to provide insight into the problems of candidates for the Senate as they relate to the Commission's decisions and rules. It also seems to me valid for the Senate's ex officio to make recommendations to the Senate Rules Committee with a view to adjustments to the law which may be revealed by experience to be desirable.

Other responsibilities prevent me from spending a great deal of time at the Commission. In order, however, to insure a full participation on the part of the Senate, I have, with the concurrence of the Majority and Minority Leaders, designated a Special Deputy of the Secretary of the Senate, (Ms. Harriet Robnett, J. D.) who is assigned exclusively to work in connection with the Commission.

At the inception of the present Commission, I have the view and other members concurred that ex officio members should have all rights and privileges and responsibilities of the other Commissioners, except the right to vote . . .

The need and value of an ex officio member is, of course, a matter primarily for determination by the Senate and the Congress. The Subcommittee may wish to discuss the role or define it differently than I have herein described. I have no wish to intrude on the decision of the Subcommittee in this regard but I do wish to suggest that the role of the ex officio be discussed at your hearings and be considered by the Subcommittee with reference to any proposal it may recommend to the full Committee.

Would the chairman of the committee agree generally with that description of the purpose and participation of the Secretary as an ex officio member?

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, may I say to the majority leader that I have just received this at the moment.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. I have had an opportunity to read through it, and I find only one problem area, and that is on page 3 as it was read, where it reads as follows:

At the inception of the present Commission, I have the view and other members concurred that ex officio members should have all rights and privileges and responsibilities of the other Commissioners, except the right to vote.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. I would not envision myself, that an ex officio member would engage in a discussion with relation to policy matters, or in the decisionmaking process, and then just simply not vote on it, or attempt to influence other Commission members. So right now I would not necessarily agree that that is correct, that an ex officio member should have all rights and privileges and responsibilities of the other members except the right to vote.

The rest of it I find no problem with, but I think this may go a little far, and might get into a question of whether the Supreme Court decision might really impinge on this area.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Well, what we had in mind was the fact that as an ex officio member, he would not just remain mute, that he could give advice and consent, that he could, in effect, represent the Senate's point of view; that he could have a voice but not a vote.

Mr. CANNON. I think certainly if the Commission calls on him for advice and consent he would be obligated to give them advice and consent, but when we say all the rights and privileges and responsibilities of other commissioners except the right to vote, I would find some problem with that. I think that perhaps is a little broader than an ex officio member is entitled to be.

Mr. MANSFIELD. If he had to wait for the commissioners to call on him, and something came up which affected the rights, duties, and privileges of the Senate, I would think that, as the Secretary of the Senate, representing all the Senate, he would have the right to express an opinion, so that the rights of the Senate could be safeguarded, as I would assume the rights of the House of Representatives would be in the person of the Clerk of the House.

Mr. CANNON. Yes. But I think to debate and discuss policy issues and decisionmaking problems that arise that did not relate, necessarily, directly to the Senate might go beyond what was intended.

Mr. MANSFIELD. It would be as related to the Senate.

Mr. CANNON. That, I think, would be proper.

Mr. MANSFIELD. That would be the intent of the words which the distinguished chairman of the committee has brought to the attention of the Senate, and that would be the matter which I would have in mind, because then we would have a protector down there which would look after our interests, and should be allowed to speak up in our behalf if events would warrant it.

Mr. CANNON. If that were conditioned upon matters related to the Senate, then I would agree.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Oh, yes, it would be with reference to the Senate.

Mr. BROCK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. MANSFIELD. Yes, indeed.

Mr. BROCK. Was there any consideration of minority representation in this addendum to the Commission in an ex officio capacity?

Mr. MANSFIELD. It was stated in the law that the clerk of the House and the Secretary of the Senate would be the only two ex officio members, that I could recall, and as long as both those people represent, really, not a party but the Senate and the House of Representatives in their official capacities, I would think both sides would be assured that they would be given full representation.

Mr. BROCK. I think we would under the current leadership of the Senate, may I say, but I am not sure we would in the future. I am certainly sure we would not have been under certain circumstances in the past. I wonder if it would not make more sense to have two representatives of the Senate, one of the majority and one of the minority, just to be sure this protection would be available to all Senators.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I would think that would add to the difficulty, may I say to the distinguished Senator from Tennessee, because when a person becomes the Secretary of the Senate, he represents the Senate. The Sergeant at Arms of the Senate represents the Senate. I would hate to see minority and majority representation, especially in view of the fact that I have such high confidence in the present Secretary of the Senate, who has done a remarkably good job under extremely difficult circumstances.

Mr. BROCK. I have great confidence, may I say to the majority leader, in the present incumbent of that office and his employer, the Senator from Montana. I have no qualms about the equity that would be received under present circumstances. I just wonder, you know, what might happen in the future.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I understand.

Mr. BROCK. I think the law should provide for any and all circumstances. That would be my only point.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BROCK. I yield.

Mr. CANNON. I would point out to the Senator from Tennessee that that is precisely the same provision that is in the law now.

Mr. BROCK. That is why the question the Senator from Nevada raised was important, because he was trying to limit all of the areas where this ex officio person could speak.

Mr. CANNON. I was just trying to delineate what my belief was as to the meaning of ex officio in that regard. Part of that, of course, has been eliminated as unconstitutional, but the specific part and the Clerk of the House was not addressed by the Court, according to my recollection.

It reads:

> There is established a commission to be known as the Federal Election Commission composed of the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives ex officio, without the right to vote, and of six members appointed as follows:

And then the appointing provision is the part the Court struck down because Congress retained a part of the power of appointment.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, that is where you have your division of the parties on a three by three basis on the Commission.

Mr. BROCK. I understand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. BUCKLEY. Mr. President, will the distinguished Senator from Tennessee yield me time? I understand the Senator from Michigan is not here.

Mr. BROCK. I yield the Senator from New York 4 minutes.

Mr. BUCKLEY. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, first of all, I ask unanimous consent that Mike Hammond of my staff be accorded the privilege of the floor throughout the course of the deliberations on this measure.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BROCK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a similar request?

Mr. BUCKLEY. I yield.

Mr. BROCK. I ask unanimous consent that Richard Vodra and Robert Perkins of the staff be accorded the privilege of the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BUCKLEY. Mr. President, I just wanted, at the outset of this debate, to make a couple of observations.

My friend from Tennessee has stated that the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Buckley versus Valeo left us with a problem. I believe those are his exact words. Actually, it left us with a whole carload of problems, which I suggest none of the proposals before us even attempt to cope with.

I shall quote from one of the initial paragraphs of Chief Justice Burger's opinion in that case. He said:

> The courts rule does violence to the intent of Congress in this comprehensive scheme of campaign financing.

He then goes on to say:

> What remains after today's holding leaves no more than a shadow of what Congress contemplated. I question whether the residue leaves a workable program.

I tried to offer some suggestions. I introduced legislation that would have dealt with the effects of the Supreme Court's decision as a whole. I do not have any illusions that it will be enacted because the public, at large, and this Congress, in particular, have failed to focus on any aspect other than the fact that the FEC, as currently constituted, was declared to be unconstitutional. But what the decision also did was to give extraordinary advantages to candidates who are either incumbents or independently wealthy or who have the support of well organized, well financed special interest political action groups, such as the AFL-CIO's COPE. These individuals and groups can spend unlimited funds in support of their own candidacies or of candidates they favor whereas nonincumbent candidates who are of modest means or who do not have the support of well financed political action groups are subject, in that fundraising, to the limitations on contributions that survived the Supreme Court's ruling.

I submit that this creates enormous inequities that this body ought to cope with, and I intend later to offer an amendment which will have the effect of raising those limitations so that challengers may have the opportunity to raise the kind of seed money that alone can assure them of a decent start in an uphill fight.

Mr. President, I would like the RECORD to include the statement that I made before the Committee on Rules and Administration, and I ask unanimous consent that that statement be printed at the conclusion of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit 1.)

Mr. BUCKLEY. What we have here, Mr. President, is an attempt to salvage legislation that was ill-advised to begin with.

It is legislation that the Congress adopted in a state of near panic in the wake of the Watergate scandals. I think it is very relevant that a majority of the members of the Watergate Committee felt that the provisions of the so-called reform legislation adopted in 1974 were so off target that they voted against them.

Mr. President, in the immortal words of the senior Senator from Rhode Island, we ran like rats in the wake of Watergate—is that a correct statement?

Mr. PASTORE. No. The statement was we created a monster and we ran like scared rats.

Mr. BUCKLEY. Scared rats. Thank you.

I totally agree with his estimation of the situation and we ran as scared ——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. BUCKLEY. May I have 1 more minute?

Mr. BROCK. Mr. President, I yield the Senator 1 more minute.

Mr. BUCKLEY. We ran like scared rats in part as a result of the enormous campaign launched by Common Cause.

Mr. President, for the edification of our colleagues I offer for the RECORD an editorial on John Gardner and Common Cause that appeared in the New Republic in the January 31, 1976 issue. To give you the flavor, I will merely read one sentence:

> From the moment, moreover, when, in upperclass living rooms across the country, he launched Common Cause, there were other indications that presumption would be his badge: demonstrably, he had come to believe in his own credentials as a keeper of public morals, though rather in the eldering way of people who, proclaiming themselves servants of God, insist also that they are "humble."

I ask unanimous consent that that editorial be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MONEY AND SANCTIMONY

We do not recall ever sharing the general mugwump enthusiasm for John Gardner, certainly not since that day long ago when in this side of an hour we read his mediocre book on Excellence. From the moment, moreover, when, in upperclass living rooms across the country, he launched Common Cause, there were other indications that presumption would be his badge: demonstrably, he had come to believe in his own credentials as a keeper of public morals, though rather in the eldering way of people who, proclaiming themselves servants of God, insist also that they are "humble." Watergate was made for the likes of Gardner: at least it gave his unfocused enterprise a new lease on life—and a purpose. There is little so frantic, after all, as a democracy in one of its periodic fits of self-righteousness, and Gardner was able to channel the rage for some orderly purgative into legislation, popular initiatives, and—we now learn—detailed codes of campaign behavior to which his custodial army would try to hold aspirants for political office.

Gardner's greatest legislative accomplishment is the monstrously arcane campaign financing law whose constitutionality is now being tested before the Supreme Court. Passed in the shadow of Nixon's worst perfidies, the law has nearly everyone at least a bit apprehensive that the passion for reform may have led Congress to infringe on the first amendment guarantees of free expression. None of this, however, has diminished the political clout of Gardner's mission. A fortnight ago, his organization announced that all but two of the horde now running for President had pledged themselves to abide by rules that are either so vague as to be meaningless, so obvious as to be redundant, or so onerous as to make you wonder why any dignified person would think of complying at all. It is the last category which concerns us.

The contenders promise to make "public a statement of personal financial holdings, including assets and debts, sources of income, honoraria, gifts and other financial transactions over $1000, covering candidate, spouse and dependent children." What right does John Gardner have to information about the earnings of a candidate's teenage child, or a legacy left to a spouse by a rich aunt? Or for that matter even to information about the personal debts of a candidate? How does it help the public understand a campaign or judge a record? And why should the fact that an individual aspires to or holds office imply obligations upon his family to tell all—or anything for that matter—especially to reveal what only yesterday we thought legitimately to be private, even inviolate? A recent ugly instance of this is the assumption that Mrs. Marion Javits had no right to a job of her own choice because her husband is an influential senator.

On the evidence of the past, there is not even the sparsest argument that can be made for a genuine public interest in the information that is being demanded. The corrupt, moreover, will lie; and those who tell the truth will have contributed one more digression from the crucial substance of political debate, which should be how we are to be governed. In our day, however, personal exposure and revelation have displaced serious exposition and analysis as the favored mode of public discourse. The press certainly is more interested in the insignificant but perhaps scabrous aspects of a public person's life than in what the life stands for and has served. This is why "the search and destroy operation" is now standard fare in our best newspapers. Given this temper among the arbiters of the political culture, it is not surprising that most of the candidates supinely yielded to Gardner's snooping. Some of them seemed positively exhilarated to show how little or how much they had. Sensing political hay, Fred Harris and Sargent Shriver breathlessly promised Common Cause almost more than it asked. Of course, several of the candidates seem to concede that they are easily corruptible. In response to an environmental group's inquiry, they answered that they would not take contributions from oil company executives. Do they trust themselves so little?

There is, of course, some continuum between the public and the private life. But when the dividing lines are eroded, we all suffer: the politicians, their families and us. That Lyndon Johnson had the American people eyeing his post-operative scars was his grotesque way of being intimate with the millions. Yet anyone who knows children of politicians must be aware of the price they pay for the glare that illumines nothing important. The breakdown of the private sphere extends to the whole citizenry: if we claim the right to know the tax returns, the medical bulletins, the psychiatric histories of government officials, we should not be stunned when they do not respect our privacy, when they violate it as our reformers claim the right to violate theirs. In the end we will get what we deserve: politicians without private lives or private feelings, men and women, as the Austrian novelist Robert Musil put it, wholly "without qualities."

Common Cause is not alone in the business of scrutinizing the personal lives of the candidates. Jack Anderson has asked them all to submit to him both a current medical report and the last five years of their tax returns. He has not, to our knowledge, imputed wrong to those who refuse, as Common Cause has done with its two recalcitrants. But the editors of the slick New Times have done it for Anderson. "Failure to comply" with his request, they say in their issue of January 9, "may raise more interesting questions than those that surface in the tax returns and health reports themselves." This is prurient vigilantism. Gardner was predictably more delicate with his threats: "The public will want to know whether these two candidates disagree with the standards or cannot live with them politically," particularly the requirement for public disclosure of personal financial holdings. One of the two who has not signed on Gardner's dotted line is Ronald Reagan, though his spokesman assured The New York Times that the candidate "can probably agree with all these points." Eugene McCarthy, the other candidate out of step, has not himself responded either to Anderson or to Common Cause; but he did tell the Gridiron dinner that he had received an inquiry from a religious group that amounted to a request for "transcripts, if not tapes, of my confessions over the last 10 years." This is, we suppose, his way of answering. His campaign manager, however, wrote Gardner directly, not felicitously but expressing a sentiment with which we fully sympathize. "Take your enclosed standards and stuff them in your ear."

STATEMENT OF HON. JAMES L. BUCKLEY, A U.S. SENATOR FROM THE STATE OF NEW YORK

Senator BUCKLEY. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I welcome the opportunity to discuss my bill, which was introduced yesterday. It is now 2½ weeks since the Supreme Court handed down its decision, and since then a number of bills have been introduced more or less as emergency measures that are intended to deal with only the most obvious of the gaps left by the decision.

None of these measures, I submit, addresses the full range of problems created by the Supreme Court decision, especially in congressional races.

We need to do substantially more than simply reconstitute the Federal Election Commission so that public subsidies may continue to flow to Presidential candidates. The Supreme Court's elimination of limits on individual spending has accentuated the inequities already ingrained in the Federal Election Campaign Act. They, too, must be addressed on an urgent basis.

Finally, there is broad agreement, based on actual experience with the act, that a number of its provisions are unwieldly and unduly burdensome. These can easily be corrected at this time if only we will take the trouble to do so.

Yesterday, Congressman William Steiger of Wisconsin and I introduced in our respective Houses a bill that will restructure the Federal Election Commission along constitutional lines, reallocate its responsibilities in a more efficient manner, adjust some of the major inequities in the law as it has survived the Court's decision, and make certain modifications that we believe will simplify the administration of the Federal Election Campaign Act, as amended. In preparing our bill, we have consulted with our coplaintiffs in Buckley v. Valeo. Our bill represents a consensus that cuts across partisan and ideological lines. It is the only bill before this committee that attempts to address all the major problems that have been precipitated by the Supreme Court's decision.

Our bill does not seek to change features of the act, such as the public financing of Presidential campaigns, which the plaintiffs in Buckley v. Valeo found objectionable, but which the Supreme Court left standing. Rather, we seek only to make those corrections in the law that are urgently required as a result of the Supreme Court's decision, while correcting some of the widely noted defects in the law that have become apparent since its enactment.

Specifically, our bill is addressed to the following deficiencies:

1. THE INEQUITIES AMONG CANDIDATES

The Supreme Court's rejection of limitations on expenditures by candidates and independent individuals and groups has dramatically magnified the inequities that exist under the law between different classes of candidates. On the one hand, wealthy candidates or candidates having the support of well-organized, well-financed political action groups, such as the AFL–CIO's Committee on Political Education, can now spend unlimited sums in the promotion of their candidacies. On the other hand, candidates without private means or without the support of such groups are limited to contributions that may not exceed $1,000 from individuals or $5,000 from political action committees. In practice, this has provided enormous handicaps in raising the kind of seed money that is especially important in launching the campaign of a candidate who is relatively unknown.

Our bill will help redress this imbalance by raising the limitations on individual and committee contributions to the following levels: $50,000 in the case of a Presidential candidate, $25,000 in the case of senatorial candidates, and $10,000 in the case of a candidate for the House of Representatives. These limitations are high enough to enable middle- and lower-income candidates to raise the money necessary to launch successful campaigns. Any possibility of abuse will, in our opinion, be checked by the effective enforcement of the disclosure provisions

I would at this time point out that unless we substantially raise the limits on individual contributions, candidates for Congress runnng this year will face the danger of losing substantial control over their own campaigns. The $1,000 and $5,000 contribution limitations will no longer keep individuals on political committees from spending as much as they want on behalf of candidates they want to support. It will merely prevent them from coordinating their expenditures with the candidate's campaign. In other words, each one of us running for office this year could see chaos in their promotion of a singe cause.

2. THE FEDERAL ELECTION COMMISSION

Aside from the fact that the Supreme Court has found the method of appointing the Federal Election Commission to be unconstitutional, the Commission in practice has been found to reflect all the deficiencies that are to be found in too many other agencies that are clothed with very broad rulemaking and enforcement responsibilities. Arbitrary and at times capricious requirements impose excessive legal and bookkeeping costs on candidates without serving any apparent public service. We have also vested in the Commission extraordinarily broad powers over a most sensitive area of nations life.

I suppose there is some sort of poetic justice in having Members of the Congress finally made subject to the kind of bureaucratic harassment and regulatory uncertainties and costs to which the Congress routinely has subjected so many others in American society. Nevertheless, our bill seeks to remedy this situation by allowing the functions currently delegated to the FEC to be reallocated between a reconstituted commission and a new election law section to be established in the Department of Justice. Our bill would vest the enforcement powers for the Federal election laws not with an independent election czar, but with appointive officials within the traditional enforcement arm of the Federal Government. The election law section would be headed by a Director and Deputy Director of different political parties who would be appointed by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate. They would serve for 4-year terms and could be removed only for cause. We believe, in short, that this mechanism would insulate this section from political direction by an incumbent President.

This arrangement would leave audit, review, and certification responsibilities with the new Federal Election Commission while assigning the functions of enforcement, the issuance of advisory opinions, and the conduct of civil and criminal litigation to the new election law section of the Justice Department. This is the more normal arrangement, and we believe it represents better policy.

3. RECORDKEEPING AND DISCLOSURE

The current disclosure and bookkeeping provisions of the Federal Election Campaign Act impose costs that cannot be justified by any consideration of public policy. I speak of the current requirements that a record be kept of each contributor giving over $10 and that disclosure be made of each contribution in excess of $100.

With respect to the recordkeeping provisions, it is simply irrational to suppose that any candidate for national office will be influenced by a $100 contribution, let alone an $11 contribution. The only possible effect of the current provision is to discourage contributions by individuals reluctant to be identified with minor parties or unpopular causes. It does not in any way affect the problem of corruption in public office. Our bill would substantially lighten the current recordkeeping burden by limiting such records to contributions in excess of $100.

It is just as irrational to assume that candidates for national office could be bribed by the $101 contributions that must now be reported. The amount of money required to have a corruptive influence on a candidate for political office depends on the relative size of the contribution to the overall financial requirements of the campaign. In order to ameliorate the effect of disclosure provisions on public participation in a campaign, our bill would adopt various disclosure thresholds which would be calibrated to the office sought. Specifically, we would establish those thresholds at $1,000 in the case of a candidate for the Presidency, $500 in the case of a candidate for the Senate, and $250 in the case of a candidate for the House of Representatives. And I hope that no one suggests that any of us could be bought for lower sums.

4. MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS

The present rules appear unduly restrictive with respect to contributions to and from political parties and committees. There is also a great deal of uncertainty as to what constitutes a contribution to a particular candidate. Our bill incorporates language which will (a) remove some of the arbitrary restrictions that have been placed on the traditional role of parties and committees, thereby broadening the diversity of groups that can have an input on the electoral process, and (b) provide for necessary statutory guidelines for determining what constitutes a contribution. This will serve to remove many of the uncertainties that now exist in the law, and will facilitate the conduct of campaigns as well as the work of the election law section that would be charged under our bill with the enforcement of Federal election laws.

As I stated at the outset, the Supreme Court's decision in Buckley v. Valeo requires corrective action that is significantly broader in scope than the reconstitution of the Federal Election Commission. Inequities have been magnified which the Congress must address if we are not to establish two classes of candidates facing vastly different problems in financing and launching their political campaigns. Furthermore, the fact that some legislative action is necessary at this time provides us with a unique opportunity to correct the deficiencies that have been widely noted, deficiencies which add materially to the cost and complexity of political campaigns without serving any identifiable public purpose.

The American people have a right to expect that we will utilize this opportunity to effect something more than incremental changes intended to preserve the status quo. They have a right to expect their representatives in Congress to enact real election reform that will remove provisions whose net effect is to protect the wealthy or special-interest candidate from successful challenge, to say nothing of incumbent Members of Congress.

I thank you, Mr. Chairman. There has been distributed a synopsis of the legislation we introduced yesterday. And I would be happy to answer any questions you may have.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

The Chair states that the Senator from Nevada has 11 minutes remaining and the Senator from Tennessee 4 minutes remaining.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum and ask that time be taken out of both sides.

Mr. BROCK. I ask that the Senator not make such a request. We only have 4 minutes remaining.

Mr. CANNON. I withdraw the request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The request is withdrawn.

Who yields time?

If nobody yields time, the clock will be charged equally against both sides.

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On whose time?

Mr. PASTORE. Charged to both sides.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The second assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BROCK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BROCK. Mr. President, we are some 11 minutes shy of a vote on the pending amendment, and I shall just summarize very quickly the arguments of the proponents.

It is my very strong feeling that the bill, as presented to us by the Committee on Rules and Administration, as I said earlier, was something more than an extension bill, and yet that is the way it has been presented. It is, in fact, a Christmas tree, designed to advantage certain very important groups of high privilege and great political power in this country. It is designed to disadvantage certain other groups, but more than anything else, because those are not the points of contention, the bill as presented to us is a bill to destroy the independence of the Federal Election Commission, to pervert its basic purpose and to reconstitute the good old days where the Senate and House of Representatives were the judge of their own election process and no one else. The whole reason we got into this fight for reform some several years ago was to set up a commission whose independence was unquestionable from either this body or the other body.

The purpose was to allow the American people an opportunity to conduct an election for representation with assurance that there would not be an incumbent guarante, that the incumbent would have available to him no more and no less than the challenger, so that the people could have an honest opportunity for choice. The effect of the bill before us is to pervert that purpose.

The effect of the amendment that we offer is to restore to the commission its basic, fundamental purpose, and that is its independence in the oversight of the election process of these 50 States. I think that is a terribly important issue, and I hope that we will look upon it not in partisan terms but in terms of our responsibilities to the Republic and the Constitution; because we have no right to advantage ourselves by device, by law, by circumstance.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, I want to be sure that my colleagues understand what would be covered in this substitute.

The Senator correctly stated that it would simply extend the life of the Commission, but we already have seen many instances in which we believe the Commission had erred in the proposal of regulations that they had sent up here, in the interpretation of existing law, and many other areas.

The initial proposal, the substitute that has been presented here, simply would let the Commission go on until December 31, 1976, at which time there is a self-destruct provision. If all the bad features suggested by the Senator are in this bill which the Rules Committee has reported, I do not know why he would want to self-destruct his proposal as of the end of December 1976, because then we would be back to where we had to write a new bill and come to the floor of the Senate and go all over again.

We have already seen to some degree how this bill works. So the only thing we would be doing by making a straight provision of it in this bill, a straight destruct, until the end of December 1976, would be to say that the Presidential candidates could go on their merry way, qualifying to get the money out of the Federal funds to carry out their campaigns.

We already have found some bad features; and I am going to propose an amendment to the bill reported by the Rules Committee, if the Senator's substitute is defeated, to make sure that we cannot have such a proliferation of candiates for national office running around the country at taxpayers' expense when they have absolutely no chance of being viable candidates.

Mr. BROCK. As long as the Senator understands they are all his. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. After another primary or two, there may be some of both. At least, right now, I would say that perhaps they are mostly on this side.

In any event, I hope the Senater will support me in that.

I objected earlier to the request of the Senator from Michigan to modify his amendment by eliminating the self-destruct provision principle, because I did not know what would occur if the self-destruct provision were taken out. I have had time to review it, and I find that all we would be doing would be to perpetuate the commission into the unforeseen future, and we would be giving them some unlimited authority, giving them a salary and operating expenses, and letting them go on their way.

I believe we need more clarification of the law. We need clarification with respect to the Sun Pac decision, which was very unfair on the part of one side; and we have to keep these things in balance.

When the Senator from Michigan returns to the Chamber, if he renews his motion to eliminate section 3, which is the self-destruct provision, that will be contrary to the recommendations of his leader at the White House; because the President, himself, suggested that we have a self-destruct provision early next year. I attended the meeting at which that suggestion was made. So that we then could look at it again in a calmer atmosphere and try to come up with a new bill. In any event, if the distinguished Senator from Michigan wants to oppose his President and moves to elminate section 3 from the bill, I am inclined to go along with him on that point at present.

I see that the Senator has returned to the Chamber. I will be glad to yield some time to him, if he desires, within the very few minutes I have remaining, inasmuch as the time of the minority has expired.

I recapitulate, for the benefit of the Senator from Michigan: I have just stated that if the Senator from Michigan desires to oppose his leader, the President, who recommended that we have a self-destruct provision, and to look at this bill in a calmer atmosphere early next year, I will not object if he moves to strike section 3, the self-destruct provision, from his substitute.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, while I will not accept the characterization of the Senator from Nevada, I am glad that he has changed his position and will cooperate to that extent.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that section 3 of the substitute be stricken.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. BROCK. Section 3, on page 4.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be so modified.

Mr. CANNON. I take it that we are all talking about the same one, inasmuch as we had two earlier.

Mr. President, I yield 2 minutes to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CLARK. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, I simply wish to speak during the last minute or two that we have before the vote.

I commend the distinguished floor manager of the bill, Senator CANNON, for the outstanding job he has done in bringing this much-needed attention to the floor of the Senate. I hope we will be able to pass S. 3065 in the near future, and it certainly appears that we will.

No one can dispute the urgent need for a reconstitution of the Federal Election Commission, so that the administration and enforcement of the law can continue without disruption. But S. 3065 does more than simply reconstitute the Commission, and that is what the pending amendment is all about. It establishes strict new limits on the proliferation of so-called political action committtees which are set up by special interest groups, both business and labor, to funnel money to candidates. Certainly, if we adopt the pending substitute, we will be ignoring that problem.

Mr. President, I should like to have printed at this point in the RECORD some material which was prepared by Common Cause. It dramatically illustrates the massive special interest contribution and proliferation of committees that already has taken place. I ask unanimous consent to have this material printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[News release from Common Cause, Washington, D.C., Mar. 10, 1976]

SPECIAL INTEREST GROUPS ACCUMULATE $16.4 MILLION FOR 1976 POLITICAL CAMPAIGNS, UP MORE THAN 40 PERCENT OVER SIMILAR PERIOD IN 1974, COMMON CAUSE STUDY REVEALS

Special interest grousp have accumulated $16.4 million for the 1976 political campaigns, according to a new study released by Common Cause. The $16.4 million political war chest—cash on hand as of January 1976—represents an increase of more than 40 percent over the $11.7 million held by interest groups at a similar early stage of the 1974 elections (February 28, 1974), the study revealed.

"The $16.4 figure doesn't even begin to tell the story," according to Fred Wertheimer, Common Cause Vice President and Director of its Campaign Finance Monitoring Project. "In one of the most significant developments since the passage of the 1974 campaign finance law, 242 new political giving committees have been established by special interest groups during the past year." (See Appendix A for complete list.) "Most of these new interest group committees have just begun their drive to accumulate funds for the 1976 elections. This means that many millions of additional political dollars will be raised by the new committees in the months ahead," Wertheimer said.

According to the study, the 242 new committees now constitute thirty percent of all interest group committees registered under the federal law. The cash the new committees have accumulated at this stage, however, amounts to only six percent of the $16.4 million total funds accumulated by all interest group committees.

The new committees so far have raised only $978,000 with $496,000 accumulated by just one group, a new committee connected with the American Trial Lawyers Association.

The study notes that the huge difference between funds available for all committees and those available for new committees will change dramatically over the course of 1976, as the new committees carry out their initial fundraising drives.

BUSINESS-RELATED COMMITTEES

Almost 75 percent of the 242 new committees have been formed by business-related interests, according to the study. One hundred and seven corporations and 22 banks have established new political committees in the last year, more than doubling the number of corporations and banks with registered committees prior to the 1974 elections. Seventeen oil companies have registered political action committees for the first time, including Atlantic Richfield Co., Cities Service Co., Standard Oil of California, Standard Oil of Ohio, Sun Oil Co. and Texaco. Prior to the 1974 elections, only one oil company Union Oil of California, had registered a political committee.

Eight steel companies have registered funds for the first time, including ARMCO Steel Co., Lykes-Youngstown, National Steel Corp., Republic Steel Corp. and U.S. Steel.

Four major aerospace corporations—Grumman Corp., Lockheed Aircraft Corp., McDonnell Douglas Corp. and United Technologies (formerly United Aircraft) have also registered committees for the first time.

Other major corporations registering new political committees include American Express Co., Bristol-Myers Co., Continental Can Co., Dow Chemical Co., Litton Industries, Montgomery Ward & Co., Pan American Airlines, Pepsico Inc., R.J. Reynolds Industries and Sears, Roebuck & Co.

The remaining 25 percent of the new committees registering were sponsored by labor organizations and miscellaneous groups. Most of the 36 newly registered labor-related political committees represent additional committees formed by labor unions which already had one or more political committees prior to the 1974 elections. The Communication Workers of America, for example, registered 12 additional committees, and the Machinists registered four additional committees.

"Comprehensive public financing for the 1976 Presidential elections assures that the great bulk of all interest group contributions in 1976—new or old, business or labor, medical or dairy—are destined for the Congressional races," Wertheimer said. "These developments present one of the most compelling cases yet made on the need for Congressional public financing."

"They also demonstrate that it is essential for Congress to make clear that an organization cannot set up a number of political committees and thereby render meaningless the $5,000 limit on what an organization's political committee can give to a candidate. The need for this 'antiproliferation' legislation is strikingly demonstrated by just two cases," Wertheimer said. "During the period from October–December 1975, Dow Chemical Co. registered seven new political committees. During the period from August–December 1975 the Communication Workers of America registered 12 new committees. "The bills to reconstitute the Federal Election Commission pending in the House and Senate contain clear 'anti-proliferation' provisions," Wertheimer said.

SPECIAL INTEREST AND LARGE GIVERS IN 1974 CONGRESSIONAL RACES

The Common Cause study also revealed that $35 million in campaign contributions to 1974 Congressional candidates came from large individual givers ($500 or more) and special interest groups. The $35 million total—$22.5 million from individuals who gave $500 or more and $12.5 million from special interest groups—represents over 40 percent of the $83.5 million contributed to 1974 Congressional candidates between September 1, 1973 and December 31, 1974. Candidates in 1974 provided an additional $6.2 million of their own money.

Of the $12.5 million in interest group contributions in 1974, labor organizations accounted for $6.3 million, and business and professional groups accounted for $4.8 million. (See Appendix C.) These figures do not reflect the amount of money spent by labor and other organizations in communicating with their own members and in conducting nonpartisan voter registration and get out the vote drives. Such expenditures are not campaign expenditures within the meaning of the federal law and the total amounts involved in these activities are not known.

The study also revealed that individuals with business or professional occupations accounted for $18.4 million given by individuals to 1974 Congressional candidates in amounts of $500 or more. This included $13.6 million from businessmen, $2.6 million from attorneys and $580,000 from individual doctors. (See Appendix B for breakdown.) The Common Cause figures are based on an analysis of occupation and employer information required to be listed by candidates on campaign finance reports. They represent the first comprehensive analysis ever done of the occupation of individual contributors to Congressional races.

"These findings again strongly demonstrate the need for Congressional public financing," Wertheimer said. "They show a strong reliance by candidates on larger gifts and special interest contributions. Public financing provides candidates with an alternative choice for their elections—an alternative based on less special interest dependence, smaller private contributions, and greater citizen involvement."

Earlier Common Cause studies have demonstrated that in the absence of public financing, incumbents in Congress have consistently outraised and outspent their challengers by an average of two to one, regardless of political party affiliation, Wertheimer said.

According to the latest study the largest individual interest group contributors to 1974 Congressional candidates were the political funds of the American Medical Association, $1,462,972; the AFL–CIO, $1,178,638; the UAW, $843,938; the maritime unions, $733,314; the Machinists, $470,353; and financial institutions, $438,428. (See Appendix C.)

Of the individual businessmen and professionals who gave $18.4 million to 1974 Congressional candidates in amounts of $500 or more, $2.5 million came from individuals in the construction and real estate industry, $2.3 million came from individuals in the financial industry and $1.7 million came from individuals associated with oil, gas, or other natural resource industries. (See Appendix B.)

1976 FUNDS ON HAND

Business and professional interest groups accounted for $8.8 million cash on hand as of January 1976, compared to $6.6 million held by labor organizations. (See Appendix D.) The $8.8 million total includes $3 million held by business groups, $2.7 million by agriculture and dairy groups and $2.5 million held by health groups. In early 1974 dairy groups also had $2.1 million cash on hand but wound up giving only $361,000 to 1974 Congressional candidates. "Dairy groups had a very difficult time during that Watergate period getting candidates to accept their contributions. It is not clear that this pattern will be repeated in 1976," Wertheimer said.

Labor organizations have on hand $1.6 million more than the $5 million they had at a similar stage in 1974. In addition, the AFL-CIO's COPE fund reports a balance of only $173,000 as of January 1976. (In 1974 the AFL-CIO COPE funds contributed $1.2 million to Congressional candidates.)

Health groups have on hand approximately $1 million more than the $1.5 million they had in 1974, with the AMA accounting for $728,000 of the increase.

The leading groups with funds available as of January 1976 were the Associated Milk Producers, Inc., $1,811,702; the American Medical Association, $1,616,978; the maritime unions, $1,347,332; UAW, $988,652; financial institutions, $635,765; and the American Dental Association, $612,792. (See Appendix D.)

1974 DATA TO BE PUBLISHED IN SERIES OF VOLUMES

Common Cause also announced that it would publish within the next month a series of volumes setting forth comprehensive campaign finance data for the 1974 Congressional elections. The volumes will present for each Congressional candidate in the 1974 general election a complete list of interest group contributions, and individual contributions of $500 or more. The volumes will also provide complete listings of the 1974 Congressional contributions made by each significant special interest group.

Common Cause said it will continue to monitor campaign finances in the 1976 elections, with particular focus on the activities of special interest groups. Since its inception in early 1972, the Common Cause Campaign Finance Monitoring Project has been directed by Fred Wertheimer. John J. Conway and Neil Upmeyer serve as Associate Directors of the Monitoring Project specializing in special interest activities, and candidate and individual contributor activities, respectively.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, I wish to make absolutely clear to my colleagues that the provision requested by the White House has been stricken. The substitute, as it is now proposed, simply would reconstitute the Federal Election Commission. It would provide for the appointment of two members every other year. It would not continue the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House as ex officio members.

It would do nothing about the actions or interpretations of the commission which many Members of Congress believe the commission has erroneously interpreted so far. It would simply provide for the matching funds to be received by Presidential candidates and disbursed by the Commission to the candidates who are in the race. It would permit the Federal Election Commission to go ahead with what limited powers were retained to it under the Supreme Court decision.

I suggest to my colleagues that what we need here is a revision of law to conform completely to the Supreme Court decision and to try to make a campaign reform bill work. We have been working at this for a long time. I believe we have the opportunity now to make a success of it.

I hope my colleagues will defeat the substitute amendment of the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, because a campaign committee which I have authorized has obtained matching funds under the Federal Election Campaign Act, I believe that casting my vote on legislation to amend the act after that fact could be seen as a conflict of interest. Therefore, I am refraining from voting for or against any amendments to the pending bill, or the bill itself.

I would add, Mr. President, that I do believe, on the merits, that the act should be amended to meet the objections raised by the Supreme Court, and that I find great merit in many of the amendments that are proposed. But in order to avoid the appearance of any possible conflict of interest, I shall vote "present" on the amendments offered, as well as on final passage.

Mr. BROCK. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second?

There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 3 o'clock having arrived, the question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Michigan in the nature of a substitute, as modified. The yeas and nays have been ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. CHURCH (when his name was called). Present.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I announce that the Senator from Michigan (Mr. PHILIP A. HART), the Senator from Florida (Mr. CHILES), the Senator from Indiana (Mr. HARTKE), and the Senator from South Dakota (Mr. MCGOVERN) are necessarily absent.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I announce that the Senator from Illinois (Mr. PERCY) and the Senator from North Dakota (Mr. YOUNG) are necessarily absent.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Illinois (Mr. PERCY) would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 46, nays 47, as follows:

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state the parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BUMPERS. Is there a time limitation on the Mondale amendment?

Mr. MONDALE. There is none.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the distinguished Senator from Montana (Mr. METCALF) be recognized for not to exceed 5 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

CONTINUANCE OF CIVIL GOVERNMENT FOR THE TRUST TERRITORY OF THE PACIFIC ISLANDS

Mr. METCALF. Mr. President, I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate a message from the House of Representatives on H.R. 12122.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CURTIS) laid before the Senate the amendments in the House of Representatives to the bill (H.R. 12122) to amend section 2 of the act of June 30, 1954, providing for the continuance of civil government for the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands, and for other purposes.

Mr. METCALF. Mr. President, I have a brief statement on H.R. 12122.

Mr. President, H.R. 12122 was amended by the Senate, which amendment the House has agreed to with further amendments. The House amendments would accomplish two objectives contained in the original version of H.R. 12122. The House amendments would reauthorize the appropriation of $8 million for the construction of facilities for a 4-year college to serve the Micronesian community, but provides that no appropriation may be made until the President has conducted a study to determine the educational need and the most suitable educational concept for such a college and has transmitted that study to the Senate and House Interior Committees, which will have 90 calendar days to review the study recommendations. The second amendment would reinsert the original section 2 of H.R. 12122, which the Senate deleted in its original amendment. Section 2 provides for the extension to Guam of those laws of the United States made applicable to the Northern Mariana Islands by the provisions of section 502(a)(1) of House Joint Resolution 549, which approved the Marianas Commonwealth Covenant. The objective of section 2 is to equalize the treatment of Guam and the Northern Mariana Islands. I understand that the distinguished Senator from Arizona, Mr. FANNIN, has an amendment to offer to section 2 on behalf of the Finance Committee. I recommend that the Senate concur in the House amendments, as amended, by adoption of the amendment proposed by Senator FANNIN, on behalf of the Finance Committee.

Mr. FANNIN. Mr. President, I concur in the statement of the Senator from Montana. Will the Senator from Minnesota yield for me to offer the amendment?

Mr. MONDALE. I yield to the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. FANNIN. Mr. President, I move that the Senate concur in the House amendments with an amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

In section 2, after "except for", insert "Section 228 of Title II and Title XVI of the Social Security Act as it applies to the several States and"

Mr. FANNIN. Mr. President, I am offering an amendment which will eliminate from the bill H.R. 12122 a House provision extending certain Social Security Act programs to the territory of Guam. This amendment is being offered on behalf of the Committee on Finance which thoroughly discussed this matter in its meeting of March 9, 1976 and voted to request that these Social Security Act programs not be extended under H.R. 12122. While it is true that the two programs in question—supplemental security income and special social security benefits for the uninsured—would be extended to the new Northern Marianas Commonwealth under the covenant establishing that territory, the Finance Committee believes that these programs were not intended to be applicable beyond the 50 States and the District of Columbia. There are in fact separate programs of assistance for the aged, blind, and disabled which now apply to the jurisdictions of Guam, Puerto Rico, and the Virgin Islands and which are designed to permit locally developed assistance plans tailored to the particular economic and other circumstances of each area.

On March 11, therefore, Senator LONG as chairman of the Committee on Finance introduced legislation which would provide for the establishment in the Northern Marianas Commonwealth of the Social Security Act assistance programs applicable to other territories. At the time that bill was introduced, the Senate had voted to strike from H.R. 12122 the provision extending the supplemental security income program and the special benefits program from H.R. 12122. Subsequently, the House has again added to H.R. 12122 the provision opposed by the Finance Committee and the amendment I am offering would again strike it from the bill.

I ask for the immediate consideration of the motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. METCALF. I concur in the motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Mr. President, will the Senator from Montana yield?

Mr. METCALF. I do not have the floor.

Mr. MONDALE. I have the floor. I have an amendment pending. I will be glad to yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Does the Senator have an amendment to the legislation being presented by the Senator from Montana?

Mr. MONDALE. No, I have an amendment to the pending bill.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Before we proceed to that, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. MONDALE. I yield.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. This is a conference report, I take it, that the Senator from Montana is handling?

Mr. METCALF. No, it is not. The bill that we passed, H.R. 12122, went to the House of Representatives. We received it back with an amendment. We now have moved, or I am going to move in a moment, to concur in the House amendment, with amendments.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. May I say to the Senator from Montana that the Senator from Colorado (Mr. GARY HART) has been very much interested in this subject, and he is not here at the moment. I am wondering whether the Senator from Montana would agree to lay this matter aside temporarily until the amendment could be examined and Senator HART could be notified.

Mr. METCALF. I would be delighted to lay it aside, but I am informed that this amendment as passed by the House of Representatives has the concurrence of Senator GARY HART.

We tried to touch all the bases. We tried to meet with Senator FANNIN, Senator MCCLURE, and many other Senators who were concerned with this legislation on this specific amendment. The bill has passed both the House and the Senate. The amendment came over from the House, and we feel that we can concur in the House amendment and the bill as amended by the House.

Mr. FANNIN. Mr. President, if the Senator from Minnesota will yield, maybe I can clarify it for the distinguished Senator from Virginia.

Mr. MONDALE. I yield.

Mr. FANNIN. This amendment is one being offered on behalf of the Finance Committee so we will not be giving privileges to Guam that were in the bill for the Northern Marianas. The first bill that came over to the Senate from the House gave it to all territories. The second one that came back over gave it to Guam. This was taken up in the committee, and it was agreed that this should not be done, and that this provision would be deleted from it.

So this limits the amount Guam would be entitled to, in accordance with the bill from the House of Representatives.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. That is what the Fannin amendment did?

Mr. FANNIN. That is what the Fannin amendment did, yes.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. The only other question I have is this: When the bill was before the Senate, it was amended in four particular places, as I recall. I am taking it from memory. Would one of the Senators indicate to me how the House proposal reads, now that it has been amended by the Fannin amendment?

Mr. METCALF. Mr. President, the various Senate amendments were agreed to by the House, except for the two now before the Senate, that we are calling up before the Senate. One of them is an amendment proposed by the Senator from Arizona with which I think all of us are in agreement. The other amendment is the one we agreed to for $8 million for a college, and they modified that by saying, "Let us wait until the President determines where the needs for a college are, and refer the matter back to the respective Interior Committees of the two Houses."

We concurred in that amendment.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. I thank the Senator. That clears up the points in which I was interested.

Mr. METCALF. Mr. President, I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House of Representatives, with amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

FEDERAL ELECTION CAMPAIGN ACT AMENDMENTS OF 1976

The Senate continued with the consideration of the bill (S. 3065) to amend the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971 to provide for its administration by a Federal Election Commission appointed in accordance with the requirements of the Constitution, and for other purposes.

Mr. MONDALE. Mr. President, I am going to speak briefly to my amendment, but first I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

PRIVILEGE OF THE FLOOR

Mr. WEICKER. I thank the distinguished Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Michael Scully and Robert Dotchin of my staff be accorded the privilege of the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HASKELL. Will the Senator yield for a unanimous consent request?

Mr. MONDALE. I yield.

Mr. HASKELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that John Cevett, of my staff, be granted the privilege of the floor during the consideration of the pending legislation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Mickey Barnett of Senator DOMENICI's staff and Alan Holmer and Debbie Robertson of my staff be accorded the privileges of the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MONDALE. Mr. President, on behalf of the Senator from Ohio (Mr. GLENN) I ask unanimous consent that the privilege of the floor be accorded to Mr. Walker Nolan of his staff.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MONDALE. Mr. President, the amendment just called up is cosponsored by many Senators, including the Senator from Oregon (Mr. PACKWOOD), the Senator from Illinois (Mr. STEVENSON), and the Senator from Tennessee (Mr. BAKER), as well as 19 other cosponsors.

This amendment would set up a commission to study the Presidential nomination process in this country.

There is a crying need for this study. It is one of the few failures of the Founding Fathers that in the development of our Constitution 200 years ago, they failed to perceive what would be necessary for a rational system to nominate candidates for our highest office, the President of the United States.

They believed that this country would not have political parties. They believed instead that, through the electoral system, distinguished citizens would gather together each 4 years and elect the best qualified person to be President of the United States. Because they did not accurately perceive how the system would evolve, it never worked out in the way they intended. Political parties—what they called factions—immediately arose. Now there is not a single system of nominating a President, but literally 55 different systems, each with a welter of differing rules, often conflicting. The spectacle of the present system is now obvious to all, and the system has arrived at the point where it is utterly ludicrous. It undermines the physical capacity of the candidates, it destroys the ability for rational debate, and it is a system which now cries out for reform.

Never once in the 200 years of American history has the Presidential nomination system been subjected to a comprehensive study. That is what this proposed commission would do.

It would be a bipartisan commission with 18 members, to be equally appointed by the President pro tempore of the Senate, after advice from the majority and minority leaders, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and the President, with the chairmen of the two national political parties serving ex officio. This commission would be asked to look into all aspects of the nominating process, including the manner in which States conduct Presidential primaries, caucuses and conventions to select delegates to the national nominating conventions. It would look into State laws and rules of national political parties, which govern the participation of voters and candidates in such primaries and caucuses. It would look into Presidential campaign financing, and the relationship between the candidate for President and the media. It would look into alternative nominating systems, including a study of national and regional primary systems. Finally, it would look into the manner in which candidates are nominated for Vice President.

Mr. President, the nominating process desperately needs a comprehensive review of these areas and the relationship of each area to the others, in a way which seeks to resolve the problems consistent with clearly defined and broadly agreed upon goals.

The present system of nominating Presidential candidates is close to anarchy. There are 55 separate and different systems. This year 30 States will hold separate primaries, each without any relation to the others, and they will account for approximately three-fourths of the delegates to attend the national conventions. Thus, we virtually have a de facto national primary, albeit in a fragmented form, without ever having adopted it as a matter of national policy. The attempts at reform thus far have included proposals for a national primary, regional primaries, and a variation of the present system, but there has never been a national consensus on any of them. There is a consensus, however, among the cosponsors of this resolution and throughout the country that the system is badly in need of review.

There is always considerable interest in reforming the process during a Presidential election year, but it quickly fades after the election. Even though we believe this interest is higher now than ever before, we fear the same thing could happen again. The Commission we advocate would report back with its findings in early 1977, giving Congress the unique and compelling opportunity to act well in advance of the 1980 elections.

Whatever alternative system may be recommended by this Commission and adopted by Congress, we believe we can do much better than the present system. We also believe there is no more fitting effort we could undertake in this Bicentennial year than to try to improve one of the most fundamental elements of our democracy.

Mr. President, I yield.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon is recognized.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, I join with the Senator from Minnesota in cosponsoring this resolution and amendment of this bill.

Four years ago I introduced a bill, with several other Senators, to establish regional primaries. The bill had more editorial and academic support I think than any other bill that I have ever introduced. It had almost no opposition, except from those who preferred a national primary. And while a national primary is not my preference, it is an alternative to consider. The bill had one hearing, fell on deaf ears in the Senate and made no progress in the House of Representatives.

I have reintroduced it in each Congress since I first introduced it, and Congress has not acted.

As the Senator from Minnesota has said, if there is ever any time to pass a bill like this, one would think it would be at a time of heat and passion when we are in the midst of primaries, and I have frankly found that that is when there seems to be the most interest. About the time we get to the first of May, maybe the first of June, at the latest, the candidates who remain are tired. They have flown from New Hampshire to Florida to Illinois to California, in 1 day on occasion, making campaign speeches every place they go, being expected to sound rational. I think that kind of a schedule is training for the Olympics, but not training to be President. About that time there becomes a great hue and cry that we should do something to reform the primaries, but this is not the time to do it. Let us wait; it is too late now. Let us wait until this primary season is over and then in the cool and calm of 1973, was the last cry—now it is the cool and calm of 1977—let us look at this with dispassionate objectivity and pass a rational reform.

But then what inevitably happens is that as the ardor for this reform cools, as the primaries are over, and as the Presidential election is decided in November, this is put on a back shelf, nobody thinks about it, nobody is disturbed, and there is not much thought about it until the following primary season when again this issue bubbles to the top, is moved to the front burner about November of the year preceding the Presidential election year, and there is again great academic comment and editorial endorsement, but then it is too late to do anything for that Presidential year.

I, therefore, have joined the Senator from Minnesota in endorsing this idea of a commission which will report early, and I think that is a critical part of the amendment, in the hopes that this commission will come up with something that is preferable to the present hodgepodge Barnum and Bailey traveling sideshow we have that we call our Presidential primary system, and that we can find a rational way of selecting the nominees for our major and I might add minor parties, so that in 1980 we will not have to go through instead of 30 or 31 primaries, 35, 40, or 45 primaries throughout this Nation.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois is recognized.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from North Carolina for a unanimous-consent request.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that my legislative aide, Henry Poole, and the legislative aide of Senator NUNN, Gordon Griffin, be allowed floor privileges during the discussion and debate of the Federal election matter pending before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Virginia for the same purpose.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Phillip Reberger of my staff be granted privileges of the floor during consideration of the pending legislation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. President, a Presidential candidacy today triggers a thousand skirmishes, a welter of detail, a morass of regulation and dervish-like activity all largely beyond the control and comprehension of the exhausted candidate. Today's contender is pressured to compete in 30 State elections and hundreds of district elections and caucuses. He is forced to spend money in order to raise money in order to qualify for Federal election subsidies.

Then the strength of the Presidential candidates is measured by their bankrolls and the applause levels at joint appearances. The substance disappears from the hallowed American political system. Television offers episodes and spectacles; serious comment by serious figures on complex issues is ignored or misunderstood.

The press, exhausted and bewildered, is spread too thin by the profusion of candidates, and the public is hard put to fathom the significance of the episodes and spectacles that now pass for Presidential politics.

Mr. President, this process has demonstrated that it can eliminate men well qualified to occupy the Presidency and I count as one the senior Senator from Minnesota, (Mr. MONDALE) with whom I am privileged to cosponsor this amendment. This process has also demonstrated that it can eliminate, and it has, thoughtful men ill-suited for a process which subsists upon sensation. I cite former Governor Sanford. It has not demonstrated that it will produce only the wisest and strongest in America to occupy the Presidency. It could become a process which only the unfittest can survive.

This system, Mr. President, is not an exercise in American democracy. It is a taxpayer supported mockery of the system we profess to celebrate in 1976. If there is no better way than this, then the experiment begun 200 years ago could fail. There is a better way. We simply do not know what it is.

The commission proposed by this amendment would recommend better ways to select the American President. A myriad of possibilities exist. If created now, its recommendations would be available in time for action before the Presidential elections of 1980. If we wait, as the distinguished Senator from Minnesota and the distinguished Senator from Oregon mentioned, it could be too late.

Indeed, I would add to what they say that it could be awkward for a President produced by this process to support changes in it.

So, for all these reasons and those expressed by my colleagues, Mr. President, I urge the Members to approve this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GARN). Who yields time?

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I am pleased to support this amendment, and I congratulate the distinguished principal sponsors of the amendment for their foresight and wisdom in proposing it at this time.

I have long been a supporter of any reasonable effort to try to rationalize the Presidential nominee selection system. I have watched at close range for almost 10 years, as a Member of the Senate—and for somewhat longer as an interested observer of the general political process—and I believe that the adequacies of the present primary system and convention mechanism are fairly summarized by a remark that was made to me recently by one of our Democratic colleagues who was a candidate, who returned from the field of battle to say, "Howard, we simply can't continue having an election every Tuesday."

Mr. President, that is truly so. I think we are grinding up good men and women in the machinery of political combat at an unconscionable rate. We are placing burdens and demands on our leaders and potential leaders of the country that are beyond that which should be required of them, and which require no particular evidence of their future competence to serve in the positions to which they aspire.

Mr. President, I do not know the final answer; that is why I am glad that this proposal is for a commission. I have supported the early first utterances, I believe, of the distinguished junior Senator from Oregon, that we should try to figure out something, perhaps a regional primary system. But that has problems. For example, do you draw the lines for the regions north and south or do you cut a slice east and west and try to gather together States that are similar or States that are dissimilar? Good arguments could be made in both cases. Do you have a single national primary? In that case, do you have a runoff? Who pays the cost? What is the qualifying requirement? Perhaps you even call on Congress to participate in the selection of party nominees. That might very well strengthen the party responsibility and even the attractiveness of congressional service to party members. Perhaps you rejuvenate the electoral college. Perhaps that is the better way to choose the Vice President, in the case of a vacancy.

There are 100 variations on these and other things that suggest themselves in the debate that has been going on for a long time, at least the last decade, when I first began to hear the suggestions that we had to find a better way to select our respective nominees for President and Vice President for the two major political parties.

It is sometimes said, in an unkindly way, that Congress does nothing so well as trying to regulate politics and setting its own salaries. That really is not so. I do not think Congress is very good at either of these things, and I believe that is additional reason for constituting the commission to study and report to us on how we should proceed on this matter.

It is an extraordinarily important problem, Mr. President.

As some of my colleagues have heard me say from time to time, the importance and the relevance of the two-party system in the American scheme of things is often underrated or even overlooked. The two-party system is an instrumentality that came late to the Republic. It did not come to full flower, I believe, until well into the 19th century. It is not mentioned in the Constitution. It is not even memorialized in the statute law of the United States. The two-party system is unique in that it has served as the sensing mechanism by which the people of the country express the range of their desires and their dissent to the structures and the engines of Government. In that way, it becomes effectively the equivalent of a fourth department of Government, ranking in importance with the executive, the legislative, and the judiciary.

If that is true, and I believe it is true; if partisan politics is that important; if two-party politics is that unique and special in the American scheme of things; if it is essential, as I believe, to the sensing out and determining of the future policies of America, drawing on the collective genius of the people of this country—then it is also important that we modernize and update the method by which we select our nominees for President and Vice President.

I am not reluctant to say that I do not have the answers. I am in a position, however, to say that this is a step in the right direction.

I believe that a commission can do a good service for the country in this respect, and I look forward to their recommendations. I hope every much that the amendment will be adopted. I commend the Senator from Minnesota, the Senator from Oregon, the Senator from Illinois, and the Senator from Maryland for their cosponsorship.

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, I ask the distinguished Senator from Minnesota, the chief sponsor of this amendment, if he is willing to accept an addition providing for study to the extent to which laws in the Federal Election Campaign Act, as amended, promote or retard independent candidacies for election to the office of President.

Mr. MONDALE. Mr. President, I discussed this matter with the distinguished Senator from Maryland. I believe the modification makes good sense. It adds another subject for the Commission to study which surely is deserving of study. Therefore, I modify my amendment to add that section——

Mr. MATHIAS. It would be section 8, appearing on page 4.

Mr. MONDALE. I so modify my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is so modified.

The modification is as follows:

On page 4 add the following subsection (8) after line 14:

"(8) the extent to which State laws and the Federal Election Campaign Act, as amended, promote or retard independent candidacies for election to the office of President."

Mr. MONDALE. I also modify the amendment to add the following language on page 2, line 8, following the word "Senate":

On recommendation of the majority and minority leaders,

So that it would read:

Six members shall be appointed by the the President pro tempore of the Senate on the recommendation of the majority and minority leaders.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator send the modification to the desk?

Mr. MONDALE. I so modify my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is so modified.

The modification is as follows:

(1) six members shall be appointed by the President pro tempore of the Senate on recommendation of the majority and minority leaders, of whom at least two shall be Members of the Senate and at least two shall be elected or appointed State officials;

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, I find much merit to the amendment proposed by Senator MONDALE, for himself and others.

I believe that this type of study is long overdue. I have a question as to the size of the commission. A 20-member commission, with 12 members necessary to constitute a quorum, would indicate that it might be some kind of problem to get the commission together properly to study this matter. That would be my only question about it.

I also wondered to myself about the advisability of including it in this bill. I am sort of reluctant to see additional items go into the bill that might possibly give the President some reason to veto it; although I certainly hope he would not have any reason to veto this.

Mr. MONDALE. May I say that the President, at a recent session with reporters—I do not have his precise language—expressed interest in the establishment of a commission of this kind. So I believe it is probable that the President would not have an objection to this. We have tried to establish a way that gives him a strong appointive role in the selection of some of its members.

In terms of the timing of this amendment, what I am afraid of is this: We now have 30 primaries, each on different days, established, as the chairman of the committee well knows, with no sense of relationship at all. I think that, on June 8, there will be Presidential primaries in California, Ohio, and New Jersey on the same day. In the previous week, I think there are three other Presidential primaries. A candidate would need a supersonic jet and maybe Skylab to fly over all of them, let alone campaign in them and be understood by the voters in those States.

The system is beyond human proportions. It is no longer rational. No one knows that better than the distinguished chairman of the committee, who has spent much of his career in the Senate trying to make election laws work for the people of this country. This Commission is established in a way that I hope will help the committee prepare such reform measures as are needed before the next Presidential election in 1980. What I am afraid of is that if we do not act now, when practically everybody who has looked at the nomination system is crying out for reform, including the candidates, we shall do as we have done for the previous 200 years. Just come up to the next election, when it is too late for reform and go through the same crazy-quilt system that we see today.

I think this is a modest proposal. It has received very wide-ranging support from editorialists around the country. I know of no opposition to it. The President commented favorably about the need for such a commission a few weeks ago.

While I greatly sympathize with the chairman's desire not to load this bill down, I do not think this adds much, if any, weight to the burden that the bill carries. As a matter of fact, it may make it more attractive.

One point on the number of members: It was our desire here to make certain that the Commission was representative of the Senate, of the House, of State elected officials, of the two political parties, and of the general public, as seen by the Presidential appointments. I think the Commission will have no trouble getting a quorum because, based on the reaction we have had around the Nation, there is a tremendous amount of interest in getting down to the study of this matter.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, I would be willing to accept the amendment of the distinguished Senator. I think it is a good amendment, as I have said. I only had a question as to whether or not it should be in this bill, and the second question is the size of the Commission, which seems to be a bit unwieldy. But if the Senator tells me that is a proper size, I am willing to accept the amendment.

Mr. MONDALE. We do not need a rollcall.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. and Mr. PACKWOOD addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon is recognized.

Mr. PACKWOOD. I send an amendment to the desk that does not have a number, but I want to call it up. I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

On page 37, line 6, after "subject" insert the following: ", except that expenditures for any such communications which expressly advocate the election or defeat of a clearly identified candidate must be reported to the Commission in accordance with section 304(e)".

On page 37, line 10, after "families" insert the following: ", except that expenditures for any such nonpartisan registration and get-out-the-vote campaigns must be reported to the Commission under section 304(e)".

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, this amendment is designed to carry further the efforts at disclosure that have started in this Congress in the last few years. This is aimed both at business and at the unions. Under the present law, and under this bill, corporations are free to use corporate money to appeal to their shareholders or to their corporate officers and administrative personnel, and unions are free to use union money to communicate with their members—union dues; we are not talking about COPE dues here, or the voluntary contributions. We are talking about union money, dues. All this amendment does—and let us be frank about it—is require that corporations and unions, when they are using corporate money or union dues, file under section 304(e), which is the disclosure section of the present law, the expenditures when they use that money to—I read specifically the language—"expressly advocate the election or defeat of a clearly identified candidate" or—in the second part of the amendment—if they use the expenditures for "any such nonpartisan registration and get-out-the-vote campaigns."

Mr. President, the reason I am asking for this amendment is that we are all aware that corporate money and union money is used to solicit shareholders, to solicit administrative personnel in corporations, or union members in unions, to vote for or against particular candidates and, Mr. President, it is not reported; it is not identified. It is very easy for one candidate to say, "Oh, if I only had the money that my opponent had to spend," when that candidate making the charge may very well have been the recipient of hundreds of thousands of dollars worth of direct communications from corporations or from unions advocating defeat of the opponent of the person who made the statement.

I am not suggesting that this practice is good or bad. I am not suggesting the practice should be stopped or continued. All this amendment does is ask for disclosure.

Specifically, when a union mails out to its 200,000 or 300,000 or 400,000 members a 5- or 10-page brochure advocating the election or defeat of certain candidates, that should be disclosed. It does not even count against what used to be the candidate's limitation. That has even been stricken down. You can spend as much as you want. It just has to be disclosed. I think it is in keeping with the whole intent of this bill that we ask for public disclosure of those funds, whether they be corporate funds or whether they be union funds.

Again, I want to emphasize that I am not talking about the voluntary contributions that go to COPE from union members; I am not talking about the voluntary contributions that come from shareholders to a business political action fund. I am talking about the corporate money, I am talking about the union dues that are used to communicate with shareholders, administrative personnel, or, in the union case, with members.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. PACKWOOD. Yes, I yield.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I commend him for offering this amendment and I associate myself with it. I think many people will be surprised to learn that it is now legal for unions to use union money for political purposes and not disclose it and for corporations to do likewise. I think the assumption is that that cannot be done.

Mr. PACKWOOD. I think many people just think they cannot use union money, or they cannot use corporate money for politics, and they do not realize that what we on the inside are talking about is using it to influence third parties or nonmembers or nonshareholders. Even under this amendment, that can be done in a limited way.

But I think the Senator is right. Many people are totally unaware that a corporation which has 3,000 or 4,000 shareholders or unions with 4,000 members can use union dues to advocate the defeat or election of a candidate or use corporate money to advocate election or defeat of a candidate.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Now, of course, under the Supreme Court decision, in an unlimited way.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Absolutely unlimited, and both unlimited as to what the corporation or union wants to spend, and because there are no spending limits because of what the court has said, have as much as they want, and it is only fair if we are talking about an election is money buying the election. It is not just money that the candidate has, it is money that is spent on behalf of the candidate by a corporation, on behalf of a candidate by a union and, I think, at a minimum the people in this country, the voters of this country, are entitled to know how much money from whatever source is spent on behalf of or against a candidate.

Mr. President, I will yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, I feel that that precise requirement may be covered in the present proposal that we have reported from the committee.

The Senator has proposed a change on page 37, both of the changes.

If the Senator will go back to page 14 of the bill, and "person" is defined:

> Every person who makes contributions or expenditures expressly advocating the election or defeat of a clearly identified candidate, other than by contribution to a political committee or candidate, in an aggregate amount in excess of $100 within a calendar year shall file with the Commission, on a form prepared by the Commission, a statement containing the information required of a person who makes a contribution in excess of $100.

So I would just say to the Senator, I believe it is required in the law at the present time.

It was the intent to have it so required, and there is nothing that I find on page 37 that is contrary to that interpretation.

Now, (b)(1) was simply a definition, defining who a labor organization means, who is meant by a labor organization, and then goes on to refer to the exclusion of the communications by a corporation to its stockholders and its executive or administrative personnel and their families or by a labor organization which goes to members or families on any subject. So that it does not do away with any reporting requirements.

Mr. PACKWOOD. I might ask the distinguished chairman, that is the present law the Senator was reading from, is it not? That is the present law the Senator was reading from on pages 14 and 15 of the bill, is it not?

Mr. CANNON. Yes. Page 14 of the bill, S. 3065, section 304(e) of the act which is amended. I would have to check the present law and tell the Senator precisely.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Would the chairman do this: so long as the chairman and I are attempting to achieve the same end, would the chairman be willing to accept the same language, so long as the chairman says it is in the present law, if it is in the present law, and that no corporate committee or no union committee that was spending its own funds, dues and corporate money filed such a report in the last election?

Mr. CANNON. I would just note that the second part of the Senator's amendment—the first part is required, there appears to be no question about that, it is required now. The second part is not required where it says except that expenditures for any such nonpartisan registration and get-out-the-vote campaigns must be reported to the Commission under section 304(e). A nonpartisan drive, election drive, registration drive, has never been required to be reported and is not in the bill now.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Is the chairman aware of any reports that were filed in the last election, by either a corporate or a union committee spending funds for the purposes of advocating the defeat or election of a candidate that were filed in the 1974 elections?

Mr. CANNON. I do not have any information as to whether any were filed or not filed. I have never checked that particular thing, and I am not really aware of any election drives on the part of either to defeat a specifically identified candidate. There may have been. I just say I am not aware of any at the moment.

Mr. PACKWOOD. I will not in that case take any issue. I can get—I do not have them here, I have them in my office in Portland—many, many examples, more likely union than business—of union solicitations of members to vote for or against a candidate. They were numerous in the New Hampshire election in the last runoff campaign where unions were soliciting their members to vote for a particular candidate, and yet there would be no filing of this as money spent on behalf of a candidate when the filings are in.

Mr. CANNON. I just cannot say, I do not know whether any filings—I have not checked that so I cannot say. But I would say that under the law and under the bill we have reported to the Senate, if a person does make such on expenditure he would be required to file a report, but he would not be required to file in accordance with the second provision of the Senator's amendment where it is a nonpartisan registration drive on the part of either one.

Mr. PACKWOOD. I am advised, Mr. President, that under section 431(f)(4)(C) that unions and businesses are exempt from reporting under present laws in their solicitations of members while advocating the election or defeat of a candidate or money used in nonpartisan voter registration drives.

Mr. CANNON. Would the Senator give me the section reference again?

Mr. PACKWOOD. 431(f)(4)(C).

Mr. CANNON. I do not believe the Senator is correct. This is what it does not include. One, it does not include nonpartisan activity designed to encourage individuals to register to vote or to vote, and I already said that was not included.

> (C) Any communication by any membership organization or corporation to its members or stockholders if such membership organization or corporation is not organized primarily for the purpose of influencing the nomination for election or election of any person to Federal office.

Mr. PACKWOOD. They are exempt.

Mr. CANNON. They are exempt then, but if they are trying to elect or defeat someone for Federal office they are not exempt.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Will the Senator read that again. It says if they are organized for the principal purpose of not electing, is that not correct?

Mr. GRIFFIN. The Senator from Nevada is a better lawyer than that.

Mr. CANNON. If such membership organization or corporation is not organized primarily for the purpose of influencing the nomination for election or election of any person to Federal office.

Mr. GRIFFIN. A corporation is organized to make a profit, and a labor organization, a labor union, is organized to represent its members in collective bargaining and, therefore, they are exempt.

Mr. PACKWOOD. They are exempt from the reporting law.

Mr. GRIFFIN. So the amendment of the Senator from Oregon is needed and, as I understand it, this same amendment was offered by Representative WIGGINS over in the House of Representatives.

Mr. PACKWOOD. That is correct.

Mr. GRIFFIN. For the same purpose, and it was defeated over there on a close vote.

Mr. PACKWOOD. I think the chairman would have no objection to the amendment if what we are trying to do is simply do what the chairman says exists, although I think a reading of that law indicates they do not have to file and, indeed, they do not, and the chairman would be willing to accept the provisions of the amendment or at least the first part of it relating to the advocating defeat or election of candidates, specifically candidates.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, I would want to take a look at this. I think it is already covered.

I would say this to the Senator: If a corporation or a labor organization solicits the persons they are entitled to solicit for the defeat or election of a particular candidate, those funds should be reported as an independent expenditure. That is my intention.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Would the Senator say that again, they should be reported as a what?

Mr. CANNON. As an independent expenditure. In other words, the Supreme Court held there are no limitations on independent expenditures that can be made either for or against certain candidates.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Right.

Mr. CANNON. And we have required the reporting of those independent expenditures. I would say that my intent is—and I believe it is in the bill here that we have presented to the Senate—that those people should be required to report if they advocate the election or defeat of a known candidate.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Can I get the chairman's agreement on this, because I want to talk in addition about the voter registration?

Let us talk about advocacy of election or defeat for a moment.

Will the chairman agree to accept this amendment—and I will be willing to put it aside for a moment—if we find that present law does not require a corporation or a union using corporate funds or union dues—again, not talking about voluntary contributions—to communicate with their stockholders or administrative personnel, if the present law does not require them to report that as independent expenditures, that the chairman would accept an amendment that would make that correction?

Mr. CANNON. I would like to give some further study to it and then respond to the Senator. I want to be absolutely sure of what I am saying, as long as the Senator wants to talk on the other issue.

Mr. PACKWOOD. All right, I will talk on that a bit because I would like to vote eventually on that.

When talking about nonpartisan voter registration drives, especially as they are put on by corporations or by unions, they are nonpartisan only in the sense that they will register everybody in whatever party they want to register in.

They become very partisan in the sense of where one conducts the registration drive. Anybody who has been in the business of politics for 3 months soon learns there are certain areas that are heavily supportive of one's candidates and some heavily opposed.

In voter registration, one does the best he can to register them in the area that will support one, and ignore or give a very low priority to the area where voters will register and likely oppose one.

More often by unions than by business voter registration drives are conducted in areas that are likely to register overwhelmingly Democrat.

There are some exceptions with other organizations and I compliment such organizations as the League of Women Voters, quite often the various junior chambers of commerce around the country, who do conduct what I consider genuine nonpartisan voter registration drives.

But, by and large, unions or to a lesser extent, corporations, simply do not conduct them as openly, or too much toward the partisan voter to support their causes.

I think if that is the case, if money is going to be spent to register voters, that we know 70, 80, 90 percent are going to support the candidate of one's choice, that that is, indeed, an expenditure toward the election of that candidate or that party and that money should be revealed.

I am not asking it be stopped. I am not commenting on whether or not the practice is right or wrong. But I am suggesting that the public is entitled to know what money was spent, and where and when, to register certain voters. I do not think it is asking too much that the bill be amended in that respect.

Mr. President, I wonder if the chairman of the committee might yield for a question?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. PACKWOOD. I am reading now the present law under the definition of expenditure, and this is 431(f)(4)(C):

> Expenditure does not include (B) nonpartisan activity designed to encourage individuals to register to vote, or to vote;——

That is the second part of the amendment:

> (C) any communication by any membership organization or corporation to its members or stockholders, if such membership organization or corporation is not organized primarily for the purpose of influencing the nomination for election, or election, of any person to Federal office.

We have simply by the present law eliminated the definition of expenditure as including money spent by a union or corporation from its own funds to influence the outcome in an election. That explains why they have not reported, I think, under present law, even though we say any person, it does not mean who the person is. If we eliminate by definition expenditure of a corporation or use for this purpose, I think the amendment I offered would be enough, if we are going to achieve the purpose the chairman and I agree want to be achieved and requiring this to be reported as an expenditure.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, I do not agree with the Senator. I take it that is probably not the first time.

I am unalterably opposed to the second part because I think anything we do to discourage nonpartisan registration drives in this country today we are discouraging full participation in the voting process. We have done everything we could to try to encourage the nonpartisan election drives. We have the League of Women Voters who go out and work on a nonpartisan election drive. We have the labor people who go out. We have the corporation people who go out and urge their members to vote. If we are going to put a reporting requirement simply to spell out how much they spend in urging people to vote in nonpartisan election drives, I think we are subverting the intent of the act and I would oppose the intent of the act and I would be opposed to it. If the Senator wants to divide this, he might feel better about dividing it and having a vote on the issues spearately.

Mr. PACKWOOD. The chairman says subverting the intent of the act. Is not the intent disclosure? I am not saying they cannot do it.

Mr. CANNON. The intent is disclosure of the amount spent to elect a particular candidate or the amount spent to independently defeat a candidate. But to discourage people to register and vote is not the intent of this act.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Apart from this second part, does the chairman agree that at the moment corporations and unions do not have to report expenditures for or against a candidate so long as they limit it to communications with their members, shareholders or executive personnel?

Mr. CANNON. Yes; I believe that is right, under the present law. I am not sure that that is right under the bill that we have presented here.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Can the chairman tell me where in the bill this is rectified?

Mr. CANNON. Where we define person on page 14 and say:

Every person (other than a political committee or candidate) who makes contributions or expenditures expressly advocating the election or defeat of a clearly identified candidate, other than by contribution to a political committee or candidate, in an aggregate amount in excess of $100 within a calender year shall file with the Commission, on a form prepared by the Commission, a statement containing the information required of a person who makes a contribution in excess of $100 to a candidate or political committee and the information required of a candidate or political committee receiving such a contribution.

Mr. PACKWOOD. What happens when we get to section 431 and the expenditures for or against the candidate are simply not counted as an expenditure?

Mr. CANNON. But this is a different section and requires reporting under these conditions.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Where in this bill do we have a contradictory definition of expenditure from that in section 431, which is the controlling section on what must be reported? I might add to the chairman that on page 9 and page 10 of the bill the committee, starting with line 23 on page 9, has expanded the definition of expenditure and added a section 431 (c), added more exclusions to it. That is the definition section of the bill. But they have not changed this exclusion of expenditures for or against a political candidate made by a union with union funds or a corporation with corporate funds.

Mr. CANNON. Page 9 was a separate exclusionary item completely relating to the definition of whether or not legal and accounting services had to be counted as a contribution and had to be reported as a contribution. That was a change in the definition, that is true. It added a specific exemption to say:

This paragraph shall not apply in the case of legal or accounting services rendered to or on behalf of the national committee of a political party, other than services attributable to activities which directly further the election of a designated candidate or candidates to Federal office, nor shall this paragraph apply in the case of legal or accounting services rendered to or on behalf of a candidate or political committee solely for the purpose of insuring compliance with the provisions of this Act or chapter 95 or 96 of the Internal Revenue Code. . . .

Mr. PACKWOOD. But all the committee has done there is to slightly broaden the exemptions. I am not arguing with that. I am not arguing whether they are right or wrong. They have not changed the present exemption in 431(c). Then on pages 36 and 37 of the bill, again in defining the phrase "contribution or expenditure," "shall not include communications by a corporation to its stockholders and executive or administrative personnel and their families or by a labor organization to its members and their families or any subject."

Mr. CANNON. That is simply a definition of the phrase "contribution or expenditure."

Mr. PACKWOOD. That is my point.

Mr. CANNON. It says that a contribution or expenditure:

Shall not include communications by a corporation to its stockholders and executive or administrative personnel and their families or by a labor organization to its members and their families on any subject; nonpartisan registration and get-out-the-vote campaigns by a corporation aimed at its stockholders and executive or administrative personnel and their families, or by a labor organization aimed at its members and their families; or the establishment, administration, and solicitation of contributions to a separate segregated fund to be utilized for political purposes by a corporation or labor organization.

Mr. PACKWOOD. I think we are saying the same thing. It does not include for an expenditure any communication by a union to its members or any corporation to its shareholders or personnel. That is not an expenditure within the definition of this law, is that right, on any subject?

Mr. CANNON. That is not a contribution or expenditure within the definitions of the act on any subject within those parameters.

Mr. PACKWOOD. So that a corporation can spend corporate money to communicate with its shareholders and say, "Vote against Packwood," "Vote for Packwood," to its shareholders and it is not a definition of being an expenditure within the present law?

Mr. CANNON. I am sure a corporation would not do that.

Mr. PACKWOOD. But they can. There is no prohibition. Is that right?

Mr. CANNON. I think the Senator has raised a question there that opens up another part of the law. That is related to contributions. It might constitute an unlawful contribution on the part of a corporation, in violation of the criminal provisions of the code, if it in fact advocated the election or the defeat of a specific candidate under those conditions.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oregon yield to me on that point?

Mr. PACKWOOD. Yes, I yield.

Mr. GRIFFIN. If we look in our yellow books here, on page 49, where section 610 appears, which gives the provision that would be applicable, notice, at the bottom of page 49:

As used in this section, the phrase "contribution or expenditure" shall include—

So and so and so. Then, going over to page 50—

Mr. CANNON. The same language.

Mr. GRIFFIN. On page 50:

but shall not include communications by a corporation to its stockholders and their families or by a labor organization to its members and their families on any subject.

Mr. PACKWOOD. I think that is clear. It is not a criminal violation, and it is not civil violation.

Mr. GRIFFIN. And you do not have to report it.

Mr. PACKWOOD. It is unfortunately not a reportable expenditure. I almost wish I could stop it. I wish corporations could not give or unions could not give in this fashion, but at least, if it is going to be done, let us report it. Let us tell the public where the money came from and where the money went, and let it be reported.

I think the chairman was in agreement, because initially the chairman said it was in the law; but I think we are coming to the conclusion that it is not in the law; it is exempt from the criminal statutes, and I ask the chairman if he is willing to accept the amendment.

Mr. CANNON. Well, the Senator has it tied in with the nonpartisan registration and get-out-the-vote campaigns, in any event, and there is no way I would be willing to accept that.

Mr. PACKWOOD. If those two were not tied together, would the chairman accept it?

Mr. CANNON. I am not sure that I would, so we had just as well leave them there.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, I wish to amend my own amendment by striking out the latter part of it, which relates to nonpartisan registration and get-out-the-vote campaigns, which reads as follows:

On page 37, line 10, after "families" insert the following ", except that expenditures for any such nonpartisan registration and get-out-the-vote campaigns must be reported to the Commission under section 304(e)".

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is so modified.

Mr. PACKWOOD's amendment, as modified, is as follows:

On page 37, line 6, after "subject" insert the following: ", except that expenditures for any such communications which expressly advocate the election or defeat of a clearly identified candidate must be reported to the Commission in accordance with section 304 (e)".

Mr. PACKWOOD. Now we are talking only about corporation expenditures and union expenditures from corporate funds and union funds to elect or defeat a specific candidate. They are not now required to be reported under the law, and literally millions of dollars can be spent to support or defeat a candidate and the public will never be aware of it. Now we are talking about disclosure, just disclosure, and I do not see how the chairman or other Members of this body can oppose the amendment.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, I think the problem there is, what is a communication with its members? Certainly we have a provision in the law which makes it a criminal offense for a corporation to contribute to campaigns. I would think a communication advocating the election or defeat of a candidate could come within that provision.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Where do you draw that from, either the present criminal law or this bill, when it says a communication on any subject is not an expenditure?

Mr. CANNON. I just simply suggest that we have a vote on the Senator's amendment. I am not prepared to accept it.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Well, before we——

Mr. CANNON. I think that the law is such that a corporattion cannot legally make contributions to a candidate. We have gone through that exercise.

Mr. PACKWOOD. No, wait—do we—wait a minute. Can they give a name to their shareholders under present law?

Mr. CANNON. If a corporation makes a communication to its shareholders expressly advocating the election or defeat of a particular individual, I would say that would be a contribution that is in violation of the law.

Mr. PACKWOOD. And the same if a union uses union funds to make a contribution?

Mr. CANNON. If they use union funds. If we are talking about separate designated funds, that is a different proposition.

Mr. PACKWOOD. I am not talking about COPE funds. But I want to make sure that if the amendment fails, it is the position of the chairman that it is illegal under present law for a corporation to use corporate funds to mail or communicate to a shareholder or its executive or administrative personnel, and it is illegal under the present law for a union to communicate or mail to its members, in any event, anything advocating the election or defeat of a particular candidate. That is illegal?

Mr. CANNON. That is my understanding. That is the position that I would take, yes.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PACKWOOD. I yield.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I ask unimous consent that a vote occur on this amendment tomorrow at the hour of 11:45 a.m.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, what is the program for tomorrow morning? I might want to make some concluding remarks on this amendment, and I do not want to get shut off.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Could we perhaps agree to 10 minutes to a side?

Mr. PACKWOOD. If we could have 10 minutes to a side before the vote, that would be satisfactory.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. All right. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that at the hour of 11:25 a.m. tomorrow, there be a time limitation of 20 minutes on the amendment, to be equally divided between the Senator from Oregon (Mr. PACKWOOD) and the manager of the bill (Mr. CANNON), and that the vote occur on the amendment at 11:45 a.m.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR RECOGNITION OF SENATOR GOLDWATER ON THURSDAY

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that on Thursday, after the two leaders or their designees have been recognized under the standing order, the Senator from Arizona (Mr. GOLDWATER) be recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR ADJOURNMENT UNTIL 10:30 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate completes its business today, it stand in adjournment until the hour of 10:30 a.m. tomorrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR RECOGNITION OF SENATOR MANSFIELD, AND DESIGNATING A PERIOD FOR THE TRANSACTION OF ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS TOMORROW

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that after the orders which have already been entered for the recognition of Mr. CLARK and Mr. GOLDWATER tomorrow, the Senator from Montana (Mr. MANSFIELD) be recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes, and that there then be a period for the transaction of routine morning business of not to exceed 10 minutes, with statements therein limited to 5 minutes each.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I believe that would take us right up to the hour of 11:25 a.m.

I ask unanimous consent that the period for the transaction of routine morning business tomorrow not extend beyond the hour of 11:25 a.m.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Is there anything further for tonight?

ADJUSTMENT IN THE AMOUNT OF INTEREST PAID ON CERTAIN FUNDS

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate a message from the House of Representatives on S. 2619.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GARN) laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2619) to provide for adjusting the amount of interest paid on funds deposited with the Treasury of the United States by the Library of Congress Trust Fund Board, to strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert:

That section 2 of the Act of March 3, 1921, chapter 423, as renumbered by the Act of April 13, 1936, chapter 213 (2 U.S.C. 158), is amended by striking out "the rate of 4 per centum per annum," and inserting in place thereof "a rate which is the higher of the rate of 4 per centum per annum or a rate which is 0.25 percentage points less than a rate determined by the Secretary of the Treasury, taking into consideration the current average market yield on outstanding marketable obligations of the United States with remaining periods to maturity comparable to the average maturities of such investments, adjusted to the nearest one-eighth of 1 per centum".

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, I move that the Senate agree to the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 2619) with an amendment, as follows:

On page 1, line 10, of the House engrossed amendment, beginning with "marketable" strike out all through line 13 and insert the following: "long-term marketable obligations of the United States, adjusted to the nearest one-eighth of 1 per centum,'.".

This proposed amendment would remove the "average maturity" language from the House-reported measure and add language to assure the Library of Congress permanent loan fund (2 U.S.C. 158) of an interest rate equivalent to the rate on Treasury long-term marketable obligations. The Senate-passed companion measure, S. 2619, would have accomplished this, but would have required investment of the fund—a procedure which would be more cumbersome for the Library and which could limit the interest return to the fund should long-term rates rise.

Mr. President, this amendment has been recommended by the Department of the Treasury and has the approval of the Librarian of Congress.

Further, I have been advised that the Honorable LUCIEN N. NEDZI, Chairman of the Subcommittee on the Library and Memorials of the House Administration Committee, is aware of this proposed amendment and prepared to urge its adoption by the House of Representatives, thus hopefully obviating the necessity for a conference on S. 2619.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

On page 1, line 10, of the House engrossed amendment, beginning with "marketable" strike out all through line 13 and insert the following: "long-term marketable obligations of the United States, adjusted to the nearest one-eighth of 1 per centum,'.".

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the House amendment with an amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

ADJUSTMENT IN THE AMOUNT OF INTEREST PAID ON CERTAIN FUNDS

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate a message from the House of Representatives on S. 2620.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GARN) laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2620) to provide for adjusting the amount of interest paid on funds deposited with the Treasury of the United States pursuant to the act of August 20, 1912 (37 Stat. 319), to strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert:

That section 3 of the Act of August 20, 1912, chapter 309 (37 Stat. 319, 320), is amended to read as follows: "That in compliance with said conditions the principal of the sum so received and paid into the Treasury of the United States shall be credited on the books of the Treasury Department as a perpetual trust fund; and the sum of two thousand dollars, being equiva-tained the world economy for more than 30 years. The spirit of innovation and progress in our societies has no match anywhere, certainly none in societies laying claim to being "revolutionary." Rarely in history have alliances survived—let alone flourished—as ours have in vastly changing global and geopolitical conditions. The ideals of the industrial democracies give purpose to our efforts to improve relations with the East, to the dialogue with the third world and to many other spheres of common endeavor.

Our ties with the great industrial democracies are therefore not alliances of convenience but a union of principle in defense of values and a way of life.

CONCERN ABOUT RED ROLE

It is in this context that we must be concerned about the possibility of Communist parties coming to power—or sharing in power—in governments in NATO countries. Ultimately, the decision must, of course, be made by the voters of the countries concerned. But no one should expect that this question is not of concern to this Government. Whether some of the Communist parties in Western Europe are in fact independent of Moscow cannot be determined when their electoral self-interest so overwhelmingly coincides with their claims. Their internal procedures—their Leninist principles and dogmas—remain the antithesis of democratic parties. And were they to gain power they would do so after having advocated for decades programs and values detrimental to our traditional ties. By that record, they would inevitably give low priority to security and Western defense efforts, which are essential not only to Europe's freedom but to maintaining the world balance of power. They would be tempted to orient their economies to a much greater extent toward the East. We would have to expect that Western European governments in which Communists play a dominant role would, at best, steer their countries' policies toward the positions of the nonaligned. The political solidarity and collective defense of the West, and thus NATO, would be inevitably weakened, if not undermined. And in this country, the commitment of the American people to maintain the balance of power in Europe, justified though it might be on pragmatic, geopolitical grounds, would lack the moral base on which it has stood for 30 years.

We consider the unity of the great industrial democracies crucial to all we do in the world. For this reason we have sought to expand our cooperation to areas beyond our mutual defense—in improved political consultation; in coordinating our approaches to negotiations with the East; in reinforcing our respective economic policies; in developing a common energy policy; and in fashioning common approaches for the increasingly important dialogue with the developing nations. We have made remarkable progress in all these areas. We are determined to continue. Our foreign policy has no higher priority.

The challenges before us are monumental. But it is not every generation that is given the opportunity to shape a new international order. If the opportunity is missed, we shall live in a world of chaos and danger. If it is realized we will have entered an era of peace and progress and justice.

A NEED FOR UNITY

But we can realize our hopes only as a united people. Our challenge—and its solution—lies in ourselves. Our greatest foreign policy problem is our divisions at home. Our greatest foreign policy need is national cohesion and a return to the awareness that in foreign policy we are all engaged in a common national endeavor.

The world watches with amazement—our adversaries with glee and our friends with growing dismay—how America seems bent on eroding its influence and destroying its achievements in world affairs through an orgy of recrimination.

They see our policies in Africa, the eastern Mediterranean, in Latin America, in East-West relations—undermined by arbitrary congressional actions that may take decades to undo.

They see our intelligence system gravely damaged by unremitting, undiscriminating attack.

They see a country virtually incapable of behaving with the discretion that is indispensable for diplomacy.

They see revelations of malfeasance abroad on the part of American firms wreak grave damage on the political structures of friendly nations. Whatever wrongs were committed—reprehensible as they are—should be dealt with in a manner consistent with our own judicial procedures—and with the dignity of allied nations.

CHARGES ARE DANGEROUS

They see some critics suddenly pretending that the Soviets are 10 feet tall and that America, despite all the evidence to the contrary, is becoming a second-rate nation. They know these erroneous and reckless allegations to be dangerous, because they may, if continued, persuade allies and adversaries of our weakness, tempting the one to accommodation and the other to adventurism.

They see this Administration—which has been condemned by one set of critics for its vigorous reaction to expansionism in Southeast Asia, in the Middle East, in Africa—simultaneously charged by another group of opponents with permitting unilateral Soviet gains.

The American people see all this, too, and wonder when it will end. They know that we cannot escape either our responsibilities or the geopolitical realities of the world around us. For a great nation that does not manage events will soon be overwhelmed by them.

If one group of critics undermines arms control negotiations and cuts off the prospect of more constructive ties with the Soviet Union; while another group cuts away at our defense budgets and intelligence services and thwarts American resistance to Soviet adventurism, both combined will, whether they have intended it or not, end by wrecking the nation's ability to conduct a strong, creative, moderate and prudent foreign policy. The result will be paralysis, no matter who wins in November. And if America cannot act, others will, and we and all the free peoples of the world will pay the price.

UNPRECEDENTED CHALLENGES

So our problem is at once more complex and simpler than in times past. The challenges are unprecedented but the remedies are in our own hands. This Administration has confidence in the strength, resilience and vigor of America. If we summon the American spirit and restore our unity, we will have a decisive and positive impact on a world which, more than ever, affects our lives and cries out for our leadership.

Thise who have faith in America will tell the American people the truth:

That we are strong and at peace.

That there are no easy or final answers to our problems.

That we must conduct a long-term and responsible foreign policy, without escape and without respite.

That what is attainable at one moment will inevitably fall short of the ideal.

That the reach of our power and our purpose has its limits.

That nevertheless we have the strength and determination to defend our interests and the conviction to uphold our values.

And finally that we have the opportunity to leave our children a more cooperative, more just and more peaceful world than we found.

In the bicentennial year, we celebrate ideals which began to take shape around the shores of Massachusetts Bay some 350 years ago. We have accomplished great things as a united people. There is much yet to do. This country's work in the world is not a burden but a triumph—and the measure of greatness yet to come.

Americans have always made history rather than let history chart our course. We the present generation of Americans, will do no less. So let this year mark the end of our divisions. Let us usher in an era of national reconciliation and rededication by all Americans to their common destiny. Let us have a clear vision of what is before us—glory and danger alike—and go forward together to meet it.

KISSINGER ADDING TO FORD ALLURE

(By Louis Harris)

The attack by Ronald Reagan on President Ford's foreign policy is likely to backfire badly. The heart of the Reagan argument is that Secretary of State Henry Kissinger has been far too yielding in relations with the Russians and that the President is allowing the U.S. to drop to second place in military capability.

Since most Americans attribute the basic formulation of the Ford foreign policy to the secretary of State, the commanding fact politically is that Kissinger receives an impressive 58 to 37 per cent positive job rating from the public in the latest Harris Survey among a cross section of 1,512 adults. Even among conservatives, Kissinger is praised by a 58 to 38 per cent margin.

These figures suggest that Washington Sen. Henry Jackson [D.] who is also criticizing the secretary, may be making the same mistake as Reagan. Although Jackson might temporarily benefit by picking up the support of Kissinger critics in the primaries, he would find out quickly as the Democratic nominee that he had made a strategic blunder.

The continuing popularity of Kissinger is one of the real phenomena in current public opinion but the reason is not hard to find. For all the criticism in Congress, in the media, and in politics, a massive 68 to 28 per cent give Kissinger positive marks on "working for peace in the world."

This seems to be an article of faith among the American people, who do not see any other figure on the national scene in whom they have as much confidence in handling foreign policy.

On the basic issues of foreign policy, Kissinger receives the following positive ratings:

Relations with Russia: He is given a positive rating by a margin of 56 to 37 per cent.

Relations with China: Kissinger receives positive marks of 55 to 36 per cent.

Peace in the Middle East: Kissinger's standing is 56 to 37 per cent postive.

Relations with Western allies: He is given a positive rating of 50 to 39 per cent.

The 68 to 28 per cent rating on "working for peace" can be traced to the comparable majority who thinks Kissinger is the most effective negotiator this country has in world affairs and that the U.S. should try to work out agreements for peace rather than to back to confrontations.

Despite this highly positive public view of Kissinger, he is criticized in specific areas:

By 59 to 32 per cent, a majority takes him to task for his relations with Congress.

By 47 to 40 per cent, he received negative marks on his efforts to negotiate an arms-control agreement with the Soviet Union. This is a turnaround from last September, when a 49 to 38 per cent plurality gave him a positive job rating on SALT negotiations.

By 53 to 27 per cent, a majority criticizes

Kissinger for the way he handled United States involvement in the civil war in Angola.

By 56 to 27 per cent, a majority also gives him negative marks on the way he has cooperated with the congressional investigations of the CIA.

One of the assumptions of Reagan and Jackson in attacking President Ford and Kissinger is that there is widespread resentment, particularly among conservatives, over the failure of the United States to send more effective military aid to the forces opposing the Russian-backed faction in Angola.

Yet, this latest survey indicates that a 56 to 34 per cent majority of all adults and a 51 to 41 per cent majority of conservatives opposed that kind of U.S. aid.

In contrast, a 58 to 31 per cent majority supported the action by Congress in banning American aid to anti-Russian forces in Angola. An 86 to 6 per cent majority wanted the U.S. to try to negotiate a fair settlement that would bring the fighting to a halt. By the same token, however, 72 per cent were critical of the Soviets and Cubans for their action in Angola.

The Harris Survey asked a national cross-section of adults:

"How would you rate the job Secretary of State Henry Kissinger is doing—excellent, pretty good, only fair or poor?

[In percent]

	Positive	Negative	Not sure
February, 1976	58	37	5
November, 1975	60	33	7
September	63	31	6
May	56	37	7
March	68	26	6
December, 1974	75	19	6
July	79	15	6
May	85	10	5

The Harris Survey also asked:

"How would you rate the job Secretary of State Kissinger has done on [the following]—excellent, pretty good, only fair or poor?"

	Positive	Negative	Not sure
Working for peace in the world	68	28	4
Handling relations with Russia	56	37	7
Working to achieve lasting peace in the Middle East	56	37	7
Handling relations with China	55	36	9
Handling relations with our Western allies	50	39	11
Negotiating arms control agreements with the Russians	40	47	13
Handling relations with Congress	32	59	9
Handling civil war in Angola	27	53	20
Cooperating with the investigations of the CIA	27	56	17

Although obviously controversial, Kissinger maintains solidly positive marks, on the basics of foreign policy. As such, he is proving to be a valuable asset to President Ford, especially when opposition such as Reagan and Jackson try to get votes by attacking the administration's foreign policy.

A ST. PATRICK'S DAY BIRTHDAY FOR SENATOR PASTORE

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, today is an auspicious occasion, both to the Irish and to the Italians.

For today is not only St. Patrick's Day, a day of some conspicuous celebration among our Irish citizens, but today is the 69th birthday of my esteemed colleague and friend from Rhode Island, Senator JOHN PASTORE.

It is very appropriate that Senator PASTORE's birthday falls on St. Patrick's Day, Mr. President, for I have it on very reliable historical information that in truth St. Patrick, who drove the snakes from the Emerald Isle, was really an Italian.

Of course, no one is ever positive in matters of history. However, I recall what a writer once said, "that Ireland is a country in which the probable never happens and the impossible always does." Thus, this predilection for the improbable further persuades me that, in truth, St. Patrick was really an Italian, however improbable that may seem to my Irish friends.

I cannot prove that Senator PASTORE's ancestor, nor mine from the environs of Lucca, in northern Italy, were related to this famous St. Patrick. But, no doubt this Patricio came from a fine family and, like Senator PASTORE, dedicated himself to doing good deeds. He saw the snake-infested isle to the north and went there on a mission of mercy.

That he succeeded we all know. I also wish to note, Mr. President, that Senator PASTORE has succeeded. His wit, ability, and tenacity have been valuable assets in this body. He has fought for what he believed to be right and necessary and he has never failed to make his points cogently and forthrightly. I am most pleased for him that he has seen another season come as he nears the proverbial three score and ten.

My only regret is that because he has decided that this will be his last term, I will be left as the only Italian American in the U.S. Senate. I alone will have to bear the burden each St. Patrick's Day of setting the historical record straight. In the memory of Senator PASTORE I will do my best, if my Irish colleagues do not gang up on me in my aloneness.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

CONCLUSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time for morning business has expired.

FEDERAL ELECTION CAMPAIGN ACT AMENDMENTS OF 1976

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the hour of 11:25 a.m. having arrived, the Senate will resume the consideration of the unfinished business, S. 3065, which the clerk will state.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 3065) to amend the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971 to provide for its administration by a Federal Election Commission appointed in accordance with the requirements of the Constitution, and for other purposes.

AMENDMENT NO. 1445

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is on agreeing to the amendment (No. 1445) of the Senator from Oregon (Mr. PACKWOOD).

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, I yield myself 3 minutes.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CANNON. I yield.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the 20 minutes begin running now, and that the vote on this amendment occur at 10 minutes until 12.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, in light of my colloquy with Senator PACKWOOD yesterday, I have reviewed the legislative history of the existing section 610 exemptions to the overall prohibitions against contributions and expenditures by corporations and labor unions.

The explanation in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD by the sponsor of the statutory language in question, Representative Orville Hansen, and the Supreme Court's decision in Pipefitters v. United States, 407 U.S. 385 have convinced me that section 610 is intended to permit corporations and unions to advise their stockholders and members of the organization's support of or opposition to a candidate. I quote from a portion of Representative Hansen's remarks from 17 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD H11478:

Every organization should be allowed to take the steps necessary for its growth and survival. There is, of course, no need to belabor the point that Government policies profoundly affect both business and labor . . . If an organization, whether it be the NAM, the AMA or the AFL–CIO, believes that certain candidates pose a threat to its well-being or the well-being of its members or stockholders, it should be able to get its views to those members or stockholders. As fiduciaries for their members and stockholders, the officers of these institutions have a duty to share their informed insights on all issues affecting their institution with their constituents. Both union members and stockholders have the right to expect this expert guidance

Since such communications are of a privileged nature, because of first amendment considerations, the present law completely excepts them from the disclosure and limitation requirements of the act. These exceptions apply to every type of membership organization under section 431(f)(4)(c) of title 2 of the United States Code and section 591(f)(4) of title 18.

The Packwood amendment would alter this first amendment exception from the act. An analogous attempt to require disclosure in similar circumstances was made in a House amendment contained in the 1974 act—section 437 of title 2 of the United States Code. That provision was declared unconstitutional by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit in Buckley against Valeo. The decision on this point is so persuasive that no appeal was taken. I submit that the amendment proposed by Senator PACKWOOD would also infringe on constitutionally protected rights and should not be adopted.

The Buckley against Valeo case is the case that went on to the Supreme Court on other issues, and the Supreme Court held unconstitutional some of the other provisions, but this particular provision did not go beyond the circuit court of appeals.

So I wanted to make that explanation in light of my colloquy yesterday with Senator PACKWOOD when I told him what my view was of the requirements of the law.

Mr. President, I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. BROCK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield me 2 minutes?

Mr. PACKWOOD. Yes, I yield the Senator 2 minutes.

Mr. BROCK. Mr. President, it is patently ridiculous to say that this disclosure amendment is unconstitutional. That represents something or other. I cannot quite describe it. I am so awed by the exercise of logic or illogic involved in this particular presentation. The Packwood amendment is by no definition unconstitutional. As a matter of fact, the Packwood amendment affects section 301 of the bill, and any disclosure requirement that the Senator referred to would be under section 321. We do not even try to change that.

All we are saying, in the Packwood amendment, is, if a corporation is going to use corporate money to support a candidate, doggone it, it ought to tell us about it. We have a right to know. The American people have a right to know. By what conceivable logic can we say that that is something that can be hidden from the American people?

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question at this time?

Mr. BROCK. Not on my time. I do not have the time.

Mr. FORD. I do not have any time either. I wish to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. BROCK. Mr. President, if the Senator from Nevada will yield, I shall be delighted to respond.

Mr. FORD. I shall ask the question quickly.

Mr. CANNON. I yield 1 minute to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. FORD. Let me ask the Senator from Tennessee this question as to his interpretation now of the disclosure. If there is a threat to the voting record of one of us in the Chamber, is that part of the expenditure for the disclosure?

Mr. BROCK. No.

Mr. FORD. The Senator was talking about the Farm Bureau would be required to disclose. Are we able to require disclosure under this amendment?

Mr. BROCK. I commend to the Senator the amendment. If the Senator will take the time to read it, he will find out that it applies to corporations and labor unions; it does not apply to voting record.

Mr. FORD. The Farm Bureau is incorporated, and they have no stockholders.

Mr. BROCK. Is the Senator going to allow me to answer the question? The Senator asked the question. I am delighted to answer it.

The amendment is very precise in saying that it must identify and support specifically a clearly identified candidate.

Mr. FORD. Would it indirectly be supporting a candidate if it revealed the voting record?

Mr. BROCK. If they are using it in a favorable light, supporting him——

Mr. FORD. If it were in an unfavorable light?

Mr. BROCK. Why should they not disclose it? What are we trying to hide? What is anyone afraid of if we have disclosure?

Mr. FORD. That is so if the Senator is referring to business corporations, but he forgets about those rural area people who are incorporated. The Farm Bureau is incorporated.

Mr. BROCK. Every Farm Bureau man who I know is proud of his convictions and have nothing to hide. As far as I am concerned he would not be apologetic in what he might say.

Mr. FORD. The Senator is imposing another hazard on them.

I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. BROCK. No, I am not. I am saying we should not have a cop-out?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The 1 minute that has been yielded by the Senator from Nevada has expired.

Who yields time?

Mr. BROCK. Mr. President, I still have part of my 2 minutes remaining, do I not?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has a minute remaining.

Mr. BROCK. Let me continue then by saying, as I started out, that there is no possible way one can say to me that there is justification for hiding contributions in this country any more. Have we not learned? Where have we been? What is the lesson of our experience of the last 4 years, that we are not going to let the American people know what is going on?

If there is one single element in the whole reform movement, it is disclosure, disclosure, disclosure. There is nothing else that counts. If the American people know what is going on, they are intelligent enough to make a rational judgment. But we must not hide from them what is being done on behalf of a candidate, and that is solely within the law today, unless we pass this amendment, and every Member of this body knows it. There is no constitutional question here. It is a matter of honesty in disclosure.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, I yield myself 1 additional minute simply to point out that the Senator has completely misstated the case. He referred again to contributions. A corporation or labor union cannot make a contribution from either corporation funds or labor union dues, and it is not a disclosure of a contribution. The contribution is required to be fully disclosed, fully reported in connection with a committee that is organized pursuant to the law to make a contribution to candidates or to political parties.

Now that is covered completely, separate and apart, from this precise first amendment provision which relates to the right of a corporation or a union to communicate with its stockholders.

Mr. President, I yield 1 minute to the Senator from California.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, the Packwood amendment applies to any membership organization, in effect. It represents, in my view, a dangerous Federal intrusion into the internal affairs not only of corporations and labor unions but of all membership organizations which may communicate political endorsements or opinions to their members—organizations like Common Cause, which don't endorse candidates; organizations like the Americans for Democratic Action and Americans for Constitutional Action, which on the other hand do endorse candidates, the Environmental Defense Fund, and the Sierra Club.

I see no reason why the costs of such internal communications are any business of the Federal Government, and I approach this from a conservative point of view about whether Government has a right to intrude to that degree into the affairs of private organizations.

The fact that an endorsement has been made is certainly no secret. There is nothing about disclosure involved here.

Mr. President, may I have yielded to me one additional minute?

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, I yield one additional minute to the Senator from California.

Mr. CRANSTON. Certainly the public has no difficulty in finding out whom labor unions support, whom corporations support, or whom other organizations support. But to subject the internal communciations of a membership organization with its members to disclosure requirements—to open their internal operations to audit by Federal authorities seeking to find discrepancies—clearly infringes on our basic rights of free speech and free expression. Volunteer citizens organizations formed for the purpose of lobbying the Government should be subjected to the absolute minimum of Government regulation.

I urge our colleagues to defeat the Packwood amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield a minute or two to me?

Mr. CANNON. I yield 2 minutes to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I want to raise the question that Senators FORD and CRANSTON raised, and I would like to have an answer. Are all organizations included in the Packwood amendment, or is it simply labor organizations and corporations? Are such organizations as the Farm Bureau, if they are not incorporated, or the Sierra Club, or Common Cause covered? Is that the interpretation of the amendment of the Senator?

Mr. PACKWOOD. No.

I was talking with Fred Wertheimer, who is with Common Cause, last night on the telephone. He suggested perhaps this amendment ought to be changed to include the right to have the National Rifle Association —

Mr. CLARK. Does it?

Mr. PACKWOOD. Wait a minute.

Fred Wertheimer was in my office this morning. He said:

No, I changed my mind. I don't think we ought to do it this time. We ought to continue to limit it at the moment to corporations and unions.

This amendment amends section 610. It does not apply to any other organization but unions and corporations.

Mr. CLARK. I am not interested so much in the telephone conversation as in whether that is all that is covered. Does the Senator mean to say that the League of Conservation Voters, under this amendment, may actually send out communications and say that Senator PACKWOOD ought to be defeated, or ought to be supported, and not fall under the requirements of this amendment?

Mr. PACKWOOD. They can do that now.

Mr. CLARK. I understand that. But the Senator is going to say that corporations and labor unions may not do that, but any other membership organization in the country may do it?

Mr. PACKWOOD. No, we are not saying they cannot do it. This amendment does not stop it.

Mr. GRIFFIN. If the Senator will vote for this amendment, there could be another amendment later to expand on the principle.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired. Who yields time?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield me a minute or two?

Mr. PACKWOOD. I yield.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, I should like to go back to the question that was raised yesterday. I wish to address a question to the distinguished chairman of the committee.

Can we agree now that under existing law corporations can use corporate funds and unions can use union funds, including funds obtained from union dues, to communicate with their stockholders or members, as the case may be, for the purpose of advocating the election or defeat of particular candidates; that this can be done legally, without limitation, and that they do not have to report it? Let us get an answer to that.

Mr. CANNON. Yes. The Senator is correct.

I answered that yesterday, that I did not think they could do it.

I have since reviewed the Pipefitters' case and the Supreme Court decision, the language in the U.S. Supreme Court reports, and I am convinced that a corporation and a union are allowed to communicate freely with members and stockholders on any subject, to attempt to convince members and stockholders to register and vote, and make political contributions and expenditures, financed by voluntary donations which have been kept in a separate, segregated fund, and that they can express an opinion, under the first amendment, as to whether a candidate should be defeated or rejected.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, now that we have that point clear —

Mr. CANNON. To their members only.

Mr. GRIFFIN. It seems to me that the remainder of the provisions of the law requiring disclosure as to campaign expenditures are somewhat meaningless, if a labor organization can spend without limit, and without reporting, to support or defeat a candidate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's 2 minutes have expired.

Mr. PACKWOOD. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee this question.

Yesterday, when Senator CANNON and I were debating, he said:

I would say this to the Senator: If a corporation or a labor organization solicits the persons they are entitled to solicit for the defeat or election of a particular candidate, those funds should be reported as an independent expenditure. That is my intention.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Would the Senator say that again, they should be reported as a what?

Mr. CANNON. As an independent expenditure.

Then he said:

those people should be required to report if they advocate the election or defeat of a known candidate . . .

The intent is disclosure of the amount spent to elect a particular candidate or the amount spent to independently defeat a candidate.

Is that still the chairman's position?

Mr. CANNON. I said yesterday that that was my position. It was then. It is not now, since I have had the opportunity to review the Supreme Court decision. I am bound by the Supreme Court, the same as the Senator is, and I do not believe that such a limitation could be imposed. That was my feeling at the time. It would be my feeling now. But I cannot support that position in light of the Court's decision in the pipefitters' case and in light of the history that is stated on this matter in the U.S. Supreme Court reports.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Senator CANNON has admitted being wrong yesterday and he is wrong today. Let me read from the case we are talking about:

There has been discussion that the proposed amendment is unconstiutional since it is similar to the so-called "Common Cause" disclosure requirement, Section 437(a) of the 1974 Amendment, which was held unconstitutional by the District of Columbia Court of Appeals and was not appealed to the Supreme Court. The instant amendment is clearly distinguishable. Section 437(a) required the disclosure of not only the amount expended by any person other than an individual but also required the disclosure of the persons who contributed monies to the group or committee which made the expenditures for the purpose of influencing the outcome of a Federal election. The Court of Appeals found that this disclosure requirement failed to conform to the necessary standards of certainty which must be followed in order to abridge an individual or group's association rights and therefore, disclosed that it was unconstitutionally vague. The proposed Amendment violates none of the Constitutional requirements.

We are not requiring in this amendment that a single contribution to that organization be disclosed, or any other expenditures, just the expenditures they make for politics.

If Johnny Jones, of Dufur, Oreg., is a candidate for office, he has to report it, under the rules. The AFL–CIO or General Motors, today, who spend a million dollars of union dues or corporate treasury money, do not have to report it.

What has happened between yesterday and today is that pressure has been brought on the Senate. The unions want to spend millions of dollars and not report a single dollar of it to the American public, so that we cannot identify where the money came from.

We are not talking about constitutionality. We are talking about power, raw power, and everybody in this Chamber knows it.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, I yield myself 10 seconds.

We are not talking about contributions. A union or a corporation cannot make contributions now. It is illegal.

I yield 1 minute to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, Senator PACKWOOD made the point on the floor of the Senate yesterday that only corporations and labor unions are permitted to communicate with their stockholders or members without disclosure. Such is not the case. As I tried to indicate before, this is not a loophole for corporations or labor unions. No organization may be required to disclose that activity, as explained very clearly in the act itself—431(f)(4)(C).

Of course, the amendment applies only to corporations and labor unions, and that is why the distinguished Senator from Michigan is quite right in saying that this amendment deals only with them. Indeed, what we find here is that if this amendment is agreed to, any organization, any membership organization, may advocate the defeat or success of a candidate without restriction, without a reporting requirement, except for labor unions and corporations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired. Who yields time?

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, how much time remains?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. One minute to the Senator from Nevada, and 3 minutes to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. CANNON. I reserve the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time? If neither side yields time, time runs equally.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, in the 2 minutes I have remaining, let us put the clear points before the Senate once more.

This amendment applies to corporations and unions, and they must disclose where they spend their money. I would be happy to entertain an amendment by the Senator from Iowa or anybody else to have them disclose where they spend their money politically. The whole subject of this issue is disclosure. If this loophole is allowed to remain, if General Motors can spend a half million dollars of their corporate treasury money to advocate the defeat or election of a candidate, or if the AFL-CIO can do the same, while Johnny Jones, in Dufur, Oreg., has to report the expenditure of $100 that he spends independently, we have created the biggest single loophole that exists in the law.

It will be a loophole big enough to drive every candidate through; and he can run his campaign on what appears to be $10,000 while millions are spent on his behalf which are never reported. If there is any fairness or equity, then everything that is spent on behalf of a candidate, whether it comes through the candidate's committee or is spent on his behalf by any other committee, should be reported, so that the voters can look at it before the election.

Mr. President, how much time do I have remaining?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has 1 minute.

Mr. PACKWOOD. I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time has been yielded back.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Oregon. On this question the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. CHURCH (when his name was called). Present.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I announce that the Senator from Indiana (Mr. HARTKE), the Senator from Washington (Mr. JACKSON), the Senator from South Dakota (Mr. MCGOVERN), the Senator from Rhode Island (Mr. PASTORE), and the Senator from Utah (Mr. Moss) are necessarily absent.

AMENDMENT NO. 1446

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEAHY). Under the previous order, the Senate will now resume consideration of the amendment of the Senator from Alabama (Mr. ALLEN) No. 1446.

The Senate will be in order and the clerk will report.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Alabama (Mr. ALLEN) proposes an amendment No. 1446: On page 27, between lines 5 and 6, insert the following new section:

USE OF REGULATIONS, ADVISORY OPINIONS, AND SO FORTH IN CIVIL AND CRIMINAL ENFORCEMENT

SEC. 109A. Section 315 of the Act (2 U.S.C. 438), as redesignated by section 105 of this Act, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(e) In any proceeding, including any civil or criminal enforcement proceeding against any person charged with violating any provision of this title or of title 18, no rule, regulation, guideline, advisory opinion, opinion of counsel, or any other pronouncement by the Commission or any member, officer, or employee thereof shall be used against any person, either as having the force of law, as creating any presumption of violation or of criminal intent, or as admissible in evidence against such person, or in any other manner whatsoever.".

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alabama yield to me for a minute?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEAHY). May we have order in the Senate so that the Senator from New York can be heard?

Order in the Senate and in the galleries.

The Senator from New York.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Charles Warren of my staff be granted privilege of the floor during consideration of this measure.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. JAVITS. I thank my colleague.

Mr. BAYH. If the Senator from Alabama will yield, I ask unanimous consent that Barbara Dixon of my staff be granted privilege of the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAYH. Mr. President, with deep gratitude to the distinguished Senator from Alabama, I ask unanimous consent to add the name of Herb Jolovitz of the distinguished junior Senator from Vermont's office, as well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thanks the Senator.

Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senator from Alabama.

Mr. ALLEN. May we have order, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate is not in order. The Senator from Alabama has a right to be heard. I ask that the Senate be in order. Senators having conversations, the Chair respectfully requests that they conduct them in the cloak rooms or off the floor. The galleries will also be in order.

The Senator from Alabama.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, my attention was drawn to the need for this amendment by a letter from Honorable Brice M. Clagett of the firm of Covington & Burling here in Washington. He wrote Mrs. MARJORIE S. HOLT, sending me a copy. She is a member of the House and on the House Administration Committee where this bill, or a similar bill, was pending.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate is not in order. The Chair is having difficulty hearing the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I have been requested to yield to the distinguished majority leader in order that the Senate may go over to the House Chamber for a joint meeting.

I ask unanimous consent that I may yield to the distinguished majority leader and that I have the floor on the return of the Senate to the Senate Chamber.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senator from Montana.

JOINT MEETING OF THE TWO HOUSES—ADDRESS BY THE PRIME MINISTER OF THE REPUBLIC OF IRELAND

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, on that basis, I move that the Senate stand in recess subject to the order granted to the distinguished assistant majority leader on yesterday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Thereupon, the Senate at 12:14 p.m. took a recess, subject to the call of the Chair, and the Senate, preceded by the Assistant Secretary of the Senate, Darrell St. Claire, the Sergeant at Arms, F. Nordy Hoffmann, and the President Pro Tempore, JAMES O. EASTLAND, proceeded to the Hall of the House of Representatives to hear an address by the Prime Minister of the Republic of Ireland.

(The address delivered by the Prime Minister of the Republic of Ireland to the joint meeting of the two Houses of Congress is printed in the proceedings of the House of Representatives in today's RECORD.)

At 1:26 p.m., the Senate, having returned to its Chamber, reassembled, and was called to order by the Presiding Officer (Mr. GLENN).

FEDERAL ELECTION CAMPAIGN ACT AMENDMENTS OF 1976

The Senate continued with the consideration of the bill (S. 3065) to amend the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971 to provide for its administration by a Federal Election Commission appointed in accordance with the requirements of the Constitution, and for other purposes.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alabama who has the floor yield to me for a few minutes?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes, I am happy to yield to the Senator.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Just to clear up a situation which developed yesterday.

Mr. President, may I say I discussed this with the distinguished Republican whip who has been the acting manager of this bill and he gave it his approval.

Now I would like to call it to the attention of the distinguished manager of the bill and the distinguished Senator from Alabama, Mr. ALLEN, a member of the committee, and the distinguished Senator from West Virginia, Mr. BYRD, who is also a member of the committee.

Mr. President, if I may, I should like to address one further question to the distinguished chairman of the Rules Committee pursuant to our colloquy on yesterday. I would like to restate my present understanding of the chairman's interpretation regarding the role of the Senate's ex officio member of the Federal Election Commission, that is, the Secretary of the Senate.

Would the Senator agree that the ex officio member for the Senate serves on the Commission, irrespective of his party affiliation, in connection with Senate campaign matters which come within the purview of the Commission and that the law permits the Secretary to advise with, discuss, question and, except for the right to vote, participate fully in the proceedings of the Commission in this respect?

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, I say to the distinguished majority leader that if the bill that we have proposed here is passed in its present form, my answer would be "Yes" to his inquiry.

Mr. MANSFIELD. And what about the bill which is already on the books? This question was not raised by the Supreme Court, as the Senator recalls.

Mr. CANNON. Yes, the question was not raised before the Supreme Court. The Court did not rule on that precise point and I say that the answer would be the same because under the original bill which we passed earlier and which the Supreme Court ruled on, the Secretary of the Senate was an ex officio member of the commission, without the right to vote.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I appreciate that.

May I ask the opinion of the acting minority manager of the bill in response to the question I have raised?

Mr. GRIFFIN. In response to the distinguished majority leader's inquiry, I believe he has stated the committee's intent, as I understand it.

I think it ought to be acknowledged, however, that some question has been raised about the constitutionality of inclusion of the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House as participating but nonvoting members of the Commission. The Supreme Court did not rule directly on that point.

I think it is the view of the committee that, to the extent of constitutionality, it is expected that the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives would be participating but nonvoting members of the Commission.

Does that answer the Senator's question?

Mr. MANSFIELD. Yes. I take it that the acting Republican leader, in effect, says what the manager of the bill has said. That is, that this is what the Senate intended, no question has been raised concerning its constitutionality, and it is applicable under the law as it is now in effect.

Mr. GRIFFIN. In my view, that is correct in terms of the intent of the Senate.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Yes.

I wish to ask the distinguished Senator from Alabama to render an opinion on this matter.

Mr. ALLEN. I think that was the intent of the committee in drafting the bill, that the Secretary of the Senate should serve as an ex officio, nonvoting member of the Commission, but would have full right to advise with the Commission and to participate in any discussion or in any matter coming before the Commission; to give his advice, arising from his expertise in this area, but not to have the right to cast a vote.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I appreciate the statement of the distinguished Senator from Alabama, the statement of the distinguished manager of the bill, the Senator from Nevada (Mr. CANNON), and the distinguished Senator from Michigan, the acting manager of the bill now under consideration.

I thank the Senator from Alabama for allowing me to intercede.

Mr. MANSFIELD subsequently said:

I have had a colloquy with various members of the Committee on Rules and Administration relative to the position of the ex officio member of the Senate. Since that time, I have contacted Senators HATFIELD, SCOTT, BYRD, WILLIAMS, PELL, and CLARK. I want the record to show that they all answered in the affirmative and approved of the position taken by the manager of the bill, the Senator from Nevada (Mr. CANNON), the acting Republican leader at that time and the minority manager of the bill (Mr. GRIFFIN), and the distinguished Senator from Alabama (Mr. ALLEN) all of whom spoke at that time.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, in view of the fact that many of the Senators following the joint session went to lunch, I would like to have the opportunity to discuss this amendment before somewhat more Members than present in the Chamber at this time. I would at this time suggest the absence of a quorum until a larger number of Senators are present in the Chamber.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

RECESS UNTIL 2 P.M.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I move that the Senate stand in recess until the hour of 2 p.m. today.

There being no objection, the Senate, at 1:34 p.m., recessed until 2 p.m.; whereupon, the Senate reassembled when called to order by the Presiding Officer (Mr. FANNIN).

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What is the will of the Senate?

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The second assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment. All in favor signify by saying "Aye."

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD addressed the Chair.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The second assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I ask the clerk to state the amendment again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

On page 27, between lines 5 and 6, insert the following new section:

USE OF REGULATIONS, ADVISORY OPINIONS, AND SO FORTH IN CIVIL AND CRIMINAL ENFORCEMENT

SEC. 109A. Section 315 of the Act (2 U.S.C. 438), as redesignated by section 105 of this Act, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(e) In any proceeding, including any civil or criminal enforcement proceeding against any person charged with violating any provision of this title or of title 18, no rule, regulation, guideline, advisory opinion, opinion of counsel, or any other pronouncement by the Commission or any member, officer, or employee thereof shall be used against any person, either as having the force of law, as creating any presumption of violation or of criminal intent, or as admissible in evidence against such person, or in any other manner whatsoever.".

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, my attention was called to the need for this amendment by the Hon. Bryce M. Clagett, who was the chief attorney for the firm of Covington and Burling in the Supreme Court case of Buckley against Valeo. He called my attention to the fact that, without this amendment, the Election Commission's power to make rules and regulations creates a prior restraint on political expression. Citizens who disagree with the Commission about the meaning of the law would generally not dare to act on that disagreement, since the very fact that the Commission has spoken will prejudice their position in enforcement litigation. The Supreme Court, of course, has recognized that first amendment rights are involved in political spending. With a statute as complex and vague as the campaign spending law, I think it is unconstitutional for an agency such as the Commission to have vast discretionary power over political expression. The Supreme Court found it unnecessary to decide that question, since it invalidated the Commission's powers on other grounds, but if the Commission is reconstituted without solving this problem, months and perhaps years of further uncertainty and litigation will be necessary. Mr. Clagett suggests that the solution is quite simple. He suggests the amendment which I have introduced.

Here, Mr. President, we have a case of prior restraint under the existing law and under the law as provided by the bill. We have a case of prior restraint on the exercise of first amendment rights because, if the Commission says that its interpretation of the law is thus and so, that would put a chilling effect—a chilling, negative effect—on any person acting contrary to the Commission's statement of its view of the law. This amendment would provide that in any civil or criminal action arising under the Federal Election bill, the controlling factor would be the law, what the statute says; not what the Commission says the law is, but what is the law.

If a person wishes to go contrary to the Commission's statement of its concept of the law, if he wishes to take his chances that his view of the law is correct, then he would have a right to act contrary to what the Commission says the laws is. Then, in a proceeding against him, the Commission's rule or regulation or interpretation would not have the force of law in the proceedings against him.

What would have the force of law, then? The statute itself. Without this amendment, we are going to leave this important constitutional question still up in the air.

Why was it not decided, then, in the Buckley against Valeo case? Well, the appellate courts do not decide any question that they do not have to decide. They decided that the Commission was improperly set up and that it did not have any power in this area at all, so it was not necessary for it to decide the further constitutional question as to whether the Commission could make rules and regulations having the effect of law.

It was not necessary to decide that question, because they threw the Commission out, to all intents and purposes, other than carrying out ministerial acts that it could have carried on had it been appointed by Congress alone and without having any executive powers at all.

If we leave in here the power of the Commission to create prior restraint on expressions of first amendment rights—and the court has said that in an area of spending, this is an expression of free speech guaranteed by the first amendment—if we allow the Commission to be able to put the chilling effect on free expression under the first amendment, we shall have to go through this same process in years to come.

Mr. CRANSTON. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes, I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. CRANSTON. I ask the Senator if there is any existing Federal agency whose rules and regulations do not have the force and effect of law.

Mr. ALLEN. I believe the Senator misses the point, because this has to do with first amendment rights. Possibly other commissions or agencies might be able to promulgate rules that might have the force and effect of law, but that is merely the exercise of rights not guaranteed by the first amendment.

Mr. CRANSTON. I recognize the distinctions the Senator is seeking to make, but is the answer "no" to my question?

Mr. ALLEN. I did not understand the question.

Mr. CRANSTON. Is there any other agency that can pass regulations that do not have the force and effect of law?

Mr. ALLEN. I am not sure of that. I am sure there are other agencies that do not have the right to pass regulations that have the force and effect of law, but I would not feel that all agencies have that right. On the contrary, I think that most agencies do not have that right. Here we have involved first amendment rights.

I know the Senator is interested in protecting first amendment rights.

Mr. CRANSTON. I certainly am.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator from Alabama is not going to violate the law if he can help it. He is not going to violate any regulations of the Commission. But if regulations of the Commission should be violated by someone and proceedings are brought against him, it is not proper, in the judgment of the Senator from Alabama, and it would be unconstitutional to have the regulations and rules of the Commission set up as having the force of law where they go beyond the statute. To require any thing other than regulations consonant with the law would be an invasion of first amendment rights, in the view of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. CRANSTON. The Senator used phrase "where they go beyond the statute." Of course, if they went beyond the statute, they would not have the force and effect of law. We are talking about regulations that carry out the intent of the statute.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator from Alabama is talking about a different situation. Here we have the power of restraint. Where we have a Commission that is empowered to set up rules and regulations, then they are going to exercise a prior restraint on someone who who interprets the statute differently. He would be afraid or hesitant to exercise rights which the statute gives him in the face of regulations by the Commission that, while they may go beyond the statute, would still have some force and effect under the present law in the proceedings against him. What this amendment would do is keep those rules and regulations from having the force and effect of law and we would rely on the statute itself.

Mr. CRANSTON. Does not the bill provide that Congress would review any opinions, rules, regulations issued by the Commission before they would have the effect of law?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes; and, I think, I might say, Mr. Clagett, in his testimony before the Subcommittee on Privileges and Elections, points out that Congress, having the right to veto the regulations of the Commission, does not save it from unconstitutionality because to do so would give Congress and the Commission the power to enact laws without the Executive having the right to participate in that lawmaking process, in other words, having the right of veto.

If you follow the reasoning of the Senator from California, the Commission could come up with any farfetched regulations and then if Congress fails to veto that, or one House of Congress, then the Senator from California would have that binding law without the Chief Executive having his constitutionally guaranteed right to review that legislation and veto the legislation if he saw fit.

So I think if the Senator is relying on the right of one House of Congress to veto regulations he is overlooking the requirement of the Constitution that the legislation by Congress has got to be presented to the President for his signature or his veto.

Mr. CRANSTON. Of course, the question is not whether it is legislation. It deals with regulations, rules, opinions that must be in keeping with the intent of legislation or obviously they would be overturned in the courts. Of course, there is always the opportunity to go to court if the executive branch or anyone else feels there should be a legal challenge.

Mr. ALLEN. Well, why not rely on the statute? Why must you interpose a bunch of regulations? Why must you rely on what the Commission says that the law is rather than relying on the statute itself? That is the purpose of it.

Mr. CRANSTON. The answer, I suppose, is that in a great many cases a law is passed which requires regulations to spell out exactly how you comply with that law.

Mr. ALLEN. Still, should not the law itself rather than what the Commission says the law is be the criterion?

Mr. CRANSTON. It would be.

Mr. ALLEN. The point though that the Senator from California does not appreciate, I believe, is the fact that if the Commission spreads a bunch of regulations on its books and they are not overturned by Congress then the average citizen would hesitate to follow his interpretation, his concept, of what the law is in the face of the chilling effect of the regulations adopted by the Commission. By allowing the Commission to do that it constitutes a prior restraint on freedom of expression by a person wishing to avail himself of his first amendment rights.

Mr. CRANSTON. It seems to me that we are following here the normal practice with any law. There would be a chilling effect on the citizen if there were no regulations giving guidance as to what the law meant when it was not entirely clear.

Mr. ALLEN. Well, the citizen has got a right, if he wishes, to act according to his interpretation of the statute. He has got a right or should have the right to so act, and that is all this amendment would give him. It would be the right to be subject to the statute and for the regulations not to have the binding force and effect of law.

Now, the constitutional question has been spelled out. If the Senate in its wisdom wants to turn the amendment down, and then face this issue on down the road, well, that is certainly all right with me. I have no pride of authorship in the amendment because I did not author it, but I do agree with Mr. Clagett's interpretation of the Constitution.

Let me read further from his testimony before the subcommittee:

> The Supreme Court has clearly recognized that any regulation of campaign expenditures and contributions operates in a critically sensitive area of constitutional concern. The Court left no doubt that such regulation inevitably encroaches on free speech and makes inevitable a balancing process between compelling governmental needs and first amendment freedoms. When activity by citizens in this most sensitive area is subjected to regulation, especially with criminal sanctions, the inhibiting effect on political expression is acute.
> Moreover, the election law is both highly complex and in many respects perhaps unavoidably vague—as was fully recognized in the Senate debate last fall on the Commission's office-account regulations.
>
> In the circumstances the power to interpret the law is largely the power to make new law. A commission with that kind of power has vast influence over the political process, not necessarily excluding the power to determine the results of particular elections.
> The existing Commission has used these powers with a vengeance. In many respects its pronouncements made new law—sometimes where the statute as enacted by the Congress was silent; sometimes in rather striking disregard of what the statute did say.

And he attaches as an appendix to his statement before the committee a list of just a few of the more conspicuous lawmaking pronouncements of the Commission issued in only 4 months of operation.

He states he does not mean to be too hard on the Commission. Given the exceptional complexity and vagueness of the statute, possibly no interpreting and enforcing agency could have avoided making itself subject to the same degree of criticism—

> It is highly inappropriate, and perhaps unconstitutional, for any agency in effect to make law in an area trenching so sharply on so basic a constitutional right as freedom of speech, and on a subject so crucial to our survival as a free democratic country as the electoral process itself. The fact is that, when either a candidate or an ordinary citizen is told by the Commission that certain political activity which he wishes to undertake would violate the law, he will in the overwhelming majority of cases refrain from engaging in that activity although he is convinced the Commission's interpretation is wrong. Even if he is otherwise disposed to litigate the issue, if he is well advised by counsel he will be aware (1) that a court probably will enforce a Commission rule as having the force of law, at least unless it flatly and unquestionably is contrary to the words of the statute, and (2) that a court will give great weight to any Commission pronouncement, because of alleged agency expertise, in deciding on the proper interpretation of the statute. He will thus be chilled from exercising what a court might well ultimately hold were his rights under both the Constitution and the statute. He will in effect be subjected to a prior restraint on the exercise of his first amendment rights.
> It may well be that this chilling effect or prior restraint resulting from Commission pronouncements would itself be held to violate the Constitution.[1] The Court had no occasion to decide that issue in Buckley v. Valeo, although, the plaintiffs raised it, because the Court held the Commission's powers unconstitutional on other grounds.

So if the Commission is recreated without any changes to address the problem that Mr. Clagett outlines, there will be still a heavy constitutional cloud over the statute and the Commission, and the removal of the cloud will necessarily await still further litigation.

He suggests that the proper solution is that a recreated Commission should not be given rulemaking power except, perhaps, with respect to the Federal subsidy provisions. If it is given enforcement responsibilities it should have the power to issue guidelines and advisory opinions, if those are necessary, so that citizens can get help in deciding what they can safely do.

This amendment would not undo or would not abrogate the force of advisory opinions in protecting those who seek the advisory opinion from the Commission.

The point is that if he would go against the advisory opinion, relying on his interpretation of the law, then that advisory opinion would not have the force and effect of law.

Now, there should be a provision to the effect that such pronouncements do not

[1] See, e.g., Speiser v. Randall, 357 U.S. 513 (1958), where the Court held that tax-assessment procedures which shift the burden of proof to the taxpayers are not adequate where First Amendment issues are at stake. have the force of law and are valid only to the extent that they conform to the statutes, and that they may not be used to create any presumption of violation or criminal intent in an action against a candidate or other citizen who has chosen to disregard them, and are inadmissible in evidence against a citizen in such enactment.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD certain correspondence on this issue, together with Mr. Clagett's testimony before the Senate Subcommittee on Privileges and Elections.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COVINGTON & BURLING,
Washington, D.C., March 11, 1976.

Hon. JAMES B. ALLEN,
Dirksen Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR ALLEN: The enclosed letter to Congresswoman Holt is self-explanatory. She called me on Tuesday to say that she had proposed the suggested amendment and that the House Administration Committee adopted it.

If you agree with the amendment, you might wish to propose its addition to the Senate bill.

Yours sincerely,

BRICE M. CLAGETT.

COVINGTON & BURLING,
Washington, D.C., March 1, 1976.

Hon. MARJORIE S. HOLT, M.C.,
Longworth House Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR CONGRESSWOMAN HOLT: In addition to being a constituent of yours, I was the senior lawyer for Senator Buckley, et al. in the Supreme Court case of Buckley v. Valeo, concerning the constitutionality of the election laws. I am writing to suggest an amendment to the bill which the Committee on Administration is now considering which would reconstitute the Federal Election Commission in a constitutional manner.

The problem is described at pp. 2–5 of my testimony (copy enclosed) of last month before the Senate Rules Committee. I also enclose the text of an amendment which would solve the problem.

Briefly, the problem is that without such an amendment the Commission's power to make rules, etc., creates a prior restraint on political expression. Citizens who disagree with the Commission about the meaning of the law will generally not dare to act on that disagreement, since the very fact that the Commission has spoken will prejudice their position in enforcement litigation. The Supreme Court has of course recognized that First Amendment rights are involved in political spending. With a statute as complex and vague as the campaign spending law, I think it is unconstitutional for an agency such as the Commission to have vast discretionary power over political expression. The Supreme Court found it unnecessary to decide that question since it invalidated the Commission's powers on other grounds. If the Commission is reconstituted without solving this problem, months—perhaps years—of further uncertainty and litigation will be necessary.

The solution is quite simple. I should think the enclosed amendment might well commend itself to you, Chairman Hays and the rest of the Committee.

I should be glad to discuss this matter with you or a member of your staff if you should wish.

Yours sincerely,

BRICE M. CLAGETT.

TESTIMONY

"(e) In any proceeding, including any civil or criminal enforcement proceeding against any person charged with violating any provision of this title or of Title 18, no rule, regulation, guideline, advisory opinion, opinion of counsel or any other pronouncement by the Commission or any member, officer or employee thereof shall be used against any person, either as having the force of law, as creating any presumption of violation or of criminal intent, or as admissible in evidence against such person, or in any other manner whatsoever."

STATEMENT BY BRICE M. CLAGETT BEFORE THE SUBCOMMITTEE ON PRIVILEGES AND ELECTIONS OF THE SENATE RULES COMMITTEE, REGARDING S. 2911, 2912, AND 2918, FEBRUARY 18, 1976

Mr. Chairman, members of the Subcommittee: My name is Brice M. Clagett, and I as a member of the law firm of Covington & Burling, in Washington. I was one of the lawyers for the plaintiffs in the case of Buckley v. Valeo, some of the consequences of which you are considering today. I do not appear here as a representative of those plaintiffs or anyone else, but simply as a citizen who over the past year has had occasion to do a good deal of thinking about the election laws.

I am not here to take any position on whether the Federal Election Commission should be re-created on the basis of a constitutionally permissible method of appointment or whether, rather, its powers should be transferred to some other agency or agencies. I wish to make only two limited points with regard to S. 2911:

(1) If the Commission is re-created with its prior enforcement powers, it should not be given rule-making authority; it should be given power to issue guidelines and advisory opinions, but the status of those pronouncements should be qualified so as to protect the constitutional rights of citizens which the Supreme Court has recognized.

(2) If, contrary to my first point, a new Commission is given rule-making power, its rules should not be made subject to a legislative veto.

I.

The Supreme Court has clearly recognized that any regulation of campaign expenditures and contributions operates in a critically sensitive area of constitutional concern. The Court left no doubt that such regulation inevitably encroaches on free speech and makes inevitable a balancing process between compelling governmental needs and First Amendment freedoms. When activity by citizens in this most sensitive area is subjected to regulation, especially with criminal sanctions, the inhibiting effect on political expression is acute.

Moreover, the election law is both highly complex and in many respects, perhaps unavoidably, vague—as was fully recognized in the Senate debate last fall on the Commission's office-account regulations (121 Cong. Rec. S. 17873–89, daily ed., Oct. 8, 1975).

In these circumstances, the power to interpret the law is largely the power to make new law. A commission with that kind of power has vast influence over the political process, not necessarily excluding the power to determine the result of particular elections.

The existing Commission has used these powers with a vengeance. In many respects its pronouncements made new law—sometimes where the statute as enacted by the Congress was silent; sometimes in rather striking disregard of what the statute did say. Attached as an appendix to this statement is a list of just a few of the more conspicuous law-making pronouncements the Commission issued in only four months of operation.

I don't mean to be too hard on the Commission. Given the exceptional complexity and vagueness of the statute, possibly no interpreting and enforcing agency could have avoided making itself subject to the same criticism.

It is highly inappropriate, and perhaps unconstitutional, for any agency in effect to make law in an area trenching so sharply on so basic a constitutional right as freedom of speech, and on a subject so crucial to our survival as a free domestic country as the electoral process itself. The fact is that, when either a candidate or an ordinary citizen is told by the Commission that certain political activity which he wishes to undertake would violate the law, he will in the overwhelming majority of cases refrain from engaging in that activity although he is convinced the Commission's interpretation is wrong. Even if he is otherwise disposed to litigate the issue, if he is well advised by counsel he will be aware (1) that a court probably will enforce a Commission rule as having the force of law, at least unless it flatly and unquestionably is contrary to the words of the statute, and (2) that a court will give great weight to any Commission pronouncement, because of alleged agency expertise, in deciding on the proper interpretation of the statute. He will thus be chilled from exercising what a court might well ultimately hold were his rights under both the Constitution and the statute. He will in effect be subjected to a prior restraint on the exercise of his First Amendment rights.

It may well be that this chilling effect or prior restraint resulting from Commission pronouncements would itself be held to violate the Constitution.[1] The Court had no occasion to decide that issue in Buckley v. Valeo, although the plaintiffs raised it, because the Court held the Commission's powers unconstitutional on other grounds. So if the Commission is recreated without any changes to address the problem I have outlined, there will still be a heavy constitutional cloud over the statute and the Commission, and the removal of the cloud will necessarily await still further litigation.

I suggest that the proper solution is that a re-created Commission should not be given rule-making powers, except perhaps with respect to the federal-subsidy provisions. If it is given enforcement responsibilities, it should have the power to issue guidelines and advisory opinions—those are necessary so that citizens can get help in deciding what they can safely do—but there should be a provision to the effect that such pronouncements do not have the force of law, are valid only to the extent they conform to the statute, may not be used to create any presumption of violation or criminal intent in an action against a candidate or other citizen who has chosen to disregard them, and are inadmissible as evidence against the citizen in such an action.

The present statute has a provision (section 437f) that protects a citizen who acts in accordance with a Commission advisory opinion. That is a good provision and should be retained. What I suggest is a further provision to protect a citizen who, because he disagrees with a Commission pronouncement, chooses to act in disregard of it and finds himself the object of proceedings. Such a person of course must take his chances that a court will decide independently that his actions violated the statute. But he should not be made worse off, and in effect forced to bow to whatever restrictions the Commission chooses to place upon him, because of the danger that a court will be influenced by the position the Commission has taken.

Only by such a solution, I submit, can the Congress prevent the Commission from operating as it has, perhaps unavoidably, in the past: as a czar over the entire political process whose every view has the force of law for most practical purposes. Only thus can citizens be permitted their constitutional right to disagree with the Commission, to act on that disagreement, and to take their chances with the statute as the Congress wrote it and enacted it.

The 1974 Act did impose one very substantial restraint on the Commission: the power of either house of Congress to veto the Commission's regulations. I submit that, while the restraints I have suggested are appropriate if not necessary for constitutionality, the legislative veto is an inappropriate and very probably unconstitutional restraint, and should be excluded from any new legislation if the Commission is to be given rulemaking power at all.

The plaintiffs in the Buckley case challenged the legislative veto as an unconstitutional infringement of separation-of-powers principles. If Commission rules subject to the veto are regarded as legislative in nature, then the veto results in what is in effect legislation by Congress without the President's having his constitutionality required opportunity to participate in the legislative process. If, on the other hand, the rulemaking function is executive—as the Court strongly suggested in its discussion of the method of appointing the commissioners—then the veto is an impermissible intrusion on executive authority. And the Act's provision for a veto by either House acting alone is even more questionable than the more usual device of a concurrent resolution. The Federalist, No. 51 (Madison), Cooke ed. 1961, p. 350.

The Court found it unnecessary to pass on the legislative-veto issue as such, since it held the Commission's rule-making power unconstitutional because of the appointment method. The Court's opinion contains a lengthy footnote (slip opinion page 134, n. 176) which carefully outlined the legislative-veto question and expressly left it open. In that footnote the Court cited two law review articles which argued that the legislative veto is unconstitutional.[2]

There are other strong intimations in the Court's opinion in Buckley that the legislative-veto provision of this statute will be held unconstitutional when tthe question comes before the Court. The Court recognized that the Commission, viewed as a legislative agency because of the appointment method, could properly exercise any powers which Congress could exercise directly or through one of its committees. But the Court squarely held that rule-making is not such a power. That being the case—it having been held that Congress cannot make campaign rules through the instrument of a legislative agency—I find it hard to see how the Court could avoid holding that direct participation by Congress in the rule-making process through the legislative veto is likewise unconstitutional.[3]

[2] Ginnane, "The Control of Federal Administration by Congressional Resolutions and Committees," 66 Harv. L. Rev. 569 (1953); Watson, "Congress Steps Out: A Look at Congressional Control of the Executive," 63 Calif. L. Rev. 983, 1081–82 (1975).

[3] The brief submitted by the Justice Department in Buckley for the Attorney General as appellee and for the United States as amicus curiae argued that the legislative veto could be justified only if the Commission was a legislative agency, which of course the Court has now held it cannot be (pp. 111–12). The brief correctly described the Watson law-review article, one of those cited by the Court in its opinion, as "the most recent and thorough study [which] concludes that [congressional control] devices are often an unconstitutional intrusion into executive authority" (p. 111, n. 70). Congressional power to veto regulations of executive or independent agencies is a device expressly found constitutionally "unacceptable" and "invalid" by Watson (op. cit. at 1082).

The legislative veto is particularly inappropriate where, as here, it carries a sharp conflict of interest. Members of the Congress, of course, are candidates for office, and as such they are intimately affected by the Commission's regulations. If, as has been repeated endlessly, a primary purpose of campaign reform is to avoid even the appearance of impropriety, that end is hardly served by constant and detailed embroilment of the Congress in interpreting and fleshing out the campaign restrictions under which they—and their challengers—operate. Of course implementation of the campaign law contains a host of opportunities for tilt in favor of incumbents, and repeated congressional involvement will continually feed the suspicion that the Act is an incumbent protection law. Far better to let the rulemaking process be carried on, under proper safeguards, by a genuinely independent and impartial agency rather than one under incumbent domination. I should think that the Congress would welcome the opportunity to avoid future public spectacles of the sort that occurred over the rejection of the office-account regulations last fall.

Finally, if the legislative veto is resurrected there will be ample room for an argument that, even if such veto provisions in other contexts may not be unconstitutional, its presence in this highly charged political context makes the Commission an arm of the Congress, even absent congressional appointment of the commissioners, and thus constitutionally invalidates the rule-making power. It could also be argued that the resulting incumbent domination violates the constitutional rights of challengers.

I am personally persuaded that the legislative veto in the 1974 Act is unconstitutional and that the Supreme Court will, if necessary, so hold. To resurrect it in a new statute would leave the Commission and its rules under a constitutional cloud which only new litigation could—eventually—resolve.

Thank you.

Mr. ALLEN. I yield the floor.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, I would like to discuss the questions which have been raised regarding the constitutionality of the congressional disapproval provisions of the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971.

These congressional disapproval provisions are substantially similar to many other congressional veto provisions which have been enacted in recent years. I understand the Senator's argument because he contends that we do not invoke first amendment rights—that was as I understood it.

Despite the frequent use of congressional veto provisions, its constitutionality has never been directly tested in court.

The case of Buckley against Valeo presented perhaps the first opportunity for a Federal court to pass upon the constitutionality of such provisions. In Buckley, the constitutionality of the rulemaking provision contained in 2 U.S.C. 438(c), of which the congressional veto provision constituted a large part, was squarely before the Supreme Court by certified question from the court of appeals. The constitutionality of the two other congressional veto provisions contained in sections 9009 and 9039 of title 26 had not been challenged. Despite this opportunity, the Supreme Court in Buckley expressly declined to decide whether the congressional veto device contained in 2 U.S.C. 438(c) was unconstitutional. The Court stated in its per curiam opinion that "because of our holding that the manner of appointment of the members of the Commission precludes them from exercising the rulemaking powers in question, we have no occasion to address this separate challenge here." Buckley against Valeo, slip opinion at page 134, footnote 176.

Justice White, concurring in this part of the Court's holding, agreed that since the manner in which the Commission's members were appointed was unconstitutional, the rules and regulations issued by the Commission were invalid without regard to the congressional disapproval mechanism set out under section 438(c). Justice White, in strongly worded dicta, indicated, however, that if the members of the Commission had been constitutionally appointed, the congressional disapproval provisions of section 438(c) of title 2 would not violate the Constitution. Justice White stated:

> I am also of the view that the otherwise valid regulatory power of a properly created independent agency is not rendered constitutionally infirm, as violative of the President's veto power, by a statutory provision subjecting agency regulations to disapproval by either House of Congress. For a bill to become law, it must have passed both Houses and be signed by the President or passed over his veto. Also, every order, resolution, or vote to which the concurrence of the Senate and House of Representatives may be necessary . . . is likewise subject to the veto power. Under Section 438(c) the FEC's regulations are subject to disapproval; but for a regulation to become effective, neither House need approve it, pass it, or take any action at all with respect to it. The regulation becomes effective by nonaction. This no more invades the President's powers than does a regulation not required to be laid before Congress. Congressional influence over the substantive content of agency regulation may be enhanced, but I would not view the power of either House to disapprove as equivalent to legislation or to an order, resolution, or vote requiring the concurrence of both Houses.[30]

[30] Surely the challengers to the provision for congressional disapproval do not mean to suggest that the FEC's regulations must

In terms of the substantive content of regulations and the degree of Congressional influence over agency lawmaking, I do not suggest that there is no difference between the situation where regulations are subject to disapproval by Congress and the situation where the agency need not run the congressional gantlet. But the President's veto power, which gives him an important role in the legislative process, was obviously not considered an inherently executive function. Nor was its principal aim to provide another check against poor legislation. The major purpose of the veto power appears to have been to shore up the Executive Branch and to provide it with some bargaining and survival power against what the Framers feared would be the overweening power of legislators. As Hamilton said, the veto power was to provide a defense against the legislative departments' intrusion on the rights and powers of other departments; without such power, "the legislative and executive powers might speedily come to be blended in the same hands."

I would be much more concerned if Congress purported to usurp the functions of law enforcement, to control the outcome of particular adjudications, or to pre-empt the President's appointment power; but in the light of history and modern reality, the provision for congressional disapproval of agency regulations does not appear to transgress the constitutional design, at least where the President has agreed to legislation establishing the disapproval procedure or the legislation has been passed over his veto. It would be considerably different if Congress itself purported to adopt and propound regulations by the action of both Houses. But here no action of either House is required for the agency rule to go int effect and the veto power of the President does not appear to be implicated.

Justice White's concurring opinion is the strongest judicial declaration to date affirming the constitutionality of the congressional veto device.

Mr. President, I submit to my colleagues that Justice White's position is a persuasive one and I think it certainly should guide us somewhat in our discussions here.

With respect to Senator ALLEN'S remarks about the chilling effect of prior restraint, I have no doubt but what this would create a chilling effect or a prior restraint on actions of an individual, and I think it was really intended that way.

I think what we were trying to get here were some guidelines upon which a candidate could rely without having to go to court and find out the nature of a declaratory judgment, or other type of relief, what the situation was intended to be.

So we did provide that advisory opinions could be issued by the FEC and that they could adopt regulations and if the Congress did not disapprove them, then they would have the effect of law.

This is similar to the situation at IRS. IRS adopts regulations all of the time, as do many other agencies of government, and they do have the force and effect of law, once they go through the prescribed process.

So I submit that what we are doing here is saying that the Commission has the right to do these things, and if a person then wants to be subjected to the chilling effect, that is his decision, or he can contest the matter in law, if he so desires. True, it would place a burden on him, as the Senator points out, but I submit that the regulations themselves ought to have the force and effect of law.

I must say, I do not feel as strongly about the advisory opinion situation, but the regulations themselves ought to have the force and effect of law because that is what we have said the legal effect is, once we do not override them, when they present them to the Congress.

Now, once a rule or regulation has come to Congress, and been prescribed by the Commission, then it should, in my judgment, have the force and effect of law.

Of course, it could be challenged later in a court proceeding on the ground it had exceeded the language intended in the statute. That is one of the things about it that the Senator does not like.

It appears to me that the amendment proposed by the distinguished Senator from Alabama would provide that such a rule and regulation would not have the force of law and is, thus, contrary to Congress intent in enacting the Federal Election Campaign Act.

We went further in this bill, S. 3065, than in the initial act we passed because we have said here that we wanted to restrict, perhaps, the Commission's actions somewhat. We said that every advisory opinion of general applicability then had to be proposed to the Congress in the nature of a regulation so that Congress could act on it, or fail to act on it, as it saw fit. But we did not require this, of course, with respect to the advisory opinion peculiar to a problem of a particular individual, a particular candidate, or a committee, or someone else. Only where they are of general applicability, did we provide the requirement that they have to come up here.

So I find some trouble with the Senator's amendment as it is proposed here.

I may say that I would find less trouble with it if he were to eliminate the regulation part of it, although I am not sure that I would support him even then.

I would like to suggest that the requirement of S. 3065, that advisory opinions of general applicability be promulgated as rules and regulations by the Commission, will certainly serve to limit what has heretofore been an extremely large number of Commission interpretations of the act which do not have the force and effect of law.

I do not believe that those advisory interpretations have the force or effect of the law.

As a result of this provision which is in section 107(b) of S. 3065 on pages 18 and 19 of the bill, the large majority of the Commission's future public interpretations of the Federal Election Campaign Act will be in the form of rules and regulations subject to congressional review and having the force and effect of law when they are finally prescribed.

For the above reasons, I would have to oppose this particular amendment.

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the distinguished chairman.

The Court did find it unnecessary to pass on the legislative veto issue, as such, since, as I have said, it held the Commission's rulemaking power unconstitutional because of the appointment method.

The Senator has cited the opinion of Mr. Justice Byron White, and it is a very fine opinion. I do not agree with everything that he said, and I do not necessarily draw the conclusion from it that the distinguished chairman has drawn.

The Court's opinion, not the concurring opinion but the Court's opinion, contains a lengthy footnote which carefully outlined the legislative veto question and expressly left it open. In that footnote, the Court cited two law review articles which argued that the legislative veto is unconstitutional.

I feel as much comfort can be drawn from that fact in the court's opinion citing two law review articles that held that the veto power was unconstitutional. I would draw as much comfort from that circumstance as the distinguished Senator has drawn from Mr. Justice White's concurring opinion.

Why did they put those law review articles in the footnote? Why did they refer to them if they did not expressly concur in the reasoning of those law review articles?

The other strong intimation in the Court's opinion in the Buckley case is that the legislative veto provision of this statute will be held unconstitutional when the question comes before the Court. The Court recognized that the Commission performed as a legislative agency because of the appointment method. That was the full gist of the case, that this is a legislative agency performing executive duty. That is the reason the Commission was thrown out. If it had just been called on to carry out legislative functions, it would not have been stricken down. But since it had to carry out executive functions, then the method of setting it up, four named by the Congress and two by the President, did make that unconstitutional.

So recognizing the Commission as a legislative agency, that the Commission could properly exercise any powers which Congress could exercise directly or through one of its committees, the Court squarely held that rulemaking is not such a power. The making of rules is not a congressional power that this Commission could exercise.

That being the case, it held that Congress cannot make campaign rules through the instrument of a legislative agency.

I find it hard to see how the Court could avoid holding that direct participation by the Congress in a rulemaking process through the legislative veto is likewise unconstitutional.

Let us analyze that again. The Commission, being a congressional agency, could not make rules. So if the Congress could not make rules, then the Commission making rules and having them approved and not stricken down by the become effective despite the disapproval of one House or the other. Disapproval nullifies the suggested regulation and prevents the occurrence of any change in the law. The regulation is void. Nothing remains on which the veto power could operate. It is as though a bill passed in one House and failed in another.

Congress would also be something that they could not do.

Since, under the Supreme Court ruling, the Congress cannot make rules as to how campaigns shall be conducted, the Commission cannot do that through the instrument of a legislative agency.

If the Commission should come up with a rule that went beyond the statute as seen by everyone, and then Congress refuses to veto that rule, the chairman would have that rule have the force and effect of law. That is where I disagree. It should not have the force and effect of law.

In a proceeding against some person, not necessarily a candidate but against some person, who has disagreed with the Commission and felt that the law made some other provision, that person should have the right to act as his reasoning and his understanding dictated with regard to what the law is, and he should not be met with a regulation having the force and effect of law.

What the amendment would do would be to make the law control, make the statute enacted by Congress be the criterion or the guideline, and not have to face a ruling or a regulation of the Commission.

Every act of Congress has to be submitted to the President for his approval or disapproval by veto. But in the broad area of the campaign law if it is permitted, as would be permitted without this amendment, for the commission to go beyond the statute and then have Congress, in effect, endorse that action by not itself vetoing that provision or that regulation, we would have the Congress and this agency having the right to make law because it is not provided that it would be submitted to the President for his approval or disapproval.

Under this amendment, under any proceeding, civil or criminal, against a person for violating the provisions of a law, what would control would be the law itself, not some interpretation placed on the law by a nonjudicial body. All it would provide is that the law will control, not the Commission's interpretation of the law.

If that is not the rule, if these regulations are given the force and effect of law, what would they charge a man with? Would they charge him with violating the law, or violating a rule or regulation of the Commission? And is that violating the law, or is it violating a rule or regulation of the Commission? What are you going to charge the man with?

What ought to be charged is that he violated the law. Now, on the first amendment right of free expression, free speech, if the Commission has promulgated rules and regulations either stating how they interpret the law or making new law, John Q. Citizen would certainly feel that the cards were stacked against him if he, not agreeing with that interpretation but relying on the express wording of the statute, proceeds according to his interpretation of the statute and then, when he is haled into court, he is confronted not with the law itself, not with the statute, but he is confronted, as having the force and effect of law, with some rule or regulation that the Commission has dreamed up that may go beyond the law.

So all this amendment would do, Mr. President, is have the law, the statute, control a person's actions, and not have government by commission and commission rule and regulation.

There is an important constitutional question involved which could be solved by adopting this amendment. And I am not relying merely on my judgment, because I have not made a sufficient study, but the leading attorney in the case of the plaintiffs who carried this case to the Supreme Court, the case of Buckley against Valeo, has suggested this amendment, and I have submitted for the record his testimony before the subcommittee of the Committee on Rules and Administration on Privileges and Elections.

I believe by adopting the amendment we can preclude the possibility of another constitutional crisis requiring Congress to act again in this area. But it will certainly go to the Supreme Court, and if we are allowing the Commission to make law to exercise prior restraint on a citizen's first amendment rights of freedom of expression and freedom of speech, then we will just have to face it.

We were assured that all of these limitations that the election law provided did not violate constitutional provisions, but here we are, working on this problem. I suggest that the way to prevent that at this particular point would be to adopt this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LAXALT). The Senator from Iowa is recognized.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, the Senator from Alabama certainly makes an interesting point in terms of first amendment principles that may be considered to be involved. But I think the effect of the amendment, if it were to be adopted, would be to so weaken the commission that it would not have the enforcement powers that certainly a majority of the Members of Congress intended for it when the legislation was originally passed. Or, to put it more bluntly, if we adopt this amendment we will be saying that the Commission's rules and regulations, and their advisory opinions, have no standing in law, that they can be violated by anyone without fear of penalty. That is the way I interpret the amendment.

Rules and regulations are written by the Federal Election Commission to provide a practical explanation of campaign law. We have to have rules and regulations to implement the law. Furthermore, these rules and regulations, along with the advisory opinions that are of general applicability, must be submitted to Congress, where they can be vetoed by either House. That is a requirement of the law. There are, therefore, very adequate checks on the content of those rules and regulations, to make sure that this body and the House of Representatives agree that they are consistent with the law as we intended.

However, the Allen amendment would render those rules and regulations essentially meaningless. This would represent an unprecedented restriction on the rulemaking authority of the executive branch, and would open, I think, many serious problems. Such a restriction would be entirely new in government as far as I know. No such restriction exists on any other independent agency, whether it may or may not have some effect on first amendment principles.

Specifically with respect to advisory opinions, I think the Senate knows well that there is a provision in S. 3065 which states that if a person is in compliance with an advisory opinion rendered by the Commission on his or her request, that person is presumed to be innocent of any violation of the act.

Mr. ALLEN. This would not disturb that situation.

Mr. CLARK. Well, I know it would not disturb the provision, but are we now to say also that a person is to be presumed innocent if he is in violation of such an advisory opinion? Clearly that would be the effect of the Senator's amendment.

If you ask for an advisory opinion and get one—let us suppose that any one of us, as a candidate, goes to the Commission, and we say we want an advisory opinion on this, and we receive one, and then violate it; we say, "We have an advisory opinion, but we are not going to live by that." That has no standing in law as evidence of wrongdoing, if this amendment is adopted.

Let me try to summarize very briefly what I am saying. First of all, it is a basic rule of law that a rule issued by any agency acting consistent with statutory law has the force of law. If we undermine that principle of law, and say that rules and regulations have no standing, that they do not have the force of law, then certainly we could not continue to operate this Government.

Second, that rule is especially applicable here, because a rule issued by the Commission would become effective only if Congress does not veto it. Thus the possibility of rules that are not consistent with congressional intent is not even present. If a rule is not consistent with congressional intent, then we have the power to veto it; so clearly it is the congressional intent to allow that regulation to stand if we do not act.

Third, I believe the pending amendment would permit a person to violate with impunity an advisory opinion that that person sought. That is why I think the advisory opinion is also an essential part of the matter.

So, Mr. President, we ought to reject this amendment, and I say again, if we do adopt this amendment, we will be saying that the Election Commission rules and regulations and advisory opinions have no standing in law, cannot even be introduced in evidence, and that they can be violated with impunity and without fear of penalty. That would simply undermine the whole concept of enforcement under the Election Commission that we have created.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Iowa has said that the effect of the amendment would be to undermine the Commission's rules and regulations and that they could be violated with impunity.

I think the distinguished Senator has overstepped the real meaning of the amendment. Certainly, it would not allow anyone to violate the rules and regulations of the Commission with impunity as long as they violated the law itself.

He spoke of the right to get an advisory opinion and then go against that opinion if the person so desired. There is nothing strang about that, because a person might request an advisory opinion, being sure in his own mind of what the statute provides, and then, if the advisory opinion should be such that it was not in line with his thinking, he would have a right to go according to his interpretation of the law. If he were right in his interpretation of the law, then he could not be successfully prosecuted. But if the Commission were right in its interpretation of the law, then he could be successfully prosecuted.

But the mere fact that the Commission has said, "Now we interpret this law to mean thus and so," under the present law and under the bill, that ruling or that regulation would have the force and effect of law in a proceeding against the person. But under the amendment, the ruling or regulation of the Commission would not have the force and effect of law. The law itself would be all that would have the force and effect of law.

So if the law is violated, one would not need the Commission to say that the law has been violated. The court would reach that decision and make that interpretation, without having to lean on the interpretation of a nonjudicial body, a body under the complete control or under a great control of Congress and under complete control of Congress as to any regulations or rules that it might adopt.

The present statute does have this provision allowing a person to obtain an advisory opinion, and it protects that citizen through acts in accordance with the Commission's advisory opinion. This amendment does not have any effect on that. A person would be protected in following the advisory opinion.

This is a good provision and should be retained. What I am suggesting is a further provision to protect a citizen who disagrees with a Commission pronouncement. Surely any citizen has a right to disagree with the Commission. I am suggesting a further provision to protect a citizen who, because he disagrees with the Commission pronouncement, chooses to act in disregard of it and finds himself the object of proceedings. Such a person, of course, must take his chances that a court will decide independently that his actions violated the statute. So if he is wrong in his interpretation, he is going to be convicted.

But he should not be made worse off and, in effect, forced to bow to whatever restrictions the Commission chooses to place upon him because of the danger that a court will be influenced by the position the Commission has taken.

So, as long as the people agree with the Commission's interpretation, these rules and regulations will have considerable effect, and they will have an adverse effect, too, by resulting in or causing an inhibition against the exercise of first amendment rights of freedom of expression, or freedom of speech, in many areas of activity.

Only by such a solution can Congress prevent the Commission from operating as it has, perhaps unavoidably in the past, and that is as a czar over the entire political process whose every view has the force of law for most practical purposes.

Only thus can citizens be permitted their constitutional right to disagree with the Commission, to act on that disagreement, and to take their chances with the statute as Congress wrote it and enacted it.

The 1974 act did impose one very substantial restraint on the Commission; that is, the power of either House of Congress to veto the Commission's regulations. While the restraints I have suggested are appropriate, it is not necessary for constitutionality. The legislative veto is an inappropriate and very probably unconstitutional restraint and should be excluded from any new legislation, if the Commission is to be given rulemaking power at all.

Mr. President, I call for the yeas and nays on my amendment.

(b) (1) Part VIII of subchapter A of chapter 61 of such Code (relating to designation of income tax payments to Presidential election campaign fund) is repealed.

(2) The table of parts for such subchapter is amended by striking out the item relating to part VIII.

(c)(1) The repeal made by subsection (a) takes effect on January 1, 1979, except that such repeal shall not affect the authority of the Federal Election Commission or of the Secretary of the Treasury to require repayments from candidates under section 9007 (b) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to repayments).

(2) The repeal and amendment made by subsection (b) apply to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1978.

(d) The repeal and amendments made by subsections (a) and (b) shall take effect unless, before January 1, 1979, the Congress by law determines that the repeals and amendments made by this section shall not take effect.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, this amendment would repeal those sections of the law which created the tax checkoff system and the public financing of Presidential campaigns. It would not—and I underline "not"—affect the Presidential campaign of 1976. The amendment calls for the repeal of the tax checkoff system after taxable years 1978, and the termination of public financing effective January 1, 1979 unless the 95th Congress reexamines and reenacts the public financing concept.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator suspend.

Let us have order in the Chamber, please, the Senator is entitled to be heard.

Mr. WEICKER. I yield to the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Ira Shapiro of my staff be granted privilege of the floor during the debate and votes on the pending legislation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, several of my colleagues have suggested a new approach in determining whether individual Federal programs are effectively spending the taxpayers' dollars.

Through a zero-base review procedure—what is also known as zero budget—each program on a regular basis, would require a new authorization by the Congress. Their budget would be zero and the Congress would have to justify each dollar expended for a particular project.

In essence, the modified amendment I offer today would require the Congress to go through a similar procedure with respect to public financing for political campaigns.

My amendment would terminate public financing of Presidential campaigns as of January 1, 1979, unless Congress acts prior to that date to extend this program.

Thus, after witnessing the implementation of this act in 1976, the 95th Congress would be forced to evaluate public financing of Presidential campaigns. After hearing a wide spectrum of viewpoints and reviewing the facts, Congress would determine whether public financing was a wise expenditure of public funds; indeed, whether or not it is a wise policy; whether it met the campaign reform objectives, and whether it is in the public interest to continue this program.

Such a scrutiny is healthy. Too many programs are placed on an automatic pilot and are free from congressional review. This Senator has serious reservations about public financing. Many of our colleagues think the system should be fundamentally altered. My amendment will insure a forum for debate. After taxpayers pay for the ride in the 1976 elections, Congress will determine whether it is worth the trip.

Let me give an example as to the type of debate I think should take place in this area.

I understand the motivation behind public financing. It was deemed a reform measure to reduce the role of money in the American political process and to diminish the amount of money spent in the course of an election. But I suggest that, in effect, all we did when we enacted public financing was to accept the problem and merely find a way to finance it.

What am I talking about here? I am specifically saying that the reason why so much money is expended is the length of our political campaigns.

Why then did we not attack the basic problem, reduce the time? Because, indeed, if we had done that, we would have reduced the funds to be expended. Instead, we accept the inordinately long length of campaign time.

Believe me, unless the funds are coming from some source other than individuals, it does demand a sort of financing scheme.

This is the type of debate that should be taking place and, if my amendment is adopted, will take place after we have had an experience with public financing.

I want to see this legislation passed—I want to make that point clear. I do not want to interrupt the system as it applies to the 1976 campaign. I think it would be a big mistake for the U.S. Senate or the Congress or anyone else to delay S. 3065 so that we would have only gone half way with this public financing system during the course of the 1976 Presidential election campaign.

Let it run all the way and see how it looks. I am all for that. But I am also calling for a review before we automatically renew our license to dip into the U.S. Treasury.

From the start, I have believed that public financing was a mistake. This proposal reflects my long-held belief that public financing of Presidential campaigns rather than being a reform is a dangerous step toward decontrol of the Federal Government, and decontrol in the sense of the control exercised over us by the sovereign people of the United States.

With the best of intentions, the Congress enacted campaign reform legislation calling for direct Federal subsidies to Presidential candidates. However, that accommodates rather than eliminates the problem. The problem is long time translating into big money. Public financing only pays the blackmail imposed by that sin.

Matching funds have kept floundering Presidential campaigns afloat beyond their time. They have allowed one issue candidates and those with only a marginal chance of success to overspend their budgets, knowing a taxpayer bonanza waited in the wings. Mr. President, allowing the Federal Government to bankroll everybody who wants to be President is a subsidy that can only sap the vitality of a free society whose excellence depends on the survival of the fittest ideas.

One measure of a candidate is his or her ability to generate contributions for public office. Candidates should sell their ideas to win, not just be a warm body and rely on the Federal dole. Worse, public financing gives Congress control of the campaign war chests of Presidential challengers. The Campaign Reform Act was drafted in 1974, with the Congress and White House controlled by different parties. Under these circumstances, each candidate of a major political party would receive $20 million in a general election. Were the Nation to elect a President with a large majority of his own party in the Congress, who can say that the formula for allocating funds would remain the same? And what of enforcement? Once we hand the Congress the political purse strings, the people will no longer have the final say. Instead, politicians will be monitoring politicians. And that is not a healthy situation.

Mr. President, the dangers of public financing were recognized by the majority of the Watergate Committee when they opposed enactment of that decision. In a brief filed by the appellants for the Supreme Court, in the case James L. Buckley against Francis R. Valeo, these dangers were clearly described:

> Grave dangers to the future of democratic government result from direct payments to parties and candidates. Democracy depends largely on free political competition and the freedom to form, join or leave political organizations. Once a party becomes officially sponsored by the government or government begins to determine the allocation of political resources, that freedom is endangered.

The experience to date with the tax checkoff to finance Presidential campaign funds indicates little interest and enthusiasm among the people. Only 10 percent of the taxpayers chose to direct the $1 of their taxes owed for 1972 to the campaign fund. The total amount designated for 1972 was $12.9 million. For the taxable year 1973, approximately 14 percent of the taxpayers exercised this option, accounting for $17.3 million. Approximately 20 percent of the taxpayers submitting returns for 1974 funneled moneys into the Presidential campaign fund. The total amount for that year was $31.9 million. As of February 25, 1976, approximately $6.1 million has been accumulated. The total funds received since 1971 is approximately $68 million.

With 80 percent of the American people saying no to checkoffs, it is time the Congress reexamined the policy of paying checks out to Presidential candidates.

I understand that there are those who would want to extend the Federal financing principle to senatorial and congressional campaigns. Then how long will it be before nondesignated general funds are used when indeed the pot becomes too small for the numbers desiring to run or participate?

I confess that with today's myriad of unresolved needs, I find financing political campaigns rather far down on my priority list. If we have become so devoid of initiative, ideas, and courage that the American people are walking away from today's politicians, then it is time to get out, rather than to monetarily assure a continued presence. If we want to reduce the role of money in politics, reduce the time of politicking. In so doing we will preserve the rights of Americans, while getting better men and women to serve.

Mr. President, I have heard comment that in fact these are not general funds, that these are designated by various taxpayers.

Well, now, let us examine that just for a minute. I do not have the right, neither does any American taxpayer, to designate that a certain amount of my tax shall go to HUD, or that a certain amount of my tax shall go to Defense. So, in effect, we are giving a special privilege here. It is money that does come out of the general fund. It is money not going into the general fund but, rather, into the business of politics and financing of campaigns.

I think, and this is all the amendment is stating, that if we are going to take this step, both in the sense of its effectiveness in reducing the ills of our political system and in the sense of what it does to the basic rights of Americans, this is something we should tred into with a light step. It makes eminent sense to examine our experience, as we will the experience of the election of 1976, before we impose such a system forever on the American people. It would be very hypocritical, indeed, for this Congress to demand a zero budget-type base for all the other agencies and programs of Government if we are not willing to do it to ourselves.

I hope the American people understand what is at issue here. I have always thoroughly objected to this public financing being labeled as Watergate reform. It was no such thing. It has no relationship to the facts of Executive abuse, no relationship whatsoever. Indeed, what we have done with this type of reform is to put more power into the hands of the Executive; more power into the hands of the Congress.

One thing the American people still have to themselves is their vote, their support, their contributions. This is their one check on the Government, and it is one that I feel they should preserve. But certainly, since the Congress, the representatives of the people, deemed it advisable to give a new system a chance, let us try it out, but then let us put an affirmative responsibility on our shoulders to justify its continued existence.

I would hope, Mr. President, that the Senate would rise to support this measure because, in effect, it means that we are not afraid to challenge ourselves; that we can stand up to the arguments of logic, that which tests our ability, tests the record of our performance, and that we are just not here because the law says we are here, but, rather, that we are here on the basis of our abilities.

This is, to me, very important in the total concept of this democracy.

I repeat to my colleagues it in no way interferes with the present Presidential campaign, but as far as the continuation of this public financing system it does demand that the facts and the experience justify its continuation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nevada.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, we have gone up the hill and down the hill on this particular issue. I submit the Senator has made his position clear. I think his position was clear before, that he is opposed to public financing. What he is doing here is going through the legislative process in reverse. He is saying if his amendment is passed, that the public financing provision would be repealed unless Congress, before a certain date, takes action to say that it is not repealed.

If he wants to repeal it, all he would have to do is propose legislation next year that would repeal the public financing provision, have hearings on it and make that determination, instead of doing it in the reverse of the legislative process.

We argued this matter very thoroughly before, as to whether we ought to have financing of Presidential races. There are many people who feel we ought to go far beyond that. I sat through weeks of hearings, of floor consideration, and consideration in the conference committee on this issue. I hope we will not go back and start it all over again, Mr. President.

I am ready to have a vote on this issue up or down.

Mr. WEICKER. The purpose of the amendment is to impose upon us the obligation of review. In the sense that this affects politicians, clearly, I think, there is an added burden placed on each Senator to justify the expenditure of these moneys. We have devised something for our own benefit. This is money that would be available for other programs, except that we have allowed it to be available to ourselves.

We ask everybody to justify their actions and their programs. It seems to me what is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander. It is incumbent upon us to justify our expenditure of public moneys in campaigning. Nobody is going to deny the fact that money has played too great a role in American politics. But understand this: We are not reducing the role of money in American politics with this legislation. We are just going ahead and slapping the bill on all the taxpayers. The money does not change at all. The concept of money does not change. This is the time to debate reform.

I have accepted the judgment as it came to pass in the form of this legislation, but I want to make sure that we are going to have another debate 4 years from now and, after that election as well, debate how we can improve this system.

As I indicated in my opening comments, we all realize where the basic fault lies. There is no way one can run a 2-year campaign in this country and not incur substantial sums of money. In the case of U.S. Senator most campaigns last a year and a half, and involve substantial sums of money. In the case of a Representative, it is 1 year. But there has been no attempt to address that aspect of the problem.

Maybe the suggestion I made the other day is not perfect, but at least it tries to reach the real problem, not just accept it and finance it.

I made the statement that I thought in this country what we should do is have the candidates file the first Tuesday in September, let there be direct primaries the first Tuesday in October, and then let the general election take place the first Tuesday in November, letting the whole process consume 60 days. Believe me, then we will reduce the role of money in campaigns and we will also, I think, achieve a very affirmative result: No. 1, I think most people's attention span is quite good, if we are talking 60 days. I think in 2 years it sort of wavers a little thin.

There is no question in my mind that in this way ideas will be at a premium and they will count. By the same token, obviously, the funds expended will nosedive. But what we in effect have done—and I admit this is an argument to be made several years from now if my amendment takes hold—is just to go ahead and accept a bad situation and figure out not how we are going to pay for it, but how the American taxpayers are going to pay for it.

Mr. WILLIAM L. SCOTT. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. WEICKER. I yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. WILLIAM L. SCOTT. Mr. President, my position was similar to that of the distinguished Senator from Connecticut when this measure originally passed. I feel a little stronger on it now, and I wonder if the American people do not feel a little stronger also, having read in the newspapers about the millions of dollars of taxpayers' money that is being spent in public financing, and as we have read from time to time what each candidate receives by way of matching funds.

I would submit that if we had a referendum on this subject, the position of the distinguished Senator would prevail among the American people. I believe the proposal for public financing is less popular after we have seen these tables, and see how the taxpayers' money is being spent.

So I commend the distinguished Senator for bringing this matter up. I hope we will have a vote rather soon, though. I doubt that many Senators are going to change their minds on this matter.

Mr. WEICKER. I agree with the distinguished Senator. Along the lines he has mentioned, it must be appalling to people to see candidates use words of art, as they drop out of the race, so they will not lose any money to pay their bills.

It used to be that you were either in or out of a race. Now you suspend; you are not either in or out, you suspend—a very serviceable word—to keep the money coming in.

They raise that initial money, cross that threshold, and then frankly they are in; just stay alive. In other words, be a warm body and the money keeps coming in.

This is not a reform. It is a nice cushion for all of us and our colleagues, but believe me, I think the American people are paying a fearful price in the sense of being an effective check on their own Government.

I am willing to continue this for this year, but it seems to me we have an affirmative obligation before the next election to check and see what we have done, and then reconsider the problem.

Mr. President, unless there are further comments, I am perfectly agreeable to going to a vote. I believe the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I am prepared to yield back the time of the distinguished Senator from Nevada.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate go into executive session to consider a nomination at the desk, reported earlier in the day by the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs, which has been cleared all around.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. The nomination will be stated.

FEDERAL DEPOSIT INSURANCE CORPORATION

The second assistant legislative clerk read the nomination of Robert E. Barnett, of the District of Columbia, to be a member of the Board of Directors of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the President be immediately notified of the confirmation of this nomination.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

LEGISLATIVE SESSION

Mr. MANSFIELD. I move that the Senate return to legislative session.

The motion was agreed to.

FEDERAL ELECTION CAMPAIGN ACT AMENDMENTS OF 1976

The Senate continued with the consideration of the bill (S. 3065) to amend the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971 to provide for its administration by a Federal Election Commission appointed in accordance with the requirements of the Constitution, and for other purposes.

Mr. FANNIN. Mr. President, I am pleased to cosponsor the amendment to S. 3065 offered by Senator WEICKER to eliminate the tax checkoff and public financing provisions from the current Federal campaign law. I am in complete agreement with the Senator from Connecticut that Federal subsidies of Presidential campaigns has done nothing but "subsidize mediocrity at taxpapers' expense."

In my opinion, public financing of elections was never a good idea. I voted against the 1974 amendments to the Federal Election Campaign Act approved by Congress because I was convinced then that, instead of reforming our electoral system, those amendments would only weaken the system by encouraging ambitious but weak political aspirants to seek public office at the taxpayers' expense. To my regret, my worst fears have been realized.

Campaign "reform" legislation has proved a total flop. By providing Federal matching funds what we are really doing is putting up millions of dollars of taxpayer money—and I do not care whether there is a so-called voluntary checkoff or not—so that politicians who want to take the greatest of all ego trips can indulge at no expense to themselves. We now have the phenomenon of single-issue candidates getting into an important Presidential race, drawing hundreds of thousands of dollars in Government subsidies, to help plug their cause without any hope or chance of winning the nomination or the election.

Mr. President, yesterday's Arizona Republic carried an editorial which accurately reflects what has come about as a result of Federal campaign subsidies legislated by the Congress. I ask unanimous consent that the full text of this editorial be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

EGO TRIP SUBSIDIES

The little box on the federal income tax reporting form (1040) allowing a $1 deduction for presidential hopefuls obviously has become a boondoogle for political egos.

As of last week, the Federal Election Commission reported it has paid out $10,664,278 to 14 candidates hoping to be President.

Included were five who now either have announced they've dropped out, or are doing so badly that they've all but stopped campaigning.

These five collectively have been handed some $2 million in taxpayers' contributions to pursue their short-lived and predictably futile ego trips.

Pennsylvania Gov. Milton Shapp's oversized ambitions were subsidized with $283,749; former North Carolina Gov. Terry Sanford's quizotic adventure cost taxpayers $246,388; populist Fred (Tax The Super Rich) Harris wangled $409,363 from the till millionaire Texas Sen. Lloyd Bentsen's dead-in-the-water presidential tryout cost $611,022; and Indiana Sen. Birch Bayh took a $450,034 slice.

Others will fold, and with their campaigns collapse will go the funds supplied by compliant taxpayers.

What all this means is that the taxpayer has been sucked in to provide subsidies and political dole for oversized egos who knew perfectly well their chances ranged from zero to impossible, but cashed in on taxpayer generosity to spread their faces in media campaigns.

For taxpayers who yet have not checked off the little box on their Form 1040, there still is time to say no.

Mr. FANNIN. Mr. President, the only solution is for the Congress to admit its mistake and to repeal the tax check-off provision and end public financing as soon as possible. Accordingly, I urge my colleagues to vote for the Weicker amendment.

Of course, no matter how much we amend this bill, there is very little that can be done to improve the many bad provisions of S. 3065. This proposed legislation will severely weaken the Federal Election Commission as an effective independent enforcement agency. The bill strongly favors incumbent office holders by allowing them a veto over FEC opinions they dislike, a powerful option not available to their challengers. S. 3065 would also greatly weaken the two-party system, in my opinion. It contains a number of loopholes which will work to the advantage of special interest groups, labor unions and incumbent candidates, while discriminating against businessmen and private individuals.

S. 3065 is a mish-mash of ill-conceived proposals to change current campaign financing laws which, in my view, will seriously abridge the rights of ordinary Americans to contribute to and engage in the political process of our Nation.

I am extremely disappointed that the House and Senate Rules Committees held only brief hearings on S. 3065 and the Hays bill, H.R. 12015. It is disgraceful that the House and Senate Rules Committees would not consider alternative measures to a bill which was virtually written by the AFL–CIO. Before the Federal Election Commission is reconstituted or the campaign laws are radically revised, extensive hearings should be held and careful consideration should be given to the constitutionality, administrative feasibility and probable effects of various proposals on the Federal election process.

The President recommended that the Congress pass a simple bill reestablishing the Federal Election Commission and hold off on election reform measures until next year. I hope that the majority of my colleagues will heed his warning and will vote against S. 3065. Failing that, I pray that the President will veto this ill-conceived piece of legislation.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, the Senate first adopted public financing of Presidential elections in 1966. The Senate again passed Presidential public financing in 1970, as did the House, and in 1971 public financing of Presidential elections became law.

The amendment of the Senator from Connecticut would wipe the slate clean. The Weicker amendment would once again put the Presidency of the United States up for sale—to once again be auctioned off to the rich "fat cats" and special interest groups that have always dominated private campaign financing and always will.

As a member of the Subcommittee on Privileges and Elections, I will be delighted to hear the Senator's case after the 1976 election. Now is the wrong time.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, although we are still very early into our first experience with public financing of Presidential campaigns, I think we are beginning to realize that the concept is not everything its proponents have made it out to be. Unfortunately, I am afraid, it is much, much more—and in terms of taxpayers' dollars, that is of concern to every American citizen.

According to the Federal Election Commission's most recent figures, public matching funds have even now exceeded $20 million. The expectation is that they will go as high as $100 million by the November election. Moreover, the attraction of doubling one's money and using the proceeds to promote his personal ambitions promises to leave us with a large slate of candidates who will hang on just to keep the treasury bonuses coming in.

POLITICAL WELFARE REFORM

What all this means is that it is time to take another look at the public financing ideal. In that regard, I wish to commend the distinguished Senator from Connecticut (Mr. WEICKER) for bringing the matter to the attention of the Senate with this amendment—for which I offer my complete support. Certainly, he is right when he points out that the Politicians' Subsidy Act which we have now hardly represents real reform.

Those of us who were so critical of the concept during Senate debate on the 1974 amendments find it very difficult not to look back now and say, "I told you so." For instead of purifying the political process as it was supposed to do, it has resulted only in the proliferation of candidates whose causes have less support in votes than they do in Federal dollars.

PROMOTES EXCESS SPENDING

As the 1976 Presidential election moves forward toward its ultimate destiny of becoming the most expensive in history, I think the public is going to question more and more the entire notion of their tax dollars going to buy bumper stickers for a candidate with whose views they are totally unable to associate. When it is all over, we are going to have the same President we would have had without public financing—the only difference being that he will have spent twice as much in getting there.

Mr. President, it was my feeling 2 years ago—and it has not changed—that strict reporting and disclosure requirements—and not a mixture of private and public dollars—are the ingredients of true campaign reform. I also continue to believe that of the great many concerns on the list of the American people, the financial problems of politicians is not very high.

PUBLIC FINANCING UNNECESSARY

Besides being fundamentally dangerous, Mr. President, public financing is ineffective and, most of all, unnecessary. We simply do not need it because—regardless of all the crocodile tears on Capitol Hill—there is money to support the political system cleanly, honestly, and sufficiently, without milking the Federal Treasury. The campaigns of BARRY GOLDWATER in 1968 and GEORGE MCGOVERN in 1972 are the best evidence available that small contributors can be tapped—even against hopeless odds—to support major campaigns.

As far as I know we still subscribe to the free enterprise system in this country. And a basic element of that system is the old saying that if you build a better mousetrap the world will beat a path to your door.

I do not recall anything in the free enterprise ethic that mentions Government beating a path to your door with handouts if you merely want to build a better mousetrap. So why should there be any difference between mousetrap makers, shoe salesmen, lawyers—or politicians?

END COSTLY EXPERIMENT

Admittedly, there have been inequities in the state of political affairs—but these are never going to be corrected by an artificial "one-candidate, one-dollar" formula of equality among candidates. I think it is time we face up to that fact now and restore some confidence in our ability to make wise use of our constituents' tax dollars by adopting this amendment.

While it is too late to change the course of public financing events for our Bicentennial election year, perhaps its repeal during this historic period will be regarded in another 200 years as a landmark exercise in remedial legislation. For if we are honest enough to admit a mistake with the public financing experiment and refuse to impose its burdens on our electorate again, we will no doubt be accorded more than the casual degree of respect normally given a congressional body.

Mr. President, in urging my colleagues to support this worthwhile and expedient amendment, I would call their attention to an article from the most recent edition of U.S. News & World Report magazine entitled "When the Public Foots Bill for Politicians on the Stump." I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD following those remarks.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

$20 MILLION FOR STARTERS—WHEN THE PUBLIC FOOTS BILL FOR POLITICIANS ON THE STUMP

Taxpayers' cash for presidential candidates is running into big money. Now a move is on to help Congressmen campaign as well.

With more than seven months of electioneering yet to go, the federal plan to bankroll presidential campaigns already has begun to raise eyebrows.

Sheer costs is part of the concern.

So far, more than 11 million dollars in tax revenues has been funneled into the war chests of 14 presidential candidates. Several have spent most of their money and dropped out of the race.

In addition, an estimated 10 million dollars will be spent to provide Secret Service protection for candidates this year, as described on page 17.

And that 20 millions plus is only a starter. By the November election, federal subsidies for presidential campaigns are expected to reach 75 to 100 millions. What's more, a big push is on in Congress to provide taxpayers' dollars not only to presidential aspirants, but also to candidates for the Senate and the House of Representatives.

Reformers are talking about limiting subsidies for Congressmen this year. But if the plan approved by a Senate committee two years ago were to be adopted, the public could end up shelling out more than 350 millions in each four-year period to subsidize presidential and congressional politicking.

NOT REAL REFORM

"I can see an endless subsidization of campaigns going higher and higher year after year," complains Senator Lowell P. Weicker, Jr. (Rep.), of Connecticut, who served on the Senate Watergate Committee. "This is not real reform."

Besides the matter of dollars, other questions are being raised about the law. When enacted in 1974, the Election-Reform Act was aimed at removing the influence of big-money contributions on officeholders.

Limits were placed on the size of private contributions to candidates for the Presidency and Congress. A key part provided for Federal subsidies for candidates in presidential primaries. To qualify for these subsidies, a candidate must collect at least $5,000 in each of 20 States through private contributions of $250 or less.

Such money is then matched dollar for dollar up to a maximum of 5.4 million dollars per candidate for the primaries alone. The subsidy money comes from a special campaign "checkoff" fund in the U.S. Treasury. Taxpayers can divert $1 of their federal income-tax payments each year into the fund by checking a box on their tax return.

The whole question of the campaign law has been reopened on Capitol Hill by a recent Supreme Court decision.

The Court ruled on January 30 that the public financing of presidential campaigns is constitutional. However, it turned thumbs down on the body set up to administer the law—the Federal Election Commission—because of the manner in which its six members were appointed.

Congress, as a result, is now debating legislation to reorganize the Commission. In the process, legislators are battling over other parts of the law as well.

According to critics in and out of Washington, the present law makes it too easy for candidates to qualify for subsidies and enables them to remain eligible for subsidies even if they are defeated in primary after primary.

"We're subsidizing mediocrity," declares Senator Weicker.

ATTRACTS EVERY SQUIRREL

Says Representative Bill Frenzel (Rep.), of Minnesota: "Public financing attracts every squirrel in the cage, and it keeps them in there. They don't know when they're beaten."

Critics point out that even an antiabortion crusader, Ellen McCormack, has been able to qualify for $135,000 in public money, yet few voters take her seriously as a presidential contender.

Pennsylvania Governor Milton J. Shapp has collected $266,000 in campaign subsidies. But he received only 3 per cent of the vote in the Massachusetts primary and 2 per cent in Florida.

In an editorial urging Governor Shapp to "return to Pennsylvania," the Philadelphia Inquirer on March 11 said, "Still more of the cost of this exercise in futility is also borne by the taxpayers, who foot the bill for Secret Service agents protecting Milton Shapp from nonexistent crowds." On March 12 the Pennsylvania Governor pulled out of the presidential contest.

Three other Democratic recipients of subsidies—Senator Lloyd Bentsen of Texas, Senator Birch Bayh of Indiana and former North Carolina Governor Terry Sanford—dropped out of the presidential race when their campaigns flopped.

Yet they are still technically eligible for further matching funds, if they apply for them. They will not have to refund any portion of the public money given them until the end of the year after all their campaign debts are paid.

All told, the infusion of public money into the presidential-primary campaigns this year may well make them the most expensive in U.S. history, according to some estimates.

But defenders of public financing say it's achieving two of its main goals:

Making it easier for candidates of limited resources to get their views before the voters. "Fourteen candidates for the Presidency is not an untoward number for the early primaries," says Representative Phillip Burton (Dem.), of California. "Let's leave the choice up to the voters and not exclude candidates who don't happen to have a big block of money."

Reducing dependence on contributions from special interests who may seek favor in return. "A candidate without money has to take it from business or labor—then he is beholden to the giver," observes Representative Richard Ottinger (Dem.), of New York. "Money is the single most corrupting factor in politics. It was never contemplated by the Founding Fathers."

WISEST INVESTMENT

Arguing in the same vein, Senators such as Hugh Scott (Rep.) of Pennsylvania, Edward M. Kennedy (Dem.), of Massacchusetts, and Dick Clark (Dem.), of Iowa, term public financing "the wisest investment a taxpayer can make in the future of the country." They are leading sponsors of a bill that would extend public financing to congressional campaigns.

They argue that the case for their bill is made more compelling by the Supreme Court's ruling. One part of the ruling struck down the spending ceiling on congressional candidates.

Under the Court's interpretation, these ceilings can be reimposed only if candidates voluntarily accept the limits as a precondition for receiving campaign subsidies.

"Without spending ceilings, we're going to have to have seats going to the highest bidder. Congress will be back on the auction block," laments one Democrat.

SPECIAL-INTEREST MONEY

A study of Common Cause, the self-styled "citizens lobby," contends that special interests are primed for bigspending. According to the study.

As of January, special-interest war chests totaled 16.4 million dollars—40 per cent more than was on hand at the same point in the 1974 campaign.

Business, agricultural and professional groups raised 8.8 millions of this total, labor organizations 6.6 millions. The remainder was put up by other groups.

At the moment, Capitol Hill supporters of public financing for congressional races are pushing a plan that would divert any money left over in the presidential checkoff fund into this year's congressional campaigns.

This fund is expected to reach a total of 95 to 100 million dollars, but all but 25 million or less will probably be spent in the presidential-primary and general-election contests.

Funds left over would pay only a fraction of congressional-campaign costs, but backers of congressional financing would have a nose in the tent.

Whether or not such a plan wins approval this year, the use of taxpayers' money to bankroll political candidates is an issue that promises to grow in the months ahead.

AMENDMENT NO. 1447

Mr. BELLMON. Mr. President, I call up my amendment No. 1447.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PEARSON). The amendment will be stated.

The second assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Oklahoma (Mr. BELLMON) proposes Amendment No. 1447.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 51, after line 16, add the following:

TITLE IV—AMENDMENTS TO THE VOTING RIGHTS ACT OF 1965

SEC. 401. Section 14(c) of the Voting Rights Act of 1965 is amended by striking paragraph (3) and inserting the following new paragraph in lieu thereof:

"(3) The term 'language minorities' or 'language minority group' means persons who are American Indian, Asian American, Alaskan Natives, or of Spanish heritage, and whose dominant language is other than English.".

SEC. 402. Section 203 of the Voting Rights Act of 1965 is amended by striking subsection (e) and inserting the following new subsection in lieu thereof:

"(e) For purposes of this section, the term 'language minorities' or 'language minority group' means persons who are American Indian, Asian American, Alaskan Natives, or of Spanish heritage, and whose dominant language is other than English.".

Mr. BELLMON. Mr. President, this amendment would correct a flaw that exists, in my opinion, in the Voting Rights Extension Act which was passed last year. In that act, the purpose clause of the bill refers to the need to prevent voting discrimination against citizens of language minorities "from environments in which the dominant language is other than English." However, the qualifying phrase "whose dominant language is other than English" was missing from the definition sections stating which minority groups would be covered.

This amendment simply adds those words, and it stops the totally unnecessary practice that has been forced on us in Oklahoma of having interpreters present at voting places where the American Indians in our State vote. These Indians speak English. In many cases, they do not even have a written language other than English; but it terms of the law as it now exists, it is necessary for us to have interpreters present at those polling places, even though no one makes use of them.

This has caused a great hardship on our State. The law that now exists has done no good for the Indian citizens who do not need this help. It has caused a great hardship on our election officials and great expense to areas that in many cases are hard pressed to find the money to pay for these extra costs.

I have discussed the matter with both the manager of the bill and the ranking minority member, and I believe they have agreed to accept the amendment, unless something has happened in the last moment.

Mr. President, last July when the Senate passed the voting rights extension bill, I warned that it contained a provision which was totally unnecessary and which, if not removed, would prove to be both burdensome and costly in future elections. I refer to the requirement that political subdivisions conduct bilingual elections even though there is no single language minority.

At that time I sought to amend the bill to correct what appeared to be an oversight. The purpose clause of the bill referred to the need to prevent voting discrimination against citizens of language minorities "from environments in which the dominant language is other than English." However, the qualifying phrase, "whose dominant language is other than English" was missing from the definition sections stating which minority groups would be covered. My amendment simply sought to add those words.

My amendment was defeated, the bill was passed and signed into law, and the Department of Justice went to work to enforce its provisions.

For the benefit of those who chose not to heed my warning, I would like to touch briefly on what has taken place since the bill became law.

The Census Bureau determined that political subdivisions in 26 States would be required to conduct bilingual elections and otherwise provide special assistance to minority group voters. These groups included Spanish-speaking Americans, Asian Americans, Alaskan Natives, and American Indians.

Under the Census Bureau finding, seven States were required to provide the special assistance statewide. These States are: Alaska, Hawaii, Arizona, California, Colorado, New Mexico, and Texas. In the remaining States, some 270 counties fell under the guidelines. Those States are: Connecticut, Florida, Kansas, Louisiana, Minnesota, Mississippi, Montana, Maine, Nebraska, Nevada, North Dakota, New York, North Carolina, Oklahoma, Oregon, South Dakota, Utah, Washington, and Wyoming.

In Oklahoma, 25 of the State's 77 counties come under the provisions of the 1975 act—2 because of Spanish language minorities, the remainder because of their Indian population.

This law has been a particularly difficult problem for Oklahoma because more than 60 Indian tribes are represented in my State, and some of the tribes have more than one native language. But because Indians do not live on reservations in Oklahoma and have comingled with the rest of the population, they are accustomed to speaking and writing English. Few Oklahoma Indians can even understand their tribal language because it is no longer used. Many tribes do not even have a written language.

A census of the Choctaw Nation conducted by Oklahoma State University last year showed that less than 1 percent of the population did not speak English. All were in one county, McCurtain, and were over 65 years old.

In spite of the fact that English is the dominant language among Oklahoma Indians, and that tribal elections are conducted in English, Oklahoma election officials were confronted with an impossible situation in locating, transporting, and paying translators to comply with the law.

A good example of the difficulty faced by Oklahoma election officials is Sequoyah County. According to the Census Bureau, Sequoyah County has around 1,900 Cherokees, plus a few Creeks, Alabamas, Coushattas, Kaws, Omegas, Osages, Poncas, and Quapaws—nine different tribes. The county has 36 precincts, which means that to be in full compliance with the law, up to 324 interpreters would be needed to cover all the polling places.

A. J. Henshaw, Jr., secretary of the Sequoyah County Election Board, explained his plight in a letter to State Senator James E. Hamilton. Henshaw wrote:

> The procedures this county must adopt to comply with this Act are a financial burden our county is not able to bear. The minimum amount the Election Board could pay these people is $17 per day, plus mileage, assuming you could get the interpreters to work 12 straight hours for that amount. The cost for the interpreters for just one election would be in excess of $6,000.

Henshaw stated further:

> To find the 324 people who speak all of the respective languages that the Census Bureau alleges we have is virtually impossible.

Yet, Senator Hamilton has told me, representatives of the Justice Department have, in effect, threatened law suits against the individual election board workers if any of them fail to comply with this Federal edict.

Another election board secretary, Glenn Wood of Pawnee County wrote Assistant Attorney General J. Stanley Pottinger concerning the experience in his county in attempting to abide by the law in a city of Pawnee special election last November:

> After considerable searching, we finally found five Indians, one each for the five precincts in the City of Pawnee, who claimed they could speak both dialects of the Pawnee language, thus qualifying as interpreters for this election. Of 1,300 registered voters, we had a total vote cast of 825 of which 25 were Indians, none of whom requested or needed assistance in voting their ballot.

Wood said that in giving the interpreters their instructions prior to election day, they were asked for comments on the new law. He stated:

> Each of them made a very definite statement, stating in their opinion the law was ridiculous, not needed and an insult to the intelligence of the American Indian. They called attention to the fact that when they held their tribal elections all ballots and other materials necessary to the conducting of the election are printed in the English language only, and no effort is made to provide interpreters, due to the fact there are no Indians, at least in this area, but what understand and speak the English language.

The Mayes County Election Board secretary, Hetta Morgan, wrote me that the election officials in that county believe the bilingual election requirements are "an atrocious expense and certainly not a feasible or economical plan for our taxpaying people in Mayes County."

Oklahoma Indian tribal leaders are equally critical of the new law. When I explained the bill's provisions to Sylvester Tinker, Chief of the Osages, he was amazed. He told me that although far more than 5 percent of the voting age citizens in Osage County are Osage Indians, only a very few members of the tribe can read or speak the Osage language. Even as chief of the tribe, Tinker has difficulty himself in reading the Osage language although he can speak it fluently. Overton James, Governor of the Chickasaw Nation, wrote me that "in the Chickasaw Tribe, we have so few—in fact, I doubt any—who cannot read and understand English that it would be insignificant."

The Oklahoma State Election Board recently completed a survey concerning the implementation of the 1975 amendments to the 1965 Voting Rights Act in the 25 counties in Oklahoma affected by the act. Lee Slater, election board secretary, sent me a summary of the survey findings:

> School elections conducted throughout Oklahoma on January 27, 1976, presented the first opportunity for elections to be held simultaneously throughout the state since the Voting Rights Act became effective in those 25 counties.
>
> A total of 246 polling places were used for the school elections in the affected counties, and 42,154 persons cast ballots. Of that number, a total of 22 (Indians) requested assistance.
> County Election Boards provided a total of 116 interpreters—including 39 for Cherokee, 32 for Choctaw, 25 for Creek, six for Cheyenne, five for Chickasaw, three for Seminole, and one each for Apache, Shawnee, Spanish, Osage, Seneca-Cayuga and Pawnee.
> Of those requesting assistance, 15 requested assistance in Cherokee, six in Choctaw and one in Apache.

A total of $1,637.60 was paid to these interpreters. That figure does not include the cost of printing materials in Spanish, of meetings by the County Election Boards and other costs which probably tripled or quadrupled the total cost. As you can see, that is a very high cost per voter using the service.

Pointing out the problems that lie ahead, Slater said that for regular primary, runoff primary, and general elections in Oklahoma this year, the number of polling places will nearly triple the number used in school elections. Likewise, he said, the participation by voters will increase substantially, as school elections historically produce the smallest voter participation of any elections in Oklahoma.

Mr. President, I believe there is ample evidence, at least in my home State, to illustrate the absurdity of the bilingual provisions of the Voting Rights Act. It is a situation similar to that of the Boy Scout who sought to do a good deed by helping an elderly woman across the street. The problem was, she did not want to go.

Congress, through its failure to correct a technical error in the drafting of this law, has forced election officials in 26 States to provide assistance that is unneeded and unwanted, and which imposes an unnecessary additional financial burden upon the taxpayers of those States.

We should act now to rescind this legislative mistake by enacting my amendment.

This amendment will simply clarify the sections in titles II and III of the Voting Rights Act, defining the term "language minorities," by adding to the various groups listed—American Indians, Asian Americans, Alaskan Natives, and Americans of Spanish heritage—the qualifying phrase: "and whose dominant language is other than English." This clause more properly defines those single language minorities who should be subject to protection under the Voting Rights Act.

It should be emphasized that the language added by this amendment is not foreign to the bill. The phrase, "and whose dominant language is other than English," is identical to the purpose clause of the act which states:

The Congress finds that voting discrimination against citizens of language minorities is pervasive and national in scope. Such minority citizens are from environments in which the dominant language is other than English.

In addition, it should be noted that Senator STEVENS' amendment adding this identical language to the minority group "Alaskan Natives" was eventually accepted during floor debate on the Voting Rights Act. I am merely asking that this modification be extended to all groups.

The goal of the new bilingual provisions is a good and just one—to insure that no citizen is denied the right to vote because his dominant language is other than English. I fully support this goal and the remedial device, bilingual elections, as a means to guarantee full participation and equal voting rights.

However, there is one major flaw in these provisions. Because of the absence of the qualifying language from the purpose clause, "and whose dominant language is other than English," many political subdivisions will be forced to conduct bilingual elections even though there is no single language minority where 5 percent of the voting age citizens have a dominant language other than English.

The way to prevent this from occurring is for the Congress to adopt the language of my amendment, which will insure that the costly and burdensome bilingual registration and voting mechanism will only be applied where there is an actual need to assure citizens' voting rights because of an English deficiency.

State Senator Hamilton, a former president pro tempore of the Oklahoma State Senate, told me that if this law remains unchanged, he feels that mass resignations will result among election officials in Oklahoma. These officials know that they cannot comply with the law and simply will not take a chance on being sued by some Federal official because of their inability to do the impossible.

Time is of the essence in this matter because of the forthcoming elections.

This change will strengthen the act. The remedies and triggering provisions will remain intact. No instance of voting discrimination cited in either the House or Senate reports will fail to be corrected because of the adoption of this amendment. I urge its approval.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, I did tell the Senator that, so far as I was concerned, I would be willing to accept the amendment. However, that matter has been up on a previous occasion, when I was not the floor manager of the bill. The floor manager of that matter is in the Chamber, and I understand that he is strongly opposed to the amendment, so I will have to defer to Senator TUNNEY.

Mr. BELLMON. Mr. President, I did not know that this would be a matter in controversy. I understood that the amendment would be accepted. Perhaps I had better discuss the matter with Senator TUNNEY.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator withdraw his amendment?

Mr. BELLMON. I withdraw the amendment temporarily.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I send to the desk an unprinted amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk proceeded to read the amendment.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 22, beginning with "The" in line 22, strike out through line 2 on page 23 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"(7) The Commission shall make available to the public the results of any conciliation attempt, including any conciliation agreement entered into by the Commission, and any determination by the Commission that no violation of this Act or of chapter 95 or 96 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 has occurred.

On page 23, line 3, strike out "(7)" and insert in lieu thereof "(8)".

On page 23, line 21, strike out "(8)" and insert in lieu thereof "(9)".

On page 23, line 22, strike out "(7)" and insert in lieu theerof "(8)".

On page 23, line 25, strike out "(9)" and insert in lieu thereof "(10)".

On page 24, line 22, strike out "(10)" and insert in lieu thereof "(11)".

On page 25, line 4, strike out "(11)" and insert in lieu thereof "(12)".

On page 25, line 8, strike out "(12)" and insert in lieu thereof "(13)".

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, this is a technical amendment. The enforcement provisions of S. 3065, embodied in section 313, specify that:

The Commission shall make available to the public the results of any conciliation attempt, including any conciliation agreement entered into by the Commission, and any determinations by the Commission that no violation of the Act or chapter 95 or 96 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 has occurred.

Unfortunately, Mr. President, this important provision inadvertently was tacked on as part of the civil penalty provision, section 313(a)(6). To avoid any possible confusion, my amendment would simply provide that this provision be redesignated as a new subsection (7).

Mr. CANNON. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK. I yield.

Mr. CANNON. Do I understand correctly, then, that there is no change other than a renumbering in the bill itself?

Mr. CLARK. That is exactly right.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, I have no objection to that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PERCY). The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I send to the desk an unprinted amendment and ask that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk proceeded to read the amendment.

Mr. CLARK. I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 46, line 14, after "Sec. 301." insert the following: "(a)".

On page 47, between lines 7 and 8, insert the following:

(b) For purposes of applying section 9006 (d) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954, as amended by subsection (a), expenditures made by an individual after January 29, 1976, and before the date of enactment of this Act shall not be taken into account.

On page 50, after the matter between lines 6 and 7, insert the following:

(c) For purposes of applying section 9006 (d) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954, as amended by subsection (a), expenditures made by an individual after January 29, 1976, and before the date of enactment of this Act shall not be taken into account.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, S. 3065 reinstates the $50,000 limit on personal expenditures by a Presidential candidate as a condition for receiving public financing in accordance with the Supreme Court decision in Buckley against Valeo. It is important, however, that no candidate be penalized for any personal expenditures he or she may have made between the time of the Supreme Court decision and the day of enactment of this act. My amendment, therefore, would simply stipulate that personal expenditures made between January 29, 1976, the date of Buckley against Valeo, and the enactment of this bill shall not count toward the personal limitation.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, it seems to me that the amendment is a good amendment, simply making one change, that people who may have expended money after January 29, 1976, and before the date of the enactment, should not be taken into account, covering the interim period of the Supreme Court decision. I think the amendment should be accepted. I approve of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I send to the desk an unprinted amendment and ask that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

On page 18, line 24, strike out "prescribe rules or regulations" and insert in lieu thereof "propose a rule or regulation in accordance with the provisions of chapter 5 of title 5, United States Code,".

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, section 107(b) of the bill requires that an advisory opinion of general applicability must be prescribed as a rule or regulation within 30 days. This would conflict with the provisions of the Administrative Procedures Act, which requires that a proposed regulation must appear in the Federal Register to allow for a 30-day period of comment before a regulation can be formally prescribed. Obviously, both provisions cannot be met; they are in contradiction. This amendment simply would stipulate that the Commission, within 30 days, would have to propose a rule or regulation in accordance with the procedures set forth in the Administrative Procedures Act.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, the Senator is correct that the word "prescribed" should be changed to "proposed" rule or regulation. I am willing to accept the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I send to the desk an unprinted amendment and ask that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk proceeded to read the amendment.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 9, line 7, after "party" insert the following: "(unless the person paying for such services is a person other than the employer of the individual rendering such services)".

On page 9, line 14, after "1954" insert the following: "(unless the person paying for such services is a person other than the employer of the individual rendering such services)".

On page 10, line 9, after "party" insert the following: "(unless the person paying for such services is a person other than the employer of the individual rendering such services)".

On page 10, line 17, after "1954" insert the following: "(unless the person paying for such services is a person other than the employer of the individual rendering such services)".

On page 50, line 24, after "party" insert the following: "(unless the person paying for such services is a person other than the employer of the individual rendering such services)".

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, this amendment simply seeks to clarify the sections added in committee with regard to legal and accounting services. It is clear that the committee's intent was to exempt certain specified legal and accounting services from the contribution and expenditure limits in the act. However, it was certainly not the committee's intent to allow outside individuals or groups to pick up the tab for these services. My amendment would simply clarify that point.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, the Senator is correct. This amendment would properly clarify the intent of the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I send to the desk an unprinted amendment and ask that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

On page 12, lines 18 and 19, strike "totaling in excess of $5,000, or made expenditures totaling in excess of $5,000," and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "or made expenditures or both, the total amount of which, taken together, exceeds $5,000,".

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, during committee consideration of the bill now before us, some confusion arose regarding the off-year reporting exemption provided for in section 104. Briefly put, this provision was intended to provide that in any quarter of a nonelection year in which a candidate's campaign committee engaged in less than $5,000 of activity, the committee will not be required to report such activity until the end of the calendar year.

Because of some ambiguity in the original language, an amendment was offered which changed the meaning of that section so that the exemption would apply if the candidate's committee received less than $5,000 in contributions or made less than $5,000 in expenditures, taken separately.

My amendment simply would restore the original intent of the provision, which would now stipulate that if a candidate's authorized committees received contributions or made expenditures, or both, the total of which taken together was $5,000 or less, the committees would not have to report to the Federal Election Commission until the end of the calendar year.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, that amendment is acceptable and I am willing to accept it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I send to the desk an unprinted amendment and ask that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk proceeded to read the amendment.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 21, line 21, insert ", including a civil penalty which does not exceed the greater of $5,000 or an amount equal to the amount of any contribution or expenditure involved in such violation," immediately after "order".

On page 22, line 1, insert ", including a civil penalty which does not exceed the greater of $5,000 or an amount equal to the amount of any contribution or expenditure involved in such violation," immediately after "other order".

On page 22, beginning with line 13, strike out through line 2 on page 23 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"(6)(A) If the Commission believes that there is clear and convincing proof that a knowing and willful violation of the Act or chapter 95 or 96 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 has been committed, any conciliation agreement entered into by the Commission under paragraph (5)(A) may include a requirement that the person involved in such conciliation agreement shall pay a civil penalty which does not exceed the greater of (i) $10,000; or (ii) an amount equal to 300 percent of the amount of any contribution or expenditure involved in such violation.

"(B) If the Commission believes that a violation of this Act or of chapter 95 or chapter 96 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 has been committed, a conciliation agreement entered into by the Commission under paragraph (5)(A) may include a requirement that the person involved in such conciliation agreement shall pay a civil penalty which does not exceed the greater of (i) $5,000; or (ii) an amount equal to the amount of the contribution or expenditure involved in such violation.

"(C) The Commission shall make available to the public the results of any conciliation attempt including any conciliation agreement entered into by the Commission and any determination by the Commission that no violation of the Act or chapter 95 or 96 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 has occurred.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, the civil penalty provisions now in S. 3065 provide for penalties only in the case of "knowing and willful" violations of the act. In other words, the Commission must be able to demonstrate criminal intent even to assess civil penalties. Gross negligence, therefore, would go completely unpunished.

The purpose of this amendment is to add language already in the House bill, to provide a civil penalty of $5,000 or 100 percent of the amount involved in the violation, whichever is greater, for any violation of the act.

At present, the Federal Election Campaign Act provides for a criminal penalty for any violation. This amendment would simply provide a minimal civil penalty for any violation.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, that amendment of the Senator's is acceptable.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I send to the desk an unprinted amendment and ask that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

On page 44, line 2, strike the period and insert the following: ", except that in the case of a knowing and willful violation of section 325 or 326, the penalties set forth in this section shall apply to a violation involving an amount having a value in the aggregate of $250 or more during a calendar year. In the case of a knowing and willful violation of section 328, the penalties set forth in this section shall apply without regard to whether the making, receiving, or reporting of a contribution or expenditure of $1,000 or more was involved.".

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, under the Federal Election Campaign Act as it now stands there are extensive and severe penalties, criminal penalties, for any violation which falls under the act.

The bill now before us, S. 3065, establishes a new and elaborate civil penalty structure and combines all criminal penalties into one new section 329.

Unfortunately, as it is presently written, section 329 contains three significant weaknesses, in my judgment, which this amendment is designed to correct. Both the present law and S. 3065 contain a vitally important prohibition against making cash contributions which are in excess of $100.

We all know, Mr. President, that the unrestricted flow of cash in political campaigns was at the very heart of the Watergate affair, and that it represents by far the most serious threat to effective enforcement and administration of the campaign law.

Because the general penalty provision of section 329 contains criminal sanctions only for violations which are in excess of $1,000, a significant gap would occur between the criminal provision and the prohibition against cash contributions.

I recognize that there is some concern about providing criminal penalties for rather minor violations of the act. Therefore, Mr. President, my amendment would stipulate that the criminal penalties of section 329 would apply in any violation involving cash contributions of $250 or more. Cash is so dangerous that we are lowering the threshold, in other words, from $1,000 to $250.

Mr. President, just as both the present law and S. 3065 provide a separate provision against cash contributions so do they also provide a separate provision to prohibit the earmarking of contributions. Earmarking—where a contribution is funneled through an intermediary to a candidate—is a practice which represents a very serious threat to the integrity of the contribution limits provided in the campaign law.

Therefore, Mr. President, as with cash contributions this amendment would establish a $250 criminal penalty threshold for violations of this important section.

Finally, Mr. President, because the structure of section 329 connects the criminal penalties to violations involving a certain amount of money, S. 3065 now contains no criminal penalty to cover the fraudulent misrepresentation of campaign authority provision embodied in section 328 of this bill. This amendment would simply add a criminal penalty to cover this section.

This amendment would represent, I think, an important strengthening of the the criminal provisions of S. 3065 and I urge its adoption.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, I have discussed this amendment with the distinguished Senator, and I think it is a valuable addition to the bill, and I am willing to accept the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I send to the desk an unprinted amendment and ask that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

On page 44, strike out lines 3 through 11 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"(b) A defendant in any criminal action brought for the violation of a provision of this Act, or of a provision of chapter 95 or 96 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954, may introduce as evidence of his lack of knowledge of or intent to commit the offense for which the action was brought a conciliation agreement entered into between the defendant and the Commission under section 313 which specifically deals with the act or failure to act constituting such offense and which is still in effect.".

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, section 329 (b) of the measure before us, S. 3065, stipulates that once a person has entered into a conciliation agreement with the Federal Election Commission, the Department of Justice would be barred from initiating any action relating to the violation dealt with in the agreement.

My own concern goes to this point: No one would want the Department of Justice to be continually undercutting the actions of the Federal Election Commission, by initiating criminal prosecutions against people who have already entered into conciliation agreements with the FEC. Nevertheless, I do not believe we would want the FEC to be able to go completely unchallenged in entering into such agreements.

If the Commission should enter into a particularly weak agreement, even in the face of a serious violation of the act, it should be held accountable for such an action. Prohibiting criminal prosecutions by the Justice Department would eliminate this necessary check.

Furthermore, Mr. President, section 329(b) would be an unprecedented restriction on the prosecutorial powers of the Attorney General. A mere agreement entered into by an independent executive branch agency would, in and of itself, be enough to tie the hands of the Justice Department.

This amendment seeks to strike a balance between the intent of the provision, on the one hand, and the important issue of Commission accountability, on the other. It would provide that a defendant in a criminal action brought for the violation of a provision of this act could introduce as evidence of his lack of knowledge of and/or intent to commit the offense for which the action was brought the fact that a conciliation agreement regarding the offense had already been entered into with the Commission.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, the original provision in the bill S. 3065, as we presented it here, was the result of an amendment of the Senator from Alabama, and I would like to have him respond as to whether or not he believes this language is adequate. It seems to me it probably is, but I would like to defer to the distinguished Senator from Alabama on this point.

Mr. ALLEN. Yes, I agree with the thrust of the Senator's amendment.

I think it ought to be stated that it not only be, the conciliation agreement not only be, received as evidence of lack of knowledge of the offense or lack of intent. I think it might add some wording to the effect that it be considered in mitigation of the offense, some language of that sort which, I think, would be helpful.

I wonder if the Senator would consider adding a clause to that effect?

Mr. CLARK. A clause to the effect that what?

Mr. ALLEN. That the conciliation agreement that bars any civil action, I believe, even under the Senator's amendment, that that would be accepted in evidence, I believe, under the Senator's amendment, as evidence of lack of knowledge of the offense and of lack of intent to violate the law. Could it not also be added that it could be accepted in mitigation of the offense?

Mr. CLARK. Well, does the Senator have specific language to offer at this time?

Mr. ALLEN. I think it might be well if we passed this one over. The Senator has had about eight amendments adopted, and possibly other Senators might have some amendments, and it would give us an opportunity to discuss this amendment.

Mr. CLARK. Fine.

Mr. President, I withdraw the pending amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I have an additional amendment to send to the desk and I ask that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

On page 27, beginning with line 16, strike out through "graph," on line 16 on page 28 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 320. (a)(1) No person shall make contributions—

"(A) to any candidate and his authorized political committees with respect to any election for Federal office which, in the aggregate, exceed $1,000;

"(B) to any political committee established and maintained by a political party, which is not the authorized political committee of any candidate, in any calendar year which, in the aggregate, exceed $25,000; or

"(C) to any other political committee in any calendar year which, in the aggregate, exceed $5,000.

"(2) No multicandidate political committee shall make contributions—

"(A) to any candidate and his authorized political committees with respect to any election for Federal office which, in the aggregate, exceed $5,000;

"(B) to any political committee established and maintained by a political party, which is not the authorized committee of any candidate in any calendar year, which, in the aggregate, exceed $25,000; or

"(C) to any other political committee in any calendar year which, in the aggregate, exceed $10,000.

For purposes of this paragraph, the term 'multicandidate political committee' means a political committee which has been registered under section 303 for a period of not less than six months, which has received contributions from more than fifty persons, and, except for any State political party organization, has made contributions to five or more candidates for Federal office.

"(3) For purposes of the limitations under paragraphs (1) and (2),

On page 29, line 9, strike out "(3)" and insert in lieu thereof "(4)".

On page 29, line 16, strike out "(4)" and insert in lieu thereof "(5)".

On page 30, line 14, strike out "(5)" and insert in lieu thereof "(6)".

On page 30, line 22, strike out "(6)" and insert in lieu thereof "(7)".

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, this obviously is not a technical amendment. It is a substantive amendment.

S. 3065 retains the $1,000 limitation on contributions by an individual to a candidate and the $5,000 limitation on contributions by a political committee to a candidate.

However, S. 3065 also retains the unnecessarily high limitation of $25,000 for contributions by an individual to a multicandidate political committee and imposes merely a $25,000 limitation on transfers of funds from one noncandidate committee to another.

In light of the Supreme Court decision against the constitutionality of expenditure limitations, these $25,000 limits on contributions to political committees clearly are inadequate. Such high limitations will only serve to vastly increase the already disproportionate influence of the wealthy and the special interests in the political process.

The purpose of this amendment is to establish a new $5,000 limitation on contributions by an individual to a multicandidate political committee. However, an individual would still be permitted to contribute up to $25,000 to a political committee established and maintained by a political party, which, of course, generally supports the activities of all the candidates of that particular party.

Further, my amendment would establish a new $10,000 limitation on transfers of funds from one political committee to another.

Again, however, transfers of funds from any committee to a party committee would still be permitted in amounts up to $25,000.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The second assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STONE). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, if no one else wishes to speak on this amendment, we could proceed to vote.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second. There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the Senator from Iowa. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. So Mr. CLARK's amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CRANSTON. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. BROCK. Mr. President, I have two amendments at the desk which I offer on behalf of myself and the Senator from Florida (Mr. STONE) and the Senator from California (Mr. CRANSTON). I ask unanimous consent that they be considered en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendments will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

On page 27, strike out lines 11 through 14, and insert the following in lieu thereof: "is amended—

"(1) by inserting '(a)' before 'No' in section 318 (2 U.S.C. 439b), as redesignated by section 105 of this Act;

"(2) by adding the following new subsection at the end of section 318 (2 U.S.C. 439b), as redesignated by section 105 of this Act:

'(b) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, no Senator, Representative, Resident Commissioner, or Delegate shall mail as franked mail under section 3210 of title 39, United States Code, any general mass mailing when such mailing is mailed at or delivered to any postal facility less than 60 days prior to the date of any primary or general election in which such Senator, Representative, Resident Commissioner, or Delegate is a candidate for Federal office. For purposes of this subsection the term "general mass mailing" means newsletters and similar mailings of more than 500 pieces the content of which is substantially identical and which are mailed to or delivered to any postal facility at the same time or several different times.';

"(3) by striking out section 320 (2 U.S.C. 441), as redesignated by section 105 of this Act; and

"(4) by inserting after section 319 (2 U.S.C. 439c), as redesignated by such section 105, the following new sections:".

At the end of the bill, add the following new title:

TITLE IV—MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS

USE OF FRANKED MAIL BEFORE ELECTIONS

SEC. 401. Section 3210(a)(5)(D) of title 39, United States Code, is amended to read as follows:

"(D) any general mass mailing when the same is mailed at or delivered to any postal facility less than 60 days prior to the date of a primary, general, or special election, or a nominating caucus or convention, for any Federal office which is held in the State, district, or territory from which he was elected. For the purpose of this subparagraph, the term 'general mass mailing' shall mean newsletters and similar mailings of more than 500 pieces in which the content of the matter mailed is substantially identical and which are mailed at or delivered to any postal facility at the same time or at several different times.".

Mr. BROCK. Mr. President, these two amendments do identical things. One amends the existing law on the Federal Election Commission and the other amends the Postal Code. The purpose of the amendments is very simple and very clear. It is to prohibit the use of the frank for mass mailing purposes for a period of 60 days prior to an election.

I remind my colleagues that the Senate has already adopted this posture in the past; that, as a matter of fact, in the last consideration of this particular piece of legislation, we adopted, I think, an identical amendment.

On consideration by the House, the term of the prohibition was reduced from 60 to 28 days. The reason I offer this, then, is to restate and attempt to reestablish the Senate position, simply because, if there is one simple criterion that should be in this bill, it is equity for all parties. There is no one who can successfully challenge the fact that an incumbent with an unlimited use of the frank has an unbelievable advantage over any potential challenger which can be almost impossible to overcome. What we try to do with this particular amendment that the Senator from California and I have worked on, together with the Senator from Florida, is create a time frame during which no special advantage would accrue to the incumbent but, rather, that the two candidates can compete with each other on their merits before the people of their respective constituencies so that the people can make their own determination.

I shall be delighted to yield to the Senator from Florida if he wishes to comment.

Mr. CRANSTON. I am delighted to join with the Senator from Tennessee in this very important amendment, which is a needed reform relating to the use of the frank. I hope that it will be adopted unanimously.

Mr. BROCK. I thank the Senator for his comment. May I say he has been a long-time leader in this effort. I appreciate very much his support.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I wish to join with the Senator from Tennessee, as well. Certainly, it is a well-known fact that incumbents have an enormous advantage in elections now. Although this is not going to correct the balance entirely, it is a very significant step in that direction, and I wish to support it, also.

Mr. BROCK. I thank the Senator for his comments and support.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, the Senator is correct. The Senate has adopted that position in the past. We were required in conference to give up on that particular point and take a shorter period of time. I certainly supported the provision before, and I am willing to support it now. Unless some of my colleagues object to it, I am willing to accept the amendment.

Mr. BROCK. I am very grateful. I am prepared for a vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to en bloc.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, I have an amendment at the desk that I wish to call up. It does not have a number. It was handed in only several hours ago.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The second assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

On page 37, beginning with line 22, strike out through line 3 on page 38 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"(3) It shall not be unlawful under this section for a corporation or a separate segregated fund established by a corporation to solicit contributions from stockholders and their families or from employees of the corporation (whether or not they are members of a labor organization) and their families. It shall not be unlawful under this section for a labor organization or a separate segregated fund created by a labor organization to solicit contributions from members of that organization and their families or from stockholders or employees of a corporation and their families if that organization is the labor representative of some employees of that corporation in dealing with that corporation as to matters of pay, working conditions, and other benefits.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, I shall explain what this amendment is, and it is controversial. I expect a rollcall vote on it.

This amendment would strike out the present provision of the bill indicating whom unions can solicit in a corporation and whom a business political action fund can solicit in a corporation and, in essence, lets everybody solicit everybody in the corporation. A union or a separate segregated union fund can solicit any union employees of the corporation or any nonunion employees of the corporation. It may happen to be nonsupervisory personnel. They can solicit administrative and executive personnel, officers, stockholders, and the families of any of those people.

Conversely, a fund created by the corporation can solicit shareholders, executive personnel, administrative personnel, nonunion personnel, and union personnel.

The amendment, pretty much, puts the situation back where the Federal Election Commission had left it with their rulings in the creation of what was known as the SUNPAC decision. It seems to me that, in fairness and in equity, if a union can solicit the union employees of a corporation, as is now presented in the bill, they ought to have equal access to solicit the nonunion and nonsupervisory employees. And there is no reason why they should not be allowed to mail to the shareholders of a corporation, asking those shareholders to contribute to a union fund or a separate segregated fund provided by the union.

Again, it treats unions and businesses equitably. Any money raised by these funds would have to be disclosed, any money spent would have to be disclosed. I think it is a step toward encouraging political participation, because it will encourage people to give to whatever fund they choose and they can be equally solicited by either side.

I yield the floor, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The second assistant legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I announce that the Senator from Idaho (Mr. CHURCH), the Senator from New Hampshire (Mr. DURKIN), the Senator from Indiana (Mr. HARTKE), the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. HOLLINGS), the Senator from Washington (Mr. JACKSON), the Senator from South Dakota (Mr. MCGOVERN), the Senator from Wisconsin (Mr. NELSON), the Senator from Rhode Island (Mr. PASTORE), and the Senator from New Jersey (Mr. WILLIAMS) are necessarily absent.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Rhode Island (Mr. PASTORE) and the Senator from Washington (Mr. JACKSON) would each vote "nay."

Mr. GRIFFIN. I announce that the Senator from Oklahoma (Mr. BARTLETT), Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. BROOKE), Senator from New York (Mr. BUCKLEY), Senator from Arizona (Mr. GOLDWATER), and Senator from North Dakota (Mr. YOUNG) are necessarily absent.

I further announce that the Senator from Vermont (Mr. STAFFORD) is absent due to illness.

So the amendment of the Senator from Oregon was rejected.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the note by which the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, I am curious, because I do have other——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. PACKWOOD. I do have other amendments to offer and I shall offer them. I am trying to reach some common ground, some median that this body will regard as fair to unions and to employers. This last amendment, which was defeated by a 45-to-40 vote, would have allowed union political action funds to solicit anybody in a corporation that that union had any organization in, and it would have allowed a corporate political fund to solicit any of the employees. It was a complete crossover.

As we heard the vote going on, several people asked me about it and they expressed the feeling that maybe the corporation should not be allowed to solicit union employees, although I see no reason not to allow it. It seems to me that a union employee might have as much interest in his corporation that employs him as he does in the union he belongs to. But that is neither here nor there. The amendment lost.

The feeling was expressed that a corporation should not solicit from union employees. Others said that unions should not be soliciting from shareholders and executive personnel, administrative personnel, because basically their alinement was not with the union and everybody ought to be left to solicit really those with whom they have a common interest.

Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment. I ask that it be read in full and I ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

On page 37, beginning with line 22, strike out through line 3 on page 38 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"(3) (A) It is lawful for a corporation, or a separate segregated fund established by a corporation, to solicit contributions to such fund under paragraph (1) from stockholders and their families and from executive and administrative personnel and their families.

"(B) It is lawful for a labor organization, or a separate segregated fund established by a labor organization, to solicit contributions to such fund under paragraph (1) from members of that organization and their families.

"(C) It is lawful under this section for a corporation, a labor organization, or a separate segregated fund established by a corporation or a labor organization to solicit contributions from employees of a corporation, and their families, who are neither executive and administrative personnel nor members of that labor organization.

(D) It shall be unlawful under this section—

"(i) for a corporation, or a separate segregated fund established by a corporation, to solicit contributions from employees of that corporation who are represented by a labor organization in dealing with that corporation with respect to matters of pay, working conditions, and other employee benefits, and

"(ii) for a labor organization, or a separate segregated fund established by a labor organization, to solicit contributions from stockholders of a corporation and their families or from executive and administrative personnel of a corporation and their families.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, this is what is called the middle ground amendment. I had the Library of Congress check for me with the major corporations in this country to find out how many total employees they had, how many were unionized, how many were nonunionized. Let me just go down the list.

General Motors has 480,000 employees in this country. There are 352,000 who are unionized and 128,000 are not.

Ford Motor Co. has 206,000 employees. There are 138,500 who are unionized, and 66,791 are not.

International Telephone & Telegraph refused the information.

General Electric has 270,000 employees. There are 118,000 who are unionized, and 152,000 not unionized.

International Business Machines—and I checked this figure by calling one of their officers today because I found it hard to believe but it is true—International Business Machines has 157,000 employees in this country and none are unionized, period. Zero.

Chrysler has 129,000 employees of which 105,000 are unionized. There are 24,000 not unionized.

Westinghouse Electric: 130,000 total; 78,000 unionized, 52,000 not unionized.

Western Electric: 149,700 employees. There are 98,428 who are unionized, and 51,272 not unionized.

Goodyear Tire and Rubber: 80,600 employees. There are 40,000 who are unionized, and 40,600 are not unionized.

If we add all of these up, what we come to is this situation with the major industrial corporations in this country: About half of what we would call their blue collar or nonsupervisory white-collar employees are unionized and about half are not.

Under what was called the SUNPAC decision of the Federal Election Commission, all of the employees of a corporation, whether they were unionized or not, could have been solicited by a business or a union political action fund or a lawfulness or a union political action fund or a lawfully separate segregated fund.

After that decision came down, there was strong opposition to it, frankly, strong opposition from unions. They did not like the idea that unions and businesses would have an equal access to all employees. So an amendment was offered to this bill and it carried in committee, and a similar amendment carried in the House in the committee, which limits unions to soliciting only union employees, and it limits a corporate political action fund to soliciting only shareholders or very high echelon executive and administrative personnel. In each case either of those funds can solicit the families. But it leaves out this great middle group. These nonsupervisory, nonunionized employees, who are half of the work force of the major corporations in this country cannot be solicited by the union and cannot be solicited by the employer.

They surely have a stake in what goes on that might affect their company. They surely have a stake in what the unions who represent half of the employees of that company may advocate. Yet they cannot be solicited.

So, all I am doing with this middle ground amendment is allowing those employees who at the moment are nonunionized and nonsupervisory to be solicited by a union political action fund or a corporate political action fund.

Just let me read a selective list of the kinds of employees we are talking about:

We all know the kind of employee we are talking about. Is there any reason why they should be excluded from either a union political action solicitation or a corporate political action solicitation?

I want to make clear in this amendment we are not saying that a union or business political action fund can solicit somebody unrelated to the corporation. Business cannot use its political action fund to go out and solicit shareholders of other corporations or employees of other corporations, nor can a union go outside the corporation where it is organized and solicit willy-nilly from other employees or from the public at large.

I think in fairness, in trying to reach a middle ground, this amendment does give an evenhanded chance to both groups to reach a group of employees that at the moment cannot be solicited by either group. I think that is unfair.

I have given up, although I was unhappy with the defeat of the amendment, employers soliciting union members and unions soliciting shareholders or higher echelon executive personnel.

Mr. BUMPERS. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. PACKWOOD. I yield.

Mr. BUMPERS. The last amendment which was just defeated, I think, troubled most of the Members in this body for a very simple reason: Everybody is concerned about the possibilities of a gentle, nevertheless overt, pressure when employees are solicited by their employer.

It is no less true in some instances, and I know you are all talking about employees who belong to unions who might be solicited by shop stewards by at least a gentle pressure that is always there. The Senator's amendment, if I understand correctly, would, for example, permit a small employer with perhaps 100 employees that are nonunion to solicit those 100 employees for his political action committee; would that be correct?

Mr. PACKWOOD. For his nonunion employees, yes; that is correct.

Mr. BUMPERS. Provided they are nonunion.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Pardon me?

Mr. BUMPERS. Provided they are nonunion.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Yes.

Mr. BUMPERS. If they are nonunion employees, he may solicit them.

Mr. PACKWOOD. That is correct.

Mr. BUMPERS. The thing that troubles me about that is that it occurs to me that the pressure is really more stark in the instance where the employee is not unionized and does not have anyone as a bulwark between him and the employer. He has no organization; he has no one to protect him if he decides to say no to the employer. Does the Senator not see that as a problem?

Mr. PACKWOOD. It is a problem. It is illegal under existing law to coerce or pressure anyone into making contributions, but the Senator from Arkansas is correct; I will admit it is a problem, but a problem we disregard when we passed the remission of the Hatch Act this last week. The fear was expressed that people would be solicited in the Federal Government and, because they were worried about their jobs or desired promotions, they might give. But that argument at that time did not wash.

Mr. BUMPERS. I thank the Senator. That answers my question. I see the Senator is cognizant of the problem. I am not talking about the question of where there is overt pressure to either give or you will not have a job next week, but I think the pressure is there, and that troubles me.

Mr. BROCK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PACKWOOD. I yield.

Mr. BROCK. I just wanted to tell the Senator from Arkansas, because I think I agree with him on the problem, that I realize that what the Senator from Oregon is reaching for is a situation where a salesman, for example, for a particular company, cannot be solicited by either side. That does not seem to limit the access to the persons, and I do not know how to resolve it without some amendment of this sort. If the Senator wanted to offer a modification which would say hourly employees in a nonunion plant could not be solicited, I might be willing to take a look at that. But I think you have got to find some way other than a rejection of the amendment to deal with the problem.

I have here, I do not know, there are about 150 occupational codes listed by Civil Service of types of occupations which fall between the cracks. How do you handle that? That is the basic problem.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. PACKWOOD. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. I am just trying to anticipate what would happen under this amendment, as I understand it, if you have a nonunion shop, where there is no union. The employees who work for that corporation, the nonunion employees, would be open game for the corporation to solicit for funds, but no labor union would be allowed to solicit them, since they do not have a labor union. Am I right or wrong about that?

Mr. PACKWOOD. That is true. The reason for that is—so far as I am concerned, I would be delighted to open it up and find out whether or not we are talking about corporations, but this Senator wanted to narrow that, to show there is no interest in a corporation on the part of a union that never bothered to organize it.

Mr. CLARK. Well, if that is the case, under the Senator's amendment, as I understand it, the only available new people for the union to solicit are those in a plant where there is a union, but where the employees have refused to join that union or do not belong to that union. Those are the only additional people, under the Senator's amendment, who would be available for unions to solicit, are they not?

Mr. PACKWOOD. Yes; if there is no union in the plant, then the union cannot solicit those employees.

Mr. CLARK. And in those plants where there is a union, the only new source of recruitment for funding would be from those members who have decided against joining the union; is that correct?

Mr. PACKWOOD and Mr. BROCK addressed the Chair.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Go ahead.

Mr. BROCK. I was going to say if they have a boilermaker's union, for example, they would rarely ask the artist in the PR department to join. As a matter of fact, I do not think they would give him the opportunity; he is not considered suitable by the union, since unions organize by their own crafts.

Mr. CLARK. So the Senator is saying nonorganized crafts within the same shop?

Mr. BROCK. Sure.

Mr. CLARK. As I understand the law now, a corporation under the law may use a checkoff system for either stockholders, executive employees, or, indeed, any employees.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Under the present law, under the SUNPAC decision, that is true. Under this bill it is very limited as to whom they can solicit.

Mr. CLARK. Well, to make my question very clear, as I understand it a corporation under present law my use a checkoff system to collect funds from those people who are eligible to give funds to them.

Mr. PACKWOOD. If a person wants to volunteer and say, "Yes, you may use a checkoff and take a dollar out of my salary or my dividends each year," that is permitted.

Mr. CLARK. That is correct, it is permitted under the law, but as I understand it, under the Taft-Hartley law unions may not use a checkoff for a similar purpose. Is that correct?

Mr. PACKWOOD. No, I do not think that is correct. Under the bill, on page 38, unions would be allowed to check off.

Mr. CLARK. So under this system both unions and corporations would be allowed to use a checkoff for additional recruits that are going to be made available?

Mr. PACKWOOD. They do not have to. They could, according to what we have been talking about today. It applies to both unions and corporations. If one does it, the other can do it.

Mr. CLARK. I thank the Senator.

Mr. BROCK. Mr. President, I want to be very sure we understand what we are doing here. I am sympathetic with what the Senator from Iowa was doing, by implication at least, and I think the Senator from Arkansas; and I would like to be very honest: any of these pacts, they all bother me. There is implict in a pact, if not the fact at least the opportunity for pressure. That bothers me greatly. It occurs just as much in a union shop as it does with a corporation soliciting its lower management group, and I think it is something we ought to be troubled about, and we ought to be extremely careful what we do.

I do not know how to resolve that, because I do not know how to limit voluntary associations for public purposes. I think they are very good, but, boy, it does trouble me to have a law setting these things up with full understanding, in a posture whereby people can be abused, or at least be concerned about being abused. That is the real danger. They do not know what is going to happen. They do not know if they are going to have their union card pulled, or if they are going to lose that opportunity for promotion.

But we had the same problem in the Hatch Act debate, as the Senator from Oregon pointed out. I think the Senate made a mistake in that case. I voted against that bill, but I was in the distinct minority. I think we may be making a mistake again.

The only argument I have on this amendment is as to the merit of the pact. I cannot make that argument, because I am not sure I believe in it. But I think if we have a law it should apply to all individuals. That is all the Senator from Oregon is saying, that these people should not be allowed to fall between the cracks because they happen to be a bookkeeper-clerk, an artist, or a comparison shopper. That is all.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from Tennessee. I would be very happy if it were constitutional. If we could pass a law in this country that would say there could be no political action funds and all contributions must be individual and that one cannot have contributions of over $100, if we could tie that all together, I think it would be a good thing for the political system of this country. I am not sure it is constitutional but it certainly would be desirable.

Mr. BROCK. I think it would be, too. I tell the Senator that one of these days someone is going to read this law carefully, and is going to find the loopholes that are in it, and some corporation is going to do something like send out a letter, or maybe all of them will, to the 25 or 30 million American stockholders, and people are going to scream like stuck pigs in Congress about the abuse that that constitutes.

I say to Senators that is exactly what they are allowing to happen in this bill today, and I think it is wrong.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, first I wish to respond to the Senator——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Did the Senator from Oregon yield the floor?

Mr. PACKWOOD. No, I have not yielded the floor, but I am happy to yield.

Mr. CANNON. I am sorry. I thought the Senator had yielded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon has the floor and is still recognized.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Worry was expressed by the Senator from Arkansas about the subtle coercion or suggestion that might be used by employers who seek contributions. Again I assure the Senate such coercion is illegal under present law. There is nothing in this bill that changes that.

I quote from the condition that the Federal Election Commission laid that down in their SUN PAC decision:

> 3. Sun may solicit contributions for SUN PAC from its stockholders and employees, provided there is "no coercion or reprisal of any kind in the solicitation of contributions." The Commission set out three guidelines to "minimize the appearance or perception of coercion":
>
> (a) No superior should solicit a subordinate;
> (b) The solicited employee must be informed of the political purpose of SUN PAC;
> (c) The employee should be informed of his right to refuse to contribute without reprisal.

I am sure we can expect that if we pass this amendment, although in a somewhat more limited degree than the Federal Election Commission allows, legalizing the creation of these union and business political funds and saying they can solicit within a broad range, but not everyone, all these employees, the Federal Election Commission is going to come right back and put in these guidelines again that one cannot coerce an employee, that he must tell the employee what the purpose of the fund is and must inform the employee of the right to refuse. I would support those guidelines. I think those would be good provisions.

So I think again, in conclusion, that this is nothing but a middle-of-the-road amendment making sure that employees who are neither union nor supervisory will have a chance to be solicited by unions and by employers, without coercion from either side, and they, too, should have a chance to participate in these funds.

I yield the floor.

Mr. HANSEN. Vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nevada is recognized.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, first, I say to the Senator from Tennessee as to his statement a little while ago about the possibility of corporations sending out letters to all of their stockholders making a solicitation and there would be a great furor, that provision is not true in this proposal here. That is in existing law, and apparently they have not overly abused this, or we would have had that furor from the stockholders already. So I just wanted to make that clear, that this is not new in S. 3065.

Mr. BROCK. I say to the Senator, if they did it with a vengeance and spending a lot of corporate money, the Senator knows people would be screaming up here.

Mr. CANNON. I would certainly think so.

Mr. BROCK. Why do we allow something that we know is wrong? That is all I am saying.

Mr. CANNON. I do not quite follow the Senator there. If he is trying to change existing law, he has not proposed it in this provision.

Mr. BROCK. May I say to the Senator that we are prepared to talk about that later on. We have an amendment on which we will give the Senator an opportunity to vote.

Mr. CANNON. I assume the Senator will, because I do not think the Senator will vote for the bill no matter how it comes out.

Mr. BROCK. I would vote for a simple extension, yes, I would.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Vote.

Mr. CANNON. Then, the Senator from Iowa raised the question about whether or not the method permitting a solicitation to a corporation was the method that would be permitted or would be the same method permitted a union, and that is not quite true, because on page 38, subsection 5, it provides as follows:

> Any corporation that utilizes a method of soliciting voluntary contributions or facilitating the making of voluntary contributions, shall make available, on written request, that method to a labor organization representing any members working for that corporation.

So this does not reach the problem of the nonunion corporation or the problem of the nonunion employees. In other words, the same method of solicitation would not be permitted to unions as it would to the corporations insofar as those people are concerned.

There is one other very bad feature of the Senator's proposal, and I do not believe he intended it this way, but if one will note under the unlawful provisions: It shall be unlawful for this section, and this is subsection (d), and if we go down to (2) listen now what it is unlawful to do:

> For a labor organization or a separate segregated fund established by labor organizations to solicit contributions from stockholders of a corporation and their families, or from executive and administrative personnel of a corporation and their families.

What he is doing there is disregarding completely the fact that the many labor people, employees of corporations are likewise stockholders in the corporation, and he makes it unlawful there for a union to silicit union members who happen to be stockholders.

We had the provision on page 38 in the definition of a stockholder:

> For purposes of this section, the term "stockholder" includes any individual who has a legal or vested beneficial interest in stock, including, but not limited to, an employee of a corporation who participates in a stock bonus, stock option, or employee stock ownership plan.

Many corporations in the country have precisely that kind of a plan where they permit the employees, labor union or not labor union, whichever it happens to be, to share in the corporation through the stock bonus plan, the stock purchase plan where a person can reinvest dividends through many forms of stock ownership, and the Senator's amendment would, therefore, make it unlawful for a labor organization or a separate segregated fund established by that organization to solicit contributions from stockholders of a corporation even though those stockholders might be members of the union.

I do not think the Senator intended that, but that is what his amendment says, and I ask him if he has any proposal to correct it so that it would make it certainly fairer because we have to recognize that stockholders of corporations are certainly not limited to people who are not members of labor organizations.

Mr. PACKWOOD. I think the chairman has brought the valid point to the amendment, and I will be happy to amend it to read as follows:

On the next to the last line after the word "families" "unless said stockholders are members of the union," and that would allow the union to solicit all of the shareholders who happen to be members of the union. I certainly do not want to limit the union from soliciting those people just because they happen to be stockholders.

Mr. CANNON. Did the Senator propose an amendment to his amendment there?

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, I so offer that amendment.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, will the Senator restate it?

Mr. PACKWOOD. Yes.

After the word "families" insert the words "unless said stockholders are members of the union"—or change it "to labor organization."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has the right to modify his amendment, and the amendment will be so modified.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, could we ask the clerk to read subparagraph 2 as it is now amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

For a labor organization, or a separate segregated fund established by a labor organization, to solicit contributions from stockholders of a corporation and their families unless said stockholders are members of labor or from executive and administrative personnel of a corporation and their families.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Instead of "union," it should read "labor organization."

I thank the Chairman for catching that, because there was no intention in my mind to eliminate the many union members, especially when we are talking about pension plans and employee stock ownership plans, to prohibt the union from soliciting them.

The modified amendment is as follows:

On page 37, beginning with line 22, strike out through line 3 on page 38 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"(3)(A) It is lawful for a corporation, or a separate segregated fund established by a corporation, to solicit contributions to such fund under paragraph (1) from stockholders and their families and from executive and administrative personnel and their families.

"(B) It is lawful for a labor organization, or a separate segregated fund established by a labor organization, to solicit contributions to such fund under paragraph (1) from members of that organization and their families.

"(C) It is lawful under this section for a corporation, a labor organization, or a separate segregated fund established by a corporation or a labor organization to solicit contributions from employees of a corporation, and their families, who are neither executive and administrative personnel nor members of that labor organization.

"(D) It shall be unlawful under this section—

"(i) for a corporation, or a separate segregated fund established by a corporation, to solicit contributions from employees of that corporation who are represented by a labor organization in dealing with that corporation with respect to matters of pay, working conditions, and other employee benefits, and

"(ii) for a labor organization, or a separate segregated fund established by a labor organization, to solicit contributions from stockholders of a corporation and their families unless said stockholders are members of labor organizations or from executive and administrative personnel of a corporation and their families.

Mr. PACKWOOD. I am prepared to vote, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Oregon, as modified. On this question the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I announce that the Senator from Delaware (Mr. BIDEN), the Senator from Idaho (Mr. CHURCH), the Senator from Indiana (Mr. HARTKE), the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. HOLLINGS), the Senator from Washington (Mr. JACKSON), the Senator from Louisiana (Mr. LONG), the Senator from South Dakota (Mr. MCGOVERN), the Senator from Maine (Mr. MUSKIE), the Senator from Wisconsin (Mr. NELSON), the Senator from Rhode Island (Mr. PASTORE), the Senator from Mississippi (Mr. STENNIS), the Senator from Georgia (Mr. TALMADGE), the Senator from New Jersey (Mr. WILLIAMS), and the Senator from North Dakota (Mr. DURKIN) are necessarily absent.

So Mr. PACKWOOD's amendment, as modified, was rejected.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HATFIELD. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NUNN). The question is on agreeing to the motion to lay on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. SCHWEIKER. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

On page 11, beginning with line 22, strike out through line 5 on page 12 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

(b) Section 302(c)(2) of such Act (2 U.S.C. 432(c)(2)) is amended by striking out "$10" and inserting thereof "$100."

On page 13, beginning with line 10, strike out through line 20.

On page 13, line 21, strike out "(5)" and insert in lieu thereof "(1)".

On page 13, line 23, strike out "(6)" and insert in lieu thereof "(2)".

On page 14, line 1, strike out "(7)" and insert in lieu thereof "(3)".

Mr. SCHWEIKER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FANNIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me without losing his right to the floor?

Mr. President, I am informed that the amendment the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania (Mr. SCHWEIKER) is offering, will be accepted by the manager of the bill thus relieving the Senate of another rollcall vote today.

I am also advised that Mr. GRIFFIN will then lay down his substitute, and we think we have worked out an agreement whereby a final vote on that substitute would occur tomorrow at 1:30 p.m., and if the Chair will get order, I will attempt to get the request now, so that Senators will know what the agreement is, and they can then go to their separate abodes without concern that there will be another rollcall vote tonight.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, may we have order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senators will take their seats and will clear the well.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that on the substitute which will be shortly offered by Mr. GRIFFIN—I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CHILES. If the Senator will yield, I do not intend to offer a substitute or lay down an amendment. I have an amendment which I want to place on the desk and have printed, and I would like to have a couple of minutes to talk about it before we adjourn tonight.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Yes; the Senator will be accommodated in that regard.

REQUEST FOR TIME LIMITATION AGREEMENT

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the substitute which will be shortly offered by Mr. GRIFFIN have a time limitation thereon, without any time running on the substitute tonight, of not to exceed 2 hours, the time to be equally divided between Mr. CANNON and Mr. GRIFFIN; that there be a time limitation on any amendment thereto or to the bill of not to exceed 1 hour, the time to be divided and controlled in accordance with the usual form; that a vote occur on the substitute tomorrow at 1:30 p.m.; provided further, that no amendment be in order after the hour of 1 p.m. tomorrow; provided further that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the substitute at 10 o'clock tomorrow morning; and ordered further that the agreement be in the usual form.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I think there is also the matter of the germaneness of the amendments.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. That was taken care of in the phraseology "usual form."

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I have an amendment pending which, I think, should be disposed of prior to the vote on the Griffin amendment. I wonder if the distinguished majority whip might contemplate that?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Is the Senator's amendment to the substitute?

Mr. MATHIAS. No.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. It would be a perfecting amendment to the bill?

Mr. MATHIAS. It is an amendment to the bill, but it deals with the question of the composition of the Election Commission and, I think, it could be disposed of in advance, and it would then be desirable——

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. May I ask a question as to whether or not the Griffin substitute is a substitute for the entire bill?

Mr. HATFIELD. It is.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. It is.

Mr. HATFIELD. It is a substitute for the entire bill.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. The Senator could offer his amendment under this agreement.

Mr. MATHIAS. It is not an amendment to the Griffin substitute.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Yes, but he could offer his amendment to the bill. The Senator could offer his amendment to the bill under this agreement.

Mr. BROCK. Unless the substitute is passed.

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, just so we are perfectly clear on this, my amendment is not an amendment to the Griffin substitute. It is an amendment to the bill, and what I would like to see, before we enter into this agreement, is that I have an opportunity to call up the amendment prior to the vote on the Griffin substitute.

Mr. CHILES. I now understand that on the Griffin substitute—reserving the right to object—before the Griffin substitute is locked in I think the amendment I was going to lay down tonight would have to be conformed so that it could be an amendment to the Griffin substitute, otherwise I might be wiped out, so I would like to be included and in the time on that.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Let me rephrase my request in part, Mr. President.

I ask unanimous consent that there be a time limitation on any amendment to the substitute or to the bill of 30 minutes; that there be a time limitation on any debatable motion or appeal or point of order of 20 minutes; that no amendment either to the bill or to the substitute be in order after the hour of 1 p.m. tomorrow, and that the agreement be in the usual form, with consideration of the bill beginning tomorrow morning at 10 a.m.

Mr. BROCK and Mr. TAFT addressed the Chair.

Mr. BROCK. Reserving the right to object, Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Yes.

Mr. BROCK. The Senator from Florida and I have, I think, a very significant and major amendment. It is going to take some time. We will try to do a little bit of talking tonight about it, but I honestly am not sure it will be possible for us to adequately dispose of it in 30 minutes. I wonder if we might ask for an exception to the rule and allow 1 hour for the Chiles-Brock amendment?

Mr. CHILES. Are we getting time now?

Mr. BROCK. I was asking for a modification so that the amendment of the Senator from Florida can be accorded 1 hour instead of a half hour.

Mr. CHILES. Yes.

Mr. ALLEN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. President, did I understand the distinguished assistant majority leader to say that the amendments had to be germane to the substitute?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. That the agreement be in the usual form, so that we do not get a busing amendment or an amendment of that kind.

Mr. ALLEN. I understand. But that an amendment could be offered during the pendency of the substitute to the bill itself, could it?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Yes.

Mr. ALLEN. And it would only have to be germane to the bill; it would not have to be germane to the amendment?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. It ought to be germane to the amendment or to the bill.

Mr. ALLEN. I have not seen the substitute. I do not know what is in there. I have some amendments, one of which the floor manager of the bill, the distinguished Senator from Nevada, has agreed to accept. I would not want to have the substitute cut-off good amendments that would be germane to the bill.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I think I may have confused the Senator by my request.

The vote which would come at 1:30 p.m. tomorrow would be on the substitute for the bill. It is not a vote on the bill.

Mr. ALLEN. I understand. But the substitute would wipe out any future amendments to the bill itself, and the substitue does not cover all contingencies, I am sure.

If a substitute is pending, an amendment would be in order to the bill itself.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Yes.

Mr. ALLEN. I would not want to cut-off the right to amend the bill. I do not know what is in the substitute.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. My request does not cut-off the right to amend the bill.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator said a moment ago it would have to be germane to the substitute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Amendments offered to the substitute would have to be germane to the substitute, but amendments offered to the bill would not have to be germane.

Mr. ALLEN. That has never been stated.

The only trouble is that by having a time limit on the substitute, that could well cut off taking action on proper and substantial and constructive amendments to the bill. We would be sitting there with a handful of good amendments and the substitute would cut off those amendments.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD addressed the Chair.

Mr. CANNON. Will the Senator yield to me to respond?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. If the Senator voted against the substitute, as I intend to do, then the bill would be wide open after the substitute is defeated, so the amendments would then be in order.

Mr. ALLEN. I understand.

I do not know how it is going to go, but I might want to vote for the substitute.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, for the time being, I withdraw my request and, in the meantime, the Senator from Pennsylvania can proceed, after which we will renew the request.

I think all Senators can be assured there will be no more rollcall votes tonight.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unanimous-consent request is withdrawn.

The Senator from Pennsylvania has the floor.

Mr. SCHWEIKER. Mr. President, very simply, this amendment does one important thing. That is, it restores something that the committee bill had taken away, which is the disclosure requirement of the employer of a person who makes a contribution of over $100.

The bill before us would have withdrawn that requirement and merely listed the person's name and address. It would not have required that person's employer or occupation to be listed.

My amendment—which is cosponsored by the distinguished Senator from Iowa (Mr. CLARK), who has done a great deal of work in this area and deserves much credit for the work he has done—would simply change the law back to what is now on the books, the law that says that a candidate must report the employer of the person who makes a contribution over $100.

This disclosure is needed so that we know if there is a heavy, weighted contribution from any one segment, any private interest, any special interest. These contributions can be earmarked, they can be targeted, and they can be reported. The theory of election reform is disclosure, and that means disclosure of what interests are giving contributions.

I think this amendment is an important step. I am very hopeful that the distinguished chairman of this committee will see fit to accept this amendment.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I am pleased to join with my distinguished colleague, the Senator from Pennsylvania (Mr. SCHWEIKER) in offering this amendment. I think all of us would agree that disclosure represents the single most essential element in the entire campaign law. Disclosure of a contributor's occupation and place of business, including the name of the firm where the person is employed, is vitally important if the public is to know and understand the source of a candidate's campaign funds. Our amendment would restore this necessary disclosure requirement, and I urge its adoption.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, we had previously agreed in the committee to the provision requiring reporting with respect to contributions in excess of $100. The Senator from West Virginia had an amendment that was accepted by the committee.

This proposal now would change the proposed language back to existing law. I am advised by the Senator from West Virginia that it is acceptable to him. Accordingly, I am willing to accept the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, the Senator from Florida has an amendment at the desk that he is not going to take up tomorrow. I suppose it will come as an amendment to the Griffin substitute if there is a time limitation agreement and if the Griffin amendment is made a substitute. I believe it will bring this thing into focus a little bit.

What we have been talking about are exceptions to the prime purpose of the act, of allowing individuals to contribute in political campaigns. I believe the amendment of the Senator from Florida, as cosponsored by a number of Senators, among them Senator PACKWOOD, Senator NUNN, Senator BROCK, Senator BELLMON, Senator DOMENICI, would simply say that corporations would not be able to solicit their stockholders, their executives, their vice presidents, nor would labor unions be able to solicit their members. Neither side would be able to get a war chest for trying to invoke their own special interest. We simply allow it to individuals.

The whole electoral process, as I understand it, Mr. President, was created so that individuals could vote, so that individuals could nominate, so that individuals could elect. It looks like the fight that I have been seeing going on all day is sort of the fight between the giants. Each side believes the other has a little advantage so each side is trying to get a foothold.

I have not heard much talk about the people today. I have not heard much talk about what is really good as far as democracy and what is really good as far as individuals. It is whether we are going to allow AMPAC to be able to get its funds so it can promote itself. It is whether we are going to allow COPE to get its funds to promote itself. It is whether we are going to allow whatever the organization of the American banking group is to promote itself, or General Motors, or any of the other giants.

I believe one of the problems we have today is that all of those groups are well represented, too well represented. The people know it and the people are tired of it. The people feel it is time that they are the ones who are represented.

If we start talking about how to save some campaign costs, if we start talking about how to get people where they participate more in their electoral process, we will limit this to individuals.

Somebody said to me that constitutionally they are not sure whether this is all right. I would sure like to try that; I would sure like to test that. I do not find anything in the Constitution that says General Motors has the right to vote. I do not find anything in there that says the AFL–CIO has the right to vote. If they do not have the right to vote, why should they have the right to solicit funds to set up a war chest so that they can go out and work their will?

Nothing in this amendment says that COPE cannot be the Committee on Political Education. Nothing in this amendment says that AMPAC cannot be a committee to educate people on the benefits of the American Medical Society. Nothing says that the bankers cannot go out. They will be able to get their funds to put on their cocktail parties, to put on their solicitations to politically educate people.

What it says is that those groups are not going to walk around with a bag, they are not going to walk around with a sack, and they are not going to say:

Wait a minute, Senator CHILES. If you want our support, if you want our contributions, we are going to look at your voting record a minute. We are going to see how you stand on these particular issues. We have a little honey sack here and we have it all prepared and set up. If you want to get your nose in the honey sack, you better do right, boy, if you are going to get in there.

What I think this says is that each one of us, and every other elected official, is going to have to go out and sort of put his trust with the people. He is going to have to go out. He cannot please a Mr. Big who heads up the American Medical Society. He cannot please a Mr. Big who heads up a labor union. He has to go out to the rank and file. He has to go out to individuals. He has to kind of get his message across and go out and campaign where he is.

If Senators want to talk about incumbents and who is better off, we know all the keys. We incumbents know who have the honey sacks. We know who has what kind of campaign war chest. We know that every time we start taking a vote.

It seems to me that for those who want to vote against the Packwood amendment that is going to give some special advantage to the corporation, and those who want to vote against the Packwood amendment who think the labor unions have a special advantage, here is a home. Here is a place where they can come home because they are coming home to what the process is about. They are coming home to what our Government is supposed to be about—representing people, not committees, not unions, not bankers, not doctors, but individuals. People.

That is the kind of question I think we are going to have a chance to vote on tomorrow. I urge Senators to take the chance to look at this amendment. We would like to have Senators participate in the vote and in the amendment tomorrow.

Mr. BROCK. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. CHILES. I yield.

Mr. BROCK. May I at this early moment take the opportunity of joining my colleague from Florida, as I have done on occasion in the past to my privilege, to support this amendment. I think he knows as well as I do that this bill without this amendment is nothing but a major loophole in and of itself. It applies to the American people but it does not apply to any groups, corporate or labor, because they are exempt from the law. They can spend all the money they want to out of their own committees to elect anybody they want to and there is no way we can control it. There is no way we can stop the abuse of people who work in those groups, and the opportunity for pressure and human abuse is great.

That is what this is all about, to let every American citizen be the equal of every other American citizen. That is what the amendment is designed to do. I appreciate the Senator's leadership in the matter and intend to support him the best I can.

Mr. CHILES. I thank the distinguished Senator.

Mr. CLARK. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. CHILES. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. It is really a comment and a question, I guess.

I think it is a great temptation to support the amendment. I am not going to support it, I suspect, but I think it is a great temptation. I would like to discuss why I think it would present one major problem.

First of all, obviously it would correct a number of situations. It means that there would no longer be groups to bring together money to influence politics. Each individual would make his or her contribution and that would be the money that would be raised.

I assume that the Senator would, therefore, limit the amount that an individual can give and the amount that he or she can contribute to their own campaign.

Mr. CHILES. That amount is already limited in the bill itself.

Mr. CLARK. Right.

Mr. CHILES. I have not attempted to do it. The Supreme Court struck out the amount that a person could spend from his own money. I do not purport to put myself over that decision, so I have not done anything about that.

Mr. CLARK. As I understand it, under the amendment, if it were to pass, we would have a $1,000 limitation in terms of what a candidate could accept from an individual.

Mr. CHILES. I guess that is true that is in the bill. The Senator from Florida has not paid too much attention to that because I limited my campaign contributions to $10. Because of that I guess I have not paid too much attention to that.

Mr. CLARK. I know that. I think it is an excellent practice, and I commend the Senator for doing it.

I think there is really only one problem that is created by the Senator's amendment, and that is that it will end up being very favorable to an incumbent. Why? Because if, as a candidate running for office for the first time, as I did and as I recall you did and several other people did, being unknown, if I am limited to contributions from individuals only, I think a $1,000 limitation, what that means is that my chance of ever raising enough money to go against an incumbent candidate, with all the advantages of incumbency, would be next to nothing.

Mr. CHILES. I have to disagree with the Senator on that. I happened to spend $370,000, in total, in my campaign. I spent, I think, less than $100,000 in the first primary. The man who ran third in the first primary spent $550,000 of his own money.

I got into the primary. The Senator from Iowa kind of walked his State, like I did. There is always a way for someone who wants to take his case to the people.

I think what the Senator from Iowa did was run against big money. I did, and I think the people responded to that. I think if the incumbent has an advantage, you can use that.

The Senator from Iowa got here, and the Senator from Florida got here. I did not spend big money, and I do not think he spent big money to get here. So the very argument the Senator makes does not ring true to me on that score.

The other thing I want to point out now is that if you want to look at spending, if you look at the records—I have, and I hope you have—you will find that the incumbent has outspent the challengers in virtually every race that has taken place in the Senate by, in many instances, two times, and in almost every instance over a third.

If you want to talk about an advantage, I think an incumbent has an advantage with these groups, a tremendous advantage: You know who they are, you know what they are interested in, you know the issues, and you know how to contact them. You know how to spring, and play the field.

Mr. CLARK. I do not question that for a moment.

Mr. CHILES. I do think an incumbent has that advantage.

Mr. CLARK. I do not question that for a moment. I think they do have an advantage. I think that is clear from the record. What I am saying is that if my colleague back here from California, let us say, is challenged, obviously by a nonincumbent if he is challenged, in a State where you have 20 million people, if he was limited to a few thousand dollars, or, indeed, a few tens of thousands of dollars, or a few hundred thousand dollars, if he or she is unknown, it is very unlikely that that challenger can make a credible campaign against an incumbent.

Mr. CHILES. Still, this has done nothing about the limitation on the total amount of spending that is in the bill.

Mr. CLARK. I understand that.

Mr. CHILES. It has done nothing about what an individual can spend himself. And if the Senator from California does not have a better advantage than incumbency in getting this kind of money, he is just no good. He has that because he is an incumbent.

Mr. CLARK. He has the advantage on individual money as well.

Mr. CHILES. Well, what we are talking about is something different from the amendment. There is something that bothers the Senator from Florida, and that is that an incumbent, regardless of this amendment or not, has an advantage.

Mr. CLARK. Yes.

Mr. CHILES. I do not think he has any greater advantage with this amendment. I think he has less. We might differ on that.

Mr. CLARK. Well——

Mr. CHILES. You know what the Senator from Iowa is talking about? The one thing an incumbent has is, he has a record, and some day we are going to require that he has to stand on that record and present himself on that record, and give the other man a chance to talk about that record. That is the only way of evening that up. But I do not believe this bill will do that, or this amendment.

Mr. CLARK. Let me say, to finish, because I know the Senator from Georgia has some questions as well, my own view is that the best solution to this problem is public financing of campaigns.

Mr. CHILES. Oh——

Mr. CLARK. Wait until I finish. Because it seems to me that if we are going to give a challenger the same kind of position, an equal position insofar as that can be done in a campaign——

Mr. CHILES. Yes.

Mr. CLARK. In effect, we are going to have to see that they are both going to have an adequate amount of money to be seen and viewed by all of the people in their States.

Mr. CHILES. I do not dispute that. I voted last time——

Mr. CLARK. I know you did.

Mr. CHILES. In every instance, for trying public financing. I think it has to be a mixture of public and private. But again, that question is not in front of us. The question now is whether we are going to allow these giants to compete and fight among themselves to get the most leverage, to get the most war chips so they can work their will.

I say a pox on both of their houses, because I do not think either one of them are doing the kind of things for the fabric of this society that the people are looking for. I do not think the people are looking for us to represent corporations or labor unions.

Mr. CLARK. I agree.

Mr. CHILES. I think they are looking for us to represent them, and the best way I know to do that is to allow them to be the ones to make the contributions, and that is where we look for support. That is where we owe our allegiance; that is where we owe anything that gets us elected, not to some group, whether it be on one side or the other.

Mr. CLARK. In closing, is it the——

Mr. CHILES. You have looked at the polls, I know you have, strongly. And you find that the majority of the people of this country do not believe that the decisions are made for the average person.

Mr. CLARK. Right.

Mr. CHILES. If they are not made for the average person, who are they made for? They have got to be made for Mr. Big, or they have got to be made for someone else that is less—you know, that sits in a group. And the people know that, and you know that it is true for the legislation that comes in here, and the way we fight and the way we divide up.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator does not say anything with which I disagree. But I think we must be concerned that we not create a situation in which challengers cannot raise enough funds to be known to the constituency they are running for, that we are not going to have an incumbent's bill.

Mr. CHILES. If you are saying to me that that challenger, to get that right, must go either to business or to labor——

Mr. CLARK. No, he goes to public financing.

Mr. CHILES. But that is not before us. If you want to argue that, I am with you. But what you are saying is that now he has to go—if you are against my amendment, if you are not supporting it—now he has to go toward labor or toward business so he will have the wherewithal to make it. If he courts them, who does he belong to?

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield on that point?

Mr. CHILES. I yield.

Mr. NUNN. The argument of the Senator from Iowa, it seems ot me, is that a nonincumbent, in order to get started and get known, has to start off with special interest financing.

Mr. CLARK. No, he has to have some money from somewhere, and if he has no public money and no financing——

Mr. CHILES. The Senator from Iowa did not have any money.

Mr. NUNN. We will let him get money from any individual in the State of Iowa, or from any individual in the State of California, but the Senator from Iowa is basically telling us that with all the limitations we put on financing in the bills that we have had, and it will continue under this measure, that the only way an incumbent can be challenged successfully is for a person to go either to a labor organization or a business organization, and if that is what the Senator is saying, what he is really saying is the mechanism we have created prevents any kind of meaningful challenge to an incumbent unless the challenger is paid with seed money.

Mr. CLARK. That is precisely what I am saying because the record——

Mr. NUNN. We have a very bad situation, if the Senator is correct.

Mr. CLARK. That is right. That is why we have to go to public financing.

Mr. NUNN. That goes to the heart of the very limitation on expenditures in the beginning. That argument does not go to the amendment of the Senator from Florida. That argument goes to the whole process that has been set up here.

Mr. CLARK. Let us remember that less than 5 percent of the individuals in this country contribute to some campaign, whether it is presidential, down to the local campaign. Very little of the money that the Senator from Georgia, I, and others here received in our campaigns came from individuals in terms of percentage of the whole.

Mr. CHILES. Why?

Mr. NUNN. The Senator is incorrect. In my situation I did not get any special interest contributions until I had the nomination. I was running against an incumbent. I think the fact is the opposite. I think a person running against an incumbent would have a more difficult time getting special interest donations than a person who is here.

As the Senator from Florida pointed out, everyone here knows what makes the special interest tick. They know the votes. They know the records.

Mr. CLARK. I agree with that.

Mr. NUNN. They know who does it. What we have is a very sick situation. The reason we have it is not because of recent laws. The reason is because of the political process in terms of fund raising has been dominated by special interests for a long time, and individuals in this country have gotten discouraged with the political process.

If we take out the special interests, then I think we will stimulate greatly the participation of individuals in the political process, not only in fund raising but also in getting active in campaigns, which I think is even more important than monetary contributions.

Mr. CLARK. I am going to listen to the debate with great interest tomorrow.

Mr. CHILES. I thank the distinguished Senator from Iowa. I think he has helped the debate already, and I appreciate it.

Mr. President, I yield to the distinguished Senator from West Virginia who wishes to make a unanimous consent agreement, providing I do not lose my right to the floor.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator from Florida.

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT AGREEMENT

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent—with the understanding that no time will be charged against any amendment or against the substitute or the bill tonight—that there be a time limitation on a substitute amendment which will be offered by Mr. GRIFFIN today of 1 hour to be equally divided between Mr. GRIFFIN and Mr. CANNON; that there be a time limitation on an amendment by Mr. TAFT of 30 minutes, to be equally divided and controlled in acocrdance form; that there be a time limitation on any amendment of 1 hour to be equally divided in accordance with the usual form; that there be a time limitation on any debatable motion, appeal, or point of order of 20 minutes, to be equally divided and controlled in accordance with the usual form; that no amendment not germane either to the bill or to the substitute be in order; and that a final vote occur on the substitute at 1:30 p.m. tomorrow, with the understanding that no amendment be in order to be called up between the hour of 1 p.m. tomorrow and 1:30 p.m.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, and I do not wish to object, the distinguished Senator has stipulated in the unanimous-consent request that no amendment not germane either to the substitute or the original bill be in order. There is no doubt in the mind of the Senator from Alabama that an amendment providing for public financing of House and Senate races would not be in order, but there would be nothing under the agreement to prevent such an amendment being offered, and if the Parliamentarian had it submitted to the Senate, or the Chair ruled it was not germane and an appeal was taken, then the Senate could pass such an amendment with a time limit.

Would the Senator be willing to stipulate that no amendment providing for public subsidies to House and Senate races be in order?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. That would be agreeable with me. The distinguished Senator does raise a very nice point here, and it could apply not only to an amendment of that subject matter but also to other types of amendments if the Senate wanted to overrule the Chair on an appeal as to germaneness.

I would, if it is agreeable with other Senators——

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, reserving the right to object——

Mr. CLARK. I object.

Mr. ALLEN. That is the reason the Senator from Alabama made the point.

Does the Senator from Iowa object to the——

Mr. CLARK. I would object, Mr. President. I am not in opposition to any part of the unanimous-consent request except that which would obviously automatically rule out the possibility of a public financing amendment being offered.

Mr. ALLEN. Offered? What I am saying——

Mr. CLARK. I do not mean offered. I mean in order.

Mr. ALLEN. In order during this period. That is what I am trying to rule out, because I do not want a time limit on such an amendment.

Mr. CLARK. When does the period end?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. 1:30 p.m.

Mr. CLARK. Until 1:30 only. I am not opposed to that.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, the problem I have is that I have an amendment at the desk which I may offer either to the substitute or to the bill. I will probably offer it first to the substitute and if the substitute is adopted my end would be achieved. If it is not adopted, I might wish to offer it to the bill. But I am concerned because while the amendment deals with the subject matter of the law involved, dealing specifically with the campaign contribution portion, or the campaign participation section of the Internal Revenue Code, that section, as I see it, is not covered in the bill itself, and I would like to reserve the amendment that I had pending being in order to the amendment, to the substitute, or to the bill.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. The Senator's amendment is protected under the request.

Mr. TAFT. It is protected as to time but not as to germaneness.

Mr. BROCK. Yes, as to both.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, if it is so understood, I have no objection.

Mr. TAFT. If it is, I have no objection.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. The amendment of the Senator is protected in any event.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NUNN). The Senator's amendment is protected on both time and germaneness under the present proposal.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I ask: Did the Senator say that if the amendment were germane to either the bill or the substitute it would be germane to either one?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Yes.

Mr. PACKWOOD. So the amendment to the bill offered to the substitute would be germane.

Second, what was the part of the request about 1 p.m. to 1:30 p.m.?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. To assure Senators that after the hour of 1:30 p.m. tomorrow, in the event the substitute is not adopted, amendments to the bill will be in order.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Say that again—between 1 p.m. and 1:30 p.m. what happens?

Mr. BROCK. No new amendments.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. No new amendment can be offered during that period.

Mr. BROCK. So we can vote at 1:30 p.m.

Mr. HATFIELD. And dispose of it.

Mr. PACKWOOD. I am speaking for Senator GOLDWATER. He is not here. He is ready to offer an amendment. If for one reason or another he does not get to the Chamber before 1 p.m. and no amendment is offered until 1:30 p.m., I want a further understanding that if the substitute is adopted at 1:30 p.m., his amendment would still be germane if germane to the original bill.

I have to object.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. If the substitute is adopted, it would not be. The ball game would be over then.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Germaneness after that.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Then I have to object. If he does not get the floor and have a chance to offer it, then I object on his behalf.

Mr. BROCK. Can the Senator not guarantee him the right to have it?

Mr. ALLEN. If the substitute is not adopted, it would then be in order.

Mr. PACKWOOD. If he gets to the floor and is not able to offer it, because we are stacked up with all the amendments, he is precluded from 1 p.m. to 1:30 p.m. At 1:30 p.m. the substitute may be adopted. Hopefully, that is the end of it.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Any Senator is caught in that situation.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Yes.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Any Senator who might not have had an opportunity to offer an amendment prior to 1 p.m. would be shut out. It would not be only Mr. GOLDWATER.

Mr. PACKWOOD. I understand that.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Could he not offer it prior to 1 p.m.?

Mr. PACKWOOD. If he can get the floor, that is why I want to make sure he gets a chance to get on. I will advise him tonight. But it looks like we have a lot of amendments to be considered and we are not going to get them all.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Of course, if the substitute is not adopted, then——

Mr. PACKWOOD. I understand that.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Anyone can offer an amendment.

Mr. GRIFFIN. As I understand it, under this arrangement, any Senator is able to offer an amendment and have it voted on, even though he did not have time to debate it. Is that correct?

Mr. BROCK. That is correct.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Not after 1 p.m.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. GRIFFIN. He would have to offer it before 1 p.m.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He would have to have offered it before 1 p.m.

Mr. PACKWOOD. All right. It would be voted on with no debate.

Mr. BROCK. That is right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request?

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, is it stipulated then that prior to the vote on the substitute there will be no amendment offered dealing with public financing of House and Senate races?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. That was included in the request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is part of the unanimous-consent request. Is there objection?

Mr. ALLEN. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, reserving the right to object——

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I should like to amend the proposal in the following respect: that the vote on the substitute occur at 1:45 p.m. instead of 1:30 p.m.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. And that no amendment may be called up between 1:15 p.m. and 1:45 p.m.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. ALLEN. I understood the Senator to say that amendments could be called up but there would be no debate.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. No. I meant that no amendment may be called up after 1:15 p.m.

Mr. ALLEN. I do not know whether that suits Senator PACKWOOD.

Mr. PACKWOOD. So long as we can call it up before 1:15.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank all Senators.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, I should like to be recognized for a half minute to send the substitute to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The substitute will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to read the substitute amendment.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The substitute amendment is as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

SHORT TITLE

SECTION 1. This Act may be cited as the "Federal Election Campaign Act Amendments of 1976".

SEC. 2. (a) The text of paragraph 1 of Section 310 (a) of the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971 (hereinafter the "Act") (2 U.S.C. 537c(a)) is amended to read as follows: "There is established a Commission to be known as the Federal Election Commission. "The Commission is composed of the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives, ex officio, and without the right to vote, and six members appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. "(i) two of the members, not affiliated with the same political party, shall be appointed for terms ending on April 30, 1977,

"(ii) two of the members, not affiliated with the same political party, shall be appointed for terms ending on April 30, 1979,

"(iii) two of the members, not affiliated with the same political party, shall be appointed for terms ending on April 30, 1981.

"(B) An individual appointed to fill a vacancy occurring other than by the expiration of a term of office shall be appointed only for the unexpired term of the member he succeeds.

Until all six of the members of the Commission are appointed and qualified under the amendments made by this Act, members serving on such Commission on the date of enactment of this Act may exercise only such powers and functions as are consistent with the determinations of the Supreme Court of the United States in Buckley et al. against Valeo, Secretary of the United States Senate, et al. (numbered 75–436, 75–437) January 30, 1976.

SEC. 4. The provisions of section 309(a)(3) of the Act (2 U.S.C. 437c(a)(3)), as redesignated by section 105, which prohibit any individual from being appointed as a member of the Federal Election Commission who is, at the time of his appointment, an elected or appointed officer or employee of the executive, legislative, or judicial branch of the Federal Government, shall not apply in the case of any individual serving as a member of such Commission on the date of the enactment of this Act.

SEC. 5. (1) All personenl, liabilities, contracts, property, and records determined by the Director of the Office of Management and Budget to be employed, held, or used primarily in connection with the functions of the Federal Election Commission under title III of the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971 as such title existed on January 1, 1976, or under any other provision of law are transferred to the Federal Election Commission as constituted under the amendments made by this Act to the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971.

(2)(A) Except as provided in subparagraph (B) of this paragraph, personnel engaged in functions transferred under paragraph (1) shall be transferred in accordance with applicable laws and regulations relating to the transfer of functions.

(B) The transfer of personnel pursuant to paragraph (1) shall be without reduction in classification or compensation for one year after such transfer.

(3) All laws relating to the functions transferred under this Act shall, insofar as such laws are applicable and not amended by this Act, remain in full force and effect. All orders, determinations, rules, advisory opinions, and opinions of counsel made, issued, or granted by the Federal Election Commission before its reconstitution under the amendments made by this Act which are in effect at the time of the transfer provided by paragraph (1) shall continue in effect to the same extent as if such transfer had not occurred.

(4) The provisions of this Act shall not affect any proceeding pending before the Federal Election Commission at the time this section takes effect.

(5) No suit, action, or other proceeding commenced by or against the Federal Election Commission or any officer or employee thereof acting in his official capacity shall abate by reason of the transfer made under paragraph (1). The court before which such suit, action, or other proceeding is pending may, on motion or supplemental petition filed at any time within twelve months after the date of enactment of this Act, allow such suit, action, or other proceeding to be maintained against the Federal Election Commission if the party making the motion or filing the petition shows a necessity for the survival of the suit, action, or other proceeding to obtain a settlement of the question involved.

(6) Any reference in any other Federal law to the Federal Election Commission, or to any member or employee thereof, as such Commission existed under the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971 before its amendment by this Act shall be held and considered to refer to the Federal Election Commission, or the members or employees thereof, as such Commission exists under the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971 as amended by this Act.

SEC. 6. By addition to Section 610 of title 18 United States Code at the end thereof viz: On page 37, line 6, after "subject" insert the following: ", except that expenditures for any such communications which expressly advocate the election or defeat of a clearly identified candidate must be reported to the Commission in accordance with section 434(e)".

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, this is essentially the same substitute that was offered before, with two exceptions: one, it provides that the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House will be members of the Federal Election Commission, ex officio. It also incorporates the amendment offered by Mr. PACKWOOD, which was adopted by the Senate earlier today, the major amendment that the Senate has adopted, having to do with the reporting by corporations and labor organizations. Otherwise, it is essentially the same amendment that we had before.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I should like to address a brief question to the distinguished Senator from Nevada. This will take just a moment.

There is an ambiguity in the proposal before us which I would like to try to clarify. Pages 9 and 10 deal in part with the legal and accounting services donated to the national committee of a political party which do not further any candidate's election to Federal office and to similar services donated to a candidate or political committee which enable him to comply with Federal law. Both categories of donation are exempted as contributions and from spending limits. Following the exemptions, however, the bill requires that "such legal or accounting services" be reported in accordance with the requirements of section 304(b)." It is not clear whether the disclosure requirements cover both donations to the political party and to the candidate or only to the latter.

I feel the second interpretation makes most sense. In other words, disclosure should apply only to donations to candidates or campaign committees but not to political parties.

There is ample argument that volunteer legal and accounting services donated to a particular candidate or campaign committee should be disclosed. The basic purpose of disclosure is to enable the public to know what private individuals and interests are helping in the election of the men and women who are running the Nation, who are making national decisions affecting all of us.

But volunteer services donated to a political party's convention processes is an entirely different matter. Such a contribution has negligible influence on the outcome of an election. Moreover, the political party has no legislative nor executive responsibilities in the conduct of our national affairs. The party's major responsibilities end on election day.

After then their influence on national affairs is most akin to general interest lobbying groups like Common Cause or the Sierra Club. If anything, the party is less influential, since many incumbents see themselves—not party officials—as the embodiment of the party.

Thus I see no justification for the Federal Government's requiring disclosure of volunteer services donated to the party. While I favor full disclosure of all aspects of the election process of candidates, I do not favor disclosure for disclosure's sake. It seems to me that the volunteering of institutional services which do not relate to the election of candidates should be a private matter—in the same category as the volunteering of time to help Common Cause or the Sierra Club or any other similar organization.

Thus, Mr. Chairman, I would hope that we could agree that the requirement of disclosure should apply only to a donation of legal or accounting services to a candidate or political committee—not to the national committee of a political party.

I ask the distinguished chairman, is this an appropriate interpretation of the bill?

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, I believe the statement of the Senator from California is a helpful interpretation and will serve to clarify that the requirement of disclosure should apply only to the donation of legal accounting services to a candidate or political committee and not to the party committee. I would say, therefore, that his interpretation is correct, in my judgment.

Mr. CRANSTON. I thank the Senator very much.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, I propose two amendments to S. 3065 of a technical and clarifying nature. The first one is a traditional amendment to make technical and conforming changes to S. 3065 deemed necessary from review after it was reported to the Senate.

The second amendment restates existing law and is necessary because of the transfer of the title 18 limitations on contributions into the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971. As the law now exists, section 501(e)(1) of title 18 U.S.C. excepts from the definition of contribution for limitation purposes a loan of money by a bank in the ordinary course of business. This second amendment would transfer the language in section 591(e)(1) on this subject to section 431(e) in order to except such a loan on the same terms from the definition of contribution for limitation purposes. The amendment, however, would require such a loan to be reported as in existing law.

Mr. President, as these two amendments are of a technical and clarifying nature I ask unanimous consent that they be approved en bloc as part of S. 3065.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments will be stated.

The amendments were agreed to en bloc.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS SUBMITTED ON S. 3065

Mr. HRUSKA. Mr. President, as the Senate moves to final consideration of the pending bill to amend the Federal Election Campaign Act, it is of paramount importance that we do so in a careful and judicious manner. We are in the midst of a presidential campaign year. There is much at stake.

President Ford stressed the seriousness of the situation on February 27:

With the 1976 elections only nine months away, I do not believe this is the proper time to begin tampering with the campaign reform laws, and I will veto any bill that will create confusion and will invite further delay and litigation.

Mr. President, in my judgment, President Ford has adopted the right attitude. He has asked the Congress to reestablish the Federal Election Commission in conformity with the Supreme Court decision, as quickly as possible and get on with the job of insuring that the political system in 1976 be fair and equitable to all candidates for Federal office.

The Supreme Court, when it ruled in Buckley against Valeo, made clear its intention that the present election laws could be simply remedied by a reconstitution of the Federal Election Commission. We should not make any significant or overreaching changes in our election rules in the middle of an election campaign. Another time, preferably after the election this fall, would be more appropriate for a deliberate and comprehensive consideration of changes in existing law.

Mr. President, a careful reading of the court's decision in Buckley against Valeo clearly reveals the intent of the court to not unduly disrupt the political process in this campaign year. In its ruling on the Commission's makeup, the court said:

It is also our view that the Commission's inability to exercise certain powers because of the method by which its members have been selected should not affect the validity of the Commission's administrative actions and determinations to this date, including its administration of those provisions, upheld today, authorizing the public financing of federal elections. The past acts of the commission are therefore accorded de facto validity. . . . Buckley v. Valeo, ——US ——, (U.S. Supreme Court Docket No. 75–436, January 30, 1976, Slip Opinion, p. 136).

There are other reasons, of course, why this bill only should make the minimum, necessary corrections in current law.

There are serious problems in the pending bill with regard to contributions by political action committees. The limitations placed on corporations and their methods of making political contributions will generate more legal problems and litigation than they will solve. The consideration of hastily drawn changes such as these in the current campaign laws can only inject more uncertainty into the campaign process. Such action should be avoided at all costs.

Mr. President, I support the administration's proposal to simply reestablish the Federal Election Commission and correct the errors found in the election law as pointed out by the Supreme Court. To do anymore would be unwise and contrary to our political system and the interests of the people of America.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, the legislation before us, S. 3065, is essential to provide a legal framework for the financing of the Presidential and congressional election campaigns already underway this year.

It is, I believe, unfortunate that we are required to make substantive changes in the laws governing our Federal election campaigns at this time in an election year, allowing candidates and campaign contributors relatively little time to adjust to changes in the law.

But as we all know, we are required to act now because the Supreme Court in its decision Buckley against Valeo on January 20 invalidated certain critical provisions of the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971, as amended in 1974.

Immediately after the Supreme Court decision, as chairman of the Subcommittee on Privileges and Elections of the Committee on Rules and Administration, I conducted hearings on the Court decision and on proposals for revision of the Federal Election Campaign Act in light of the court decision.

Those hearings provided the basis for the legislation prepared by the Committee on Rules and Administration which is now before the Senate.

Legislation involving the financing of Federal election campaigns is extremely sensitive, touching as it does on the political nerve endings of all us who are elected officials, and reaching close to the heart of our democratic political processes.

In this sensitive context, I believe our committee has acted promptly, but with careful consideration, in reporting this legislation to the Senate, and I would particularly commend the distinguished chairman of the Rules Committee, Senator CANNON, for his fairness and leadership in the handling of this legislation.

The provisions of the bill are well summarized in the committee report. In my remarks, I will focus on several of what I believe to be the most important provisions.

The most significant effect of the Supreme Court decision in Buckley against Valeo was the elimination, as unconstitutional, of the limitations which the Congress had imposed on expenditures in campaigns for Federal office, except for those Presidential candidates who accept public funding.

The foreseeable result of that decision will be an influx of unlimited amounts of money into political campaigns, particularly in the form of expenditures on behalf of or in opposition to candidates by independent organizations or persons.

In these circumstances, I believe it is critically important that, if the amount of expenditures cannot be limited, that there be firm requirements for full disclosure so that the voting public can judge a candidate on the basis of the source of his campaign support.

S. 3065 has an extensive reporting requirement for political committees and other persons who spend more than $100, expressly advocating the election or defeat of a clearly identified candidate. The Court held such a reporting requirement to be constitutional, and these reports, together with the indices of such expenditures to be prepared by the Commission on a candidate-by-candidate basis will enable candidates and the general public to know where money being spent on campaigns is coming from and and whether it is being authorized by particular candidates.

In the same regard, S. 3065 has a provision requiring that any printed or broadcast communication which expressly advocates the election or defeat of a clearly identified candidate, and which is disseminated to the public, must contain a clear and conspicuous notice that it is authorized by a candidate, or that it is not authorized by any candidate. In the latter case, the communications must contain the name of the person who made or financed the communication, including in the case of a political committee, the name of any affiliated or connected organization.

Mr. President, the bill gives to the Federal Election Commission the exclusive and primary jurisdiction for the civil enforcement of the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971. The bill also gives to the Commission additional civil enforcement powers and reasonably differentiates between more serious violations of the act, which are subject to criminal penalties, and less substantial violations which would be subject to the civil enforcement and conciliation powers of the Commission.

Finally, as I believe disclosure may be an even greater deterrent than the threat of criminal prosecution for violating provisions of an act such as this, I would note that a new disclosure provision would require the Commission to make available to the public the results of any attempt to correct violations or possible violations of the act through conciliation. Thus the public would be made aware of the results, whether favorable or unfavorable to the candidate, of all conciliation efforts of the Commission.

These reporting, disclosure, and enforcement provisions are vital safeguards to the integrity of our Federal elective processes. They are, I believe, the best guarantee we can provide, within constitutional limits, that the financing of our Federal election campaigns will be fair and open and not subject to the corrosive effects of secret contributions and financing.

Mr. President, the legislation before us will fill an urgent need in the wake of the Supreme Court decision. I urge its prompt approval.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, while I agree with the query of the Chief Justice, in dissent in Buckley against Valeo, as to whether the majority opinion in that decision left "a workable program" of campaign regulation for Federal office, and not withstanding my belief that the Federal Election Campaign Act Amendments of 1974, even as modified by the Supreme Court, are cumbersome at best and illogical at worst, I consider S. 3065, and the proposed Federal Election Campaign Act Amendments of 1976 contained therein, to be undesirable and a further compounding of our earlier errors.

As may be remembered, I voted against the 1974 amendments, after sponsoring five unsuccessful revisions, primarily because of my opposition to the public financing of Federal elections and to limitations on campaign expenditures. Consequently, because the Court overturned expenditure limitations, and because I was pleased that Congress would be afforded another opportunity to review the unwise and unworkable 1974 amendments, I was gratified by some aspects of the decision in Buckley against Valeo.

Unfortunately, it appears that not only is the Senate forgoing the opportunity to respond to the more dubious aspects of the 1974 amendments and the Buckley against Valeo decision, but that S. 3065, as reported to the Senate by the Rules Committee, would elaborate and extend the mistakes propounded both in the 1974 act and by the Supreme Court.

It was my hope that the Congress would have responded to the Buckley against Valeo decision by reconstituting the Federal Election Commission in a constitutional manner; by eliminating public financing of Federal elections; and by removing or substantially raising the limitations on individual contributions to candidates for Federal elections. This latter recommendation is necessary, I believe, to counteract the distortive effect of the Supreme Court's upholding limitations on individual contributions to candidates, but finding unconstitutional expenditure limitations upon so-called "independent" efforts to elect or defeat candidates. I think that this rather curious distinction mitigates against the time-honored and traditional form of American politcal expression, that is, direct participation in and support for a particular candidate's campaign, in that the result of the decision is implicit encouragement of political expression independent of campaigns and parties; and I believe that removing limitations on contributions would reduce the incentive of those who are now tempted to establish and finance efforts independent of the candidate and his party.

In supporting the removal of limitations upon contributions, I am not advocating a return to an era in which campaigns for Federal office largely are financed by a few people making large contributions; and I think that such situations would be avoided by requiring full and timely disclosure and by the deterrent effect of our Watergate experience. I do think, however, that campaign contributions are an integral element of freedom of expression; and, notwithstanding the Court's decision to the contrary, I believe that restriction of contributions should be removed forthwith. Furthermore, I would rather see substantial contributions channeled into the official campaign process and, thereby subject to the control of the candidate and his party, rather than being expended through independent efforts free of the checks and balances of the political process.

The proposed 1976 amendments, however, do not meet these concerns but, rather, would do mischief of their own.

S. 3065 would reconstitute, and weaken, the Federal Election Commission. While I share the reservations of those who question the breadth and scope of the license appropriated by the FEC in utilizing its enforcement authorities, the new procedures that would be imposed are too complex and unwieldy for direct, effective regulations. Moreover, by further enhancing the advantages of incumbency, and through reduction of criminal sanctions, this bill abrogates two vital, but apparently not lasting, lessons imparted by our recent distress.

More disturbingly, the 1976 amendments, under the guise of reform and refinement, interjects elements of partisan expediency by limiting those employees who may contribute to political action committees, and by exempting certain fund-raising transfers traditionally utilized by only one of the two national parties.

During the pendency of the 1974 amendments, I offered an amendment which would have prohibited all group contributions, under the justification that, as only individuals can vote, only individuals should be able to contribute to political campaigns. But if we are to allow group giving, as we apparently are, I firmly believe that the ground rules should not favor or discriminate between groups, and that businesses and labor unions should be able to solicit contributions on an equal footing.

Mr. President, although I would prefer that Congress respond in a definitive fashion to the challenge provided by the Buckley against Valeo decision, the proposed amendments before the Senate are fraught with difficulty and advantage. Thus, while I rue this loss of opportunity, I voted for, and hope to again, the unsuccessful amendment offered by my distinguished colleague from Michigan (Mr. GRIFFIN) for a simple extension of the Federal Election Campaign Act Amendments of 1974. It appears that the best we can do is to pass a straight-forward bill reconstituting the Federal Election Commission.

I hope that the Senate and House do not continue along the track evidenced by S. 3065; and, if this or similar legislation is agreed to, I shall urge President Ford to veto it. The regulation of political campaigns is an area of great constitutional and democratic sensitivity, and our republic will be ill-served by the passage of this legislation as reported by the committee.

SOUTHEASTERN UNIVERSITY OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate a message from the House of Representatives on S. 611.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ALLEN) laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 611) for the relief of Southeastern University of the District of Columbia, as follows:

Page 5, after line 19, insert:

SEC. 11. The provisions of sections 2 and 3 of the Act of August 30, 1964 (Public Law 88-504; sections 2 and 3, 78 Stat. 636; 36 U.S.C. 1102, 1103) entitled "An Act to provide for audit of accounts of private corporations established under Federal law" shall apply with respect to the corporation.

SENATE FLOOR DEBATES ON S. 3065 MARCH 18, 1976

Under current postal policy, the answer to these questions is "probably yes"; and it is important that any change contemplated must only occur under law. The proper forum for airing the Postmaster General's views is in the Congress of the United States. All of us know, from our mail, from our talks with folks at home what kind of service the average citizen wants. He wants postal service as good as possible; at least no worse than it is now. And it is in the Congress that these and other, perhaps divergent, views should be weighed, assessed, and decided upon. Congress is here for that purpose—to set public policy, including the broad guidelines under which the Postal Service will be operated.

Mr. President, the Post Office and Civil Service Committee is currently in the midst of hearings on a bill which I sponsor to increase substantially the public service allowance authorized by the Congress to allow the Postal Service to operate a universal mail system serving all the people.

Among the important purposes of the bill is to reduce the frequency of postal rate increases. If postal revenues and costs can be brought more nearly into consonance by the additional funding the bill would authorize, I am confident that the constant upward spiral of rates can be substantially slowed. Rates inevitably will increase as costs go up, but over the past 5 years first-class rates have far outdistanced the Consumer Price Index. Since May 1971, when the 8-cent rate became effective, first-class postage has risen 63 percent. At the same time, the CPI has increased 35 percent. May bill would slow down rate increases and this effect, we are confident, would help maintain the stable mail volume upon which the Postal Service relies so heavily for revenue.

In its consideration of S. 2844, the committee has heard testimony from Postmaster General Ben Bailar. He endorsed the thrust of the measure and responded to questions about postal operations. It is true that in his testimony he also questioned whether the present structure of traditional postal services is essential or relevant to our future national needs, but nowhere did he call for a national dialog or request far-reaching policy changes.

Now that he has unveiled in Detroit and San Francisco his strong misgivings about the economic viability of a universal postal service for America, I think it appropriate to ask him to discuss these views in greater detail with the committee—with Members of the Senate responsible under the Constitution for considering the kind of broad-gage changes he has been suggesting around the country.

Accordingly, I am scheduling a hearing for March 29—a hearing at which the Postmaster General and his staff will be the sole witnesses. In addition to hearing his views on why the scope of postal operations should be reduced, the committee will want to question him on service cuts. And I will ask for his assurance that he will maintain service at its current levels in accordance with the guarantees of the Postal Reorganization Act. For that law must prevail unless or until it is changed.

TRAFFIC SAFETY IS EVERYBODY'S BUSINESS

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, the Safety First Club of Maryland is celebrating its 20th anniversary on April 29, 1976. In conjunction with that event, the following statement, entitled "Traffic Safety Is Everybody's Business," has been prepared. The Safety First Club, which is a nonprofit organization dedicated to traffic safety, has been honored with two National Safety Council Awards. I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate this group for its years of service to the community and to share with you some of their observations on the importance of traffic safety.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this statement by the Safety First Club of Maryland be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TRAFFIC SAFETY IS EVERYBODY'S BUSINESS

At the beginning of the century we did not have an annual fatality record of 50,000 from automobile accidents. The worst that could then be said by statisticians was that we had in excess of 20 million horses on the roads.

Today we have progressed to an astounding mobility, thanks to our automobile. We have also progressed to a numbness that allows us to accept a slaughter of human beings on our highways unprecedented in the annals of recorded history.

At the Transpo '72 exhibit near Washington, in 1972, GM experts indicated that the automobile would continue to be the principal form of transportation during most of the balance of this century. Much was made of improvement in highway technology, lanes for larger vehicles and buses, peripheral parking facilities, electronically automated traffic control systems, use of smaller electric cars for inner city use, separation of pedestrians from traffic malls, and others. Little was said about re-programming automobile drivers who, as one humorist said, are "the loose nut behind the wheel" that causes most accidents.

The automobile driver's physical well-being, as well as the mechanical health of his vehicles, is vital, of course. In 31 different states, however, a blind person may renew his license. In 10 states a stone-deaf person can renew his license without any question. Few states even check the hearing of an applicant; fewer still ask for an eye examination after the initial one (at age 16 or 18). All you need in most states is a check to be sent in for the renewal. What a license to kill!

In 1973, there were 3,800,000 miles of roads in the United States to accommodate the approximately 100,000,000 cars. Our courts devote 57% of their time to cases involving the automobile. More than half a million abandoned cars each year crowd the landscapes—45,000 alone in New York City. One-third of every American city is appropriated by businesses which cater exclusively to motor cars—and another third is flattened out for the fabulous expanses of asphalt and concrete which provide mobility and parking for these urban monsters.

But what, at long last, becomes the most horrendous statistic of all: over 50,000 people annually are sacrificed to the most voracious god of all humanity, the automobile—and the statistics are proportionately even worse in some other countries, though quantitatively less.

In 1974, and primarily due to the 55 mile-per-hour limit, 46,200 lost their lives in traffic accidents in the U.S.A. In Maryland alone, 862 individuals became traffic toll fatalities during the year 1975.

As the Safety First Club of Maryland, one of the foremost citizen organizations working for traffic safety, stated it: "The automobile designed for our comfort, our need and our convenience, imposes upon us the responsibility of utilizing it without making of it at the same time an instrument of destruction." This applies equally to you and me.

The Safety First Club of Maryland, a nonprofit citizens' organization, with headquarters in Baltimore, has been crusading since 1956 for safety on our streets and highways. The organization's major objectives are to help reduce traffic fatalities; stress the importance of traffic safety among our youth; work for the passage and enforcement of statutes aiming to reduce the traffic toll; and give proper recognition to the deserving for attainments in the field of traffic safety.

The organization believes that traffic supervision and control belong in the sphere of duly constituted experts and authorities; but, nevertheless, such groups as the Safety First Club of Maryland can render services through planned and consistent safety programs, campaigns and activities aimed at helping to reduce the mounting toll.

The Safety First Club of Maryland will feature the theme "Master Motor Menace" at the organization's 20th Anniversary Wheelmaster Dinner, to be held Thursday evening, April 29, 1976, at the Mercantile Club in Baltimore.

The Safety First Club of Maryland believes, and advocates, that eternal vigilance is the price of liberty—and traffic safety.

CONCLUSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no further morning business, morning business is closed.

FEDERAL ELECTION CAMPAIGN ACT AMENDMENTS OF 1976

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senate will now resume consideration of the unfinished business, S. 3065, which the clerk will state.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 3065) to amend the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971 to provide for its administration by a Federal Election Commission appointed in accordance with the requirements of the Constitution, and for other purposes.

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Paul Donnelly, a member of Senator SYMINGTON'S staff, may have the privilege of the floor during the debate on S. 3065.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment for myself and the senior Senator from South Dakota (Mr. MCGOVERN) and ask that it be read and considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

At the end of the bill add the following new section:

HONORARIA

SEC. . Section 616 of Title 18, United States Code, is repealed.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I want to make it clear, Mr. President, that the amendment is to the substitute which has been offered by the Senator from Michigan.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Arizona will be so modified.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I rise to speak in support of the amendment jointly offered by the senior Senator from South Dakota (Mr. McGOVERN) and my self to strike out the limitations on honorariums in section 327 of the Federal Election Campaign Act.

This provision is both mischievous and discriminatory. It was originally added to a Senate-passed campaign finance bill by Members of the House of Representatives, not as a reform measure, but to openly punish and pressure Members of the Senate who had not gone along with the idea of steep pay raises for Members of Congress. The House author of the honorarians limitation, Congressman ANNUNZIO, vocally announced his purpose in proposing the provision. During what brief discussion there was of the section in the House, the author of this restriction stated that:

In the main, it is aimed at the members of the other body who have been so piously proclaiming from time to time that Members of Congress do not need any pay raises.

He repeated this purpose when discussing the conference report which became law, adding the hope that we Senators, in his words, "will now come along to acting more wisely when the measure of a pay raise comes up."

Surely, Mr. President, there is no room in Federal law for provisions such as this, which are run through by one House of Congress out of pique with the other body, and as a self-serving tool for pressuring that other body to approve congressional pay raises. Mr. President, this bit of background on the origin of what is now section 327 highlights what is wrong with it. It is a narrow and badly worded limitation on outside income of Members of Congress and other Government officials. When an amendment was offered during debate on the Campaign Finance Law which called for a far-reaching restriction of outside payments and fees to Members of Congress, it was beaten down by a vote of 61 to 31. That proposed amendment had been offered by Senator ALLEN and it would have prohibited the receipt by Members of Congress and Government officials of nearly all payments other than their official salaries. This is the kind of honest amendment I can vote for and, although I did cast my vote against tabling the Allen amendment, it was badly beaten.

Mr. President, this makes my point that Congress has made no effort to restrict all outside income.

Nothing in section 327 prohibits the 286 lawyers who are Members of Congress from earning outside income from their vocation. Nothing prevents the 41 or so farmers in Congress from accepting income from Government agricultural subsidies. Nothing prevents the 16 Members of Congress who had a business or banking background from receiving any income for whatever enterprises they may have retained. Nor does anything in the section limit the receipt of income from securities and other investments.

I might add, Mr. President, that nothing in 327 prevents any Member of this body from writing a book. I have written a number of books since I have been in this body. I am not foolish enough to think that BARRY GOLDWATER, a merchant in Phoenix, Ariz., could ever get a book published, but BARRY GOLDWATER, a Senator from Arizona, gets his books published. Yet there is nothing in this section that prevents my doing that. There is a limitation on the amount of money that can be received by a Member of Congress for writing an article for a magazine.

Another example: There is nothing in this section that prevents us from appearing on television shows or radio shows and being paid for it. I happen to be a member of a union, the Television Actors Union. I guess that possibly saves my hide, but, nevertheless, a number of us do have income from those sources. I have a radio program. It is on twice a day on some 400 stations in this country. Nothing in this section prevents my being paid for it.

I bring these points out from personal experience, and I am sure that many Members of this body could cite similar experiences.

Mr. President, what the section does do is impose a discriminatory limit only on the income of people who happen to be qualified as lecturers, speakers, or writers—and, I might add, not that any of us are. But sometimes we are mistakenly looked upon as such. What it does is severely restrict income that up to now has been available to schools, colleges and local charities. In many cases those of us who received honorariums for speeches would donate the entire balance to this church, that hospital, or some other charitable organization. Yet under the existing and proposed law, there is no way to contribute an honorarium to a charity over the limits of the section even though not one penny of it would go through the speaker's accounts or through his hands or be under his direction. What this has meant is that many charities are going, and will be going, to go without help that formerly have depended on it.

Again, I can cite my own personal experience. Before this bill became law, I had made pledges to various charities, churches, hospitals, and so forth, in my State of close to $50,000, which I did not have to give. But I propose to give the income from lecturing to these purposes. I wrote the chairman of the committee that controls that law and asked if the honorariums could be paid to these charities direct—not even going through my hands for signature or anything else. He ruled no. So I have the unpleasant future of trying to find $50,000. I will do it, but it would be much easier if we did not have to be hamstrung by this law.

Mr. President, there are other reasons why section 327 should be stricken from the law. The language of this provision is badly drafted and no one can fairly understand what he is prohibited from doing. The term "honorarium" is not defined in this section or anywhere else in the Federal Election Campaign Act. Nor does any other section of the United States Criminal Code to which this section has been added, contain any definition of "honorarium."

There is very little legislative history as to the meaning of this word. In fact, of the several hundred pages of legislative history relating to the Campaign Finance Amendments of 1974, only about 10 pages in all involve the honorarium section. Not one of these pages contains a definition of the word.

I remind those of my colleagues who are attorneys that one of the first principles of the Constitution rests in the protection of individual rights by the fifth amendment, what is known as the due process clause. In brief, the Supreme Court has said that due process includes "the deepest notions of what is fair and right and just."

Due process, in the context of a criminal statute means that the language of that statute "must be sufficiently explicit to inform those who are subject to its what conduct on their part will render them liable to its penalties." A statute which forbids "the doing of an act in terms so vague that men of common intelligence must necessarily guess at its meaning and differ as to its application," in the words of the Supreme Court, "violates the first essential of due process of law."

This doctrine has been known as the "vagueness" doctrine and it has been the basis for voiding several legislative statutes. In this instance particularly, where section 327 restricts on its face first amendments freedom of speech, I believe such an unclear statute is a bad one. As the Supreme Court said in the recent case of Buckley against Valeo, "where first amendment rights are involved, an even 'greater degree of specificity' is required."

Mr. President, I urge that my colleagues add section 616 to the substitute which has been offered by my friend from Michigan.

I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, I rise to support the amendment of the Senator from Arizona and the Senator from South Dakota. To me, the present restriction in the law is a blatant example of unfairness and unconstitutionality. It is perfectly all right for a Member of the Senate to manage an apartment house, to own an apartment house, to spend his weekends fixing toilets, putting on sideboards, or whatever else he wants to do. It is perfectly all right legally to practice law and to earn income from that. It is not all right, as the bill is read and apparently intended, to go out and make a speech or go out and write an article and be paid in excess of $1,000 to do it. It is all right, interestingly enough, to write a book—to write, in essence, long articles and be paid great amounts of money. I have, compiled by the Library of Congress, a list of all the autobiographies and books written by Members of Congress, many written by Members of the Senate, including many who voted against any change in this honorarium limitation.

It takes a great deal of time to write a lengthy book, if they wrote it themselves. At least their names appear on them.

It seems to me immoral, Mr. President, to say you can write a long article and be paid $25,000 if you call it a book, but you cannot write a short article and be paid $1,500 if it is called an article.

I ask unanimous consent to have this list of authors in the Congress printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the list was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. PACKWOOD. Secondly, the argument is raised that making speeches and writing books causes us to miss votes in the Senate. So I again had the Library of Congress prepare for me a list of the top moneymakers on the honorarium circuit for 1973 and 1974, the years that this limitation has been in effect. I do not have the figures for 1975 because the honorariums have not yet been reported for 1975.

But in taking the entire list of those who have spoken, with one exception—and in this entire list of 15 to 20 people with one exception each year, there is one person who is extraordinarily low—the Senate average would be around 85 or 86 percent, with one person down to 55 percent. In each case it happened to be, 1973 and 1974, a candidate running for election in 1974, and those running for election are notoriously low in their attendance. Subtracting that one person in each year, who was notoriously low, the average attendance record for all of those who go out and speak is above the Senate average. So they are not missing votes any more, at least, than other people miss votes, for whatever reasons other people miss votes. They are not missing votes because they are writing articles and making speeches.

What it really boils down to is that some people like to play golf, some people like to go fishing, go hunting, some people like to make speeches on weekends, and we all ought to be allowed to do what we like to do, and there should not be any restriction, a very narrow and limited restriction, on those who go out and make speeches.

I wholeheartedly support the amendment.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I thank my friend from Oregon. I think he has made a great contribution to the logic that I hope, exists in this proposal.

I want to repeat what I said earlier that this came about because the House of Representatives, at least some Members, were mad at the Senate for seeming to resist the pay raise, so they are going to take it out on the Senate and the whole Congress by disallowing any so-called honorariums, whatever they might be.

I will withhold the remainder of my time unless the Senator from New York wishes to be heard.

Mr. BUCKLEY. I thank the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. President, I also rise to support this amendment. It seems to me the limitation that has been put into the law is irrational and erratic. I believe it is of dubious constitutionality.

I will say, quite frankly, when the plaintiffs in Buckley against Valeo considered the specific complaints that they would argue before the Supreme Court they chose not to zero in on this one because I and other Members of Congress did not want to color our case with any potential self-advantage, but I wish that somebody had joined in to have tested this as well because, it seems to me, it is a deprivation of a property right, the right to earn, without due process and without the kind of rationality that could justify such a restriction.

I also happen to believe, Mr. President, that this provision is counterproductive. Let us face the facts. Members of the Senate are really required to maintain two households. They maintain their household in their State of origin and they must also maintain a house here in the District or in the neighboring areas.

The provision that allows us to deduct expenses for our residence here is way outdated. We are allowed $3,000 as a deduction. The rent on my first apartment here exceeded that, and it was a modest apartment.

The fact is that a number of people in this body feel they have to supplement the income they have to meet the costs, the extra costs, incurred by virtue of their service in the Senate, the cost of education and all the rest.

Therefore, in order to maintain their maximum earning potential they are forced to leave town, go somewhere 15 times a year at $1,000 a head instead of 5, 6, or 7 times a year for a larger amount.

Then, I believe, the Senator from Oregon talked about the time it takes to write a book. I guess I am on that list. I happen to have written a book in the last year, and I can certify that I spent infinitely more time on that particular project than I have in the last 5 years speaking, and I have spoken with some regularity in New York State and around the country.

So I hope we will drop all of the pieties. They fool nobody, and I hope we will restore to ourselves the basic rights that anybody else in this country has to use his spare time as he sees fit.

I thank the Senator from Arizona for having introduced this amendment.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, I yield myself 5 minutes.

Mr. President, the Senator from Arizona is quite right historically on the background of this amendment. Senators will recall that there was no such provision in the bill as passed by the Senate and there had not been, prior to that time, any such limitation. But the House imposed such a limit and wrote it into the law, and that went to conference.

In our conference with the House, the House's thinking was colored by exactly the same reasons as stated by the Senator from Arizona as to why they wanted to get this particular limitation in. It turned out that the House Members were not receiving great amounts of honoraiums and were not engaging in it to the extent that some of the Senators were, and so the House conferees were quite critical, and in an effort to try to get a bill we accepted that add-on by the House at that particular time.

Then, this year, the issue, of course, came up again because it was in the draft of the House bill as it came to us. In the Rules Committee we considered the issue itself, and one of the members of the Rules Committee offered an amendment to change it as it now is in S. 3065 on page 42. So that the figure, the limitation, was doubled from $1,000 to $2,000 per appearance, that is, for any appearance, speech, or article or honorariums aggregating more than $24,000 in a particular year.

The rationale in arriving at the $24,000 was that we have raised the amount for a particular one from $1,000 to $2,000, and you could have 15 appearances under the existing law for $1,000 each, and yet under this one, one could have $2,000 each, and it would only take 12 appearances or 12 times theoretically away from Washington to build up to the $24,000. That was the rationale that was presented, and the committee did accept that and wrote it into the bill as it is here.

The Senator from Arizona's proposal now, of course, would strike any limitation at all, leave the law as it was prior to the enactment of the Act in 1974.

Mr. MATHIAS. Will the Senator yield for a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Mr. Colbert King of my staff be granted privilege of the floor during the debate on this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without obection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, I do not see any other Senator who wants to talk on this matter. I am prepared to yield back the remainder of my time, if the Senator is.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I am prepared to yield back my time.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Will the Senator yield to me?

I believe, frankly, that the present limitation is unconstitutional. If it were tested in the courts, my judgment is that it would be declared unconstitutional. I think that view is buttressed by another point which I should like to make.

I refer to the fact that the amendment of the Senator from Arizona does not change in any way the existing requirement of public disclosure of the honoraria received by any Senator. Is that correct?

Mr. GOLDWATER. That is absolutely correct.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Accordingly, in the future, as in the past, on an annual basis, each Senator would still have to file and publicly disclose the sources and amounts of honoraria received?

Mr. GOLDWATER. That is correct. This amendment does not touch that.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I thank the Senator.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, I would like to make one further observation. The Senator is precisely correct; there is no limitation in the law, in this provision or elsewhere on a person's engaging in any other activity, and he can do that.

However, there is a provision in the Rules of the Senate, rule 44, which requires the Senator to file under the direction of the Committee on Standards and Conduct disclosure of any amount that he may have received, from whatever that source is, each fee or compensation of $1,000 or more received by him during the preceding year from a client, and so on. There are various other requirements in rule 44 as well.

So there is a complete filing required and as well as disclosure.

Mr. President, I am prepared to yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time has been yielded back. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Arizona.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask that it be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Arizona (Mr. GOLDWATER) for himself and Mr. McGOVERN proposes an amendment to the bill, as follows:

On page 42, beginning with line 18, strike out through line 2 on page 43.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, all that this amendment does is apply the same reasoning to the bill. The other amendment was to the substitute which will be offered later. This amendment is merely to the bill.

Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, I am prepared to yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Arizona.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the Goldwater amendment was just agreed to.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that it be in order to move to reconsider the vote by which the previous Goldwater amendment to the substitute was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, I so move.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

AMENDMENT NO. 1467

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, I have an amendment at the desk, No. 1467.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Maryland (Mr. MATHIAS) proposes an amendment numbered 1467.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 2, line 11, strike out "six" and insert in lieu thereof "eight".

On page 2, line 17, after "party" insert the following: ", and at least two members appointed under this paragraph shall not be affiliated with any political party".

On page 2, line 17, after "party" insert the following: ", and at least two members appointed under this paragraph shall not be affiliated with any political party".

On page 2, line 22, strike out "six" and insert in lieu thereof "eight".

On page 3, line 5, strike out "and".

On page 3, line 8, strike out the period and insert in lieu thereof a comma and the word "and".

On page 3, between lines 8 and 9, insert the following:

"(iv) two of the members, not affiliated with the same political party, shall be appointed for terms ending on April 30, 1983.".

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, this is an amendment to the bill rather than to the Griffin substitute.

I explained the amendment in some detail when I offered it several days ago and the explanation appears in full in the RECORD.

The very simple purpose is to add two members to the Commission who will not be affiliated with any political party.

The purpose of this is simply to give some representation to what may well be the largest group of voters on the American political scene today—those who are not affiliated with a political party.

I know that there are some people who are reluctant to take this step because they think it will encourage people to leave political parties. I submit, Mr. President, that this is not a step that will encourage it. It is the old method of doing business that has encouraged people to leave political parties. It is the old way of doing business that has driven the nonmembership, the numbers of those not affiliated with political parties, from about 20 percent of the American electorate 20 years ago to over 40 percent of the American electorate today.

So, Mr. President, this is a very simple step which recognizes that a very large percentage, perhaps half, perhaps larger than either of the political parties, a very large percentage of the American electorate, does not choose to affiliate with a political party and these people deserve some representation.

It is a very simple amendment adding two nonaffiliated members to the Commission.

I urge the Senate to consider it favorably.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, I yield myself 2 minutes.

Mr. President, the Senator from

Maryland has discussed this amendment with me and, frankly, I had the feeling that he expressed that some people might have reservations about the fact that adding two members who were not affiliated with any political party might tend to encourage people to not belong to a political party.

I do not think we should do anything that would discourage them from belonging to a political party, or encourage them not to belong.

However, I do not feel very strongly about it. The Senator has stated to me and has stated on the floor that he believes this would not have any adverse impact. So I am willing to take this amendment to conference. It is not in the House proposal as reported out by the House, but I am willing to accept the amendment and take it to conference.

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Colorado (Mr. GARY HART) be added as a cosponsor to this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President. I appreciate very much the attitude of the distinguished Senator, the manager of the bill, and I believe that I have not misled him. We are just facing the facts.

Not just particularly, but I very much do not like to see what is a sign of disintegration of the two-party system. But whether we like it or not the facts and figures are there. Forty percent of the American voters do not affiliate with a political party. It seems to me it is the most simple justice to allow them some representation on the election commission.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, the concept, of course, of the Federal Election Commission is that it should be bipartisan insofar as the appointment of its members is concerned. During the confirmation hearings, when the FEC appointees were being considered by the Senate Committee on Rules and Administration, this Senator—and I think I was joined by some of my colleagues—made a point of emphasizing to those being appointed that once they were appointed to the Commission it was expected that they would not be partisan; that they were responsible for serving the public interest without regard to their previous political affiliation.

There is nothing new or unusual about that expectation. Just as a person who is appointed a Federal judge may come from a background of experience and affiliation with one political party, nevertheless, it is expected that in his judicial capacity he will exercise judgment on a nonpartisan basis.

What I am leading up to, really, is an indication that I see nothing wrong with the amendment of the Senator from Maryland. I hope he will also offer it to the substitute because I am sure he would like to make certain that it is adopted, whichever of the two courses the Senate elects to take.

I would like to indicate that there is an amendment in the committee bill which I am sure the Senator from Maryland would not like. That is the requirement that for the Commission to take any action of a meaningful nature there must be two votes from each party in support of that action.

What that language does, it seems to me, is to politicize the Commission. They must always be conscious of the political affiliation of the membership, which goes exactly contrary to the original intent, and certainly contrary, it seems to me, to the purpose of the amendment of the Senator from Maryland.

I wonder what the effect of the Senator's amendment will be on the provision of the committee bill to which I have just alluded. Has the Senator from Maryland considered that?

Mr. MATHIAS. I did not consider that.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Was the Senator aware that there was such a provision in the committee bill?

Mr. MATHIAS. Yes, I am aware of that provision.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I think it is one of the most objectionable parts of the committee bill.

Mr. MATHIAS. It seems to me that the independent members might well provide a majority swinging either side, but it would not affect the requirement that, in a decision of the majority, they had to have two members from each political party.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I take it that that would be true unless there was some other change made.

Mr. MATHIAS. Yes. I think unless there is another change what we would have to have, in other words, is not a simple majoritarian principle but a majoritarian principle plus a minimum of the party.

I do not really like that provision, but I do not think this amendment affects it.

Mr. GRIFFIN. If anything, it dilutes it.

Mr. MATHIAS. It dilutes it.

Mr. GRIFFIN. That is one of the reasons I see merit to the Senator's amendment.

If there is any Senator who is not familiar with this provision that I am referring to, it is on page 4 of the committee bill. Line 19 says, "Except that the affirmative vote of four members of the Commission—no less than two of whom are affiliated with the same political party—shall be required" in order for the Commission to take certain actions. They are the most important actions, of course, on which the Commission is supposed to rule.

That means that as the bill is now, any two members of the same political party have an absolute veto on anything as far as the Commission is concerned. This is intended, it is deliberate. It is deliberately intended to weaken the Commission, to make it impossible for a combination of three members of one political party to be joined by one member of the other political party and take any action. I think that is a very serious and bad provision.

Mr. CANNON. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I will be glad to yield.

Mr. CANNON. In the existing law three members have a veto anyway. It takes a vote of four. If three members have a veto and all the Senator is saying now is two members of a political party——

Mr. GRIFFIN. That is different than saying two members have a veto.

Mr. CANNON. The difference is not as great as the Senator would have it appear.

Mr. GRIFFIN. It makes all the difference in the world.

Mr. CANNON. If the Senator's amendment is approved, then we are in quite a different situation because there would be an eight member Commission.

Mr. GRIFFIN. We will have that under the chairman's bill anyway. Is that correct? If the Mathias amendment is adopted, there will be an eight-member Commission. Is that correct?

Mr. CANNON. That is what I said.

Mr. MATHIAS. I do not want to prolong this debate, but it does seem to me that one point deserves very brief comment. I do not believe that this is quite the situation of a Federal judge who becomes nonpartisan and neutral, politically, once he ascends the bench. I think these people are being drawn from each party and hopefully, under this amendment, from no party, because of their political experiences, because this is not an area of general jurisdiction, law in equity, admiralty, and all the rest.

This is a very special area of jurisdiction dealing with election practices. Their political experience in life will necessarily color their decisions, and properly so. That is why we are choosing these people, because they have some political experience in life. I think those who are independents or nonaffiliated, or as we in Maryland call them, "decines," have had a particular experience, I am sure, involving a considerable amount of frustration. That view, I think, will add something to the reality of the decisions of the Commission.

I appreciate the attitude of the Senator from Michigan in accepting at least the concept that this may be of some value.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I believe the comment of the Senator from Maryland is realistic, even though we did extract from the appointees their agreement that when they were confirmed they were to be nonpartisan. I think the Senator makes a good point, that in this particular area it may be somewhat unrealistic to assume that it will not affect their decisions on political questions.

Nevertheless, it seems to me that should be the goal and the objective to the extent possible.

Mr. MATHIAS. Oh, I agree. But I think we are dealing with two time frames.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Right.

Mr. MATHIAS. One, the unpartisan way in which we hope they will act in the future; but that is necessarily going to be colored by their partisan experiences in the past.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I do not know who has the floor. Is the Senator from New York seeking to contribute to this colloquy?

Mr. BUCKLEY. Frankly, I had risen to make an observation, but the discussion got beyond the point.

I had risen when the Senator spoke about the provision in existing law. I think he talked about a party vote being allowed to advance a decision by a party.

Mr. GRIFFIN. It is not in existing law, but it would be the law if the pending bill should be passed.

Mr. BUCKLEY. But this confirms my reaction, which is one of cynicism, pure and simple. We have wrapped in all kinds of advantages for the incumbent.

The Supreme Court by its decision eliminated some, fortunately, which would have redounded even more to the advantage of incumbents; but I hope these comments will somehow get into public discussion so people can have a better understanding that this is not reform, but it is legislation which sort of consolidates the status quo.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, I wonder if the Senator from Maryland would object to having a rollcall on his amendment, to be sure that in conference it will receive proper attention.

Mr. MATHIAS. No, I certainly have no objection.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on the pending amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McGOVERN). Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is all remaining time yielded back?

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, just briefly, since there it to be a rollcall on it, I just want to recall again to the Senate some of the critical statistics which support the amendment.

According to the Gallup opinion index for November-December 1975, 33 percent of the electorate considered themselves independents, while only 22 percent considered themselves Republicans and 45 percent considered themselves Democrats.

Independents, therefore, outnumber Republicans by 3 to 2, and the same Gallup poll reflects that since 1964, in the short space of 12 years, the proportion of independents has increased 50 percent, while the Democrats have declined from a majority status to a low of 42 percent.

So that is really the fact of the matter. That is the reality that we face, and it is the reality that this amendment recognizes.

I am prepared to vote.

Mr. GRIFFIN. If I could ask a question for clarification——

Mr. MATHIAS. Yes.

Mr. GRIFFIN. The question has been asked concerning the intent: would it be possible for a President to name a member of a third party as one of the two appointees?

Mr. MATHIAS. As the amendment is drawn, it is clearly for the nonaffiliated.

Mr. GRIFFIN. With any party.

Mr. MATHIAS. Yes, with any party, because that, statistically, is the large group, the reservoir from whom we would have to draw.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Then it would be the assumption that the six members would be affiliated——

Mr. MATHIAS. With the two major parties.

Mr. GRIFFIN. No more than two from any one major party.

Mr. MATHIAS. Right.

Mr. BUCKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MATHIAS. I am happy to yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. BUCKLEY. I believe the question raised by the Senator from Maryland has merit. The fact is that under existing law, minor parties have very special problems. There are all kinds of discriminations against them, and I believe it would be helpful, frankly——

Mr. MATHIAS. I have made some study of that subject, and I am aware of it.

[Laughter.]

Mr. BUCKLEY. I am a product of that system, so I too am aware of it. But I do believe it would be worthwhile to require that one be a member of the public unaffiliated with a political party and the other have an affiliation with a minor party. I wonder if the Senator from Maryland would be willing to modify his amendment to that effect. I truly believe there are special problems affecting minor parties.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Must be, or may be?

Mr. BUCKLEY. May be.

Mr. MATHIAS. Well, I am impressed with the kind of equity which underlies the suggestion of the Senator from New York. I do believe, however, we are dealing on a solid statistical base with the amendment as it stands. We are dealing with figures that are known and recognized.

At this point, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the results of a survey conducted in 1974, including the period from 1956 to 1974, conducted by the University of Michigan, which I think supports these figures.

There being no objection, the survey was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TABLE 1.—DISTRIBUTION OF PARTY IDENTIFICATION IN THE UNITED STATES, 1952–73

Center for Political Studies, the University of Michigan.

Mr. MATHIAS. It does indicate that this large number of independents exists.

I do not have before me at this moment, and this makes me somewhat reluctant to amend the amendment at this point, statistics which actually show us the membership of the minor political parties. I would be reluctant to alter this pattern which looks to a group that we know exists; they are a group in being. I would hope that the Senator from New York, much as I sympathize with the spirit of his amendment, and much as I sympathize with the problems of a third party, would withhold that, because I am just not sure enough of how the numbers fit together. This amendment is directed at this group which we know, according to Dr. Gallup, just at the end of the year was at least a third of the national electorate.

Mr. BUCKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MATHIAS. Yes.

Mr. BUCKLEY. I shall not press the matter at this point. As a matter of fact, I shall not do so for tactical reasons. I am persuaded that in due course members of minority parties, or minority parties themselves, will be able to assemble the provable evidence to demonstrate the discriminatory character of this law; and were my suggestion to be adopted, it would weaken the case that I think will ultimately succeed in abolishing this monstrosity.

Mr. MATHIAS. I think the Senator is right. I do not know whether the third parties will be able to assemble the evidence, but I think third parties and independents will assemble together as a mighty political force in this country, and will challenge the two traditional parties in many instances. I do not think there is any doubt about that, and I shall be happy to join with the Senator. I just suggest that we prepare ourselves a little better before we try to present a case here to the Senate on an amendment on which there will be a rollcall in a few minutes. We do have a sound statistical base on which we are now moving, and if we can withhold that argument, I will be glad to join in it with the Senator when the foundation is laid.

Mr. GRIFFIN. One further question, which I think I know the answer to, but perhaps it would be well to get the view of the Senator from Maryland. The staff has called it to my attention. How long would one have to be an independent in order to be eligible for appointment?

Mr. MATHIAS. I think as long as good faith requires. You know, people do move around in the American political system. They do not always stay as one or the other.

I had occasion to be discussing with Mr. Edward Bennett Williams the other day the fact that prior to 1964 he was a Republican. He was one of my ardent supporters, and he worked in my campaigns when I ran for election to the other body. In 1964 he left the Republican Party, and he wanted me to go with him; and he was chiding me the other day. He said, "You see, you should have gone." He said. "You have waited too long." He said, "On the other hand, John Connally moved too soon."

[Laughter.]

Mr. GRIFFIN. Well, I think a further answer to my question is that these appointments have to be confirmed by the Senate, and the bona fides of the person's claim to independence or to being a Republican or a Democrat is subject to judgment by the Senate.

Mr. MATHIAS. I think the Senator is absolutely right. There has to be discretion by the Senate. And I think if in fact someone had obviously registered as either a Democrat or as a Republican, or had dropped any party affiliation, simply to get appointed to this commission, it would be patent on the face of it, and the Senate would not have much trouble in smelling that out and I hope the President would not in making the appointments in the first place.

Mr. GRIFFIN. There is another question which may be taken care of, but sometimes one cannot tell by looking at the amendments which would have to be technical in nature. In the bill which the Senator's amendment would amend, in that paragraph which I referred to earlier, it requires the affirmative vote of four members of the Commission to take action. Obviously, unless there were some conforming amendments to the bill, I assume we would not want an eight-man Commission with four members making the decision.

The Senator is thinking then five members would be a majority for action?

Mr. MATHIAS. I would think the Senator is right, and we should have a conforming amendment. If this amendment is adopted, we would prepare a conforming amendment which would, I think, say that a majority——

Mr. GRIFFIN. That is so, because obviously if they had a tie, nothing has been decided by eight members. So I suggest that the staff be looking at the bill and the substitute to provide the necessary conforming amendments to make sure that the bill or the substitute makes sense, if the amendment of the Senator from Maryland is adopted.

Does the Senator from Nevada have anything further?

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, it had entered my mind earlier that it might be well for the Senator to suggest the absence of a quorum and try to modify his amendment.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I would suggest that it would be well to modify his amendment to include these conforming amendments.

Mr. MATHIAS. I am happy to do this at this time.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum for this purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On whose time does the Senator suggest.

Mr. CANNON. To be charged equally.

Mr. MATHIAS. On my time. I make a point of order that a quorum is not present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The clerk will call the roll.

The second assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, while they are working on this, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

COMMON CAUSE NOT MEETING WITH DEMOCRATIC CAUCUS

Mr. GRIFFIN. I do that only to make a very brief statement and to call attention to a notice in the Washington Post this morning that at 12:15 p.m. there will be a meeting of the Democratic Caucus of the Senate and that they will be meeting in closed session with Common Cause.

Mr. MANSFIELD. What is that?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Surely the Washington Post cannot be correct in its publication here today.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator repeat what he said?

Mr. GRIFFIN. It says that Common Cause—I take it that that would be representatives of Common Cause—are meeting in closed session with the Democratic Caucus of the Senate today at 12:15 p.m.

Mr. MANSFIELD. No; there will be a Democratic conference today. The purpose is to discuss the resolution based on the suit brought by Common Cause.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I see.

I show the majority leader what was in the paper. It was a little bit shocking. I wondered if it might need some explanation.

Mr. MANSFIELD. The press makes mistakes once in a while just as we do.

Mr. GRIFFIN. All right.

Mr. MANSFIELD. But we never invite outside organizations into our caucuses. We would invite our Republican colleagues in first.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I thank the Senator.

I would apologize, except I think that, in this instance, it is probably a good thing to mention. The majority leader agrees with me that this should be straightened out because, otherwise, there would have been a great deal of misunderstanding.

Mr. MANSFIELD. What we want to do now is straighten out a resolution which we discussed at the last conference, but we developed a plug, and we hope to eradicate that.

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Michigan yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes.

Mr. MATHIAS. I add a word to what the majority leader has said. I honestly believe from what I know of John Gardner of Common Cause, that even if the majority leader invited them to a closed door partisan session they would not come.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I tend to agree with the Senator's observation.

Mr. MATHIAS. I suspect they have been enticed into a few by Members of both parties, the invitations to which they have resisted.

FEDERAL ELECTION CAMPAIGN ACT AMENDMENTS OF 1976

The Senate continued with the consideration of the bill (S. 3065) to amend the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971 to provide for its administration by a Federal Election Commission appointed in accordance with the requirements of the Constitution, and for other purposes.

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, I am prepared with the conforming amendment to my amendment.

Mr. GRIFFIN. The yeas and nays have been ordered so the Senator shall have to ask unanimous consent.

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may have permission to modify my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, I offer a modification to the amendment to the effect that on page 4, line 20, strike the word "four" and insert in lieu thereof "5".

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator send his modification to the desk?

The modification will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

On page 2, line 11, strike out "six" and insert in lieu thereof "eight".

On page 2, line 17, after "party" insert the following: ", and at least two members appointed under this paragraph shall not be affiliated with any political party".

On page 2, line 17, after "party" insert the following: ", and at least two members appointed under this paragraph shall not be affiliated with any political party".

On page 2, line 22, strike out "six" and insert in lieu thereof "eight".

On page 3, line 5, strike out "and".

On page 3, line 8, strike out the period and insert in lieu thereof a comma and the word "and".

On page 3, between lines 8 and 9, insert the following:

"(vi) two of the members, not affiliated with the same political party, shall be appointed for terms ending on April 30, 1983.".

On page 4, line 20, strike out "four" and insert in lieu thereof "5".

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is so modified.

Is all time yielded back?

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, I said earlier I was willing to accept the amendment, but as long as the minority wants a rollcall vote on it, I am prepared to yield back the remainder of my time unless someone on this side wants to speak.

Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time is yielded back.

The yeas and nays have been ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I announce that the Senator from Idaho (Mr. CHURCH), the Senator from Indiana (Mr. HARTKE), the Senator from Washington (Mr. JACKSON), the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. KENNEDY), the Senator from Louisiana (Mr. LONG), the Senator from Rhode Island (Mr. PASTORE), the Senator from California (Mr. TUNNEY), and the Senator from New Jersey (Mr. WILLIAMS), are necessarily absent.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Washington (Mr. JACKSON) and the Senator from Rhode Island (Mr. PASTORE) would each have voted "yea."

Mr. GRIFFIN. I announce that the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. BROOKE), the Senator from North Carolina (Mr. HELMS), and the Senator from North Dakota (Mr. YOUNG) are necessarily absent.

I further announce that the Senator from Vermont (Mr. STAFFORD) is absent due to illness.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from North Carolina (Mr. HELMS) would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 88, nays 0, as follows:

So Mr. MATHIAS' amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GRIFFIN and Mr. MOSS. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. MATHIAS and Mr. TAFT addressed the Chair.

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio yield to me?

Mr. TAFT. I had already agreed to yield, and I ask unanimous consent to yield to the distinguished minority leader, without losing my right to the floor.

Mr. MATHIAS. Fine.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GARY HART). Who yields time?

Mr. TAFT. I ask unanimous consent to yield to Senator GRIFFIN, without losing my right to the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has no time until the amendment is offered. Who yields time?

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I believe I am in control of time.

Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to read the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the clerk suspend until the Senate is in order? The Senate is not in order. Will Senators take their seats or have their conversations take place in the cloakroom? The Senate is not in order.

The clerk may proceed.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

At the end of Amendment 1491 add the following new section:

TERMINATION OF PAYMENTS FOR LACK OF DEMONSTRABLE SUPPORT

Sec. .Section 9037 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to payments to eligible candidates in primary campaigns) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(c) Termination of Payments for Lack of Demonstrable Support.—

"(1) General rule.—Notwithstanding any other provision of this chapter, no payment shall be made under this chapter to any candidate more than 30 days after the date of the second consecutive primary election in which such candadate receives less than 10 percent of the number of votes cast for all candidates of the same party for the same office in such primary election if the candidate permitted or authorized the appearance of his name on the ballot. If the primary elections are held in more than one State on the same date, a candidate shall, for purposes of this subsection, be treated as receiving that percentage of the votes on that date which he received in the primary election conducted on such date in which he received the greatest percentage vote.

"(2) Reinstatement of payments.—Notwithstanding the provisions of paragraph (1), a candidate whose payments have been terminated under paragraph (1) may again receive payments (including amounts he would have received but for paragraph (1)) if he receives 20 percent or more of the total number of votes cast for candidates of the same party in a primary election held after the date on which the election was held which was the basis for terminating payments to him.".

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Mr. Tom Block of my staff have the privilege of the floor during the debate and vote on this measure.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, the amendment I have offered is a modification of amendment No. 1491 proposed by Mr. GRIFFIN, amended only so that it would be an amendment to the substitute now pending.

The amendment is offered to protect the intergrity of the Presidential matching fund program. Let me be candid. I opposed this concept when it initially came before the Senate, and I intend to support efforts to delete the checkoff provision altogether. Nonetheless, I also believe if a majority of the Senate wants to have a Federal program then it should be a workable program.

Clearly the system that has been operating during hte current primaries has not worked. The Washington Post, in an editorial on March 9, put the case well, and I quote:

> The program was not intended, for instance, to encourage marginal contenders to spend far beyond their means on the assumption that public funds would cover up to half of their debts. Nor was it meant to keep the door of the treasury open to those who acknowledged that their path to the nomination has been closed.

I agree with the Washington Post, and I believe Congress should terminate payments to those who show a lack of support.

Under my amendment funds would be terminated if a candidate does not receive at least 10 percent of the vote in the two consecutive primaries that fall on different days. The termination would become effective 30 days after the trigger date so as to give a period for cleaning up the operations of the campaign.

I have also included a provision to allow a candidate to again become eligible if he goes into a further primary without the public financing involved and receives more than 20 percent of the vote in that future primary.

Mr. President, it is difficult to establish at what point a candidacy loses by ability, but I believe the standards set in my amendment would generally be agreed upon by my brethren in the art of politics.

Critics will undoubtedly charge that the levels I have set are arbitrary. But this legislation is full of arbitrary decisions Congress has made in the field of campaigning and they are decisions that the Supreme Court has affirmed.

The setting of a $1,000 ceiling on contributions is an arbitrary figure; the itemization of each donation over $10 is an arbitrary decision; and the limits of contributions to multicandidate committees is arbitrary.

There is no scientific way of setting these limits and, I believe, the standards set in my amendment are fair.

Once a candidate has failed to obtain 10 percent of the vote in two consecutive races he would have 30 days to terminate his campaign. This would allow for debts that were incurred during eligible primaries to be paid, and it would also give the candidate's staff time to adjust to the conclusion of the campaign.

I want to emphasize that the failure to obtain 10 percent of the vote in two consecutive primaries does not mean that a candidate can no longer run for President.

It will only mean that the taxpayers should no longer be required to finance the apparently fruitless effort. Under my amendment any individual who wants to run for President can, and any individual can obtain Federal matching funds. But once the campaign begins and the votes are counted, my amendment will separate the serious candidates from those who are not going to be nominated.

I know that on some occasions there are primaries in more than one State on the same day. Candidates, therefore, target their efforts. I, therefore, have language in my amendment stating that the consecutive showing of less than 10 percent cannot occur from the same date.

I also realize that in some States candidates have no choice as to whether or not their names appear on the ballot. I, therefore, have inserted language stating that the candidate must have permitted or authorized his name to be entered on a particular primary ballot in order for it to count in the disqualification process.

This amendment will not cover all cases where candidates withdraw from the nomination but still receive funds. But I do think by passage of this amendment we will be expressing the sense of the Congress that the public financing program is not to support campaigns that are going nowhere fast.

The passage of this amendment will not close all the loopholes. A candidate could receive matching funds and not enter any primary States or enter only caucus States. However, I think it has become apparent that for any announced candidate to get the nomination, primaries are a prerequisite. In the first primary, four announced candidates received less than 10 percent of the vote in the Democratic primaries this year. They were Mr. Shriver, Governor Wallace, Senator JACKSON, and Mrs. McCormack.

Next week primaries were held in Vermont and Massachusetts. Only Mrs. McCormack received less than 10 percent in Vermont, but in Massachusetts, Shriver, HARRIS, BAYH, Shapp, and Mrs. McCormack all received less than 10 percent.

Under my amendment at this point the trigger would have been set for candidates McCormack and Shriver.

In Florida the following; Shapp, UDALL, BAYH, McCormack, Shriver, ROBERT BYRD, HARRIS, and CHURCH all received less than 10 percent of the vote. This would have added BAYH, Shapp, and HARRIS to the list of candidates who were no longer eligible for funds.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the statistics on what the various candidates have received from matching funds as of March 11.

There being no objection, the statistics were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senator Birch Bayh	$418,79[illegible]00
Senator Lloyd M. Bentsen, Jr.	511,02[illegible]61
James E. Carter	847,13[illegible]55
Senator Frank Church	209,69[illegible]28
President Gerald R. Ford	1,532,05[illegible]1
Ferd R. Harris	444,84[illegible]83
Senator Henry M. Jackson	1,485,83[illegible]85
Ellen McCormack	134,78[illegible]53
Ronald Reagan	1,473,16[illegible]73
Terry Sanford	246,38[illegible]82
Gov. Milton J. Shapp	265,79[illegible]6
R. Sargent Shriver	255,81[illegible]74
Congressman Morris K. Udall	783,85[illegible]25
Gov. George C. Wallace	2,445,59[illegible]54
Total	11,054,70[illegible]40

Mr. TAFT. I think it is worthwhile to note that the March 11 press release from the Federal Election Commission states that they were receiving requests for $627,531 from six candidates: BAYH, Carter, Ford, Reagan, Shriver, UDALL, two of whom would no longer be eligible for funds under my amendment.

I also ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial from the Cincinnati Enquirer on the subject, and the list of the primaries that are to be held this year.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SUBSIDIZED EGO TRIPS

As the 1976 political season continues to unfold, our faith in human nature tells us that the American people will become increasingly alive to the utter absurdity of the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1974.

That enactment, of course, was the 94th Congress' formal, legislative response to the whole morass known as Watergate. It was an enactment, we were informed by such outfits as "the people's lobby," Common Cause, that would clean up American politics and restore the people's faith in the entire electoral process. It was also an enactment, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) solemnly assured the Senate, that would make future Watergates impossible.

The formal withdrawal of Sen. Birch Bayh (D-Ind.) as an active seeker after the Democratic presidential nomination in the wake of what was, for him, the disaster of the Massachusetts primary, helps to underscore the pitfalls written into the Federal Election Campaign Act.

No one can know for certain where Senator Bayh got the idea that he ought to be President of the United States. But it is difficult to doubt that he was helped to that decision by the Federal Election Campaign Act.

For among that enactment's provisions is a complex formula for diverting tax-derived revenues to help finance seekers after the presidential nominations of the major parties. If they raise enough money on their own in a sufficiently representative number of states, than they qualify for federal matching funds.

In the case of Senator Bayh, these funds amounted to $273,848. Senator Bayh's campaign lived long enough to see him finish third in one primary, seventh in another.

Senator Bayh was alert enough to recognize that there was no real groundswell for him after all, but only after the American taxpayers had invested roughly $6 for every vote he received in Massachusetts and New Hampshire.

That, it strikes us, is a pretty steep price to pay for Senator Bayh's ego trip. But it is less high, really, than the price the taxpayers have paid for Sen. Lloyd Bentsen's (D-Texas) campaign for the White House—or former North Carolina Gov. Terry Sanford's.

Senator Bentsen withdrew even before the first primary—but only after the taxpayers had invested $511,023 in his campaign.

Mr. Sanford Withdrew also without going before the electorate in a single primary, after an investment of $246,388 from the taxpayers.

It is worth noting that Senator Bayh, like Senator Bentsen and Mr. Sanford, is not out of the campaign altogether; he is simply out of the active campaigning. He will still be around if the electorate calls. And why shouldn't he be, if there is the prospect of more federal matching funds?

The fact appears to be that the Federal Election Campaign Act, among its other miscalculations, is having the effect of making presidential aspirants of men and women who would not otherwise dream of running for President, and of keeping them technically in the race long after it has become obvious that they aren't going to be nominated.

If that is a contribution to cleaning up the political process, we hope the nation's taxpayers are convinced they're getting their money's worth.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I believe that we owe passage of this amendment to the people who choose to use the Federal income tax checkoff system. I am confident these individuals, like the majority of the Congress, do not want to see the matching funds go to keep dead candidacies alive.

Mr. President, I urge passage of my amendment.

Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on my amendment and I reserve the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BAYH. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. TAFT. The time is under control. Does the Senator wish to talk on my time?

Mr. BAYH. Will the Senator from Nevada permit me to have a couple of minutes to address myself to this matter?

Mr. CANNON. I yield 5 minutes to the Senator.

Mr. BAYH. As one who, I must say, comes to this particular issue with perhaps less than total objectivity, try as I will, I find the general thrust of the Senator from Ohio's amendment salutary.

I do not know whether 10 percent of the vote is the place to identify a candidate's viability, or not. Regardless, I wonder if on the second page, the fifth line, the Senator would be willing to accept an amendment after "candidate" which says "competes actively and receives less than 10 percent"?

I ask him to consider that because the State laws in some States now permit a local official to make the determination of who is going to be on the ballot. Thus a State official can try to determine the strategy of someone running for the presidency. Even though one's name is placed on the ballot, one might not choose to campaign in a State and thus finish below the 10-percent figure but lose matching funds under the amendment. It seems to me that situation is probably not what the Senator from Ohio is directing his attention to.

Mr. TAFT. I think the Senator from Indiana makes an excellent point and this was a point we tried to cover in the language of the amendment.

I point out to the Senator that on line eight we have the words:

If the candidate permitted or authorized the appearance of his name on the ballot.

In other words, if the name of the candidate appeared on the ballot, if not permission or authorization, as possible under some State laws, that primary election would not be counted for the purpose of the 10 percent minimum requirement.

I think it takes care of the problem the Senator is concerned with.

Mr. BAYH. I would like to again urge my colleague from Ohio to consider the fact that in order to take advantage of the provision on line eight, while it is possible to take one's name off the ballot in some states, in order to do that one has to totally disavow the national candidacy, which one may not want to do.

For example, an active and viable candidate may wish to spend his money some other place than a State where his name is placed on the ballot by a State official.

Would there be any great change in the thrust of the Senator's amendment to add "competes actively"?

To make my concern clear: One can take his name off the ballot in some States, but to do that he has to disavow any future intention to be a national candidate. I am certain it is not the Senator's intention to require a national candidate to spend money and to campaign in States one feels did not make sense for his candidacy.

Mr. TAFT. I think the Senator has a point. I think the language he has used and the place he has used it might be confusing. Other than that, I am inclined to suggest we add at the end of the sentence on line 9 words along the line of "or has indicated his desire to withdraw from active participation in the primaries in question."

Mr. BAYH. Why do I not yield the floor and get together with my colleague from Ohio, or his staff member, as long as he understands and is in general favor with the concern I express.

I do not care where we put the language. As I say, I think his idea of making certain Federal funds go to credible candidates, realizing it may be risky for us to establish a standard of credibility, nevertheless is wise. But I am trying to point out a very real technical problem that exists. It does not exist to me, frankly, as one who made the decision to be less than an active candidate. My name was on the Florida ballot, for example, even though I was out of the picture and was not actively campaigning.

I use that as a personal experience similar to that which might confront another candidate who is active now or would be in another election.

I thank my colleague.

Mr. TAFT. I thank the Senator for calling the matter to my attention.

Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask unanimous consent that the amendment be modified as indicated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Without objection, the amendment is so modified, as follows:

On page 1, in subsection (c)(1) after the word "ballot", add the following:

"or has indicated his desire to withdraw from active participation in the primary in question."

Mr. CLARK. Is it my understanding that I have been yielded 3 minutes?

Mr. CANNON. Five minutes.

Mr. CLARK. Five minutes.

I wish to discuss with the Senator from Ohio the effects of his amendment.

It seems to me that the intent of it is commendable because he would, in fact, try to avoid giving matching funds, Federal tax money, in effect, to candidates who were not serious candidates or who had proven through their own primary election efforts that they were not able to attract votes.

But I wonder, in fact, if we would not find if we adopted this amendment that certain serious candidates might, in fact, find themselves at a disadvantage in comparison with other candidates.

Let us remember, first of all, that these are not grants of money to candidates. We do not simply give the money to a candidate. They have to raise it by going out in a number of States and raising a rather significant amount of money in small amounts.

These are matching funds. These are funds, really, only given to a candidate if he goes out and raises the same kind of money himself.

But second, and perhaps more important, suppose a candidate were to enter a race rather late. Let us suppose a candidate decides, for one reason or another—and we have seen this happen in the past—that he wants to go into the New Hampshire primary and he decides that only a day or two or three before the New Hampshire primary, and perhaps another primary follows a week later; he may be a very serious candidate and, indeed, if given time to prove that, may even emerge as the nominee. Yet in that first race and in the second race a week later, he may well find he is not well enough organized, he does not have the media, he does not have the wherewithal yet to really put it together. We would be saying, "You're done unless you can come back in at a disadvantage with other candidates and raise that vote total to 20 percent."

I wonder if, in fact, the effect of the amendment would not be to put at a disadvantage rather serious candidates.

Mr. TAFT. I think the first question boils down to whether someone who does not get more than 10 percent of the vote on two consecutive dates is a serious candidate. We have to make that judgment. This is an arbitrary figure one arrives at. We do a lot of arbitrary things in this particular bill.

My feeling is if a man is a serious candidate he is going to meet that 10 percent. He probably is not going into a primary where he will get less than 10 percent, certainly not go into two where he will get less than 10 percent.

I would point out again, which I am sure the Senator understands, there is nothing in this amendment which would prevent a man from continuing to be a candidate. In fact, there is a requalification procedure. If he then becomes a more serious candidate at a later time, goes into another primary campaign in a particular State and gets 20 percent of the vote, he is restored to matching at that time for any funds raised from that point on.

Also, of course there is a 30-day lag in the cutoff after the two 10 percent or less than 10 percent primaries, in which period he still would have the privilege of getting matching funds against funds that he raised during that period. All in all I think there is a sufficient period there to get off the ground any candidate who is really a serious contender. We have been criticized a good deal for having our primary campaigns too long anyway, dragged out, divided, and confusing for the public generally. It seems to me that this measure would prevent the kind of criticism that we are getting now, I think very validly, for allowing the continuation of matching payments for people who are no longer candidates. We have not been able to come up with any better answer than the one we propose in this particular amendment.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator would agree, as I understand it, that if, indeed, a candidate did enter very late and was not able to get the 10 percent within the first 8 days—because there are often two primaries, one following the other within 7 days—if he or she were not able to get his or her campaign together adequately to raise 10 percent in those first two, they would be an enormous disadvantage to the candidate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. TAFT. All I would say to the distinguished Senator from Iowa is if I were that candidate and my campaign manager advised me to go into the two States where I did not get 10 percent, I would be looking for a new campaign manager very quickly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. CANNON. I yield myself 2 minutes. I would say that not only would the Senator be looking for a new campaign manager but new financing as well.

I think the Senator makes a very good point. I am not sure that his breakoff point is correct, but I do believe we have to have some provision that terminates when a person demonstrates that they are not a viable candidate. I think we have seen that in the experience so far with the law as it now is. I would be inclined to accept his amendment though, as I say, I am not sure that his point of determination of a person being a nonviable candidate is precisely the correct point. I do not have a better one to offer. I had an amendment, which is printed and at the desk, which was directed generally along these same lines, to achieve the same result.

Mr. BAYH. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. BAYH. I respectfully suggest that if we had about 3 minutes for a quorum call we could deal with the problem that I was concerned about and that the Senator from Iowa was concerned about in the language which is now being debated. We could give the candidate the option, as in the example the Senator mentioned and the one that I mentioned, by advising in writing that he did not intend to actively seek support in a given State. I think what we are trying to accomplish is to avoid penalizing candidates who do not seek support in States where their name is placed on the ballot by State law. It is not for us to determine what the strategy of future campaigns or this campaign is going to be, to determine where candidates spend their time or money. I do not think we want to do that. May we have a couple of minutes?

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordererd.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I send a modification of my amendment to the desk and ask unanimous consent for its adoption.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the modification.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

On page 1, in subsection (c)(1) after the word "ballot", add the following: "or certifies to the Commission that he will not be an active candidate in the primary".

At the end of subsection (c)(1) add the following new sentence:

"The provisions of this section shall apply as of the date of enactment."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the modification of the amendment? Without objection, the amendment will be so modified.

Mr. TAFT's amendment, as modified, is as follows:

At the end thereof add the following new section:

TERMINATION OF PAYMENTS FOR LACK OF DEMONSTRABLE SUPPORT

SEC. —. Section 9037 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to payments to eligible candidates in primary campaigns) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(c) Termination of Payments for Lack of Demonstrable Support.—

"(1) GENERAL RULE.—Notwithstanding any other provision of this chapter, no payment shall be made under this chapter to any candidate more than 30 days after the date of the second consecutive primary election in which such candidate receives less than 10 percent of the number of votes cast for all candidates of the same party for the same office in such primary election if the candidate permitted or authorized the appearance of his name on the ballot or certifies to the Commission that he will not be an active candidate in the primary. If the primary elections are held in more than one State on the same date, a candidate shall, for purposes of this subsection, be treated as receiving that percentage of the votes on that date which he received in the primary election conducted on such date in which he received the greatest percentage vote. The provisions of this section shall apply as of the date of enactment.

"(2) REINSTATEMENT OF PAYMENTS.—Notwithstanding the provisions of paragraph (1), a candidate whose payments have been terminated under paragraph (1) may again receive payments (including amounts he would have received but for paragraph (1)) if he receives 20 percent or more of the total number of votes cast for candidates of the same party in a primary election held after the date on which the election was held which was the basis for terminating payments to him.".

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, as the amendment is modified, I would just advise the Senate that we have worked out with a number of Senators on the floor this modification, which would allow a candidate who is not a serious candidate in a particular primary election to certify to that effect, and under those circumstances, if he receives less than 10 percent of the vote in that primary, it would not be a disqualifying primary for the purposes of the general disqualification established by the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has 1 minute remaining on his amendment.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, as stated earlier, I support the Senator's amendment in principle. I have reviewed it——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator suspend until the Senate is in order? The Senate will be in order.

The Senator from Nevada may proceed.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, I have reviewed the Senator's amendment as it is now modified. It has the same objective, as I have said, that I had in an amendment I sent to the desk yesterday to have printed, and I am willing to accept the Senator's amendment as modified.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. CANNON. I yield.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Is the amendment now pending to the substitute or to the committee bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is to the substitute.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I appreciate the fact that the floor manager is willing to accept the amendment as an amendment to the substitute. I am sure he did not mean it that way but I take it that it would be the intention of the Senator from Ohio to immediately also offer it to the bill.

Mr. TAFT. I had that intention.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Then that would, of course, make things appropriate. Is the Senator going to have a rollcall?

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the order for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, reserving the right to object—I do not intend to object, and I hope I shall not—we had a similar situation with regard to the Mathias amendment with reference to the two independent Commissioners to be appointed. That was adopted on the substitute, and I am sure it would be a formality to have it also adopted on the bill. I would like to be recognized for a few moments after we deal with the Taft amendment on the substitute and the bill for that purpose. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, that I be recognized after the disposal of the Taft amendment for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. Is there objection to vacating the order for the yeas and nays on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio? Without objection, it is so ordered.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment, as modified, of the Senator from Ohio (Mr. TAFT).

Mr. CANNON. I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. TAFT. I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All remaining time having been yielded back, the question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, as modified.

The amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I call up an amendment on the bill in the exact form of the amendment that has just been adopted on the substitute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk proceeded to read the amendment.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. TAFT's amendment is as follows:

At the end thereof add the following new section:

TERMINATION OF PAYMENTS FOR LACK OF DEMONSTRABLE SUPPORT

SEC. —. Section 9037 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to payments to eligible candidates in primary campaigns) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

(c) TERMINATION OF PAYMENTS FOR LACK OF DEMONSTRABLE SUPPORT.—

"(1) GENERAL RULE.—Notwithstanding any other provision of this chapter, no payment shall be made under this chapter to any candidate more than 30 days after the date of the second consecutive primary election in which such candidates receives less than 10 percent of the number of votes cast for all candidates of the same party for the same office in such primary election if the candidate permitted or authorized the appearance of his name on the ballot or certifies to the Commission that he will not be an active candidate in the primary. If the primary elections are held in more than one State on the same date, a candidate shall, for purposes of this subsection, be treated as receiving that percentage of the votes on that date which he received in the primary election conducted on such date in which he received the greatest percentage vote. The provisions of this section shall apply as of the date of enactment.

"(2) REINSTATEMENT OF PAYMENTS.—Notwithstanding the provisions of paragraph (1), a candidate whose payments have been terminated under paragraph (1) may again receive payments (including amounts he would have received but for paragraph (1)) if he receives 20 percent or more of the total number of votes cast for candidates of the same party in a primary election held after the date on which the election was held which was the basis for terminating payments to him.".

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Do Senators yield back their time?

Mr. CANNON. I yield back my time.

Mr. TAFT. I yield back any time I may have remaining.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment to the substitute, and ask unanimous consent that the reading of the amendment be waived, with the explanation that this is the Mathias amendment as adopted earlier to be put on the bill itself.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. GRIFFIN's amendment is as follows:

In section 2(a) of the amendment, strike out "six members" and insert "eight members".

In section 2(a) of the amendment, after "the same political party" insert the following: ", and at least two of the members shall not be affiliated with any political party".

In section 2(b) of the amendment strike out "six years" and insert "eight years".

In section 2(b), strike out "1981." and insert "1981, and".

In section 2(b) of the amendment before subparagraph (B) of section 310(a)(2) of the Act as amended by section 2(b), insert the following:

"(iv) two of the members, not affiliated with any same political party, shall be appointed for terms ending on April 30, 1983.".

Page 4, line 20, strike "four" and insert in lieu thereof "five".

Mr. GRIFFIN. I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. CANNON. I yield back my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All remaining time having been yielded back, the question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Michigan.

The amendment was agreed to.

AMENDMENT NO. 1430

Mr. BUCKLEY. Mr. President, I call up my amendment No. 1430, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from New York (Mr. BUCKLEY) proposes an amendment numbered 1430.

Mr. BUCKLEY's amendment (No. 1430) is as follows:

On page 27, line 9, strike out "$1,000." and insert in lieu thereof the following: "$5,000.".

On page 27, line 23, strike out "$5,000;" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "$25,000, except in the case of a candidate for election to the office of representative, the contribution shall not exceed $10,000;".

Mr. BUCKLEY. Mr. President, this is an amendment to the bill itself. I call the attention of the Senate to a typographical error on line 1. Where it reads "line 9" it should read "line 19," and I modify my amendment to correctly reflect the line number.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be so modified.

Mr. BUCKLEY's amendment, as modified, is as follows:

On page 27, line 19 strike out "$1,000." and insert in lieu thereof the following: "$5,000.".

On page 27, line 23, strike out "5,000;" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "$25,000, except in the case of a candidate for election to the office of representative, the contribution shall not exceed $10,000;".

Mr. BUCKLEY. Mr. President, the purpose of this amendment is simple. What it would do would be to raise the permissible contribution by an individual from the current level of $1,000 to a new threshold of $5,000. Also, with respect to political committees, which are now restricted to contributions aggregating $5,000 or less for a single candidate, they would be permitted to give up to $25,000 to a Presidential or Senatorial candidate, and $10,000 to a candidate for the House of Representatives.

Current limitations in the bill discriminate against challengers in two important respects. In the first place, it is much more difficult for a challenger without the benefit of a wide recognition factor and the perquisites of office to obtain sufficient contributions in small amounts to provide the necessary seed money to launch his campaign. This is because challengers are less well known than incumbents, and do not have the use of mailings lists available to incumbents and of the mailing-list facilities of the Senate computer.

Furthermore, challengers who are not independently wealthy do not have the benefit of large amounts of cash on hand at the outset of their campaigns. In preparation for the 1974 elections, incumbent Senators seeking reelection had $1,402,083 in cash on hand on September 1, 1973. In 1974 House races, incumbents had $398,097 on hand on September 1, 1973. It is an undeniable fact that incumbents have a far easier time raising funds than most challengers. It is also an undeniable fact that challengers must usually spend signficant sums at the outset of a campaign just to gain the recognition already possessed by the incumbent by virtue of his office.

There is another way in which the 1974 amendments to the election law discriminate against challengers and in favor of incumbents. In imposing limitations upon permissible contributions to candidates, Congress failed to include any provision to offset the advantages it grants to itself through the prerogatives of office. In 10 years, the cost of the frank alone has risen from $7.5 million in 1966 to a projected $46 million in 1976. Americans for Democratic Action has estimated that the total advantage per term which an incumbent Congressman possesses by virtue of his perquisites of office amounts to about $976,000. This colossal lump-sum transfer, which is exempt from the $1,000 contribution ceiling, constitutes a contribution which few could equal from private sources even if it were allowed under the election laws.

That the drafters of the 1974 amendments were perfectly aware of the advantages to their own incumbencies is evidenced by this bald, unequivocal statement in the Senate report on those amendments:

Lower limits on campaign contributions, by themselves, would serve to increase the advantages incumbents presently have in fund raising.

At the very least, we should demonstrate to the American people that we will not, in fleeing from Watergate, seek refuge in the incumbency-maximizing techniques which characterized that period.

There is a second problem concerning discrimination in favor of affluent candidates which has been presented in the wake of the Supreme Court's decision in Buckley against Valeo. Now that the Supreme Court has held that wealthy candidates may, as a constitutional matter, spend unlimited amounts of money from their own personal assets to forward their own campaigns, it is only the less wealthy candidates who are now effectively restricted in their attempts to make their campaigns viable.

It is my opinion that the Court, when faced with a specific example a candidate discriminated against in this manner, will declare such a state of affairs unconstitutional. It is my opinion that Congress should act immediately to eliminate the inequities inherent in the campaign laws before such a course is forced upon it by the Supreme Court.

Mr. President, I should like to call attention to another factor involved in volved in campaigns.

I do not think that this body has sufficiently focused on the extraordinary inequities that have now evolved as a result of the Supreme Court's decision. As I said a little earlier, people who are independently wealthy or candidates who happen to have the support of well-organized and well-financed independent political action committees are able to spend virtually unlimited sums, while, on the other hand, the unknown challenger is forced to rely on the contributions available under the $1,000 limit in order to launch a successful campaign.

This kind of candidate is particularly in need of what is called seed money—that is, the initial funding to get the campaign off to a good start.

I say quite candidly, Mr. President, that I could not be in this Chamber today but for the fact that some people were willing to provide me with about $50,000 of seed money in 1970. Only with that money in the bank was I able to establish myself as a credible candidate. Only with that money in the bank was I able to conduct the polling required; to open an office, which required a $15,000 deposit; or to even get the telephone company to come in and wire the office. They would not do so unless an additional $15,000 was advanced.

So I submit that elementary fairness and equity should mandate that we raise the current limits to a level where a new face can seek the kind of support required to launch a credible candidacy.

The limits I have selected here are such that I do not think anyone possibly could claim that a candidate might be "bought." I am talking about $5,000 from individuals; and in the case of political committees, we are talking about the following figures, in relation to the particular type of election; namely, senatorial and Presidential on one side, where there would be a $25,000 contribution, down to $10,000 in the case of the House.

I believe that the Members of this body should take into consideration another consequence that is probable should we fail to raise these limitations. Because the Supreme Court decided that independent groups and individuals may spend whatever they wish in support of a particular candidate, so long as that spending is not coordinated with the particular candidate's campaign effort, we will find that we will be fracturing political campaigns. We will see groups going off on their own tangents, putting ads in the paper, printing literature, doing whatever they wish, and the candidate will have no ability to coordinate these expenditures into a comprehensive effort to inform the public what he believes and why.

For all these reasons, Mr. President, I hope that this body will support this amendment.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nevada yield me 3 minutes?

Mr. CANNON. I yield 5 minutes to the Senator.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield, without the time being charged against him?

Mr. CLARK. I yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JOHNSTON). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the vote on the substitute amendment occur at 2 p.m. instead of 1:45 p.m., and that the one-half hour during which no amendment may be offered be that period between 1:30 and 2 p.m., rather than 1:15 p.m. and 1:45 p.m.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I thank the Senator.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, in listening to the Senator from New York explain his amendment and in reading it the intent of the amendment is very clear; and I think none of us should have much difficulty in understanding what it would do. I think he makes some valid arguments in terms of his position. But let us look at what the effect would be.

What we are saying is that individuals would not be limited by a $1,000 contribution but that that would be increased five times over. An individual under this amendment, actually could contribute $5,000. Who can contribute more than $1,000 to political campaigns and candidates, with the rare exception of relatives or someone very close to the campaign who may be willing to make a special sacrifice out of their own lives to help a candidate? That would be a very, very small number of people, who might be very close to and might be interested in the candidate.

So almost all the additional money is going to come from people whom we could identify as being wealthy. There are very few people in this country who can contribute more than $1,000, except the wealthy.

I believe that the whole purpose of this bill is to try to encourage more people at lower levels to participate in the process, to try to become less dependent upon the rich in politics, to make all of us less dependent upon that kind of contribution.

So, to increase the individual contribution from $1,000 to $5,000, five times over, seems to me, in effect, to give wealthy contributors five times the influence that they presently have under the law.

Second, what we are talking about doing in terms of committees is the same thing so far as Presidential and congressional campaigns are concerned.

We are going to increase the amount five times over. It does not seem to me that that goes in the direction or the intent of campaign finance reform or campaign reform.

I know that the Senator from New York, for a very good reason, and some very strong reasons from his point of view, feels that these efforts in the past have, for the most part, been in the wrong direction. But I think that the majority of the Members of this body have expressed themselves clearly that they do not want to go in the direction of a greater influence from wealthy people and that they do not want to go in the direction of bigger money for committees. For those reasons, I feel confident that this body would vote "No" on this amendment.

I yield back the remainder of my time to the floor manager.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Texas.

VISIT TO THE SENATE BY A MEMBER OF THE NEW ZEALAND PARLIAMENT

Mr. TOWER. Mr. President, I am pleased to present to the Senate Mr. Robert Talbot, a member of the Parliament of New Zealand for South Canterbury, and the Chairman Designate of the Foreign Relations Committee of the New Zealand Parliament.

[Applause, Senators rising.]

RECESS

Mr. TOWER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate stand in recess for 1 minute so that Members may greet our distinguished guest.

There being no objection, the Senate, at 12:10 p.m., recessed until 12:11; whereupon, the Senate reassembled when called to order by the Presiding Officer (Mr. JOHNSTON).

FEDERAL ELECTION CAMPAIGN ACT AMENMENTS OF 1976

The Senate continued with the consideration of the bill (S. 3065) to amend the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971 to provide for its administration by a Federal Election Commission appointed in accordance with the requirements of the Constitution, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, I do not have time. Is the time under the control of the Senator from New York?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct, and the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Will the Senator yield me 2 minutes?

Mr. BUCKLEY. Yes.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, I am going to join with the Senator from New York. This is a change of direction from my previous views. I supported the lower limits before, but I think the lower we make these limits, the more we make this an incumbents' paradise.

From a selfish standpoint, I could wish we had lowered the limits to $100. Nobody can give more than that, and very few incumbents would ever be defeated. Let us face it: incumbents start out with a couple of hundred thousand dollars worth of publicity, from serving 2 years in the House, or 6 years or more in the House or the Senate. When we are talking about an unknown challenger starting out and that challenger has very low limits of contributions placed upon him, unless the challenger candidate happens to be wealthy, there is no way that that challenger, in most cases, is going to be well enough known by November to be elected.

When we look at the statistics over the past years, the number of incumbents that win is bad enough as it is. If we keep these limits where they are, I expect on replacement that from 95 to 96 percent of the House will be reelected and 90 to 95 percent of the Senate will be reelected. So I very strongly support the Senator from New York in supporting this amendment.

Mr. BUCKLEY. I yield myself 2 minutes.

I want to thank the Senator from Oregon for saying precisely what the consequences are of the existing legislation. The Senator from Iowa said that my amendment would somehow tilt the scales in favor of the wealthy people. I say that its designed to do precisely the opposite. Right now, because of the Supreme Court's having found unconstitutional any limitation on direct spending by a candidate, a wealthy candidate can spend unlimited amounts of money.

Also, well-financed, well-organized political action committees can spend as much money as they want in support of a particular candidate, again in unlimited amounts.

Who are the people who cannot muster the resources under this bill? The people, I suggest, are those who are not incumbents, and, therefore, do not have a wide spread of contacts that they can tap, or people who do not have large personal means, or people who do not seem to appeal to one of these well-organized political action committees.

I believe that the only way we can help restore the scales, in terms of access to money to wage a credible campaign, is to lift the individual limits so that the money can come in and get people started.

I have heard it stated, for example, that our colleague (Mr. McGOVERN) could never have successfully fought for the nomination had he not had some supporters early in the game who believed in him, believed in what he was trying to accomplish, and provided him with that essential seed money.

This, I suggest, is not possible under the present circumstances.

Again, to answer the statement by the Senator from Iowa with respect to wealth, the fact is that at the present time, anybody with money who wants to support any political cause can do so in unlimited amounts. The only thing he cannot do is contribute to a particular candidate sums in excess of $1,000 so as to enable that candidate to organize a campaign to establish credibility, to overcome the enormous disadvantages that a newcomer has when facing an entrenched incumbent, and get himself off in the race with some hope that he might be able to present his views clearly enough and effectively enough to win an election. So this is anything but legislation intended to help the wealthy; rather, it is intended to equalize the scales against the wealthy. I hope the Senate will give it its approval.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, I yield myself 2 minutes.

The Senator from New York appeared before the Senate Committee on Rules and made his position known in this area, with respect to the limitation on financing. The committee did have in mind the limitations that are imposed now by the Supreme Court. I must say that I find some difficulty, myself, in the Court's decision that permits unlimited spending by an individual on his own campaign and permits unlimited spending in an independent effort by others, either for or against a candidate, and then says that the limitation of a $1,000 contribution was constitutional. It does give me some problems. In any event, that was the wish of the committee. We did act on that very deliberately and I would be forced to oppose the amendment.

Mr. BUCKLEY. Mr. President, I should like to ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, I want to pursue this a bit further so the record is clear. Let us assume you are an unknown challenger. You served on the city council of one of the towns of your State or in the State legislature, but you are fairly unknown outside of the district or town you are from. How do you go about, under this limitation, starting to get enough seed money to raise money? What do you do?

Mr. BUCKLEY. I can tell the Senator from my own experience, it is extremely difficult.

Mr. PACKWOOD. You cannot afford to do any kind of mass mailing, because frankly, mailing, as we all know, is quite expensive. You are talking about mailing in the order of 200,000 to 300,000 pieces.

Mr. BUCKLEY. All you can do is hope to get people to talk to other people. I have been in two races. In the first, I had no chance to win. But important contributions do not go to people who are not considered credible candidates. You therefore have to have a certain amount of activity. You have to get some favorable press comment. You have to have a poll that indicates that on specific issues, you have got popular support, and so on, before you can get the kind of money that is required to open a headquarters, to get the telephones, to send out the mailings, to do all of the mechanical things essential to a political campaign.

Mr. PACKWOOD. We have almost got the dog chasing the tail. You have to have some seed money to collect other money, and this bill is going to prohibit you from getting the seed money, and you cannot get other money, and you are going to undo the whole race.

Mr. BUCKLEY. I think it would be constructive if I stated my own situation in my second race. I was a candidate of a third party. We all know third parties do not win elections in a big State like New York or smaller States like Oregon. But I happened to be the Conservative candidate. I entered the race, and I felt confident that I would have a reasonable chance, but I found that even though I spoke to dozens of people who believed in what I believed in they would not part with their money. They said, "Give us the proof." I said, "I think I am a credible candidate. I think you are not wasting your money. I think I do have a chance under this year's circumstances."

They said, "Where is the proof? Where is the poll?"

I was able to get a poll. Why? Because one family contributed $15,000. That got us a poll. OK. That then showed I could win.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Which right away would be prohibited under this new law. Lou never would have gotten the $15,000 to start with.

Mr. BUCKLEY. Exactly.

Mr. PACKWOOD. All right.

Mr. BUCKLEY. Even so that was not quite enough to persuade enough people to get an election headquarters. You have to start a campaign with people in place, with the appearance of confidence even if you did not have confidence, in order to get the press attention, to get you started and your message rolling.

Weeks and weeks went by, and I was unable to put the pieces together until a friend of mine said, "I will lend you $50,000 to be repaid out of further collections after you get a mailing launched," and so on.

With that $50,000 I was able to do three things: Get myself a headquarters—visibility which is terribly important; No. 2, to get telephones put into my headquarters, essential in a State like New York; and No. 3, to initiate a mailing which, from that point forward, was a principal source of my campaign financing. But without that friend I could never have got started.

Mr. PACKWOOD. And you found as soon as you got the headquarters and visibility you suddenly became more newsworthy and got more exposure on television because you had a headquarters, and so you put up the headquarters.

Mr. BUCKLEY. Precisely. Because I was more visible and everything seemed to be running——

Mr. PACKWOOD. And under this bill you cannot even get a loan to pay back.

Mr. BUCKLEY. Exactly.

There is another thing here that affects a third party but not regular party candidates. A political party is able to give its candidate a substantial contribution. Not every political party is able to do it, but certainly a third party almost never has that kind of money around. Usually they are going for debt to debt and loan to loan. But, as I say, I believe the law as it now stands, especially in light of the inequities which have resulted from the Supreme Court decision, makes it virtually impossible for a challenger to get started and, I think, it is unconscionable, frankly, that we do not recognize this.

The purpose for these limitations was originally to avoid corruption, was it not?

Mr. PACKWOOD. Absolutely.

Mr. BUCKLEY. No one is going to be corrupted by a $5,000 gift in a campaign that costs $2 million. And we have the disclosure provisions which allow the whole world to know who is contributing in your campaign.

Mr. PACKWOOD. That is the key part, when you have disclosure, when it is ahead of the election not after the election, ahead of the election, and certainly your opponent is going to point to every conceivable dirty contribution you have had and say, "Shame, look where he is getting his money from," and that in and of itself normally should be sufficiently cleansing, and I frankly wish we would go back to where we were, or at least change where we are, and have full disclosure of everything from a penny on upward, and take off all limits on contributions. But, obviously, we are not going to do that.

Mr. BUCKLEY. That is why I agree with the Senator from Oregon, and that is why I proposed rather modest increases again to allow someone to get started.

Mr. PACKWOOD. I do have an amendment I may want to offer to the Senator's amendment. Is an amendment in order to the Senator's amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. At the time when the time has either been yielded back or used an amendment would be in order.

Mr. PACKWOOD. At a time when it has been yielded back or used it will be in order.

May I ask for a quorum call now to consult with the Senator very briefly?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On whose time?

Mr. PACKWOOD. I ask that it be divided equally, if the Senator does not mind.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. PACKWOOD. May I have—I thank the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Was there objection?

Mr. CANNON. The Senator is taking it out of his time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BEALL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BEALL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that David Rust from my staff be granted the privileges of the floor during the debate on this bill and the votes thereon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BEALL. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On whose time?

Mr. BEALL. Equally divided.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. CLARK. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

Mr. BEALL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the time for the quorum call be taken out of the time of the proposers of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The clerk will call the roll.

The second assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HUGH SCOTT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HUGH SCOTT. I seek recognition.

I think that some comments are in order at this time regarding the obvious unconsitutionality of section 111 of the bill we are now debating—the so-called Election Campaign Act Amendments of 1976.

In its present form, section 111 of Senate bill 3065 adds a new section 321 to title 2 of the United States Code, replacing the existing 18 U.S.C. 610, which generally prohibits contributions by national banks, corporations, or labor organizations, but permits them to pay the costs of establishing, administering, and soliciting contributions to a separate segregated fund to be used for political purposes. This new section would limit the classes of persons who may be either informed or solicited for contributions. Proposed section 321 would make it illegal for a corporation, or a political committee created by it, to solicit contributions to the committee from any person other than the corporation's stockholders, executive or administrative personnel, and their families. It would, at the same time, prohibit a labor organization and any of its political committees from soliciting contributions from any persons other than union members and their families. These restrictions would affect not just solicitations, but the dissemination of information.

The ultimate consequence of this section's provisions, however, goes further than merely preventing large numbers of persons from contributing to or receiving information from those political action committees—with whom they identify. It deprives vast numbers of individuals, some 75 million, from being given the opportunity of associating with either labor organizations or corporate management. Preserved under this proposed section are the separate constituencies of labor and business—union members and corporate executives. Forgotten, ignored, and discriminated against are millions who are neither executive officers nor union members, but who have a vital interest in the political climate in which their employers or unionized fellow workers operate, and who might well wish to support one or the other's political action committee.

Section 321's blatant abridgement of the freedom of expression in the political area far exceeds what any court would countenance. Solicitation of contributions by corporations or labor organizations to their respective political action arms is a form of expression, regardless of whether it is oral or written. And while the regulation of conduct or the manner of expression can be constitutionally permissible, the Supreme Court, in United States against O'Brien, which was favorably cited in the Buckley case, set forth a constitutional test for regulation of courses of conduct having both speech and nonspeech elements.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the proponents of the amendment has expired. The Senator from Nevada has 23 minutes.

Mr. CANNON. I yield 2 minutes to the Senator.

Mr. HUGH SCOTT. I thank the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. HUGH SCOTT. Mr. President, to be constitutionally acceptable, the Government must have a substantial interest unrelated to suppression of first amendment freedoms, and the regulation itself must be no greater than is necessary to further the interest and can have only incidental impact on those freedoms.

Admittedly, the Federal Government has a substantial interest in its electoral process and in the preservation of the right and freedoms of individuals to participate fully in our unique political process. But, where the speech of any individual does not infringe upon another's rights, then the Government can demonstrate no legitimate interest.

The new section 321 fails the O'Brien test, since it restricts not only the manner of solicitation, but also its extent. Inas much as unions or corporations are restricted to solicitations of narrowly defined classes of persons, the extent of the solicitations, or speech, is also restricted. Such restrictions are clearly prohibited by the Constitution. The Supreme Court made this distinction between "manner" and "extent" in Buckley against Valeo, and held that direct quantity, or extent, restrictions on political communication are not permissible under the Constitution.

Mr. President, I am convinced of the desire on the part of my colleagues in this Chamber to enact a fair, equitable, and workable election law. Section 321, however, is the antithesis of what is fair, equitable, and workable. It will accomplish nothing but the further polarization, this time by legislative dictate, of management and unions. It will relegate to political limbo a very substantial number of our fellow citizens, the very people who were originally intended to be the beneficiaries of these reform measures. But, far worse, it gives a congressional stamp of approval to the denigration of our most cherished, our most valuable, and our most sacred right—the right of free speech.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a list of occupations which are excluded under the pending bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the list was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. HUGH SCOTT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that with the exception of the last 2 minutes which the distinguished Senator from Nevada has yielded me, that my time may be taken from the time of the substitute offered by Mr. GRIFFIN.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. CHILES. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

Mr. CHILES. Reserving the right to object, I want to say to the distinguished minority leader that some of us have been waiting all morning to present our amendments. There is a fixed time, a certain time we are going to vote on the Griffin amendment, or take it up.

Some of us who have been sitting here all morning waiting for an opportunity to present our amendments feel that we should have a chance to present and discuss those amendments.

That was the purpose of this Senator's objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STONE). The 2 additional minutes granted have expired.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, do I understand the time on the Senator's amendment has expired?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the proponents has expired.

Mr. CANNON. Of the proponents, and the yeas and nays have been ordered?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Oregon (Mr. PACKWOOD) proposes an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from New York (Mr. BUCKLEY), No. 1430, as follows:

On page 28, line 3, strike out "Contributions" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "The limitations on contributions contained in the preceding sentence do not apply to transfers between and among political committees which are National, State, district, or local committees (including any subordinate committee thereof) of the same political party; but contributions".

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would observe that the form of the amendment just reported is not in order as being an amendment to the bill as opposed to the pending amendment.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, I offered that as an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from New York.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that, but in form it does not do that. It amends another part of the bill.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President. The time has expired.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time having expired and the yeas and nays having been ordered on the pending amendment, the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I announce that the Senator from Idaho (Mr. CHURCH), the Senator from Indiana (Mr. HARTKE), the Senator from Washington (Mr. JACKSON), and the Senator from California (Mr. TUNNEY) are necessarily absent.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Washington (Mr. JACKSON) would vote "nay."

Mr. GRIFFIN. I announce that the Senator from North Carolina (Mr. HELMS), the Senator from Ohio (Mr. TAFT), and the Senator from North Dakota (Mr. YOUNG) are necessarily absent.

I further announce that the Senator from Vermont (Mr. STAFFORD) is absent due to illness.

On this vote, the Senator from North Carolina (Mr. HELMS) is paired with the Senator from Ohio (Mr. TAFT). If present and voting, the Senator from North Carolina would vote "yea" and the Senator from Ohio would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 23, nays 69, as follows:

So Mr. BUCKLEY's amendment (No. 1430), as modified, was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida is recognized.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I yield 1 minute to the distinguished Senator from Iowa, under the provision that I do not lose my right to the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, may I inquire spefically for what purpose?

Mr. CLARK. For the purpose of offering an amendment which was offered yesterday and withdrawn until certain changes were made.

Mr. CANNON. And it is an agreed upon amendment now?

Mr. CHILES. It is.

Mr. CANNON. Then I have no objection, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Iowa (Mr. CLARK) proposes an amendment on page 44, between lines 2 and 3——

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CLARK's amendment is as follows:

On page 44, between lines 2 and 3 insert the following:

"(b) A defendant in any criminal action brought for the violation of a provision of this Act, or of a provision of chapter 95 or 96 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954, may introduce as evidence of his lack of knowledge of or intent to commit the offense for which the action was brought a conciliation agreement entered into between the defendant and the Commission under section 313 which specifically deals with the act or failure to act constituting such offense and which is still in effect.".

On page 44, strike out lines 3 through 6 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"(c) In any criminal action brought for a violation of a provision of this Act, or of a provision of chapter 95 or 96 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954, the court before which such action is brought shall take into account, in weighing the seriousness of the offense and in considering the appropriateness of the penalty to be imposed if the defendant is found guilty, whether—

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, section 329(b) of the bill stipulates that once a person has entered into a conciliation agreement with the Federal Election Commission, the Department of Justice would be barred from initiating any action relating to the violation dealt with in the agreement.

My amendment would provide that a defendant in a criminal action brought for a violation of this could introduce as evidence of his lack of knowledge of or intent to commit the offense for which the action was brought the fact that a conciliation agreement had already been entered into with the Commission.

Further, it would provide that the court would take into account, in considering any penalty which might be imposed, whether a conciliation agreement had been entered into and was being adhered to.

Senator ALLEN had some questions about an earlier amendment, and I have now changed it, discussed it with the manager of the bill and with him, and all have agreed that this wording of the amendment would be better.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, the amendment is in acordance with the discussion yesterday, and I am willing to accept the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I be allowed to yield 2 minutes to the Senator from Kansas for the purpose of presenting an amendment which I understand has been agreed to on both sides.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I send an unprinted amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk proceeded to read the amendment.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

At the end of the Griffin substitute amendment add the following new section:

SEC. —. Section 431(f)(4)(B) of the Act is amended by deleting the semicolon at the end thereof and adding the following: ", or partisan activity designed to encourage individuals to register to vote, or to vote, conducted by the national committee of a political party, or a subordinate committee thereof, or the State committee of a national party, except, that such partisan activity shall be considered an expenditure for the purposes of the reporting requirements under this Act;"

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, this is an amendment to the pending substitute offered by the distinguished Senator from Michigan (Mr. GRIFFIN). I have discussed it with the distinguished manager of the bill, Mr. CANNON, as well as the distinguished Senator from Iowa (Mr. CLARK).

In discussing briefly its purpose, I would have Senators recall that yesterday, by a vote of 50 to 41, we adopted an amendment proposed by the distinguished Senator from Oregon (Mr. PACKWOOD) dealing with reporting requirements for nonpartisan voter registration drives conducted by a labor or business organization. My amendment is designed to complement that provision with respect to partisan registration efforts made by an element of a national political party.

What it would do, thus, is exempt from the definition of "expenditure" all partisan voter registration drives and get-out-the-vote activities carried on by committees or subordinate committees of a national party. At the same time, however, it would clearly specify that such costs would have to be reported to the Federal Election Commission under section 304.

The intent of the amendment is, very plainly, to remove the requirement under existing law that such activity be allocated among particular candidates. In the process, it should help strengthen the party structure and increase political participation.

In light of the fact that there is no longer an overall spending ceiling imposed by law—except for Presidential candidates who accept matching funds—elimination of the allocation requirement would be totally consistent with the Buckley against Valeo Supreme Court decision. Moreover, it would alleviate the very difficult problem of trying to determine the "fair and reasonable benefit" accruing to each candidate from registration activities sponsored by the party organization itself.

Traditionally, Mr. President, the high incidence of "independents" in the voting population have forced parties to look beyond just party affiliation in encouraging registration for, and voting on, election day. Thus, the name of one or more candidates is often used as a criterion for making these determinations.

While none of us is prepared to suggest that partisan voter registration drives are not going to aid a candidate's cause, I think we can all agree that there is no longer a need to make subjective evaluations regarding the extent of that aid. Therefore, we should do away with this unnecessary and burdensome accounting problem by adopting this amendment.

Clearly, this is a bipartisan proposal which should benefit all candidates and all parties equally. The only exception might be to the extent that there are more potential Democrats than Republicans among independent voters—but in the interest of competition, we are willing to assume that risk.

Mr. President, this is a commonsense amendment which I understand is acceptable to the committee. It will simplify reporting by national parties while making them stronger and more effective—and these are goals which deserve our uniform support.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, the Senator has discussed the amendment with me. I think it is an acceptable amendment, and I am willing to accept it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Florida (Mr. CHILES) proposes an amendment:

On page 44, line 15, strike out the closing quotation marks and the final period.

On page 44, between lines 15 and 16, insert the following:

"LIMITATION ON CONTRIBUTIONS BY ARTIFICIAL LEGAL ENTITIES

"SEC. 330. (a) The Congress finds and declares that—

"(1) it is inappropriate for artificial legal entities, whether in corporate or other form, which are not permitted to vote for Federal candidates to make political contributions in campaigns for Federal office, and

"(2) that it would be appropriate as a means of guarding against the reality or appearance of improer influence stemming from the dependence of candidates on large campaign contributions from such entities to limit the privilege of contributing to Federal political campaigns to individuals generally.

"(b) Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act, no person other than an individual may make a contribution to or for the use of any candidate for Federal office. This subsection does not apply to a political committee established and maintained by a political party.

"(c) Nothing in this section shall be construed to prevent or inhibit the right of individuals to associate with each other for the purpose of making political expenditures or for expressing their views on political matters.".

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CHILES. For what purpose?

Mr. CRANSTON. I should like to discuss the Senator's amendment and ask if he would be willing to modify it. I am not going to offer an amendment. I should like to discuss the amendment.

Mr. CHILES. I yield to the distinguished Senator.

Mr. CRANSTON. I thank the Senator very much for yielding.

Mr. President, I was in the Chamber last night, and the Senator caught my attention when he said the following:

The whole electoral process, as I understand it, Mr. President, was created so that individuals could vote, so that individuals could nominate, so that individuals could elect. It looks like the fight that I have been seeing going on all day is sort of the fight between the giants. Each side believes the other has a little advantage so each side is trying to get a foothold.

I have not heard much talk about the people today. I have not heard much talk about what is really good as far as democracy and what is really good as far as individuals.

Mr. President, I think that is a very eloquent and meaningful statement which we should all take into account as we are considering this matter. We have not paid adequate attention to the just plain citizens whose voices are the most important voices in our democracy. I believe there has been too much jockeying for advantage going on from one side of the aisle to the other, one party to the other, representatives speaking more or less for one group of interested people and for another.

It was that statement by the Senator from Florida that caused me to look seriously at his amendment, which has much appeal.

My concern about the amendment is that in limiting the ability of poor people to band together to support a candidate they might particularly support because of issues that are of great interest to them, if they cannot band together, the individuals whose small contributions only become significant in terms of what they mean in elections if many of them make contributions—and they are not apt to occur unless they can make them together—the consequence of the amendment in its present form, without that being the intention of the Senator from Florida, I know, would give a greater advantage to those who give large contributions, who do not need to band together with others in order to have a very significant impact from their contributions.

That is my concern, and I know that the Senator is more concerned about this than any other Member of the Senate. The Senator from Florida has made it his own practice, I understand, to accept only small contributions.

Were they limited in the Senator's campaign to $10?

Mr. CHILES. Yes.

Mr. CRANSTON. I wonder whether the Senator would be willing to accept an amendment—and I would offer it only with his permission—which would have the effect of sustaining even more strongly his purpose of eliminating what I feel would be the advantage to large contributors without this proviso.

The amendment I propose would be to limit acceptable contributions, the size of contributions, to $10 from individuals.

Mr. CHILES. From any contributor?

Mr. CRANSTON. Any contributor. Limited to $10.

Mr. CHILES. I would not be prepared to accept that, and the reason is the one I gave in my press conference at the time I said that I was limiting my contributions to $10. That reason was this, purely and simply: If we limited it to that amount for every individual, then I believe that the incumbents would have too great an advantage. I was asked whether I thought that anyone running against me should limit his contributions to $10. I answered "no," because I think that if they are running against me and I am an incumbent, I can see that it might be necessary for them to feel that they have to accept more than that, because they do not have name identification and they might not engage in a walk which would get them name identification, or something like that. For that reason, I would not go along with that.

However, I invite the attention of the Senator from California to subsection (c), which was put in overnight, and is now in the amendment. That states what the Supreme Court really has said. It reads:

Nothing in this section shall be construed to prohibit or inhibit the right of individuals to associate with each other for the purpose of making political expenditures or for expressing their views on political matters.

So if the group that the Senator is talking about, the poor people, wish to associate themselves in a common cause in order to be able to express themselves, they can do so. Nothing in this amendment would prohibit that.

However, they would not be able to give that money, in a satchel or a war chest, to the candidate. Neither could the labor unions do that; neither could the banks do that; neither could the American Medical Association do that. If they wanted to make expenditures, they would have to make them themselves. The label of who made those expenditures would have to be there. So, again, the voters would be able to see who was attempting to sort of influence that election.

I think that would take care of the Senator's fears. I can see that the Senator has thought through that if we limited everybody's contribution to $10, we, as incumbents, would have an advantage, unless we made some sort of free television time available, unless we made available some kind of franking privilege, and other things, because we do enjoy tremendous advantages.

Mr. CRANSTON. I share the Senator's concern about not giving unfair advantages to incumbents. I was one of the Senators who voted some time ago for an amendment by the Senator from New York (Mr. BUCKLEY) that would have permitted challengers to spend more than incumbents, which is one way to try to equalize the situation. I am prepared to vote for and work for such an amendment. We cannot require TV stations to give anybody free time, because that would be a violation of the first amendment. Perhaps we could find a way to subsidize television time for challengers.

I am more concerned about the ability of large donors to have advantages than I am about incumbents to have advantages, because at least the large donors are not elected by the people. Incumbents at least have won an election. I would like to see the advantages that incumbents have taken away from them.

Mr. CHILES. If the Senator wanted to change the thousand dollars that is now set forth in the bill to a lower figure, the Senator from Florida would join in that amendment, because I do not think we should have those large funds; but I think that $10 would be much too low, as I have expressed.

Mr. BROCK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CHILES. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. BROCK. First, a technical question. Is the Senator's amendment, now pending, to the substitute?

Mr. CHILES. It is an amendment to the substitute.

Mr. BROCK. The clerk did not understand that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is not drafted as being to the substitute.

Mr. CHILES. I modify it so that it would be an amendment to the substitute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is so modified.

Mr. BROCK. I wanted to be sure of that, because if the substitute is not agreed to, we can offer it to the bill.

Mr. CHILES. I thank the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. BROCK. If the Senator will permit me to make a couple of comments in light of the comment of the Senator from California, I think the whole purpose of this amendment is to eliminate the power of the major money influence that exists today. That is the whole purpose of it. We have been debating, for the last 2 days, amendments to advantage or disadvantage power group and not people. This is the first time we have had an opportunity in this particular body and during consideration of this particular bill to consider an amendment which would divest the power centers of this special advantage, their loopholes, their exemptions, and allow the American people to have a voice in the full process, a full and complete voice. I think that is why support for this amendment is so terribly important.

It says, in effect, that we are not going to grant any special exemption to major corporations to go out to their 30 million stockholders with an all-expense paid campaign to tell them how to vote. Nor are we going to do that for labor. We are going to let the American people individually select their political representation, as the Constitution originally envisioned it. I think that is why the amendment is so precise, and I am delighted to support it.

Mr. CHILES. I thank the Senator from Tennessee. I think the Senator from Tennessee, as well as most of us in this body, has looked with some alarm at those polls. We now see not only the esteem in which they hold Congress in the executive branch, but further, when we poll a little deeper on the question, "Do you feel that Government represents the average man in this country?", the answer to that is astoundingly and overwhelmingly, "No." I think they have found the truth.

What we are talking about here—and I have been going up to a lot of Senators, asking them to support this amendment. The general thing that I find is that everybody says, "That is something that we ought to do sometime, that is something that I am generally for; that is a good idea, but—I get my help from here or from there." Or "I feel that where I am receiving my help from is this group or that group."

That is what is convincing me that those polls show that people have found out; they have some kind of idea.

I just wanted to relate to the Senators that in my campaign, where I have limited my contributions to $10, a lot of people have said, "There is no way you can do that; you are not going to get that kind of people. People don't participate, period. There are only certain people who are willing to give."

Interestingly enough, from the first newspaper ads—not newspaper ads, newspaper stories—that went out on the announcement, I received a flood of checks. Almost every one of those letters said, in different words, "The idea that I could be your largest contributor, the idea that you would not accept and no one would give more than my $10, is why I decided to contribute." The vast majority of people who are contributing to my campaign on that basis have never contributed before.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. CHILES. Yes, I will.

Mr. PACKWOOD. I can verify that point. I was in the Senator's State over the weekend and I met with some of the Senator's supporters who were raising money for him. People who previously were used to raising $100 or $1,000, say, "Our work is cut out. It is like organizing a door to door campaign."

What I was intrigued with was they said that white collar workers, secretaries, and so on, have come up to them in their work and given them a check for LAWTON CHILES' campaign, unsolicited, because they felt so good that nobody could give more than $10. I think the Senator has hit upon a great idea for a campaign, a gold mine of an idea. I think what he has done is so unique, putting out shares saying that you can own a share of a candidate and you can have a certificate that you own a share of a candidate if you contribute $10. I think it is the best idea in politics I have heard in years.

Mr. CHILES. I thank the Senator from Oregon for those kind remarks. I want to say, in addition to that, that what I am finding is that people are a completely different set of people now. Some of the best money raisers that I now have are not the corporate presidents. He does not want to go and ask anybody for $10. Nor are they the labor people. The best contributors that I have are, really, sort of little people.

I had a lady come to a rally, and she has to be 85 years old. She went in her neighborhood and she collected 20 $10 contributions.

I have a Cuban doctor who lives in Monticello, Fla. That is a Cracker north Florida community, in which he is the only Cuban in town. He has gotten about 200 of those $10 contributions.

I have a cookie salesman who goes to stores. Again, he has gotten a number of these, because they put that thing in their pockets. They will ask somebody and the people they are asking all feel that they are participating.

I thank the Senator.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield, on my time?

Mr. CHILES. Yes, I shall be delighted to yield.

Mr. CANNON. I want to correct one misimpression that I think the Senator from Tennessee has. I wish to verify it from the Senator from Florida.

The Senator from Tennessee said that this would prohibit corporations or the PAC groups from going out and soliciting contributions. That is not true at all. They can go out and solicit. What we are doing is changing where the power base is even more disproportionately than it is right at the moment.

For example, by this amendment now we force independent groups to operate exclusively by an independent expenditure. They can go out, they can form their associations, they can raise their money, and they can spend unlimited amounts for or against a candidate, as long as it is an independent expenditure in accordance with the Supreme Court decision.

The Senator has even gone so far as to recognize that in the addon of his amendment, which takes the language from the Valeo case and says that this shall not be construed to deprive persons of their right to associate together. This, in my judgment, completely turns the power and the conduct of a campaign over to the special interest groups, because they can go out and solicit. They can solicit from their stockholders and so on. They can use those funds and spend them independently against a candidate.

I think that, really, what it does is deprive the candidates and political parties of control of their own campaigns. I shall be talking later on the constitutionality of it, but I did want to raise that point, because the Senator from Tennessee said that this would stop the solicitation by the corporations to the independent funds and by the labor unions and so on. It will do no such thing.

Mr. CHILES. I yield to the Senator from Georgia to clear the Senator up on that.

Mr. NUNN. I thank my colleague from Florida. I am cosponsor of this amendment and I talked to my colleague from Florida for some time about it. I think it is really the heart of campaign reform. I think it is going to divide the special interests from the people in this country. I agree with everything that the Senator from Florida has said and that the Senator from Tennessee has said.

I shall have to take exception to the analysis of the Senator from Nevada.

Certainly, this amendment provides that there is no dilution of the freedom of association. Certainly, it permits labor unions, corporations and other groups to solicit their members for campaign contributions. But those funds would not then be able to be given to the candidate. They could spend the money. Yes, they could spend the money. There cannot be a limitation on expenditure under the Supreme Court decision. But they cannot go up with a bag and give money to a candidate. They cannot get the recognition that the candidates himself owes them one single thing in terms of a favor, in terms of an office, appointment, or in terms of a vote.

Besides that, the most important part about this amendment is that if the American Medical Association wants to oppose the Senator from Nevada or the Senator from Georgia or Tennessee or Florida, then they are going to have to let people know what they are doing. It is not going to be in the form of a television ad that comes on, showing the Senator from Georgia talking about an issue concerning foreign policy. It is going to have to be under the name of the American Medical Association, or under the name of COPE, or under the name of the American Bar Association, or General Motors.

If we really want to take special interests out of politics, if we really want to return the political process to the individual in this country, then this amendment is a clear, concise way to do it.

You watch what scurrying will go on around the Capitol and around Washington, D.C., and around this country if the Chiles-Nunn-Brock-Packwood-Hart amendment passes. Just watch it. If you do not think this is the key to campaign reform, the interest group reaction to passage of this amendment will confirm that it is.

Mr. BROCK. I agree. You watch what a restoration of faith there will be in the American people if we pass this. There will be more excitement by people in this country saying: "Hey, I have a voice again. I have something to say, and they will listen to me."

Mr. NUNN. We have not been hearing from individuals about this act because individuals still realize this is a battle between special interests. We have had 1 week of battle between special interests, and now we are getting down to the heart of the democratic process. We have an opportunity to really do something about what all of us know is at the very foot and foundation of the problems we have in the process now.

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NUNN. I would be glad to yield. The Senator from Florida yielded to me, so I yield back to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. BUMPERS. First, I want to say I have always been an admirer of the Senator from Florida because of the very unique way he was elected in the first instance, and I applaud his limitation of contributions to $10.

I would say this: that if a country lawyer, with whom I am very familiar, who in 1970 had a 1-percent name and face recognition, had limited his campaign to $10 per person, he would still be the country lawyer and not the junior Senator from the State of Arkansas.

Now, the thing that troubles me about this bill—and I applaud most of it, but the thing that troubles me about this bill—as it troubled me about the original so-called Campaign Finance Reform Act is the effect it has on an unknown challenger.

It is easy for me to stand here with the name and face recognition that I have in my State and say, "I am going to limit my contributions." I certainly think it is laudable, and I think all of us ought to do it. But, I recognize the difference between a sitting Senator or a sitting Governor making that kind of fine gesture on behalf of participatory democracy and somebody who is equally interested in getting involved but is totally unknown, having to depend on individual people to give him $1 or $2 when they never heard of him, they do not know what he stands for, and the likelihood of their ever knowing what he stands for is never very good unless he is one of those fairly wealthy people who can spend his own money.

Mr. CHILES. But if he depends on getting elected by getting contributions from one of these groups, COPE or AMPAC, whose man is he going to be when he comes to the Senate, if he depends on them?

Mr. BUMPERS. He is going to belong to his own hometown, I am afraid, forever unless he can go to somebody and persuade them as a group.

I like the amendment, and the Senator from Florida knows I have seriously considered cosponsoring it. But I am also extremely concerned about unknown people who have a right, indeed a duty and a responsibility, to challenge the people who sit in this body.

Mr. CHILES. I share that concern. But what I do not know and what I cannot understand is how this amendment—you know, this concern that the Senator has goes to other things in the whole bill. They go to whether you are going to grant TV time, and they go to whether we are going to have public financing, and they go to many of these, but I do not see how this amendment is going to change that unless you are going to say if you want to sell your soul to one of those groups you can get financed, and I do not think—that does not give me much comfort that that is the way that is going to help an unknown lawyer or anyone else.

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Florida yield one minute on that? I would agree with the Senator from Florida and disagree with my good friend from Arkansas for this reason: I think a careful analysis of campaign contributions to incumbents versus challengers will reveal that the challengers get very little so-called group money. I think it would reveal that the incumbents are the ones who get the group money and that challengers usually have to wait until they have won a primary or made substantial progress before they are entitled to any group money.

So I would say if the Senator's argument is anything it is the best argument for this amendment. If you really want to protect the right to challenge then you will take away the right of groups to come and pool their money and give to candidates because usually—and I know there are exceptions, but usually—I think any careful analysis will reveal that the majority of group money goes to incumbents and a very small amount goes to challengers until such time as they look like they are going to be winners and then, oh, yes, you can find the groups when you are a winner. You can find them. They come from everywhere. You meet people you never heard of before; you meet them very quickly when you are a winner but not when you are unknown.

I have gone through that period of time when I had only 1 percent recognition, and I went through that period of time when the only people who supported me were people in my hometown. They were not groups but individuals.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CHILES. I would like to yield the floor now and let the chairman——

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CLARK. I must say I am very divided myself on this amendment because, as the Senator from Arkansas has said, there are so many attractive aspects to it in terms of getting private money, group money, out of politics.

I think the question that all of us raise and face is whether if we do this, if we go to this kind of system, whether any nonincumbent could seriously expect to raise money to make a serious challenge.

I think the record would show very clearly that both challengers and incumbents get well over half of all their money from groups. I think perhaps as much as 75 percent is raised in that fashion. I do not find that an attractive fact. But I do believe that it is a fact, and I doubt that there are very many people in this Chamber who were unknown when they ran for office who would have been able even to accumulate the minimum amount of money to be a candidate, a successful candidate, without something more than individual contributions.

Now, having said that, it seems to me that the amendment has so many attractive aspects that if we were indeed to modify the amendment along the lines that the Senator from California suggested that, in spite of its proincumbent nature, it would be worth adopting. I think I would support the Senator from Florida if he were to accept that amendment because I think it would at least say we are not going to let wealthy people determine who is going to run for office.

The fact is right now under the bill as it is drawn we know what would happen. We would have $1,000 cocktail parties all over this town. If that would get the special interests out of politics I would be very much surprised. We are going to have in our States and in this city $1,000 cocktail parties, and the wealthy people are going to determine who can make the serious challenges because you are not going to be able to run on $10, $15, and $20 contributions alone.

So I would ask the Senator from Florida if he would consider—if I may have his attention—an amendment which I have prepared which would simply limit the amount of money that could be spent, not to $10 because he has expressed opposition to that, but to $100, and I will support the amendment and I would support his proposal.

But I do not believe, in view of the fact we are making it such an incumbent bill in the process, that we ought to leave it to the wealthy people who can contribute $1,000 at cocktail parties to determine who the candidates will be.

If the Senator will accept that, I would be prepared to support his amendment.

Mr. CHILES. I thank the distinguished Senator. I think he would, but the reason I would not is because I think I would be going against the very thing the Senator is talking about. You would still be giving a tremendous incumbent advantage.

Mr. CLARK. I understand that.

Mr. CHILES. If you limit it to $100, you are giving a tremendous advantage to us.

Mr. CLARK. I understand that. You are giving incumbents a tremendous advantage with $1,000 and, obviously, you are aggravating that if you go to $100. But my point is at least the wealthy would not be determining who the candidates will be.

Mr. CHILES. I am convinced personally that the best way you would limit the spending and the contributions is to prove that a $10 campaign works, to prove that a $100 limitation works, because all of us like to emulate success.

The Senator from Iowa is here today because he saw an idea that would work.

Mr. CLARK. He borrowed the idea.

Mr. CHILES. And he tried walking the State.

I am working to fill this Chamber with people who will decide that $10 is the way to go, not by passing a law but by showing that it works. But I think you do have to set certain standards that the people can look at, and one of those standards is we are not going to receive our money from the war chest.

I would just quickly answer one other thing. The $1,000 cocktail parties, both sides can hold those.

Mr. CLARK. I do not like that, though.

Mr. CHILES. I do not either.

Mr. CLARK. Let us go to $100 and we will both be on the same side.

Mr. CHILES. The Senator is doing what he does not want me to do. He is giving too much advantage to the incumbent.

Mr. CLARK. That is very true—at least, you are going to do that in either proposal, but in this proposal you are not going to leave it to the $1,000 contributors to determine who the candidates will be.

Mr. CHILES. I will tell you what I think is the best way. If the Senator will offer that as an amendment to the bill I will vote for it, not to my amendment.

Mr. CLARK. I cannot do that.

Mr. CHILES. Let the Senator offer it as an amendment to the bill and I will vote for it. I will vote for $10 in the bill. I will not vote for $10. That is too low. I will vote for $100. But if the Senator puts it on this amendment he is going to lose all kinds of votes, and I do not think that would be proper to do.

Mr. CLARK. I think the problem with attaching it to the bill, without the amendment, clearly is that you are going to leave groups in, then, for $5,000 contributions and individuals at $100 and that just would not be practical.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I would like to send another modification to the desk that just conforms with the amendment to the substitute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is so modified.

The amendment, as modified, is as follows:

At the end of the amendment, add the following:

On page 44, between lines 15 and 16, insert the following:

"LIMITATION ON CONTRIBUTIONS BY ARTIFICIAL LEGAL ENTITIES

"SEC. 380. (a) The Congress finds and declares that—

"(1) it is inappropriate for artificial legal entities, whether in corporate or other form, which are not permitted to vote for Federal candidates to make political contributions in campaigns for Federal office, and

"(2) that it would be appropriate as a means of guarding against the reality or appearance of improper influence stemming from the dependence of candidates on large campaign contributions from such entities to limit the privilege of contributing to Federal political campaigns to individuals generally.

"(b) Notwithstanding any other provision law, no person other than an individual may make a contribution to or for the use of any candidate for Federal office. This subsection does not apply to a political committee established and maintained by a political party.

"(c) Nothing in this section shall be construed to prevent or inhibit the right of individuals to associate with each other for the purpose of making political expenditures or for expressing their views on political matters.".

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MORGAN). The Senator from Nevada.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, first, it is not often that the Senator from New York and I are on the same side and I am delighted to yield 5 minutes to him at this time.

Mr. BUCKLEY. I thank my friend from Nevada.

Mr. President, I must say that I rise with some reluctance. I like the thrust of what this amendment is attempting to achieve, but, unfortunately, I think that a ruling of the Supreme Court which declares that independent groups may spend unlimited funds under the Constitution will have the effect of creating a bias in favor of the largest pressure groups, the ones that are best organized, best financed, who know how to effectively mobilize funds in support of a candidate, but doing so independently of that candidate's campaign.

I see the net result of the adoption of this amendment to be one that eliminates smaller people, smaller groups.

Yes, call them interest groups, but they tend to come on every side of the equation, from having any kind of input comparable to the kind of input we are going to be seeing, as the AFL–CIO votes, and perhaps the American Medical Association, or the business groups, but the big ones, are going to have as they work independently in the political process.

It is for that reason I am reluctantly going to have to vote in opposition.

Mr. NUNN. Will the Senator yield for a brief question?

It seems to me the Senator is in the position of not disagreeing to the amendment, but rather, disagreeing with the Supreme Court decision, perhaps that is not true.

This amendment removes all of groups from direct contribution, but gives any of them the opportunity to go out, complying with the Supreme Court decision to expend funds as opposed to contributing.

So that the Senator's argument appears to the Senator from Georgia to be going against the Supreme Court decision rather than against this amendment.

Mr. BUCKLEY. Not at all, Mr. President. The fact is that I do not disagree with the Supreme Court interpretation of the Constitution. This is a fact we live with, and I would not want to change the Constitution in this respect. But the practical consensus of that decision is that we are going to see more and more well-organized, well-financed groups operating outside of an individual campaign, parallel to it, but independently.

So the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida and cosponsored by the Senator from Georgia will not have the effect of significantly taming the really large political action committees and groups in this country, but it will make it impossible for the smaller groups to throw any kind of counterweight into the equation.

Mr. NUNN. The amendments are not intended to remove biased groups from freedom of association and participation, as is their constitutional right. It is aimed at not having candidates receive and direct funds, which I think would substantially improve not only the process but also the image that the average American individual has in feeling that he has some degree of input into the process or is not competing with corporations and labor unions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, I yield myself 5 minutes.

I must say that I completely agree with the analysis given by the Senator from New York. This does put big groups in the position that they can go forth and solicit contributions and they can spend them any way they see fit. They can spend them for a candidate, they can spend them against a candidate, and they put a candidate to a tremendous disadvantage.

I said earlier today, and this gets to the point the Senator from Georgia was making, I found it a little difficult to rationalize how the Supreme Court could say that a candidate was limited to a $1,000 contribution, but, on the other hand, an organization could spend all of the money it wanted of its own or spend in association with others for the defeat or for the election of a candidate.

It seems a little incongruous.

Mr. NUNN. If the Senator will yield for a brief comment. I would agree that is a paradoxical result, but it is not a result of this amendment. It is a result of the Supreme Court decision, which we are going to have to live with.

Mr. CANNON. I understand that. But this amendment says that an association or an organization cannot contribute to a candidate.

This gets right back to what the Senator from Arkansas was saying. This puts the unknown candidate at a worse disadvantage than he was to start with because he cannot go to any organization that may be friendly to what his views are and solicit them for a contribution.

Mr. NUNN. Let us look at it and weigh the facts. Anything we do toward limiting contributions overall would have the effect of making it a little more difficult for an unknown to mount a campaign. Anything we do in regard to limiting overall limits of contributions. I argued this fact when we first considered this bill.

But I would say, if the worst result we have of this amendment is that we force some poor candidate who is not known to have to go to the people of his State and community to raise funds for a campaign, it will be very therapeutic and a very lofty result.

In other words, what the Senator is saying is that we have a terrible amendment here because it is going to require candidates to go to the people for their contributions rather than to groups. I think that is an argument for the amendment, not against it.

Mr. BUMPERS. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. CANNON. I yield 3 minutes to the Senator.

Mr. BUMPERS. I thank the floor manager. I want to submit a question to the Senator from Georgia.

If we adopt this, is not the effect of this to say that any candidate can drop into the nearest bank, visit with the president of the bank, and perhaps he will give $1,000, he can afford to give everybody in the race $1,000, and he gives $1,000.

What does that do to the challenger who must go out on an assembly line or at the plant gate and try to solicit $1 to $5 from working people who are leaving in the afternoon?

It occurs to me that the effect of this is to force him into going after the large contribution from the bankers and the insurance executives instead of the small people.

Mr. NUNN. I say that under the present law it is very unusual when a candidate solicits funds at the plant gate. That is not where we get funds and the Senator from Arkansas knows that. We go to the leaders of the particlar union or the leaders of the corporation.

If the present law was as the Senator described where people really did get out on the assembly line and solicit funds, I would not be proposing this amendment.

That is not how the system works and everybody knows that.

Mr. BUMPERS. How does the Senator reach those people for solicitation?

Mr. NUNN. Passage of this amendment would result in exactly what the Senator says is done now, which the Senator from Georgia disagrees with, one would get out on the assembly line and talk about $1 or $5 contributions.

That is what this amendment would result in, but that is not the present system.

Mr. BUMPERS. How long would it take an unknown to gather up $1,000 that way as compared to walking in to a bank president and getting it just like that?

Mr. NUNN. The unknown under any limitation on expenditures is put at a disadvantage. The overall laws we passed a year and a half or 2 years ago put an unknown at a disadvantage.

This amendment does not put an unknown at a disadvantage because the unknown does not get special interest contributions until he gets known, until he has already demonstrated he is a viable candidate.

I would challenge the Senator to have someone look at the record and determine when the associations give to a campaign. They do not give to an unknown with no chance. They give to a non-Governor, or a former Governor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Time has expired.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, I yield 3 minutes to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I oppose the amendment of the Senator from Michigan (Mr. GRIFFIN). I listened to the debate and the discussion at the time he presented a similar amendment earlier in the week. It was defeated then. I am hopeful that it will be defeated now.

The Rules Committee bill makes some very important and substantial and necessary changes in the election laws, outside of the question of the reconstitution of the Federal Election Commission. If we are going to accept the Griffin amendment, then all of those other changes which have been proposed, which I think are extremely important for preserving the integrity of the election process, will be abrogated.

I would mention specifically the problems of independent spending and wealthy candidates which exists as a result of the Supreme Court's decision. If we accept the Griffin amendment, these problems will not be solved. Wealthy activists will be able to spend massive amounts on the candidates they favor. Wealthy candidates will be able to spend unlimited amounts of their own resources. The Rules Committee bill brings these abuses under control in three important ways—it subjects candidates who accept public financing in Presidential elections to the limits on spending of their own resources. It requires independent spending to be genuinely independent, by clarifying the prohibition on cooperation or coordination of such spending with a candidate. If there is such cooperation, the expenditure is a contribution and will be subject to the spending limits. Also, the bill prohibits independent spending by those who simply disseminate materials prepared by the candidate. And, finally, the bill requires full disclosure of all independent spending.

I would also mention the important provisions of the bill modifying the basic enforcement machinery of the FEC. These changes are going to make it a more effective and useful agency in dealing with the difficult practical problems within its jurisdiction.

Finally, I would mention the important provisions in the bill that prohibit proliferation of political committees. This abuse is the newest emerging loophole in the election laws. It is being used to avoid the contribution limits in the law. The committee bill would close this loophole by prohibiting such artificial proliferation of political committees.

So it is a serious oversimplification to argue that the Griffin amendment is going to do the job that needs to be done if Congress is to deal responsibly with the problems of campaign financing left in the wake of the Supreme Court's decision.

I also share the concerns of those opposed to the Chiles amendment. The question which troubles me most, is the undue advantage that will be given to persons able to afford $1,000 contributions. They will make their voices heard even more loudly than they are heard today, because ordinary citizens will be prevented from grouping together to make their small contributions more effective.

I think there are serious constitutional questions raised by the Chiles amendment. The first amendment guarantees the right of free association, and this amendment clearly impairs that right. It handicaps and limits those who are interested in participating in the political process, but whose separate efforts under this amendment would be too isolated to be effective. I hope the amendment will be defeated.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, I yield myself 5 minutes.

Mr. President, the amendment offered by the distinguished Senator from Florida would permit only individuals in their personal capacities to participate in our electoral process. Although this amendment would allow certain political party committees to contribute to candidates and campaigns, the essential thrust of the proposal would be to cast a severe chilling effect upon the first amendment rights of associations, committees, partnerships, political committees—whether formed by individuals or segregated fund committees of corporations and labor organizations—and all other organizations or groups of persons. These groups and organizations would be summarily ostracized from participating in our democratic form of government. The proposal is thus fraught with grave constitutional infirmities.

When I say they would be ostracized in the sense of being able to make any contributions, it is true they could go out and make their own independent expenditures, go their merry way, and take the control of a campaign completely out of the hands of the participants in the campaign.

Mr. President, this amendment does not propose a reasonable restraint upon constitutionally protected associational freedoms, such as the overall contribution limitations in the Federal Election Campaign Act. These were upheld by the Supreme Court as appropriate legislative weapons against the reality or appearance of improper influence stemming from the dependence of candidates on large campaign contributions. The Court found these contribution ceilings to serve the basic governmental interest in safeguarding the integrity of the electoral process without impinging upon the rights of individual citizens and candidates to engage in political debate and discussion.

The amendment proposed by the distinguished Senator from Florida, however, does not serve any governmental interest. Instead of a limitation it is a direct prohibition of the constitutionally protected freedom of association. In Buckley against Valeo the Supreme Court reemphasized that "the right of association is a 'basic constitutional freedom' that is closely allied to freedom of speech and a right which like free speech lies at the foundation of a free society." [Slip opinion p. 19.]

In referring to the nature of protected associational freedom the Supreme Court stated, and I quote, > Making a contribution, like joining a political party, serves to affiliate a person with a candidate. In addition it enables like-minded persons to pool their reserves in furtherance of common political goals." (Slip opinion p. 17).

The Court in Buckley said the act's contribution ceilings limit one important means of associating with a candidate or committee; that is, the making of a contribution. This extraordinary amendment, Mr. President, would prohibit this important means of associating with a candidate or committee to groups, associations, and other organizations which have in and of themselves protected first amendment rights.

Such a broad prohibition, furthermore, would preclude all associations from amplifying the voice of their adherents and members. Such amplification and expression of the voice of an association's adherents—here in the context of the association's participating in the electoral process by making contributions to candidates or committees—is the original basis for the recognition of first amendment protection of the freedom of association. [Buckley v. Valeo, slip opinion p. 17.]

Mr. President, at this moment it is difficult to conceive of a proposal which would have more severe constitutional questions and I would strongly urge my colleagues to vote against it.

Mr. President, I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I yield 1 minute to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. PACKWOOD. First, the Supreme Court said it was up to the Congress to set the limits where they want. We set it at $1,000 and $5,000.

Two, political action committees can now give money to a candidate or spend it themselves. All we are saying is henceforth they cannot give it to a candidate.

Three, as to where the money goes now, the Senator from Georgia said most of it goes to incumbents. I have a study, though not with me, which shows that 90 percent of political action committee money now before primaries goes to incumbents, Republican or Democrat, and only 10 percent goes to challengers, and then only if the incumbent is not running.

After the primary, 80 percent of the money still goes to the incumbent. The fat cat PAC money goes to us. It does not go to the country lawyer. It does not go to the guy who has never been heard of before. It goes to us and this will change it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. BUMPERS. Will the floor manager yield me a couple of minutes?

Mr. CANNON. I yield 2 minutes.

Mr. BUMPERS. I want to make one final comment. As a practical matter, this will work in reverse of the way the sponsors of the amendment think these steps will work. I was just talking to my distinguished colleague from Florida. I believe that the success of an organization like Common Cause, for example, is because individual people do not think their voice makes any difference. They feel that if they can join with a coalition or group of people and allow the leadership of that group to express their opinions, then they have some clout with this body, with Congress, and with the President.

Does it not work the same way if the ordinary worker in this country is limited to giving $1 or $5 to a candidate and he sees the published reports where the bankers, insurance executives, and other "fat cats" are giving $1,000? How does he feel about his $5 contribution? How much effect does he think it has as opposed to those big $1,000 contributions he sees reported periodically?

If that worker has a sense of apprehension about it, or if he has a feeling that he can be effective by joining with others and pooling his $5 with others until it amounts to $1,000, why should he not be permitted to do it?

I am saying that by this amendment we would force candidates to go to individual workers who would feel that a $1 or $5 contribution would not mean anything, and we would really be distorting the very participatory democratic processes we are trying to enhance. I thank the manager for allowing me this time.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator from Arkansas for making this observation because I think he has put his finger right on the point.

Why is Common Cause growing to the extent that it is? Why is it an organization that now has over a million members, and grows by leaps and bounds?

I think it is because people have decided there are all kinds of pressure groups. There are labor pressure groups that are influencing all kinds of decisions, there are management pressure groups that are influencing all kinds of decisions, and I as an individual do not count any more. So I am going to try to get together and form what I think might be a pressure group that would interest me.

Who are members of Common Cause? A lot of them are retired. A lot of them are on fixed incomes and retired, and do not belong to any of these other pressure groups.

If you want to talk about the growth of Common Cause, let us talk about why. The reason is that the process we are talking about—and it is so interesting—we are not talking about this process as though it belongs to the people, we are talking about the process as though it belongs to the committees. "Wait a minute, now, we should not hamper the committees this way or that way."

You know why that is? Because we have got the feeling that it belongs to the committees. We have started feeling that way because that is where our money has been coming from, from the committees.

You can parade the $1,000 cocktail party through here as often as you want to, but what are you saying? My ear really tells me something different. It says, "I have got to be careful; my money comes from here or my money comes from the other side, and I want to make sure that I do not rock the boat, so I am not going to do anything about that."

It seems like to me I cannot do anything about the Supreme Court decision and the Supreme Court decision said a group of people can band together and can spend money if they want to, and to try to limit them from doing that is against their first amendment freedoms.

All right, so we recognize that we cannot do anything about it. So if COPE wants to collect money they can. If they want to spend it they can. If AMPAC wants to collect money, they can and they can spend it.

If you vote for this amendment, it has to be under the committee. Then every mother's son gets a chance to see that that is COPE spending that money, that that is AMPAC spending that money. I believe they are entitled to know that. As the Senator from Georgia said, I do not believe they know that if they see my face on the tube saying I am for this or for that. No one says, in that kind of TV ad, where that money comes from. But if they want to put on an ad as a COPE ad or an AMPAC ad, they can put it on. I cannot stop that. The Supreme Court has said that.

But what else has the Supreme Court said? The Supreme Court has said, after Congress spoke and said we do not think labor unions should make a contribution, the Supreme Court said, "That's all right, you can make that limitation."

We said, "We don't think corporations should make a contribution." The Supreme Court said that is all right.

Now, if the Supreme Court says it is all right for us to limit that a corporation or a union cannot make a contribution, why is the Supreme Court going to say, "We are not going to allow those very managers to go solicit their members and/or their stockholders to make that contribution"?

I do not hear anyone arguing that we ought to allow a labor union directly to make a contribution. I do not hear anyone arguing that we ought to allow a corporation directly to make a contribution. So why are we wedded to the committee structure? Purely and simply because we have been living by it, and we are afraid we will die without it. So what becomes the habit and what we look to is what concerns us.

I think in this amendment we have a chance to say, "We are going to reverse that process, that is, we are going to recognize it 'ain't' committees that elect people, it is people, and it ought to be people that contribute."

We talk about how to get the money out. I wish we could get the money out like that. I have supported the public financing thing. I would support making some free TV time available for nonincumbents. I think we incumbents have a tremendous advantage. This amendment does not change that one way or the other.

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a brief question?

Mr. CHILES. I am happy to yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. NUNN. The amendment of the Senator from Florida, as I understand it, would not prevent 15 individuals from walking into a Senator's headquarters in Jacksonville, Fla., and individually giving their money to that campaign.

Mr. CHILES. As long as it was not more than $10, in my campaign.

Mr. NUNN. The Senator has a limitation. But let us assume you did not have a $10 limit. This would not prevent a group of people from walking in and giving their money, all in one pack.

Mr. CHILES. No, sir; and as the Senator from Arkansas mentioned, you cannot go out on the assembly lines and ask for the money.

Mr. NUNN. If this amendment passes you could.

Mr. CHILES. Yes. If you decide to limit all contributions you can now, because I have been out there and done that.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield the floor a couple of minutes for purposes of an observation?

Mr. CHILES. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. Will the Senator from Nevada yield me 2 minutes?

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, what is the time situation?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nevada has 3 minutes remaining.

Mr. CANNON. I yield a minute to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CLARK. In 1 minute, as we have seen, Mr. President, the amendment of the Senator from Florida would do a lot of attractive things in terms of eliminating special interest committees, but the offset would be that no candidate could conceivably raise enough money to have a credible race against an incumbent save for one possibility: That he or she is going out and start holding thousand-dollar cocktail parties or $500 cocktail parties. You are not conceivably, in a small State, going to be able to raise enough money if you are an unknown except in $1,000 amounts.

Mr. CHILES. The Senator from Florida did not do that.

Mr. CLARK. I have only 1 minute. If we are going somehow to say a committee which joins together a group of people with $5 or $10 in sufficient numbers to get us $10,000, which is the present limitation——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator's 1 minute has expired.

Mr. CLARK. To go out and raise those out of contributions of $5 or $10, that is hardly getting the big money out of politics.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, I sort of supervised myself the first time I sought public office. I ran against several well-known people in the State, and took a solemn vow that I would never support legislation which I thought gave an incumbent an advantage over his challenger. Rightly or wrongly, I know there is an honest difference of opinion here, but I perceive this amendment as giving incumbents an unfair advantage. Therefore, I shall be compelled to vote against it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Who yields time?

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I yield 30 seconds to the distinguished Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. BROCK. Mr. President, since when do we have to have groups of contributors? For 200 years the country has operated without them; now all of a sudden we have to have groups.

The groups stake the incumbents. That is where the money goes, and that is where the power is. All we are saying is, let us open up the process, get the group influence out of it, and let the people have a voice.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I do not think the Senator has enough faith in people. I say to the Senator from Arkansas that if someone uses big money, and you are an incumbent, if you cannot use that against him I do not think you are very inventive; I do not think you have any ingenuity. I did not get big money when I got elected. The Senator from Iowa, I do not think, got big money when he got elected. The Senator from Georgia did not raise big money when he got elected. I look around at most of the new incumbents I see here, and I do not see a mother's son that raised big money to get elected, and I do not see a one who has spoken who did not raise more money than his opponent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from Florida has expired. The Senator from Nevada has 1 minute remaining.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, purely and simply what this amendment would do is take the conduct of an election campaign out of the hands of a candidate and give it to the special interest groups, because all that is said here is that the groups that can be organized, the associations, the AMPAC's, and whatever they are, that can be organized under the law and in accordance with the Supreme Court decision, can go out and spend independently any amount of money they want to spend either for or against a particular candidate.

This means that the man who has no source of income other than going to the maximum limit of a $1,000 contribution will have, effectively, the control of his campaign taken away from him. It is left in the hands of the big groups, who have no limit on the amount of money they can spend, the amount they can raise, the amount they can solicit. The corporations can solicit through separate, independent political organizations. They can solicit their stockholders and employees, consistent with the act. The labor unions can solicit, and they can go out and spend without limit. But the Senator is saying that no group can make a contribution to a candidate.

Mr. President, I submit that this is not the way to solve the handling of the political process, and I move to lay the amendment on the table. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question is on agreeing to the motion to table. On this question the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

So Mr. GRIFFIN's amendment was rejected.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was rejected.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to read the amendment.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(Pursuant to an order entered later in today's proceedings, Mr. GRIFFIN'S second amendment in the nature of a substitute is not printed in the RECORD.)

Mr. GRIFFIN. I would like to explain this amendment.

Mr. CANNON. Does the Senator have a copy, Mr. President?

Mr. GRIFFIN. We will get some Xeroxed copies made for the chairman and others.

I will tell the Senate this is another substitute, and in this case the Packwood amendment, which is a very meritorious amendment, one of the most important amendments that we have ever adopted around here, but realizing that it is controversial and we lose votes because it is in the substitute, has been eliminated. But the Chiles amendment has been included.

This substitute includes the Chiles amendment, and it also carries the amendment of the Senator from Arizona with regard to honoraria, and we would just like to call the roll again.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. I wonder if it also contains the amendment of the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I will have to admit it does not at this point. Of course, it is amenable.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, I would like to see a copy of the amendment.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, I have an amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will state the amendment.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to read the amendment.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

Mr. CLARK. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is heard. The clerk will read the amendment.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

Amendment to Line 23 of Page 27 of S3065, amending Section 320(a)(2) of the bill, as follows:

After "exceed $5,000." add "except that the Republican or Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, the Democratic National Congressional Committee, the National Republican Congressional Committee, or the national committee of a political party may contribute at any time amounts not exceeding $20,000 to candidates for Congress with respect to any or all of the elections in which such candidates seek office during an election year."

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, this amendment is submitted on behalf of myself, Senator BENTSEN, who is a former chairman of our Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, as well as Senator STEVENS, the chairman of the Republican Senatorial Campaign Committee.

What it does is simply this: It increases to $20,000 per year for elections that the committee may give to any candidate. Under the present law the committee, the Senatorial, Democratic or Republican, Committee may give $5,000 per election, election including the primary, runoff, and general election, or $15,000 for candidates who have all three elections.

What this amendment does is simply say that that amount is increased to $20,000 is not made dependent upon whether they are primaries, runoffs, or general elections.

Mr. President, the whole thrust, the whole reason, for this campaign law is to do away, insofar as we can, with what you might call committed money—some call it dirty money, money with strings, money where there is some quid pro quo, express or implied, for the contribution.

So, Mr. President, this amendment increases the amount which you can get from the one source, that is, your Senatorial Campaign Committees or your national committees, for which there is no quid pro quo.

As a matter of fact, I daresay the average Senator in this body does not even know where the contributions come to for the Senatorial Campaign Committees. In the case of the Democratic Committee we do not pass around the list. Some Senators do not even secure contributions, but they all get contributions on a parity basis.

It seems to me, Mr. President, we ought to make it as easy as possible within reason to allow these contributions to be made in reasonable amounts when we know they are not going to be based on any semblance of any promise, expressed or implied.

I hope the manager can go along with this. It has bipartisan support. Frankly, Mr. President, I see no conceivable objection.

I ask for the adoption of this amendment.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, when this bill was originally drawn 2 years ago we, of course, had a very extensive debate here about whether or not all committees ought to be limited to $5,000 or whether we were going to create a special loophole a special situation, a special condition, for our own.

That is really what the issue here is. Are we going to say that labor committees and business committees and so-called good government committees, and all other committees, are limited to $5,000, but when it comes to us that does not apply to the committees that contributes to us and to us only?

In those cases, if we are to adopt this amendment, we would find ourselves giving ourselves $20,000.

The absolute contribution limitation on the Democratic National Committee, the State committees, county committees, every other committee, is $5,000. If we adopt this amendment, we are saying that that would apply to all but our own in-house committees.

The great problem with this amendment is that because we wanted to keep the party strong, we have said that an individual may contribute to a party committee, the national committee, or the Democratic or Republican senatorial committees and congressional committees, not just $5,000, but $25,000.

I think that is perhaps overly generous, but it is in the bill and in the law. Any individual may contribute to the congressional campaign committees and senatorial campaign committees up to $25,000. If we are going to allow $20,000 to go to a candidate, that means we really open up and invite the possibility of earmarking. At least, we make it extremely difficult to enforce the law against earmarking because then we have a way to pass at least $20,000 out of an individual and into the hands of a House or Senate Member.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. CLARK. I do yield.

Mr. JOHNSTON. The Senator is aware that there is a specific law which prohibits the earmarking?

Mr. CLARK. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSTON. If someone, expressly or by implication, earmarks, then it is the duty of the committee to so note that earmarking and it is the duty of the candidate to report that as if it were a direct contribution from the original donor and the final donee, the Senator is aware of that?

Mr. CLARK. Yes, that is why I was very careful in saying that it obviously makes it hard to enforce the earmarking law. The earmarking law is the law the Senator just described. Of course, if one can identify someone who said, "We want this $20,000 to go to that candidate," it is against the law.

But we have to be very concerned in the process of passing this legislation that we do not invite difficulties in the enforcement of this law. I think this would do so.

Mr. JOHNSTON. The Senator is not suggesting that the chairman or the committees of this Congress would be party to circumventing that law, either expressly or impliedly?

Mr. CLARK. No.

Mr. JOHNSTON. The Senator surely is not doing that.

Mr. CLARK. No. But obviously, not every dollar that comes in to the campaign committee goes through the chairman, is seen by him and passed on by him.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Oh, yes, it is. I beg to disagree.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GARN). If the Senator will yield, I advise the Senator from Louisiana that his amendment is not in order. Line 23 has already been deleted from the bill.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, I would, therefore, move to amend my amendment by striking the words "after exceed $5,000 add" and in lieu thereof insert the following "notwithstanding any other provision of this act".

I also want to strike "except that" and put the quotes in front of "the." So, therefore, it would read as follows:

Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act "the Republican or Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee"

Et cetera.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question remains, where does the Senator wish the amendment to come in the bill?

Mr. JOHNSTON. At the appropriate place.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is so modified.

The amendment, as modified, is as follows:

At the appropriate place in the bill insert the following: "Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act the Republican or Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, the Democratic National Congressional Committee, the National Republican Congressional Committee, or the national committee of a political party may contribute at any time amounts not exceeding $20,000 to candidates for Congress with respect to any or all of the elections in which such candidates seek office during an election year."

Mr. JOHNSTON. As I was saying to the Senator, if I recall the question, earmarking is totally impossible, and I am sure this applies with equal force to the Republican committee as it does with the Democratic committee.

Not one cent goes out to a political candidate. I know this is true. It was true when Senator BENTSEN was chairman of the committee. It is true when I am chairman of the committee.

Not one cent goes out that is not signed by the chairman, cosigned by the executive council and distributed under a plan generally perfected by the committee.

Mr. CLARK. If I understand the Senator's statement, every cent of money that is taken into the committee is personally received by him, and if there were any conditions assigned to that, he would be aware of it?

Mr. JOHNSTON. No. Every cent that goes out.

Mr. CLARK. That goes out?

Mr. JOHNSTON. That is right.

Mr. CLARK. But not that comes in?

Mr. JOHNSTON. It is illegal to accept under conditions—unless they are earmarked, and that is so stated.

Mr. CLARK. Right.

Mr. JOHNSTON. It does not go out without the chairman actually signing the check.

Mr. CLARK. I understand.

Mr. JOHNSTON. So that it is impossible for a staffer, for example, to receive some money and understand the conditions and send it out of the committee. It comes through as it should, as it must, through the chairman.

Mr. CLARK. Let me try to explain more specifically with regard to this point that I do not think we ought to set up a different standard for the senatorial and congressional campaign committees than we set up for any other committee.

Particularly, I do not think we ought to set up a different level of contribution. There was a good deal of debate here a little while ago on the Chiles amendment about how much faith people have lost in the system, how people believe big money corrupts and that special interests money corrupts.

Now the senatorial and congressional campaign committees can receive money exactly the same way, and from the same kind of sources as any other committee may.

There is no restriction where they can take money.

I would argue that for us then to create a special category—every committee in America can spend so much except one committee, our committee—it is only going to cause greater cynicism, and justifiably so, from the American electorate.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I say to my distinguished friend that precisely the opposite results come from this committee.

Surely the Senator cannot compare a Democratic committee or a Republican committee to a labor committee or a business committee or any special interest.

Mr. CLARK. Why not?

Mr. JOHNSTON. Because we have no public interest, other than the party interest.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator is going to take contributions from labor for the committee, is he not? It is exactly the same dollar—from business as well—whether for Republican or Democrat.

The Senator makes no restriction on where that money comes from.

Mr. JOHNSTON. But it is comingled in a common pot and given out without strings.

That is the key, and that is the reason for this amendment.

If we assume a certain amount of money is essential in a campaign, and I think that is a safe assumption, then if we cannot get it from the committee, we get it directly from the special interest group, and is this not much better than getting it from the special interest?

Mr. CLARK. Is the Senator saying the campaign committees handle money that is somehow purified as compared to the Democratic National Committee or the Republican National Committee or the State committees?

Mr. JOHNSTON. This amendment is applicable to the Republican National Committee and the Democratic National Committee and, yes, that is precisely what I am saying. It is purified because to the extent that there is any express or implied strings on the money, or the appearance of strings on the money, then those strings are cut by going through this committee.

Mr. CLARK. Maybe I misunderstood the Senator's amendment.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Apparently, what?

Mr. CLARK. There are no copies of the amendment available.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I gave the Senator a copy earlier, as a matter of fact.

Mr. CLARK. It says:

Except that the Republican or Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, the Democratic National Congressional Committee, the National Republican Congressional Committee, or the national committee of a political party may contribute at any time amounts not exceeding $20,000 to candidates for Congress with respect to any or all of the elections in which such candidates seek office during an election year."

What is being said is that every committee in America is limited to $5,000, except the senatorial and congressional campaign committees and the national committees.

Mr. JOHNSTON. That is precisely correct.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I would like to say that what we are doing now is saying to the Democratic National Committee, "You cannot only give $5,000 under the present law, you can spend 2 cents a voter for every voter in a State, with a minimum of $20,000, on behalf of a candidate. So you can spend $5,000 now plus $20,000 or 2 cents a voter, whichever is more. Now we are going to lift that limit of $5,000 all the way to $20,000."

That means the Democratic National Committee and the Republican National Committee can now contribute a minimum of $40,000 to any candidate in Congress. Apparently, according to the amendment, it could not do that for the President. He would be restricted to $5,000. But Senators and Congressmen would be allowed $20,000 in direct cash and a minimum of $20,000 in expenditures on their behalf. That is now a $40,000 minimum limitation that can be either given directly or spent on their behalf.

Am I interpreting the amendment correctly?

Mr. JOHNSTON. This amendment simply changes from an aggregate of $15,000 to an aggregate of $20,000 that a candidate may get directly from these committees. It does not change in any way what he may get otherwise. Right now, as I understand the law, a candidate may have expenditures made on his behalf by the national committee to the extent of $20,000 and he may have spent on his behalf by the Congressional Committee $15,000, assuming he has a primary, a runoff and a general election. All this changes is that $15,000 provision to a $20,000 provision, and it takes over the requirement that there are three elections. In other words, they may get $20,000 even if they only have a general election.

I would suggest to the Senator we are not changing it to allow the $40,000 but simply changing it from the $15,000 to the $20,000. If a candidate were so lucky to get the full $40,000, and I submit that is going to be very rare indeed, what is wrong with that? Is it not better for him to get that money, which I submit is purified, rather than get it directly from the special interest group, directly from the labor group or directly from the business group?

Mr. CLARK. I must say that I do not share the Senator's view that somehow the money that goes through the Senatorial Campaign Committee or the Congressional Campaign Committee is as pure as the driven snow, and the money that comes from individuals who participate in labor is tainted or business money is tainted.

Mr. JOHNSTON. It is not that it is tainted. It is that they have a special point of view and they give their money to promote candidates who share that point of view.

Mr. CLARK. I assume if that were the only criterion, the Democratic Committee gives it to candidates that share their view and the Republicans give it to candidates that share their view.

Mr. JOHNSTON. No, that is not so, because any member of the Democratic Caucus, regardless of his view, even if at times it strays from the majority, is entitled to his share of the money.

Mr. CLARK. But it is a Democratic view. They are not giving money to anybody but Democrats or they are not giving money to anybody but Republicans.

Mr. JOHNSTON. That may be so, but that, I submit, is under our system of government which, in effect, has enshrined the two-party system. That is permissible and that is the kind of taint, if the party puts a taint on money, that our system of government envisions and endorses and has run on traditionally. No one out there in America can say because a party gives someone money that there is anything wrong with that. That is traditional American politics.

Mr. CLARK. I think what the amendment does and what it says is quite clear. I would like the Senator from Louisiana to correct me if I am wrong. Every single committee in the United States that falls under this law would have a $5,000 limitation on the amount that they can contribute, with two exceptions carved out by this amendment: The national committees of the two major parties and the congressional and senatorial committees of the two major parties. In those cases they would be allowed to give $20,000 in direct cash plus, in accordance with the present law, the national party committees would be allowed to spend a minimum of $20,000 on their behalf.

That means that we are going to arrive at a conclusion where the two national committees can now spend an aggregate of $40,000, $20,000 indirect and $20,000 direct, $40,000 minimum. In those States where two cents a voter amounts to more than $20,000, they would be able to spend in excess of that.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. CLARK. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSTON. How much can those sources now spend, assuming there is a primary, a runoff, and a general election?

Mr. CLARK. First of all, let us assume that the primary, runoff, and general election do not occur in at least half of the races in America. We have never had a runoff, to my knowledge, in any place in my part of the country. I do not think one can assume that one automatically gets $5,000 in three elections. I think on the average there will be two elections, and on some occasions three elections. That is direct money. What the Senator is suggesting is that in those cases where there is a primary and a general election we would be able to double that to $20,000. I think it only means the introduction of bigger money into politics and greater cynicism about it, particularly when we are doing it for ourselves, particularly when we are doing it to our own committees.

As I say, we debated this at length 2 years ago. Maybe the Senate feels differently about it now, but I feel very strongly that if we were to say that our committees ought to be different, that we ought to be able to give $20,000 instead of $5,000, we would come in for a great deal of justifiable criticism.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, just one final word. I believe the amendment is well understood. I would like to simply point out that the $20,000 the National Committee may now spend on behalf of a candidate is not inserted by this amendment. That is not changed by this amendment. All this amendment does is increase basically for the senatorial campaign committees from an aggregate of $15,000 in case there are the three elections to a total of $20,000 for however many elections there are.

I submit that when we say we are doing it for ourselves, what we mean is that we are doing it for any candidate for national office, whether he be a congressional candidate or a senatorial candidate. In that sense, this is not a club amendment, if one wants to call it that. It is not for incumbents; it is for any candidate that the committee may give money to.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSTON. Yes, I will yield.

Mr. ALLEN. This would cover primaries and run-off primaries as well, would it not?

Mr. JOHNSTON. That is correct. Under the present law, the campaign committee can give $5,000 for the primary, $5,000 in a run-off, and then another $5,000 in the general election, which is a total of $15,000. What this would allow is to give the committee some flexibility. If the Senator's tough race is the general, he could withhold the whole $20,000 until that time.

Mr. ALLEN. How often do either of the committees contribute to a challenger of an incumbent?

Mr. JOHNSTON. In the case of the Democratic Committee that is not done.

Mr. ALLEN. In other words, this, then, is just for the benefit of incumbents; is that not right?

Mr. JOHNSTON. It would also apply to the challengers, I mean in those cases where an incumbent is beaten and a new incumbent is elected.

Mr. ALLEN. That is right; in other words, in general elections. But through the primaries, first and second, it would be the incumbent who was taken care of. I have no objection to taking care of incumbents, but——

Mr. JOHNSTON. Except in cases where you have no incumbents, as in the case of retirees.

Mr. ALLEN. But where there is an incumbent, there would be no impediment to any incumbent receiving funds, in the general election or primary, either one.

Mr. JOHNSTON. The Senator is correct in the point he makes, in the sense that that is the standard operating procedure under which we have operated, and I see no movement to change it. But the Senator is correct in the point he makes.

Mr. ALLEN. I just want us to understand what we are voting on. As long as the incumbent is in the picture, he is the one who gets the benefit of the increased amount.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Not just the incumbent.

Mr. ALLEN. I say, as long as the incumbent is in the picture, though, he would be the one to really benefit.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSTON. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. ALLEN. But is that not true?

Mr. JOHNSTON. Yes; the Senator is correct.

Mr. TAFT. Is it not true that that depends upon what the committee involved desired to do? If the committee involved desired to make other rules, it could make other rules as to the distribution of those donations.

Mr. JOHNSTON. That is correct. There is no rule that specifies how a national committee or a senatorial committee is going to spend its money.

Mr. TAFT. Well, the Senator is not entirely correct. The Republican senatorial committee does have certain rules.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Well, yes.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSTON. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. I would like to ask the Senator if his amendment would allow the national committee to give more money to a Presidential campaign. Does it increase the limit that may be given to a Presidential candidate?

Mr. JOHNSTON. I do not believe so. It is not intended to, and I do not believe that the phraseology is subject to that interpretation.

Mr. CLARK. That is the way I would interpret it. Therefore, I wonder if this would not be interpreted, and quite accurately, as an amendment aimed only at helping Senators and Members of Congrees. The Senator seeks to permit those national committees to give us more, but not the President more. We are not raising the amount the national committee can give to a President; that remains the same.

Mr. JOHNSTON. That is correct.

Mr. CLARK. So it seems to me all we are doing is saying we want to funnel a lot more money into Senate and congressional campaigns through giving the national committee a separate contribution limitation, and the same with the campaign committees. I do not see how it could be interpreted except that way, as a means of getting more money into our own congressional campaigns.

I think, as the Senator from Alabama has emphasized, it is merely a means of getting more money into an incumbent's campaign, because this amendment does favor incumbents. For all those reasons, Mr. President, I hope the Senate will not adopt this amendment, because I think if we open up the flood gates and say this committee ought to go from $5,000 to $20,000, we will have a very difficult time in saying that State committees, county committees, and other committees ought not to be able to do that. Then we will not have a $5,000 limitation on committees, but a $20,000 limitation. After all, how does one justify increasing from $5,000 to $20,000 for national committees and not State committees?

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point so that I may ask for the yeas and nays?

Mr. CLARK. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore (Mr. HANSEN). Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I thank the Senator.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I am prepared to yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I yield back the remainder of my time.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. All remaining time having been yielded back, the question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana (Mr. JOHNSTON). On this question, the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I announce that the Senator from Idaho (Mr. CHURCH), the Senator from Indiana (Mr. HARTKE), and the Senator from Washington (Mr. JACKSON) are necessarily absent.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Washington (Mr. JACKSON) would vote "yea."

Mr. GRIFFIN. I announce that the Senator from North Carolina (Mr. HELMS) and the Senator from North Dakota (Mr. YOUNG) are necessarily absent.

I further announce that the Senator from Vermont (Mr. STAFFORD) is absent due to illness.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from North Carolina (Mr. HELMS) would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 64, nays 30, as follows:

NOT VOTING—6

So Mr. JOHNSTON's amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CANNON. The President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TAFT. I move to lay that on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment to the pending substitute by Mr. GRIFFIN.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The second assistant legislative clerk proceeded to read the amendment.

Mr. TAFT. I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 1, in subsection (c)(1) after the word "ballot", add the following: "or certifies to the Commission that he will not be an active candidate in the primary".

At the end of subsection (c)(1) add the following new sentence: "The provisions of this section shall apply as of the date of enactment."

Mr. TAFT. This is an amendment that had already passed on the first Griffin substitute and on the bill itself. I am attempting now to put it into the second Griffin substitute. As the Members of the Senate who were here will recall, the amendment relates to a limitation on the payout share to the Presidential candidates. It eliminates candidates who, for two consecutive primaries, have under 10 percent of the vote in those primaries, with the provision that Senator BAYH asked to be included, to the effect that if a candidate wishes to certify that he is not an active candidate, this will not count against him in the primary so far as elimination is concerned. I know of no objection to it. It went through by a voice vote originally.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, do I understand correctly that this is the same amendment to decertify Presidential candidates provided that they do not get a certain percent of the votes in the primary, and this is the amendment that was offered before to S. 3065 and also to the previous Griffin substitute?

Mr. TAFT. The Senator is entirely correct.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, I am willing to accept the amendment. I think it is a good amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CRANSTON. Certainly.

MODIFICATION OF ORDER TO REPORT SENATE RESOLUTION 400

Mr. MANSFIELD. If I may have the attention of the Senate, I ask unanimous consent that the order of the Senate mandating the Senate Rules Committee to report Senate Resolution 400 establishing a Standing Committee on Intelligence Activities on March 20, 1976, be modified as follows:

Senate Resolution 400 be reported forthwith from the Committee on Rules and immediately be referred simultaneously to the Committee on the Judiciary and to the Committee on Rules;

That the Committee on the Judiciary make its recommendations on Senate Resolution 400 not later than the close of business on March 29, 1976 and that the recommendations of the Committee on the Judiciary be referred without further action by the Senate to the Committee on Rules; and

That the Rules Committee report its final recommendations not later than April 5, 1976.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, may I inquire——

Mr. MANSFIELD. This has been cleared.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I just wanted to know that, because I happen to be the only ranking member of the Committee on Government Operations here.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I looked for the Senator, but he was not available. He was in a hearing.

Mr. JAVITS. I understand.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I cleared it with Senators CANNON, HATFIELD, EASTLAND, TUNNEY, HART, BYRD, HRUSKA, RIBICOFF, and SCOTT.

Mr. JAVITS. Has it been cleared with Mr. PERCY, the ranking member?

Mr. MANSFIELD. I shall trust the Senator from New York to get him.

Mr. JAVITS. I shall not object. I just wanted to know that.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I thank the Senator.

FEDERAL ELECTION CAMPAIGN ACT AMENDMENTS OF 1976

The Senate continued with the consideration of the bill (S. 3065) to amend the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971 to provide for its administration by a Federal Election Commission appointed in accordance with the requirements of the Constitution, and for other purposes.

Mr. CRANSTON. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma for a unanimous-consent request.

Mr. BARTLETT. I ask unanimous consent that Don Cogman of my staff be accorded privileges of the floor during consideration of this measure.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CRANSTON. I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

Mr. CRANSTON. I ask unanimous consent that reading be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(Pursuant to an order entered later in today's proceedings, Mr. CRANSTON's amendment in the nature of a substitute for Mr. GRIFFIN's amendment, is not printed in the RECORD.)

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk proceeded to read the amendment.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the amendment be dispensed with. I shall explain it very quickly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(Note: Mr. CANNON's amendment consists of all amendments that have been agreed to with the exception of Mr. PACKWOOD's amendment. Pursuant to an order entered later in today's proceedings, Mr. CANNON's amendment to Mr. CRANSTON's amendment is not printed in the RECORD.)

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, this amendment now gets back to S. 2065 and includes all of the amendments which have been approved to date except the amendment of Senator PACKWOOD requiring reporting of expenditures by corporations and labor organizations in communication with their stockholders and members. We have discussed this matter very thoroughly up one side and down the other. I am prepared to discuss it further or to vote on it, either one.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. HATFIELD. We did not hear the reading of Senator CRANSTON's amendment and we have heard but a brief explanation of the amendment of the Senator from Nevada, the chairman of the Committee on Rules. Is it possible to know what the Cranston amendment is before we are asked to vote on an amendment to the Cranston amendment?

Mr. CRANSTON. I shall be glad to explain, Mr. President, that my amendment was the original bill as reported from committee. I offered that. Then the Senator from Nevada offered a substitute. So the substance of the substitute of the Senator from Nevada is the matter now before the Senate.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, a further parliamentary inquiry. Since we have an amendment to an amendment to an amendment, we are precluded from further amendments, as I understand it, at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Nevada is not open to further amendment.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, a further parliamentary inquiry: If this is brought to a vote and the amendment is passed by the Senate—that is, the amendment of the Senator from Nevada—what is the question before the Senate at that time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Then the question is on the amendment of the Senator from California, as amended.

Mr. HATFIELD. Is that amendable, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It would not be amendable.

Mr. HATFIELD. Then if that passes what is the parliamentary situation, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Then the question would be on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Michigan, as amended.

Mr. HATFIELD. So that by this particular parliamentary action at this time the Senator from Michigan's (Mr. GRIFFIN) amendment is third in line and is not subject to consideration if the first two amendments pass; namely, the amendment by Mr. CRANSTON, as amended by Mr. CANNON; is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. HATFIELD. I thank the Chair.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry or maybe the chairman can answer this: Would his amendment include all amendments that have been passed or agreed to on the committee bill?

Mr. CANNON. My amendment now pending includes all amendments that have been heretofore passed, adopted by the Senate, on the committee bill, S. 3065, except the Packwood amendment.

Mr. GOLDWATER. The amendment that was agreed to, the one I introduced this morning, would not be affected?

Mr. CANNON. Would not be affected. It is covered in the amendment.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, perhaps I misunderstand the parliamentary maneuver that is being sought to be made at this time. If I understood the distinguished chairman of the committee, he is seeking to amend the amendment offered by the distinguished Senator from California (Mr. CRANSTON). Such amendment of the distinguished Senator from Nevada would embrace all of the amendments that have been adopted up to the present time except, as I understood him to say, the amendment of the distinguished Senators from Oregon (Mr. PACKWOOD) and Tennessee (Mr. BROCK), which has been agreed to here in the Senate.

So if the amendment of the distinguished Senator from Nevada is agreed to not only would it work a reconsideration of the vote by which the amendment of the distinguished Senator from Oregon and the distinguished Senator from Tennessee was agreed to here in the Senate, but it would cut off all further amendments.

Well now, if that is the way we are going to play ball here, I assure you that this amendment is not going to be voted on any time soon.

[Laughter.]

Mr. ALLEN. At the conclusion of my remarks, Mr. President, I am going to move to table the amendment of the distinguished Senator from California, which would carry with it the substitute of the distinguished Senator from Nevada (Mr. CANNON), because I do not believe the Senate on either side of the aisle would agree to this power play.

I have got some amendments over here that I would like to have voted on. One amendment I might comment on right at this time. I would like Senators to turn to page 46; "616" on line 6 would lift the limit on honoraria that Members of Congress can charge for making speeches or writing articles? Who would think that? Here it is very innocent on line 6, page 46. Who would think that "616" means that hereafter there shall be no limit whatsoever on honoraria that Members of Congress can charge?

Well now, we are supposed to be reconstituting the Federal Election Commission to meet the decision of the Supreme Court, and this little power play here, this second power play, I might say, "616," how unwise can we get? We added the Members of Congress, House and Senate, to the pay adjustment plan for Federal employees so that Members of the House and Senate are guaranteed an annual raise in salary.

Let us read what section 616 says. I do not believe the Senate is going to agree to cut off all amendments, but discard one that has already become a part of the pending bill. But 616 is to be repealed under the Senate bill. It allows—it is now just Members of Congress who are covered here it allows—an employee or officer of the Federal Government, elected or appointed, to receive honoraria up to $15,000 a year and up to $1,000 for any one appearance. Well, that is pretty good extra income, it would seem to the Senator from Alabama, an extra $15,000. I question whether a Federal employee ought to use the prestige of his office to charge for his appearances, but that is the custom.

But we have got a limit on it, and why, in repealing or amending the Federal election law to conform to the decision of the Supreme Court, must we reach out in an entirely new field and remove this ceiling so that any Federal employee—a Federal judge, let us say, he is covered, too, so that there shall hereafter be no limitation whatsoever, the sky is the limit, guaranteed annual increase in compensation, as much as the tariff will bear in outside appearances away from this Chamber.

I do not believe the Senate will want to do that. I just mention that as one little imperfection of the bill as it now pends before the Senate.

This substitute was not even read. We are to take that in one swallow, discard an amendment adopted by rollcall vote here in the Senate, lay that aside, reconsider that—that has already been reconsidered here in the Senate, we cannot reconsider it but once—this is doing indirectly what the rules do not permit on a direct vote, because we have already had one vote to reconsider.

I dare say, there are 30 or 40 amendments pending here in the Senate right now. Under this plan, not a single one of them would be allowed to be offered.

I do not believe that is quite right. That does not comport with my understanding of what is fair. I do not know who was consulted on this matter. The Senator from Alabama was not consulted.

As a matter of fact, the Senator from Alabama was trying to get recognition over there at his seat. I wanted to offer this amendment on honoraria, but I could not get recognized—it seems to be a common failing with the Senator from Alabama, the inability to get recognized.

But this is a little play acting here where the Senator from California offers an amendment and then the Senator from Nevada (Mr. CANNON) offered another amendment, neither of which were read. It would have taken an hour, probably an hour and a half, to have read those two documents. All of that was waived because, as was stated, "an explanation will be given."

Well, an explanation was given, all right, but I did not particularly fancy that explanation.

So, Mr. President, what do the managers of the bill fear in this effort to cut off amendments, in this effort to prevent the Senate from working its will?

I hardly regard it as democratic. I hardly regard it as a democratic move, small "d." I cannot give my sanction to a power play of this sort.

They take the amendments they like. They discard one that the Senate had already voted by some 50 to 46, I believe, somewhere in that range. That is laid aside.

I had an amendment in addition to the honorarium amendment that I had cleared with the distinguished manager of the bill and I was in hope that some time in the next 30 or 40 minutes it might have been adopted.

Under the present effort the Senate would be tied and locked in, if this power play is allowed to take place. Under this bill it is entirely likely that membership corporations, corporations that have members but do not have stockholders, could not set up segregated funds as are permitted to corporations with stockholders and stock.

Mr. CHILES. Will the Senator from Alabama yield for a minute?

Mr. ALLEN. For a question, yes.

Mr. CHILES. It is a question and it is not particularly on the subject the Senator from Alabama is talking about.

I wonder if the Senator from Alabama would just help the Senator from Florida. I am trying to figure where we are now.

Mr. ALLEN. Well, we are behind the eight ball.

[Laughter.]

Mr. CHILES. As I understand it, we have the kind of parliamentary situation set before us in which we sort of have a locked-in vote, do we not, in which any amendment we offer now is in the form of a perfecting amendment which gets automatically wiped out if the Cannon substitute passes?

Mr. ALLEN. That is correct.

Mr. CHILES. So if the Cannon substitute has a majority, then everybody else that might have an amendment or a thought—such as the Senator from Alabama who wishes to address this sleeper that he just found, that has been kind of slipped in here, that the Senate has not had a chance to express itself on yet, and that the Senate did express itself at one time—that would not come up, any other provision that might come up in regard to what the Senator from Florida has labored and perhaps belabored too long for a lot of people, that could not come up?

The Senator would be out on his amendment.

It seems to the Senator from Florida that the only sort of protection one has if he has any kind of feeling that maybe there ought to be some other legitimate vote on an amendment of this, would be that we do not come to a vote right now because we would be wiped out.

If that be the case, I just wanted the Senator from Alabama to know that I am prepared to kind of stand with him for a little while.

I want to be in Florida for the September primary and I want to be down there maybe before that.

Mr. ALLEN. Well, that is fine. The Senator can absent himself all he wants to and he will still be standing with the Senator from Alabama because it takes a definite number of affirmative votes to bring this issue to a vote.

Mr. CHILES. Yes.

Mr. ALLEN. So if the Senator wants to go to Florida, that will be all right, because his absence would be a vote against what is being sought to be done here.

The Senator has been voting along pretty well, as I noticed, with the steamroller here, but he did have a very fine amendment and it came very close to being adopted.

They do not want to run that risk again. They do not want the Senator from Florida to come in again with another amendment, because it might pass this time.

But, of course, if it had passed, I will say to the Senator from Florida, they could have left it outside, outside the Chamber, just like they are seeking to leave the amendment of the Senator from Oregon and the Senator from Tennessee, they are seeking to leave that out.

So the Senator could not win if he had won. He could not have won if he got his amendment adopted, because this ploy would have wiped the Senator out even after the Senate had spoken on the issue.

All is not lost. I feel confident that on a motion to table the Cranston amendment, which would carry with it the substitute of the Senator from Nevada, I feel reasonably confident that such a motion to table would, in all likelihood, carry, because I do not believe Members of the Senate——

Mr. CHILES. Does the Senator feel confident enough that we should have a vote on that this week or——

Mr. ALLEN. On a motion to table?

Mr. CHILES. Yes.

Mr. ALLEN. Well, I am not sure.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Will the Senator from Alabama yield?

Mr. ALLEN. I yield for a question.

Mr. PACKWOOD. It is a position that I agree with. I am going to be here tonight with the Senator from Alabama. I believe there are many things wrong with this bill. We have the situation the Senator raised about the trade associations, as to whether they are in or out, or what can they do.

The Senator from Maryland (Mr. MATHIAS) has increased the Commission to eight, which may be fine.

We have a situation where two people from a political party can veto what was a six-man commission and now we are not sure what the status is with eight.

I would be reluctant to table this too soon until we at least can have discussion on a variety of these other problems.

I agree with the Senator from Alabama and the Senator from Florida, that we should discuss his amendment again, where we are so close.

I think it would be unfortunate for this amendment to pass, which, as the Senator has indicated, would eliminate the major point, which would require unions and corporations to disclose how they spend their money.

I will be here for as many hours as the Senator from Alabama would like to stay tonight.

Mr. STEVENS. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not intend to be here that long. I had a simple amendment which really dealt with something that I think is a terrible thing which has come out of this Election Commission. These reports are prepared for candidates by volunteers who in good faith try to comply with the law. They come in here and they are looked over meticulously by people who are employed to do that. I do not argue with them. That is their job. But I do think there ought to be some good-faith compliance concept to stop this nit-picking that has been going on about these reports.

I know of one instance, for instance, where a person was listed with his business address as an accounting partnership and his occupation was listed as partner by the volunteer who prepared it. Anyone who looks at it knows the man is an accountant or a partner in an accounting firm. It was sent back to have the whole thing typed over, because it did not comply with the law.

I am not being critical of the Secretary of the Senate or of FEC. The law is very, very rigid in that area.

We worked out an amendment on what I call the best effort, the good faith compliance effort, which I have been waiting to offer. I do not see any reason why it should be shut off. This is the time now, before all of these candidates find that they lose their volunteer help, because people who are employed to go over these reports—and again they are doing their job under the law—are given such rigid instructions that they are not permitted to accept good faith compliance with the intent of Congress and the basic law, under which we are operating.

Some of us are leaving on a trip to go talk about a great project, the Alaska pipeline, in our neighboring country this evening. I happen to be going to Canada in about 45 minutes. I want to know if the Senator intends to raise this motion to table tonight. If he is, I will stay, because I want to assist him in some way to restore the position where I can offer this amendment. But if he is not, I am going to tend to my business for my State which takes me to Canada.

Mr. ALLEN. I will state to the distinguished Senator from Alaska that I do not know at this time. I am rather hopeful that the proponents of this maneuver will see the error of their ways and withdraw this effort to lock in the Senate. I am hopeful that that will take place. Even if the motion to table should lose, it would still be open for further discussion. That would just bring it to a head a little bit quicker.

Mr. STEVENS. Will the Senator yield for a further question?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes.

Mr. STEVENS. It is my understanding that the Senator would see to it that we will have a slightly extended conversation about this bill until we return on Monday so that we might be able to address the matter again next week as far as these perfecting amendment are concerned?

Mr. ALLEN. I have no desire to discuss the bill at length. As a matter of fact, I have been willing to agree on a time limit, because I do think it is essential that we reconstitute this Commission. What I object to is the use of a power play to cut the Senate off, to cut off 100 Members of the Senate from offering amendments.

We have many constructive amendments. I was telling of another amendment that I have, which I think is very constructive. As a matter of fact, I am sure the distinguished floor manager of the bill would not object to my saying that I had cleared this amendment with him and he agreed that the amendment had merit.

What it does is to allow a membership corporation or a corporation without capital stock but with membership, a cooperative, a membership organization, to set up a separate segregated fund. I do not have any group in mind, particularly, that I feel would want to contribute to any particular candidate, but I do feel they ought to have the same right as corporations.

Take, for example, a local REA, which has possibly hundreds or thousands of members but which does not have any capital stock. They could not set up a separate fund and solicit contributions to that separate fund from their members.

The amendment I have would allow cooperatives, nonstock corporations, and membership organizations to set up the same type of segregated fund as a corporation with stock and stockholders or labor organizations.

Why should they be prevented from setting up funds? They are as interested in good government as the corporations with stock and stockholders and labor organizations. The distinguished manager of the bill, the chairman of the Rules Committee, agreed that there was merit in that suggestion. If I had just been given a little more time I would have been able to get that amendment agreed to.

I do not know whether it would have been one of those select amendments, however, that was chosen to go into the final substitute. They picked and chose there. The 50 Senators who voted for the Packwood-Brock amendment were given the cold shoulder. They were not allowed to have their amendment included in the substitute. But everybody else had his amendment agreed to with the door closed to constructive amendments like the amendment of the distinguished Senator from Florida (Mr. CHILES). The Senate ought to be allowed to work its will on this bill.

Who can say that this bill, as it is now contained in this last substitute, is the best bill that the Senate can work out? I do not believe it is. It falls far short.

I will say this: This provision lifting the ceiling on honoraria would be locked in. There is no way in the world to change that as far as this bill is concerned.

What we are doing unquestionably is moving this bill to a veto. I do not see why we are moving headlong down a dead end.

I do not believe the President would approve of these strongarm tactics that are being used to cut off amendments. That is exactly what is being done.

I believe he would see the merit of allowing nonstock corporations, cooperatives and membership organizations to set up segregated political funds and allow solicitations of the members of such organizations for contributions to that fund.

I believe there are many other injustices contained in the bill.

I believe all we are doing is spinning our wheels if we are locked out from offering further amendments when the desks are full of printed amendments, and many Senators have written or unprinted amendments on their desk.

Of course, one amendment begets another amendment, so if we are allowed to work our will here, I think there is a good chance we would be able to move on and finally come up with a bill that the Senate can pretty generally agree upon. But not if 50 Senators are going to be slapped in the face, on an amendment that has been adopted by the Senate, and it is not included in the bill, when that amendment has passed and its reconsideration voted down, and it supposedly was locked into the bill, but here comes an effort to discard that and, in effect, to reconsider the matter.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may suggest the absence of a quorum without losing my right to the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ALLEN. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, after consultation with the——

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I believe the Senator from Alabama has the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama has the floor.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Will the Senator from Alabama yield without losing his right to the floor?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes. I ask unanimous consent that I may yield to the distinguished Senator from Michigan without losing my right to the floor, and without the continuation of my remarks constituting a second speech.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I thank the Senator from Alabama.

After a good deal of consultation among the manager of the bill, the ranking member of the Committee on Rules and Administration, the majority leader, the majority whip, and others, we understand that it is going to be impossibile to finish this bill tonight; therefore, it seems to be in the interest of the Senate that I should withdraw the substitute that is now pending and go back to square 1, and it is understood that we will take up this measure again next week, as I understand it.

So because of that and with that understanding, Mr. President, I withdraw the substitute that I offered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STONE). The amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. MANSFIELD. As I understand it, the two amendments that were offered to it, the Cannon amendment and the Cranston amendment, would fall, because of the withdrawal of the underlying amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I thank the Chair. I thank the Senator from Alabama.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I am delighted that this solution of this problem and parliamentary situation has been worked out and amicably agreed to.

As I understand the situation, when we next consider this bill we will have before us a clean bill with all of the amendments which the Senator has agreed to add to the bill and that it will be open to further amendment. Is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. ALLEN. And any Senator would have a right, then, to offer an amendment if he should be able to get recognition from the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. ALLEN. Very well.

AMENDMENT NO. 1496

Mr. ALLEN. I call up then my amendment No. 1496.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Alabama (Mr. ALLEN) proposes an amendment No. 1496:

On page 37, line 13, before the period insert the following: ", or by a membership organization, cooperative, or corporation without capital stock".

On page 38, line 3, after the period insert the following: "This paragraph shall not prevent a membership organization, cooperative, or corporation without capital stock, or a separate segregated fund established by a membership organization, cooperative, or corporation without capital stock, from soliciting contributions to such a fund from members of such organization, cooperative, or corporation without capital stock.".

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, all this amendment does is to cure an omission in the bill. It would allow corporations that do not have stock but have a membership organization, such as a cooperative or other corporations without capital stock and, hence, without stockholders, to set up separate segregated political funds as to which it can solicit contributions from its membership; since it does not have any stockholders to solicit, it should be allowed to solicit its members. That is all that the amendment provides. It does cover an omission in the bill that I believe all agree should be filled.

I have talked to the distinguished manager of the bill and I think I am correct in saying that he agrees to the adoption of the amendment.

I yield to the distinguished Senator from Nevada.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, the Senator has discussed that amendment with me. I think it covers a void that is not present in the bill and certainly is proper and should give those organizations the same opportunity that we have given to other organizations in the bill, and I am willing to accept the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama (Mr. ALLEN).

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I am delighted to have this amendment agreed to. It is an important amendment.

I have other amendments that I am not going to offer tonight, and one is, as I say, to amend the bill so as not to lift the ceilings on honorariums and to eliminate that repeal.

I might state, further, that the mere acceptance of this amendment that I have offered would in no way indicate that if a similar parliamentary situation is presented, whereby amendments are not in order and amendments are cut off, the Senator from Alabama would, of course, feel free to discuss any such effort at length.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, will the Senator be willing to yield to me for a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. ALLEN. I am willing to yield the floor.

ORDER TO NOT PRINT AMENDMENTS

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Cannon substitute, the Cranston amendment, and the Griffin substitute last offered not be required to be printed in the RECORD in accordance with the rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER AUTHORIZING PRINTING OF H.R. 3065 AS AMENDED

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill in its amended form now be printed as a clean copy. Before there is a ruling on that request, I point out that if that is done there are some amendments at the desk and some Senators might want to revise their amendments then to get them fitted in at the proposed proper place.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. ALLEN. Of course, the bill as amended and as reprinted would be subject to amendment.

Mr. CANNON. Certainly, of course.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR PRINTING OF S. 3065 IN ENGROSSED FORM

Mr. CANNON subsequently said: Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill S. 3065, as amended, be printed as if it were in engrossed form for the use of the Senate when next it considers the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER AUTHORIZING SECRETARY OF THE SENATE TO MAKE TECHICAL CHANGES IN H.R. 3065 AS AMENDED

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Secretary of the Senate be permitted to make technical changes that are necessary to conform the bill in its present form as so amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, I address myself to the point that Senator ALLEN raised. The reason that section 616 was stricken in the bill, as it came out, was because the same language was rewritten with some changes elsewhere in the bill. So it was not just a question of eliminating section 616 and doing nothing. When section 616 was eliminated there was a rewriting of that provision with some modifications in the bill as the Committee on Rules and Administration reported it.

Then the distinguished Senator from Arizona (Mr. GOLDWATER) offered amendments this morning that, in effect, resulted in the deletion of section 616.

Mr. ALLEN. Yes. I am glad the distinguished Senator brought that up.

When the Senate knocked out the substitute language earlier today it just left the repealer of the entire section there. So as things now stand both the House of Representatives and the Senate have a provision here in this election bill that does lift the ceiling on the amount of honoraria that Federal officers and officials can receive in the course of a year. What the amendment of the Senator from Alabama would do would be just to knock out this inoffensive looking figure, section 616, which has a whole lot in it; however, that should not be there.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ALLEN. I yield.

Mr. CANNON. Let me just make one correction. The House, it is true, eliminated 616 in their proposed bill, but they in turn rewrote section 616 precisely as it was. It is now designated as section 327 in the House bill. So the House did not just eliminate 616 and do nothing. They rewrote 616 at a different place in the bill and entitled it section 327.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator is correct. The trouble is that that is not before the Senate. The way things now stand, all that is present now in the Senate bill is the repealer.

Mr. CANNON. No. In the House proposal, H.R. 12406, there still is the language on honoraria, the same language as in section 616 of the present law.

Mr. ALLEN. That is correct. I readily acknowledge what we are operating on, though, is the Senate bill, which is going to be substituted for the House bill, I assume.

Mr. CANNON. That may be; but the House bill, H.R. 12406, still has that provision in it. That has not been deleted.

Mr. ALLEN. But it also has the repealer of 616; but adds comparable language as section 327.

Mr. CANNON. That is correct.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield the floor?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia is recognized.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Has the amendment been agreed to?

Mr. CANNON. The Senator's previous amendment was agreed to. He just talked about the amendment related to 616, and that is controversial. Senator GOLDWATER is opposed to it.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the pending measure now be set aside until Monday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

CONSIDERATION OF CERTAIN MEASURES ON THE CALENDAR

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the following three measures, which have been cleared on both sides of the aisle: Calendar No. 669, Calendar No. 670, and Calendar No. 671.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

INSTALLATION OF CERTAIN FLAGPOLES ON THE CAPITOL GROUNDS

The bill (S. 3161) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior, with the approval of the Architect of the Capitol, to locate flagpoles on the U.S. Capitol Grounds in order to fly the flag of each of the States of the United States, and its territories and possessions, was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, subject to the approval of the Architect of the

The effective date of any such regulations shall be no later than 2 years after the date such regulations are published as a final order in the Federal Register.

Mr. MOSS. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. MOSS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Secretary of the Senate be authorized to make technical and clerical corrections in the engrossment of S. 641.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MOSS. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment to the title and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

Amend the title so as to read:

"A bill to regulate commerce and protect consumers from adulterated food by requiring the establishment of safety assurance procedures and safety assurance standards, to provide for the effective enforcement of the Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act, to implement registration of food processing establishments, to provide for more informative labeling of food products, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to amend the title.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MOSS. Mr. President, I thank the following Senators for their assistance in the handling and expedition of this legislation: Mr. PEARSON, Mr. BEALL, Mr. JAVITS, Mr. KENNEDY, Mr. HART of Michigan, Mr. MAGNUSON, Mr. WILLIAMS and Mr. HATHAWAY, for the particular efforts and spirit that he put forth in this debate and in the amendment to the bill.

I would also like to thank the joint leadership for bringing this bill up so expeditiously. It has been passed before, but in passing it this early in the session we well may see it enacted into law during this Congress.

TIME-LIMITATION AGREEMENT—SENATE RESOLUTION 406

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that on Senate Resolution 406, "The importance of sound relations with the Soviet Union," there be a time limitation of 1 hour, to be equally divided between Mr. CRANSTON and Mr. BAKER.

BYRD, JR.; that there be a time limitation on any amendment thereto of 30 minutes; that there be a time limitation on any debatable motion, appeal, or point of order if such is submitted to the Senate of 20 minutes, and that the agreement be in the usual form.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR YEAS AND NAYS ON SENATE RESOLUTION 406

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that it be in order to order the yeas and nays at this time on Senate Resolution 406.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HARRY C. BYRD, JR. Will the Senator from West Virginia yield?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I yield.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Could I ask the Senator from West Virginia if he would communicate with the Senator from Virginia before time agreements are sought on the Foreign Assistance Act? I understand that bill has been reported today. It is not yet on the calendar.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Yes. The Senator has that assurance.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. I have no plans to hold it up in any way at all, but I would like to have adequate opportunity to study the committee report and the report is not yet available.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 184—AMENDMENT OF THE REGIONAL RAIL ORGANIZATION ACT OF 1973 REORGANIZATION

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I have been asked by the Senator from Indiana (Mr. HARTKE) to ask for the immediate consideration of a joint resolution which, I understand, has been cleared on both sides of the aisle, which I now send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be stated by title.

The legislative read as follows:

A joint resolution to amend the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973, as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Senate will proceed to its immediate consideration, and, without objection, the joint resolution will be considered to have been read the second time at length.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a statement by Mr. HARTKE in explanation of the joint resolution.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF SENATOR HARTKE

EXPLANATION OF JOINT RESOLUTION

Section 1 would change section 306 (c) of the Regional Rail Reorganization Act by changing the phrase "without regard to" to "adjusted to reflect" in order to accurately describe the process of making adjustments to reflect any stock splits and similar transactions that might occur after the time of the distribution of the securities pursuant to the provisions of the Act.

Section 2 would apply the same adjustment formula to common stock under Section 306 (c) (3) (B) as applies to Series B Preferred Stock under Section 306(c)(3)(A). This amendment would correct an inadvertent omission in the present clause (B).

Section 3 is addressed to the third sentence of Section 301(e)(2) of the Act, which states: "As a condition of its investment in the Corporation, the Association may require that the Corporation adopt limitations consistent with the final system plan on the circumstances under which dividends on the series B preferred stock and common stock are payable so long as any of the debentures or series A preferred stock are outstanding." While this sentence is essentially a "preemption" provision it could be construed to preclude issuance, without an order of the Special Court, of series B preferred stock and common stock in a greater amount than either seemingly authorized or contemplated for issuance in the plan.

Sec. 4. Section 102(3) of the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973, as amended, is amended by inserting between "Act" and "," the phrase "or its successor by merger, consolidation or other form of succession carried out under applicable law for the purpose of changing the State of its incorporation.".

Sec. 5. Section 501(2) of the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973, as amended, is amended by inserting after the words "or to an acquiring railroad", the world "or to a State pursuant to section 208(d)(2) of this Act".

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution is open to amendment. If there be no amendments to be proposed, the question is on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution (S.J. Res. 184) was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed, as follows:

S.J. RES. 184

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 102(3) of the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973, as amended, is amended by inserting after "Act" the phrase "or its successor by merger, consolidation or other form of succession carried out under applicable law for the purpose of changing the state of its incorporation".

SEC. 2. Subparagraph (A) of paragraph 3 of section 306(c) of the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973, as amended, is amended by striking "without regard to" and by inserting in lieu thereof "adjusted to reflect".

SEC. 3. Subparagraph (B) of paragraph 3 of section 306(c) of the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"(B) the number of shares of common stock determined by dividing the total number of shares of common stock distributed pursuant to section 303(c)(4) of this Act to the transferor receiving such series of certificates of value (adjusted to reflect any stock splits, stock combinations, reclassifications, or similar transactions affecting the number of shares of outstanding common stock following the date of distribution pursuant to section 303(c)(4) of this title) by the total number of certificates of value in the series so distributed to such transferor.".

SEC. 4. Paragraph (2) of subsection (e) of section 301 of the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973, as amended, is amended by adding thereto the following sentence:

"Notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the final system plan, the initial authorized number of shares of series B preferred stock may be 35,000,000, and the Corporation may issue initially for the purpose of the deposit required under section 303(a)(1) of this Act such numbers of shares of series B preferred and common stock as the Association shall certify to the Special Court pursuant to section 209(c)(1)(3) of this Act, including any modifications in such numbers of shares as may be ordered by the Special Court for the purpose of, and in connection with, such deposit and certification.".

SEC. 5. Section 501(2) of the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973, as amended, is amended by striking "or to an acquiring railroad" and inserting in lieu thereof ", to an acquiring railroad, or to a State pursuant to section 208(d)(2) of this Act".

REMOVAL OF INJUNCTION OF SECRECY—EXECUTIVE G, 94TH CONGRESS, 2D SESSION

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, as in executive session, I ask unanimous consent that the injunction of secrecy be removed from the Convention on Registration of Objects Launched Into Outer Space, signed by the United States at New York on January 24, 1975—Executive G, 94th Congress, 2d session—transmitted to the Senate today by the President of the United States, and that the treaty with accompanying papers be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed, and that the President's message be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SPARKMAN). Without objection, it is so ordered.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

To the Senate of the United States:

With a view to receiving the advice and consent of the Senate to ratification, I transmit herewith the Convention on Registration of Objects Launched Into Outer Space, opened for signature at New York on January 14, 1975. For the information of the Senate the report of the Department of State concerning the Convention is also transmitted.

The Convention is designed to provide the international community with a central and public registry of objects launched into outer space. Pursuant to this Convention launching States would be required to submit certain information to the U.N. Secretary-General regarding objects which they launched into outer space. The Convention builds on the foundation of a voluntary system of notification to the Secretary-General of the United Nations by U.N. Member States of objects they have launched. That voluntary system has now been observed for more than a decade.

The Registration Convention is an appropriate addition to the Outer Space Treaty, the Astronaut Rescue Agreement, and the Liability Convention. The Senate gave its consent to these earlier treaties in the field of space activities by unanimous vote. I hope that, at an early date, the Senate will also give its strong endorsement to this latest Convention.

ENERGY CONSERVATION IN BUILDINGS ACT OF 1975

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, on behalf of Mr. PROXMIRE, I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate a message from the House of Representatives on H.R. 8650, an act to assist low-income persons in insulating their homes, to facilitate State and local adoption of energy conservation standards for new buildings, and to direct the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development to undertake research and to develop energy conservation performance standards.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr.

SENATE FLOOR DEBATES ON S. 3065

MARCH 22, 1976

may cause the kind of diabetes that attacks youngsters. If so, it may be possible to screen genetically-susceptible children and vaccinate them.

The basic cause of diabetes, however, isn't yet known. Diabetics are unable to properly metabolize the sugar they eat, leading to dangerously high blood-sugar levels, either because they don't produce enough sugar-regulating insulin or because of some other reason. Today, a common treatment is injection of insulin. In the future, pancreas transplants, or transplants of the specific pancreas cells responsible for sugar metabolism, could be more efficient. Current research also is aiming at the development of an artificial insulin-releasing pancreas.

Aging: In 2000, the average life will probably be only a few years longer than at present. But the biological mechanisms of aging will be better understood, and this will make geriatrics more useful as a medical specialty. In fact, geriatrics will be booming, with 28 million Americans over the age of 65 against 22 million today. As a major part of their job, geriatricians will use a wide variety of treatments and procedures, many of which now are available but underemployed, to delay the symptoms of senility.

Mental ailments: The split between those who believe that mental illness reflects chemical abnormalities in the brain and those who believe that mental illness is essentially of non-biochemical origin will still exist in 2000. Whatever the truth, many many drugs today do alleviate the outward symptoms of mental illness to permit psychiatric treatment and encourage "normal" behavior. If mental illness is chemically based, then the illness itself might be treatable by drugs, too.

On the other hand, some mental or emotional disorders may disappear simply because notions of what is normal and abnormal may change. Homosexuality and even certain psychoses have been accepted by some physicians and psychiatrists as natural and healthy, if not always socially acceptable.

Prosthetics: Researchers recently have reported successes with computer-controlled electronic devices, implanted in the brain, that transmit signals allowing totally blind persons to "see" Braille letters and read them. Advanced versions, by 2000, may be able to transmit video-like images of the outside world, perhaps from tiny camera-transmitters in the blind person's eye sockets. And similar audio devices implanted in the inner ear could permit deaf persons to understand normal speech.

An electrode that can detect human nerve impulses already has been developed. With refined engineering, the Harvard medical school scientists who designed it believe, it may be used to link severed nerves and reverse paralysis. It would also make possible direct brain control of electrically driven artificial arms, legs and other prosethetic devices.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The second assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

PRIVILEGE OF THE FLOOR—SENATE RESOLUTION 406

Mr. CRANSTON. I ask unanimous consent that both William Jackson and Murray Flander of my staff may have the privileges of the floor throughout the consideration of Senate Resolution 406, and from now until that measure comes up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CRANSTON. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The second assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SENATOR MIKE MANSFIELD

Mr. SYMINGTON. Mr. President, much has been said about the character and ability of the gentleman who has guided our destiny on this floor longer than anyone in the history of the United States.

One of our outstanding towns in Missouri, Warrensburg, has a paper, the Daily Star-Journal, which in its editorials consistently hits the nail on the head.

I ask unanimous consent that this editorial about a man we all respect, and to whom we are all devoted, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Warrensburg (Mo.) Daily Star-Journal, Mar. 11, 1976]

SENATOR MIKE MANSFIELD

Since Sen. Mike Mansfield announced his retirement recently, the reaction to it has been noteworthy. It has taken only one direction. Remarks by congressional leaders of both parties and comments by members of the media about the man have been laced with superlatives.

Emphasis has been placed on the manner in which he handled his job as he related personally to those with whom he dealt.

Early in his 15-year tenure as Senate majority leader, longest in the Senate's history, he gained the respect of all members of Congress and of those in the executive branch. It has remained this way, even with his adversaries. And being a man of principle, he has not been without them. In the hard-hitting world of politics sustained respect is the exception, not the rule.

Time magazine called him "easily the Senate's coolest elder statesman," adding, "he is legendary for almost never having lost his temper. . . . He changed the nature of the Senate."

James Reston of the New York Times said, ". . . he got ahead by giving up . . . he never allowed personal differences to overwhelm issues of principle."

Because of the kind of man he is, he became a counselor to many, regardless of party affiliation. Frequently he has been sought out by congressional members and others with personal problems. His humanism toward all people and his evenness of temperament create a magnetism which doesn't require what is typically thought of as the kind of charisma which attracts others.

Widespread regret is felt over Sen. Mansfield's leaving the Washington scene. Probably more so by those who are remaining on it than anyone else. His steadying influence, graciousness and wise ways provide sorely needed attributes among his colleagues.

Yet his decision to retire at the age of 73 is perhaps another indication of his wisdom. Others on Capitol Hill have made the mistake of staying too long.

Senator Mike Mansfield has served the nation exceptionally well. We need more men in government like him.

LAMAR, MO., STUDENTS BUILD SOLAR FURNACE

Mr. SYMINGTON. Mr. President, one positive and promising result of our fuel shortages problems has been the increased effort at the grassroots level to develop alternative energy sources which can reduce our reliance on fossil fuels. We depend on Government and industry to conduct these research and development programs, but private citizens around the country also provide encouraging reports of projects and experiments which may some day supply some of our fuel needs.

Among the most promising of the energy options included in long-range plans is solar power. Today, solar technology is particularly well suited for decentralized application in individual homes and buildings.

The ultimate potential of solar power for large-scale heating and cooling is, as yet, undetermined, but I would like to bring to the attention of the Senate the activities of the Lamar, Mo., High School science students who, with the support of their teacher, have designed and constructed a solar furnace.

Made of such surplus scrap items as an old ice cream storage freezer, part of a hay bin, and crushed glass, the Lamar High School solar furnace is now heating some school rooms which previously were without heat and therefore unused.

Science teacher Ralph Williston and his students are to be commended for an innovative approach to the study of scientific principles while at the same time providing a practical, usable heating system.

I ask unanimous consent that an article from the St. Louis Post-Dispatch describing Lamar High School's new solar furnace be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, Mar. 14, 1976]

STUDENTS AT LAMAR, MO., DEVELOP SOLAR FURNACE

LAMAR, Mo., March 13.—Using such things as an old ice cream storage freezer, crushed glass, part of a hay bin and other improvisations, the students in Ralph Williston's science classes at Lamar High School here have created a solar furnace that's become a hot topic.

"They say necessity is the mother of invention," Williston explains, "We had a few vacant school rooms without heat, so we decided to build a solar furnace. Now those romso are warm and usable."

Williston is thinking in terms of a patent for what he and his students have developed because it has a parabolic collector to focus the rays of the sun and he thinks it is more efficient than the flat surfaces used in other solar heating systems.

The collector is not the only oddity on the roof of the high school in this southwest Missouri town of 3760 persons. Williston and the students in his advanced physics and chemistry classes have also built a wind generator and a celestial observatory. They have a radar scanner to work with.

"This has been our most ambitious project," Williston said of the solar furnace. "We managed to get the public involved because we needed donations. Now we have people coming every day to look at it."

The solar furnace cost $1200. Modifying and perfecting it in future experiments may bring the price tag near $2000.

"We should be able to turn it into an air conditioner during the summer," Williston said, "but that's just one of a hundred experiments we have in mind."

Students cut apart a metal hay bin to make the parabolic collector. They electroplated a mirror-like surface onto sheets of metal to line the concave surface.

The sun's rays are bounced onto a finned coil that runs the 12-foot length of the parabola, and the heat is transferred to a half-and half mixture of water and antifreeze which is pumped through the coil.

The pump also pulls the heated mixture through another coil system that is embedded in two tons of crushed glass inside the old ice cream freezer box, and the glass becomes the depository for the heat.

A blower and another transfer system send warm air through ducts into the previously unheated school rooms.

On recent winter days, the temperature at the focal point of the parabolic reflector had reached 300 degrees. The projected plan is to keep the temperature of the glass about the same on winter days, with the idea that it will go no lower than 200 degrees during the hours of darkness when the circulating pump is shut off.

On cloudy and cold days, the collector is covered with a plexiglass shield that traps an extra ration of the sun's ultraviolet rays.

"It's a hothouse effect, like getting a sunburn on a cloudy day or a closed car that gets much hotter inside than out," Williston explained.

On a hot summer day, Williston estimates that the temperature at the local point may reach 1,000 degrees.

"One student figured out we could use excess steam from the system to generate electricity, so we're going to try it," Williston said.

Lamar has become almost as involved in the solar furnace projects as Williston's students. Individuals, organizations and businesses have supplied the money for the motors, the pumps, the wiring, the switches and the pipes that the youngsters have put together.

"This has been their recreation," Williston said. "The kids come before school, after school, even on weekends. I think this is the best way to teach."

FEDERAL ELECTION CAMPAIGN ACT AMENDMENTS OF 1976—S. 3065

Mr. CANNON. Over the weekend, there have been various reports in the press of statements by the President of the United States that Congress is retreating from its commitment to clean and fair elections, with an accompanying threat to veto any campaign bill that went beyond a simple extension of the major powers of the Federal Election Commission. Such a simple extension of the Commission has been proposed here as a substitute to S. 3065, and the Senate has twice rejected this approach on the first rollcall vote of 46 to 47 and a subsequent roll call vote of 39 to 55.

I would like to take a few moments at this time to clarify the record as to who appears to be retreating from a commitment to clean and fair elections, and to stress the importance of the approval of S 3065, as it has been amended here in the Senate. As we all know, one of the most severe impacts of the Supreme Court's decision on the Federal election laws was the ending of any limitation on expenditures, particularly on independent expenditures made by persons or political committees unconnected or unaffiliated with candidates and their campaigns.

Mr. President, without S. 3065, there will be limited information and disclosure to the public of the independent expenditures which will clearly be made in vast sums of money to elect, and in many cases to defeat, specific candidates for Federal office. S. 3065 will require detailed reporting of these expenditures as well as conspicuous disclosure of the source of expenditures to support or oppose candidates in the public media. These are proposals necessitated by the nature of the Supreme Court's decision and represent another positive step toward fair and clean elections.

It is difficult to understand why the President and his party opposes this type of legislation.

If a simple extension of the Commission is adopted, as proposed by the President and his party, political committees will be able to transfer unlimited sums of money to any other political committee, so long as the funds are not earmarked for any particular candidate, and such concentrated sums of money will then be available to be injected into political campaigns in unlimited amounts as independent expenditures to elect or defeat certain candidates for Federal office. S. 3065 will put reasonable limits on such transfers of money and it is difficult to understand why the President and his party oppose such legislation.

Under existing law, there is an accelerating proliferation of political committees being organized by corporate divisions and subsidiaries as well as by labor unions and locals. The obvious danger to the integrity of our campaign process is the unacceptable possibility that each of these political committees, whether formed by a corporation subsidiary or labor union local, would then each be able to qualify to make the maximum $5,000 contributions per particular candidate per election. This is certainly contrary to the intent of Congress in permitting the formation of political action committees by corporations and labor organizations, and will result in an increase of money into political campaigns, rather than a curtailment which was the purpose of this legislation. S. 3065 would not limit the number of political committees that corporations or labor organizations could set up through their divisions or labor union locals, but it would curtail the proliferation of political committee contributions to candidates, and I emphasize, Mr. President, that this curtailment would apply to unions as well as corporations.

It is difficult to understand why the President and his party oppose such a measure.

Under existing law, only corporations are permitted to provide a checkoff for the voluntary contributions to their political action committees. S. 3065 would make this available to a labor union in a situation where a corporation had decided to institute such a procedure. This is only equitable and it is hard to see why the President and his party oppose this type of legislation.

Existing law has been interpreted to permit corporations to create comprehensive programs to solicit every employee of those corporations for contributions to corporate political action committees over which the employee has no control. This is in addition to the corporation's statutory right to solicit stockholders for their volutary contributions to the same political action committees. Of course, under the statute, labor organizations are permitted to solicit their union members for contributions to labor union political action committees. As has been pointed out here on the floor during the debate on S. 3065, there is an enormous potential for coercion in a situation where a corporation is permitted to solicit all of its employees for such contributions, but in addition to this potential for coercion, it must be remembered and emphasized that stockholders who are being solicited, can vote out the corporate management who is doing the solicitation if they do not agree with it or if they do not agree with the contributions made from the political committees.

By the same token, the union members are in a position to vote out the union management with which it disagrees. However, employees of a corporation have no such resourse and should not be subject to political solicitation by their employers to such an all encompassing extent as has been interpreted under existing law by the Federal Election Commission.

Mr. President, S. 3065 would impose a reasonable limitation on this solicitation, limiting the employees whom a corporation could solicit to the salaried employees who have policymaking or supervisory responsibilities. It is difficult to see why the President and his party oppose such reasonable legislation.

Under existing law, every violation of the Federal election campaign laws is a criminal act and the Federal Election Commission has extremely limited civil enforcement powers at the present time. S. 3065 would provide criminal penalties for willful and knowing violations of the law of a substantive nature, and civil penalties and immediate disclosure of violations for less substantial infractions of the campaign finance laws. At the same time, S. 3065 would give the Commission expanded civil enforcement powers including the power to ask the court for imposition of civil fines for such violations as, for example, the negligent failure to file a particular report, as well as more substantial civil fines for willful and knowing violations of the act. The bill would grant the exclusive civil enforcement of the act to the Commission to avoid confusion and overlapping with the Department of Justice, but at the same time, retain the jurisdiction of the Department of Justice for the criminal prosecution of any violations of this act. Mr. President, I cannot understand why the President and his party oppose such legislation.

It is clear that there are differences of opinion between the Congress and the President, but I would like to suggest that the President's proposal for a simple extension of the Commission's powers is a totally inappropriate response at this time to the needs which this Congress must address in order to maintain the commitment, not only of the Congress and the President, but of the country to clean and fair elections. Contrary to what appears to be the President's current thinking, I would like to suggest that if the Senate does choose to approve no more than a simple extension of the Commission's powers, we can then be justly accused of retreating from our longstanding commitment to clean and fair elections. We have twice rejected that approach and have worked hard to make S. 3065 a bill which we can all accept. I hope we can continue to work hard to make such further improvements in S. 3065 which will make it a bill we can send to the House in the near future.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Roddy, one of his secretaries.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

As in executive session, the Acting President pro tempore (Mr. CULVER) laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(The nominations received today are printed at the end of the Senate proceedings.)

REPORT ON THE INVESTIGATION AND STUDY OF THE WAR RISK INSURANCE PROGRAM OF THE DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORTATION—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore (Mr. CULVER) laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce:

To the Congress of the United States:

In accordance with Section 3 of Public Law 94–90, I am forwarding to the Congress a Report on the Investigation and Study of the War Risk Insurance Program of the Department of Transportation.

This Report states that the existing authority of the Secretary of Transportation under Title XIII of the Federal Aviation Act of 1958 should be expanded in certain respects. This Report will provide the basis for developing remedial legislation. Such legislation should authorize the Secretary of Transportation, after appropriate consultations with other Federal agencies and with the approval of the President, to provide insurance for international U.S. commercial aviation when such insurance is not available commercially and when it is necessary for the continuation of a particular required air service.

I transmit this Report for consideration by the Congress. The Department of Transportation will soon be transmitting implementing legislation.

ANNUAL REPORT OF THE NATIONAL SCIENCE FOUNDATION—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore (Mr. CULVER) laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare:

To the Congress of the United States:

I am pleased to submit to the Congress the Twenty-Fifth Annual Report of the National Science Foundation, covering fiscal year 1975.

Science and Technology have dramatically benefited our Nation and the world. During the NSF's first 25 years of operation, research supported by the National Science Foundation—particularly basic research in universities—has contributed much to our Nation's progress in science and technology. I expect the Foundation to continue this valuable contribution.

As this Annual Report shows, the programs of the National Science Foundation in 1975 addressed both the important search for new scientific knowledge and its use in solving society's pressing problems. Also, these programs continued to assist in meeting the Nation's need to train tomorrow's scientists and engineers. I commend this report to your attention.

My 1977 Budget now before the Congress recognizes the important role played by the National Science Foundation and assigns high priority to increases in Federal support of basic research. I urge Congressional approval of the proposed budget increases in the National Science Foundation.

BUDGET REQUESTS FOR RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT ACTIVITIES—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore (Mr. CULVER) laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was referred to the Committee on Aeronautical and Space Sciences, the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, the Committee on Appropriations, the Committee on Armed Services, the Committee on the Budget, the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, and the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare:

To the Congress of the United States:

The desire and the ability of the American people to seek and apply new knowledge have been crucial elements of the greatness of our country throughout its 200-year history.

Our Founding Fathers placed high value on the pursuit of knowledge and its application. They supported exploration, new methods of agriculture, the establishment of scientific societies and institutions of higher learning, measures to encourage invention, and means to protect and improve the Nation's health.

In our recent history, the Nation has made major investments in research and development activities to ensure their continued contribution to the growth of our economy, to the quality of our lives and to the strength of our defense. Today there is mounting evidence that science and technology are more important than ever before in meeting the many challenges facing us.

I fully recognize that this country's future—and that of all civilization as well—depends on nurturing and drawing on the creativity of men and women in our scientific and engineering community.

The 1977 Budget which I submitted to the Congress on January 21, 1976, is one measure of the importance I attach to a strong National effort in science and technology. My total budget restrains Federal spending to $395 billion—an increase of 5.5 percent over 1976. But my Budget requests $24.7 billion for the research and development activities of the various Federal agencies, an increase of 11 percent over my 1976 estimates. Included within this total of $24.7 billion is $2.6 billion for the support of basic research, also an increase of 11 percent. Such long-term exploratory research provides the new knowledge on which advances in science and technology depend. I urge the Congress to approve my budget requests.

I also urge the Congress to pass legislation to establish an Office of Science and Technology Policy in the Executive Office of the President. This will permit us to have closer at hand advice on the scientific, engineering and technical aspects of issues and problems that require attention at the highest levels of Government.

On June 9, 1975, I submitted a bill to the Congress that would authorize creation of such an office. The director of this new office would also serve as my adviser on science and technology, separating this responsibility from the many demands of managing an operating agency. On November 6, 1975, the House of Representatives passed an acceptable bill, H.R. 10230, which authorizes the new office. On February 4, 1976, the Senate passed a similar bill which, with some changes, would also be acceptable. Those bills are now awaiting action by a House-Senate Conference Committee. Early agreement by the conferees on a workable bill will permit me to proceed without further delay in establishing the Office of Science and Technology Policy.

In addition to its direct support of research and development, the Federal Government has a responsibility to ensure that its policies and programs stimulate private investments in science and technology and encourage innovation in all sectors of the economy—in industry, the universities, private foundations, small business, and State and local Governments. We pursue this objective through our tax laws, cooperative R&D projects with industry, and other incentives.

Industry and other elements of the private sector now support nearly 50 percent of the Nation's total research and development efforts and we must avoid displacing these important investments.

The role of industry is particularly important. In our competitive economic system, industry turns new ideas from laboratories into new and improved products and services and brings them to the marketplace for the Nation's consumers. Industry has built successfully on advanced developments of the past and provided new products and services of great economic and social value to the Nation. This can be seen in electronics, computers, aircraft, communications, medical services and many other areas.

My 1977 Budget gives special attention to research and development for energy and defense and to basic research. It also continues or increases support for other important areas such as agriculture, space, and health where research and development can make a significant contribution.

—In energy, an accelerated research and development program is vital to our future energy independence. My 1977 Budget proposes $2.6 billion for energy research and development—a 35 percent increase over 1976. These funds, together with the efforts of private industry, provide for a balanced program across the entire range of major energy technologies. Major increases are proposed in energy conservation to achieve greater energy efficiency. Additional funding is provided in fossil fuels to enhance oil and gas recovery, to improve the direct combustion of coal and to produce synthetic oil and gas from coal and oil shale. Expanded efforts are planned in 1977 to assure the safety and reliability of nuclear power and to continue the development of breeder reactors which will make our uranium resources last for centuries. My 1977 Budget also provides for rapid growth in programs to accelerate development of solar and geothermal energy and fusion power.

In defense, a strengthened and vigorous program of research and development is absolutely fundamental to maintain peace in the years ahead. Our National survival depends on our continued technological edge. The quality of our military R&D program today—and decisions on its scope and magnitude—will directly influence the balance of power in the 1980's and beyond. Obligations for defense research and development will increase by 13 percent in FY 1977, to almost $11 billion. In the strategic area, the defense R&D program provides for continued development of the Trident submarine and missile system and the B–1 bomber. We are providing increases for cruise missiles and for defining options for a new intercontinental ballistic missile system. For our tactical forces, we will pursue a number of major programs ranging from the F–16 and F–18 fighter aircraft to a new attack helicopter, improved air defense systems, and a new tank. In addition we will strengthen our military-related science and technology effort. The combat potential of new technologies such as high energy lasers will be actively explored.

—Through basic research, new knowledge is achieved that underlies all future progress in science and technology. My proposed budget provides an increase of 11 percent over my 1976 estimates to assure that the flow of new scientific discoveries continues. Since much of the Nation's basic research is carried out at colleges and universities, I have given special emphasis to the budget request for the National Science Foundation and other agencies that support research in these institutions. I have requested an increase of 20 percent in NSF's funding for basic research in order to underscore my strong support for such research, particularly in colleges and universities.

—In agriculture, improving the efficiency of American food production is vital to our National well-being and to help ease critical worldwide food shortages. My budget provides over $500 million for agricultural research including programs to increase crop yields, improve the nutrition and protein content of crops, and help find new and safer ways to protect crops from the devastating losses which are caused by pests and bad weather. Matching State funds for research at land-grant institutions will contribute an additional $400 million to the national effort. Within the agricultural research program, greater priority will be given to basic agricultural research which is the key to our longer range objectives in food production. Our agricultural research and research undertaken by others around the world can have a major effect on the world food situation for generations to come.

—In health, basic and applied medical research provides new knowledge about causes, prevention and cure of diseases. This knowledge will make it possible to reduce the toll of human suffering, reduce expensive medical treatments, and increase the general level of health of our people. For the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare alone my Budget requests over $1.2 billion to pursue new scientific opportunites relating to cancer, heart and lung disease, arthritis, diabetes, and behavioral disturbances. It will also continue research in emerging areas of National importance such as immunology, aging, environmental health, and health services.

—In space, the shuttle is the key to improved operational space capabilities for science, defense, and industry. My 1977 Budget provides the necessary funds to continue development of the shuttle and to assure a balanced program in science and space applications. In the future, space technologies can further advance our National and worldwide needs for better communications, better weather forecasting and better assessment and management of our natural resources. Scientific exploration and observation in space an add immeasurably to our understanding of the universe around us.

My Budget also provides funds for continued research and development in environment, natural resources, transportation, urban development, and other fields of social and economic activity where we will support work that shows promise in meeting the problems of society and the new challenges we face as a Nation.

Prompt and favorable action by the Congress on my proposal to create the new Office of Science and Technology Policy and to approve my 1977 Budget requests are vital to ensure that science, engineering and technology will continue to contribute effectively in achieving our Nation's objectives.

THE WHITE HOUSE, March 22, 1976.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL

A message from the President of the United States stated that on March 19, 1976, he had approved and signed the following act:

S. 2017. An act to amend the Drug Abuse Office and Treatment Act of 1972, and for other purposes.

MESSAGES FROM THE HOUSE

At 12:03 p.m., a message from the House of Representatives delivered by Mr. Berry, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House has passed the bill (H.R. 8532) to amend the Clayton Act to permit State attorneys general to bring certain antitrust actions, and for other purposes, in which it requests the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

The message also announced that the Speaker has signed the following enrolled bills:

H.R. 3427. An act to provide for the striking of medals in commemoration of the 200th anniversary of the signing of the Declaration of Independence of Charles Carroll of Carrollton.

H.R. 12128. An act to amend section 2 of the act of June 30, 1954, providing for the continuance of civil government for the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands, and for other purposes.

The enrolled bills were subsequently signed by the President pro tempore (Mr. EASTLAND).

At 4:29 p.m., a message from the House of Representatives delivered by Mr. Berry, announced that the House has passed the joint resolution (S.J. Res. 134)) to amend the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973, as amended, without amendment.

barrels of oil daily; under the proposed agreement the United States is expected to be eligible to receive 200,000 barrels a day (or 2 percent of its daily production). The Soviet Union ranks first among the world's oil producers. In fact, in 1974, for the first time, Russia's crude oil production surpassed United States production. In addition, the U.S.S.R. has an estimated 36 percent of the world's probable oil reserves and is a major natural gas producer.

Reportedly, the U.S.S.R. also has been importing oil from the Middle East at artifically low prices; this has enabled the exportation of petroleum to Eastern Europe to meet its commitments to these countries. This has provided the U.S.S.R. with an advantageous political position. However, demands for Russian petroleum by Eastern Europe are expected to increase during the next few years at a faster rate than increases in energy production.

In order for Russia to meet its commitment to the United States under the proposed energy agreement, it might well be possible that supplies would have to be diverted from Eastern Europe. The Soviet Union thus has expressed interest in the purchase of oil development and natural gas transmission equipment from the United States in order to develop new natural gas and oil supplies for export. At the present time, such energy exports are estimated to comprise over 50 percent of the U.S.S.R.'s hard currency income. In my judgment, the United States should not lightly convey such precious technological know-how and equipment to the U.S.S.R. when the return in petroleum imports is so small.

I believe that the United States should not become reliant on energy-rich U.S.S.R. for a sizeable fraction of our imported oil products. However, the U.S.S.R. does desire to acquire our technological know-how and hard currency. Therefore, the United States appears to be in a position to bargain from the advantageous position when negotiating the amounts and prices for Russian petroleum product imports.

Again I urge you to develop a firm and conditional policy link between the export of U.S. grain and national energy policies governing oil imports. I also suggest that your Department review the possibility of furnishing the Soviet Union with finished grain products rather than grain, itself, where possible. This would enable utilization of American industrial capacity as well as the demonstration of American capitalism in the U.S.S.R.

It is my hope that present negotiations with the Soviet Union on grain export and oil import agreements will produce more than another letter of intent; instead it should result in a binding agreement on sufficient Soviet petroleum supplies at reasonable prices to meet our requirements.

Your attention to these recommendations will be appreciated.

With best wishes, I am,

Truly,

JENNINGS RANDOLPH.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I rise to offer a word of explanation about my vote on the motion to recommit.

As my colleagues know, I was the principal cosponsor of this resolution. I spoke in opposition to several amendments because I felt that there should be a general statement of principle on the foreign and defense policies of the United States uttered as a sense of the Senate resolution in the midst of election time controversy. For that reason, I initially voted against referring this measure to the Committee on Foreign Relations, not because I do not have confidence in the Foreign Relations Committee, because I do. I once served on that committee and hopefully will serve on it again.

Rather, I thought time was of the essence and that if there was real utility and value to this sense-of-the-Senate resolution in expressing America's determination to remain strong, as the resolution stated, unchallengeably strong, and to have the courage to negotiate, as the resolution stated, in the face of our strength, then it needed to be said now.

Mr. President, in view of the determination by the Senate, which I accept in good grace, to refer it to the Foreign Relations Committee, and in view of the obvious controversy that the resolution developed—not upon the fundamental tenets of the resolution but as it devolved into a debate on the component parts of both defense and foreign policies and in view of the direction that it might have gone, to debates about weapons systems, to agricultural policy, and to immigration policy—it was made apparent to this Senator that the Senate today was not in a position to express a unified sense of its sentiment with respect to the fundamental and general tenets of foreign policy.

It was for that reason that I changed my vote on the motion to recommit and voted in favor of the motion to refer to the Committee on Foreign Relations, for I feel that in view of that controversy and in view of the changed nature of the debate to particular questions on special aspects of defense and foreign policy, instead of a timely general statement, the best interests of the Senate and the country would be served by referring it to the Foreign Relations Committee, which has now been done.

With that view, however, I felt it my obligation to report to my colleagues why I made that change and what my views are in that respect.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, inasmuch as there is nothing before the Senate, I ask unanimous consent that there be a brief period for the transaction of routine morning business, with statements therein limited to 5 minutes each.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

THE IMPORTANCE OF SOUND RELATIONS WITH THE SOVIET UNION

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I am delighted that there was general agreement in the Senate that the resolution should go to the Committee on Foreign Relations. The sponsors of the resolution should have guaranteed, when the resolution was submitted, that it go to the Committee on Foreign Relations, by merely allowing it to be assigned to the committee. But it seems to me that this vote in the Senate certainly indicates that there is great doubt, great skepticism, on the part of the American people with the policy of detente and with the policy of entering into agreements all the time that are one-sided, which require in many cases unilateral action on the part of the United States.

I believe that this issue, having been debated in the Senate, pointed the way to the referral of the resolution to the Committee on Foreign Relations, where it well could have been all along.

So, Mr. President, it seems to the Senator from Alabama that the people of this Nation want to see Russia take some overt step in their direction of disarmament, in the direction of working toward world peace, some overt action such as cutting back their 5-million-man armed forces, such as allowing on-site inspection of their nuclear installations, such as allowing freedom of the skies, such as pulling out of Africa, such as staying out of the Middle East, such as pulling out the infiltrators from every country in Africa, such as releasing Cuba from economic and political bondage to the Soviet Union.

I feel that the American people are tired of concessions being made by the American people to Russia. They want to see some overt action on the part of Russia looking toward disarmament, looking toward promoting world peace.

I hope that this resolution will gather much dust in the Committee on Foreign Relations, so that it will not come to the floor of the Senate again.

Mr. WILLIAM L. SCOTT. Mr. President, I associate myself with the remarks of the distinguished Senator from Alabama. I suggest that the members of the Committee on Foreign Relations review the various statements that were made on the floor of the Senate.

This resolution purportedly was to stop the rhetoric, but we had quite a bit of rhetoric in the resolution and a considerable amount of rhetoric in the explanations of the resolution.

So if there is a genuine desire on behalf of those who presented the resolution in the first place to limit the amount of rhetoric on foreign relations, I hope that the matter will not be reported to the floor of the Senate.

CRISIS IN ARGENTINA

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, the situation in Argentina is growing more tense by the day—even by the hour, according to many reports that I have been receiving. It was only a little less than a year ago that I was privileged to be a guest in that delightful country, a country of great national resources, both natural and human. I was deeply impressed with the ability of the Argentine people, and with the bounty which God had provided for the people who lived in that land.

Yet, as I pointed out on the Senate floor after my return, the picture was marred by what then appeared to be a slowly disintegrating political and economic situation, exacerbated by Communist and anarchist terrorism.

Indeed, my first sight of that beautiful country was through the bullet-proof glass of the security vehicle provided by our competent and courageous Ambassador to Argentina, Robert Hill. Ambassador Hill himself is forced to live in one of the highest security situations of any diplomatic representative in the world, and it is a tribute to his deep understanding of the Argentine situation that he preferred to gloss over the ever-present danger to his person and to dwell instead upon the positive achievements of Argentine science, industry, and agriculture.

While I was in Argentina, I had the opportunity to speak with a number of Argentine leaders in both the public and private sector, and I have been pleased to return the hospitality when they visited Washington. They have been unanimously agreed that the Argentine people are anxiously searching for a solution to the dangerous quandry they are in.

It is now clear that Argentina is on the verge of financial and social collapse. As an American Senator, I am in no position to comment upon the internal politics of another country; yet over the weekend, there have been many articles in the press of the United States indicating that the constitutional government of that country has broken down in all except the name, and that the only constitutional element that remains to guarantee the liberties and human rights of the people is the Armed Forces of Argentina.

This is a development that will not be easily understood by many elements of American opinion. Yet it is a fact of life in many countries of the world that economic bankruptcy and social disintegration bring on the need for a single authority to restore order. In the United States, we regard free expression of opinion and a freely elected government as the cornerstones of human rights.

Yet in the long run, such rights are only a means to protect more basic human rights—the right for the ordinary person to enjoy life without fear of public disorder, the right to have a job and to earn a living, the right to provide support for one's family and an education for one's children, the right to own one's own property and to engage freely in enterprises of one's own choosing. Even in the United States, with all of our democratic experience and safeguards, we see, day-by-day, basic human freedoms being trod upon by freely elected majorities in this Congress, and the economic security of people on pensions and fixed incomes, to say nothing of ordinary workers, being diminished by inflationary government deficits and inordinate increases in the money supply. We should not be surprised then if the ballot box in other countries also leads to the suppression of human liberties. We saw this happen in Brazil 12 years ago; we saw it happen in Chile under Allende. Today we see a tremendous amount of human suffering in Argentina because of the breakdown in social order, despite the manner in which the government took power.

I will give one example from my personal experience. A year ago when I was in Buenos Aires, the peso was converted into U.S. dollars at the rate of 28 to 1. Two weeks ago, the official rate of conversion was 300 to 1. That is an increase of over 10 times in less than 1 year.

The misery that financial collapse brings is incredible, not only because many industries face bankruptcy, but because basic social services and charities are unable to meet the level of need. Housewives are unable to stretch a dwindling paycheck to cover necessities. Workers do not know how long their jobs will last.

In addition, the wave of terrorism has greatly increased since I was there a year ago. At that time there were isolated bombings and kidnappings of targeted victims. But the strategy of the Montoneros and the ERP terrorist organizations originally was to initiate Communist takeovers through terror in the provinces, and gradually isolate Buenos Aires, where half the people in the nation live. However, the military, under the able leadership of Gen. Jorge Rafael Videla, was given the power to take the necessary steps to eliminate the guerrilla activity.

I must add that the United States, through no fault of our Mission in Buenos Aires, failed to cooperate fully with these efforts to eradicate the terrorist bands. Important pieces of military equipment were not delivered, partly because of unilateral actions taken by the Secretary of State, and partly because of actions taken by Congress to hamper the world-wide fight against Communist infiltration. As more members of Congress become aware of these problems, I am hopeful that congressional opinion will be more understanding of the problems faced by nations under attack from the international Communist movement. Indeed, General Videla has demonstrated that the myth of guerrilla invincibility is just that, namely, a myth, and that terrorists do not command the support of the people they terrorize.

The Communists, therefore, switched strategy. First a unified command was organized among the various revolutionary groups, with a unified plan of action. Tactics were set up for a coordinated effort against military and security forces, to demoralize those forces, and to weaken their credibility among the people. But that has not been accomplished. In recent months, there has been a decided shift of terrorist activity from the outlying provinces to the urban areas, where it is more difficult to attack terrorists because of the concentration of population. But the random terror in the urban areas has done even more to

U.S. response—I can say this most clearly: That today we have indeed missed virtually every opportunity to improve the prospects of peace; that the Secretary has defined precisely the failures of our current policies, and defined the standard for action that the State Department itself has failed to observe.

Mrs. Goler Butcher, chairwoman, of the Africa study group of the democratic advisory council of elected officials, has eloquently summarized the most compelling reason for the United States to develop sound policies:

The challenge of Africa to the U.S. in the year of our Bicentennial is to redeem the principles proclaimed at our birth: Self-determination, liberty and justice. As the health of our nation in the post World War II era required that the U.S. begin to extend these principles to black people in the U.S., so the present era of global interdependence requires, if we are to continue growth and prosperity and the realization of our potential, that the U.S. begin to function as a partner with Africa and the rest of the developing world, and not as a condescending superpower.

Mr. President, America needs an African policy that clearly relates to the interests and concerns of both Africans and Americans. In this country, we proudly profess allegiance to the ideals of personal freedom and social justice, as the keystone of our Bicentennial celebrations. Then let us bring the spirit of that allegiance to our national policies toward a continent that bears one of the world's most promising hopes for the future of mankind.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The second assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate stand in recess until the hour of 1:30 p.m. today.

There being no objection, the Senate, at 12:34 p.m., recessed until 1:30 p.m.; whereupon the Senate reassembled when called to order by the Presiding Officer (Mr. DOLE).

FEDERAL ELECTION CAMPAIGN ACT AMENDMENTS OF 1976

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DOLE). The hour of 1:30 having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated by title.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 3065) to amend the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971 to provide for its administration by a Federal Election Commission appointed in accordance with the requirements of the Constitution, and for other purposes.

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE REFERRED ALSO TO COMMITTEE ON COMMERCE

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Commerce be added to the list of committees to which the President's message on budget requests for research and development was referred yesterday.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GARY HART). Without objection, it is so ordered.

EXTENSION OF TITLE V OF THE RURAL DEVELOPMENT ACT OF 1972

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 676.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be stated by title.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (H.R. 6346) to extend the authorization of appropriations for carrying out title V of the Rural Development Act of 1972.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry with an amendment to strike all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

That subsection (a) of section 503 of the Rural Development Act of 1972 (7 U.S.C. 2663(a)) is amended—

(1) by striking out the word "is" and inserting in lieu thereof "are";

(2) by striking out the word "and"; and

(3) by changing the period at the end thereof to a comma, and adding the following: "not to exceed $5,000,000 for the period July 1, 1976, through September 30, 1976, and not to exceed $20,000,000 for each of the three fiscal years during the period beginning October 1, 1976, and ending September 30, 1979.".

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, this bill would extend for another 3 years the authority for rural development research and extension under title V of the Rural Development Act of 1972. Since the present authorization expires on June 30 of this year, this important title of the act will lapse in the absence of action by the Congress.

The objective of title V is to provide research, extension, and training to insure successful programs of rural development in order that the highest possible level of employment and quality of life in rural America may be achieved.

It was the intent of Congress that programs under title V consist of extension and research with respect to new approaches for the management, agricultural production techniques, farm machinery technology, new products, cooperative agricultural marketing, and distribution suitable to the economic development of family-sized farm operations.

Notwithstanding the unwillingness of the administration to make appropriated funds available for these programs, they are vitally needed and their contributions to the welfare of rural America are proven. Congress recognized that many of those small farms to which this section of the act is addressed are too small to be economically viable in and of themselves. It was recognized that many of these farmers or their wives might have to seek supplemental nonfarm incomes to get by. But the point was that many of these people, even with two incomes, are living at or near the poverty level. They are underemployed. If research and extension can be used to maximize their farm incomes, we will be able to accomplish much improvement of their standard of living, putting more dollars into local rural economies, and thereby accomplishing a great deal of rural development.

In title V, there is a new model of research and extension. The act mandates that Federal agencies work cooperatively with other public and private institutions in the State and provides for the coordination of the total program within the State which is not embodied in the Smith-Lever Act and the Hatch Act.

The advisory committee structure is part of the planning process to get State and community involvement. In addition, the regional rural development centers, of which there are four, provide a creative means for using the limited resources made available under title V.

The largest appropriation for title V thus far has been for $3 million, divided equally between research and extension. This means that no State has received as much as $100,000 per year.

This may seem inefficient in some ways, but title V is the instrument which assures that the cooperative extension service and the cooperative State research service maintain a commitment to rural development.

Many States have added dollars to the title V money from other authorities to strengthen their programs.

Another strength of title V program has been the broad-based input going into identifying statewide and local development objectives. This arises from the direct involvement of State advisory and local citizens advisory councils in title V program direction, representing farmers, business, labor, local government and multicounty planning and development organizations, advisory council members are acquainting title V administrators with needs confronting rural areas of the State and providing significant input into program development.

I feel that this measure to extend the funding of these vital rural development programs through 1979 is very much in keeping with our original intent in passing the 1972 act and that the funded programs will be used as vehicles to insure that these commitments which we have made to rural Americans are kept in a responsive and responsible manner. I urge favorable consideration of this measure.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to read the amendment.

Mr. DOLE. I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

At the appropriate place, insert a new section as follows:

SEC. 2. Subsection (b) of section 3 of the Farm Labor Contractor Registration Act of 1963, 78 Stat. 920, as amended (7 U.S.C. 2041–2055), is amended—

(1) by striking the word "or" at the end of paragraph (6);

(2) by striking the period at the end of paragraph (7) and inserting in lieu thereof a semicolon; and

(3) by adding at the end thereof a new paragraph (8) as follows:

"(8) any custom combine, hay harvesting, or sheep shearing operation.".

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, the purpose of this amendment is to exempt custom combine operators, hay harvesters, and sheep shearers from the Farm Labor Contractor Registration Act—FLCRA.

This amendment is cosponsored by Mr. ABOUREZK, Mr. BENTSEN, Mr. CURTIS, Mr. MANSFIELD, Mr. BURDICK, Mr. BARTLETT, Mr. BELLMON, Mr. HRUSKA, Mr. MCGEE, Mr. MCGOVERN, Mr. TOWER, Mr. YOUNG, Mr. HELMS, Mr. FANNIN, Mr. HANSEN, Mr. LAXALT, Mr. MCCLURE, and myself.

Mr. President, a major problem for custom combine operators, and for the farmers they serve, developed recently when the Department of Labor made their interpretation that custom cutting and sheep shearing operations should be included under the Farm Labor Contractor Registration Act. Since that time, my office has received a stream of letters, telegrams and telephone calls from custom cutting operators and from farmers indicating that they would have a great deal of difficulty complying with the requirements of this law. Custom hay harvesters are essentially the same as custom cutters and there is concern that they would be included too. It is my understanding that this problem has major proportions in other midwestern and agricultural States.

DIFFERENT SITUATIONS CONFUSED

The Senator from Kansas strongly believes that the extension of this law to include custom combine and sheep shearing operators is a confusion of two entirely different situations. The FLCRA was intended to end abuses against migrant workers and against farmers that use the services of farm labor contractors.

But custom combine and sheepshearing operators have no record of exploiting or abusing their employees or the farmers they contract with. Custom combine and sheepshearing operators do have a record of providing a very important and timely service to farmers and ranchers.

So custom operators and sheepshearers are justifiably upset about a decision by the Department of Labor to extend a large number of requirements to cover them when there is no demonstrated need for such requirements. That is why, in the opinion of this Senator, this amendment is so important.

PROMPT ACTION NEEDED

The Senator from Kansas feels strongly that quick action is needed on this exemption. That is the reason for offering this amendment to a nongermane bill rather than going through the normal legislative process.

It is the hope of this Senator that the exemption contained in this amendment will be adopted by the Senate today. Hopefully, the House will then agree to this bill as amended or to a conference report on it that includes the exemption. This process, if completed, will allow the exemption to be enacted into law much more quickly than going through the normal process of committee hearing and markup.

There is a need for prompt action because the custom harvesting season will begin in the next few weeks. Wheat harvest begins in Texas in the middle of May. At this point, custom combine operators in Kansas and other States are getting their machinery ready to go south to begin the harvest season. From that time on, they will be cutting grain and moving north throughout the summer, into the fall. It is important that the Congress approve this exemption before that time so they will not be burdened by unnecessary and inappropriate regulations.

COMMITTEE APPROVAL

Prompt action on this legislation by the Congress is justifiable. Recently the junior Senator from Wisconsin (Mr. NELSON) who is also the chairman of the Senate Migratory Labor Subcommittee, together with Congressman FORD of Michigan, who is chairman of the House Agricultural Labor Subcommittee sent a letter to the Secretary of Labor indicating that it was never the intent of Congress to include custom combine and sheepshearing operators under the FLCRA.

The Senator from Kansas has been in touch with the Department of Labor and it is my understanding that it is not the need to extend these regulations to custom combine and sheepshearing operators that prompted the Department of Labor interpretation, but simply the technical wording of the definitions of migrant workers and farm labor contractors in the act. So, hopefully, Congress can complete action within the next few days and agree on this exemption.

PROBLEMS CAUSED

The requirements of the FLCRA would cause a large number of problems for custom combine operators. Most of the regulations are either unnecessary or inappropriate for custom cutting operations. But the problems that would be caused for custom combine operators would result in severe hardship and in some cases could result in custom operators simply quitting the business altogether.

In the case of safety and health requirements, custom operators are already meeting the standards necessary to protect their employees, there is no need for the additional safety and health requirements of the FLCRA.

There are many requirements in this act that would cost a great deal of time and money for custom operators.

For example, the Senator from Kansas counts 25 different types of forms and statements that are required for each custom operation. Many of these forms and statements would have to be submitted repeatedly for each employee, for each vehicle, and for each job performed by the operator. The farmer that hires the services of a custom operator would also have additional paperwork requirements. I request unanimous consent that a list of these forms and statements be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the list was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FORMS AND STATEMENTS TO BE PROVIDED BY CUSTOM CUTTERS UNDER THE FARM LABOR CONTRACTOR REGISTRATION ACT

1. Form for application for an initial or renewal Certificate of Registration.
2. Certificate of Registration card.

20. Form for providing information to employees on overall wages and working conditions, WH–416.
21. Statement of terms and conditions of

That seems to me a very appropriate amendment. I commend the House for its vote, and it was an overwhelming vote, 229 ayes to 139 noes.

I see no reason why our Nation should continue to give more and more funds to nations which refuse to pay their just obligations to the United States.

Mr. President, at a recent hearing before the Subcommittee on International Finance and Resources of the Finance Committee, the State Department testified that 113 different countries now owe the United States varying sums of money and that many of those countries are delinquent.

The total amount owed the United States by these foreign countries is now, or was this past month, $60 billion.

The effort has been made in the House of Representatives, and the House sustained that view, to prevent additional aid to those countries which refused to pay their just obligations to the United States, and I think that is appropriate.

For that reason, for the reason I have cited, I shall oppose and do oppose the committee amendment and urge that the bill be left as it was when it came to the Senate from the House.

Mr. INOUYE. Mr. President, I yield myself 10 minutes, speaking on behalf of the committee.

Mr. President, according to testimony we have in our files, in the vast majority of instances, debts due the United States are being paid on time.

Of the approximately $64 billion in long-term U.S. Government credits extended since 1940, repayments of over $42 billion, including $12 billion in interest, have been received.

In fiscal years 1974 and 1975, the U.S. Government collected over $5.6 billion in principal and interest on Government long-term credits. Collections on short-term credits have also been very substantial.

The second point, as of June 30, 1975, Mr. President, principal and interest due and unpaid 90 days or more on foreign loans and credits owed U.S. Government agencies totaled $637 million.

A large proportion of this amount relates to a few unique situations where circumstances currently impede our ability to collect these debts. For example: $100 million in outstanding debt is attributable to the Republic of China, and involves a number of issues including the proper allocation of claims between the Republic of China and the People's Republic of China, the correct evaluation of the claims, and the problems of government succession.

This presently is under discussion and negotiation and if we were to apply the Alexander amendment as intended by the House, we would not be able to in any way or fashion assist the Republic of China.

There is an item of $68 million owed the United States by Cuba which the administration advises us will be pursued as soon as the state of our bilateral relations permits.

There is another item of $200 million——

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. INOUYE. Yes.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Is it proposed to give financial assistance, foreign aid, to Cuba?

Mr. INOUYE. Not at all.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Then I do not see the point of the Senator's statement which he just gave.

Mr. INOUYE. This is to advise the Senate that among the amounts which are now in arrears, $68 million is owed to us by Cuba and the administration advises us that at the earliest moment when bilateral relations permit, the United States will very aggressively try to get the loan paid up.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. In my experience with the U.S. Government acting through the State Department, there has been no aggressive action on the part of the State Department for years in trying to get loans paid which are owed to the U.S. Government.

Mr. INOUYE. But I would like to suggest to my distinguished colleague from Virginia that according to available records, U.S. Government collection of debts incurred over the last 30 years has been fairly good. In fact, it compares very favorably with private banking institutions in the United States.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. I think that would be the case only if one is considering the writing off of huge sums as being in settlement for the loans.

For example, the State Department in 1972 agreed to settle the Russian debt for 3 cents on the dollar, plus another 24 cents if the Russians could borrow the money from the Export-Import Bank to pay the other 24 cents.

I do not call that really paying the just obligations.

In any case, I see no harm in leaving the House provision in the bill so that those countries which refuse to pay the United States can no longer draw aid until such time as the payments are made.

Mr. INOUYE. Mr. President, most of the arrearages are brought about not by a refusal on the part of the country to pay the United States, but because of some differences of opinion.

For example, during the Korean conflict, the U.S. Government provided logistical support to several nations: Colombia, Ethiopia, Greece, the Philippines, Thailand, and Turkey. These were countries who, at our request, participated in this conflict.

In that conflict, we provided the logistical support. Needless to say, the history of debt arising from the provision of this support is complex and presents a unique situation. Should we pursue the Turks to obtain payment of this loan when they, in response to our request, sent their men overseas to Korea to battle the North Koreans?

Then we have another matter of $60 million owed by Pakistan. This relates to the complex negotiations between Pakistan and her creditors that arose from the 1971 war, the so-called independence of Bangladesh, and the desire of the creditor countries to insure full servicing of the prewar Pakistan debt.

This is now being negotiated so that Pakistan will be current on this obligation in addition to these considerations, I would point out that, if we insist upon the Alexander amendment, we would not be able to provide any sort of assistance to Colombia, Ethiopia, Greece, the Philippines, Thailand, and Turkey.

So, if we restore the Alexander amendment, some of the requests submitted by the administration will have to be turned down. For example, among the countries that could be affected by the amendment, we find Syria, which, incidentally, is very important in the strategy of the United States in bringing about a more lasting peace in the Middle East. Egypt, another country which is very important in the quest for peace in the Middle East, would also be an ineligible country.

I would hope that the Senator from Virginia would not insist upon restoring the Alexander language. The administration is very strongly against the Alexander amendment. The administration has expressed the hope that the Senate would delete it and bring this matter into conference with the House. We hope in conference the House will agree to the position of the administration and agree to the deletion the Alexander amendment.

Mr. BROOKE. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. INOUYE. I yield.

Mr. BROOKE. Mr. President, I certainly understand the desire of the distinguished Senator from Virginia who very customarily is interested in both the revenues and the defense of the U.S. Government, and who has performed a great service to this country because of his vigilance. I certainly agree with him that we ought to do everything possible to collect whatever is due the United States from foreign countries to whom we have made loans.

Normally, looking at the language which the Senator suggests, one would think certainly these countries ought to be able to pay up and should pay up if they are to receive any further loans from the United States. But actually, this amendment, and I do not like to characterize in this way, has, in effect, a shotgun approach to a very complex problem when circumstances vary widely from nation to nation.

I think delinquencies should be resolved on a case-by-case basis with all relevant factors concerning our relationship with a delinquent country being taken into account. But this is impossible under the proposed amendment.

The broad scope of this amendment would also affect arrearages on short-term credits which could affect a large number of countries but involve relatively small amounts of money. The amendment would likely make it even more difficult to collect on overdue debts, and it would provide little flexibility in working out the problem with various countries with whom we desired to maintain cordial bilateral relations.

Several of the countries have been mentioned that would be affected by the so-called Alexander amendment, Mr. President, but I think we ought to list them all. I think that even though some may be more important in terms of the peace of the world at this moment, all of these countries would be affected by this amendment:

Argentina	Mexico
Brazil	Nicaraugua
Bolivia	Pakistan
Chile	Panama
Colombia	Paraguay
Costa Rica	Peru
Ecuador	Philippines
Egypt	Portugal
El Salvador	Senegal
Ethiopia	Somalia
Greece	Syria
Guatemala	Thailand
Guinea	Tunisia
Haiti	Turkey
Honduras	Republic of China
India	Uruguay
Iran	Venezuela
Iraq	Zaire
Liberia

As I read over those countries, Mr. President, I am sure it is easy to see that we should deal with most of them on an individual basis. Certainly, we are not in a position at this time, with the condition of the world, to cut off economic assistance to many of these countries because some of them are not able, at this time, to make repayments to the United States. In fact, it would be heartless to cut off some of them at this time, for thay are in desperate need now. In many cases we are trying to help them to help themselves and eventually, hopefully, they will be able to pay back our Government.

I again say that I sympathize with the intent of the amendment of the Senator from Virginia and what he is trying to do. We do want to collect from these countries. We want to get them in the habit of paying back. Many are in a position where they cannot pay back. Many are in strategic positions where we just cannot afford to cut off economic assistance at this time.

I have some language which I would like to suggest to the distinguished Senator from Virginia that he might consider because I, too, am concerned, as we all are, about collecting the money but at the same time maintaining some flexibility so that we can avoid any negative effects in our relations with many of these countries.

The language would be as follows:

Beginning 6 months from the date of enactment of this section, no part of any appropriation contained in this Act shall be used to furnish assistance to any country which is in default during a period in excess of 1 calendar year in payment to the United States of principal or interest on any loan made to such country by the United States pursuant to a program for which funds are appropriated under this Act, unless (1) such debt has been disputed by such country prior to the enactment of this legislation or (2) such country has either arranged to make payment of the amount in arrears or otherwise taken appropriate steps which may include renegotiation to cure the existing default.

That is rather lengthy language.

Mr. President, I would like to suggest the absence of a quorum and submit this to my distinguished chairman and the distinguished Senator from Virginia for their consideration as an alternative to the Senator's language.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator suggest the absence of a quorum?

Mr. BROOKE. Yes, I do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. INOUYE. Mr. President, earlier today the distinguished Senator from Alabama (Mr. ALLEN) inquired whether any of the funds provided in the fiscal year 1976 bill for Eximbank programs can currently be used to authorize credits or guarantees in support of U.S. exports for oil and gas exploration in the Soviet Union.

I have made an inquiry of the Eximbank, and in a memorandum dated March 23, 1976, the Export-Import Bank has submitted a reply which states that none of the funds in the fiscal year 1976 bill can be used by Eximbank to authorize such credits or guarantees. The Bank is prevented from doing business in Russia, because of certain provisions of the Trade Act of 1974.

I ask unanimous consent that the memorandum of the Eximbank be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the memorandum was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MEMORANDUM TO SENATOR INOUYE

In accordance with your request, this memo confirms our conversation earlier today during which I advised you that none of the program activity in the FY 1976 bill for Eximbank can currently be used to authorize credits or guarantees in support of U.S. exports for oil and gas exploration in the Soviet Union. This is because the Bank is currently prevented from doing business with Russia due to the Trade Act of 1974.

Even if we were permitted to do business with Russia an additional restriction contained in the Export-Import Bank Amendments of 1974 places a limitation of $300 million on new loans and guarantees to the U.S.S.R., none of which amount can be used for equipment and services for the production (including processing and distribution) of fossil fuel energy resources. Not more than $40 million of the $300 million can be used for support of any products or services involving research or exploration (as opposed to production, processing and distribution) of fossil fuel energy resources. The $300 million limitation could be increased, however, if the President determines that it is in the national interest, reports such determination to Congress with the reasons therefore and the amount of such increase which would be available for development for fossil fuel energy resources, and if the Congress adopts a concurrent resolution approving such determination.

JAMES K. HESS,
Deputy Treasurer-Controller.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. INOUYE. I yield.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator said that the Senator from Alabama raised this point. I certainly was interested in it. However, the Senator from Alabama also expressed the interest of the distinguished senior Senator from Virginia (Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR.), who last year, when this bill was before the Senate, waged a gallant and heroic fight to keep a limitation on the amount of money the Export-Import Bank could make available for the development of the Russian natural gas fields, with the gas to be produced by Russia and sold to Japan and the American taxpayer paying the bill.

So it was the distinguished Senator from Virginia (Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR.) who was primarily interested in this matter, and waged the fight last year.

Mr. INOUYE. Mr. President, I apologize for not including the name of the distinguished Senator from Virginia. Let me add that it was not only a spectacular fight, but a very successful one.

FEDERAL ELECTION CAMPAIGN ACT AMENDMENTS OF 1976

AMENDMENT NO. 1516

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. INOUYE. I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, on behalf of myself, Mr. HATFIELD, Mr. MANSFIELD, Mr. HUGH SCOTT, Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD, and Mr. GRIFFIN I send to the desk an amendment in the nature of a substitute for S. 3065, a bill to amend the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971 and for other purposes, and I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be printed in the RECORD as well as having the normal printing.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be received and printed, and will lie on the table, and without objection, in accordance with the Senator's request, the amendment will be printed in the RECORD.

The amendment (No. 1516) is as follows:

"(5)(A) If the Commission determines that there is reason to believe that any person has committed or is about to commit a violation of this Act or of chapter 95 or chapter 96 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954, the Commission shall make every endeavor to correct or prevent such violation by informal methods of conference, conciliation, and persuasion, and to enter into a conciliation agreement with the person involved. A conciliation agreement, unless violated, shall constitute an absolute bar to any further action by the Commission with respect to the violation which is the subject of the agreement, including bringing a civil proceeding under paragraph (B) of this section.

"(B) If the Commission is unable to correct or prevent any such violation by such informal methods, the Commission may, if the Commission determines there is probable cause to believe that a violation has occurred or is about to occur, institute a civil action for relief, including a permanent or temporary injunction, restraining order, or any other appropriate order, including a civil penalty which does not exceed the greater of $5,000 or an amount equal to the amount of any contribution or expenditure involved in such violation, in the district court of the United States for the district in which the person against whom such action is found, resides, or transacts business.

"(C) In any civil action instituted by the Commission under paragraph (B), the court shall grant a permanent or temporary injunction, restraining order, or other order, including a civil penalty which does not exceed the greater of $5,000 or an amount equal to the amount of any contribution or expenditure involved in such violation, upon a proper showing that the person involved has engaged or is about to engage in a violation of this Act or of chapter 95 or chapter 96 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954.

"(D) If the Commission determines that there is probable cause to believe that a knowing and willful violation under section 328(a), or a knowing and willful violation of a provision of chapter 95 or 96 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954, has occurred or is about to occur, it may refer such apparent violation to the Attorney General of the United States without regard to the limitations set forth in subparagraph (A) of this paragraph.

"(6)(A) If the Commission believes that there is clear and convincing proof that a knowing and willful violation of the Act or Chapter 95 or 96 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 has been committed, any conciliation agreement entered into by the Commission under paragraph (5)(A) may include a requirement that the person involved in such conciliation agreement shall pay a civil penalty which does not exceed the greater of (i) $10,000; or (ii) an amount equal to 300 percent of the amount of any contribution or expenditure involved in such violation.

"(B) If the Commission believes that a violation of this Act or of chapter 95 or chapter 96 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 has been committed, a conciliation agreement entered into by the Commission under paragraph (5)(A) may include a requirement that the person involved in such conciliation agreement shall pay a civil penalty which does not exceed the greater of (i) $5,000; or (ii) an amount equal to the amount of the contribution or expenditure involved in such violation.

"(7) The Commission shall make available to the public the results of any conciliation attempt, including any conciliation agreement entered into by the Commission, and any determination by the Commission that no violation of this Act or of chapter 95 or 96 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 has occurred.

"(8) In any civil action for relief instituted by the Commission under paragraph (5), if the court determines that the Commission has established through clear and convincing proof that the person involved in such civil action has committed a knowing and willful violation of this Act or of chapter 95 or 96 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954, the court may impose a civil penalty of not more than the greater of (A) $10,000; or (B) an amount equal to 300 percent of the contribution or expenditure involved in such violation. In any case in which such person has entered into a conciliation agreement with the Commission under paragraph (5)(A), the Commission may institute a civil action for relief under paragraph (5) if it believes that such person has violated any provision of such conciliation agreement. In order for the Commission to obtain relief in any such civil action, it shall be sufficient for the Commission to establish that such person has violated, in whole or in part, any requirement of such conciliation agreement.

"(9) In any action brought under paragraph (5) or paragraph (8) of this subsection, subpenas for witnesses who are required to attend a United States district court may run into any district.

"(10)(A) Any party aggrieved by an order of the Commission dismissing a complaint filed by such party under paragraph (1), or by a failure on the part of the Commission to act on such complaint in accordance with the provisions of this section within ninety days after the filing of such complaint, may file a petition with the United States District Court for the District of Columbia.

"(B) The filing of any action under subparagraph (A) shall be made—

"(i) in the case of the dismissal of a complaint by the Commission, no later than sixty days after such dismissal; or

"(ii) in the case of a failure on the part of the Commission to act on such complaint, no later than sixty days after the ninety-day period specified in subparagraph (A).

"(C) In such proceeding the court may declare that the dismissal of the complaint or the action, or the failure to act, is contrary to law and may direct the Commission to proceed in conformity with that declaration within thirty days, failing which the complainant may bring in his own name a civil action to remedy the violation complained of.

"(11) The judgment of the district court may be appealed to the court of appeals and the judgment of the court of appeals affirming or setting aside, in whole or in part, any such order of the district court shall be final, subject to review by the Supreme Court of the United States upon certiorari or certification as provided in section 1254 of title 28, United States Code.

"(12) Any action brought under this subsection shall be advanced on the docket of the court in which filed, and put ahead of all other actions (other than other actions brought under this subsection or under section 314).

"(13) If the Commission determines after an investigation that any person has violated an order of the court entered in a proceeding brought under paragraph (5), it may petition the court for an order to adjudicate that person in civil contempt, or, if it believes the violation to be knowing and willful, it may instead petition the court for an order to adjudicate that person in criminal contempt.

"(b) In any case in which the Commission refers an apparent violation to the Attorney General, the Attorney General shall respond by report to the Commission with respect to any action taken by the Attorney General regarding such apparent violation. Each report shall be transmitted no later than sixty days after the date the Commission refers any apparent violation, and at the close of every thirty-day period thereafter until there is final disposition of such apparent violation. The Commission may from time to time prepare and publish reports on the status of such referrals.".

"(b) (1) For the purposes of this section 'labor organization' means any organization of any kind, or any agency or employee rep-

TITLE V—MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS

USE OF FRANKED MAIL BEFORE ELECTIONS

SEC. 501. Section 3210(a)(5)(D) of title 39, United States Code, is amended by striking out "28" and inserting in lieu thereof "60".

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, I would simply say that we have tried to work out a substitute for the Federal election bill, which has been under consideration for several days. The printing of the proposed substitute in the RECORD and the printed amendment itself will be available here for Senators to review in the morning.

There are certain amendments still outstanding, including one of the distinguished Senator from Alabama (Mr. ALLEN) and others which we anticipate will be offered, but we are hopeful that in light of the substitute as it is now drafted, we can move to a speedy conclusion of S. 3065 within the next day or two.

I thank the distinguished Senator from Hawaii for yielding.

FOREIGN ASSISTANCE AND RELATED PROGRAMS APPROPRIATIONS, 1976

The Senate continued with the consideration of the bill (H.R. 12203) making appropriations for foreign assistance and related programs for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1976, and for the Transition Quarter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. BROOKE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. BROOKE. Mr. President, the Senator from Virginia (Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR.) had offered an amendment, and I wish to offer a substitute for that amendment. Is it in order to move to accept the committee amendment, and then to introduce, at the appropriate place in the bill, an amendment?

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield, before the ruling on that parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. BROOKE. Before the Chair rules?

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Yes.

Mr. BROOKE. Mr. President, I withhold the inquiry.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. The Senator from Virginia, I might say, did not offer an amendment. The Senator from Virginia opposed the committee amendment.

Mr. BROOKE. That is correct.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. The Senator from Virginia has no amendment at this time.

Mr. BROOKE. I thank the Senator. Let me restate that inquiry.

The Senator from Virginia has opposed the committee amendment. Is it now in order to move to accept the committee action, and then offer an amendment at the end of the bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would say that it is his understanding that the Senator from Virginia was opposing excepted committee amendment No. 2, which was to strike and insert new language.

The inquiry now is whether, after the disposition of excepted committee amendment No. 2, an amendment adding a new section be in order?

Mr. BROOKE. That is correct.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The ruling of the Chair is that it would be in order.

Mr. BROOKE. Mr. President, I move to accept the committee action.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is all time on the committee amendment No. 2 yielded back?

Mr. BROOKE. I yield back all of my time.

Mr. INOUYE. I yield back all of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time is yielded back.

The question is on agreeing to excepted committee amendment No. 2.

The committee amendment No. 2 was agreed to.

Mr. BROOKE. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. BROOKE) (for himself and Mr. INOUYE and Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR.) proposes an amendment:

At the appropriate place in the bill insert the following:

Beginning three months from the date of enactment of this Act, no part of any appropriation contained in this Act shall be used to furnish assistance to any country which is in default during a period in excess of one calendar year in payment to the United States of principal or interest on any loan made to such country by the United States pursuant to a program for which funds are appropriated under this Act unless (1) such debt has been disputed by such country prior to the enactment of this section or (2) such country has either arranged to make payment of the amount in arrears or otherwise taken appropriate steps, which may include renegotiation, to cure the existing default.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous unanimous-consent order, there is 1 hour of debate.

Mr. BROOKE. I yield back all time.

Mr. INOUYE. I yield back all time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time is yielded back.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BROOKE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Mr. Chuck Warren and Mr. Frank Ballance of Senator JAVITS' staff be accorded the privileges of the floor during the consideration of this matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, I have an amendment which I send to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Louisiana (Mr. JOHNSTON) proposes an amendment: On page 11, line 22, delete the figure "$25,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof: "$200,000,000".

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, the President of the United States in his budget request submitted a budget request for $323,913,000 under section 506 of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 to replenish ammunition stocks of the Armed Forces which had been used by the Armed Forces in Cambodia in 1974–75.

The House of Representatives passed this provision granting the full $323,913,000. When this provision got to our Subcommittee on Foreign Operations, we reduced that amount to $25 million. The feeling of the committee was that frankly the President was incorrect and the Armed Forces were incorrect in giving that much money to Cambodia at a time when Congress and the Senate, particularly, had made it very plain that this body did not believe that that much aid should go to Cambodia when the story had already been told and it was too late for money to do any good.

However, Mr. President, since that time we further checked into the matter and found this: First, section 506 of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 authorizes the President to transfer these defense articles to countries requiring military assistance if he determines it to be in the security interest of the United States to do so.

Furthermore, this section of the law authorizes the Department of Defense to incur obligations or to let contracts in anticipation of reimbursements to the Defense Department of the amount.

Pursuant to this authority, the President did transfer these stocks of ammunition, valued at $324 million, and pursuant to that transfer the Armed Forces subsequently contracted in anticipation of this authority to restore these amounts. The Army has let these contracts. That is the Army in particular. Because the Army has $276 million of the $324 million, they have let those contracts, and those contracts are now in the course of being fulfilled. The action of the Subcommittee on Foreign Operations in cutting this amount to $25 million would cause not only the failure to replenish these stocks of ammunition, but it would cause the cancellation of these contracts as well. It would have an impact of 2,000 people being immediately laid off jobs and another 900 jobs lost down the pipeline.

So the ultimate question is whether or not we need the ammunition and whether or not the stocks should be replenished, because they were, in fact, depleted and transferred to Cambodia pursuant to act of Congress. It was all done totally within the ambit of the authority previously given by this body.

My amendment does not give the full $324 million. It does not for one very practical reason, and that is the subcommittee disagrees with me and the subcommittee feels that it would not be proper to go the full route but that $200 million would be sufficient.

While I believe that we should go the full replenishment, in a spirit of compromise I have put in this amendment which would authorize $200 million out of $324 million and would, for the most

SENATE RESOLUTION 412—TO RECOGNIZE THE INTERNATIONAL ASTRONAUTICAL FEDERATION'S "IAF '76" CONGRESS TO BE HELD OCTOBER 10 THROUGH OCTOBER 16, 1976, IN THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

Mr. MOSS. Mr. President, by direction of the Committee on Aeronautical and Space Sciences, I report favorably an original Senate resolution to recognize the International Astronautical Federation's "IAF '76" Congress to be held October 10 through October 16, 1976, in the United States of America and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

Mr. HATFIELD. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. MOSS. Yes.

Mr. HATFIELD. I would like to ask if this has been cleared with the minority?

Mr. MOSS. It has been cleared with the minority.

Mr. HATFIELD. I thank the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be stated by title.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A resolution (S. Res. 412) to recognize the International Astronautical Federation's "IAF '76" Congress to be held October 10 through October 16, 1976, in the United States of America.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. MOSS. Mr. President, this Senate resolution was sponsored by the Senator from Arizona (Mr. GOLDWATER) and me.

The purpose of the resolution is for the Senate to recognize the 27th Congress of the International Astronautical Federation which will be held in Anaheim, Calif., from October 10 through October 16, 1976.

The International Astronautical Federation is a nongovernmental association of scientific and technical organizations from throughout the world. The president of the International Astronautical Federation for 1976 is Mr. Leonard Jaffe, NASA's Deputy Associate Administrator for Space Applications.

The federation has two affiliated organizations—the International Academy of Astronautics and the International Institute of Space Law. Together, they selected the United States for their 1976 Congress in recognition of our Bicentennial and named it "IAF '76".

This "IAF '76" Congress will be chaired by Dr. George E. Mueller, former NASA Associate Administrator for Manned Space Flight.

The International Astronautical Federation and its affiliated organizations represent about 65,000 scientists, engineers, and lawyers including many of the world's leading authorities in astronautics, the space sciences, and space law. Hundreds of these will attend this 27th congress to exchange information and views on space science, technology, and law.

The American Revolution Bicentennial Administration has recognized this Congress as a significant contribution to the Horizon '76 theme of our national Bicentennial commemoration.

Mr. President, this resolution was prompted by our belief that we should acknowledge the "IAF '76" Congress and its sponsors for bringing the Congress to the United States not only because of its technical, scientific, and legal merit but also because of the genuine international cooperation that is realized when individuals from differing backgrounds and social systems come together to interact with each other on the common ground of scientific, technical, and legal development.

The motivating spirit behind the "IAF '76" Congress should remind us that the quest for world peace takes many paths. One of the most important paths leading to that objective is the international cooperation that has developed in the U.S. space program—a program that has offered the world untold benefits, opportunities, and solutions to growing problems on Earth. I believe that the proper use of the environment of space is the next great frontier that man must penetrate in his search for a better and more fulfilling existence.

Mr. President, because the International Astronautical Federation has selected the United States as the location for its 27th Congress in recognition of our Bicentennial, I believe it is fitting that the Senate formally recognize this work of the IAF. In so doing, we are offering our encouragement and best wishes to the "IAF '76" delegates for a successful Congress.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, the International Astronautical Federation, known as the IAF, is a nongovernmental organization created in 1950 by national societies concerned with the development of rockets and space exploration. Thus, it was in existence 7 years prior to the launching of the first artificial Earth satellite. It was a small organization during its early days but greatly expanded in importance as space activities caught the attention of the nations of the world.

Today the IAF, through its member associations and societies, represents nearly 65,000 engineers, scientists, and technicians from 35 nations around the globe.

The International Astronautical Federation chose the United States as the location of their 27th congress in recognition of our Bicentennial. The IAF '76 Congress which will meet in Anaheim, Calif., during the second week in October will bring together the world's this resolution and to have it reported leading authorities in astronautics and space law. I was, therefore, glad to join my colleague from Utah in sponsoring this resolution and to have it reported from the Committee on Aeronautical and Space Sciences.

Mr. President, I believe it is entirely fitting for the U.S. Senate to recognize this IAF '76 Congress of the International Astronautical Federation. Moreover, the federation and its affiliated organizations are to be commended for selecting the United States as the location for this congress in recognition of our Bicentennial and to further commend the host organizations of the United States for sponsoring this congress.

Mr. President, I move that the resolution be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 412) was agreed to.

The preamble was agreed to.

The resolution, with its preamble, is as follows:

Whereas the International Astronautical Federation is a unique, international, nongovernmental, interdisciplinary federation of societies devoted to fostering the exploration of space through space science and the development of space technology and space law; and

Whereas the International Astronautical Federation and its affiliated organizations, the International Academy of Astronautics and the International Institute of Space Law, represent the world's leading authorities in astronautics, the space sciences and space law; and

Whereas the International Astronautical Federation will hold its 27th Congress in Anaheim, California, during 1976, the Bicentennial Year of our Nation, in recognition of the vital contributions made by the United States to the scientific, technical and legal wealth of our civilization; and

Whereas the host organizations for this 27th Congress, to be called the "IAF '76" Congress, are the American Institute of Aeronautics and Astronautics, the American Astronautical Society, the Aerospace Medical Association, the New York Cardiological Society and the Rocket Research Institute, Inc.; and

Whereas the "IAF '76" Congress will be attended by hundreds of people who belong to the International Astronautical Federation's affiliated organizations and member societies from many nations; and

Whereas the "IAF '76" Congress will conduct sessions and present papers in all areas of astronautics, and the space sciences, and space law thereby advancing and strengthening international cooperation and understanding in these critical areas of science, technology, and law; and

Whereas the American Revolution Bicentennial Administration recognizes the "IAF '76" Congress as a significant contribution to the Horizon '76 theme of the national Bicentennial commemoration; and

Whereas the International Astronautical Federation, its affiliated organizations, and its member societies represent considerable hope and promise to the world for the continued advancement of man's accomplishments in the fields of astronautics, the space sciences, and space law, such accomplishments having brought a better life to all humanity; and

Whereas the International Astronautical Federation strongly supports man's exploration of space and the proper use of the environment of space in order to help fulfill man's greatest aspirations and meet his vital needs on earth: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Senate of the United States recognizes the importance of the 27th Congress of the International Astronautical Federation to be held in Anaheim, California, from October 10 through October 16, 1976; commends the International Astronautical Federation and its affiliated organizations for selecting the United States as the location for its 27th Congress in recognition of the Bicentennial of the United States; and commends the host organizations of the United States for sponsoring the Congress.

SEC. 2. The Secretary of the Senate shall transmit a suitably enscribed copy of this resolution to the International Astronautical Federation.

Mr. MOSS. I thank the Senator from Nevada for his kindness.

FEDERAL ELECTION CAMPAIGN ACT AMENDMENTS OF 1976

The Senate continued with the consideration of the bill (S. 3065) to amend the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971 to provide for its administration by a Federal Election Commission appointed in accordance with the requirements of the Constitution, and for other purposes.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, what is the pending business?

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending business is S. 3065.

AMENDMENT NO. 1516

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, I call up my amendment in the form of a substitute to S. 3065.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will state the amendment.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Nevada (Mr. CANNON) for himself, Mr. HATFIELD, Mr. MANSFIELD, Mr. HUGH SCOTT, Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD and Mr. GRIFFIN proposes an amendment in the nature of a substitute numbered 1516.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the substitute be dispensed with.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(The amendment is printed in the RECORD of March 23, 1976, pages S4060 through S4074.)

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, yesterday afternoon an amendment in the form of a substitute to S. 3065 was introduced by myself, Senator HATFIELD, Senator MANSFIELD, Senator HUGH SCOTT, Senator ROBERT C. BYRD, and Senator GRIFFIN. This substitute represents an attempt by both sides of the aisles to set forth a reasonable compromise proposal which we can discuss and hopefully reach agreement on in the near future.

It is understood that there are a number of amendments to this substitute which will be proposed and considered by the Senate. At this time, however, I would like to set forth the changes and modifications which this substitute amendment would make to S. 3065 as it had been amended on the floor prior to yesterday.

The essential structure, and in many important respects, the substance of S. 3065 remains intact with the following modifications:

First of all, section 102 of S. 3065, creating an eight-member commission—the number of commissioners was expanded from six to eight by Senator MATHIAS's amendment which was approved by the Senate—remains the same, with the deletion of the provision prohibiting outside business activities of commissioners and the deletion of the provision requiring in a majority vote of the commission that no less than two of the five-member majority be affiliated with the same political party.

In the definitional section 102 a provision was added excluding from the definition of expenditure for limitation purposes partisan activity designed to encourage individuals to register to vote, or to vote, conducted by the national committee of a political party, or a subordinate committee thereof, or the State committee of a national party. Such partisan activity would, however, be required to be reported. This addition had been approved by the Senate as an amendment to an earlier substitute but had not been proposed as an amendment to S. 3065. In addition, the substitute would delete a surplus definition of independent expenditure which is not used in the bill or the substitute as a defined term.

Section 104 of S. 3065 contained some provisions related to reports by political committees and candidates, in particular the reporting requirement for independent expenditures. Here the substitute has include the reporting requirement proposed by Senator PACKWOOD for expenditures made by corporations' and labor organizations' communications to their stockholders or members expressly advocating the election or defeat of a clearly identified candidate. This reporting requirement has been expanded to equitably apply to all membership organizations requiring them to report expenditures directly attributable to such communications and for that reason has been transferred to the reporting sections of the act from the section which dealt only with corporations and labor organizations.

I might add here that I understand that there will be an amendment proposed to set forth a reasonable floor on such reports to the Commission to relieve the burden of such reporting on small businesses and membership organizations, as well as to clarify the nature of the expenditures which must be reported. I personally feel such an amendment would be an equitable and clarifying addition to this disclosure provision and intend to give it my strong support.

The portions of S. 3065 which relate to the general enforcement powers of the Commission which have been previously discussed on the floor remain intact. These are sections 106 and 108 of S. 3065 and the only change is a minor one to clarify that where a conciliation agreement, unless violated, constitutes an absolute bar to any further action by the Commission, it is a bar to further action with respect to the violation which is the subject of the agreement.

The substitute amendment deletes all the advisory opinion provisions of S. 3065. The effect of this is to retain existing law in section 437f of title 2, United States Code, exactly as it now it.

The substitute also would delete those provisions in S. 3065 relating to the House of Representatives procedure for considering the Commission's proposed rules and regulations, leaving this as a matter for the House to act upon at a later time.

The substitute does not make any changes in the section of S. 3065 relating to limitations on contributions and expenditures, as amended to date by the Senate, except in the following specific respects. First, a provision is added to provide for an unlimited transfer of funds between and among political committees of the same political party together with a provision to assure that the antiproliferation rule of S. 3065 would not apply to contributions by a political party through a national committee and to contributions by that party through a single State committee in each State. Second, the amendment to S. 3065 proposed by Senator JOHNSTON and previously adopted by the Senate is modified to clarify that contributions by the specified party committees do not aggregate more than $20,000 in an election year.

This substitute also modifies the section of S. 3065 related to the solicitation of contributions by corporations and labor organizations to segregated political funds to allow, in addition to what is in S. 3065, corporations and labor unions and their segregated funds, to solicit in writing one contribution during the calendar year for use in connection with primary election campaigns and one contribution during the calendar year for use in connection with general election campaigns from any stockholder, officer, or employee of a corporation or the families of such persons provided, however, that such solicitation is made only by mail addressed to the stockholder, officer, or employee at his residence and shall be so designed that the corporation, labor organization, or separate segregated fund conducting such solicitation cannot determine who makes a contribution as a result of such solicitation and who does not. This restriction is a valuable protection against person-to-person coercion, and provides a degree of anonymity so corporations or unions cannot set up elaborate systems to monitor who contributes and who does not.

This same section was further modified to expand the provision prohibiting coercion by corporations and labor organizations by adding three specific prohibitions to protect employees during the solicitation process. In addition, the penalty provisions of S. 3065 were amended to provide up to a 2-year imprisonment or a fine of not more than $50,000, or both, for violation of the coercion prohibition portion of this section.

The substitute also makes a modification of the section permitting solicitation to segregated funds by government contractors so that it conforms to and is governed by the revised provisions which relate to corporations and labor organizations.

Mr. President, the final change which the substitute would make to S. 3065, as amended, is a modification of the provision amending section 3210(a) (5) (D) of title 39, United States Code, regulating the use of franked mail before elections. This modification would alter existing law only to the extent of changing the 28-day period prior to an election during which certain franked mass mail may not be sent out by a Member of Congress up for election to a 60-day period.

I should expand a little on that, it is not a prohibition on franked mail, it is on the franked mass mailing.

I would like to commend my Republican colleagues for their support of this substitute amendment. Although there are provisions in or omissions from the bill with which we all may not be completely satisfied, this substitute to S. 3065 does represent a significant coming together of many of the divergent views which have been expressed in the past weeks. It represents a number of necessary and constructive changes in the Federal election campaign laws and I recommend it to the Senate for its consideration and approval.

At this time I would like to yield to any of my colleagues who may wish to speak on this substitute or to offer amendments which they would like to have considered by the Senate.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I am very happy to join with the chairman of the Rules Committee (Mr. CANNON) and my colleagues Senator HUGH SCOTT and Senator GRIFFIN, who are also on the Rules Committee as well as the minority leaders, along with Senator MANSFIELD and Senator ROBERT C. BYRD, the majority leadership, in introducing this compromise bill.

Mr. President, I signed the minority views on the later substitute to S. 3065, the Federal Election Commission Amendments of 1976, with the understanding that there were five areas of disagreement with the original majority bill.

First, the original version seriously crippled an independent election commission. In the compromise version we bring to the floor today, I believe that most of the crippling provisions have been removed.

The provisions which would have curtailed the advisory opinion method of enforcement and statutory construction have also been removed. Advisory opinion power is left as it was under the 1974 Act, and I believe this is a definite improvement.

The bill is still more favorable to incumbents than the previous bill, but the more obvious favoritism is no longer included in this compromise version.

The third objection we found was that the original bill placed restrictions on national party organizations and their associated and subsidiary committees. One will find the compromise bill does take out most of those more objectionable features. I am particularly pleased that the transfer between committees can be made so that it is possible to pay debts of party committees that might otherwise face virtual bankruptcy.

The original compromise draft we approved on Monday night was essentially a fair compromise along many lines suggested by the majority.

I must say that two proposals to seriously limit the political solicitation of the separate, segregated funds have been accepted by the minority as a price for a reconstituted Federal Election Commission and removal of other objectionable features.

As the chairman of the committee has stated, we, too, accept, with some degree of reluctance, these compromises. As with any compromise, this bill doesn't represent the druthers of either side, but we join in the sponsorship of this substitute S. 3065.

I think we will have an opportunity later to discuss some of the matters which we have found less desirable in accepting this compromise, but I only want to emphasize at this time that, true to any compromise, one does not achieve all that he or she would like to achieve.

All of us, both the majority and the minority, have seen that we have a public responsibility to move this bill into some kind of form that we can accept and, hopefully, get the President of the United States to sign.

Obviously, in that sequence I just gave, I omitted one of the most important of all the steps, and that is to find agreement with the House of Representatives. None of us can predict what the House will do at this time. Hopefully, it can be in some general area of similarity to the Senate version. Hopefully, the Senate will accept our compromise proposal, the Cameron-Hatfield bill, and we would then go to conference.

Mr. President, I believe it is very obvious that since this expiration of the commission has occurred, we are again under a certain degree of pressure, particularly from the candidates for President. Since the Democrats have more candidates than the Republicans, I assume that they feel the pressure even more keenly than we. But I think that this original bill was enacted in good faith, although I did not personally subscribe to the public funding section of the bill. Therefore, we led the candidates to believe that they could count upon a certain contribution based upon the formula in the act as their campaigns progressed.

A rather sizable amount of money already has been disbursed under the original act. Of course, we find ourselves in an accelerated situation following each primary that has occurred, and the acceleration carries with it, no doubt, additional costs and expenditures.

So we have here a situation in which many candidates are out on the road, no doubt with great question as to where their future support is going to come from. They are making commitments and make those commitments in good faith, based upon their expectation of this act being sustained or revised, but at least being carried out through this particular election.

With the intervention of the Supreme Court in knocking down certain provisions of the act we are, therefore, confronted with the responsibility of reconstituting the Commission and attempting to maintain the continuity of the act, including the disbursement of funds.

I must say in all candor, that, from the constituents with whom I have discussed this matter, there has not been any great enthusiasm about the disbursement of funds from the Treasury to the candidates, but that is neither here nor there. The act was passed, however, and there developed an expectation, an honest expectation, from the candidates regarding the financing sections.

I am not here this morning pleading for the candidates, because that is only one part of the act. There are many other sections that, of course, concern all of us in this body and in the House. Therefore, I feel that the sooner we can take action on this substitute measure and maintain the continuity of the campaign funding as well as the rules under the general act that was enacted earlier, the better it will be for the Nation.

I want to also say, Mr. President, I think it is very obvious that whatever we develop we are going to find, through the experience and exercise we are now engaged in, of primaries, and later in the general election, certain bugs and certain problems that will necessitate our addressing this issue following the election. I think out of the experience of this election we will no doubt find the inadequacies of this measure that we cannot foresee in every instance when we are in the process of drafting such a precedent-setting act.

Again, I commend the majority for compromising, as they did, because there was strong sentiment on the part of the majority to address some of what they believed to be deficiencies already experienced during this campaign in the existing act, and to attempt to perhaps reorganize the act through such a bill now in the midst of the campaign.

The minority objected to this procedure. I speak now on general behalf of the minority; it is not unanimous. The minority felt very strongly that we had committed ourselves to a particular bill that was enacted into law. We were embarked upon this campaign, we were in the midst of this campaign, and to change the rules of the game at this particular juncture short of meeting the objections of the Supreme Court was not timely.

We felt this strongly and we pursued that particular viewpoint throughout the committee review and on the floor of the Senate.

Again I emphasize the point that this is not to assume that the act is perfect nor that there are not already requirements that we could identify that will have to be reviewed, discussed and debated. But I think we will be in a far stronger position to take the right action at the time we have concluded a presidential year election, and the various other elections that would be affected by this law. Then, in the next session of the Congress, we can come back with that data in hand and make a very careful review of what changes might be proper.

Mr. President, we also have in the substitute the Mondale amendment, which is very important because of the fact that it sets up a review commission to consider the review of presidential primaries. The way this is worded in the bill makes it very obvious that we are not locked into one narrow interpretation of what this commission can do.

It is very obvious that this commission can address itself to many things that occur, or review many aspects of the nominating system, during this election year. I do not think it is locked in necessarily just to a projected future idea of presidential primaries. I believe they will have to make judgments based upon this present system of primaries that are occurring now throughout the country.

So if there are current and immediate problems that may arise, we have in the Mondale provisions another vehicle to review those incidents and those concerns, as well as the presentation of such problems to the election commission once it is reconstituted.

For those who have felt keenly about certain amendments that they have authored and have proposed during the debate here in the Chamber during the last few weeks, I would say to them that even though the compromise may not incorporate all such amendments, those ideas certainly are not dead nor are they cast aside. Those ideas can be reviewed and can be studied by such a Commission if that part of this substitute proposal is sustained through the conference committee and a Presidential signature.

Mr. President, we are hopeful that both sides of the aisle will show some unusual restraint as to the offering of amendments to this particular substitute. We in no way are trying to close out or shut out the freedom and the right of any Senator to offer an amendment. But we discussed this matter very thoroughly in our conferences, the majority and the minority, and we both committed ourselves to the simple fact that we would try to dissuade our colleagues from offering copious and numerous amendments. I believe that if we can keep this substitute as clear of such amendments and as simple as it is now constituted, we will have not only a far better chance of passing this substitute on the floor but perhaps sustaining it in conference. I cannot speak for the President directly, but I do feel, after conferences at the White House yesterday morning, there are provisions in this bill now that the President can accept, and hopefully will sign.

I stress the point I do not commit the President nor attempt to be presumptuous enough to speak for the President at this point. The President has not yet had the chance to even read the substitute proposal, which has just been printed this morning.

In general discussions with the President and minority leaders at the White House yesterday, though, I am at least persuaded that the bill is within the scope of possibility of obtaining the President's signature.

This is very significant, because our labors could be totally in vain if we face an automatic or a promised veto. With our Cannon-Hatfield substitute I think we have removed that particular cloud hanging over the actions of the Senate.

I am again very grateful for the openness, the flexibility, and the obvious expressed desire on the majority side of the aisle for reaching some kind of an understanding and resolving this problem. Particularly I commend the leadership, Senator MANSFIELD, Senator HUGH SCOTT, Senator ROBERT C. BYRD, and Senator GRIFFIN for their intervention at a time when I think it was most appropriate to try to get this whole matter off dead center. Chairman CANNON has demonstrated many times in the committee and here on the floor his profound understanding of the details of this bill and of the previous bill, and also expressed strong philosophical commitments and viewpoints.

I again emphasize that none of us individually are looking at a bill we would personally sit down and draft, but because of our concern over getting this action moving and getting results, the chairman and all of the members have made sacrifices for that common objective of action and solution.

So I join with the majority, even with reservations on some portions of the bill, in asking my colleagues on the minority side of the aisle to support this bill and to exercise restraint in not voting it down, nor in raising up a lot of issues that could possibly be better undertaken at a later date. We still will have the legislative process itself at a future time, or, in the interim, by the Elections Commission, or by the primary review commission created in this compromise bill.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, I, too, wish to rise and compliment the chairman and the ranking Republican member and the others who were involved in this compromise. I think if I had to vote up or down right now, I would support it.

I agree with my colleague that I have never yet voted for a bill that was 100 percent the way I wanted it, and I suspect that if I stay here 30 years I would never get a bill completely to my satisfaction. I am not quite sure how certain features of this bill work, and I think some debate would be helpful on those. I think we are both aiming in the same general direction, particularly in connection with soliciting that middle group, nonunion, nonsupervisory employees.

I do not quite understand how the bill works without the solicitors knowing who they are, or without someone knowing who they are. I do not know how they can get a gage, or get some kind of identifiable, qualifiable instrument that can be turned in. I do not know how we can do that without violating the terms of the limitation of $100 on a national campaign.

I believe we want to go the same route. I do not want pressure brought on members and employees who may be recalcitrant. I am concerned about the question of primaries; does a convention count as a primary? Does the money have to be spent in a primary, or can it be spent in a general election?

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PACKWOOD. I am happy to yield, so I can figure out what some of the answers are.

Mr. CANNON. First, with respect to a primary, there is no limitation on spending other than the limitations that exist with respect to the separate, segregated funds; so it does not matter whether it is primary or general, we have limited it to two solicitations, and while it is true that it is not clear in the bill, I would assume that if a State does not have a primary, but has a convention, it would be my intention, at least, that the one solicitation could apply to the convention in lieu of the primary, and the other apply to the general election.

That was arrived at solely to fix the numbers, so that you could not have solicitation after solicitation.

Mr. PACKWOOD. I agree with the Senator. In other words, we are talking about two solicitations a year, period.

Mr. CANNON. That is correct.

Mr. PACKWOOD. But this could also be in a nonelection year; not just two to a campaign.

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. PACKWOOD. And the money raised in the primary does not have to be spent on the primary?

Mr. CANNON. No limitation on the expenditures, other than the limitations on contributions by the separate segregated funds.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Right.

Mr. CANNON. But that relates to another provision of the bill.

Mr. PACKWOOD. I think that before we are done here we can probably redraft that language a bit to make sure it reflects what the Senator and I anticipate—two solicitations a year, be it a campaign year or not, that is, with no continual dunning of employees month after month about "do you want to give?"

Mr. CANNON. But, mind you, that is only with respect to that particular solicitation alternative.

Mr. PACKWOOD. That middle group.

Mr. CANNON. That middle group.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Right. The unions do not——

Mr. CANNON. But the middle group is expanded through the definition of the term, so that that solicitation can go to nonunion members or to union members. It can be a solicitation by the corporation or the separate segregated fund of the corporation, or a solicitation by the union.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Correct.

Mr. CANNON. So it gets at the principal group that was excluded, let us say, in the nonunion shop.

Mr. PACKWOOD. So, in other words, a corporation can solicit all of its employees twice.

Mr. CANNON. In that fashion.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Union or nonunion; they can solicit shareholders and executive officers as much as they want. The unions can solicit all employees twice, and their officers and shareholders and members as much as they want.

Mr. CANNON. That is correct.

Mr. PACKWOOD. We are in perfect agreement on that. Now, to get down to the second part, about the union or no union; how does this physically work?

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oregon yield before he leaves the first point he made?

Mr. PACKWOOD. Yes.

Mr. HATFIELD. I think there is real confusion here in this language, and I would only ask the indulgence of the chairman at this moment to suggest that on page 39, in this language that starts with line 9, we are talking here about one contribution when actually we should be talking about one solicitation. I think changing that word would clarify this a little bit further.

I offer this only as a possible suggestion: to make this two written solicitations during a calendar year from any stockholder, and so on. We can go ahead and define it as both primary and general, or leave it in general terms to cover both a primary and a convention situation. But the bill now puts the emphasis on one contribution for the primary and one contribution for the general. Actually our emphasis was intended to be on the communication, the solicitation, which might involve contributions over a period of time rather than a single-shot contribution.

Mr. PACKWOOD. I think the chairman is right, because we always talk about the possibility of a checkoff. That should not be 12 contributions a year, with only a single solicitation.

Mr. HATFIELD. That is right. So I think it was a matter of semantics rather than policy that it came out with the emphasis on the contribution rather than the solicitation. The whole emphasis during our discussion, and I think the chairman will agree, was on the question of communications and solicitations. Again, this may not be the exact wording to correct it, but I think it could be clarified and perhaps be something of an answer to the Senator's question.

Mr. PACKWOOD. I think the way it reads, in addition, the corporation would be prohibited from soliciting even their own shareholders more than twice, and the union would be prohibited from soliciting its members more than twice. I think that is fine. This way, we would have two solicitations during a year, and I think that is enough.

Mr. CANNON. If the Senator will yield, we could even spell that our further by saying "any election." So it would not be interpreted as two solicitations for the general or the primary, or even the convention. The general idea we wanted to get over in the compromise was that they would not be solicited more than one time in the nominating procedure, and once in the general election.

Mr. PACKWOOD. But they could also be solicited twice in the preceding nonelection year.

Mr. CANNON. Because that is on a calendar year basis.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Yes, twice in a calendar year.

Mr. CANNON. Yes, the Senator is correct. But the theme we were trying to strike was in an election year, particularly.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Although we did use the language "in a calendar year," which would give them the opportunity to solicit in a year prior to the election.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GARY HART). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Oregon (Mr. HATFIELD) proposes an amendment to amendment No. 1516. On page 39, strike lines 12 through 15 and insert in lieu thereof the following: "to make two written solicitations for contributions during the calendar year from any stockholder,"

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, now we pick up with the same language that is in the bill. I will explain this briefly. I think it has been pretty well brought out in the colloquy up to this point.

In order to clarify the situation in those States where there are primaries, versus the States where there are no primaries, this new language would be broad enough to incorporate both situations.

Second, during the discussions that we held in the conferences leading up to this substitute proposal, it was very clear that our emphasis was upon the communication, the solicitation, for contributions. The language here—inadvertently, I think—tends to convey that the emphasis is on the contribution itself. Therefore, I think that the amendment is really more technical and perfecting than it is anything else.

So I suggest that it might strengthen the understanding of the intent of those who drafted the substitute and provide a more inclusive situation for those States with primaries or States without primaries.

Also, it provides for the emphasis upon the calendar year, which means that solicitations could be made in nonelection year, a year before an election, for example.

Mr. PACKWOOD. And the money collected does not have to be spent in the primary if it is collected before the primary?

Mr. HATFIELD. The Senator is correct, in that this removes any question as to whether or not such funds collected for a primary or for a convention situation have to be expended.

Mr. PACKWOOD. We have taken that language out altogether.

Mr. HATFIELD. That is right.

Mr. PACKWOOD. The only other question I have is this: I ask the Senator to look at page 38, line 25, through line 8 on page 39. That is the language that allows unlimited solicitation by corporations of shareholders and employees of unions and union members. With that language, you can solicit them as often as you wish. Is that language limited by what we have added, or are these people still exempt from the two times a year contribution by the appropriate organization?

Mr. HATFIELD. We go back to page 38, line 23, which says, "except as provided in paragraphs (b) and (c)".

Mr. PACKWOOD. That is fine. I want to make sure that our legislative history is correct on that.

Mr. HATFIELD. I think that is the qualifying language there.

Mr. CANNON. I interpret it to mean that that does not make a limitation on the prior provisions.

Mr. PACKWOOD. It does not?

Mr. CANNON. It does not make a limitation. So that a corporation, for example, or a separate segregated fund established by a corporation could solicit its stockholders and their families and its executive and administrative personnel and their families at any time and in any fashion they saw fit.

Mr. PACKWOOD. And as many times as they want, to their hearts content?

Mr. CANNON. That is right. The same applies to a labor organization and its members and their families. However, while this limitation does permit the solicitation of the same persons, it really gets the body of people who cannot be solicited by either the separate segregated fund of the corporation or the separate segregated fund of the union.

Mr. PACKWOOD. I agree with that interpretation.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, are there any other questions on the amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Oregon.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, I am curious about the second part of the paragraph and how literally the anonymity is protected. Let us use Sun Oil, which is the example everybody uses. Say we have a union pact fund and an employer pact fund, and they send out written solicitation to all the employeees of the company. The union says, "Please contribute." To what—"to our pact fund?" Is that the form of the solicitation?

Mr. CANNON. They can make it in whatever form they see fit. I assume that they would do it to their political action fund, whatever that is. I am not going to try to spell out on the floor of the Senate what they would do. If it requires spelling out, I think the Federal Election Commission is the one to do it.

The intent here is that they cannot send out a form and have it returned to them to indicate who the contributor is. There are many ways they could do it. They could establish that fund in a trust account in the bank and say, "Send your contribution in care of so and so at the bank." Obviously, many contributors would send in their contribution by check. That certainly would not be a violation, even though they could not protect their anonymity if they sent it in by check.

Mr. PACKWOOD. What I want to make sure of is this: Are we saying that this is going to be a specially carved out exception for recordkeeping? We are not talking about a separate segregated fund. This is really a second generation separate segregated fund run by a trustee in a bank, for lack of a better descriptive term. That trustee is prohibited from reporting the names of the people. I imagine that most of the money will come in by check, and he will have a record. If he is a good trustee, he should keep a record. Is he prohibited from disclosing that to anybody? He would not file anything with the FEC, and the FEC would have no right to look at his records in order to see where his money came from?

Mr. CANNON. We have considered a provision elsewhere that says—if the Senator is worried about the more than $100 issue—that the contributor, himself, must report if he has given, in the aggregate, more than $100.

Mr. PACKWOOD. But that destroys his anonymity.

Mr. CANNON. If the contributor wants to give up his anonymity, then he can do it. This provision is to protect the contributor.

Mr. PACKWOOD. The Senator says that the person we are concerned with is the contributor, and if he does not care, we do not care, if he wants to report it. Is that correct?

Mr. CANNON. That is correct.

Mr. PACKWOOD. As I understand the law, a contributor of more than $100 does not report. It is the independent organization of the candidate to whom the $100 is given who does the reporting.

Mr. CANNON. That is correct.

Mr. PACKWOOD. A person gives $100 to this trustee. That contributor does not have to report. Does the trustee have to report that?

Mr. CANNON. Obviously, he would. Whoever controls the fund, in amounts more than $100, would have to make the reporting, under the provisions of the law elsewhere.

Mr. PACKWOOD. The trustee, then, will have to keep track of everybody who gives, because we have this aggregation rule that if you give $25 five times, you have to report.

Mr. CANNON. We also provide that burden on the contributor, so that if he contributes more than a hundred dollars in the aggregate, he does it.

Mr. PACKWOOD. We do not require the contributor to report anyplace, unless it is an independent expenditure, and then we require it as an expenditure.

Mr. CANNON. Let me correct that. Counsel tells me that we did not adopt that particular amendment. We were considering it.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Unless it is an independent expenditure, to the extent it is given to a committee, it is up to the committee.

I take it that this means that the trustee must keep records of everybody who gives, so that when this aggregation problem comes up, the trustee can say yes or no: "John Jones did not give over a hundred dollars," or, "Yes, he did give over a hundred dollars."

Mr. CANNON. I suppose he would want to keep them. I assume that the FEC would set up some rules to govern this precise thing.

Mr. PACKWOOD. They have rules now on this aggregation of money, in the present law. It talks about aggregation.

All those who ran in the last campaign, in terms of keeping track of our contributors, recall what we had to do to make sure that we caught a situation in which someone gave us more than a hundred dollars in two or three sums.

In order to protect himself, the trustee will have to keep these records. Who has access to those records? Can the FEC come in before the election and demand to see those records?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly, the FEC could. These separate segregated funds are a political committee, within the definition of the act.

Mr. PACKWOOD. But this is a trustee account. We are designing this, really, for a different purpose than our normal political committee.

Mr. CANNON. One will not be able to go through a dodge by setting up a trustee and saying, "We do not want to report under the provisions of the act.'

Mr. PACKWOOD. I do not want to go through a dodge, either, but I do understand how it works.

Apparently, we are talking about a second generation political fund, an unrelated fund, not the first separate segregated fund that a SUNPAC sets up or that the union sets up as a COPE. I do not understand, on the one hand, how we protect the anonymity and you do not have access to it period, and on the other hand we say, "However, reporting is going to be required for certain circumstanees."

Mr. CANNON. There is no question as to the reporting that will be required under certain circumstances, though I can assure the Senator that he is not going to have to worry very much about the $100 contributions under these circumstances.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GARY HART). The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ABOUREZK). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, there has been a question raised on page 39, subparagraph (b), where the language reads that it shall not be unlawful under this section for a corporation, a labor organization, or a separate segregated fund established by a corporation or a labor organization, and then going on to the two written solicitations per year. The question has been raised as to whether that language might permit the corporation and the separate segregated funds of the corporation, both to solicit twice a year, and the same thing with respect to a labor organization and its separate segregated fund, to permit each organization to solicit twice a year.

That is not the intent. The total solicitation of the corporation and/or its separate segregated fund and the total solicitation of the labor organization and/or its separate segregated fund should only amount to two in a year.

Therefore, to eliminate any question on this issue, I propose an amendment on line 11, to strike the letter "a" where it appears in two places in that line, and insert in lieu thereof the word "such," and I propose that in the form of an amendment, Mr. President.

Mr. PACKWOOD addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Nevada send the amendment to the desk?

Mr. CANNON. I ask the clerk to state the amendment. I think the clerk has the essence of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

On page 39, line 11, strike "a" wherever it occurs and insert in lieu thereof "such".

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nevada is recognized.

Mr. CANNON. I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, I agree with the intent and I support the amendment. At some stage later, I have another question about the constitutionality of limiting these separate segregated funds.

I hope that this is constitutional. I support it, and when we have this discussion later on the constitutional issue, I will raise that issue. It is not appropriate here.

But I do agree, it was not our intention to allow four solicitations, two by the fund and two by the corporation that creates it, two by the union, two by the fund.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. ALLEN. This all occurs to me, even though these expenditures by these organizations are permitted under this statute. What about the possible stockholder suit by a stockholder who feels that this might be a misuse of corporate funds or funds of an organization, a labor organization, or otherwise?

Mr. CANNON. I think the court has already held that it is proper to establish a separate segregated fund and proper to communicate with a limited number of people. I believe that is adequate to cover it.

But, certainly, I would assume if the corporation did not have advice from its lawyers that they could do so safely, and they would not run any risk, they would not attempt to solicit the use of any corporate funds.

Mr. ALLEN. The separate segregated fund might do the soliciting and that would not be the use of corporate funds, is that correct?

Mr. CANNON. That is correct.

I would take it, in most instances it would be the separate segregated fund that would do the soliciting.

Mr. ALLEN. I believe that would be the answer.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Is the Senator from Alabama asking or talking about the initial solicitation by the corporation using corporate funds of its shareholders, saying that we want to set up a separate fund, please contribute to it? Is the Senator suggesting the shareholder, just because of that initial instance, might have a course of action against them?

Mr. ALLEN. I suggest that possibility and, right at that point, would that be one of the two solicitations permitted, when they announce the setting up of a separate fund?

Mr. PACKWOOD. No. The setting up of the fund is permissible under present law. The setting up of the fund is not a solicitation for contribution to the fund.

Is that the chairman's understanding?

Mr. ALLEN. When they announce setting up the fund, obviously, that is a solicitation right there. There is a need to cover that, it would seem, in some language.

Mr. PACKWOOD. If they are only soliciting their shareholders, we have already agreed on this, there is no limit to the number of times they can do that.

Mr. CANNON. There is no limitation with respect to shareholders. The only limitation applies with respect to what someone described as the unreachable group included in this amendment, and this amendment as it is now in the bill simply says that it shall not be unlawful for the corporation to solicit these people twice in a year in the fashion we prescribed, in writing by mailing.

Mr. ALLEN. I would not think setting up this fund, the original announcement would be limited to the stockholders; because they need also to advise the employees, I would think.

Mr. PACKWOOD. The initial setting up of the fund—that is a good question, asking could they solicit everybody when setting up the fund.

Mr. ALLEN. And they are to send that same notice, I assume, to the employees. They would be left in the dark about the setting up of the fund. That would be the solicitation unless it is covered in the language. It could be considered.

Mr. PACKWOOD. I guess, what I think mine would be, although in my estimation, a corporation can do two initial solicitations in setting up the fund, and to the group it can solicit as often as it wants, administration and friend, is not that expensive.

I would say a union or corporation solicited everybody and how we are going to set up a fund that would properly count as one of the two solicitations they are entitled to——

Mr. ALLEN. That is the point of the Senator from Alabama. The Senator from Oregon has come around to the view of the Senator from Alabama. That would constitute a solicitation.

Mr. PACKWOOD. The reason I think it is not an overwhelming problem is twofold.

First, one sets it up, and the stockholders or shareholders, as often as one wants. Second, once it is set up, I presume it is not going to be set up every year, it will be a continuing fund, and after first creation, an initial cost at least for the creation——

Mr. ALLEN. Would it or would it not constitute one of the two solicitations?

Mr. PACKWOOD. My interpretation, I do not want to be bound by it, if one solicited everybody——

Mr. ALLEN. By everybody, the Senator means employees, not the public generally?

Mr. PACKWOOD. I mean all corporate employees and shareholders. The union sends out a mailing, the corporation does, and says, "Please join our political action committee," that that would fit it as one of the two solicitations they are entitled to make in a year.

Mr. CANNON. If that is sent out in writing, in accordance with this provision of the act, that certainly would constitute one of the two solicitations.

Mr. ALLEN. And after that is set up, they have one more solicitation?

Mr. PACKWOOD. For that year.

Mr. CANNON. The Senator is correct.

Mr. President, I move the adoption of my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Nevada.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is open to further amendment.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, the question has been under discussion as to the problem of the $100 and over and the less than $100 contribution. If a person contributes more than $100, obviously it is required to be reported under the provisions of the law. To further define that matter in connection with the language in subparagraph (b) on page 39, which permits the written solicitations of two per year to the so-called unreachables, I have an amendment I want to propose on page 15, between lines 18 and 19.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Nevada (Mr. Cannon) proposes an amendment:

On page 15, between lines 18 and 19, insert the following:

"(3) Any person who makes a contribution in response to a solicitation under section 321(b)(3)(B) which, when added to all other contributions made by him to the same recipient during the calendar year, exceeds $100 shall report to the recipient the total amount of such contributions made to such recipient for that year. Paragraph (4) does not apply to reports under this paragraph.".

On page 15, line 19, strike out "(3)" and insert "(4)".

On page 16, line 8, strike out "(4)" and insert "(5)".

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, the purpose of this amendment is to make it clear that if a solicitation is made under the provisions of subparagraph (b) on page 39, and an individual sends in contributions that, in the aggregate, total more than $100 to a particular recipient, whether it be a trustee or a separate segregated fund, or whatever the designee may be, he must notify the recipient so that the recipient, to meet the requirements of a political committee under the other provisions of the act, can make that report in accordance with the law.

This is solely so that the person who maintains the fund would have that information available to make his reports.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. CANNON. I yield.

Mr. PACKWOOD. I agree with the amendment so long as what we are doing is clear. We are not requiring every person who gives over $100 to any recipient not in this section, but the Republican Election Committee, the Packwood or Cannon election committees. It is up to us to report that, and that contributor does not have to make a further identification of himself.

Mr. CANNON. The Senator is correct.

Mr. PACKWOOD. But because we are trying to avoid somebody lying under this particular section trying to guarantee an anonymity, if that person gives over $100 in aggregated sums, that person reports it to the recipient committee and that recipient committee reports it to the Federal Election Commission.

Mr. CANNON. The limitation is spelled out in the amendment if it is a limitation under the provisions of this section.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Right.

Mr. ALLEN. I do have a point I want to bring up as soon as the amendment is acted upon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. CANNON. I yield.

Mr. ALLEN. I would like to direct the chairman's attention also to page 39, starting on line 19, where it says that this solicitation shall be so designed that the corporation, labor organization, or separate segregated fund conducting such solicitation cannot determine who makes a contribution as a result of such solicitation and who does not.

I would like to inquire as to how in the world that will be implemented when they send out a letter asking people to make contributions and the mail comes in. Are they going to throw the mail away? What are they going to do? How could they keep from knowing who contributes, unless the contribution is made in cash? Then one would have to know who brought it in, I assume.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, we have had considerable discussion on that very point. This, I believe, is a proper area for the Federal Election Commission to design how an organization should meet this particular provision. We were talking earlier in our colloquy in terms of a trustee. They may say, "Send this to" such and such "trust account at the First National Bank. Send your contribution there."

The point we are trying to get to is that they cannot, in the designation of that form that they use, maintain a file of information as to who did and who did not contribute, because, as soon as we do that, we open the matter wide up to the pressure interests.

Mr. ALLEN. This duty of the segregated fund to file reports should not be delegated to a trustee, would be my judgment. In other words, somebody has to make a report of these receipts.

Mr. CANNON. Yes, but in the reporting provision we have spelled that out, if it is less than $100, the information concerning the contributor need not be reported.

Mr. ALLEN. Still, records have to be kept of what is contributed, whether the report is made or not.

Mr. CANNON. The Senator is correct. The records have to be kept as to the moneys received, yes.

Mr. ALLEN. Could the committee delegate that responsibility and clear itself of liability under the statute?

Mr. CANNON. I am not trying to say that a trustee is the method to use. I would prefer to let the Federal Election Commission solve this problem as to the mechanics of it. But if a trustee is used and the trustee makes that reporting as a political committee, I would say that that certainly would satisfy the obligation. But the obligation is not in the amounts of less than $100. It is in the contributions of $100 or more. We have just now spelled out that the contributor must let him know. This is to take care of the type of situation where a contributor, maybe, makes a contribution of $50 at one particular time as a result of a solicitation and then, maybe, makes a contribution of $75 another time. Now he has gone over the $100 and, therefore, his anonymity is not protected and that must be reported.

Mr. PACKWOOD. If I might respond to the Senator from Alabama, I raised the same question awhile ago and I still have misgivings about how it works—and I will vote for this provision—if there is a separate segregated fund. Taking COPE, for example, the national president of the AFL–CIO is Mr. George Meany. The secretary-treasurer is Mr. Lane Kirkland.

If all of these little contributions come in to COPE, I think we are fooling ourselves if we think that somebody who maybe we would not want to see them is not going to see them. I do not know how to get around that. With the corporation fund, probably the officers of the separate corporation fund are going to be the president of the corporation and the treasurer of the corporation. So we have this balancing act. We are going to require everybody over $100 to be reported but we have this difficult balancing act, and we are giving in to the Federal Election Commission to try to draw a rule that on the one hand protects the anonymity and on the other hand says, "But you better keep records good enough so that if we want to come in and see if there has been a miscarriage of justice, you have the records for us to examine."

Mr. ALLEN. The bill had a provision saying that if a corporation had a method for collection of these contributions, they would have to make the same method available to the unions. I am thinking about a checkoff contribution. If that was reported, too, that would disclose the names, it seems to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. PACKWOOD. We had just about reached that point. The Senator from Nevada and I have a disagreement. He says that an employee cannot authorize a checkoff. The fact that the employee does not care if he is known, he is happy to have his name listed on Senator ALLEN's reelection committee, the Senator from Nevada says you cannot use a checkoff.

Mr. ALLEN. Under this you cannot.

Mr. CANNON. Under this provision that is correct. That was the intent. This does not get at the stockholders. It does not get at the supervisory and executive officers of a corporation. It does not get to the members of a labor union, insofar as their union is concerned.

The Senator was referring to COPE. Obviously COPE is going to have records as to who contributes, I would assume, but they are members of the union and they are not in this untouchable group which is the one we are limiting.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Except that when COPE, which will be entitled to make solicitations at the homes or residences of these middle group employees, says "Please contribute," they can say, "Please contribute to COPE," and here comes through the check of this nonunion, nonsupervisory employee to COPE, and then COPE will certainly have his name and address there on the check.

Mr. CANNON. This will not affect the individual who may elect to do away with his anonymity. If he elects to send in a check he is free to do so. What we are trying to do is eliminate the pressures on the part of either the labor organization or the management organization, to be able to put pressure on the individual by knowing who he is and keeping a record of whether or not he contributes. Obviously if he wants to contribute by check he can do so, and if he does that they are certainly going to know who made the contribution, but then they will not be in violation of this provision of the law.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Certainly most people are going to make contributions by check. They are not going to run down with cash some place. If that employee can make a contribution by check, why not allow a checkoff? What difference does it make? What do you accomplish by saying, "You can make a contribution by check, but not through a checkoff"?

Mr. CANNON. What you gain is eliminating the pressures that would be applied to enter into a checkoff provision. This in itself is a form of pressure.

Mr. PACKWOOD. But that is another matter. We are concerned about the anonymity. The reason for eliminating a checkoff is because people's names shall not be known; but their names will certainly be known if they give a check. The Senator is saying the reason for eliminating a checkoff, be it by the union or company, is what?

Mr. CANNON. I am sorry; I missed that.

Mr. PACKWOOD. If the purpose of eliminating the checkoff is to make sure that nobody can be unduly pressured by an employer looking at this payroll records and saying, "Jones has agreed to a $2 checkoff, or has not agreed to it; if, on the other hand, Jones gives a check for $20, is not the same fact revealed?

Mr. CANNON. The same fact is revealed, but the check was given voluntarily by the contributor, and not as a result of pressure from someone else, either through a checkoff or any other system. It was just for the purpose of giving, so that a man who wants to say "I gave at the office" can do so.

Mr. PACKWOOD. That is what I am getting at. If the guy wants his identity to be known, he can be protected if he does not want it known under this provision, but if the man wants it to be known, why not let him use a checkoff?

Mr. CANNON. Because once you permit the use of the checkoff, you put the people in a position to maintain a list, and to be able to say, "Here are the people who have contributed by a checkoff; we better see about the people who did not."

Mr. PACKWOOD. But if they have a check, they are going to be able to keep track of the people who gave.

Mr. CANNON. Not if it is not over $100. The problem is not that great.

Mr. PACKWOOD. I am not worrying about the $100; we can take care of that. But I am talking about the recipient committee that gets a check for $50, and that is all you give this year. That committee, to protect itself, is surely going to keep track of that person's name and what he gave, so that if the FEC comes to that committee and says, "Let us see your records," they are not going to say, "We shredded them all under $100."

Mr. CANNON. They are not required to keep that record.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Are they not required to keep a record of and report contributions of over $100, or list? As I understand the law, they must keep the record of who gave.

Mr. CANNON. They are not required to keep such records. They have to keep the aggregate of sums they receive, but they are not required to keep the record of the man, address, and occupation of the particular contributor.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Say that again?

Mr. CANNON. They are not required to keep the name and address and occupation of the particular contributor.

Mr. PACKWOOD. I just wanted to make sure. This is where we raised it from $10 to $100 in the bill. So now anybody who gives a check for $50, the committee is not required to keep a record of who that donor was, that donor's address, or anything to do with that donor?

Mr. CANNON. This is the way the law would then read:

Every person who receives a contribution in excess of $100 for a political committee shall, on demand of the treasurer, and in any event within 5 days after receipt of such contribution, render to the treasurer a detailed account thereof, including the amount of the contribution and the identification of the person making such contribution, and the date on which received. All funds of a political committee shall be segregated from, and may not be commingled with, any personal funds of officers, members, or associates of such committee. . . It shall be the duty of the treasurer of a political committee to keep a detailed and exact account of all contributions made to or for such committee; the identification of every person making a contribution in excess of $100, and the date and amount thereof; and, if a person's contributions aggregate more than $100, the account shall include occupation, and the principal place of business (if any); . . .

Mr. PACKWOOD. All right. What do you have to keep if a contribution is under $100? We are not talking about contributions which never aggregate $100. Does the treasurer have to keep his name, his address, or anything else?

Mr. CANNON. He has to keep the amount of contributions made to such committee.

Mr. PACKWOOD. But not the identity of the person?

Mr. CANNON. But not the identity of the person.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Here is a contribution that comes in from John Jones to the committee. It does not have to keep a record of who gave it that money?

Mr. CANNON. The Senator is correct.

Mr. PACKWOOD. All right.

Mr. CANNON. Under the old law it was under $10, and the recordkeeping requirement proved to be so onerous on people who have had expeirence with it that we made the determination that that ought to be raised from $10 to $100.

Mr. PACKWOOD. I just want it to be understood what it is, so that the treasurers, this year, may realize they do not have to worry about that person's residence, address, or occupation, or whatever it is, or name.

Mr. CANNON. Wait; do not say they do not have to keep track of it. They have to keep track of the money.

Mr. PACKWOOD. But not the donor. What you would have, at the end of the campaign, even if the average is substantially under $100, you could have a tremendous amount of money given for which you would have no identification, because it came in amounts under $100.

Mr. CANNON. The Senator is correct.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. ALLEN. This method of solicitation under (b), is this cumulative as to any other method permitted under the bill?

Mr. CANNON. Yes. The answer is yes. In other words, a stockholder—the definition is such that it includes everybody—but a stockholder can be solicited without any limit. So really, what it in essence means is that people who are not otherwise reachable, whom we referred to a while ago as the unreachables because they are not stockholders, they are not supervisory personnel or executive officers of the corporation, or members of the labor union—those people can be solicited by their parent body unlimited in any fashion, so this is not a limitation on them.

Mr. ALLEN. Yes; that is the point the Senator from Alabama is making. In other words, a labor organization can solicit orally and in public meetings or union meetings without limit?

Mr. CANNON. The Senator is correct, its labor union members.

Mr. ALLEN. So really this method here just says it shall not be unlawful for this to happen; actually, there would be no necessity of the labor organization using (b) here, would there? In other words, they could solicit by word of mouth?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, I should say because under this provision they could solicit the stockholders of the corporation, if they wanted to do it; and under this provision they could solicit the nonunion people if they wanted to do it. Absent this provision, the only people they could solicit are their members.

Mr. ALLEN. But there would be no need of using method (b) then. Possibly I was not precise enough. There would be no need of using section (b) then to solicit their own members. That can be done at any time by anyone.

Mr. CANNON. In any fashion.

Mr. ALLEN. In any amount.

Mr. CANNON. The Senator is correct.

Mr. ALLEN. I see. Really then, the new ground that it produces, so to speak, is to allow a corporation or segregated fund to solicit in writing twice a year contributions, is that right, from the employees, whether union or otherwise?

Mr. CANNON. The Senator is correct.

Mr. ALLEN. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. The Senator is correct.

Mr. ALLEN. Really this gives corporations certain benefits and labor organizations certain benefits that they do not have under the rest of the bill.

Mr. CANNON. The Senator is correct.

Mr. ALLEN. I see.

Mr. CANNON. And it gives them the identical benefits with respect to from whom they can solicit.

Mr. ALLEN. I believe it is a good section, I say to the distinguished Senator.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, if no one has any questions at this time, I am prepared to yield the floor. I understand there will be other amendments offered and we will deal with them as we get to them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NELSON). Who yields time?

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, is it true that we are not under controlled time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold that request?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama.

Mr. ALLEN. I send an amendment to the desk and ask for it to be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Alabama (Mr. ALLEN) proposes an amendment:

On page 45, between lines 13 and 14, insert the following new section:

"ACCEPTANCE OF EXCESSIVE HONORARIA

"SEC. 328. No person while an elected or appointed officer or employee of any branch of the Federal Government shall accept—

"(1) any honorarium of more than $1,000 (excluding amounts accepted for actual travel and subsistence expenses) for any appearance, speech, or article; or

"(2) honoraria (not prohibited by paragraph (1) of this section) aggregating more than $15,000 in any calendar year.

On page 45, line 14, strike out "Sec. 328." and insert in lieu thereof "Sec. 329.".

On page 21, line 1, strike out "section 328 (a)" and insert in lieu thereof "section 329 (a)".

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. CANNON. Is there a time limit on this particular amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is a time limit of 30 minutes on this amendment.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, I would suggest the absence of a quorum for the purpose of letting Senators know that this amendment is now pending. I ask unanimous consent that the time not be charged to either side.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Parliamentarian advises the Chair that there is no time limit on this particular amendment.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The second assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that, at the hour of 2 p.m., we start consideration of the amendment that has been offered by the Senator from Alabama relating to honoraria.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, the purpose of the Senator's request is to allow Senators who oppose this amendment to be notified so they can be present; is that correct?

Mr. PACKWOOD. That is correct.

Mr. ALLEN. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Chair in his capacity as the Senator from Wisconsin suggests the absence of a quorum, and the clerk will call the roll.

The second assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NELSON). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, I have an amendment which I send to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

On page 35, line 18, strike the words "or House of Representatives,"

On page 35, beginning with line 21, strike the words "the Democratic National Congressional Committee, the National Republican Congressional Committee,".

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, a few days ago, I offered an amendment on behalf of myself, Senator STEVENS, and Senator BENTSEN, the effect of which would be to increase the amount which senatorial campaign committees and the House campaign committees could give to a candidate from $5,000 per election to $20,000 per year. After that amendment had passed—of course, we have intervened with this substitute bill, but, in the meantime, we have heard from our colleagues in the House, who tell us that making this applicable to the House committees would have the untoward and unwanted effect of raising expectations of House Members way beyond reality. They tell us that, whereas they may be able to give $1,000 or $2,000 per Member of Congress, with this kind of language, Members of Congress would come in expecting their $20,000.

I do not know whether we are going to be able to approach anything close to those kinds of numbers on the Senate campaign committees. We shall have to wait to see how our respective fund-raising events come out to determine how successful we are in that respect. But the House people assure us that it is way beyond reality and it would have the very mischievous effect of disappointing many Members of the House. Accordingly, they asked to be deleted from the special treatment which our amendment of last week gave. All this amendment, therefore, does is excise the words "Congress" or "Democratic Congressional Committee" or "Republic Congressional Committee" from the amendment, which, in turn, makes the amendment, the $20,000 limit, applicable only to the Senate committees and not to the House committees.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, that amendment is acceptable to me as the manager of the bill, on the basis that the Senator has stated it. I am willing to accept the amendment.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I thank my colleague. I ask for its consideration, Mr. President.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, I have no objection to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The second assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I send to the desk an unprinted amendment and ask that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

On page 25, between lines 4 and 5, insert the following:

PROHIBITION ON CONVERSION OF CONTRIBUTIONS TO PERSONAL USE

SEC. 107A. Section 317 of the Act (2 U.S.C. 439a), as redesignated by section 105, is amended by striking out "or may be used for any other lawful purpose." and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "may be contributed to him to the National committee or State committee of a political party, or returned by him to his contributors on a pro rata basis (as determined by the Commission), or contributed by him to another candidate."

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, the purpose of this amendment clearly is simply to correct a flaw in the present law which could, under certain circumstances, result in the conversion of excess campaign funds to personal use. This amendment would simply add a section whereby we would correct that.

I might say this amendment was suggested by Congressman BERKLEY BEDELL. I think it is a good one. We have talked to the manager of the bill and to other parties interested in this bill. What it would do, frankly, is to say that, in addition, if one has campaign contribution money left over, in addition to the two present ways in which that money can be disposed of—namely, to defray office expenses or to contribute to a charity—we are now providing three additional ways that the money can be disposed of without converting to personal use. Those are to contribute it to a State or National party committee, to contribute it to another candidate's committee, or to return it on a pro rata basis to the contributors.

We think this is important because be know historically that money has been converted from political committees to personal use if income tax is paid on it, and we would like to prevent that, and that is the purpose of the amendment, and I urge its adoption.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, will the Senator from Iowa yield?

Mr. CLARK. I yield.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Do I understand from the Senator's amendment that at the moment a candidate would be prohibited from giving this surplus to the National committee or a State committee?

Mr. CLARK. It is not clear whether they would be prevented under present law, but we would like to make it very clear, at any rate, that that would be permissible under the law.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Well, in that case, why strike out "for any other lawful purpose"? Why not add the Senator's amendment indicating this is a lawful purpose?

Mr. CLARK. Well, the reason we are striking "for any other lawful purpose" even though that phrase seems to us rather clearly to allow State and National committees to take funds is that we would like to make it possible in addition for them to return the money to their contributors as an alternative way of disposing of the money and to allow them to contribute to another candidate.

In other words, it is not at all clear that those other two methods we are now adding are permissible under the law presently.

Mr. PACKWOOD. I have no objection to the Senator's amendment, but I come back again why not simply leave in "for any other lawful purpose" and put in the Senator's definitions of lawful purpose, what that would include. What are we striking out when we strike out "or for any other lawful purpose"? What can a candidate now do with money that a candidate could not do with that stricken out?

Mr. CLARK. The point is under the present law it seems quite clear that a person can convert campaign funds to personal use if he pays income tax on it lawfully, and that is why we are striking that section and specifying the exact ways in which the money can be converted. In other words, it would leave the bill as it is under present law if we leave this phrase in, that candidates can indeed convert campaign funds for personal use.

Mr. PACKWOOD. What bothers me—and I agree with the Senator that they should not be converted to personal use—is what might be any other lawful purpose we are thinking of that is not conversion to personal use that we are striking out by striking out that phrase?

Mr. CLARK. Well, we are not aware of any other purpose for which campaign funds, in our judgment, ought to be used.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold his amendment then and let me try to draft an amendment because I agree with the Senator about conversion, but I would like to make sure that we limit it to that purpose.

When we legislate on the floor, things come up that we do not think about, and I would not want us to trap a member, unconsciously trap a member, of the House or of the Senate who is now spending it for a lawful conversion and which that amendment might strike out.

Mr. CLARK. I would be happy to consult with the Senator.

Mr. President, I request that my amendment be withdrawn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has the right to withdraw his amendment, and it is withdrawn.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The second assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I send an unprinted amendment to the desk and ask that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

On page 25, between lines 4 and 5, insert the following:

PROHIBITION ON CONVERSION OF CONTRIBUTIONS TO PERSONAL USE

SEC. 107A. Section 317 of the Act (2 U.S.C. 439a) is amended by inserting after "other lawful purpose" the following: ", except that no such amount may be converted to any personal use".

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, the amendment which was just read, we are convinced, comes closer to achieving the purpose that we had in mind than the original amendment that was offered because the problem that we face and that we want to try to correct is the problem of a candidate's converting campaign contributions to personal use. It is quite clear, based on present law, that that is being done or has been done. So we think by simply leaving the bill as it is but inserting an additional line which simply says "except that no such amount may be converted to any personal use" is quite clear and achieves the purpose which we want to achieve.

I urge its adoption.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from Iowa. I think we should have it clear in this colloquy, we should make it clear, that just because the Senator's previous amendment was withdrawn, it is still our assumption that money can be given to a State political or the national committee or any other political organization, subject to the limits that are now in the law as to how much you can give.

Mr. CLARK. That is correct.

Mr. PACKWOOD. The specific type of thing we are aiming at is literally converting it to personal use in almost an Internal Revenue definition because if you pay a tax on it you can take a trip to Europe because you are converting funds at the moment, and this is legal as long as you pay a tax on it. This will prohibit you from doing that. You can still use it for any purpose other than personal use, which is prohibited by law. By this amendment you cannot convert it to your own personal use just because you pay a tax on it.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator is absolutely right. That is the intention and that is the purpose. We think it would be a good amendment to this bill because it corrects a very, very serious problem, conversion of campaign contributions to personal funds.

I yield, Mr. President.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, the amendment is acceptable to the manager of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The second assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Oregon (Mr. PACKWOOD) proposes an amendment:

On page 40, line 13, after "request" insert the following: "and at a cost sufficient only to reimburse the corporation for the expenses incurred thereby,".

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, this amendment has been worked up with the chairman and I think is agreed upon.

What we are simply trying to do here is that if the corporation uses a checkoff to collect political funds, if it is legal, that they must make that available to the union.

This simply says that if the union chooses to exercise its privilege to use that checkoff, they shall have to pay the cost incurred in making the lists available to them and using the checkoff.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, I think that is a reasonable amendment.

We already have in the bill the provision that same system has to be made available to a labor organization representing any members working for the corporation. This would simply say they pay the cost attributable to making that method available.

I am willing to accept the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, if there are no other amendments to come up now, we have an amendment pending at 2 o'clock.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HASKELL). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Oregon (Mr. PACKWOOD) proposes an amendment:

Page 54, line 9, strike "or" and insert "unless the candidate".

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, this is designed to clarify the amendment offered by Senator TAFT a few days ago, and again I think there is unanimous agreement on it. Senator TAFT's amendment would restrict and limit the amount of funds a candidate could get unless he got a certain percentage of votes in two successive primaries. However, with now 30 primaries and who knows how many we will have, most candidates do not participate in all primaries. They just do not have the money and they choose to skip some primaries. By this language, we would allow a candidate to be exempted from this two-primary 10-percent rule if the candidate says, "I am not a candidate in that primary."

The Chair knows well what I am talking about because Florida and Oregon place candidates on the ballot. A candidate is on the ballot even if he does not want to be on the ballot. He may not want to campaign in that State, not spend his money there, but he cannot get off the ballot. He cannot sign a certification that says, "I am not a candidate."

This would make it clear that if a candidate notifies the commission that he is not a candidate in that particular primary, whatever the finish, the order of finish, or percentage of votes that the candidate received in that State would not be a factor in determining whether or not in two successive primaries he had received less than 10 percent of the vote.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, the amendment is a good amendment. I think it makes clear the intent that was desired, at least, in the discussion of the Taft amendment a couple of days ago. I am prepared to accept it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

RECESS UNTIL 2 P.M.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, if there are no further amendments to come up at this time, I move that the Senate stand in recess until 2 p.m., at which time the one Allen amendment would be the pending amendment under the previous agreement.

The motion was agreed to, and at 1:08 p.m., the Senate recessed until 2 p.m.; whereupon, the Senate reassembled when called to order by the Presiding Officer (Mr. GARN).

FEDERAL ELECTION CAMPAIGN ACT AMENDMENTS OF 1976

The Senate continued with the consideration of the bill (S. 3065) to amend the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971 to provide for its administration by a Federal Election Commission appointed in accordance with the requirements of the Constitution, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending business is the amendment of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, this matter probably should not be before the Senate at this time because, certainly, it was not necessary to make any different provision about honoraria that Federal employees and Members of the Congress can receive in order to meet the objections of the Supreme Court to the provisions of the Federal election law. But an amendment was passed in the Senate knocking out a provision in the bill which did place a limit on honoraria.

Up until last year, there was no limit whatsoever on the amount of honoraria, that is, payments for speeches or appearances, that might be received by Federal employees or Members of the House or Senate, or the judiciary, for that matter.

Congress in its wisdom then, feeling that some limitation should be placed on the amount of honoraria that Federal employees and Members of Congress might charge for appearances and speeches that they might make outside the line and scope of their official duties, placed that limitation at $1,000 per appearance with a limit in any one year of $15,000.

That was made a part of the Federal election law. But when the Supreme Court said that the Federal Election Commission was not so constituted that it could carry out executive function, it was necessary for the Congress, if it wanted the Federal Election Commission to continue in any meaningful fashion, to amend the law to reconstitute the commission by making the six members—or whatever number of members the Congress wanted to provide—appointed by the President.

It certainly was not necessary to lift the limitation that Congress made in 1974 in the Federal election law.

Mr. President, I do not speak only with reference to Members of Congress; as I say, it includes members of the Federal Judiciary and other Federal employees. They are adequately compensated without having some method whereby they gain additional compensation by making appearances before various groups, and—I am somewhat hesistant to say this—many times appearing before groups that have an interest in legislation that might come before the Congress and, unquestionably, the desirability of their speech and their appearance is springing somewhat from their official position.

I wonder how much in honoraria might be drawn by some member of the Federal establishment if he did not have that particular position with the Federal establishment.

Mr. ABOUREZK. Will my friend yield?

Mr. PACKWOOD. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. ALLEN. Well, two want to ask questions, and rather than favor one over another, I will just continue for a while and then I will yield to one or the other.

So what was done was to lift this ban? That was done some several days ago, but now, the substitute is pending.

What the present amendment provides is that we will return to the limitation that was written into the law when this Federal Election Commission was set up.

I believe, actually, it was in 1971. I believe that it was actually set up then. So this limitation has been in force for several years.

Why is it necessary at this time to lift that limit and to pave the way for payments of any amount that the Federal official might care to charge and that his listeners might be willing to pay, and no limitation whatsoever on the amount that an official could receive in a year's time?

Mr. President, just last year Congress over my objection and the objection of a number of Senators here, put the compensation of the Members of Congress on the same basis as Federal employees generally and this guaranteed the Members of Congress an annual increase in salary.

I believe last year it was some $2,100 based on the increase in cost of living. It would probably be considerably more this year. And each year the salary of not only Members of Congress, but every Federal judge, every Cabinet officer, every head of a Federal agency or a member of a Federal agency board, is going to get an annual salary increase.

Why, then, would we want to provide for no limitation whatsoever on honoraria that Federal employees, Federal judges, Members of the Congress might receive?

I believe a $15,000 outside income by Members of Congress should be adequate.

Mr. ABOUREZK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ALLEN. Just a moment, let me finish this thought.

Added to the present compensation of a Member of Congress, that would permit earnings of some $60,000 a year, and, of course, the Supreme Court is over $60,000 already and that would enable them to go up to $75,000.

I am delighted to yield to the Senator.

Mr. ABOUREZK. I tend to agree with what the Senator is saying. I have no problem in leaving a limitation of $15,000 per year, per Congressman, for honoraria.

The Senator made a statement that he thinks $15,000 outside income is adequate for any Senator. I probably would agree with that, as well.

I am curious to know if the Senator would accept the amendment I intend to offer which would limit any outside income, not just honoraria, but law practice income, stocks and bonds, dividend income, savings account income, rental income, business income of any kind?

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator is getting pretty far afield.

Mr. ABOUREZK. It is no more far afield than the Senator's amendment is.

Mr. ALLEN. That is the Senator's view and he will have a right to vote against the amendment, as I anticipate that he will.

I think the Senator certainly is going pretty far afield in suggesting that a person's income from investments he might possibly have should be limited.

I do not see any justification for that. If he would like to put in a separate amendment, I would have no objection to the Senator doing so. But I would have for him to burden down the amendment the Senator from Alabama is offering.

Mr. ABOUREZK. My desire is not to burden down the amendment, but to do as the Senator said; if it is far afield, it is only following his lead. He said $15,000 outside income is sufficient. I think he is right.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator does not quite understand the connection. The Senator from Alabama said that many of these appearances are based on the fact not, for instance, the Senator from South Dakota might be a great speaker, a great orator——

Mr. ABOUREZK. I will accept that.

Mr. ALLEN. And people would like to mirror his forensic ability. I would think that his listeners might be more interested in the fact that he is a U.S. Senator with an opportunity to vote in this body.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Will the Senator yield at that juncture?

I am curious now. I recall a specific appearance that Senator RIBICOFF and I had—in fact, it is the first time I met David Mathews—at the University of Alabama, in 1970. Senator RIBICOFF and I were both paid. The students wanted a Republican and a Democrat to come and speak specifically on the war. Is the Senator suggesting that the covert purpose was really to get Senator RIBICOFF and I there to lobby us on something that the University of Alabama had, some kind of secret purpose in this appearance?

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator can state what his motive was. I do not attribute anything to it. I said that many times the listeners were more interested in the fact that a person serving in the Senate or serving in the House might have influence in this body, and not necessarily on account of the forensic skill that the various speakers might possibly have.

Mr. ABOUREZK. Will the Senator yield on that point? Is that same statement true for someone who has a law practice and is serving in the Congress?

Mr. ALLEN. I do not know about a law practice. The Senator from Alabama does not practice law even though he is a lawyer. He does not have outside income from that source.

Mr. GARY HART. But if one were looking for a law firm to represent him, it might be nice to have a firm in which there is a U.S. Senator.

Mr. ALLEN. If the Senator will offer that amendment, the Senator from Alabama would be glad to vote for it.

Mr. ABOUREZK. I would like to offer it as an amendment to the Senator's amendment.

Mr. ALLEN. Wait a minute. That is assuming that the Senator would then vote for the amendment.

Mr. ABOUREZK. I would like to offer, at this time, an amendment to the Allen amendment.

Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk.

Mr. ALLEN. I have not yielded for that purpose. I yielded for a question only.

Mr. WILLIAM L. SCOTT. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. ALLEN. I yield for a question.

Mr. WILLIAM L. SCOTT. Mr. President, I appreciate the Senator yielding. I arrived in the Chamber during the discussion of his amendment, so I am not familiar with all of its provisions. I heard the Senator from Alabama refer to the congressional pay raise and also to a $15,000 limitation upon honorariums. I would be glad to support the distinguished Senator on the $15,000 limitation on honorariums.

However, I believe that oftentimes Members of Congress are unduly made whipping boys on pay raises. I believe it is fair to say—and I believe the Senator from Alabama is fully aware—that the only pay raise that a Member of the U.S. Senate has received since 1969 is one 5-percent raise.

There are some of us in this body who are wholly dependent or substantially dependent upon the salaries we receive as Senators. Moreover, the pay of members of the legislative branch of Government is below the executive and judicial branches. Both Cabinet officers and Supreme Court Justices are receiving more than $65,000, $22,000 more per year for Cabinet officers and for members of the Supreme Court.

I am not speaking in favor of a pay raise for Members of Congress, but I do believe, in fairness to ourselves, we ought to put this into proper perspective. I like to think of the legislative branch as a coequal branch of the Government. We live in the type of society where the salary a person earns does have something to do with his standing. We are making ourselves, through our own actions, second to, rather than coequal to the Cabinet officers, and members of the Supreme Court.

Perhaps the other branches are overpaid. However, we cannot do it to the Supreme Court for constitutional reasons and I rise merely to suggest the unfairness of continuing to criticize Congress without reference being made to the other branches of Government.

I have the greatest respect for my friend from Alabama, but I just sort of hate to see this done. I will add that I have accepted few or no honorariums during my service in Congress. So, $15,000 is $15,000 more than this Senator will make in honorariums.

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the Senator. I assure the Senator that the amendment of the Senator from Alabama takes into account that we are three coequal branches, because the limitation applies alike to the executive branch, the legislative branch, and the judicial branch. So all three branches of the Government are, under the Senator's amendment, being treated as coequal branches.

Mr. President, the general practice in the Senate is to take this amendment limiting honoraria that might be charged by any person in the Federal Establishment and weighting it down with other amendments to the point where it will be absolutely absurd. The Senator from South Dakota is talking about limiting what a person might draw in U.S. Government bonds or E bonds that he might receive on a payroll deduction plan. He is seeking to limit all sorts of things such as that and not facing the issue about how much it is proper for a Federal employee or a Federal official to earn in speaking appearances that would result in his receiving an honoraria or a payment for an appearance or a speech.

Mr. ABOUREZK. Will the Senator yield again?

Mr. ALLEN. I yield for a question, yes.

Mr. ABOUREZK. Would the same thing hold true for law practice income? Would the same thing hold true for dividend income from stocks and bonds in some private industry over which we, as Members of the Senate and Members of the House, have some sort of jurisdiction? The Senator is talking about a conflict of interest. That is what he is talking about.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator misses the point in talking about limiting a person's income from other sources. What I am seeking to limit is the compensation he gets for his personal services of an official nature. If a person might happen to have a Government bond, the income from that should not be proscribed; it should not be prohibited, as the Senator would seek to do.

I will say to the Senator if he feels so strongly about investments in Government bonds, or the like, he might offer a subsequent amendment.

Mr. ABOUREZK. I would like to, if the Senator will let me.

Mr. ALLEN. I say a subsequent amendment. Let us act on this now.

Mr. ABOUREZK. I think, to be fair, it ought to be considered with the Senator's amendment. That is all we are trying to do, to be fair. The Senator is singling out one kind of income. I think all income ought to be proscribed.

Mr. ALLEN. I just wonder if the Senator is interested in that or in killing this amendment by weighting it down with somewhat unrealistic proposals.

Mr. ABOUREZK. I have never been very good at putting anchors on other amendments or other bills. It has never worked very well for me. I am interested, as I stated before, in some kind of equality and fairness in this matter. I think if the Senator from Alabama, who is generally very fair in his treatment of everything, would continue that attitude of fairness, he would accept my amendment to his amendment. Because that would proscribe everybody's income. Why would the Senator want to discriminate against anyone's income?

Mr. ALLEN. I think the Senator understands when I say to him that investment income is somewhat different. Say, for example, that Senator PELL, who is reputed to be a man of great wealth, would not be able to stay in the Senate because he has investment income that would bring in more than $15,000. I do not believe the distinguished Senator from South Dakota would want to do that.

Mr. ABOUREZK. What was that again? I would not want to do what?

Mr. ALLEN. I do not think the Senator would want to see the Senate and the country lose the services of the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island because his investment income would run far beyond the $15,000.

Mr. ABOUREZK. I feel the same way about some of the other Senators in this body whom, if they do not earn over $15,000 in honorariums, we might lose. I do not earn that much any more.

Mr. ALLEN. Oh; any more?

Mr. ABOUREZK. I did not come anywhere near that last year.

Mr. ALLEN. I wonder if the Senator's use of the words "any more" has any significance?

Mr. ABOUREZK. It does, yes; because at one time I made considerably more than $15,000.

Mr. ALLEN. I see. I do not yield any more. Mr. President; I wish to conclude my remarks, and ask other distinguished Senators to seek the floor in their own right if they want to torpedo this amendment, which would place a restriction back on the amount of income that members of the Federal establishment—not just Members of Congress—can receive for personal appearances and for speeches.

I am wondering, as to the distinguished Senator from South Dakota, whether his services might be in such demand if he were not a Member of the U.S. Senate. I think therein lies the difference between investment income received by one Senator—not the Senator from Alabama, I am sorry to say—but therein lies the difference, in the playing upon one's official position. A limit ought to be placed on the ability to do that.

Mr. ABOUREZK. Would the Senator like me to answer that?

Mr. ALLEN. Take a member of the Supreme Court appearing before some body of some sort. The fact that he is a member of the Supreme Court would naturally allow his honorarium to go up from what he might receive if he were merely a practicing attorney and not a member of the Supreme Court.

Mr. President, the House bill has this limitation in it, the limitation that the Senator from Alabama is seeking to attach to this bill. In other words, it restates the present law. It puts the limitation at $1,000 per appearance, and a maximum of $15,000 in any 1 year. That is outside income, in addition to the $44,600 that is paid to a Member of Congress.

I believe that that should be sufficient. The House of Representatives thought so, and in the conference, no matter what the Senate does, the House bill will have that limitation in it; and if the Senate lifts the ban, that will not be the end of the battle, because it will have to be battled out also in conference, with the House taking the side of a reasonable limit and the Senate, up to now, being in favor of no limit.

I do not believe that Senators are that much more interested in obtaining outside income than Members of the House of Representatives, but maybe they are.

Mr. President, I have a modification of my amendment at the desk. I modify the amendment by substituting for it the modification which I have at the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The modification will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

Amend amendment in the Nature of a substitute to 3065 as follows:

On page 50 lines 10 and 14 strikes the following "616."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is so modified.

Mr. ALLEN and Mr. ABOUREZK addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator Alabama has the floor.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, this modification has exactly the same thrust as the original amendment. It approaches it in a little different fashion.

Let us start with the House bill, where the bill originated. The House bill has a provision repealing section 616 of title 18 of the United States Code. That is a section which makes it a criminal offense for a member of the Federal establishment—legislative, executive or judicial—to receive more than the limits that I have stated for appearances and speeches, that is, $1,000 per speech or appearance and a total of $15,000 in any 1 year.

The House bill repealed that section, but they put in another section carrying out the same thrust. That is, they provided for the exact same limitation in another section of this bill. Then when the bill came to the Senate, the Senate went along with the repeal of section 616, and the committee amended the amount that could be received, and made it a limit of $2.000 per appearance, or a total of $24,000 in any one year.

When that alternate amendment came to the Senate floor, the limitation was stricken out here on the floor by a voice vote. So the House bill still has the repeal of section 616 and the substitution of the $1,000 and $15,000 limits, putting that under the control of the Federal election law, but now here in the Senate, the alternate provision, which was as the House had it, and the Senate had it all the way through committee action, has been stricken out, leaving section 616 repealed and no provision in its place.

Instead of inserting or seeking to insert an amendment reimposing the limitation, the thrust of the modification is merely to strike out section 616 from the repealed provision.

So if this amendment is adopted it will accomplish the same thing as the original amendment, by leaving section 616 still the law in the Senate bill.

So the effect of agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Alabama, as modified, would be to place this limitation back in the Senate bill, the limitation of $1,000 per appearance or speech, with a maximum of $15,000.

I hope the Senate will go along with this amendment in order that the two bills will coincide and will mesh. In any event, as the Senator from Alabama said, the House bill, no matter what we do here in the Senate, will still have the limitation in the bill.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes; I yield for a question.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I am wondering if the Senator is aware of exactly how this language got into the bill, and to bring him up to date, although I know——

Mr. ALLEN. Yes; I am aware of how it got in the bill. I was on the conference committee where it was put in.

Mr. GOLDWATER. May I have permission to read only a few sentences as to how this came about?

Mr. ALLEN. As long as that is treated as a question, yes.

Mr. GOLDWATER. It is a question.
